"Wait for it to end," Hermione was shouting. "Wait! Wait!"

For the first time he heard what she was saying. Ethylene buildup from their respiratory processes produced the fuel for their breath. Discharging created a temporary vacancy where the flame would be inert. He'd have an opening. Ten seconds of one, at least, which was an opening in the same way that a fourth-story window was technically a fire exit.

When the flame ended, he took another foul breath, put self-preservation out of his mind, and dove. The smoke parted like shredded silk.

The Horntail peeled open the bony clamp of jaw and screeched at him, drenching him in heat so thick it stung his skin like acid. A bead of red glowed at the back of its throat. Its mouth yawned. The Horntail screamed, and the crowd bellowed, and though he knew the two were unrelated for one glowing moment he imagined they were cheering for him.

The bead of red spread to a glitter, and then started moving, wobbling like flame.

He wound back and pitched the bag like he was making a shot on the goalhoop.

It plummeted between the shipwrecks of its teeth and winked out of sight down the tunnel of its throat. He bent low on his broom and wrenched sideways as a final pillar of fire pierced the gray clouds behind him.

Self-preservation, which had been hammering furiously on the door to his brain ever since he ejected it, battered down the door and stumbled drunkenly back in. Fear followed belatedly, like a tardy partygoer trying to overcompensate, and wracked his body with an involuntary shudder, which entirely ruined his suave landing. He stumbled badly on the dismount, tripped on the Invisibility Cloak, and dropped hard into the dirt. His Nimbus skittered to the side and gave a hiss of steam where it connected with the dewy grass.

People were applauding. Someone was shaking him. He rolled over onto his back and got a full eyeful of sky for three honestly comforting seconds before it was occluded by a faceful of hair and panic.

“Draco! Are you alright?”

“Mmgh,” he said, as his body downshifted from immovable terror into fear-drunk jitters. “Mmhgrnyn.”

“You’re on fire!”

“Thanks,” he said distantly.

A harsh word slipped between her teeth, and she was wrestling out of her cloak, despite the windchill. She threw it down over his leg and tamped it down, and when the sensation returned to his legs he realized that the only thing he felt below the right kneecap was pain.

“Merlin’s f—”

“Hold still.” When she peeled back the cloak, there was a mess of char and something sticky along his leg and he gave a wild, high sound of shock more than pain — he couldn’t actually feel it too well — and she slammed her hand over his mouth.

“Quiet!”

“You keep quiet! My leg—”

“It’s not a bad burn,” she said. She was a good liar. He always forgot that, somehow. “Hold still. I can heal it.”

“Are you bloody well sure?”

“Yes, but you’ve got to let me work. Molly showed me this one, it’ll fix the tissue better than Episkey.”

“Suppose those came in handy,” he said thickly, “raising the twins.”

“She really is a very powerful witch, you know,” said Hermione, as if that were even in the first fathom of things he could give a damn about. “I mentioned her to Professor Moody the other day, and he said she was one of only three Order members who ever beat him in a duel. The others — you might want to hold on to something, if you’re squeamish. Ascepiomys.”

A strange bubbling sensation rolled up his ankle, and he flinched away from it — or would have, if she hadn’t braced her weight on his thigh with her knees. “That’s horrid,” he gritted, arching his back against the ground. She patted his stomach absentmindedly.

“Yes, I know,” she said. “It’ll be more horrid if we have to amputate, though.”

“What.”

“Joking! Joking. Trying to relieve the tension.”

The prickling sensation abated, and he sat up in a bruising crunch. His trouser-leg had been shredded to ashy thread, but the skin underneath it was smooth, with only a thin bridge of scar tissue where the worst had been.

“How does that feel?”

“Fine.” He rolled it this way and that. It was a remarkable job. Almost no stiffness at all, though the skin was faintly shiny, and when it pulled, his leg twitched oddly.

“I couldn’t see you.” Hermione seemed to be having trouble getting enough air. Her lip was bleeding. She said unevenly, “I had no idea where you were. Or what was happening.”

“Your loss. Just picture someone devastatingly attractive and fantastically daring, and add fire—”

“Shut up. I didn’t distract you, did I?”

She had, a little.

“For some reason,” he said, “the dragon was remarkably good at holding my attention.”

“Oh, good. God, that was so much worse than quidditch. Broomsticks are actually evil. I’m sorry about your trousers, by the way.”

“I’ll put them on Potter’s tab.”

A bout of applause echoed from the stands, and Hermione swayed to her feet. He clasped her hands and hauled himself upright, an exertion mostly on his part, because she lacked the strength Merlin gave a house-elf.

The gate to the enclosure shrieked open, and shouts swelled. Wizards swarmed the Shortsnout’s enclosure and hauled back the gridded ceiling of its cage. One with bright red hair jogged around the others, shouting and directing with his hands, and they lifted the dragon, flapping and thrashing out of its pit.

“Charlie,” gasped Hermione. “Hide—”

“Cloak—”

“Quickly!”

She threw the cloak around their shoulders, but it tangled in her haste, falling short-ways instead of long — there was an ungainly scramble of limbs and elbows in bad places — and she shoved them together and whipped the hood over their heads. At their age the Cloak was quite simply not big enough for two people, and she solved this problem by crowding into his chest like she intended to camp in his ribcage, apparently forgetting there were quite a few tender organs who had the idea first.

“Ow. Ow! Quit!”

“Then move!”

“You move!”

“I’m trying!”

The dragonkeepers wrestled the Shortsnout out of the paddock. His back connected painfully with the fence. There was an elbow in his spleen and a hipbone digging into his pelvis and hair bristling all up the side of his face, and it was hot, both residually, from the dragonfire, and inevitably, from the juxtaposition of two warm bodies in a tight space.

After the gate shuddered closed, Hermione sagged like a loosed bowstring. “Thank Merlin,” she murmured, mostly into his collarbones. “They didn’t see us.”

“Suppose they were rather busy with the creature trying to kill them,” said Draco, “good mate, that dragon,” and then she chuckled and looked up at him and his stomach vanished to another dimension.

He had failed until now to appreciate certain details of their physical situation. She was all spread up against him like jam on bread, connected from their tangled ankles to the flush of their chests, and his hands, which had grasped her elbows to extricate them from his kidneys, still braced her loosely by the arms. Under the Cloak it was muggy and acrid and somehow it still, impossibly, smelled like her hair, citrus and flowers and a tang of salt from sweat, cutting through the fug of smoke. It was so close he couldn't see her face altogether clearly, but through the haze of curls he could see the vague shape of her hard, intense little face, her passionate eyebrows, the bloodied flower of her mouth. A stroke of ash grazed her cheek.

His hand twitched, for no reason he could understand — inside his skull it was warm and humid and he was focusing on the suddenly difficult task of breathing — but in an apocalyptic feat of good fortune, this snapped her to attention, and she tore away like she was ripping off a bandage.

"It's a curious sensation," he said, surprised and pleased by the ease in his voice, "having one's pancreas introduced to one's appendix."

"You are such a baby."

"They're getting along, I think, but only because of induced fusion. Your elbow was doing a glorious job of mediating."

"An utter baby, at that. And about the oddest things, too." She sounded relieved. She picked up the cloak and looped it over her arm.

"I beg your pardon. I think facing a dragon entitles me to whinge."

"By all means, whinge away. You won't, though," she said, with offensive confidence. "If you happened to amputate yourself and stub your toe at once, the whole country would know about the toe by sundown, but it'd take a week for the arm to even come up."

Which was such a forthright and blatantly disrespectful analysis of his character that he retracted into sullen silence, reflecting on the severe disadvantages of allowing oneself to be understood.

The pitch brimmed with people. He'd never seen it so packed, even for a championship game. It oughtn't have fit that many people. Surely there was lap-sitting concerned somewhere.

On the way into the match, they were nearly flattened by a stampede of people coming up the stairs — the interlude between champions had been taken as license for all of bloody Europe to hurtle its way to the loo — and Draco nearly turned Theodore Nott into a green stain on the floor.

They scuffled apart, Theo's hair tousled, Draco's — it didn't bear thinking about.

"What happened to you?" Theo demanded, with extreme and offensive judgment. Hermione twitched her robe to cover his ripped trouser leg, but he suspected it might have been too late, because Theo's eyes lingered.

"Detention," he snarled. "With Hagrid. Rectal exams on a blast-ended skrewts. Nott, excuse me—"

"Did you see what happened to the Frenchwoman?" he interrupted.

"What?"

"Delacour. Her strategy. I don't think it falls within the parameters of wizarding magic. Pans was suggesting she should be disqualified; me, I take a more sanguine approach. I say, let her do the next one without a wand, if she doesn't need it." He glanced at Draco, searchingly, and Draco flattened his expression. Theo couldn't read what they'd been doing. The whole place smelled like smoke, anyway.

“No, we didn’t see it,” said Hermione loudly, “since, as Draco pointed out, we were in detention. Pardon us, but if we don’t move soon we’re going to miss Krum—” “What’d you get detention for, brains?” said Theo casually, leaning against the wall. Hermione set her jaw.

“Chronic lateness,” she said, and sidestepped him neatly into the stairwell.

Ron had done his best to save as much space as possible for them, but these advantages were on the order of inches, not seats, and they ended up crammed against the front of the spectator’s box, jostled by the slightest quiver of the crowd.

Gone was the slate of grass and three-pronged posts. There instead lay a barren rock pit, undulating and pitted like a lava field, sculpted at one end into a kind of nest. The only glimmers of green were strains of browned moss that laid thin over some of the rocks, smoking faintly. The sun had mounted the sky and fell in blinding waves over everything, making it impossible to see above the uppermost box.

“OI! YOU MADE IT!” Ron had to bellow to be heard. “GLAD YOU’RE NOT DEAD — FLEUR NEARLY WAS!”

“How’d she do it?” Hermione shouted, wedging her fingers in her ears.

“WHAT?”

“HOW DID SHE—”

“CHARMED IT! SHE SANG A SONG AND IT CALMED DOWN! MIONE, I THINK SHE’S PART VEELA!”

“Yes, Ron, we all know you think she’s pretty!”

“NO, I MEAN LITERALLY, SHE — never mind, talk later — LET’S HAVE A HOLLER FOR HARRY POTTER—”

The Gryffindor students had rallied into a group and were having a skirmish with the Slytherins: for each roar of “CAS-SIUS WAR-RING-TON,” followed by clapping, Fred and George launched into another, louder rendition of Harry’s theme song, which after several repetitions acquired the same quality as ‘A Hole in My Bucket.’

A podium of judges sat beneath the judges’ box, stocked with three unhappy faces and one equanimous Albus Dumbledore, who alone among the headmasters appeared undisturbed by the presence of several dragons in immediate proximity to his students. The fourth judge was the senescent Mr. Crouch, who seemed to have aged considerably since Draco had seen him at Halloween, though perhaps the light was merely less forgiving.

Ludo Bagman took Lee Jordan’s usual seat, his cheeks stretched like taffy in a cosmetically preserved grin. “LADIES! AND! GENTLEMEN! I TAKE YOU NOW FROM THE SUMMER FIELDS OF FRANCE TO THE FROSTY VISTAS OF THE HINTERLANDS… PLEASE! PUT YOUR HANDS! TOGETHER! FOR—”

He was cut off. All words vanished in a boom of cheers as Viktor Krum strode into the arena, his wand outstretched in the hostile grip of an advancing duelist. A red firework boomed and detonated over the pitch.

“VIK-TORRR KRRRRRRRRRRUM!”

The Shortsnout, aggravated by the noise, leapt into the air and shrieked. It had a thinner scream than the Horntail’s, close to a whistle, and it was feathered along the back and tail with a row of pale quills. Krum’s eyes went very wide, then constricted to slits.

“What’s he got to do?” shouted Hermione.

“YOU SEE THAT EGG THERE? UNDER THE LEGS? HE’S GOT TO GET IT!”

“Why can’t he just Summon it?”

Apparently Krum had the same thought, because after a moment, he lassoed his wand in a textbook execution of a Summoning Charm. The egg gave a thrilling leap toward him, but the Shortsnout slammed its foot down and crushed it to the ground with another piercing scream.

“THAT’S WHY,” said Ron.

The dragon did not take kindly to having its eggs jostled about. It bulked its throat and issued a jet of blue flame. Instead of dodging, Krum swept his wand and deflected them into a nearby rock, which blazed red from heat.

When the jet dissipated he broke into a breakneck run across the field, clearing a hundred yards of pitted ground with unexpected grace.

“There he goes! There’s the athlete of your generation, dear fellows, the seeker for the Bulgarian National Team, as you well know, and damned fast, I suppose they keep them fit over there. My, but he’s getting close to it! Very daring! Watch out, though!”

The dragon had flicked its tail, and a row of quills thudded into the rock behind Viktor. He ducked and slipped to the side, taking cover, and lashed two jinxes over his shoulder. They ricocheted off its scales and shattered two nearby rocks to rubble.

“WICKED!”

“Ron!”

“What? I’m still rooting for Harry!”

Krum flipped over the rock and scrambled up the side of the shelf. Another volley of quills narrowly missed him, and he sidestepped a jet of fire, rolling effortlessly under its wing. He was so close that he had to leap over its tail and dodge the sweep of its hind foot, deflecting it away from his head with a Locomotor Curse, and now he was out of its eyeshot it gave a snarl of aggravation. He danced back from another volley of quills, and it chittered forward, snapping its jaws at him.

“Luring it out! Getting it off the egg! That’s one way! But it takes some nerve!”

He snapped his wand like a whip, and ropes lashed around his wing, pinning it down. While it wrestled against the ropes, he dove for the egg, but then it gave a yowl and whipped its head around to snap at him, faster than vision, its teeth snapping. Bagman didn’t have time to do more than gasp.

Draco’s vision flickered and for a heartbeat he left the stands and watched a werewolf sink its teeth into Daphne’s neck, and then he was back and it was still happening, it was going to happen again, not again, not again.

Krum barked and punched it squarely in the nose.

The crowd bellowed. The Shortsnout recoiled, more stunned than hurt. Bagman was making noises of incoherent joy. Krum dodged a swipe of its claws and shot a red curse straight into its eye. Then he slid under its belly, vanishing for a moment under the curtains of its wings.

It tipped over in a squealing thrash, and slipped from its nest, falling thunderous to the ground. The shockwave sent Krum tumbling off his feet, and it looked like his head clipped the rock; someone screamed; it was impossible to make out what happened to him.

“DID YOU SEE THAT!” Fred, George, and Ron were all shaking each other like maracas. “DID YOU SEE IT? HE PUNCHED IT! HE PUNCHED IT IN THE FACE—”

“IN THE FACE!”

“IN THE FACE!”

Gasps erupted. Hermione seized Draco’s arm and squeezed until he could count the individual tendons under her thumb.

When Krum scrambled up again, he had a cheek full of blood, a leg full of quills, and two hands full of egg.

He raised them and gave a shout. A klaxon split the air. So too did a thundering roar from the stands, and no one stayed on their feet, not even Draco, for there was no hard-hearted Hogwarts loyalist who could fail to appreciate such an incontrovertible spate of badassery.

“He’s got it!” cried Bagman. “And in good time, too! A tidy five minutes, seventeen seconds, to Miss Delacour’s nine thirty-four! Of course, time won’t be dispositive — the judges score holistically, and he’ll lose a point or two for injury, I think — but nevertheless, well done! We’ll have a moment, while they take care of the beast…”

Dragonkeepers scurried onto the field and lured the Shortsnout away. As it staggered under one of the gates, another slid open, and the Ridgeback exploded onto the pitch with a shriek and a burst of fire.

“Good Lord, it’s hideous,” said Draco.

Ron cuffed him gleefully. “Don’t be rude! That’s Hagrid’s daughter, you git!”

“RETURNING YOU NOW TO THE BONNIE LOCHS OF SCOTLAND… THE FIRST HOGWARTS CHAMPION… I GIVE YOU… THE IRREPLACEABLE CASSIUS WARRINGTON!”

The champion’s gate opened, and Warrington strode onto the pitch, his wand held in a perfect western underhand. Slytherin all but put its voice out cheering for him. He smiled and tapped his temple in a salute to the judges' box, though Dumbledore gave no sign of having seen him.

He ignored, or perhaps did not near, the small contingent of Gryffindors that had started jeering. A few Hufflepuffs, including Hannah Abbott, joined in.

Cassius made it two steps inside and he leapt aside to dodge the flames.

When they abated, Norberta closed her mouth with a sort of satisfaction, and raked her claws over the rock in violent invitation, skittering sparks. Cassius took two quick steps back, eyes wide, and twitched his wand in an almost instinctive shield, over his chest; it was oddly human, for someone so polished. Then he rallied and shook out his hand, grimacing.

The first slash of his wand erected a wall of rock in front of his body, intercepting a jet of flame before it could charbroil him. The flames surged and burst against the black stone like a wave breaking on a dyke, flickering in a wide ring, and the edges blazed red. Cassius stepped around the side of his shelter and lashed his wand again, and something small and black began to pour from the air in front of it: a fluttering, writhing mass of feathers and claws that gradually took form as a flock of ravens.

"AVIS!" Bagman seemed perplexed. "That's a N.E.W.T.-level Conjuring spell, very dynamic, quite complex, and by all means, impressive — easily the most sophisticated spellwork we've seen yet — but it's not clear what he wants to do with them, unless it's to owl for help!"

Laughter pittered from the Gryffindor stands. Cassius sent a sour look at the judge's box, but shook it off and finished conjuring the flock, which rose in a fluttering cacophony of rancid shrieks. As the Ridgeback gave another scream, he ducked around the other side of the rock wall and lashed his wand at it.

The flock lifted, like it was of one mind, and soared at the dragon. The Ridgeback arched its neck and issued a yellow ribbon of fire that seared a full flank of the flock out of existence; but there were still more left, and they swarmed its head, their small bodies slipping through the irked lashes of its claws and tail.

“Oppugno!” Bagman had transformed from confusion to delight. “Well, there you are! Quite clever! Just the thing, too! Now she’s well and distracted.”

Cassius darted across the field, making good time over the uneven surface. Slytherin was roaring for him; Ravenclaw was roaring for him; even most of Hufflepuff, at this point, was pleased at the elegance with which he had distracted the dragon, which swayed and snarled, trying to claw away the black cloud of feathers that encircled her head. They were pecking at her face, claws scrabbling on the hard lacquer of scales, beaks jabbing around for a chance at the eye — the leathered skin of her eyelid snapped shut, and she gave a shriek, struggling back from the ravens’ claws.

“And there he goes! Off to the races, right up the rock face, and the dragon still distracted, but he’ll still have to get the egg, and time’s a-ticking, Mr. Warrington!”

Cassius was scaling the nest: neat short flicks of his wand carved footholds in the stone, and he mounted them, quickly, each crumbling at the touch of his foot. At the top he dropped to the ground as the dragon’s tail came whipping around and nearly beheaded him; the stands gasped; but he staggered up again and pointed his wand at the eggs, his mouth moving.

Norberta snapped up the last of the birds in her mammoth jaws, and then whirled around, in time to see Cassius’ spell shatter the entire nest, scattering shards of egg like shrapnel.

Only the gold egg remained untouched, sitting in a white bed of rubble.

“No,” said Hermione faintly.

Norberta nosed at the crumpled shells and gave a panicked scream. She whirled and spat a spear of flame that almost grazed Cassius, but he did a neat deflection with a backhand flick of his wand and pointed his wand over his head, conjuring something — a shimmer in the sharp morning light — resolving gradually into the misty shape of an egg.

“He’s conjuring a decoy!” Bagman was speaking in a whisper, like the dragon might hear him and catch on. “Luring her away… that’s another piece of very hard magic, illusion magic… Mr. Warrington is giving us a bit of an exhibition, isn’t he? Hogwarts’ best and brightest, to be sure!”

“It’s not that difficult,” muttered Draco. “Bagman’s a quidditch player, how would he even know?”

But Hermione appeared not to hear him; she was still shaking her head.

“He destroyed the eggs,” she said thickly. “That’s not—”

“They’re not real eggs, Granger.”

“I know that! She doesn’t!”

Norberta screamed and surged, but Cassius twitched the illusion out over the cliff face. She buckled and gave a low, almost plaintive whine, her tail thrashing here and there, but as he lowered his hand, her head dipped with it.

“Dragon taming!” Bagman was thrilled. “That’s a technique right out of Darrian Dragonsbane’s classic compendium! Clever as anything! Of course, a dragon has terrible eyesight, so they’re very susceptible to illusion! Shows a real appreciation for the history of the thing, too.”

Norberta scrabbled through the shards of her false eggs with her claws, wailed, and made a sudden leap for the illusion. Cassius waved it out of existence, pivoted, and cast it again in the air to her right; she beat her wings and rose, her shackle rattling, to desperately swipe at the retreating illusion of her egg, which was thin and disappearing in the bitter midmorning sunshine.

When she had strained her shackle to the very limit, baying and flapping her wings, Warrington calmly strode forward and collected the egg from the nest. He twitched his wand over his shoulder.

The illusion disappeared; Norberta gave a scream of grief.

“It’s horrible,” said Hermione thickly. “It’s just — horrible.”

“It’s all fake,” said Draco tightly. “He got the egg.”

“Yes, but she’s heartbroken!”

“Nonsense. She’s a dragon.”

“Listen to her,” she said, and she wasn’t wrong: the sounds coming from Norberta’s throat were miserable and vile. She sank in a crumple of wings and scales to list on the broken nest, nosing desolately at the shards beneath her, while Warrington hopped down from the nest and strode over to the mediwizards, who barely gave him a once-over: he hadn’t taken a single hit.

“At five minutes, twelve seconds, that puts Warrington in the lead, with respect to time — again, not dispositive, but certainly looks good for him, doesn’t it? With zero injuries, and flawless execution on every spell, methinks the judges will have quite the hard time finding a reason to deny Mr. Warrington his due!”

“Listen to him, he’s drooling.”

“He shouldn’t speculate,” said Hermione, frowning.

“He’s not incorrect,” said Draco. Both of them shot him dirty looks, but he rolled his eyes and shrugged them off. He was right. Cassius hadn’t done anything they could dock him points for.

“A hard act to follow... But not impossible! Let’s have our last champion of the day, and we saved the best for last — well, in the dragon department, the jury stays out on the champion — but our second Hogwarts contender, you know him and I know him, the Boy Who Lived, the Chosen One, the man you’ve all been reading about in the papers: HARRY POTTER!”

Harry tottered out of the gate on none-too-steady legs, gazed stupefied at the audience above him, and then took his wand out, apparently as an afterthought. Gryffindor gamely screamed for him.

Hermione turned around and put her hands over her eyes.

The Horntail limped in at the other end of the enclosure and hunkered over its clutch of eggs. It might have been wishful thinking, but it was slower than the others had been. Its eyes were lidded. Its tail dragged listlessly over the stone, and when it snorted fire, it came out in tiny puffballs, not the long bursts.

“It worked,” whispered Hermione. She was peeking through the lens of her third and fourth finger.

“Well, now you’ve jinxed it.”

“Don’t say that!”

“Merlin. Joking.”

The Horntail cracked its jaws and spat a bolt of flame at Harry. He dropped on his belly and popped back up with a springy push-up that would have made Oliver Wood applaud. Three years of square meals and a summer of work at the Burrow had started to give him Wood’s sort of frame, and when he straightened up, hard-faced and squinting, it suddenly seemed remarkable that he could have ever been small.

Bagman cleared his throat. “He’s got strength! That’s clear enough!”

Harry was avoiding his wand like there was some sort of fungus on it. He darted across the pitch with remarkable agility, flexing the full suite of his athletic skill, which would have been impressive if the Tournament was a tumbling competition, and there wasn’t anything that he actually needed to do. It was possible, to Draco’s very credulous dread, that Harry had been so flabbergasted by the piss-worthy fear of Big Bloody Dragon that he’d forgotten about the Task altogether.

“I don’t think they let him take coaching, Granger.”

The pressure of her nails left pink splotches on her face. “What’s he doing? Why won’t he just use his sodding wand?”

“Performance anxiety,” he suggested, gripping the handrail. “He didn’t land it, those last few times.”

“That doesn’t count. By then the mice were all dotty anyway, you could hardly tell. Oh!” Harry leapt over a lazy swipe of the dragon’s barbell tail. He soared through the air and landed neatly in a crouch, hopping across the lava field with quick canny footwork.

“Fun fact about Harry Potter, he’s also a seeker,” said Bagman conversationally, as Harry fled the Horntail in a vaguely slapstick chase around the arena. “Youngest player on the Gryffindor team in some years, and recently a champion of the House Cup, a natural prodigy, as I’m told… ooh, good jump… by jove, the Horntail doesn’t seem quite bothered with him, does she?”

This, in Draco’s opinion, an insulting understatement. The dragon very much wanted him dead, but it was having some logistical trouble getting there. It limped after him, wobbling drunkenly on her legs, and sent weak snarls of fire that always flickered out shy of his feet.

Harry took a flying leap and slammed against the side of the nest, hauling himself up by his arms. The Horntail limped after him, groaning sluggishly.

When he reached the top he spun around, and the Horntail reared up on its hind legs, shuffling forward. Finally, finally, Harry lifted his wand.

The tail whipped around and caught him in the side.

“POTTER!” roared Bagman, leaping out of his seat. “Great Scott! Someone get him! Please! Look out! No!”

He sounded beside himself in distress. Mr. Crouch leaned over and said something sharp to him, frowning, and Bagman cut himself off, hands wringing anxiously.

Harry flew. The stands screamed. He caught a full ten feet of air and then slammed against the rock, a bad landing. When he stood up there was a rash of blood running from his temple to his neck and the right side of his uniform lay in tatters. He swayed, hard, and then dropped to his knees and fumbled for something on the ground—

“Glasses,” moaned Hermione. “The strap— I told him—”

The dragon shuffled over towards him, grunting and nosing the ground.

“POTTER! UP, BOY! MOVE!”

This, in Draco’s opinion, was far beyond the pale of a commentator’s purview; Bagman had the microphone in one fist and appeared to be trying to swallow it; he was not really commentating so much as attempting to give Harry directions.

Harry fumbled across the rock.

“THAT’S RIGHT!” Bagman was hysterical. “THAT’S RIGHT! JUST THERE! NOW GO, GO ON — WATCH IT THERE, POTTER— LEFT! LEFT! GO LEFT!”

There was a squeal of feedback, and his voice died; Barty Crouch sat back with a cold expression, holding the severed cord of the microphone in one hand, while Bagman mouthed furiously and silently into the inert mouthpiece, his voice swallowed by the roar of the stands. The two men immediately bent towards each other and started arguing.

Always receptive to good coaching, Harry rolled left, and narrowly avoided another sweep of the creature’s tail.

The Horntail flicked open its leathery wings, swept its head down and opened its jaws. The telltale ripple of heat twitched the air before her face, blasting back the hair on Harry’s head. But it was slow. Just slow enough.

Something glinted on the ground under the Horntail’s wing. Harry dove for it and threw himself into a somersault. When he came up, he was holding a wand in his hand, and his glasses sat on his nose.

The dragon swiveled its head, and now he was so close that even a weak jet of fire would immolate him.

He shouted something, and a yellow jinx darted into the center of its throat.

The dragon reeled back drunkenly and fell, swiping feebly at the air. It rolled to the ground, and was still, its side moving in the slow deep breaths of unconsciousness.

Harry scrambled into the nest and snatched up the egg.

“...YES! YES! YES! HE DID IT! AND THE FIRST TASK IS FINISHED!” Bagman’s voice swelled back into being, projected from the tip of his wand, while Crouch bellowed at him and tried to repossess it; but Bagman gleefully danced out of his reach. “Harry Potter, coming in with a time of six minutes and twenty-one seconds, with the strongest magic we’ve seen yet today! To think! Fourteen years old, with a Stunner that takes down a Hungarian Horntail — I’ve seen four men try the same, folks, with no such results — haven’t seen its like since Dumbledore himself — a remarkable, remarkable thing!”

A surge of movement hurled Draco against the railing. The fresh scar on his leg twinged stiffly, and he threw an elbow with juvenile menace at the nearest head. Gryffindor was screaming. So were the other houses, mostly. It was hard not to.

Professor McGonagall was rushing onto the field, along with some more dragonkeepers, who had not the slightest trouble shepherding the dizzy Horntail back to its paddock. Behind her, Professor Karkaroff followed with Krum in lockstep, and Madame Maxime and Fleur kept graceful stride; at the rear of the pack, Cassius strolled along, waving indulgently at the roar that greeted him.

McGonagall reached Harry first. She bent over him, saying something fierce and quick that was lost in the roar, and Harry nodded back. Then she clapped his shoulder like she was driving a spoke into the ground, and he stumbled into the arms of the mediwizards, grinning.

Cassius shouldered his way to the front of the pack and extended his hand to Harry, ignoring the coat of grime and moss on it. He said something; he wasn’t smiling, but he didn’t seem angry, either. After a beat of palpable confusion, Harry shook it. Somewhere, a flashbulb ignited.

Once the handshake was completed, Cassius pivoted and did not look at Harry again, though perhaps that was because McGonagall had hauled him back into the arms of the mediwizards. Krum and Fleur were chatting in a sort of idle way behind Karkaroff, Fleur gesturing with her wand, Krum nodding; both of them seemed rather relieved to have it all over with. Every so often Krum had to swipe a dribble of blood off his forehead, with such absentmindedness that it seemed more a nuisance than injury.

Students were flooding out of the stands, now, and while teachers blocked most of them from entering the pitch, a few slipped past and managed to duck the bouncers: a sleight girl of perhaps ten shot out of the competitor's tent, her golden hair bouncing, and draped herself around Fleur's shoulders like a delicate porcelain mantle. A few Durmstrang students came out and formed a fluttering cocoon around Krum, who batted off their attentions awkwardly. Dumbledore remained at a distance. He dipped his head at Harry and Cassius, each, in turn, but he did not come forward, as the other headmasters had done, to comfort either champion; and Draco was grateful. He wasn't sure which would have been worse.

Then Crouch, Bagman, and the headmasters had drawn away and bent their heads together. At first, there was much collective nodding, as if there were little disagreement. Karkaroff said something; Dumbledore seemed to agree. Maxime, though obviously displeased, shrugged and nodded. The next round of deliberations made Karkaroff's expression grow pinched, but when he raised his voice, Crouch looked at him and said something that made everyone in the circle fall briefly silent.

"I wonder what's taking so long," said Hermione intently, watching them. "I don't suppose there's any way for us to hear…?"

"Fleur scored low," said Draco, watching Maxime sulk and pluck at her shawl. "Krum did well, but not as well as Karkaroff wanted him to. They're trying to decide Potter's score."

"How do you know?"

"Just look at them. Besides, Potter's the only one they haven't had time to grade yet."

Dumbledore broke the tension with a calm remark to Bagman. Crouch began saying something else, but then Bagman interrupted him, once, then twice — they broke off into a private conversation, and had a brief, heated argument of whispers, while the headmasters gazed on in confusion — and then they turned back to the circle. Crouch said something.

Maxime let out a high, furious cry. Dumbledore reached out to touch her shoulder, but she slapped it away, and stalked off, leaving the judges to stand awkwardly in an incomplete ring. When they broke apart, none of them looked particularly happy.

“The judges have come to a conclusion,” said Bagman brightly. “Scores are allotted out of fifty; each judge has ten points to give. I will note that the outcome is terribly, terribly close! This is still very much anyone’s game, as they say.

“In fourth, with a composite score of thirty-six: Fleur Delacour.” The Beauxbatons students applauded weakly and jostled their champion. “In second, with a score of thirty-nine points: Viktor Krum.”

Ron was bellowing again before Bagman had finished with the second-place announcement. Draco sighed and delicately inserted his fingers into his ears.

“And tied for first, leading by two points, with a score of forty-one points each: Cassius Warrington and Harry Potter!”

Krum’s mouth puckered. Karkaroff scowled and broke into a heated exchange of whispers with Crouch.

“Embarrassing, Potter,” shouted Draco. “Underperforming, as usual!”

Harry whirled around, clutching his head, and made a spastic gesture with his hands. Ron was so excited that he had to start slap-boxing Seamus.

“Well done, all of you!” Bagman cried. He was beaming. Draco got the feeling he would’ve worn the same expression if the dragon had eaten them. “You’ll get a nice long break before the Second Task, on February twenty-fourth. Whereas the First tested your courage and daring, the next will test your reason and ingenuity. If you look down at those golden eggs you're all holding, you'll see that we've already furnished you with a clue."

Fleur raised her hand. "Excusez-moi," she said clearly, pointing at the egg. Her voice was faint, and tinny, but clear. "What eez zis for? Why do I 'ave to carry it?"

"Well, I can't tell you that," Bagman said indulgently. "It wouldn't be much of a puzzle if I did! Any other questions?"

"The egg's a puzzle?" breathed Hermione.

"Down, girl," he said. She turned pink.

Fleur had handed off the egg to Madame Maxime, apparently uninterested in it. Krum had shuffled away from the group and Karkaroff followed him, muttering aggressively, though Krum didn't seem to pay much attention.

"No?" said Bagman. "Well, good! Off you go, then! And congratulations, again, to every one of you!"

They were bundled up in the gridlock of the crowd and swept down the narrow wooden staircases, caught in a frenzied babble of theories and verbal replays, reenactments, and exhortations of joy. A trio of third years were singing Harry's song. A pair of Ravenclaws were furiously debating the technique of Cassius' illusion. Fred and George were passing out POTTER POWER pins for three sickles apiece, and Draco was quite sure Harry would never see a knut of it.

And as they were spilling out into the sun-drenched afternoon, he overheard Lavender Brown saying to someone: "Not that I'm not happy for him, but it was a bit lame, wasn't it, Harry's dragon? Thing was practically falling asleep."

“First place! Not bad, Harry! Not bad at all! Tens from Dumbledore and Bagman, a nine from Maxime, seven from Crouch, and a five from Karkaroff. Five!” Ron tossed a bit of popcorn in the air and caught it in his mouth. “An’ he only wen’ tha’ low because Dumbledore gave Krum an eight—”

“Which, frankly, is more than he earned,” interrupted Draco. “Trying to wrestle a dragon down is like using a sledgehammer when the task is opening a door.”

“They’re nutters!” Harry lolled back in his chair. His legs sprawled over the armrest, and he nursed a flagon of butterbeer and a sported paper crown lopsided on his head, like a heavily discounted young Arthur. “I thought Warrington would take it for sure!”

“For what? Between Warrington breaking the eggs and your Stupefy of the century, things must have shaken out even,” said Draco. He had stolen a hot toddy from one of the seventh years and was enjoying it in the comfiest corner of the leather sofa, with his feet sprawled on an ottoman firmly in range of the fireplace. He was wearing a silk lounge robe and altogether enjoying himself tremendously. The party in Gryffindor Tower had petered out around one or two in the morning, when Fred and George performed a rendition of “Save a Broomstick, Ride a Seeker” that brought McGonagall hammering on their door.

“Nah. Bagman loved you. As for Karkaroff and Crouch, they don’t even pretend to be fair. Five points off for timing? Don’t make me laugh.”

“I’ll say Bagman loved him,” said Draco. “I think he was about to leap in and try his hand at the dragon, himself.”

Harry grinned and scratched the back of his neck. “Yeah. I dunno — he tried to give me advice ahead of time, too,” he said. “He was telling me this story about using the Conjunctivitis Curse to deal with a ‘fire wyrm,’ and he’d expect a fourth year could do it, no problem — really not subtle at all, I reckon he thinks I’m pretty thick.”

“But that’s against the rules,” said Hermione, aghast — so caught up in her indignation at maladministration, apparently, that she appeared to forget she had conspired to cheat.

“What’s more, it doesn’t make sense,” said Draco. “Potter’s no one to Bagman; if anything, he should be pulling for Warrington. He’s the Ministry favorite.”

“Maybe he likes me,” said Harry. “I’m a likable person.”

“Oh, I know,” said Ron, sounding surprised as anyone. “Gambling. Ludo Bagman’s a huge gambler. I bet he’s got money riding on Harry.”

Hermione made another scandalized noise.

“Apart from how horrendously unethical that is,” she said, “it doesn’t make any sense — I mean, I love you, Harry, but you’re not exactly the safe bet—”

“No, that’s consistent,” said Draco abruptly, nodding to Ron. “You can get better margins with the underdog. Hardly anyone will wager against Warrington, he’s slated to win—”

“—and you pay a premium if you bet on the favorite,” agreed Ron. “Since it’s likely. But with the underdog, if there’s an upset, you can get really big payouts — two-to-one, three-to-one, even, the more unlikely it is — and you don’t necessarily have to bet on Harry to win it, either—”

“Just to lose it by no more than a certain threshold of points.”

“Right, yeah. Fred and George went through all this for the World Cup,” explained Ron. “This is how they made all that money on Ireland. Of course, Bagman still hasn’t paid them back—”

“Oh, well, that’s it, then,” said Draco lazily, gesturing with his drink. “I expect he’s got outstanding debts from the Cup, and he’s put his money on Potter to get them back. No wonder he's so eager; it's been months. His creditors will be rather anxious."

"I don't think they should be judges at all," said Hermione firmly, wrapping her arms around her knees. "If you're right, Bagman is breaking the law egregiously, trying to bet on an activity he's moderating. And why are three of five judges British? That's hardly fair."

"Thank God they are, if it gave Harry a leg up," said Ron. "But I reckon we should keep an eye on Karkaroff. He'll be judging again for the Second Task, and I bet he's got it in for you, now, Harry — since you beat Krum."

"Potter will have to simply perform so well he can't mark him down without showing himself corrupt."

"Easier said than done," Harry pointed out. "Hey, speaking of the Second Task."

He handed the egg to Hermione. "Merry Christmas," he said. "I fought a dragon for it. Dunno how to open it, though. I dropped it, but it didn't crack."

"You dropped it?"

"Sometimes I despair of you entirely," said Draco. He reached for it, and she handed it over with proprietary reluctance, as if she'd laid the thing herself. "To be clear: the judges said it was a test of reason and ingenuity, and our daring champion's first move was to whack it against something."

"Hey, it's an egg," said Ron. "How do you open eggs? You crack them."

"Am I to assume you gave counsel on this strategy?"

“Nah, Seamus came up with it. Anyway, it didn’t hurt, see? Hasn’t got a scratch. That tells you something, doesn’t it?”

“Most certainly,” he said. “Now we know it’s idiot-proof.”

“Bad luck for you, then, since you’ve got to open it,” said Harry. Draco made a rude gesture, which he returned. “I don’t want to think about it. In fact, I’ve got three months before I even have to think about the Tournament. It’s lovely.”

“And it’s that kind of enterprising spirit that will steer us to victory, Potter.”

Harry stuck out his tongue.

“If you ask me, it’s a riddle,” said Ron. “‘How do you open an egg? You crack it.’ Makes enough sense, I reckon.”

Hermione wrinkled her nose. “That’s not a very good riddle,” she said. “And I hope it’s not, in any case. It’d make the whole thing much more difficult. Riddles are notoriously opaque. ‘How is a raven like a writing desk?’ I don’t know, because the author wanted to sound clever.”

“Thought swots liked riddles,” said Ron, tweaking her ear.

“Not particularly. Most of them are illogical and meant to make you feel stupid. Case in point: how do you open an egg?”

“I dunno,” he said, “maybe the Second Task’s to make an omelet—”

He was interrupted when Hermione gave the clasp a hard wrench. It gave with unexpected ease, and the egg drooped open along its glowing fissures. Inside a small blue bulb like a pearl radiated an intense iridescent glow, like a small concentrated bead of moonlight, surrounded by a fan of golden petals that had been its eggshell.

Draco marveled at its beauty for several pleasant seconds before it attempted to deafen him.

It was the screech of several hundred cats being slaughtered by several thousand angry violinists. It was the screech of something that absolutely hated whatever it was screeching to, and the sentiment was well taken and reciprocated. Hermione slapped her hands over his ears.

The moment she released the clasp, the egg snapped back together, and thunked into the carpet.

It lay innocently in a puddle of Turkish embroidery. Draco loathed it afresh.

“That was the worst riddle I’ve ever heard,” said Hermione. Ron gave a hoarse laugh.

Draco snatched up the egg and peered at it. “What the devil is wrong with it? Potter, is it defective?”

“How should I know!”

“Merlin, that was awful. Should plant that in Filch’s office, it’s not fit for anything else.”

“Do you see those marks?” said Hermione curiously, crawling across the sofa to peer at it over Draco’s shoulder. “All those little engravings? They must be the clue to decoding it. I think we have to solve them first, and they’ll tell us how to use the egg. They look runic.”

“They’re not runes from our alphabet.”

“It just reminded me of a runic circle, because it goes around—”

“I know what you mean, but it doesn’t translate.”

“We should go to the library. I know some books that’ll start us off.”

“I quite agree. First thing in the morning.”

“I thought you’d want to get a head start,” she said innocently, “before Warrington swoops in and steals some more books.”

He narrowed his eyes at her. She was getting cheekier by the day, was Hermione.

“But,” she sighed, peeling herself off the couch, “if you’d really rather sleep, we can manage with his leftovers. It worked the first time.”

“Listening to you attempt manipulation is almost embarrassing enough to be its own compellent.”

“What do you mean, stealing books?” said Harry.

“It doesn’t matter.”

“Draco,” trilled Hermione, while he glowered, “is of the opinion that Cassius Warrington is trying to sabotage you.”

“Damn, really?” said Ron. “Git.”

“Ron, don’t be silly—”

“Nah, but I reckon Draco’s right,” he said, to Draco’s immense gratification. “That’s the right thing to do, innit, from his perspective? He’s a Slytherin. He’d probably go for Harry’s kneecaps, if he could get away with it.”

“But he shook my hand,” said Harry, frowning. “And he told me — he said, ‘That was well-done.’ He seemed to mean it, too.”

“Oh, well, if he gave you a compliment,” said Draco acidly. “And in front of the press, too? Surely he’s a good egg. Suspicion retracted.”

“Hate to say it, but he makes a point,” said Ron. “He’d want you to think he was a good sport, right? To throw you off.”

“Or,” said Harry, stubbornly, “and get this: he might actually be, you know, a good sport. Not all Slytherins are bad, are they? You know

—”

“Lord help us, he’s getting into the politics.”

“—just talking about it, but isn’t it a bit possible that Warrington might not be a total git, if the Goblet chose him to represent Hogwarts? Anyway, Daphne’s a Slytherin,” he said, “and we all agree she’s not a git.”

“They’re right, Harry,” said Hermione, and Draco enjoyed the double gratification of being recognized, twice over. It very nearly compensated for not getting any applause. “We’re not dealing with Cedric here—”

That put him right out again. “What’s this and your obsession with Cedric? He would do the same.”

She cut him a narrow look. “I was going,” she said, highlighting the part where he’d interrupted her, “to make a point about sportsmanship, which we know Cedric has, since he tried to forfeit the match against Gryffindor last year.”

“But he didn’t, did he?”

“What do you mean?”

“He didn’t forfeit,” said Draco, folding his arms. “Hufflepuff won the match.”

“So what?”

“He didn’t exactly pitch a fit, did he?”

“He caught the snitch before he saw Harry fell! That’s not his fault!”

“Right, and he just happened not to see Potter falling out of the sky, I suppose—”

“It was raining! And pitch black!”

“Nah, mate, you’ve lost me,” said Ron, yawning. “Ced’s a Hufflepuff. Warrington’s a Slytherin. Totally different case.”

Hermione rolled his eyes, and shot a knowing look at Draco, who received it with a minimum of smugness. It didn’t do to gloat.

Much, anyway.

After more rounds of drinking and post-round congratulations, Hermione announced her intention to retire, and it was another hour of conversation after that before she got anywhere with it. All told, it was almost three o’clock when Draco stumbled back to bed, and the very residual pearls of adrenaline still skittered around his system. In his limbs there was a lingering weightlessness, and when he laid back in his four-poster, his whole body was loose and easy, like he was breezing along on a strong tailwind.

-Hello! And that wraps on the First Task. I remember this chapter took like three weeks to write, because there were so many different set pieces.

-In which Hermione realizes that the Invisibility Cloak is not so large as it used to be, and deals with the consequences. The consequences being, namely, a simultaneous case of "Oh Boy I Hope This Won't Awaken Anything In Me."

-I can't remember because I don't think it comes up until OOTP, but I was unsure whether Mad-Eye could see through the Invisibility Cloak. Supposedly the eye can pierce all surfaces, but the Invisibility Cloak is a Hallow, so there's an argument to be made for it being a special case. Not that it's relevant in this chapter. (Probably.)

-Dear, dear Cedric. He really is such a good sport, it's just he's in rather the wrong story for it. I'm hoping to bring him more to the fore in coming chapters.

-For every comment, a very beautiful slice of seven-layer cake, with buttercream frosting and candied roses. The kind that Dobby would make.

-Next chapter goes up on Friday — it's called "The Viennese Affliction."

-A.K.A. "we're finally doing the Yule Ball arc." Je vous aime, mes amis. À bientôt!

The Viennese Affliction

Chapter 42: The Viennese Affliction

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

It was the queerest sensation: sitting down one afternoon to bang out a Transfiguration essay, looking up, and finding that November's sleet in the window had transformed to the first tepid snowfalls of December.

He did not know when, if at all, Cassius or the other champions were finding time to study the egg. McGonagall and Sprout both doubled their homework assignments in the last weeks of term, claiming — wholly erroneously — that the tournament had set classes behind. The result was chronic aches of the brain and tiredness of the soul. He and Hermione had cleared out the library shelves on rune systems, to no avail; Hermione suggested at one point that it might go faster if they got Harry and Ron to help, which showed that puberty was doing wonders for her sense of humor.

"We'd do a lot better with more eyes."

"Not theirs."

"They can recognize symbols, you know. They're not entirely useless."

"If that was all it took, Longbottom could ace the Runes O.W.L."

Hermione opened her mouth to say something in the boys' defense — she was always doing that, it was rather irritating — and the portrait-hole swung open. She began shoveling pages of runes under her Arithmancy homework as if they held nuclear codes, but it was followed by the spurt of brash laughter: Harry and Ron ambled into the common room, brushing gray crystals of frost from their hair and robes, and dumped their wet cloaks in soggy bundles near the fireplace.

“It’s called a coat rack, you know,” said Draco. “That big wooden thing, with the arms? It isn’t a bomb.”

“I’ve got a letter from Padfoot,” announced Harry.

Hermione surreptitiously directed her wand at his cloak and levitated it. Draco angled his wand across hers and hit it with an Itching Jinx.

“What?” said Harry, a bit tetchily. “Nothing?”

“Ignore them, they’re sore you broke up their Arithmancy,” said Ron, slumping into the chair next to Hermione. He poked his head over his shoulder. “Or demon summoning.”

“Heaven’s sake, Ron, it’s only numbers. Anyway, that’s wonderful, Harry. What’s he said?”

“Not much. But he wants to Floo me tonight, in the common room.”

“You can Floo into the Gryffindor commons?” Hermione arched an eyebrow. “Isn’t that a security risk?”

“No,” said Draco and Ron at once. Ron gestured lazily at Draco.

“You can’t travel. The headmaster’s office has the only operable Floo grate in Hogwarts. If you try to fit more than head-and-shoulders through the common room fires, it’ll sever the connection. It’s so students can communicate with their families.”

“If their parents are wizards, that is,” she muttered.

“Buy your parents a bottle of Floo powder,” he suggested, draping his arm over the back of his chair. He gestured at her with his quill. “Pay them a call.”

“My parents aren’t going to stick their heads in a fireplace, no matter what I tell them it does.”

He twirled his quill, equal parts exasperated and amused, as always, by the bizarre neuroses of muggles. “And what exactly do they think you do here?”

“They know very well what I do, but it’s one thing to know and another thing to understand, and it’s not as if I can show them any of it over the summer.”

“Fine, but you must admit that’s their fault. No one’s stopping them. You can lead a muggle to water, and so forth.”

“They’re not s— never mind.” With a huff, she turned to Ron. “When have you used it, then? I haven’t seen you do it once.”

Ron cleared his throat. “Er — I mean, they know I’m alright,” he said. “It’s a busy line, the Floo, and everyone’s always trying to get on… Ginny calls home often enough, and Percy used to have weeklies with Mum…”

“Ronald Weasley, don’t you call your mother at all?”

“Draco doesn’t call his!”

“Excuse me, my mother’s been traveling this year, and we write letters. Don’t you enter into a pissing contest over filial piety with me, young Weasley.”

Ron sulked.

“Are you supposed to call your parents often?” Harry asked thoughtfully.

This was such a well-crafted indicator of tragically orphaned obliviousness that it pitched them all into a uniform silence of horrified sympathy. Draco suspected that this was on some level intentional, because a moment later Harry snapped into a smile, and said, “Blimey, I can’t wait to tell him about the dragons. You’re all invited, of course,” and trotted upstairs to change out of his wet robes, as if he knew very well that he had ended their bickering, and was plum pleased about it, too.

“Do you know, I think he’s getting smarter,” said Draco, mildly impressed.

“Yeah,” said Ron, with foreboding. “Reckon so. Better watch out, us three.”

That evening, they had the pleasant task of clearing the common room for Harry’s call. Ron stole a dungbomb from Fred and detonated it at the foot of the girls’ stairwell. The resultant combustion so polluted the air that the prefects erected Siphoning Charms across the top of the stairs and had to shout punishments down at Ron through the billows of pungent green smoke, while he grinned and sheepishly lifted his hands. Hermione cast Muffliato on the fireplace and a Notice-Me-Not charm on the grate itself, got nervous, and re-did them both twice. Draco put his feet on the ottoman and read a book.

“What if he’s forgotten?”

“Mm. I expect he’s probably distracted with his other godson.”

“But what if he doesn’t call?”

“I don’t know. Did you two discuss funeral arrangements?”

The clock struck eleven, and Harry blinked not once in the next five minutes he spent watching the fireplace. At the turn of the sixth, he stood up and announced: “I knew it. He’s not coming,” and, thusly tempted, the fire blazed green.

“Thank God,” said Draco, tossing his book to the side.

Sirius's head came nosing out of the ashes and announced himself with a furious sneeze.

"God, I hate the Floo," he said, and spat a gob of cinders onto the carpet. "What kind of a worthless addlebrained warlock thought, let's all dunk our heads in ashes, there's a way to communicate. Do you know where you have to stick your head in order to use a telephone, these days, Moony? Nowhere! They invented wireless ones while I was in the clink! Muggles! Anyway, I hope I've got the right grate; Monty and Phemes were always ringing up the Hufflepuffs by mistake—"

Harry shot out of his chair. The three of them were treated to the amusing charade of watching a boy try to figure out how to hug a fireplace, and wilt when he realized it could not be done.

Sirius had changed. In fitness, he had made great progress from nail-thin to pencil, and the ragged mat of curls á la Hagrid had been pruned to a choppy mane. The hollows under his face had been paved with fat and muscle, and when he grinned it glittered with mischief, not murder.

"Harry! Wotcher! You're the size of a tree!"

"You think?" Harry consulted his frame with pride. "I grew a lot at the Burrow."

"Molly will do that for you," he said sagely. "For a while there she was feeding the whole Order on about four potatoes and a box of cornmeal every week, and I never ate better in my life—" A muffled noise came from somewhere behind him. "What do you want me to — he's bigger now. Yes, exactly like him, it's sort of w— fine. For a minute."

He burrowed back into the flames, and was nosed aside by a second face, this one bony and long-nosed, with jagged scars bisecting his cheeks.

“Remus!”

“Harry!” He swept his eyes ravenously over Harry and beamed. “Good to see you! Great, in fact! You look well! How are you? How are your friends?”

“Oh, we’re fine. The First Task is over. We fought a dragon the other day—”

“What?”

A piercing grumble came from behind the flames. Remus twisted over his shoulder.

“He said he fought a dragon!”

A high-pitched sound.

“Yes, a dragon — no, I didn’t — oh, fine, you jealous old goat. Harry, I’m sorry, I’ll be back in a moment — your godfather’s a nosy narcissist, and he can’t stand being left out—”

“You had him for a whole year, you hog!” Sirius’s face came wrestling back into the ashes, wedging Remus out of the grate with a yelp of surprise. “This was my idea! You, Mr. ‘Risk Management,’ can go watch the door! Thank you! Goodbye! Alright, Harry,” he said, breathlessly, “that’s stark raving. Bloody incredible. I wish I could’ve seen it. I’m sorry, but we haven’t got long here — broke into a wizarding house to use the fire, they could be back at any time. But I reckon I’ve figured out who put your name in the Goblet. It’s Karkaroff.”

Harry blinked. “What?”

“He was a Death Eater. He was in Azkaban with me. They released him in exchange for names. Not very good names, of course, nobody they didn’t already have — Mulciber, Avery, Bulstrode—”

“But Karkaroff tried to stop me competing. He argued with Mr. Crouch—”

“He had to, in front of Dumbledore, didn’t he? Listen. Things are getting dicey out here, Harry. The things I’m hearing… Death Eaters at the World Cup… the Dark Mark… people are going missing, have you heard about this? At the Ministry of Magic?”

“Like Bertha Jorkins,” said Hermione, wrapping her arms around her knees. Her eyes were dark. Draco rolled his wand restlessly between his fingers, irritable at the wind for howling, irritable for no reason at all. “Percy mentioned her. She works in Games and Sports, doesn't she? She would’ve known about the Tournament.”

“Exactly right. And she disappeared in Romania. That whole region is a mire for Dark magic. It’s not a safe place for muggle-borns, especially not alone.”

“She was muggle-born?”

Sirius paused uncomfortably, like a man just noticing a crushed egg under his bootheel.

“She was,” he allowed. “But not like you, Hermione. She wasn’t… she had no brains at all, I mean, very easy to fool. She’d walk right into a deathtrap and complain about the upholstery.”

“Oh, good. So long as it’s only the stupid muggle-borns who have to worry,” said Hermione acidly. She stalked over to an armchair and sat down.

Sirius grimaced.

“What about the Minister?” whispered Ron. “He could have it in for Harry, doesn’t he? He’s with Nott, and Nott was a Death Eater.”

“Yeah, but Runcorn wasn’t,” said Sirius, frowning. “I mean, don’t get me wrong, you lie down with jarveys, you’ll wake up with nargles, but Runcorn's too young to have been much more than… what, twelve, thirteen, during the War? He might've supported them, but even at the peak of the fighting, Death Eaters didn't take any younger than sixteen."

Hermione cleared her throat like a battery of cannonfire. "Obviously it's not the Minister," she said flatly. "First of all, if he wanted to kill Harry, I can think of a dozen ways easier than a live death match with a thousand witnesses. But more importantly—"

"Love this conversation," said Harry. "Makes me feel great, this conversation."

"More importantly, it's got to be someone from the Ministry. Whoever put his name has to have some sway there, because they'd have to have known that Harry would be made to compete anyway. Which means they either knew how the Ministry officials would rule beforehand, or they were one of the Ministry officials."

"Who? Ludo Bagman?" snorted Ron. "Barty Crouch? That's your big guess?"

"Well, why not Crouch?"

Draco was in the difficult position of agreeing with both of them: Ron's idea was terrible, but so was Hermione's. "Granger. Don't take this the wrong way—"

She snorted. "This is going to be good."

"But if you'd known who Crouch was — speaking as someone who perhaps has more of an an appreciation for his reputation—"

"An appreciation, yes, of course, let's have it for another rendition of 'Things Only Purebloods Understand'!"

"That's not what I meant, and you know it."

She sat up, eyes blazing, and that feeling skittered down his spine again — heat and danger and prickling eagerness, and he wanted to hurl all his irritation and watch her crack it cleanly in half on her own. The feeling was knotting up under his skin and the pressure was generating heat, pressing all his thoughts into diamond-sharpness, and he just knew if they fought they'd both be magnificent.

But she gave a queenly sniff and curled up in her armchair, like the conquering general of a territory she'd not even touched. He leaned back on the carpet and marveled at the fact that apparently you could be as irritated by not fighting as by fighting itself. And in the middle of all that, he still wanted her not to be upset.

She caused feelings that ought to have been listed with psychiatric disorders. She gave him migraines. He really didn't know why he was so attached to her.

"He's not a Dark wizard, Hermione," Sirius interrupted brusquely. "Take it from me. Aside from Moody and the Order, he's the only man in the Ministry I'd trust with your lives. Got the personality of a splintery knob, but I'd trust him."

"Maybe we can ask him for help with the Second Task," said Harry blandly. "'Say, do you want me to die? Reckon not, right? Well, can I offer you a look at this egg?'"

Hermione practically erupted out of her chair. Draco startled and hiked his legs out of her way. "Runes! Of course! Sirius, can you put Lupin on? We need him to look at something! Harry, where's the egg?"

Sirius turned. There was an uncharacteristically long pause, a bang!, and a muttered curse, and then Lupin's head appeared in the fire.

"Sorry," he gasped. "Got to run. They're coming home now. Hermione — whatever it is, write me, alright? And Harry — you, too — take care of each other — I love you — talk soon!"

He vanished. With a pop, the flames waxed yellow, and dwindled to their normal size, and Harry sat back on his haunches, looking bereft.

The last day of classes brought a fleeing gasp of sunshine, which Harry and Ron got to see none of, having put off their homework until the last possible moment. This meant Draco and Hermione had an early breakfast to themselves, sneaking mouthfuls of fried eggs and toast between helpings of Ancient Runes, and when Harry and Ron did stumble downstairs, they looked like they'd been dragged homework-first through a hurricane: smears of ink decorated their wrists and one blotted Ron's eyebrow.

"That was a nightmare," gasped Ron, toppling down next to Hermione. "If I never see a cauldron again, it'll be too soon. What does Snape think he's doing, assigning all that?"

"In your case, not much," said Draco, mostly into his teacup.

"Oi! Wanker."

Harry merely grunted. He was moving bacon into his mouth as if they were about to make it illegal. Hermione subtly Vanished a splotch of ink from his chin.

"Any progress on the egg?" said Ron, peering at Hermione's worksheet.

"What does it look like, Ron?"

"Hell if I could tell you. Come to think of it, are we sure it's Runes?"

"There's nothing else it could be," she said impatiently. "The inscription has to carry a clue, because there's nothing else on the egg that could explain how to open it, unless Harry's right, and you're really supposed to just smash it on something. But that's stupid, so it can't be—"

They were interrupted by someone saying, at a volume terribly unfit for that hour of the morning: “Hail and well met, you chaps!”

It was Daphne. And Daphne wasn’t well. A sweep of pincurls sat under a lacquer of hair gel, a bouffant with volume most purebloods would bathe in maidens’ blood to attain, and a face painted in reds and blacks and pinks so vivid that she looked like she’d bathed in formaldehyde. Her scars had been caked in with powder, giving her face a gravelly, poreless sheen that made it look like her cosmetic surgeon had withdrawal jitters. The overall effect was supreme prettiness and extraordinary misery.

“I don’t suppose any of you would mind if I squeezed in, did I?” she said. “Draco once made a terribly daring voyage to the Slytherin table, and I realized we never repaid the visit.”

“You look different,” said Ron.

Her smile grew pained. “Stop, really, I insist,” she said, strained. “Flattery will get you everywhere.”

There was a pause like a dropped glass.

“Goodness, I understand why you haven’t many visitors, if this is how you greet them.” She wet her lips. “But of course, I shouldn’t dream of intruding.”

“Er — sure,” said Hermione, shuffling her Runes out of the way. “Sorry.”

Daphne closed her eyes for a moment, and exhaled through her nose. Then she piled herself into the table and planted her elbows on either side of her plate, and said, through a thousand-watt beam: “Thanks. So! What’s on the schedule for the Gryffindor foursome, eh? The Golden Quartet? The Chosen One’s Chosen Ones! I feel so cool and rebellious. I think it’s the banners, they make me want to skip class and break all the rules. Shall we set off some fireworks? Raid the kitchens? I know a secret way into the tunnels—”

“Greengrass, what are you doing here?”

Her mouth was frozen ajar in anticipation of another percussive vowel; she slowly sealed it up. “Paying a visit,” she said. “I know it’s hard to explain, but some people do desire your company. Mostly because they’ve never seen your table manners, one supposes!”

Ron let out a delighted guffaw. Hermione shushed him.

“If you refrain from any further remarks like that, you’re welcome to stay,” he said tartly, “but for all your charms, this isn’t your table. I can think of at least two people wondering where you are.”

“Teddy and Pans are making great progress in their object permanence. They’ll manage a breakfast without me. You know, I always wondered why they had us eat by table? Isn’t the point of inter-house unity to make lots of friends? And except for classes we never see each other, so when else are we supposed to get a sense of unity, I mean, we’re in competition for practically everything else…”

“That’s actually an interesting question,” said Hermione. “It’s quite recent. The Great Hall was destroyed during a duel in 1919, and when it was rebuilt, the architect put places to hang the House banners overhead, but they didn’t mean for them to indicate— well, never mind. I don’t suppose you’re actually interested in this, are you?”

“Oh, please finish,” said Daphne, throwing her hand across the table. It landed on Hermione’s, who jumped and spilled her pumpkin juice onto Ron’s lap. “Tell me everything.”

She was doing her best you are the smartest person I, Daphne Greengrass, have ever met, which would have been suspicious alone —Ron was so dazed he barely noticed the loch of pumpkin juice forming over his groin — if it hadn’t also been far more flirtatious than anyone had a right to be at half eight in the morning, especially when Hermione was looking like four hours of sleep with a garnish of jam on her chin. This bemused no one more than Hermione herself, who said: “Er. That’s it, really,” which was a relief to Draco, because the mere thought of her falling for Daphne’s pucker-mouthed eyelash-fluttering made him want to go Obliviate himself in the bathroom sink.

He put two and two together, and found it made four.

“Is something wrong in the dungeons?”

Daphne jerked her head, not a yes, not a no, just a cut of movement that answered the question.

“Of course there is. What happened? Where’s Theodore?”

“Theo’s fine,” she said. “Theo’s perfect. Theo’s lovely and diplomatic and never makes anyone mad. God, I love Theo, he’s such a wonderful person, I think we should all get together and have a party for him!”

“Oh,” said Harry, eyeing the pumpkin juice lake. “Alright. So, he put his foot in it, then?”

“Theodore,” she said, “has been a perfect gentleman. He has conducted himself in ways immaculate and unimpeachable by any involved. He has made many sacrifices for my sake and for others’, as it does so tickle Pansy to remind me, and, to wit, dear Theodore has most recently made me a very kind suggestion that would have solved a lot of problems.” She stabbed a large sausage. “And if I don’t kill him for it, it’ll prove him not merely a good man, but a lucky one.”

“So… he was… nice to you?” said Harry weakly. “And now you’re angry at him?”

“I’m not angry at him!”

She sawed into the sausage with so much force it split the plate.

There was a beat of silent appreciation. The Hogwarts plates were solid bronze.

“Accidental magic!” she cried. “At my age! I’m so embarrassed.”

“Daph,” said Ron slowly, “why don’t you just… have some toast, say? Don’t even need a knife, for toast. Can just go at it. No faff.”

She stared at him miserably. “Why is it,” she said, “that whenever I see you, you’ve dyed some of your hair?”

He checked his reflection in a spoon and hastily scrubbed his eyebrow with a napkin. “Honest mistake,” he admitted. “I would’ve asked, but seems like you were pretty busy with your meltdown, and what-all.”

She gave a hoarse honk of a laugh.

“Millicent told her father I hit her,” she said.

“You hit her?” said Hermione, baffled. “With your hand?”

“With my hand,” confirmed Daphne. “It was a good hit, too.”

“You’re lying,” said Ron. “Millie Bulstrode? With the warts? The one who sat on Ginny?”

“That was an accident,” said Daphne primly. “She felt bad about it later. But yes. And I can’t even be mad at her. I’m the dummy. I slapped her silly, and I knew her daddy was a Board member, I knew it. And it’s not like she was the only one saying those things. Poor Millie didn’t even start the rumor, I just — couldn’t stand it.”

“But that’s great! Ten points to Slytherin!”

“No, it’s not,” hissed Hermione, “because, as she was just telling us, Millie’s father is on the Board, and he can… well, what did he do to you?”

“Nothing that will kill me, I assure you,” she sniffed. “He only had a… a bit of a chat, with me and Dumbledore and my parents, about me and his daughter, and… how he doesn’t quite feel safe, having someone so violent and aggressive living in the same place as Millie, so — but he wouldn’t want to deny another pureblood the chance at an education, of course—”

“Of course,” said Hermione dryly. She quirked an eyebrow at Draco.

“So they’ve arranged to separate us.”

Hermione set down her fork, frowning. “So you’re sleeping in another dorm? With the third years?”

“Nope!” she said brightly. “I have a room all my own, off the Slytherin commons. With a bed and a desk and my own bathroom, and everything. My parents agreed to it, it’s all quite civilized. They’ve been petitioning for me to have special accommodations for years, so this honestly isn’t even a punishment, for them, and they said it’ll give me a place for — well, if I ever need my space, because of the urges. I don’t know what ‘the urges’ are, but apparently I am well prepared for them! And I believe,” she added, shredding the crust from a piece of toast with her fingers, “the word ‘infection’ was also used, at some point, though in what context, I confess I couldn’t tell you! I wasn’t hardly listening, by then.”

He didn’t know what to say except that he was sorry for her, and he knew she would die a little to hear it, so he kept quiet.

“Many find this hilarious,” said Daphne. “You would be in good company to laugh.”

“Where are Theo and Pansy in all this?” he said, rendered uncomprehending by the possibility that they might not care. They were cold and callous and they had salt rinds where much of their kindness ought to have been, but they loved Daphne so obviously it was an embarrassment. Pansy! Who had schemed and connived her way into Daphne’s room fortnightly during a long and lonely summer — Theo, who had sworn to kill Remus Lupin on sight, if he ever encountered him — who had lived in the Hospital Wing with her, ferried her homework, read to her, held her hand — he understood that. He thought he'd understood.

"Well, Pansy is owling her father about it, for what I do not know, less she expects him to kill Baxter Bulstrode in an honor duel. And I'm not talking to Theo for a year and a day, or some other mythologically appropriate amount of time, or until I decide he's been punished enough. Whichever comes first. Don't ask why."

"Why—?"

The hour-bell struck. Daphne swore and folded three slices of toast neatly into her mouth, one after the other, with such velocity that Ron peered at her in impressment.

"Training for the quidditch team?"

"Nf. I'm starving," she managed. "Is this what a working metabolism is supposed to feel like? I don't know how any of you get anything done. Anyway, got to run, chaps. Thanks for the toast. Ronald, I swear to Merlin, if you don't put your hair to rights by the next time I see you, I'm going at it with a Stasis Charm."

She liberated an éclair from his platter, braced it between her teeth, and rolled herself neatly out of the bench.

Her exit from the hall would have been flawless if not for Vincent Crabbe, whose arm connected with her shoulder, and knocked her so hard she nearly spun fully around; Draco and Ron both rose from their seats; but she stumbled upright, shoved off the Ravenclaw girls who stopped to help her, and ran out without stopping or looking at anyone.

"She should really talk to a teacher," said Hermione, in hushed tones. "Do you think if I spoke to McGonagall—" “She’d never forgive you,” said Draco.

“I don’t care if she’d forgive me. She’s getting bullied. And clearly, Snape isn’t doing enough to stop it.”

“What do you want him to do? Have a sit with Bulstrode’s parents? Baxter’s on the Board.”

“Then move her out of there! House her somewhere else! It’s a big castle!”

“You can’t change Houses,” he said, watching Crabbe exchange a friendly jostle with Marcus Flint. He reserved the point that Daphne would never consent to a move, if offered. Slytherin was her home. It was that simple, and that difficult. “Things would only get worse if she tried.”

She stared as if he’d dyed his eyebrows in ink.

“You know,” she said, after a moment, “I never thought this before — I really did put off saying so — but I think I’m really starting to hate purebloods.”

He threw back the bitter dregs of a cold cup of tea, and it snaked past a twinge of pain in his throat. “Strong words,” he said briskly, standing up. “I recommend you delay judgment until you’ve been to one of our parties.”

On Fridays their breakfast preceded a visit to the airy, stone-capped cathedral of the Transfiguration classroom. All the desks, the chipped wooden two-seaters with age-gnarled clawfeet, had been swept out of their usual files and piled in a soldier’s barricade to one side of the room. Gryffindors and Ravenclaws milled around in pure bedlam, with neither chairs nor tables to assert the formal order of the classroom, and into this windstorm of murmurs swept Professor McGonagall, leading her hardy lieutenant Filch. The caretaker wheeled behind him a gramophone whose last performance could not have fallen during his lifetime.

“Attention! Attention! Would you give me your attention, please! Thank you. There will be no class today.”

A bellow of gratitude and goodwill broke out. Hermione’s hand shot up. Draco grabbed it and put it back down.

“Silence! No! You have not — Finnigan, come back — would someone go get him? Thank you, Thomas. For the next ninety minutes, I expect to enjoy the full breadth of attention you would otherwise bring to bear on Transfiguration,” she said, “if not, perhaps, more. It was brought to the attention of the headmaster that some of our students may require instruction pertaining to an upcoming event in which you will all be strongly encouraged to participate.”

Her accent turned her R’s into a spray of artillery.

Filch began fiddling with the gramophone, which reacted like an exceptionally old gelding being prodded with spurs. “The Yule Ball,” said McGonagall, and then jumped at a screech of feedback. Filch grunted.

“The Yule Ball,” she continued, only to close her eyes at another interjectory squeal of a needle on a record. “The Yule Ball is a tradit — do you require assistance, Mr. Filch?”

“I’ve gottem, ma’am!” Seamus wiggled through the crowd, joined by a sweaty-faced Dean. “Sorry! Jumped the gun!”

“Thank you for joining us, Mr. Finnigan,” she said thinly. Giggles circulated. “You may apologize for your haste by helping Mr. Filch. Now. The Yule Ball is a tradition of the Triwizard Tournament.”

She paused. “It is an opportunity to promote camaraderie, to cultivate professional friendships, and represent ourselves to our guests from abroad. It will be open only to fourth years and above, though you may invite a younger student if you wish. The champions and their partners will open the ball—”

There was a gasp. Lavender and Parvati had both rounded on Harry as if he were the last morsel on an island of dogs.

Draco would have felt sorry for the bloke, who was doing his level best to hide somewhere in Ron's pockets, if this hadn't also been the funniest thing that had ever happened to anyone, ever, in the history of the world. He might very well manage a patronus on the mere idea of it. Tall, scruffy-haired, God-awfully awkward Harry Potter, dolled up in dress robes with the stays done loose and wrong tie knot, stalwartly mashing some poor girl's toes, while Krum and Fleur and Warrington waltzed neat circles around him.

His shoulders were shaking. He put his hand to his mouth.

Hermione whacked his elbow with her Transfiguration textbook. "It's not funny! It's easy for you to laugh when you don't have to dance in front of the whole school, but if it was you in his place I'm sure you wouldn't be quite so amused—"

"Firstly, I would never be caught in this position, I'm a magnificent dancer. Secondly, the fact that it's Potter is what makes this hilarious, and thirdly, Granger, look at me and tell me you don't find this funny."

She stared at him with the anguish of a woman who knew very damn well it was. "It's not," she managed, all wobbly with suppressed laughter.

He grinned. "Convincing."

McGonagall had finally grappled the room back to attention. "On Christmas Eve — Miss Brown, hold your questions until the end, thank you! On Christmas Eve, we and our guests will gather — Miss Patil, I assure you, Mr. Potter will still be there when I am finished talking — and the same assurances to you, Mr. Weasley! — we will gather in the Great Hall for an evening of well-mannered frivolity. As representatives of the host school, I expect each and every one of you to put your best foot forward — and I mean this quite literally."

Seamus and Dean, having shouldered Filch away from the gramophone, gave a shout of victory, and a spatter of music burst forth from its ancient loins. A watery blossom of strings crested into the rolling three-footed trot of a waltz, slow and syrupy and punctuated with the occasional syncopation of static. Draco's mother would have been in spasms of ecstasy. He was in spasms of something else altogether.

"Very good! No commentary will be necessary! Thank you!" cried McGonagall. "Today's lesson — and you will find the door is quite locked, Mr. Boot — will prepare you all for the first dance, which is, traditionally, a Viennese waltz."

"All of us?" said Seamus, astonished. "Not just Harry?"

"Yes! All of you. Because, while some of you have had the opportunity to learn such things since childhood, many of you have not, and it is incumbent on us as teachers to make clear that such differences should not embarrass you," she said fiercely. "You may see me after class if you require further elaboration. Mr. Filch, will you assist me?"

Mr. Filch, ostensibly under duress of some arcane and vigorous threat, obliged her. She forcefully relocated his hand to her waist, sank the claw of her hand deep into his trapezius, and began steering him in tight mechanical circles around the room.

Draco, to his own pride, was not the first person to lose control under such circumstances; that honor went to Ron, who wheezed so loudly that it cut through the music, and nearly passed out.

"You each will find a partner, and practice — is something funny, Mr. Weasley?"

"No, professor."

"Indeed not! Miss Midgen, why don't you help Mr. Weasley find his feet? I trust it will be easy for him, since he finds this exercise so amusing! And the rest of you, go on—”

A scramble ensued for partners. Eloise Midgen, who had an asymmetrical nose and a smile as persistent as her boils, pulled Ron up; Neville blushingly offered his hand to a Ravenclaw named Marietta Edgecombe; Lavender nearly punted Hermione to the floor in her haste to get to Harry, but she was beaten by Cho, who grabbed his arm and said, “Better stick with me; seekers are good with our hands,” and grinned when he turned pink.

“Granger.”

She jumped. She’d been knitting her fingers and raptly observing the floor, but at the sound of her name, she jumped.

“Yes?”

“I was going to ask you to dance, but if you’re having an attack of nerves, perhaps I’d better inquire after Patil.”

“Oh,” she said, as if this weren’t the most predictable thing he could have possibly said. “Yes. Well. I would. But I don’t know how.”

“There are these things called lessons,” he said. “Marvelous devices, really.”

“Shut up.” She lowered her voice, and he had to lean in to hear her, which was an inconvenience, to say nothing of highly uncharacteristic also. “This is sort of awkward, isn’t it? I mean, most of us aren’t going to be good at it.”

“You’re not supposed to be good at it, that’s what I’m for. Listen, do you want to dance or not? Because if you don’t, I’m not going to stand here trying to convince you—”

“I’m just warning you,” she said, glancing at her nails, probably to hide the lamentably obvious attack of nerves. “It’s for your benefit, not mine. So I don’t get out there and do something stupid and then have you accuse me of entrapment or something.”

“Granger, it is plainly adorable that you think, after all this time, I harbor any delusions about your skills of physical coordination. That is entrapment like a box on a stick is an ambush.”

“You’ve made your point!”

Her shyness crumbled away under the pressure of indignation and pride, and he was pleased. He could do this, sometimes. He could poke a few levers and pull a string in her head, and she would come back to herself. He liked doing this. He liked that he could.

He held out his palm. She slapped hers into it and marched forward with a doomed finality. He followed, ordering the corner of his mouth to sort out what the hell it was about.

She planted herself in front of him, shoulders square, with so much confidence it took a beat to realize she hadn’t a single idea what to do. That amused him, too, and so he toyed with her a little — so what, it wasn’t a crime — by slipping his hands in his pockets, shifting his weight back on his heels, to see how long it would take her pride to ebb.

The answer was forever. The answer was one billion years. She stood there in the hex of swaying couples and the flush slowly gathered around her neck, spreading a rosy finger up to her jaw, while she ran her eyes up and down him as if figuring out which part she’d like to skin first. He put his tongue between his teeth and exerted a frankly ungentlemanly amount of effort not to laugh at her.

“Well?” she said belligerently.

He cocked his head. “Well, what?”

“What are you waiting for? Show me.”

“You’re supposed to curtsy, first.”

She snorted and folded her arms, rolling her weight onto one hip.

“I’m serious,” he said, amused. “That’s how it starts. For the traditional waltz.”

“Oh, yeah. And then I hop on one foot in a circle, rubbing my belly and patting my head?”

“It’s not part of the dance, but however the music moves you.”

“Draco!”

“What!”

“Show me how to waltz! Properly, I mean! If you don’t want to teach me, I’ll go dance with Neville, who seems quite competent, by the way, as he’s already doing spins with Marietta—”

“Fine,” he said sharply, sliding his hands out of his pockets. “I will. You ought to be glad of your own luck, by the way. My dancing tutor said I was the finest waltzer she’d taught in three generations.”

“After three generations, one has to question her memory,” she muttered, which he decided was the appropriate moment to teach her a lesson or two in hubris.

He twitched back his sleeves and swept into a low bow at the waist. It was tradition. When he came up he had a rising look at her slightly parted mouth, and her eyes, which had turned owlish. She looked like he had performed a dizzying aerial stunt on his broom.

It was, without exaggeration, incredibly satisfying.

He stepped into her space and took her hand. She tried to lace their fingers, and frowned when he didn’t let her, which turned into a thousand-yard stare of embarrassment when he guided it to his shoulder instead. He smirked.

It was a great day.

“Bend the elbow. You’re not erecting a perimeter. You’re supposed to be close to your partner.”

“What if my partner is annoying?” she said plaintively, but she did it, shuffling until the tips of their shoes touched.

“Alas, should’ve tried a gavotte. Hold my hand. Hold it, I said.”

“I am holding it.”

“My mistake. Keep holding, then, while I fix your footwork.”

He kicked one of her legs wider, and she stumbled with an indignant squeak. The nails on his shoulder bit down so deep it would leave a welt. “And leave as much of your partner’s blood inside them as possible,” he said stiffly. “That’s not a rule, it’s just good maintenance. Now. When I step with my left foot, you’re going to step forward with your right—”

“I know!”

“Oh, of course you do. That’s why you asked me to teach you, isn’t it, because you already knew.”

“Well, I haven’t done it. But I’ve seen it. I know the theory.”

“Then I expect you’ll be a natural.” He laid his hand on her waist.

Under the soft wools of her robe, her body was warm. Ridiculously warm, compared to her hands, which were tiny and also warm, especially for extremities, but not compared to her body. There was a hard curve where her waist flared into her hipbone, and above it, the first round of her ribcage, a slight edge of pressure under his thumb. There was a softness between fabric and bone that disappeared when he pressed, and she made a sound, not hurt, but startled, and he quickly stopped pressing. His fingers curved around to her back. He could span her rib to her hip with pinky and thumb.

“Right,” he said, casting around for a train of thought. He found one, not where he put it, but lingering around in a different region of his brain altogether, and hauled it back to the fore with some irritation. “I’m going to move.”

“Alright,” said Hermione, sounding utterly terrified.

“Don’t say it like — have a little — never mind.”

He stepped forward, pushing her back with the slightest pressure on her hand and her waist, and she stepped half a beat after she was supposed to. The second step was the same, her tagging belatedly where he moved, and on the third beat, she was faster, stepping nearly in time. She was not good at it; she was not even in the same hemisphere of skill with anyone who was, in fact, good at it; but she learned quickly where her feet were supposed to go, even if her actual feet stayed out of the loop on the subject. By the fourth or fifth turn, she was trying to steer them into tighter circles, leaning on their joined hands as if it was a rudder.

“You know, Granger,” he said conversationally, “I don’t know how it is for muggles, but here, traditionally, gents lead.”

“Yes, I know.”

“Which means — and I’m sorry to break it to you — but you are, in fact, going to have to follow.”

“Oh. Am I not?”

He gave a short, surprised laugh. She was so earnest. “No; in fact, most efforts at steering, pushing, or otherwise hauling the other person into your preferred figure—”

“Fine! Yes! I get it!”

“—are signs of leading, yes — besides which, a fellow likes to feel that he’s more than his partner’s luggage, if you catch my drift.”

“But — hm.”

“What?”

She worked her mouth around a question. He tapped the back of her hand with his finger, twice, like a knock on the front door to her mind.

“What if I want to do something?” she said, and the question had a certain philosophical intensity. He gave it fair consideration.

“Then you tell me.”

She tilted her head. “Really?”

“Yes. Now, I might not agree—”

“Oh, I knew it. You had me there, you know—”

“Wait a minute. If you want to move somewhere, you can tell the lead. Or show him. Move your arms, lean — gently, mind you — in one direction or another, he’ll catch on. If he’s not unpardonably thick, he’ll take a hint.”

“What if he doesn’t?”

“If he doesn’t…? I don’t know. Then he doesn’t. Why would it matter?”

“Why would it matter if I don’t get a say? Really?”

“Yes, really. It’s not a binding contract. You can stop always dancing, if you don’t like it.”

“Hm,” she said thoughtfully. Then, upon great rumination: “Can we do a spin?”

“The question is: ‘can you do a spin.’”

“Prat! Try me.”

He thought it would be very funny if she said this and immediately floundered it, so he said nothing, but cut his steps and whisked her hand up into the pendulum from which she would twirl; she went under his arm quickly, did a shy little twist on her heel, and then came hurrying back into position. What it wanted for grace she repaid in enthusiasm.

“See? You see?”

“Well done, then. You very nearly didn’t trip.”

“This is fun,” she decided. The movement had driven some blood into her cheeks, and stirred hairs loose from the clasp at the back of her head, and her heart rate was up; it was a funny thing to notice, but he could tell, because it was rabbiting along under his thumb. “I get it. It’s sort of a game.”

“You could see it that way. It’s also a kind of sport.”

“You would see it that way,” she said, amused, and the maddening lilt in her tone put him in half a mind to assert that sport was the difference between man and beast — why, he didn’t know, he would figure out an argument for it while she was delivering her rant on why it wasn’t — but he looked down and found her gazing thoughtfully at Neville and Marietta. The pair had flown through the beginner’s steps and were now perambulating merrily around the gramophone.

“Alright, Longbottom.”

“He’s quite clever,” she said automatically. “And he’s kind, too. I helped him with his Transfiguration, once, and when he gets the hang of something, he’s actually quite… good to work with.”

“I know that. I only tutored him for three years.” Neville hadn’t asked again, for their fourth. His grade in Potions seemed to be buoyant for the moment, which was a relief, because between the Tournament and his own work, he hadn’t any idea where he would have found the time.

“I suppose he’s a pureblood,” she said. “So he’s had lessons and things.”

“He is. Of course, he’s not me.”

This finally dragged her attention away from Neville, but it was a pyrrhic victory, considering that she looked at him like he was fully stupid.

“I meant that he’s not some virtuoso of dancing. He’s fine at it. Had lessons, I expect. But I can do better.”

“If you weren’t saddled with me as a partner, is that what you’re saying?”

“No. First of all — you have a niffler’s nose for insults, you know, and it isn’t a good thing, but second of all — I could do better with any partner.”

“Oh, you’re just desperate for me to ask you to prove it, aren’t you?” She was far too cheeky; her voice on desperate pitched into some low, breathy mockery of yearning. It put up the hairs on the back of his neck.

“I’ve never been desperate for anything in my life,” he said coolly, and did a quick contracheck that had her stumbling. Good. “If I wanted to prove it, I would.”

“I’m not going to ask you.” She was still enjoying herself. Disastrous. Time for extreme measures. “If you want to show off, you’ll have to just do it, I’m not going to beg you like some— what are we doing stop.”

He laughed. He had switched directions and waltzed backward on his own rotation, drawing her forward instead of back, which was easier for her to fudge — it meant he had to dance everything backward, but he could do that like he could tie his own shoelaces — and therefore easier to go faster. Much faster. He swept into double-and triple- time and whirled her under his arm and made her scream, a little, which was funny and also drew attention, even better. The motion slid her back into the curve of his arm and he put his hand on her waist and lifted — her feet left the ground, and she shrieked — after a spin he dropped her back on her feet.

“I told you—”

“Draco Malfoy, I’m going to skin you.”

“Marvelous, wasn’t it?” His heart rate was up, too. Maybe he ought to have kept training for quidditch. She wasn’t heavy, it shouldn’t have come up from just lifting her.

“It was,” she said, “many parts terrible, to one part, if at all, marvelous. Stop spinning.”

“I’m not.”

“Oh. That’s just the room, then.”

She leaned into his shoulder, vaguely gray. Her forehead met the point of his shoulder and rested there. He could see down into her hair, through the many volumes of static billow, where the gold threads latticed the brown, and the pearly thread of her part. Her fingers pressed little white indentations into his hand. With every breath, his hand moved in the lift and fall of her side. They were breathing together, he noticed. He’d forgotten if that was normal for dance partners. He’d learned so long ago.

Some people had looked over when she screamed, among them Harry and Ron and the virtuoso himself, Neville Longbottom. He fixed his mouth into a cool smirk and waltzed past them. Ron rolled his eyes so hard he ought to have strained a nerve.

Draco didn’t so much as sniff back at him. “We’re faster than Longbottom and Edgecombe, you know.”

“It’s not a competition!”

“So you think, because I’m winning it for us.”

“Poor Neville doesn’t even know what you’re doing, you realize that?”

“Longbottom knows what he knows,” he said vaguely.

“And it’s not winning if your partner’s sick.”

He slowed. He could always be moved by threats of mess.

She tipped her head back and smirked like she was laughing at him. He could twirl her again, just to teach her something about arrogance, but he didn’t want to. There were other things to consider. Ever since she’d had her braces off she’d been smiling more, and she had nice teeth, very clean and straight. There was a freckle under her right eye that moved when she smiled. It migrated around like an orbiting satellite. During a contracheck she folded neatly into the curve of his elbow and if he dipped down he could bend her further, and it was curious, how her body moved where he wanted it to go, how she let him do that. It was Hermione, letting him do that. The fact that she could let anyone else move her at all was a sort of revelation.

It was impossible not to wonder what she was thinking, when her eyes went wide and dark and curious, like telescopic lenses. Her mouth was parted and the full round of her bottom lip had a ridge of scars where she bit them; he wondered if the skin was rougher there, if it was soft everywhere else. There were ways to check.

He had the thought and then slammed the door on it, frightened, like something had come racing out of the dark.

Self-awareness crept along all the planes of his body like a slow-moving fire. It wasn’t his fault; she kept looking at him, like there were a thousand of her favorite secrets written all over his skin. She made looking feel like something that it wasn’t. It had been too long since he’d said anything. There was a jerking double-tap against the inside of his ribcage. In the dust and the sunlight and the violin music the movement of his mind had slowed, and there was something easy about moving, like flying and running, letting the route machinations of the body roll ceaselessly into each other, while he drifted somewhere else.

The hour-bell tolled deeply over the syrup of strings. Filch cut the gramophone. Then he was holding her waist and her hand in a silent classroom in the middle of a giggling mass of embarrassed fourth years, standing halfway through a beam of the midmorning sunlight, waiting for the nerves between his brain and his fingers to reconnect.

Somewhere a synapse flared. He took his hand off her waist and stepped back. She curled her fingers off his shoulder and wrung them in front of her chest, working anxiously at the knuckles there, like there was an ache in them.

He bowed to her. When he came up her stare was gone and she snorted, muttered something about poshness, and shouldered past him to collect her bag.

Word of the ball spread through the castle like a disease. It infected all organs of society. The division of the sexes came down with unexpected force, and across that iron wall only the bravest soldiers dared climb. Girls traveled the castle walls in packs, boys in haggard defensive formations. Established couples swanned smugly through the halls, aware of the envy they incited from dodging the gauntlet altogether. Relationships in budding or nebulous stages, meanwhile, were punted into a hash of negotiations. The Gryffindor common room became a swamp of gossip, for the question of whom to go with was superior only to the other, juicier question of who was going with everyone else.

Draco considered himself by and large above it all. Of course he thought about girls, abstractly, in the way that most boys did, and specifically, in some cases, because he was — well — see teenage boy; but that was a different thing from having anything to do with them. It would be a lie to say he hadn't noticed girls loosening their collars or rolling up their skirts. He knew what it meant when Saoirse O'Donnell asked if he was coming to Hogsmeade that weekend, and why Romilda Vane offered him her spare ticket to the opera. But the idea of doing anything with them, of taking them out, the way so many of the upperclassmen did every weekend — walking out with one on his arm, holding her hand, or giving her his cloak — did nothing for him. It didn't raise his pulse or turn his brains to soup, the way it seemed to do everyone else. Which was excellent luck, because with the exception of him and Hermione, it appeared all of Gryffindor Tower was cheerfully cartwheeling into madness.

Harry, as a champion, was an immediate target. It was bad enough that hordes of girls had apparently been longing for him beforehand, on charges of heroism and dashing nature — Draco had never known so many women suffered from acute blindness — but once it was announced that champions opened the ball, he became the prize ticket. This meant every meal became theater: as many as four or five girls might come up to ask him out, and once, hilariously, altogether, in the world's most awkward queue. Harry's answers were always so immediate and nakedly fearful that he spent the rest of the day paying it off in teasing.

Classes ended, and very few people went home. Draco, torn between the chance to see his mother again and the luring gravity of goings-on at Hogwarts, ended up writing a somewhat ungenerous and spurious letter offering to come home, only to be rebuffed, to his surprise, when his mother said she was still traveling, and could not possibly host him, but to have the best of times at the Yule Ball. She had attended hers with Draco's father, she said, wearing a gown of silver acromantula silk, with an emerald and peacock-feather brooch — see enclosure — if he was struck by the inclination to confer it, in turn, on some lucky lady. He shoved the brooch and the letter in his bedside drawer and swathed them with so many Notice-Me-Not spells that Ron, walking by, accidentally steered himself into the wall.

So even mothers were not immune to insanity.

Meanwhile, Hermione had found a new ax to grind, and which was good for her, since grinding axes was a beloved hobby.

“One more day of this,” she said, “and I’m going to beat them both over the head with a textbook.”

“Lovely. Business or pleasure?”

“A really big, mean, thick one, like Runes,” she added, with relish. It seemed to give her great joy to think about. “Or Arithmancy. With the appendix. I love them, and I treasure them, and they’re going to drive me mad, and so I’m going to beat them, with an Arithmancy textbook, with an appendix.”

“A good plan, well-researched. Is this cumulative retribution, or acute?”

She rubbed her eyes. “It’s this sodding stupid ball.”

“Ah. Both.”

“It wouldn’t be any problem if they could just shut up and ask someone instead of complaining, but of course, they won’t. And if they don’t find some mettle somewhere before the week’s out, they’re going to end up going alone, and they’ll complain even more. It’s a mess. At least Ron’s only passively complaining — but Harry hasn’t any excuse. You’d think he’d have landed one date, he’s only been asked out by half the girls in our year—”

“His hesitation is understandable, their taste is clearly dubious.”

“God! I know.” She slammed down the Runes textbook. They were in the library, their table nestled in a small ray of winter sunlight, as whorls of dust inside the window-light orbited in time with the whorls of snow outside it. Hermione was wearing a lush red scarf that fountained over her shoulders and a thick white jumper that made her hair look like coffee spilling into cream, and she had tucked her wand behind one ear. He had tired of the Runes and started practicing Snowing Charms over her head, to see how long it would take her to notice.

“It’s getting ridiculous, honestly. Did you hear what he said about Susan Bones?”

“I would have preferred not to.”

Glittering flakes were starting to accumulate in her hair. She brushed it off absently, and it showered onto her shoulder; he smiled.

“And it’s even sillier, because obviously neither of them have even thought to ask me,” she said hotly, “when any of us could’ve gone as friends, and it would’ve solved the whole problem.”

“I’ll thank you to refrain from suggesting that sort of farce. Too much laughter is bad for digestion.”

“...Why is that funny?”

“Why? Why is it funny? Because you don’t want Potter to break your toes in front of three schools. Because you’d have to stand for pictures next to Ronald’s dress robes, which I can confirm for an abomination. Because neither of them are even remotely suitable partners, especially not for an international event. In fact, you should thank Merlin they haven’t asked you, and made you come up with an excuse to say no.”

“Why would I need an excuse?” she said coolly.

“Because unless you’ve another date—”

“Don’t I?”

“Do you?” he said, taken aback.

“There’ve been — offers.”

“Who?”

“Neville.”

“Longbottom?”

“Yes. He found me at breakfast, and told me that he assumed I had already had lots of invitations, but he wanted to ask me, in case I wanted to go as friends,” she said stiffly, turning a page with such force it nearly ripped. “He was very sweet.”

“So? Are you going?”

“No!” She did tear it, this time. Swearing, she whisked her wand out of her hair and traced a Mending Charm over the page. “I don’t like him that way.”

“As friends? Uncommonly cold, Granger.”

He sprawled in his chair, at ease. She cast him a glare. He smiled back, indolent and breezy.

“He’s a dear friend, in fact, I’m very fond of him. But I thought — you know, it really doesn’t matter. And anyway,” she said, with some venom, “at least Neville has asked someone. What have you done for the ball, besides sneer at other people trying?”

He snorted. “It’s not a sodding horse race. I’ll not go running after the first girl that’ll have me for fear of going alone. I’ll end up going with someone suitable, I expect.”

Hermione went still. Her fingers curled into crescents, like tiny sea-life retreating into their shells.

“Granger? What’s wrong?”

“Nothing. I’m thinking.”

“I know, it’s boring. Think louder.”

“I won’t, because it’s very stupid,” she said, with surprising anger. Rarely did he hear her wield that tone against herself, being normally reserved for the rare idiocy of Gryffindor boys. “I suppose I should’ve just gone with Neville, and been glad that someone asked me at all, instead of sitting around like — I’m as bad as Ron.”

“Don’t be daft. Just because Longbottom’s quick off the mark doesn’t mean you shouldn’t have a lady’s choice.”

She shook her head, muttering. He watched her swat some snow off her shoulders without much gentleness.

“Were you waiting for someone?”

“No! I didn’t even think about it, I just looked at him and thought — it was mean,” she said furiously. “It wasn’t kind. I only wanted to go with someone as friends, anyway, this date rubbish has everyone acting like beasts—”

“Hear, hear.”

“—and it’s bad enough, you know, going to bed and listening to Lavender brag that she’s got four boys waiting on an answer, but she’s holding out for Harry — she doesn’t even like him, she just wants to be the center of attention—”

“Four? Good woman.”

“It doesn’t matter! Lavender Brown and her perfect blonde hair and her stupid giggle and her snogging partners have absolutely nothing to do with me getting a date to the dumb ball everyone’s so mad about, where I’d have to bother with a dress and hair and figure out whatever it is about makeup I’ve never understood, which is more time than I’ve got anyway, since I’m pressed enough between nine classes and a club and the Tournament, so I don’t even know where I’d find the room in my schedule for three hours of garrulous folderol.”

He wondered if he ought to ask her.

The snow had started to melt and stained the emergent layer of her curls, gilding the rest in glimmers from the afternoon sun. One flake clung to the curly tip of a piece of fringe, swept over her eyes, and it irritated him like a dog-eared page or a misplaced crease, yearning for correction. Her hair never stayed up, was the problem, it always wanted adjustment. His fingers twitched.

They could go as friends. It would put to bed all this nonsense with Neville and Ron and Lavender Brown. He was by far the best choice. He knew how to dance and drink and comport himself, not to mention how to actually wear white tie, which put him head and shoulders above anyone else she knew. He wouldn't embarrass her. And it would be fun to put up their feet and chat about runes while everyone else frayed their nerves to shreds over dates.

He cleared his throat. She tilted her head at him, and a stroke of static blotted out whatever he was going to say.

Go to the ball with me was, apparently, a much more complicated incantation than anyone had let on, because his tongue went dead and he was staring at her like he'd never seen a sodding girl before.

She was staring at him. Her fingers fiddled with her quill, unconsciously smearing ink over her thumb.

"What?" she said. His eyes flickered down. The shape of the word 'what,' which for some reason he'd never thought about before, was a sort of strange thing. It rolled off the mouth, like a blown kiss.

"What?" she said again. "You look like—"

A shriek split the air. Hermione jumped, smacked her knee on the table, and broke into a train of swearing that almost dwarfed the sound of the three Hufflepuff girls tearing around the corner. They ducked into the bookshelf, giggling and pawing at each other. One had a Bulgarian scarf knotted around her waist.

“—sodding bloody buggering goddamn pain in my arse, this is a library. What are they doing?” she snarled, and then, at him, sharply: “What are you smiling at?” which was a terrible shock.

“Quiet! Shut up! I think he saw us!”

“He did, I made eye contact—”

One darted her head around the bookshelf and squealed. “Wait! Wait! He’s coming by now—”

They fled to the next aisle and dissolved into cackling like a legislature of hags. Not much later, sharp footsteps swelled down the aisle, and Viktor Krum appeared, blinking in confusion.

“Herm-ow-nee,” he said, with dignified surprise. “Pale Man.”

“Hello, Viktor,” said Hermione politely. She massaged her knee. “Happy Christmas.”

“If you’re looking for your fan club,” said Draco, “they’re in the next aisle over.”

“Fan… club?”

“The admirers,” Hermione clarified. “The girls. They’re not here.”

“Oh,” he said, fervently, “good,” and to Draco’s dismay, he shuffled closer. This so happened to let him peer over Hermione’s shoulder at her notes.

Draco flicked his wand. The textbooks closed themselves with the same crisp snap, while the notes whisked themselves into piles and dove under innocuous volumes of Arithmancy.

Krum’s cheek twitched. “Is private?”

“Personal, actually. It’s nothing against you, but I’m sure you understand.”

“Ah.” He turned to Hermione and tapped the table. “Reasonably private? Eh? This?”

“Obviously,” said Draco.

“No,” she said, oblivious. “Why? Would you like to join us?”

Draco glared at her.

Krum broke into a lopsided, toothy smile. “Thank you for kind offer,” he said. “But I vill not stay. I am hiding from the girls.”

“Really? I think you could just wink at them, and they’d faint dead away.”

“No. You are vrong about this. They are always hiding when I am trying to talk to them,” he said, frowning. “I am suspecting this is the work of Warrington. He is having me followed.”

She was amused. “What, as espionage? An elite squadron of simpering third years?”

“He’s got a point,” muttered Draco.

“Ah. Right. You’re both ridiculous. Viktor, they want you to ask one of them to the ball.”

Viktor peered at her.

“The ball?” She rolled her hand expressively. “The dance, the Yule Ball? Didn’t Karkaroff tell you?”

“I know vhat the ball is. But vhy do they vant me to ask?”

“I suppose going to a ball on the arm of an international quidditch star who fights dragons is just the sort of thing some girls are interested in,” she said dryly, reaching for the textbook. “Did you bury my notes? Draco Malfoy, if you smeared them I’ll hex you silly, those were still wet.”

“They vould like it, you are thinking?” said Krum pensively. “Even from Hogvarts? Vhen ve are rivals?”

“If they didn’t have a heart attack first,” she said absently. “It’s not a real rivalry, nobody takes it that seriously.”

“Excuse you.”

“They are not thinking: ‘He is no good boy, from Durmstrang, dark magic’? Their families — they are not care?”

“Do not,” said Draco thinly, twirling his wand. The Knockback Jinx was tremendously effective at close range. “It’s ‘do not’ care. As in ‘I do not care to discuss this any further.’”

“Maybe they do,” she admitted, “but honestly, I can’t see why. And if they’re like mine, they’re muggles, so they don’t care one way or another.”

Krum nodded. “Thank you,” he said shortly. “I am leaving you to your privacy now.”

Draco ignored the look Hermione shot him as Krum left. His eyes followed the Bulgarian to the door, and thereafter he took care to cast Muffliato when they went to the library.

Sometimes he thought he was the only one in Gryffindor Tower with the slightest nose for subterfuge.

That evening, over a game of wizard’s chess with Harry, Ron lamented the deluge of work that had skated in over the deadline. Snape had assigned a take-home test on common antidotes in Potions, and both Draco and Hermione had refused to do it for him.

“Evil, he is,” Ron said bitterly that night in the Gryffindor common room. “Ruining the break with a lot of studying.”

Hermione turned her nose up over the edge of her notebook. “Mmm. You’re not exactly straining yourself, are you?”

“It’s Christmas!”

“It’s December nineteenth.”

The portrait-door whinged. Fred, George, and Angelina tumbled in, levitating a barrel of apple cider and a wheelcart of spiced fruitcakes, which the room greeted with a cry of appreciation. Ron stumbled up to help them, leaving Harry to puzzle out the four different ways he was in check.

“So. Harry,” said Angelina, flopping down in a chair. “Who’s our Hogwarts Crown Princess?”

Harry groaned, and a round of friendly jeering took up.

“Better hurry up, boy-o. It’s a big night. She’ll need time to plan her outfit.” Angelina leaned against the mantelpiece, grinning. “Besides, the good ones go fast, don’t you know.”

“Lay off him, he’s working up to it,” said Ron loyally. “We’re planning a strategy.”

“Does this strategy involve asking a girl to the ball?” said Draco. “Or is the plan to stare mournfully at the Ravenclaw Table until the idea transmits? Because so far, the results are uninspiring.”

Harry, sprawled despairingly spread-eagle by the fireplace, lifted a single finger. Draco fired off two in return.

“Who’re you taking, then, wanker?” yawned Ron. “At least Harry’s got a game plan.”

“I say again: can we confirm this plan involves eye contact?”

“He’s got irons in the fire! Leave him alone!”

“Ah, young love,” sighed Fred, perching on the back of the sofa. He clasped his hands over his heart. “Faint heart never won fair seeker, dear Potter. Go to her. Fly to her, serenade her — tell her she has bewitched you with her broom-handling skills and robust arms — shower her in flowers and quidditch gear—”

“You are so full of shit,” said Angelina fondly, crossing her arms.

He grinned. “I reckon,” he said. “By the way. Nearly forgot. We’re going to the ball, yeah?”

“Are we! Are we, now! And just what do you expect to hear, Fred Weasley, Mr. Serenade Her, when you come up to a girl and say ‘we’re going to the ball’ like you’re taking me to buy broomstick ointment?”

“...Yes?”

“Yeah,” she admitted. “Reckon so. Wear pink, it’ll match my dress.”

“But Georgie wants to go twinsies.”

“Great, then he can match, too.”

“Fair ’nuff. Cheers,” said Fred, and wandered off to help Lee Jordan deface a poster of Viktor Krum on the notice board. Angelina gave a small pleased smile and went over to chat with Katie Bell.

Each day new decorations appeared in the Great Hall, like a coruscating countdown to ritual sacrifice. Long talons of everlasting icicles dripped from the banisters of the grand staircase, and thick robes of holly wound up the ever-shifting arms of the staircases above. Twelve fir trees of gigantic height emerged overnight in the Great Hall, decked in the colors of each Hogwarts house, and each topped with a moving porcelain figurine of a lion, eagle, badger, or snakes. The tiny roars and hisses of these little creatures were lost under the sound of Christmas carols, for the suits of armor had been enchanted to sing whenever someone passed by, and the acoustics of their empty helmets gave these songs a hollow, mournful quality, like they were being played from far away. The gloomy strains of “O Tannenbaum” echoed long and deep through the stone vaults of the castle, and accompanied by the humming croons of the ghosts, as if the rock itself were singing.

It was a strange evening. Daphne was there. Ginny, too, had joined them late, bundling in beside Hermione and haughtily spooning lamb cawl into her bowl, so preoccupied with her own smugness she didn't even notice Daphne until the girl turned to her and said admiringly: "I say! How many of you are there? Your mother must be a drill sergeant," and she dropped a chunk of lamb into her pumpkin juice.

He interceded.

"Weasley, Daphne Greengrass. She's here on good behavior. Daphne, this is Ginevra. The terminal Weasley, or so one hopes."

"You're in Slytherin," observed Ginny.

Daphne levitated the lamb chunk out of Ginny's goblet. "And you have the loveliest hair I've ever seen. What is that color? Garnet? Copper? I should simply die to see you in green. You'd be mesmerizing."

Ginny, who had dirt on her nose and looked like she had never mesmerized anybody, flushed pink beneath her freckles. "Huh," she said suspiciously. "Thanks, I guess."

Satisfied that the risk of violence was low, he returned to Hermione's conversation with Harry, who was scraping a spoon listlessly across his bowl.

"Just tell her you like her, and want to go to the ball, she's going to say yes — honestly, you might do it now, she's coming in."

A set of Ravenclaws had indeed arrived from the courtyard, glazed in rain-drizzle, and Cho's dark hair shone amongst them. Harry groaned. Ron thwacked him on the back and he stumbled to his feet.

With a foreboding sigh, he went over to her group and mumbled something, his hands in his pockets. Cho blinked and then said something, and Harry let out a loud, wild honk of laughter, like a startled goose; and then both of them smiled very brightly.

When he stumbled back, he still looked like he'd been clubbed.

"Ah, no, she rejected you," said Hermione dryly.

"She asked me," he said, in disbelief at his own luck. "I brought up the ball, and she just… asked me."

"You're joking," said Ron.

He wasn't. Whatever poor overclocked angel was responsible for Harry Potter's good luck had burned the midnight oil down to its smoking wick, for Cho, trained in warfare on the cold mud of the quidditch pitch, had come out from the tall grasses and seized her man while the getting was good. Her reward was a burst of congratulatory shrieks and the full rights to extreme smugness. She settled at the Ravenclaw table like a cat that had glutted itself on cream.

Ginny, opposite, looked like someone had smashed the empty cream jar over her head.

Daphne squealed and fluttered her fingers on the heel of her palm. "Brava, brava! What a handsome couple! It'll make quidditch matches complicated, of course, but I suppose a bit of friendly competition whets the blood, doesn't it?"

"Nicely done, Harry," said Ron, only slightly strained. "Taken care of."

"Indeed. And who all are the rest you taking?"

There was a pause. Clearly, she had expected a more resounding answer, because she paled and glanced desperately around the table, looking for someone to rescue her. Draco, who was not feeling terribly warm towards her at the moment, declined to do so.

“He hasn’t asked anybody,” muttered Ginny, jerking her head at Ron.

“Hey! Oi! At least I’m going! You’re not even invited, so why don’t you hop off—” “Actually, I am going. With Neville, in fact.” She stabbed a carrot.

His jaw dropped.

“Neville? You’re serious?”

“Yes, I am! And what’s wrong with him?”

“Nothing! And I like Neville, but — Merlin, so everyone has dates but me, don’t they?”

“No, they don’t,” said Hermione patiently. “For example, Eloise hasn’t got a date yet, and neither has Parvati.”

“I’m not taking Eloise.”

“And what’s wrong with her?”

Ron rolled his eyes and put a finger alongside his nose.

“Ron!”

“Come on,” he said, tilting his head at her. He trailed off, and his stare waxed keen and contemplative, as if wheels were turning under that ruddy hair that had never known movement before.

Draco directed the full force of his attention to his baked potato. That was fine. Ron was allowed to look at Hermione, if he wanted.

“Hermione,” Ron said. It was soft and thoughtful. “You’re a girl, aren’t you?”

Said girl promptly coughed up half a goblet of pumpkin juice. Ginny thumped her mightily on the back, and the blockage vanished from her airway with a thoroughly un-girlish wheeze. The ginger shot a glare at her brother.

“Well spotted!”

“Right, right.” Ron kicked away Ginny’s foot, which was attempting to locate and terrorize his shinbone under the table. “Reckon you’ll — quit it, Gin! — reckon you’ll want a date then, won’t you?”

The shriek of cutlery on porcelain made them all flinch.

“I quite apologize," said Draco calmly, setting aside his fork. The baked potato was no more. “Granger, would you pass me—”

“You’ve just now thought of that?” she said disbelievingly. “Now you’ve exhausted your other options?”

“I dunno. I didn’t think about it before, to be honest.” Ron rubbed his neck, exerting the minimum of decency to look sheepish.

“Oh, that’s charming. Pray tell: didn’t think that I was a girl, or didn’t think I’d want a date?”

Ginny’s foot dealt a tremendously powerful blow to its victim’s kneecap, which, if received, would have surely silenced Ron as desired; unfortunately, the victim was not Ron but Harry, who wheezed and doubled over.

“Either, I guess.”

“Granger, I asked you to pass a new setting. You know how I loathe being made to repeat myself.”

She ignored him. “Because either way, Ron,” she snapped, “it’s pretty hard for a girl to feel wanted—”

“Feel wanted? Come off it! You’re our friend, and you might have offered, anyway.”

“Offered? Offered? Like an owl service?”

Realizing that he had stuck his foot in the bear trap, Ron set his jaw, girded his loins, and firmly wedged the other one in after it.

“You know what, yeah! I mean, not for nothing, Mione, but you didn’t ask me or Harry, either!”

Ginny was fingering her fork, gazing at Ron’s arm with savage intent, as if calculating the odds of getting a howler for puncturing her brother’s cephalic vein.

Hermione’s knuckles turned white on her knife. Draco eyed them with appreciative concern.

“That’s beside the point,” she said. “If you wanted to go with me, you should’ve asked me, and not waited until I was the last girl in eyeshot without a date.”

This bizarre bloodletting had gone on long enough. Entertaining as it was to watch Ron whale furiously at the bottom of the hole he was digging, Hermione was starting to look a bit genuinely hurt, and it took the joy out of the thing.

“Ronald, enough of this. Ritual humiliation is out of vogue, and it clashes with your complexion. Now, Granger, about the setting—”

“Well, I’m asking you now,” Ron said stubbornly. “Do you wanna go with me?”

Something cramped in Draco’s stomach. He set down his silverware and reached for his water, immediately relieved of appetite. He had never known the Hogwarts food to betray him before.

“I — you know what, Ron, actually, I would have,” she said flatly. He set down the waterglass hard and it splashed over the rim. The cramp spiked, and now a hot little curl of irritation was snaking up his throat.

She was lying. Why was she lying to him? To make fun of him? She wouldn't have wanted to go with Ron, it would have humiliated her. What a joke that would have been, him hauling her around on his big oafish arm, wearing those ridiculous dress robes, embarrassing her, making her look stupid—

"—going with someone else."

"What."

Hermione and Ron both stared at him.

"I'm going with someone else," she repeated clearly.

The cramp was swiftly becoming awful. His stomach had folded into a small pitted stone and slithered down his abdomen, sending a roil of nausea up his throat. What she was saying kept slipping in and out of his focus, and so it took him a few seconds to process, by which time his stomach had landed painfully in his appendix.

"...not telling you, it's a surprise," she said, tucking her hair behind her ear. He stared at her.

She was being demure. She was being bashful. Hermione Granger, who fought a mountain troll and stood down a dementor and outran a werewolf, who brewed an illegal N.E.W.T-level potion in the girls' bathroom between classes, and shouted someone down about every other day, was fidgeting and curling her hair behind her ear because someone had asked her on a date.

He was really in profound pain.

"Who is it?"

She averted her eyes. "I just said it's a surprise."

“Piss off. Who is it?”

“Oh, never mind, since you asked so nicely.”

“Is it Finnigan?”

“No, he’s taking Lavender,” said Ginny. Harry had hidden his face behind his goblet.

“Fine. Thomas?”

“It’s not Dean,” she said, “and I wouldn’t tell you if it was, because, as I’ve said three times now, it’s a surprise.”

“But there’s no one else,” said Ron, after a moment. His expression was stunned and more than a little hurt. “Is that — are you serious? Because if you’re not — there’s no point to us both going alone. Listen, I’m sorry I didn’t ask you, okay? I should’ve done it sooner. That’s my fault.”

This dumbfounded her.

“You think I’m lying to spite you? Are you joking, Ronald Weasley?”

“Granger, forget about that. It’s irrelevant. Is it Jordan?”

“Lee?” she said, distracted by glaring at Ron. Her lack of priorities offended: she ought to have been glaring at him, if anyone. “No, he’s taking Katie. And stop guessing, you’re not going to get it.”

He wanted her to look at him. She seemed to be putting a lot of effort into not looking at him. What was her problem?

Ron stood up. “Fine,” he snapped. “No, that’s fine. I get the point. Literally anyone else, before me, right?”

“What? You’re being ridiculous! Come back! Ron!”

But he had stalked off. She stood up, and Draco hauled her back down.

“Don’t bother.”

“I never said that!”

“Of course you didn’t. Don’t be daft. He’s delusional.” His fingers fully encircled her wrist. He noticed this, involuntarily, and then threw away both wrist and idea in a fit of self-disgust. What was his problem, that was the better question.

The silence clambered down onto the table and sat in the worst possible place.

Daphne cleared her throat. “Please, everyone, try the treacle tart. I think the puddings are better here than our table. I blame the house-elves, I think they pick favorites.”

“Not a very close contest, when one house likes to enslave them,” snapped Hermione. Ginny snorted.

The silence turned around three times and resettled itself with one foot in the pudding.

“I envy your mind for politics, Hermione,” she said timidly. “I feel like I’m watching you go at it with swords whenever you talk. I should like to introduce you to some of Daddy’s friends at the Ministry of Magic; a lot of them ought to have their noses smashed in, and you seem like you could do with a good chance to smash some noses.”

Hermione tossed her hair back and blew out a short breath.

“I wouldn’t want to give them the pleasure,” she said, but it was less heated than she’d been a moment ago.

Daphne smiled at her with evident relief, and then set down her knife. “Steering the conversation back to something I’m good at,” she announced, “I, er — well, say I’ve been inspired by Cho’s example. And I — this is a teensy bit embarrassing, but I haven’t got a date.”

Even distracted, Draco found this surprising. “Not Theo?”

“I don’t think so,” she said evasively. “We haven’t spoken about it, but I don’t expect much. I imagine he’ll want to take Pansy, and a girl doesn’t like to stick her foot in.”

“Reckon not,” said Ginny darkly. “If one half is Pansy Parkinson, you’d get slime all over it.”

“Yes, well. Pans is quite set on going. But you see, so am I, and I’m not of a mind to maverick, it’s not done. Quite proud of the girls who do, of course, all power to women, but I’m a lady of the old school. So. Draco. You won’t leave a girl hanging, will you?”

Draco looked up at the same time as Hermione dropped a forkful of treacle tart. It was hard to say who was more stunned.

“You want me to take you? Why?”

“Your natural abundance of charm, obviously,” muttered Ginny, sawing her lamb.

“Not if it’s such a chore as you make it sound,” Daphne said pleasantly, “but otherwise, yes, I’d be much obliged. You’re perfectly suitable.”

“Suitable,” repeated Hermione. Ginny watched him like he had the World Cup Final playing on his forehead. She seemed to be trying to communicate something with eyebrows and mouth movements, but unproficient as he was in the Late Weasley Dialect, it told him nothing.

He thought about it.

“Alright,” he said. Daphne beamed and nodded at him, and then tucked into her pudding.

“What,” said Hermione. “You’re just — like that? Because he’s ‘suitable’?”

“Why, yes,” agreed Daphne. “Though ‘suitable’ doesn’t mean half a hot toot to me. It’s just to make the families happy. I’m sure I shouldn’t care who I dance with; I’d go with a leprechaun if I knew my parents wouldn’t find out.”

“Because anyone who isn’t pureblood is as good as a non-wizard, aren’t they?”

Ginny sighed and started rubbing her eyes. “Had to, did you?” she muttered to Daphne, under her breath. Draco hardly caught it, being distracted by a mounting row, but Daphne must have, because she stiffened. “You just had to.”

Daphne turned pink, and looked at the table.

“Granger, it doesn’t actually mean anything. It’s a nothing-term. Anyway—”

“That’s not true, though,” she said loudly. “Is it? Because Daphne didn’t ask anyone, she asked you, and she said suitable, and you knew exactly what she meant.”

He couldn’t understand how she had ended up yelling at him. Under most circumstances he knew what he’d done wrong, but she’d never been this angry without some sort of understandable cause before.

He scowled at her, and she scowled right back. Well, that was fine. If it was yelling she wanted, she’d get it. She’d more than earned a row, anyway, she and her ‘surprises,’ the little sneak—

And there was still that troublesome whisper of eagerness — are we going to row, now? Are we going to fight? — that darted through the wall of discomfort in his stomach.

“I’m not suitable for most people in Slytherin,” said Daphne suddenly.

Hermione rounded on her. “Oh, really? You’re plenty suitable for a Malfoy, though, so I wonder where the line is? Not blonde enough? You can’t be pureblood if you don’t rank between platinum and alabaster?”

“No,” she said. She drew a finger across the scars on her face.

“That’s why I asked him,” she added, after a beat of silence. “Seeing as Draco doesn’t mind, and people won’t talk so much, if I’m spoken for. Sorry. I didn’t think it would be a problem, Hermione. I thought — well, you said you already had a date.”

Hermione was a quiet rictus of horror.

“I didn’t think,” she said. “I’m — I’m quite — I didn’t mean to. I mean —”

“My darling, I’ve already forgotten it. What were we talking about?”

It was a Herculean effort, truly, but it failed because no one stepped in to relieve her.

“I have to go,” blurted Hermione. “To. The library. I just remembered.”

They had spent three hours on Runes together earlier that morning; it was also almost nine o’clock at night, and the library would close soon.

“For what?”

She looked at him wildly, as if she'd never heard of such a thing as a library in her life.

“Charms,” she said. “I have Charms.”

She leapt up and carried this lie on swift feet out of the Great Hall. He stared after her.

“We have Charms homework?” said Harry miserably.

“No, we don’t.”

“Oh. Good. But what’s her problem, then?”

Daphne glanced at Draco, sipped her pumpkin juice, and said nothing.

“Harry,” said Ginny emphatically.

“What?”

She raised her eyebrows.

“Ginny, what?” he said, annoyed.

She hit the table and stood up.

“You know, I really hope all of you die alone," she snapped. She stormed out after Hermione.

It had started raining. It pattered against the tall windows and washed out the melancholy strains of Nearly Headless Nick and the Grey Lady singing “A Coventry Carol” among the candles overhead. The sound was dull and gloomy, and the Great Hall glittered like a bronze relief in the dark mirror of the windows. Someone down the table was saying the bad weather would last through Christmas, and Draco was of a mood to believe them.

“Goodness,” said Daphne worriedly. “Do you think she meant me, too?”

-Written to one of the hardest serves James Fitzpatrick and Patrick Doyle ever whipped up. Not nearly enough conversation about how those two provided for us after John Williams bowed out.

-They and Mike Newell also gave us the Weird Sisters as an all-male glam rock band, and personally I think you should be allowed to go to heaven for that.

-This chapter goes out in loving memory of my dance teacher, who would have been aghast at the mere idea of intentionally doing a contra check without communicating it to the follow. Jail-worthy.

-As has been litigated in the fandom, the scene of McGonagall teaching dance lessons does, in fact, imply an equivalent with Snape; however, since Slytherins are mostly purebloods and therefore expected in general to have some training in it, I think he probably doesn't, or he sends the few half-bloods and untrained purebloods to go sit in on a Ravenclaw lesson or something. (Covering the fact that I'm fairly certain Snape has never danced a step of anything in his life, and could not teach it even if asked.)

-It's a rare treat for me to get more Ginny. She's still a bit of a cipher, and I'm looking forward to more of her in fifth and sixth year. There's always a balancing act, in a series with this many characters, of trying to do everyone justice without spreading the attention too thin. I like the idea that she and the twins have this unique friendship — Ron's distant with her because he's trying to strike out on his own, but the twins are old enough that they're not threatened by a kid tagging along with them, and plus, they think Ginny's hilarious. Which she is.

-I wrote the line "she'd walk into a death trap and complain about the upholstery" and then realized that I was, in fact, describing myself.

-The comments have been amazing this past week — reading my inbox is my treat after a long day. I hope everyone who left a comment has something lucky and unexpected happen to them today.

-Anyway: you all know when the next chapter goes up! It's called "Eine Kleine Nachtmagik." And it's exactly what you think. Insane love to all of you. <3

Eine Kleine Nachtmagik

Chapter 43: Eine Kleine Nachtmagik

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

He did not see Hermione again for several days. He only saw evidence of her, in a pink cardigan draped over a sofa filmed in cat hair, or a flier for S.C.R.U.M.B.Y. that appeared, thrice, on the common room notice board, despite persistent graffiti attacks. The third time, he caught a first year named Hooper going after it with a quill, and from irritation and curiosity, he tried out a strange little spell he'd picked up from the margins of Moste Potente Potions, which turned out to make the victim's teeth grow until they met a solid object, e.g., the floorboards. The success of this experiment was the highpoint of his weekend; the rest was dreadfully dull, composed mainly of listening to Harry complain about homework he wasn't doing and Ron sulk over dates he hadn't gotten.

He heard that Hermione had taken up in the library, but he was wary of disturbing her. So he cast an Anti-Vandalism Charm on the S.C.R.U.M.B.Y. poster and gave Crookshanks a scratch behind the ears, and went about his days as normal.

The result of this process was an accidental and unpleasant revelation of just how many hours in the day he spent with, or thinking about, Hermione Granger. It was a daunting hole in his schedule that he struggled to mortar in. There was always plenty of homework to do, but wheedling away too many hours on homework alone made him feel like a pathetic hermit. He flew a few quidditch scrimmages organized by Harry and Cho; he finished reading the fifth year Runes textbook, and did a little work on the egg, though it was slow-going, because Hermione kept their notes in her journal. He played games of Exploding Snap with Ron and the twins in the common room, which always ended with a redhead's eyebrows getting blown off, and in a true fit of boredom one day he taught Ginny how to cheat. He went through Seamus's record collection. He listened to Lavender complain about her volumizer. He put on his Walkman and wrote a long letter to his mother complaining of everything in great detail. Then he burned it and penned a short sequel asking why she wouldn't be home for Christmas. She didn't answer. He was starting to worry.

On Monday he found a note on his favorite armchair demanding his opinion on a particular Runic script from Ancient Mesopotamia, and his relief was embarrassing.

He burned it and waited four hours before sticking an answer to her favorite desk, under the window. Then he sat down across from it, put up his feet, and practiced Summoning Charms to pass the time. By the end of the hour he was so good at them that he could vault something across the common room, Summon it, and whisk it back into his hand before it landed.

She came down from the girls' dorm fussing a spray of damp curls into their clamp, and then froze.

The inkwell came hurtling over, and he caught it.

She'd bathed. Her hair was dark and stringy, and her face dewy from the heat. There was something vaguely indecent about seeing her with her hair wet, though it had happened before at the Burrow and he hadn't thought anything of it then. He blamed it on recent events. She was the one acting oddly; of course he was going to stare.

Some internal debate crescendoed and resolved, because after setting her mouth in a firm line, she stomped over and picked up his note without a word to him.

Her vow of silence was not long for the world.

"Doesn't work?"

“And a good morning to you, too, Granger. How was your weekend? Mine was wonderful.”

“It was perfectly lovely, thank you, I feel quite refreshed, I slept for an age and still got heaps done and what do you mean, it doesn’t work?”

He tossed the inkwell from one hand to the other. “Precisely what I wrote. It doesn’t work. Work, it does not. Work is the thing it does not do.”

“It checks every box.”

“Except the one where it has to work.”

“How would you know? We haven’t even cross-referenced it.”

“That would be a waste of time. We agreed the runes have to have a grammar, that’s what the accent marks are.”

“I’m positing,” she gritted out, “that we were wrong about the grammar. Obviously.”

“So I gathered. And I’m saying you’re wrong,” he said, “obviously.”

She ripped the note cleanly in half and fed it to the fire.

“We’re getting nowhere.”

“No, really? I thought we’d cracked it.”

“I’m half convinced it doesn’t translate at all,” she said pensively, wringing out a strand of hair. “That it’s supposed to represent something else. We haven’t skimmed the surface of potential symbology.”

“We dismissed symbology because it was too random. Three schools, three nations, and a clue that hinges on someone happening to recognize a precise item of cultural trivia? We can go through it all again, if you'd prefer, but we weren't stupid then and we aren't stupid now, so—"

"I know that, but one of us is wrong somewhere, and if we don't sort it out soon, Harry's going to be flattened or eaten by whatever horrible thing they've got lined up for him, and would you stop throwing that stupid thing— Accio!"

It zipped neatly into her palm. He closed his hand around nothing.

"Twitchy."

"Prat," she said.

He cocked his head at the chair opposite him. She hesitated.

"Ronald found a date," he said, by and by.

She blinked. "Really? He asked someone?"

"Apparently Chang has a friend."

"I see," she said. "How's her nose?"

He held his hand so it bisected his face, dead center.

The corners of her eyes turned up the way they did when she wanted to smile. "Well. That's one less thing to worry about."

"Her name's Padma."

"I see."

"Patil."

"Yes, I know."

"And yours?"

“Nice try.”

“I won’t tell.”

“Yes, you would,” she said, insufferably smug, like she took pleasure in knowing something he didn’t. Scratch that: he knew she did, and the fact that he would’ve done exactly the same in her situation didn’t make it any less aggravating. “If you knew. You really would.”

Horrible, sneaky woman.

He held out his hand. She tossed the inkwell, and he caught it.

“If he doesn’t ask to match your dress, take Ronald,” he said, and went to go get his Runes book. He could feel her watching him as he left the common room, and that, too, was nearly as satisfying as the last word.

Increasingly, he felt there was a payment of some sort they were delaying. It was racking up behind them, all that debt, but for the life of him he couldn’t find it in his heart to pay it; not today, with the snow coming down so gently on the window, and the fire was babbling like it had a secret to tell. He let it go.

The ball was on Christmas Eve. That morning, the twins held a snowball fight in the courtyard, which started at nine o’clock and went twelve hard-fought rounds — a pyrrhic siege of snow golems and frozen artilleries that chased wherever you ran — until noon, when most of the girls departed to make preparations.

“What are you going to do?” said Ron, bemused, when Hermione went with them. “And — hey! Who are you going with?”

She threw a laugh over her shoulder and skipped ahead to join Ginny and Katie Bell. Draco landed a Bombarda that shattered a ten-foot snowman into a twinkling snowfall.

There was music in Gryffindor Tower that night. In the yellow rooms girls and boys hurried to and fro in whispering flocks like the migration of butterflies, half-dressed and half-drunk on excitement. At five o'clock a tea setting appeared in the common room and the boys came down for meat pies and fruit cakes with cups of hot strong cider, chatting about snowball fights and pretending vainly to have no interest whatsoever in what was going on upstairs. Seamus Finnigan put on an album by Blur, and bouncy guitars zigzagged up and down the staircase with the footsteps and the shrieks.

"They're putting it on," griped Ron, white-knuckled on his armchair. "There's no reason to make this much noise."

There was a crash, followed by giddy screams.

"What are they bloody doing up there? Animal sacrifices?"

"If only it were that easy," said Katie. She lounged in an armchair with a snifter of brandy, in a three-piece suit of black satin, looking effortlessly sharp and masculine, and somehow, her tie was still better than Ron's. Merlin wept. "Lavender's eyeshadow alone would take three goats."

"I would contribute at least one to fix Ronald's robes," said Draco, adjusting his cufflink. He wore a wizard's white tie, exactingly traditional, down to a white rosebud boutonniere his grandfather might have plucked for himself: a black tailcoat, a neat silk hourglass of a tie, and a waistcoat that sculpted the arch of his waist like it was painted there, in the same marble white as his hair. In the mirror, the black of his suit flushed like the first bloom of ink on parchment against the pale column of his throat and wrists. He slipped on his signet ring, and wondered whether his father had seen something similar in his mirror, down in a different part of this castle, twenty years ago.

Ron adjusted the spangled epaulets of his dress robes, and sighed gloomily. He did not wear a wizard's white tie, or any sort of white tie at all, but a camel hair suit borrowed from the husband of his Great

Aunt Muriel, and it looked like just the sort of thing someone married to a Muriel would wear. Bill had kindly mailed Harry his old set of white tie, in the interest of “not embarrassing himself” during the Opening Dance, but since Ron had no school to represent, he was allowed to embarrass himself in solitude.

“Me, too, mate,” he said glumly.

A knock came at the common room door. Harry went to get it.

“Er. Draco? Your date’s here.”

“We’re not to leave for an hour.”

Harry shrugged and held the door. Daphne wandered in, her eyes sweeping wondrously over the common room.

“So this is where you all throw parties,” she said. “I’d always wondered. Those stairs! Gryffindor calves must be fearsome.”

She was wearing a green dressing-gown. She carried several carpetbags that could have comfortably packed a small household.

“Draco, you look wonderful. Don’t think I’m going in this, of course; I’ve brought three dresses, I want your opinion — I didn’t know if there was a corsage that I ought to match—”

“Don’t push it.”

“Then don’t make it so fun to try! Would the girls mind, do you think, if I went up and — oh, I don’t know, found a corner, or something? I swear I won’t peek. I’m very good at not peeking. And I’ve brought goodies, if they want to share—”

“Slytherin’s still being twats, are they?” said Ron. Daphne faltered.

She rallied bravely. “Why, Ronald! Your suit is so individual. I love it.” She gave him a smile on full wattage. “No one will mistake you for anyone else. A bold statement. Well-made.”

“It’s pish.”

“Oh, thank God. Yes, it’s very bad, and I’m sorry, but I don’t have a moment to help you fix it. Do you think the girls will mind, if I go up, by the way? I wouldn’t ask, really — but I need a third hand to do my hair, and it’s just — the girls’ bathroom in Slytherin, they won’t — I couldn’t—”

Katie stood up. “Sure, I’ll take you,” she said. “It’s jam-packed up there, nobody’ll mind one more.”

Daphne looked her up and down. “Oh! You’re a girl!”

“Most days,” she said, grinning, and offered Daphne her arm.

Daphne looked at Draco, who shrugged. With uncharacteristic timidness, she took Katie’s arm and was led up the staircase. As she went, he heard her murmur: “Now, are you one of those girls who…?” followed by a burst of Katie’s laughter.

The lights grew brighter as the last vestiges of sunset dimmed from the windows, and the music grew louder, rowdier, dripping with the confidence that young partygoers were trying to leech like honey from the air. One of the seventh years sent a flask of firewhiskey rotating around the common room and it loosened the air with laughter, which now flowed eagerly from even the dullest remarks. Already there were vanguards, couples polished and primped ahead of schedule, such as Fred and Angelina, who was sleek and stylish in a sleeveless shift of pink silk, which matched both Fred’s tie and George’s. They formed a constellation with Katie and Lee Jordan, twinning in suits, around whom the younger students coalesced, faces bright with naked yearning. Ginny and Neville hurried down at ten to eight, she in a fluffy blue number with cap sleeves, he in a slightly sloppier vision of Draco’s tails. Cho appeared in a champagne-colored robe with red blossoms embroidered up the skirt, and her hair freed, for once, from its trademark ponytail. She chatted with George and Parvati while they waited for Harry to haul his brain back online.

Suddenly the clock tolled eight, and the will of the crowd asserted itself with a firm gesture toward the exit. Draco, caught up in the current of the colorful flock, checked the sea of heads for a familiar nest, but didn't find it.

"Hang on, we're missing someone," called Ron.

"They're fine! Go on! Hermione had some trouble," gasped the arriving Lavender, and when both Draco and Ron stared at her, she snorted and flapped her hand. "Oh, she's alright. Silly thing thought she could pick up makeup in an afternoon, because of course she did, and then we had to scrub it all off — anyway, Daphne said they'll catch up."

"She's alright, though?" said Ron, in a tone Draco vaguely resented, though he had no good reason to. He decided to blame it on Ron's jacket.

"She will be, once Daphne figures out how to get mascara on her without getting jinxed. As for me, you couldn't pay me enough — HELL-O, Finnigan, are you going to carry my heels? Because otherwise someone better bloody levitate me, I am not walking those stairs."

The entrance hall mulled with people he didn't recognize. In their finery, it was hard to tell these apart from the true foreigners, who swirled and eddied among the Brits with only a sneeze of French or Bulgarian to differentiate them. Not here, the dominion of House, for a glimmer of green could as well be a Hufflepuff's ballgown as a Slytherin's, and there were at least as many Durmstrang students in red fur dress uniforms as there were Gryffindors sporting the color.

A group of Slytherins emerged from the dungeons in dark finery. Theo led the group, his hair slicked in the knife-edge part of an old muggle movie star, dressed to the nines, and perhaps the tens and elevens, in tails, a cane, and a silk scarf. Pansy wore a sleeveless sheath of shimmering jet that made her body into a thin black knife, the same lightless color as her hair. Her mouth puckered in stylish boredom, but it curved up slightly when someone called out a compliment on her haircut.

“Is that Fleur?” whispered Cho, going up on tiptoe. A group of blondes from Beauxbatons had come in, sparkling in white dresses. “With Roger? Roger Davies?” An anonymous whisper assured her that it was. “But he’s a skirt-chaser!”

“Is he really?” said Parvati, with interest.

Professor McGonagall’s augmented voice cut through the chatter. “Champions over here! Over here, please!”

“That’s us,” said Harry nervously, and offered Cho his arm. She beamed and fluttered her hand at the other girls, as if to say: Can you believe it? and they went off to stand with Fleur and Roger. Krum and Cassius had yet to make an appearance.

He turned around again to look for Hermione, and it felt a sting of irritation when she wasn’t there. It was one thing to be late. It was another to lag so far behind that you missed the opening.

“Can you see Granger?” he asked Ron. Did she intend not to show at all? It wasn’t like her. Pride alone wouldn’t keep her upstairs; if it were a matter of courage, she’d be charging down any minute at a dead sprint in pajamas.

“No. Say, there’s Daphne, though,” said Ron suddenly, and pointed.

Daphne rounded the curve of the grand stairwell and stepped into the light. Her hair fit in scalloped golden shells on the side of her head, a pale rose mounted atop the marble shelf of her naked shoulders. Two glittering straps rose from the bodice of her pale blue gown and twined around her neck, dangling a diamond pendant at the center of her naked back.

The amount of bare skin revealed the path of her scars from one ear all the way down into the neckline of her dress, a long canyon of undisguised wounds, and there was whispering all across the hall.

On a guess, he glanced at Theo. The result was gratifying and amusing in the extreme: he was staring at her as if he had never seen a girl, or indeed another human being before.

Then Daphne winked at Draco, and then turned and said something to someone out of sight on the stairs. She held out her hand and beckoned.

A girl stepped timidly into the light. It caught and scintillated on the petals of her skirts, which bloomed in a wide gold bell from the stem of her waist. Gold sleeves like translucent leaves of champagne flowered from her shoulders, like the corselet of gold boning that encircled her waist, and it matched the sparkling tail of the gold wreath that wove in and out of her hair, like a naiad's crown. Her hair was dark and shimmery and soft as billows of melted chocolate being poured, some braided, and some left to curtain her heart-shaped face, which was bright and smiling and lovely.

It was Hermione.

At that moment it didn't occur to him that he was staring. It didn't occur to him that he was doing much of anything at all. Warmth invaded his stomach and trailed its tongue up the inside of his ribs. Everything was moving very slowly, except, of course, for Hermione, who was timidly creeping down the stairs under the hazardous rim of her skirts.

He crossed the room.

He felt himself move before he thought about it. There was static in the parts of his brain that were usually sharp. He really did think he'd been Confounded, but the trouble with it was that he was so distracted he couldn't concentrate on that, either.

She reached the last steps, which were bigger than the others, and a longer jump in heels, and in her hesitation a hand pressed out of the crowd. She peered at it, and then broke into a smile and accepted it.

It didn't belong to Draco. It belonged to Viktor Krum.

The champion wore a blood-red cloak and a uniform with polished black boots. The difference in size between them was never more obvious. He was taller than Draco, taller than most of the professors, too, and her hand vanished in the glove of his own.

He leaned in to say something, a distance of approximately several miles, and spoke so close to her ear one would think she was deaf. She giggled back at him. It was all wrong on her. Hermione did not giggle, or wink, or anything that could be described by a theoretically short-lived poet as flirtatious. She was intense and serious and peppery and sly, and dryly funny, but she did not giggle, and if she did, she did not do so girlishly.

Or maybe she'd found a reason to.

It was a normal thing to do. Giggling. She could do it if she wanted.

She could flirt with Viktor Krum, if she wanted. Couldn't stop her.

But — but — it was perverse for Krum to encourage it. He was seventeen. There was a full two year difference, for God's sake, it was absurd. One could only infer that Durmstrang had so few girls he had to resort to cradle-robbing at Hogwarts.

Hermione was wearing makeup. There was gold on her lids, a sheen of pearl pink on her lips, and her eyelashes were unusually long and fluttery, all the better for batting at Bulgarian delinquents.

"Do try and give us a smile, darling," said Daphne. She was at his elbow, somehow; presumably she'd teleported. "I didn't spend two hours on that for you to scowl like she gave you the croup."

"Did you know her date was Krum?"

“If I did, I still wouldn’t answer questions put to me in that tone. And yes, she told me. You can thank me for that dress, also, it’s mine, but I’m simply a goddess with a needle and stitching; I dropped the bust two sizes and took in the waist four inches in the span of half an hour. I should be carried cheering through the streets of Rome. Frankly, for the hair alone I think I deserve awards.”

“You deserve something,” he said thinly. Krum had taken Hermione’s arm and was introducing her to Karkaroff and Maxime, who stood in a group with Fleur and Roger. Roger kept glancing at her waist. If he did it again he would get knocked off his broomstick the next time he played Gryffindor, and Draco would not be dispatching any Weasleys to catch him.

“Ah,” said Daphne wisely. She took his arm. He gave it to her, distractedly, in the same way he probably would have handed over his wallet and wand, if she’d tried to take them. “Well, don’t worry. She’s not in love with him, I don’t think. I gave her a thorough interrogation.”

“What?”

He hadn’t even considered the possibility. The shriveled little chamber of her heart reserved for things like romance and kissing was filled with petitions and Arithmancy textbooks and the smell of fresh ink. He knew, because — because he knew these things. And Viktor Krum didn’t. So she wasn’t.

“I said, she’s not in love with him,” said Daphne patiently, steering him along, though where he didn’t know. He was twisting his neck to keep an eye on Krum’s hand, which was drifting dangerously low on her back, and if it took further liberties it would receive a curse currently being deliberated on. Perhaps something to do with fingernails. “I don’t know about him, though. I don’t think she knows. For his part, he seems to be a gentleman.”

“He seems to be nine-tenths giant and one-tenth bear. If he’s a gentleman, you’d need a telescope to find out.”

“Mm. They do make a handsome couple, don’t they,” sighed Daphne, who was now being mean on purpose, he thought. “The gold and the red? Gryffindor colors? And it’s such a lovely story, all the newspapers will swoon for her. La belle et la bete. The little swot and the international celebrity.”

“What are you, their publicist? Shut your mouth before you drip ignorance on the flagstones.”

“And you shut yours before you drool jealousy on my dress. I didn’t agree to come tonight with a sourpuss. Pick that jaw up and smile at someone before I hex one onto your face.”

He twisted his cheeks into a stiff smile and aimed it at a random Slytherin second year, who quaked and turned around. “Don’t make me laugh, ‘jealousy.’ I’m concerned for her. If it’s jealousy not to want a seventeen year old putting his paws all over your friend, then I suppose I’m guilty.”

Krum’s hand was toying with one of the lace petals on her skirt. Fingernails and toenails, he decided. And possibly a blood curse, as a reminder. Or he could hex the hand off altogether. He had no right to do that. He didn’t care.

What was wrong with him?

“I’m sure I wouldn’t know,” she said faintly. “But do me a favor? If you see Theo, tell me, and whatever I do, don’t comment on it, please. I’m going to say hello to Pansy.”

“What?”

But she had slipped off his arm and into the crowd. This left him standing alone, and he didn’t know whether to be glad or dismayed, for Hermione turned and saw him, and her glow redoubled. She slipped away from Krum and Karkaroff and bobbed through the crowd, wading like a lantern cut loose on the tide, until she crested again beside him, and he was standing there, and she was in front of him, and for the love of anything he had ever known he could not figure out what to say.

“Hi,” she said.

Something happened in his ribs.

She drew her eyes down his suit, approvingly. “You look very nice.”

“Yes.” As if that was any sort of answer whatsoever.

Her mouth curved. “Of course,” she said. “As I learned from Daphne earlier this evening, ‘humility is so middle-class.’”

“What?”

“Never mind. Are you alright?” She turned over her shoulder. “Is someone there? Oh, did you want to talk to Vikt—”

“No. I don’t want to meet ‘Viktor.’”

“Really? I think you’d have plenty to talk about. He was very interested when I said you played quidditch. And I’m sorry, but if I hear one more person say the words ‘Scottish Pincer,’ I’m going to tear my hair out.” She fidgeted with her fingers. It was so familiar that it rooted him gratefully to earth. It was Hermione. Hermione Granger. Nervous and fretful and tightly-wound, with more fidgets than a Pekingese. The girl on the train.

“Well?” She twisted her hips in a way that made her skirts swirl. It was a very small and girlish gesture that didn’t seem like her at all. “What, nothing? I thought at least you’d say something about the hair. ‘Well done, Granger, but where’d you hide the rest of it?’, that sort of thing.”

Her imitation of him was highly nasal and unsporting; also, very funny.

And now she was looking at him. Merlin.

“You look — you look like—”

“It’s a bit much,” she said quickly. “I didn’t realize. I had to borrow it from Daphne. She said it would be perfect, I didn’t know any better.”

“Of course she did.”

“Oh, dear. What’s wrong? I look silly, don’t I?”

“It’s perfectly appropriate.”

“Ah,” she said, confused. “Alright. So—”

“You look like you’re getting married.”

His mouth was dry. He wet it. Hermione was staring at him with all-consuming attention, which was good, and horror, which wasn’t, and the slack line of her mouth spelled a dismay so profound it erased all traces of levity and sparkle from her face. He kept looking at it.

“What?”

“In the wizarding world,” he said thickly, “gold is — it’s got a particular cultural — that is, as a color, it’s rather significant.”

And if she were getting married, her husband wouldn’t be wearing red. Her husband would be in traditional dress robes, probably with gold accents instead of white, but that wasn’t important; he would be waiting for her at the end of the stairs, and he’d take her arm and — and she’d smile, with her wide shining eyes, when he put a cloak over her shoulders — and the sunlight would be catching the gold in her skirt, because wizarding weddings took place at dawn, the kind of rosy light that always loved her, like fireplaces and lanterns and the candles that guttered on library tables at night.

And she would — theoretically — kiss him. The person she was marrying. There would be that, and he was thinking about it, unwillingly, and unhappily, but there it was. Because he was distracted. Because he wasn’t well.

“You’re lying,” she said, and he tried to remember what they’d been talking about.

“Cheers, you look well,” Ron said gruffly, appearing with a sour-faced Padma on his arm. One sympathized. He didn’t comment on Krum, though Draco didn’t know how he could have missed it. “Nice dress, too. Worried there was a funeral happening, though.”

“She put me in a funeral gown?” said Hermione faintly.

Draco narrowed his eyes. Ron backpedaled like he was going for a medal. “No! It’s not just for funerals! It’s like, for special occasions. A proper show-offy dress.”

“So I am overdressed!”

“Not really,” said Padma. “Cho’s in gold and red, and nobody thinks she’s out of place. Besides, you’re coming with a Champion. S’pose you’d want to look fancy.” It was more than a little jealous.

“I didn’t want to stand out! I asked her to give me a suitable, normal wizarding dress! Oh, I’m going to kill her. I’m sure she thinks this is hilarious.”

“Nah, I don’t reckon she does,” said Ron. “She brought that dress for herself, remember? You ought to trust her a little. She’s a real sport, Daphne, if you give her a chance.”

Hermione still seemed skeptical. Draco was about to lie and say it didn’t make a difference anyway, but Viktor Krum chose that moment to lumber over and loom behind her like a bodyguard.

Draco found it necessary to count back from ten.

“Hermynee,” said Krum, and Padma gave a high, freewheeling giggle that appeared to flow involuntarily from her throat. Draco and Ron cut her twin stares of disgust. “The headmaster calls us to dance.”

“Oh, God. Alright. I thought I’d have more time.” Hermione touched her hair, her sleeves, her waist, a flutter of shivery hands. “I warned you, I’m no good at dancing, so I’m probably going to embarrass you and say ‘I told you so’ afterward.”

“She really will,” said Ron, who was uncharacteristically sullen in the presence of his quidditch idol.

“Is good. I am not good also. Ve vill be not good together,” said Krum, smiling at her a little, and Draco was struck by a searing fork of feeling.

It was like dropping into a dive on the broomstick, the dizzying rush of fear and danger with none of the thrill. Like gravity, he was helpless to it, and like all helplessness, it irritated him. Draco couldn’t stand irrational people. It was a humiliation to be made one of them against his will, and he blamed her.

“If he drops you, I’m going to laugh,” he said coolly to Hermione, and then stepped away. Stares followed him. He didn’t care. If he stood next to her and Viktor Krum for a moment longer he would have said something he regretted even more, or possibly said nothing, and done something worse.

She was his friend. It was natural to want to protect one’s friends. Especially from overdeveloped Bulgarians with a taste for younger women.

He couldn’t find Daphne, but was hailed by Pansy and Theo near the entrance, standing in a circle with Goyle, Crabbe, and Marcus Flint. Crabbe had brought Millie, and Marcus was with a girl whose name might have been Gemma, from one of the up-and-coming pureblood families in Surrey.

“Good show, my boy,” said Theo grandly. They shook hands. “Trotting out the old reliable, I see.”

“Apparently more modern than I realized. Did you come straight from the coronation, or have you scheduled a revel of aged dandies for the afterparty?”

“I’m not sure what Dumbledore’s evening plans entail, but I quite intend to stay out of them. This is my father’s scarf, and it’s young ruffians like yourself who are letting the side down. Granger’s a revelation, by the way, not bad at all.”

“Go to hell.”

“That was genuine,” said Theo mildly. “Merlin. Can’t hardly say anything around here. She looks nice. Everyone’s saying so.”

Terrible news for his headache. He considered going back to bed.

“What do you mean, everyone? Are you taking a poll?”

“Everyone means two people,” said Pansy, rolling her eyes. “And he was one of them. If you ask me it’s a bit gaudy—”

“Hark at her, ‘a bit gaudy,’ she wanted to come as a nun—”

“—but better overdressed than under, and far better than the things I’ve seen on some of these muggle-borns. Thompson looks like she forgot to put a skirt on before leaving, Bell’s bloody crossdressing—”

Pansy had a remarkable knack for finding a sore nerve and whaling on it. He didn’t understand why it was so difficult for her to keep her mouth shut, at least when they were in public, about muggle-borns. It wasn’t as though she could really believe much of it. She’d gone to the same school as him and Hermione.

“Bell’s not a muggle-born. And she wore it correctly, so what do you care?”

“Because it’s not done,” said Pansy plaintively. “You think I wouldn’t like to wear pants to one of these things? I’d shoot someone to get this stupid skirt off, but you can't flaunt the rules. It's rude to the people who do follow them."

"Be nice," said Theo, flicking her ear. "If you wanted to borrow my trousers, you should've just said."

"Sod off."

"Have you seen Daphne?" said Draco, deciding it was time for a change of subject.

Theo closed his mouth and turned his head away. Pansy also turned her head. The group found a panoply of fascinating objects on the floor. It was testimony to the deep space carved by her absence that it was marked in silence by a group ill-disposed to be silent on any subject, at any time, ever.

"So you have, then," he said, thinking of her carrying her own carpetbags up all fourteen flights of stairs, and feeling particularly ungenerous.

"I'm glad you took her," said Theo quietly. "I was worried she wouldn't come."

"Don't thank me as if it's some favor, you embarrassment. Why didn't you take her, that's my question, she'd obviously rather go with you —"

Pansy cringed. Theo gave a short unhumorous bark of a laugh. "Would she?" he said. "If she did, she might have said yes when I asked her, old chap."

"...She rejected you?"

"Mmhm. I believe she'd rather strip naked and ride in with Hagrid. Paraphrasing."

"You're being mean," muttered Pansy.

“Ring the presses. Local man expresses his personality, more at eleven.”

Draco marked the time and location on his watch when he admitted it: he officially understood nothing about the social dynamics of Slytherin House.

A kettledrum boomed, and a harmony of horns shrieked out over the babble of the chamber. From atop the stairwell, Dumbledore spread his arms and spoke in a voice that resounded against the walls:

“Dear friends! Peers! Special persons! Welcome to the Yule Ball! For our opening number, we will have a waltz from the four champions, who I am assured have prepared assiduously to demonstrate for you.” There were titters. Draco caught Harry’s eye, and found with satisfaction that he was already shining with sweat.

“The waltz is known," he concluded slyly, “by its dear composer, a wizard not of magic, but of skill; and a personal favorite of mine, whom you may blame for the choice, if you disdain it: Jonathan Strauss’s ‘The Blue Danube.’”

“A muggle composer?” whispered Pansy. Applause blanketed her next remark, and the doors swung open.

Someone had struck down the Great Hall, and raised in its place an enchanted garden. White trees sleeved in frost and fairy lights and diamond chains drew back their frost-feathered skirts around a wide dance floor. Their arms tangled overhead and formed a silver lattice, like a bridal veil, through which a river of blue and purple stars strained down from the bespelled ceiling. A menagerie of animals wrought in ice and furred in snow migrated, shining clear birds and foxes with coal for noses, deer with long intricate horns sculpted to glittering tips, and dormice with cups of holly for ears. On buffet tables, anchored between levitating trays of hors-d’oeuvre, baked hams glowed like small fat suns among a planetarium of roasted pig, scalloped potatoes, purple gelatins, tall whipped snow drifts of trifle, and circus salads brimming with Christmastime colors. A champagne fountain nine tiers tall poured in the shadow of a chocolate fountain four tiers higher than that, so tall that most of the guests could not crest it on tiptoe.

The champions were dancing now in small circles of varying grace. Fleur and Roger swept fashionably through a rotary waltz, while Harry and Cho executed a mechanical box step. Next came Cassius, looking tastelessly handsome in a classic tailcoat, holding the arm of a sandy-haired girl in a green pinafore, her thin, fox-like features trained into an expression of intensely concentrated gloat.

“Hm,” said Theo. “Well, it’s not a bad match.”

“Not a good one, either,” said Pansy.

“Think he was nervous about losing the spotlight?”

“Or he wanted to keep his options open. At least this way, there’s no rumors of engagement.”

“Not sure this does help the rumors, Pans. Why would he take her if he’s not shagging her?”

“Oh, he wouldn’t, but that doesn’t matter. The gesture proves he’s not obligated, and the rumor makes her seem desirable. Good business.”

“Perhaps,” suggested Theo, “they’ve fallen madly in love.”

She barked a laugh and clipped his arm with her elbow, and he shouldered her back, tussling like a pair of colts.

“Pardon the fool,” said Draco tautly, “but whom are we mocking?”

“Oh. Right. Pans, d’you want to help the neophyte?”

“That’s Flora Carrow,” said Pansy, indicating the blonde with one indolent pinky finger. “If I’m not wrong, that is, I can’t barely tell the twins apart.”

“Mm. Do you think Cassius can?”

“Shut up.” She was smirking. “Pig. Anyway, Draco, they’re not suitable, which is why we’re speculating.”

Draco lifted an eyebrow. “Carrow is on the Sacred Twenty-Eight,” he pointed out. “‘Warrington’ isn’t.”

“Well spotted, but the twins don’t stand to inherit,” said Theo. “Only daughters of a thirdborn son, and the Carrow estate’s entailed, so the heirs couldn’t help even if they wanted to. Plus, their mother’s a loon—”

“Manners, Teddy, quite literally everyone is here.”

“What? She is. Elea Carrow was born a Lovegood, and they’re quacks each to each. How else can you explain marrying a thirdborn with an entail?”

“Somehow, I don’t suspect the Warringtons are cash poor,” said Draco dryly, after a moment. “And if they were, I don’t suppose they’d send their seventeen-year-old heir out with a shopping list and a dance card. But perhaps I’m old-fashioned.”

Pansy rolled her eyes. “Lord help us,” she said, “sometimes I forget you’re rich.”

“We’re all rich, Parkinson.”

“Yes, but some of us have estates that will expire before the heat death of the universe. We have reputations to uphold.” She nodded at the waltzing couple. “But I still wouldn’t marry a Lovegood for all the gold in Gringotts.”

“She seems perfectly lucid to me.”

“Neurosis can skip a generation,” she said. “With my mother, I’m not taking chances.”

After a few turns, the conductor turned, and beckoned other couples onto the floor. Dumbledore came first, escorting Minerva McGonagall in the most unsensual waltz of all time, and then came Cedric Diggory, with — Draco blinked — a mousy-haired boy.

“Who’s that?” hissed Pansy.

“I’ll be damned. That’s Neil Macdonald.”

“Who?”

“Hufflepuff seventh year. I wouldn’t have… well, I will be damned,” said Theo thoughtfully. “I wouldn’t have thought he’d try it on.”

Under the omnipresent grin, Cedric looked faintly nervous. Neil didn’t, however. He held Cedric’s arm like it was a shillelagh and smiled, serenely, like he was more than willing to use it. They settled into a form-perfect rotary position, Cedric leading, and slid gracefully into their waltz.

The sweep of whispers that followed them almost overshadowed Hermione’s second waltz with Viktor Krum. Hermione’s face was drawn with mixed excitement and dread, and she proceeded to give a presentable, if inelegant, demonstration of a waltz. It turned out that she was the stronger dancer of the pair, for Krum, never much one for land-based activities, was only charitably ‘dancing’ at all.

Draco watched. He couldn’t help it. There was nowhere else to bloody look.

She wasn’t unhappy, he thought, which was a minor miracle, considering the crimes she was abetting to the art form of dance. In fact she was very nearly happy itself, if anxious, which of course she was; she hated being stared at. He knew that. Krum didn’t, naturally.

After the first movement of the song, other couples joined them, and they disappeared among the colorful skirts.

He ought to find Daphne. He made excuses to Theo and Pansy, and pushed through the hex of swirling couples to a table where she sat chatting with Ron and Padma. Also with them were Percy Weasley and Mad-Eye Moody, who was stiff and imposing in a starched auror uniform.

“Did you see Hermione?” whispered Ron, leaning across the table. Padma sent a disgruntled look at him, which he ignored. “With Viktor Krum?”

“Oh, is that what his name is? I thought she’d transfigured a brick wall.”

“What’s she on about?” he hissed. “He’s from Durmstrang! He’s the enemy! She could be giving away our secrets!”

“What secrets? That we haven’t solved the egg yet? That Potter is, in fact, as lamentably ill-prepared as one could possibly suspect?”

“Among other things! And even if she’s not, she might have gone with someone from Hogwarts, instead of fraternizing with the enemy.”

“I simply must disagree. Young Miss Granger has come precisely in the spirit of the event,” sniffed Percy. “The tournament is an opportunity for international cooperation—”

“Ronald,” said Daphne, quite abruptly, “what do you think of Hermione’s dress?”

Draco sent her a dark look. Ron stuttered out, “I didn’t — but that doesn’t — it’s not bad, I guess,” and Daphne puckered her lips as if she were trying to work a length of pipe out of her mouth.

She turned to Draco at once. “Dance with me?”

Glad to get away from the table, he agreed. When they were whirling a clockwise rotary around the outer circle of dancers, she sighed and sagged into the hand on her waist. She was, as he recalled, an able dancer, and they moved in swift eddies around the ring that would have dizzied someone else, like Hermione. She did not lean on his arm as if she required it, or indeed, as if she would move any differently had he disappeared altogether; she was the sort of follower whose great talent was in letting the lead imagine he was making any of the decisions at all.

Hermione had never once let anyone imagine they were making a decision for her, in her life, and had been distraught at the idea that she might have to even pretend. She led from the following position, for Merlin's sake. She'd kept bracing her weight on his shoulder, as if unconsciously, to drive him back where she wanted him. And she probably could have managed it, if she'd had ten more minutes and a partner less stubborn. His lip quirked.

"Draco, does Ron fancy anyone?"

"Merlin's flea-ridden beard. No, and vital fractions of my will to live are predicated on my never finding out, so step carefully."

"He's never said anything about fancying that lovely Lavender, or Parvati? Or Romilda? She's growing up quite pretty."

The gut revolted. He really should have taken an antacid before he came down.

"I don't know what you imagine we talk about, when you're not in the room, but the dubious allure of Romilda Vane is so far down the list as to have not been touched in three years of middling-to-acceptable conversation. And if you lived with Lavender Brown, you would understand from whence comes the strength to resist her charms."

"So your theory," she said skeptically, "is that a fourteen-year-old boy, living in immediate proximity to dozens of girls his own age, has never had a crush?"

“No. I don’t think about it one way or another, and I resent the attempt to break my streak. Why the hell are you interested in Ronald, anyway? I thought you were obsessed with Theodore.”

“Lower your voice! Merlin! Are you talking to someone in the Astronomy Tower? No! I thought not! Good! Shut up! Thank you!”

“Calm down. He hasn’t got bat-ears.”

“You’d be surprised! And I’m not ‘obsessed’ with him. I don’t even like him. I do think he’s fit, but so would anyone.”

“I’d mourn your taste, but considering fate has cruelly pitched Cho Chang into the throes of passion for Potter, it seems you’ve caught what little luck you can.”

She clucked her tongue. “Oh, but Harry’s fit, too. Don’t make that face. He’s not my type, but you’d be barking not to see it. That bit with the dragonfight was terribly daring.”

“I am asserting my inviolate right not to hear you lust after my idiot friend.”

“You can’t be jealous of everyone,” she said mildly, rounding off a promenade. “I’ll agree not to remark on your thing about Hermione —”

“I thought we’d ascertained the Astronomy Tower has no part in this conversation.” He spun her. “And I don’t have a thing about Granger. It’s Krum I don’t like.”

She huffed. “You and Theo are sopophorous beans in a pod, you know that. If I locked you both in a room with Anti-Irony Charms, I think you’d both leap out the window before you said a word to each other.”

“You made that up.”

“Anti-Irony Charms? Why, have I frightened you?”

“I’ll trip you.”

“Do it, I’ll scream.”

The waltz ended with a round of clapping, and the orchestra struck out a hearty mazurka. Dinner had begun, and enchanted automatons dressed as nutcrackers danced plates to each table. The champions ate at a table with the headmasters, Fleur’s long golden arms striking the air in emphasis, Hermione’s head bent intently towards Krum — and at their table, Ron, George, and Angelina were having an argument about the Weird Sisters, while Padma sulked and eventually drifted off with a boy from Beauxbatons. The dinner was sumptuous and accompanied by small fizzing cocktails that foamed different colors each time someone sipped, and afterwards a host of ice ballerinas in white tutus carried trays of spiced Turkish coffee and brandy with chocolates and cheeses for dessert. The orchestra jazzed it up and the mannered whirls of strictly ballroom ceded to the clumsy undulations of modern dancing, ‘Hungry Like the Hippogriff,’ ‘Compliments on Your Curse,’ interpolated with covers of muggle music.

Three girls came by to ask Draco to dance, which did nothing for Ron’s mood.

“He doesn’t want to dance with you,” he said bluntly to the last one, a short brunette from Hufflepuff, who purpled in mortification and practically Apparated out of sight. Draco didn’t disagree, but kissed his teeth in silent disapproval, to which he snapped: “What? You don’t,” and stole a gulp of one of the twins’ punch, which made him erupt in coughing.

“God,” he gasped. “That’s neat petrol, that is.”

Draco frowned and took it. One whiff had him steering it as far from his nose as possible.

“Spiked.”

“Course it is, it’s the twins. But where the hell do they get the alcohol?”

“Outside the castle, I expect,” he said distractedly, for Hermione had broken out of a knot of dancers and was coming over.

Roses had bloomed in her cheeks, and hair had started its inevitable ascent out of its gelled coiffure, forming a feathery corona around her face, but for all that she merely looked flushed and hearty. It was so rare to see her disarrayed or out of breath that he felt taken aback all over again, which was frankly getting annoying, at this point.

“Hello! It’s hot, isn’t it?” She was fanning herself. “You’d think the ice would do something, wouldn’t you? Viktor’s gone to get some drinks.”

“Viktor,” muttered Ron. “It’s Viktor, is it?”

She toppled into Padma’s empty seat. “I think it’s going well,” she said, “as far as I can tell. Harry and Cho wanted to keep going, but I had to beg off. Daphne, these shoes are obscene.”

“Oh, aren’t they just? You should show off your calves more often,” said Daphne serenely, proving that she held nothing but hatred for Draco in her heart.

“I meant obscenely uncomfortable,” Hermione amended, hiking up her skirt to rub at a small red mark on her ankle. “Waltzing’s already a nightmare in flats. Who decided witches ought to do it backward? And in heels?”

“It’s not backward, from the follower’s perspective,” he said, faintly amused.

“It is from mine. All the books teach you the steps from the lead’s position, and then they just say, ‘for the follower, do this, but backward,’ like that’s any help at all. Oh, just do it backward! Wonderful! I’ll be a ballerina by morning. Good Lord.”

“You read books on it?” Daphne sounded utterly charmed.

“Well, I wasn’t going to go in fresh on one lesson. Especially one lesson with him.”

His lip was twitching. “What’s that supposed to mean?”

“That you’re hardly a consummate teacher.”

“Excuse me, I’m a wonderful teacher. Ask Longbottom.”

She laughed. “He says you yelled at him for three years.”

“Correct. And then what happened?”

“Nothing like what will happen if you yell at me, I assure you.”

He did smile, then, and was more or less resigned to it. He pointed it at the far wall, for deniability’s sake.

“Did you see Neil, by the way?” she said into his ear. He leaned in to hear her over the music, and accidentally smelled whatever it was Daphne had put in her hair: something starchy and perfumed that overwhelmed the usual smell. He wrinkled his nose. “With Cedric? I got to talk to them a little, at the table. Dumbledore thought it was wonderful. You should’ve seen Fleur’s face, though, I think she a bit fancied him.”

“It’s a bold move, on Diggory’s part. He’s made himself rather vulnerable.”

“You think so? I thought the opposite,” she said reflectively, reaching behind him for a water glass. “I saw it as a great show of strength.”

Another lungful of scent. He turned his head toward her and was nearly elbowed in the face. The makeover had failed to imbue her with any grace, agility, or regard for his personal space, and it was deeply reassuring. No fairy-girl, this; just a bossy swot who didn’t respect him half as much as she might have, if Merlin had garnished her massive brains with a drop of common sense.

She pressed the glass to her cheek, and condensation melted against her skin. He pivoted to face the dance floor.

By ten o'clock the Yule Ball had committed that triumphant metamorphosis from a dance into a party. The Weird Sisters thrashed away on guitars while their singer wailed into the microphone as if she intended to swallow it; the dance floor's subtle ecosystem had sprouted microbiomes, circles of girls with bare legs rolling their hips, shuffling couples penguin-walking in their private corners, wide dance circles where those with talent or courage broke into frenzies of pantomime for the amusement of their cheering friends — in which no one was partaking with more enthusiasm than Fred and George Weasley, who were throwing it back in the center of the dance floor as if they had but one night left to live.

A group of muggle-born seventh years were attempting to teach Dumbledore something called the Macarena, a task he undertook with bewildered delight. Cho had enticed Harry to Charleston, and he was making her laugh by doing it wrongly on purpose. Ginny and Neville were doing something that would have been humiliating if either of them gave the slightest evidence of taking it seriously. Theo, Pansy, and the Slytherins presented a row of uniformly mannered disdain at their own table, although Crabbe's foot was tapping.

Hermione peered around. "Ron, where's Padma?"

"Oh, remembered me, have you?"

"What?"

"Nothing. Nice of you to drop by."

"But — what do you mean?"

“Nothing. Forget it. Ronald’s been into the punch—”

“Excuse me,” said Ron, outraged, but he was interrupted by Harry, who broke out from the crowd and shouted something to Hermione about the song playing — she laughed, and took his hand — and he swapped her for Cho, who fell into her chair with a giggle and shooed them away.

“Did you see what happened with Lavender?” she said hoarsely. “I’ve never seen Seamus so red in my life. Wow! That’s a brave lass.”

“What did she do?” Ron wanted to know, but they were interrupted by a shadow roughly the size of a building.

“Vhere is Hermynee?” said a voice. Krum materialized from the crowd, dual-wielding cocktails.

“Lost her, have you?” said Ron, addressing him somewhere around his boots.

“Yes. If you see her, tell her I haff drinks.”

“Tell her yourself,” said Draco shortly. “She went to the powder room. First left out the door, all the way down the hall.”

Krum dipped his head and departed.

“I didn’t know there was a girls’ room on the first floor,” said Cho thoughtfully.

“There isn’t,” said Ron, sounding conflicted.

Draco shrugged, draped an arm over the back of his chair, and sipped his coffee.

Harry and Hermione were not so much dancing as jumping rhythmically up and down to a muggle song whose contents were mostly incoherent to him, peppered with refrains about starting a fire.

She was laughing. Harry was disheveled. Angelina and Fred were shaking their arms like they were in some sort of religious ecstasy.

“Excuse me. It’s impolite to hoard all the pretty girls at one table.”

Theo appeared from the swirl of dark coats. Daphne set down her goblet and splattered punch over the tablecloth.

“It’s impolite not to dance with your own date,” she said. She sounded indifferent, but her knee was bouncing.

“I quite agree. Tell Pansy,” he said. “But do it after you’ve danced with me. You might as well, since I’ve come all the way over here, and if you reject me now, everyone will see it.”

“You’re despicable.”

“A despicable fellow who gets his way.”

“That’s what makes you despicable.”

Nevertheless, she got up slowly, ignoring Draco's stare of judgment, and followed Theo onto the dance floor. The hand she offered to Theo had a braid of scars. He took it and tucked it into his arm.

“You don’t mind, do you, Draco?” he said off-handedly.

“I don’t,” he said, “but I won’t if she hexes you, either.”

“Good man. Have her back in a nonce. Meantime, why don’t you go rescue some pretty thing for yourself? If fifty galleons can buy anything these days, the music’s about to change.”

On his cue, the song ended, and a sad, sweet little waltz drifted out of the orchestra pit.

“Oh, I hate you,” said Daphne, with thrilling warmth. “This is my favorite, you beastly little man.”

“Is it?” said Theo indifferently. “Good Lord, that’s lucky. I just asked for a waltz.”

He drew her into the dissipating pack of dancers. All across the enchanted glade girls were canting up against their partners and leaning teasingly into their arms, and indeed the very crowd itself, from which some boy almost always appeared to catch them. And Draco was alone at a table with Ron Weasley and Cho Chang, both locked in a zealous symposium on the future of the Chudley Cannons.

He made an apology under his breath and stood up. Neither of them noticed him leave.

Beached aside the whirlpool of waltzing couples, caught in a conversational bubble with Harry and Parvati and Angelina, Hermione still glittered through the crowd like a lighthouse. When she felt the tap on her shoulder, she turned, and he thought it might have flickered with pleasure when she saw him; but since dancing had disheveled her, it was hard to tell under the changing lights, which marbled her face as if under the ocean.

“Dance.”

Her eyebrows pinched together. The music might have drowned him out, or she might not have understood, because she shuffled closer.

“WHAT?”

He rolled his eyes and held out his palm.

Her face cleared. “You want to dance?”

“You should have at least one with a decent partner,” he said. He was only half thinking about what he was saying. The whole affair was a mad impulse gone rogue, and he wondered a little when the other half of his brain would come back to check in on it.

“I’m not good,” she said immediately.

“Believe me, I know.”

“I was bluffing about the books. I read them but they didn’t help. I’m still rather bad.”

“Is that a no, then?”

“No — no,” she blurted. She laced her fingers and fidgeted with them. “I’m only telling you so — you know — you don’t expect me to be good at it.”

“Believe it or not, Granger, you don’t need a license to do this. No one will arrest you for fumbling a box step. Now, give me an actual answer, or I’ll go find McGonagall or something.”

“Is that a promise?”

“Keep standing there if you want to find out. At least a gentlewoman of her stature wouldn’t leave a fellow hanging like this. Speaking of which, if you don’t take my hand right now, I swear to Merlin—”

She huffed, as if she weren’t the one stalling. “Fine, then,” she said, “but only for McGonagall’s sake.”

The cheeky twit. As if she were worried he might get ideas.

But she gave him her hand, and her pulse nudged his fingers hello.

Fast, it was — from dancing.

Her hand laid across his like a limp gold leaf. He put his hand on her back and discovered, in a small supernova of synaptic activity, that part of her dress was backless. That was fine. It took some steering to put her into place for a rotary. She was no easier to partner with than she’d been in class. The books really hadn’t helped. God bless them for that, because otherwise he would have had nothing to think about except the bloody dress.

The waltz was slow and sweet like thick wine. He saw Hermione in a glittering streak of gold under his periphery, and saw her, too, when he released her for a spin. In the crowded whirl of couples it was impossible to see or focus on anyone else. And when he did let his eyes slide down, her face was pointed firmly at his collarbone, as fierce and independent as it ever was, but struck now and then by furtive glances of bewilderment and happiness, like the expression of a cat enjoying being petted more than it wanted to admit.

“Viktor Krum?” he muttered, for want of anything better to say.

“Oh, don’t you start.”

“I’m not saying anything.”

“You wanted to. He asked me, for your information.”

“So did Neville Longbottom. Of course, his performance in the World Cup final was just a hair shy of adequate, so I can see where you’d draw the line—”

“Very tasteful, Draco.”

“I’m dead serious. He didn’t even score once. You can never marry him now.”

“Marry him?”

He liked when her voice hit a pitch that threatened glass. It hurt his ears, but he still liked it. “Oh, heavens, no. He’d never suit. What would the papers say?”

“I expect they’d be too interested in your rendezvous with Daphne Greengrass,” she said snidely, and trod on his toes — possibly on purpose, but probably not.

He swore and corrected her footwork with a sharp turn, which she obviously thanked him for not at all.

“You realize, of course, that she only asked me because she didn’t know anyone else who wasn’t in Slytherin.”

“Anyone else ‘suitable,’ that is,” she muttered.

“If you’re sore she didn’t ask you, I’m sure it’s a failure of creativity, not of malice.”

Hermione was trying not to smile. But the smiling distracted her from her feet and she stumbled against him. He caught her against his chest and for a moment had her whole body curled inside his hand and his arm, her head spilling against his shoulder, while she righted herself. She gave an inelegant snort of derision and he could count little beads of sweat on her forehead, count them on her bare golden arms, on her shining chest, on the spirals of free hair swelling at her temples, shining on the valleys of her knuckles and the light brown plains of her hands, all over her, like a caravanserai of fairies come to take him in a bizarre and fearsome thrall.

He had a vague premonition that something stupid was about to happen, and he was going to be at fault. He was as helpless to stop it as she was.

“You should thank her.” His voice, to his own ears, sounded curt.

“Thank her? For what?”

“How you look. People have been looking at you all night.”

“Have they?” she said skeptically. “At me? I think they were looking at Viktor. Or Harry.”

“They weren’t,” he said.

“But how—”

“They weren’t.”

She blinked three times in quick succession and gave a bark of surprised, awkward laughter, as if trying to turn what she'd said into a joke. He said nothing more, and the waltz came to an end, which was a mercy. When the waltz changed tempo there was a clearing of a throat, and Krum stepped out of the crowd behind her, like the Masque of the Red Death, stony, drinkless, and unimpressed.

"Why, hello," said Draco pleasantly. "How was the powder room?"

"It vas quite charming," said Krum, equally civil. "I must thank you for showing me more of your castle's great beauty."

"I can give you a heading, if you'd like to see some more."

Krum ignored him. "I haf been looking for you," he said to Hermione. "They vant the champions to take pictures with their partners."

"Oh, God," she said in alarm. "Now? My hair isn't — yes, well. I suppose we'd better go, shouldn't we?"

She turned to Draco, of all things, as if he might have some sort of objection. Silly. Stupid idea. He let go of her and stepped away with his hands behind his back.

"Go on," he said coolly. "I've had my turn."

She rolled her eyes and began to say something, but the revival of the music drowned her out, and with a posture of gentle insistence Krum drew her hand over his arm and led her away.

The high point of the party had crested and smashed the undulating wave of dancers into pools that eddied around tables and in corners, nursing old drinks and laughing too loudly, too often, to suggest anything witty had been said at all. Lavender had welded herself to Seamus and was dancing, not so much 'with' but 'on' him; Ginny had fallen asleep on George's shoulder, and Fred and Angelina had slipped out of the Great Hall without company or goodbyes. Whenever there was a new song the groups dissolved and reformed as dancers traded places. The main set was over and now all the songs were slow, as if coaxing the night to sleep.

Pansy popped out of one of these dissolving crowds and seized his elbow. “Have you seen Theo?” she demanded. “Or Daphne?”

“And a splendid evening to you, too, Parkinson,” he said. “No, I haven’t. He made off with my date, and I haven’t seen him since.”

“Oh, good, you’re useless,” she snapped. “Where have you been? I leave him alone for five minutes, and he totters off to find her, like a toddler who can’t help it— and why did you let her dance with him?”

“Shouldn’t I have?”

She threw up her hands. “Useless!” she cried. “Use! Less! I should have known. She’s been avoiding him for weeks, and there you go, throwing all that good work away!”

“I ask again — drawing on reserves of patience that are, I warn you, very nearly exhausted — why? It’s not my fault no one tells me bloody anything.”

“I didn’t think I needed to!” she said shrilly. “Because it’s obvious to anyone with half a brain! A quarter, even! Don’t they let you keep a quarter-brain, up there? For posterity?”

“Did I say ‘very nearly’? I meant entirely.”

“Because she’s supposed to be getting over him!”

The supreme underwhelming-ness of this revelation rendered him rather apathetic to Pansy’s woes.

“So?”

“So? So, it doesn’t help her when Teddy — who knows fully well what she’s doing, by the way, and don’t think for a moment he doesn't — flounces around serenading her and dancing with her and being nice to her—"

"Yes, God forbid anyone be nice to her."

"If that's your idea of a barb, scrape it up and go flop it at someone else. I can't help what Millicent Bulstrode does, and if I could, I wouldn't have turned my room into a bloody rookery trying," she said, ferociously, all at once. "I've come around to the idea that isolation really is best for her, even if it's hateful, because it means none of the other girls can do anything, which has been my personal nightmare. A small price to pay, you'd think, when she knows we still love her, and I'll say it, even if he won't: so what if she can't come to our sodding tea parties? I told him, 'Let her vacation with the Gryffindors, it won't kill her.' But no, he's got to be Sir Luckless about it, trying to mate water with oil. If he could pull his head out of his own arse I do think he'd see that and stop bothering her."

She hoisted up her dress strap with the grim determination of one snapping down a helm. "Listen, if you see her, don't let him talk to her. Just — jinx her, or snog her, or something. Anything. And if you see him, send him straight to me. I'll set him to rights," she said, with a gentling, softer confidence. "I always can."

"Managing this farce can't possibly fall to me," he said incredulously. But her glare informed him that he was wrong, and she burrowed into the crowd, calling Theo's name.

He looked around, without much enthusiasm, for Daphne. Currents of older students in slackened ties and short dresses made a glittering railroad up to the countless echelons of afterparties. In the Entrance Hall a seventh year boy was talking with desperate speed to a weeping girl on the steps, though the color of the lipstick on his collar didn't match the one on her mouth. A draft of fresh delicious air wafted from the open doors, and he steered toward it at random, trying to escape the stuffy hysterics of the party, and leave behind all the stickiness that came with it.

On the front steps, he passed a huddled Dean Thomas, who had curled his knees under his chin.

“Night, Thomas.”

Thomas scrubbed a hand across his face. “Night, Malfoy,” he said gruffly, and Draco decided to leave him be.

The flowered labyrinth of the rose garden glowed ice-blue. Fairy lights hovered like rivers of stars over each courtyard and kissed each babbling fountain in white. He found a stone bench and a large fountain with an immodest cherub sprawled atop, far enough from the party that the voices had dimmed. No sooner had he bent to sit down than the bushes rustled, and he held up his wand, not from fear, but from wariness of being disturbed.

As a figure emerged from the bushes he put down his wand and suppressed a sigh. It was Daphne, her pale shoulders ice-blue in the fairy light.

When she saw him she took a wet gulp of air and smiled, a little miserable, but mostly relieved. He sympathized. He began to ask her if she’d just spoken to Theo, and if so, what she’d said; but then he considered that he more or less knew the answer to both questions, and decided not to indulge in needless cruelty.

“Oh, good. It’s you.” She swiped a glittering figment from her left eye. “If it was anyone else I would’ve had to drown myself.”

“I’ve had enough theatrics for one night, thank you.”

“Me, too. Care to join me in some meditative compartmentalization? I’m rather good at it, but don’t be intimidated.”

She draped herself across the bench. He joined her.

The water burbled lustily from the cherub’s lions. Midnight announced itself with a sad peal of the hour bell. After twelve tolls the silence settled in, and the wind skated off the frosted plain of the lawns.

“Do you want to kiss me?” she said abruptly, turning.

He blinked, absolutely thoughtless.

“I beg your pardon.”

“Do you want to kiss me,” she repeated. “Or would you mind, terribly, if I kissed you? Barring objection? I’ve had quite a bad night, and it would all be much more bearable if I could walk away saying I’d at least been kissed.”

He fumbled for an answer.

He didn’t want to, in truth. It wasn’t that he found her unattractive. She was obviously extremely pretty. But it simply wasn’t something he had ever thought about, and it still didn’t exactly excite him, now.

But then again: he was fourteen years old, and he’d never kissed a girl before. It might be an ideal environment to try it out and get it over with.

And it was Daphne, anyhow. She’d know it didn’t mean anything, and she’d have a sense of composure about it.

“Fine,” he said. “But be quick.”

“Just what a girl wants to hear,” she sighed, and scooting across the bench — he stiffened — she pecked him on the lips.

It was a very strange first kiss. He was so stiff that he didn’t feel much happening on his mouth, except a firm and deliberate pressure from her own. He still took a careful catalog of sensations, for thoroughness: the heat from her face, the jitter of anxiety, and the inevitable weirdness of feeling a part of his body that had never made contact with its like before. That made him prickle, but there was nothing more than that, nothing supernatural, or even moving.

He wondered what it was about this that made everyone stupid. The reports of lunacy had been greatly exaggerated.

Her nose bumped his, and he made an irritated sound, and then she drew back, snickering. She dabbed a parting kiss on his cheek. He made another skeptical noise and shifted away.

“Thank you,” she said politely.

“You’re welcome.”

They sat in meditative silence.

She sniffled.

Draco had never cared much for meditative silences. They bored him.

He leaned forward on his knees. “So. What’s the matter with you and Nott?”

“Good Lord. How to start?”

“Briefly,” he suggested, eyeing her.

She giggled.

“Nothing,” she said. “Everything. The same.”

“...A little less briefly.”

“I’m in love. And he isn’t.”

“Oh.”

He turned back to the fountain, wondering if she would be content to leave it there.

“But you want to know why we’re fighting, I take it.”

“Conceivably.”

“Well, I’m furious with him, you see.”

“Sure.”

“Because he proposed.”

He hadn’t known it was possible to choke on air before.

“To you?”

“No, Professor Snape. The nuptials are in June. Yes, to me, you numpty.”

“Why?”

She rubbed small neat circles into the inner beads of her eyes. “I haven’t a clue, darling, except that he gets desperate when he can’t solve a problem, and when he’s desperate, he’s stupid. The way he explained it, however—”

“You’re fourteen!”

“Fifteen, actually, but the point is taken. The way he explained it—”

“Haven’t your parents anything to say about this?”

“Oh, they’d be thrilled if anyone would have me,” she said neutrally. “Better still, one of the Twenty-Eight. Best of all, a Twenty-Eight heir. And fifteen isn’t that young. We’d do it like Vince and Millie, have a three-year engagement, marry after graduation. It’s a very good match. And it would get me away from my parents. If we were engaged, he’d have some liberty to move me around. Take me on holidays, chaperoned visits, that sort of thing.”

With a considerable degree of mental effort, he pocketed the hard cringe of wrongness that reared at someone of his cohort contemplating matrimony, and he considered it neutrally.

“If it was such a good match,” he began slowly, “then why not—”

“Take it?”

“...Well.”

“Apart from the fact that he doesn’t love me?” she inquired matter-of-factly, without resentment or sorrow.

“If there are other reasons.”

“Because it doesn’t solve the problem. Even if he did love me, he couldn’t make everyone else do it, just by wanting. The way these things work, it wouldn’t... it’s harder to move up than down. We’d end up closer to where I am than where he is, socially. Which is something I know and he doesn’t, because he’s never been down before, so I had to be the sensible one.” She sat up straighter. “I don’t know if I can have children, anyway. Medically, I mean. The soul is willing and all, but there are two different blood conditions clobbering each other to death in my circulatory system, which means I’m in incredible pain three weeks of the month and given to smashing furniture in the fourth, and it doesn’t seem like it would leave one’s womb a welcoming environs for wee tots. Not that it would be a deal-breaker, but it does create logistical problems, and his father wouldn’t approve.”

That was its own rancid, molding vessel of worms. “Good Lord. You’re not honestly thinking—”

“Yes, because those are the sorts of things you have to think about, when someone proposes,” she said firmly. “As I have recently discovered. And I decided I wasn’t going to submit us both to all that just because it would make my life easier right now.”

“Is it bad?”

“Oh, who’s to say? Spells and stones will break my bones, but names will never hurt me. My pants keep going missing in the wash, but if that's human malice or house-elf incompetence, I never do know how to tell—"

"Your condition, Greengrass."

"It is what it is," she said, with schooled neutrality. "There's pain, of course, but when isn't there? I can move around now, which is the important thing."

"What about full moons."

"I'm human. I told you, I've always been human. The worst I've ever done is throw a tantrum, which is scary, but I'd challenge you to do anything else when your bones start chiseling themselves away."

"So there are changes, then."

"Some," she admitted. "It hurts, mostly. But I don't transform. It's not… enough, for that. The healers said it was something to do with cell counts." She paused. "Some said it was possible it'll get worse."

"But that's not a certainty."

"'Not a certainty.' You sound like Theo, he didn't want to think about it, either. By the way, is it all right if I tell Theo I kissed you? I want to see him do the thing with his eyebrows."

"...Parkinson said you weren't to talk to him."

"Oh, well, if you're going to let her boss you around."

"Bite your tongue. Tell him, don't tell him, what do I care? I'm not your keeper."

"Indeed not," she agreed. "On the subject, do you mind if I tell him I let you get a leg over? Just to make him mad. And only if he does something to deserve it."

He closed his eyes, marinating in discomfort.

“You have the impulse control of a ravenous wolverine.”

“Old news. Can I?”

“Aren’t you supposed to be getting over him?”

“Aren’t you supposed to take my side? Besides. I’ll say you were really good.”

“Please don’t.”

“I’ll say you rocked my world.”

“You have taken ‘don’t’ in the wrong direction.”

She laughed. A more tired laugh he had never known from anyone so young.

“Do you want to know the saddest thing?” she said. “Sometimes I think you’re the only real friend I’ve got.”

He snorted, thinking this was an attempt at humor. But she had stopped laughing.

“I thought we held a moratorium on theatrics,” he said.

“No, really. Pinky swear.” She kicked off her heels and lifted her feet onto the bench, perching her chin on her knees. “Theo and Pansy might as well have shared a womb, and no matter how much I love him, even if he ever loves me back, it’ll always be Pansy, Pansy, Pansy — and it’s the same for her. They grew up together, did you know that? Running wild in the forests of Knotscliff, two terrible angry little children. You can’t get in late on love like that. It’s the kind that you only find when you’re young and lonely, when you’ll let someone carve himself into you just so you’ll remember him. Me, I grew up with Tori, and I’d live for her, but she worships me. She can’t be that way with anyone yet, she’s too young, it isn’t fair.

“But everyone else I’ve ever known, I’ve been too late or too little to get in — even you, too, you useless wonderful boy, I like you so much, but I already know if I get to liking you any better you’ll break my heart, too, won’t you?”

He had no idea how to respond to that, and chose silence.

“Yes, you will,” she said, eerily serene. “I think you’d try, just to be nice. And we’d both get smashed up, because nice just won’t do, for something like what I want. I’ve already taken more than I should; see, I made you come as my date, when I knew full well I shouldn’t have. I knew what I was doing, but I didn’t care. That’s my problem. I’ve never cared for rules, when it came to getting what I wanted.”

“Don’t be daft,” he said curtly. “You didn’t force me to come. I could have said no.”

“Could’ve isn’t would’ve,” she said. “And what did I get from coming? A few hours of make-believe? Not even. Neither of us think you’re here for me, and I knew that from the beginning. I saw her face, you know, when I asked you — I hope I never forget it, maybe I’ll finally learn — but I remember thinking, ‘Daphne Greengrass, you perfect bitch, you would’ve mauled a girl for doing this to you, and you well know it.’ And so I went back and tried to make up for it, but it didn’t work, and I still felt horrid afterwards. Isn’t that awful?” She sounded wondrous. “I came over and stomped on something pretty because I wanted one for me, and then I wasn’t even happy about it.”

A spider of nausea skittered up his stomach. “You’re not… Greengrass, if you’re trying to suggest… to attempt some sort of confession— I’m flattered, but—”

“Confession!” She tipped her head back and spilled laughter into the canopy of false stars. “Confess? No, I’m still very much heartsick for a boy who thinks marriage is the answer to a bullying problem, I’m afraid. You’re just an entertaining hypothetical.”

“Thanks,” he said tartly, one part insulted to all other parts profoundly relieved. “Glad to be of service.”

“Oh, you’re grateful, admit it. I’ve saved us both a lot of pain and suffering by not being in love with you, you know. I thought it out beforehand. I was practical! It would be fun, for a while, and I really would give you a good time — but I want someone to live and die for me, you see, and you’re far too busy living for someone else.”

“What?” He jerked his head at her. “Who?”

She smiled. “Drat. I owe Pansy five galleons. Don’t tell her we had this conversation, would you? I’m cash-poor; Daddy’s taking the Bulstrode settlement out of my allowance.”

“I don’t know what you mean, and my hypotheses about it range from indecent to offensive. And I don’t live for anyone, you daft tart,” he said. “I live for the sole purpose of pleasing Draco Lucius Malfoy. I fulfill it, daily, with vigor.”

“Do you really?” Her voice was rich with amused toleration of a lie. “Well, then, I’m very sorry. I was going to congratulate you for finding someone who’s quite obviously living for you, too, it’s a rare coincidence and most of us would kill for it; but if you haven’t, then I stand corrected, and I hope the food is good in Bulgaria.”

She stood up before he could parse this snippet of nonsense. “It’s late,” she said, “and it’s bloody gelid, and I’m wearing a backless dress. We should go in.”

It was the first sensible thing he had heard all night.

But the evening’s last piece of chicanery was still unspooling. At the foot of the grand staircase stood Hermione and Ron, having an exchange that could be easily heard before it was ever seen, from well through the oak doors and outside the building.

“—don’t like it, you know what the solution is, don’t you?”

The heat in her voice could have scorched the skin off someone's face. She was so angry it had closed up her throat, and left her choking, almost weeping from it.

Draco broke into a run, and shoved through the ring of stupid gossips goggling at them. He nearly mowed down Harry, who was struggling to mediate between them.

"—BEFORE someone else does—"

"But that's not the point! That's not the bloody point!"

Draco pulled his wand, which on reflection might have been an escalation, but it wasn't necessary: the fight slammed to a halt when Ron caught sight of him over Hermione's shoulder. His expression crumpled, mixed frustration and relief, and Hermione saw.

She whirled around. Her face was wet. Not just nearly weeping, then.

"Granger," he said, helplessly. He didn't know what to do when she cried. Hermione cried so rarely, and hated it so deeply when she did, that it occupied the same place in his brain as most forms of natural disaster. One simply weathered it, recovered, and moved on.

"There you are," she snapped, and then her eyes slipped briefly over his shoulder — to Daphne, who had come in from the gardens just after him, shivering from the cold air coasting over her shoulders.

"What's going on?" Daphne said warily, when she realized that several people were staring at her.

"Nothing," snarled Ron. "Where've you two been?"

"We were… out in the…" She blinked. "Hermione, are you quite alright?"

"Fine," spat Hermione, and violently scrubbed her hand across her cheek. She turned on her heel and started up the staircase, but wobbled; Draco caught her elbow, and she tore it free with a vehemence that shocked him. “I’m just fine. It doesn’t matter. Go back to — whatever you were doing — I need to get up these godawful stairs—”

“Darling, your shoes, they won’t — let me help you—”

“That won’t be necessary, thank you!”

“Hermione,” said Ron, with traces of regret, but she cut her hand at him as if to slash his throat.

“Oh, shut up!” she snarled. “Go find Viktor, if you want someone to yell at! I’m sick of it!”

He recoiled.

“Fine! Maybe I will! Maybe I’m sick of it, too!”

“Good! Then go!”

“Great!”

“Fantastic!” She leaned forward to shout at him, wobbled, and Draco caught her again. Her skin was hot from dancing and shouting, and almost all of her hair had sprung back to its usual self.

“Potter,” snapped Draco, and jerked his head at Ron. Harry hurried forward and grasped Ron’s arm, muttering something under his breath while he steered him away; but Ron wrested himself free, and stormed down the hallway, away from the party.

“Ron! Wait!”

Harry gave chase down a random hallway into the dungeons. Once the two were gone, some of the fire went out of Hermione, and she stumbled again on her heels.

“They’ve got to come off,” said Daphne hurriedly, tripping up the stairs. “You’ll hurt your ankles. Here, sit down.”

“I said I was fine.”

“Let her help, Granger.”

Hermione shot him a nasty look, but she sat down hard on the staircase and drew up her skirt to let Daphne wrangle the buckles on her heels. In a moment, her shoes went clattering over Daphne’s shoulder, and she stood barefoot on the marble stairs.

“There you are,” said Daphne hopefully. “Now, we’ll get you up—”

“I don’t need your help,” she snapped, which would have been more convincing had she not listed immediately onto one foot, and hissed, whisking up her ankle. This time, when he caught her elbow, he refused to give it back, and braced her up by force.

“You’re not climbing fourteen flights of stairs like this,” he said flatly, something he took for a statement of fact, but turned out to be unexpectedly provocative.

“If I don’t want to sleep on a bench, I’m going to have to, since unlike any civilized muggle building, this monstrosity of a castle doesn’t have a lift.”

“Or we could carry you,” said Daphne, who seemed to think she was being helpful. “Between the two of us. In fact, I’m sure Draco could carry you himself—”

“He will not,” she said, with an insulting degree of horror.

“...or he won’t, of course. But there are other ways! If you give me your arm, you can use us like crutches. Trust me,” she added brightly, “it’s easier than it looks.”

Hermione’s expression became cryptically pained. “You don’t have to,” she said, but the amount of weight she was leaning on Draco’s arm belied it. “You should go back to the party. It’s silly. I’ll be fine.”

“Personally, I can’t think of anything I’d like less than to go back to the party,” he said. “But Greengrass can decide for herself.”

“No,” she agreed. “I’ve had quite enough party for one night.”

Probably unconsciously, Hermione’s hand had wrapped around his wrist. He put his hand over it and used it to pull her up. It was all quite clumsy and ill-coordinated, but at least she wasn’t about to topple over and crack her head open, which she might have done just to spite him, now he thought about it.

At last, when Daphne offered her arm, she took it, and gingerly hopped up one of the stairs. “I don’t know how you manage in heels,” she muttered mutinously. “They’re torture devices.”

“They’re fashionable.”

“They’re ridiculous.”

“They’re sexy.”

“They cause back problems.”

“So do the men who like them,” said Daphne, and Hermione made the same discovery he had earlier, about choking on nothing.

He glared at her. Daphne simpered.

“Be that — as it may,” said Hermione in a strangled voice, and Daphne’s laughter skittered all over the hall.

The orchestra floated away beneath them as they wound up the many staircases to Gryffindor Tower. He held Hermione’s arm and sometimes her waist and bits of gold film from her dress flaked off on his hands, gilding his palms, his fingers. The snippets of shouting and laughter dwindled beneath them like the last swirling dregs from a wine glass, and in the higher atriums of the castle, a sudden emptiness descended from the long hallways and unoccupied stairs, while the palimpsest of music and chatter lingered in his ears.

The Pink Lady had fallen asleep, and came awake only on a full-throated exhortation of “fairy lights.” Draco jumped up and helped Hermione into the portrait hole, while Daphne lingered in the hallway.

“If you stay there, I’ll show you back to the dungeons. I’m going to help Granger to bed.”

“That won’t be necessary!” came the shrill rejoinder from the portrait-hole. He shrugged at Daphne.

“Go on,” she whispered. “I’ll wait here. Goodnight, Hermione! Sleep well! You looked gorgeous! And ask Lavender to help you with the straps!” She turned to Draco. “She needs help with the straps,” she informed him.

“Alright,” he said, entirely at a loss as to what he was supposed to do with that information, besides smother any thought of straps, Hermione, or the combination thereof.

Offput, he left the giggling miscreant to her own devices outside the portrait-door.

The common room was empty. Word had it the afterparty would occupy the Astronomy Tower until four o’clock, and the hour-bell was striking one. The fire guttered low in the grate, sending red light swimming across the walls.

At the foot of the girls’ stairs, Hermione hesitated when he offered her his arm, and then pushed it away. “You should go help Daphne,” she said firmly. “She ought to get to bed.”

“In a moment.”

“It’s not polite to leave her waiting,” she pressed.

“She’ll live.”

“So will I. You didn’t have to help me in the first place. This is more than enough—”

“Granger, it’s this or Levicorpus, and I don’t really need the temptation.”

“But she’s waiting—”

He stepped towards her. She yelped and skittered away.

“Don’t you dare!”

“Very good, then.”

He held out his arm and smirked at her. She sighed.

At the top of the stairs, she was deposited safely within limping distance of the fourth year dorm, and he was two steps back down the staircase before he heard her call his name.

“Draco?”

“Mm?”

He turned. A halo from the lantern atop the stairwell glazed each of her loose curls with white, and made her dress scintillate, the way it did when she came down the grand staircase. He lost his train of thought.

“I said thank you,” she said hesitantly. “I mean — I had a good time. Even though the ending was rushed, a bit, it doesn’t — I, er — I didn’t think it would be fun. But it was.”

“Splendid. I’ll tell the organizers.”

“No, I…” She yawned. “Never mind.”

She put her knuckles to her mouth while she yawned again. He followed the movement with his eyes.

“Happy Christmas, Granger.”

“Happy Christmas, Draco,” she said, and ducked out of sight.

Several seconds passed while he stood on the staircase, feeling cold and strange and scatterbrained. It was late, and he was tired, and he had suffered more ordeals in one night than he thought any human being could be asked to tolerate.

On his way down, for some reason, he thought about the kiss. It was his first kiss. He’d done it, and it was over, and it had been nothing to bother with.

But he thought about Hermione — his heart beat faster at the memory of her face gliding out of a muddied watercolor of other couples, sharp as film — and thought of her in moonlight, on a bench in a courtyard. He wondered if it might have been different, in a different garden, on a different sort of night, if they had by some accident found themselves secluded, when he could have crossed that small distance between their faces and done it differently. The idea throbbed inside him like the beat of a tuning fork on his ribs. The reverberation continued, a jarring, constant thrum of an idea that would not leave his mind’s eye, following him down the stairs — the many, many stairs — that separated him from its completion. Distance failed to ease it; no amount of space seemed to shake it free. It lived in his head, a physical thing, and when he folded himself into bed it continued humming in his chest, a gnawing persistence, like he had invented a new species of hunger. He feared that if he let himself think about it, deliberately, he would never stop: there was something terribly real behind that thought, something more than parties and ballgowns and the make-believe courtships of a school formal. If he set it free, then it would bury him under its monstrous weight — that dark and dense and terribly real hunger.

-[clapping idiotically]: prom chapter. prom chapter. prom chapter

-There's a lot of good-faith criticisms you can make about the books. But. We did eat with the prom chapter. We were FED with the prom chapter. There was no plot reason to do that, but it was put in there for us.

-Further notes on the soundtrack. I believe that Lavender introduced Daphne to Shania Twain while they were getting ready and it rocked her world. how could it not. Imagine you're a pureblood teenage girl, the only music you're used to string quartets and Puccini, and then one day someone throws on "I Feel Like A Woman." Instant radicalization.

-Thank you for the warmest reception, and for endlessly encouraging comments! I wish all of you a very fine, sad, slow waltz with a person of your preference at some point in the near future. Or, alternately, spiced Turkish coffee and brandy with chocolates and cheeses for dessert.

-The next chapter is called "The Golden Trio." In which teenage heartache shall never end, Theodore Nott continues to play hopscotch with the moral event horizon, and Ronald Weasley has a Moment.

The Golden Trio

Chapter 44: The Golden Trio

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

On Christmas Day, while the church bells in Hogsmeade crooned, Gryffindor Tower rose blearily to laze about in its jimjams and trade presents over cups of hot cider. Draco woke sooner than most, since Dobby had Apparated directly on top of his legs. This was no more pleasant than it had been when he was six.

The elf had darned a tea cozy apiece for Draco, Hermione, Harry, and Ron, each printed with different flowers; Draco's were jasmines, while Harry and Ron got a sprig of bright red holly, and Hermione's were patterned with marigolds. Harry mistook it for some sort of hat, and put it on his head, which Dobby took as a compliment of such high esteem that he burst into tears, and was still weeping when he left.

"He takes the holidays seriously," remarked Hermione. Her hair had swelled to its normal bush now the Sleekeazy had washed out, but a few bits of gold still twinkled in it.

Draco passed her a package wrapped in gilded green paper. It contained a full set of Everfull Inkwells — expensive ones, but justified as an investment in the vain hope that she would stop stealing his. Signing the card would have felt like an insult to her intelligence, so he hadn't. "Course he did. Potter wore his gift as clothes," he said. "For a house-elf, you can't get much more serious without proposing."

Ron, who had not spoken to Hermione or Draco since the Yule Ball, silently shuffled over and deposited a pair of packages in both their laps. This being the closest they were likely to get to an entreaty of reconciliation, Hermione thanked him stiffly, while Draco cleared his throat and muttered something vaguely grateful.

It was a strange, slightly strained Christmas, but at the very least the bad feelings from last night had abated; the atmosphere was not dislike or bad feeling but embarrassment, as though no one had a great deal of pride for how they comported themselves. Even Draco, who thought honestly that he had done nothing wrong, was not spared from the tension, and found himself wishing that Harry and Ron would go celebrate elsewhere. All the same, when they drifted together into a private corner of the common room, chatting in low voices about something that had Harry glancing more than once over his shoulder at Hermione, Draco felt ill at ease, even though his wish had been fulfilled.

Ron's present for him was a sweater from Mrs. Weasley, along with a package of Ton-Tongue Toffees that had obviously been stolen from Fred and George. Draco almost said something to this effect, but Hermione spoke first.

"Er. Ron, what's this?" She was holding a weatherbeaten English-French dictionary, its spine splintered white from wear.

Ron jumped. "Er. Yeah," he said. "Sorry about the wrapping, I know it isn't pretty."

"Oh, I don't care. But… why…?"

"I thought you might like to know what they're saying," he said stiffly, jerking his chin at Draco. Draco glanced up in disgruntlement. "When the purebloods are talking, you know. Or the kids from Beauxbatons. I just remember it annoyed you, and I know it's pretty tough, feeling left out. So."

"That's very thoughtful," she said. "Thank you, Ron."

She hugged it to her chest. Ron grinned at the floor.

“Yeah, well. It’s a rubbish copy, so don't go spilling anything on it, or anything.”

“I would never,” she said seriously, and there were a few beats of happy silence. Harry actually gave a little sigh of contentment. It seemed that everyone was pleased by this exchange except Draco, feeling even more irritated than before — he was the only tosser in the room who actually spoke the language, it wasn’t like Ron would know a good French dictionary if it tried to mount him in his sleep — and he waited for Ron to turn away before he leaned against the back of Hermione’s armchair.

“If you wanted to learn French, I could’ve taught you.”

He spoke in a low voice; Ron was busy trading Dungbombs with Harry. She looked up in surprise.

“But now you won’t need to,” she said matter-of-factly. “I’d think you’d be glad to save the time.”

“I’ll be the judge of what I have time for. Anyway, reading a dictionary hardly makes you fluent.”

“It’s still a thoughtful gift,” she said.

“Oh, yes. And wildly generous. I don’t know where I’d even go about finding something from the Stone Age, myself.”

She scowled and shooed him away, calling him a spoilsport; but a few minutes later, she was absorbed in trying out her new inkwells, and the dictionary lay under a pile of books from her parents, apparently forgotten. He decided not to bring it up again.

When the common room was a hurricane of boxes and wrapping-paper, they waded out into the cottony snow, swaddled in new sweaters from Mrs. Weasley. Some students from Beauxbatons were building ice sculptures in the shadow of the Forbidden Forest, while the Durmstrang ship glittered with tall bonfires, and there was music from aboard the deck.

At two, Fred and George led a party down to go ice skating on the lake, but they were turned away on the shores by a grim Barty Crouch in a fur hat, informing them the lake had been fenced off for construction related to the Second Task. Instead, they hosted a snowball tournament, in which Harry and Angelina led a siege on the Ron and Ginny's snow fortress that left the whole pack of them soaked and red-nosed and cackling when they filed back into the common room, where Hermione and Draco had been spending their afternoon on a delightful excursion through Middle Eastern pictographic scripts.

At the sight of Angelina, however, Hermione broke away from their enrapturing work — Draco hardly noticed, having spent most of the past hour reading about novel uses of the Banishment Charm — and stood up.

"Oh! Angelina! Glad I caught you! Are you interested in joining a club?"

Angelina shrugged, stretching her muscles with a deep knee-bend. "Sure. I reckon. What about?"

"It's called the Society for the Cultivation and Recreation of Underage Muggle-Born Youth," she said in one breath. "It's for muggle-borns and half-breeds and people of otherwise underprivileged circumstances. I'm starting it with Colin and Dennis. I've invited Nigel Wolport and Justin Finch-Fletchley from Hufflepuff, and Dean, too, even though he's technically half-blood, because he was raised as a muggle which is the main thing—"

Angelina straightened. "Not sure that's not such a good idea, Hermione."

Hermione sputtered out. She looked like a bird that had flown into a window, all disarray and pain. "You don't… want to?"

“It’s not that I don’t want to,” she said, “I mean, mudblood and proud, right?”

At the word mudblood, Hermione flinched. So did Draco, who looked sharply up from his book. Angelina said it like beautiful, with her whole chest.

“But I’m not gonna put my name on a list of ’em, either,” she added.

It took Hermione about two seconds to process this, and then she sat up very straight. “You don’t think someone might...?”

Angelina shrugged. “Maybe. Maybe not. I tell you what I’m not gonna do, is find out, though.”

“So you’re just going to hide, then?” Hermione’s shoulders had assumed defensive formations around her ears. “You’re going to let people assume, what, because you’re scared of someone—?”

“Oi,” said Angelina sharply. “Cool off. Tell you what, I’m scared of nothing and his cousin, bugger-all nobody, and if anyone in this castle wants to test that theory, my door’s open seven days a week. Doesn’t mean they need me making it easier for them, though. You get me?”

Hermione appeared to be thawing to Angelina’s perspective. She gazed doubtfully at her notebook, fretting at her bottom lip. Quiet stretched over the common room. Ron and Harry fidgeted with their presents. Draco waited, intrigued as to what Hermione would say; he had never heard her lose an argument about muggle-borns before.

It was into this mire of pensive silence that Lavender Brown called out: “I’ll join, Hermione.”

Hermione’s eyebrows prepared to clear the ceiling. Draco had noticed Lavender’s exclusion from the list of muggle-borns, and as Hermione pressed her lips together with faint guilt, he realized that might have been deliberate.

“Like, you are so right, Angelina?” Lavender added, pitching up the end of the sentence like the question it wasn’t, “but I don’t, like, see it that way, personally? It’s like, anybody who really super cares enough to go after all muggle-borns ever is probably, like, smart enough to also figure out who’s a muggle-born? And I’m, like, super open about it, so joining a social club is like, not going to make a difference for me? Personally.” She smiled guilelessly, drumming her periwinkle blue nails against her cheek.

“It’s not a social club, actually,” said Hermione, under a taut skein of politeness. “It’s a dedicated political organization for the advancement of underprivileged groups. And it’s important.”

“Oh, if it’s im- por -tant,” said Lavender, rolling her eyes. “Come on. It’s muggle-born club. What are we gonna do, talk about boy bands? I do that already.”

The skein snapped. Hermione’s voice kicked up at least an octave. “Well, it’s been a lot of work, actually! For me! And it’s meant for people interested in solving real problems at this school, because — honestly, Lavender, no offense, but there’s such a thing as priorities.”

Lavender’s smile had the brittle sweetness of toffee. “Wow,” she said. “Cool! Never mind. Have fun running your super-duper serious club with the Dweeby Brothers, I guess. Hard to believe anyone wouldn’t want to be part of that group.”

Having delivered this tinkling cudgel to the face, she swiveled back to Parvati and Romilda. Hermione made a sound like a broken steam engine. Draco swore he actually watched the fingers of her wand-hand flex — he tried to decide how he’d feel if she jinxed Lavender, settling on ‘dismayed, but strongly amused’ — but she held back, possibly because half the common room was watching. Instead, she threw herself into a chair and disappeared into the smoky cowls of a Granger Sulk.

“Bungled that one, I think, Hermione,” murmured Angelina.

“What do you care? You’re not joining anyway,” she snapped. She then shot a wary look at Draco, who cleared his throat and feigned a reverie of fascination with his book.

Two weeks and several centuries of cumulative research later, he and Hermione were still left with nothing but two heads full of empty and an egg full of scream. Each morning he methodically downed the mug of lukewarm tea and stacks of brittle sourdough that Hermione ferried up from the kitchens, and scoured compendiums on spell incantations, looking for anything that required the user to scream. He pored over Moste Potente and Defense Against the Dark Arts textbooks. He even considered writing to his mother. He didn’t think she would know, but any word from her would be more reassuring than the short, terse card she had attached to his present (a pair of fireproof dragonhide gloves, expressly requested) at Christmas. He was beginning to suspect that she was cross with him, but Snape had been impossible to get ahold of, and he was not yet so desperate he was willing to submit a letter to Ministry confiscation via owl post.

Everything was cold and frustrating and strange, right down to the Gryffindor common room. With every passing day, jaws of icicles closed over each windowpane, and anxiety about the Second Task made Harry remote and uncommunicative. Cabin fever worked its claws into his mind. He toyed incessantly with his pocket snitch, and sprang up like a shot every time an owl fluttered at the window. There was no distraction, no game of Exploding Snap or snowball fight or marshmallow-eating contest, too trivial to claim him; Hermione had to haul him down to the common room by his ear to get him to work on the Task at all.

“What the hell am I meant to be doing down there?” he said plaintively, as she fruitlessly tried to teach him the Bubble-Head Charm. His efforts spluttered out with a bubble the size of a fist. “Finding another egg?”

“Unlikely,” drawled Draco, bent over a spreadsheet of translations from Banshee. He had not known before today that it was a comprehensible language, and an hour of study had not rendered him convinced. “Too predictable.”

Hermione nodded. “Besides, even if it is an egg, you’ve still got — wand up, Harry, come on, twirl and flick — you’ve still got to plan around whatever’s down there. It wouldn’t be a challenge if they didn’t implement some defenses for whatever you’ve got to do in the lake. I’d guess it’s some sort of guardian, like the dragon — it’s a classic setup — brave the lake, slay the monster, claim the reward.”

“What reward? Not getting eaten?”

“A very motivating reward, one thinks,” said Draco. “Almost as good as not drowning. You’re leaking.”

Harry’s wand had begun panickedly spluttering bubbles at the idea of his oncoming demise. Hermione sighed and swept them into the fire with Ventus.

“Why don’t you two stop riding him for a minute?” suggested Ron. Draco was startled not so much by the flinty streak in his tone as the fact that he was awake at all: he had spent the better part of the last hour with his head pillowed in his arms. His contributions to their brainstorming consisted of derisive snorts and the errant horsey sigh. “Let him work it out without you needling him.”

Though it was addressed to both of them, it was clearly aimed at Hermione, who had been trying to fix Harry’s wand form. It caught her all the deeper because she had been off her guard. “Work what out, Ron?” she said shortly. “We don’t have any clues. The best we can do is start preparing for what we can predict, and move forward whenever we solve the egg — which, by the way, did you read the book I asked you to?”

It proved that hope sprang eternal, he thought, that Hermione had assigned both Harry and Ron some research on theories of aquatic spellcasting. The last touch either of those books had known was hers.

Ron ignored this. “That’s what I’m saying,” he shot back. “You’ve been on Harry about the Task since Christmas. How’s a bloke s’posed to think with you twittering in his ear about Bubble-Head Charms?”

Draco lifted his head. He slowly set down his quill.

“I do not twitter,” said Hermione hotly. “And if Harry doesn’t start working on the Charm soon, he’s not going to get it in time for the Task, and so excuse me for twittering, Ronald, but I think it’ll be easier for him to bear than drowning.”

“See? See? That’s what I’m talking about. You can’t go five minutes without reminding him he might drown, or get eaten, or get murked by the squid. Gosh, I wonder why he hasn’t got it yet!”

Harry’s lips bunched into a purse the quarter of their usual size. “It’s fine,” he said loudly. “You lot, it’s fine. I’ll be fine.”

“Harry had a month to relax,” said Hermione. The lines under her eyes were ashen and inflamed, from an abundance of reading and none of sleep. It made her face dire and bloodless. “He had a nice long break while Draco and I tried to figure out the Task. Just like we did last time, incidentally!”

“Gee, Hermione, did you and Draco do something for the First Task? You never said!”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

Ron raised his head. “I dunno! Sorry. I dunno. It’s just — you act like you want a medal or something,” he said flatly. “Alright. You figured it out. It worked. So what?”

It was an arrow to the square of Hermione’s back: the suggestion that she had not, in fact, been helpful.

“So what?” she stuttered. “So what — if we hadn’t, it wouldn’t have happened! Harry would’ve been stranded!”

“You don’t know that!” he snapped. “Why d’you assume that Harry and I couldn’t do it without you, huh? Why’s Draco the only one who gets a mite of credit where brains are concerned?”

A flare of panic scuttled across Hermione’s face.

“Because I often happen to use them,” Draco said coolly, and Ron twitched, apparently just remembering that he was still in the room. “If you wanted credit for helping, you might try the same. Or haven’t you noticed that the rest of us have been working for the past hour?” He unfurled his hand at the notes beneath him.

For a moment he expected Ron to throw something at him. But he must have judged his odds wanting, because after a palpable unclenching, he muttered, “Never mind,” and screeched his chair away from the desk. “I’m gonna get some air.”

“That’s a great idea,” said Harry, nearly hysterical with relief. “Really good. Best I’ve heard all day. Air! Let’s get some air! Hermione, Draco, do you want some air? I think I’ll get my cloak.”

Hermione was glaring after Ron’s back in the portrait-hole. What she wanted for was clearly not air so much as the chance to stuff a piece of her mind through his thick skull. But she swallowed whatever she wanted to say next — a clump of words so thick they visibly moved down her throat — and tucked her wand into her hair. “I’ll go get some tea,” she said thinly. She flashed Draco a look of heated exasperation and snatched up her robe on the way out.

Harry exhaled and leaned over on his knees.

“Don’t put your back out keeping the peace, there,” said Draco dryly.

“I dunno what to do with them,” he groaned. “I’d stick my foot in but I think I’d lose it. Why can’t they just get along? It’s not that hard for the rest of us to not rip each other's throats out."

This last was questionable, but he let it go.

He flipped the book closed. "Do you want to know what your problem is?" he inquired, crossing his legs casually.

"If I say 'yes,' will it get me out of this conversation?"

"No. But good thought," said Draco. "Your problem is you let your friends rule you."

"I wouldn't describe what you're doing as 'ruling,'" he said doubtfully. "'Bothering,' maybe—"

"Too late, I'm still talking. Now. You came to this school and welded yourself indivisibly onto the two — and I'll even admit it, three — most headstrong, contrary, pertinacious wankers of the crop. An incredible yield, really. Once-in-a-generation. And all of them would kill for you, but they'd die before they let you win an argument."

He opened his book with a decisive flick, and returned to it.

"I don't want them to kill anybody," said Harry philosophically, from a reflective pose laid upside-down on the sofa. "And I don't need to win arguments. If it's Ron, I'd rather let him win than have him be angry, and if it's Hermione, she's probably right anyway." He smiled, soppy and guileless, at Draco. "And if it's you, I just let Hermione know, and she takes it up with you for me."

"You play your hand well, I admit. But it's not tenable."

"Why not?"

"Because one day, one of us is going to be wrong," he said. "It won't be me, obviously—"

"Obviously," said Harry, nodding somberly.

“—but it’ll happen, and if you don’t find it in you to shake one of them off, you’ll end up hauled into mortal peril by the hooks in your heart.”

Harry was puzzled.

“If they’re in mortal peril, I don’t want to shake them off,” he said. “Why wouldn’t I go with them?”

He felt an unwelcome rash of heartburn. Talking to Harry this way reminded him why he infrequently attempted to engage on matters that were neither practical nor trivial. Draco made a point of carefully moderating the sincerity in his diet. Like all rich foods, it risked indigestion. Now was not the day to find out how Harry could bear to gorge himself on it.

He opened his mouth to say Hopefully because I am also there, yelling at you, but was interrupted by a crisp rap on the portrait-door. Harry made an abortive attempt to sit up that somehow ended with him slumping even more comfortably into the pillows, groaning at the imposition.

It took two encores before Draco finally threw back his chair and went to get it, taking responsibility for absolutely everything, as per usual.

It was Theo. His hair had recovered from the rictus of gel at the Yule Ball and he had dressed quite snappily in a brown wool suit and tie, his breast double-studded with the Slytherin badge and the League one beneath it. He was fanning himself.

“Merlin’s sordid rectal prolapse, she wasn’t joking about the stairs. This is untenable. This is disrespectful to the student body. My body, to be precise. Surely you don’t do this every day? I’d hurl myself over the banister. I would learn to levitate. I have,” said Theo, “a stitch.”

“You play quidditch, you emphysematous bellyacher.” Draco leaned against the portrait-hole. “If you think that’s rough, Oliver Wood would dine out on your liver. Ah, wait; he already did.”

“If you’re referring to the late and tragic miscarriage of justice that denied us our fairly won Quidditch Cup, then I refuse to hear it, for I am selectively deaf to all remarks under a certain threshold of intelligence. The threshold is ‘any.’ Any intelligence. In case you need it spelled out for you. Speaking of spelling things out, are you busy? It’s been ages since we’ve caught up, and I’ve missed being mocked with five syllables.”

“Pansy knows the word ‘emphysematous.’”

“Yes, but she prefers ‘twat.’”

“She’s efficient.”

“Among other things. Do you have time for a butterbeer, or is your dance card full for the afternoon?”

He weighed his options. Ron and Hermione likely wouldn’t be back for a while. It had been miserable working on the egg, and he wasn’t keen to be the only one at the grindstone if everyone else had decided to lark off. He wanted a short vacation, somewhere breezy and calm and not tempestuous, where everyone could be trusted to lock up their unpalatable emotions in a vault. Repression sounded delightful, right about now, frankly.

He turned around.

“Potter!”

“What!”

“I’m going to Hogsmeade. Be back at dinner.”

“What do you want me to tell Hermione about the egg?”

“Tell her it’s not Banshee, and if she wants to check my work, she’s welcome to, though it’s a fate I wouldn’t wish on a mountain troll. I recommend we get started on Hagspeak, instead.”

“Okay. I’ll try. I’ll remember maybe half of that, though.”

This was rank optimism. Draco had put the over-under at one third.

“That’ll do. Afternoon.”

“Have fun!”

He dropped down from the portrait-hole. Theo rediscovered the world outside his cuticles and swept the conversation tactfully aside with a pivot on his heel.

They wound down through the maze of staircases. The castle was quiet and chilly in the weekend emptiness, the halls hollowed, narrow stairwells grown newly ample.

“Have a good Christmas?” Theo said unexpectedly, his voice skittering in the chill gloom. “I’m sorry I didn’t get you a present. I sent Narcissa some poinsettias, of course, but she hasn’t written back, and considering the usual tempo of her correspondence, I can only conclude I’ve committed a grave sin. Is she allergic? I didn’t think to ask.”

Theo’s voice was smooth and nasal, but the vibration behind it was poorly suppressed. He wasn’t really half as good at hiding his feelings as he thought he was.

Not that Draco had much room to think of it. At the mention of his mother, a black pit of worry, like the stone heart of a cherry, congealed in his chest.

“The sin of tardiness, perhaps,” he said. “She’s probably not received it yet.”

“Slander. I ordered it a week ago.” Theo thrust open the Entrance Hall doors with a wave of wand, and they waded out into the sludge carpet of the lawns. Snow was still wafting in dark sticky flakes from a lumpy mattress of clouds, a sorry medium between powder and rain, stinging their heads and cloaks.

“But she’s well, then? I shouldn’t worry?”

“No. She’s fine, thank you.”

Theo sent him a sidelong look.

“What.”

“Do you remember coming to the Yule Hunt at my house?” he said mildly. “I understand if you don’t. It was fully two years ago.”

“I remember.”

“Mm. Do you remember how you left?”

Draco cut a sharp look at him, and Theo met it, evenly and expressionlessly.

“Perfectly. I also remember telling you what would happen if you tried to hold it over my head.”

“I’m holding nothing.” He demonstrated with a flick of his hands. “I should fry my fingers in oil and serve them to lions before I willed any harm to your mother. Incidentally, if you require someone to make discreet visits—”

“Your concern is appreciated but unnecessary.”

“—someone to check in, from time to time—”

“If you require an illustration of the word ‘unnecessary,’ please refer to a mirror.”

“Do you want me to beg you?” he said shortly. “Do you want me to go down on my knees and plead to let me help? That’s not normally how this goes, Draco. Normally, you ask, and I give, and we don't wait for someone to hurt herself before it happens."

Draco shuttered. He felt all the doors and windows of himself slamming closed, at once, generating a cold breeze that whistled through all the chambers of his heart.

"We have help. We don't require your charity."

"Oh, thank Merlin. Maybe your gardener can weed her back to health. You do understand that your mother is sick, don't you? Properly sick. If she weren't a Malfoy, she'd probably be in St. Mungo's."

"Hark at you," he said coldly. "What leprous fool gave you a healer's license? You know nothing about her condition."

"And you do?" said Theo incredulously. "You're here three-quarters of the year and flouncing off with the Potter Pals for the fourth. If she had an attack, when would you know about it? Would you?"

He moved his hand to his hip; Theo twinned the movement, touching his holster.

They stood with their ankles turning wet in the snow, awkwardly facing off on the trail to Hogsmeade.

It was silly. He made a disgusted sound in his throat and lifted his hand away from the holster, flashing five fingers. Theo relaxed and folded his hands behind his back.

"She wouldn't accept it, you know." His voice was quiet. "She raised me. I don't know why you think her position will be any different than mine."

They came upon the gnarled iron gates to Hogsmeade. Black cloaks scuttled here and there sparsely through the gray downfall.

“I don’t know either,” said Theo. “I suppose you get your stubbornness from the Blacks.”

“At least mine has a better pedigree than yours.”

They passed under the iron archway, and left the subject outside it.

Striding past the Three Broomsticks, Theo turned in at a dingy stone building that looked like the earth was trying to digest it. Scummy moss stained at the half-timbered walls and spread in gangrenous patches over the pitched roofs, and an old billygoat in the courtyard wailed balefully at them as they crossed it.

“Darling, you take me to the nicest places.”

“Left your mettle in the Tower, did you? It’s discreet.” Theo dodged the main entrance, over which flew a wooden sign of a hog’s head leaking blood onto a white tablecloth, and picked his way through a litter of rubbish and mold-nibbled barrels in the alley. He tapped out a pattern on the brick with his wand, and a slot opened in the wall. A pair of beady eyes peered out.

“Password?”

“Godelot,” said Theo.

The slot closed, and part of the brick wall swung open. Theo flicked his hood up and gestured for Draco to do the same, which he did, after a moment, feeling terribly silly.

Inside it was a low-ceilinged barroom sparsely populated with witches and wizards in dark cloaks. Grime laid too thick on the windows to cast much sunlight, so they found their way by the light of small candles which guttered on each table. Behind the bar there was a mirror turned black as a chalkboard with tarnish, and a wizened bartender with few teeth and fewer hairs, polishing a glass.

“Aberforth,” said Theo, and the bartender grunted. The glass appeared to be getting dirtier from his polishing.

Coming in from the side door, they cut directly behind the bar and up the rickety stairs to a sitting room, where a long wooden table sat under a withered brass chandelier, and a fire roared in a great stone fireplace to one end of the room. The film on the windows was so dark it could have been night, and an owl roosting in the rafters gave a keen warning of their arrival.

Blinking the darkness out of his eyes, Draco picked out Theo rolling off his cloak with a sure ripple of his shoulders, talking to another boy. It was Gregory Goyle. He hadn’t seen Goyle up close since last year’s quidditch final, a time all evidence suggested he had spent guzzling growth potions continuously: he had progressed from big to unhealthfully large, whereas the unhealthful applied to Draco, not him. He’d started working on a beard, too, under a generous definition of “started,” “working,” and “beard.”

“Draco,” said Theo, turning, “you remember Greg.”

“I seem to recall a large blur trying to kill my seeker.”

A younger Goyle would have risen to the bait. This one snorted and threw back some of his tankard.

“S’ just a game,” he said. “Don’t be a girl.”

Draco waited for the customary threat of unsettling violence, but none came. This was a new, unspirited Goyle, more interested in glugging butterbeer than declaring his malevolent intentions toward Draco’s bones. He reflected with new interest on the possibility that all his menacing had been Goyle’s idea of trash talk, and found it both unsettling.

“I thought we might have a shared grievance,” said Theo, “since we’re all three quidditch players. Monstrous that they’ve canceled it, this year.”

“Only thing that made this stupid school worth coming back to,” muttered Goyle.

A door to the privy opened and Pansy came out, pink and swaddled for the cold. She wore a League of Promising Youth badge high and proudly on her collarbone, but her Warrington badge was gone.

She saw Draco and grunted amicably before scuttling into the warm radius of the fire. “Balls, it’s cold,” she snapped. “Why couldn’t we meet in the castle? That privy retains cultures from the Pleistocene Era.”

“There are few things so expensive as privacy,” said Theo, “as my father likes to say. A little discomfort is a bargain price.”

“Maybe yours is. I hope mine isn’t. Who else is coming?”

“I invited Blaise, Cassius, and Tracy, but alas, it’s a day that ends in Y, so Tracy’s got a shagging appointment with Higgs, and Blaise is a notorious flake. Cass might come, but he sprained his ankle, so it depends on whether he can pull Pomfrey away from a Hufflepuff outbreak of the first year flu.”

He noticed that Crabbe and Bulstrode hadn’t made the guest list. But then, neither had Daphne.

“Anyway, it’s a bad day for the side all-around. We’re trying to decide who to root for if Cass is still hurt for the Second Task, and it’s slim pickings. Krum’s seeing a muggle-born, and rumor has it the Frenchwoman’s a half-breed. I think Potter has it by a nose.”

Draco gripped the table.

“Who?” he gritted out. “Are you talking about Granger?”

“It was a joke,” sighed Theo. “Are those still legal, in Gryffindor?”

“Speaking of which,” said Pansy severely, pointing at him as if she were conducting an inquest. “What the devil is she doing with the Durmstrang champion? I thought she was with Potter."

He narrowed his eyes. "She's neither."

"What? Not Krum, either?"

"No."

"Hm. They were awfully friendly at the Yule Ball. If she's smart, she'll hold onto him, she's not likely to get a better match."

"Your mouth is about to get 'awfully friendly' with a Scouring Charm, if you don't find a better use for your tongue than septic waste," he snapped. "I didn't realize an escort was meant to precede a fucking marriage proposal, I would've sent you and Theo flowers."

Her eyes flared auspiciously. "Don't be saucy. I was only asking for Gemma's sake, anyway, she has a crush on Krum."

"My wishes for a swift recovery," he snapped. "I'm sure Granger would tell her happy hunting. For her part, she's been in a long-term engagement to her personal library since she was about three, and they're blissfully happy together. Put your nose out."

He sat down in bad grace. Why everyone suddenly thought Hermione's love life was their personal Witch Weekly column was a profoundly unpleasant mire of a question, rivaled only by the dark mystery of what he would do to them if they didn't soon recover.

"I don't like Potter," said Goyle, slowly and emphatically.

"We know, Greg. The world knows," said Theo. "The question is whether you like him better than someone whose grandfather dabbled in bestiality."

The new turn of the conversation hip-checked Draco from brooding into disgruntlement. "The hell? Nott, clarify."

“Delacour. Her grandmother’s a veela,” he said mildly, tracing the tip of his tankard with a finger. “Didn’t you suspect? That’s where she gets her looks. Also why her magic’s weaker than the other champions’, I expect. Blood’s diluted.”

“Diluted?”

“You know how it is. The further you get away from a wizarding line, the less magic you have. There’s science about it. Some studies show that muggle-borns—”

“Stop.”

It became very quiet in the room. Pansy stared at him. Theo’s finger stilled. When it started again, it moved in the opposite direction.

“Anyway,” he said, after a moment. “Whatever. It’s a hang-up of yours, I get it. But half-breeds are different, everyone can agree on that. They’re not fully human, so their magic doesn’t fully manifest. Take Hagrid, for instance. Is it any wonder that he got expelled?”

Draco startled.

“Hagrid? A student? You’re lying.” Pansy was sniggering.

“Oh, yes. About fifty years ago. He’s older than he looks. That’s giant blood, for you.”

Draco said, “Giant blood?”

“You should be reading the Cavalier Post,” said Theo, tapping his nose. “Keep you up to date on everything the Prophet won’t let to print. Yes, he’s a half-giant. So’s Maxime.”

“How the devil can you tell?”

“...Is that a joke?”

“He’s big. Goyle’s big, that doesn’t mean he’s a half-giant.”

“You’d be amazed what you can find, digging through old school records,” said Theo airily, picking some lint from his tie. “Newspapers dating back to the 1930s, for example. I even found McGonagall’s graduating class — total riot, well worth a look if you’ve got a strong stomach — and a few delectable tidbits about the lake. In fact—”

But the door swung open, interrupting him. In swept a tall, golden-haired boy with an oily pompadour.

“Cass,” said Goyle, with the first thing approaching real gladness he had shown all afternoon. He got up and hurried to shake the Head Boy’s hand.

“Greg. Delightful.” Warrington pumped his arm and gave a short bow to Pansy. A light German accent cushioned his consonants. “Parkinson. The cold becomes you, does it not? Du bist so schön wie Rosenrot.”

She gave him a haughty scoff and turned her head toward the fireplace.

He moved one of the chairs with his wand and Summoned a tankard from the sideboard. “Good call with the private room, Nott. It’s just the ticket. Of course, it’s not the faculty lounge, is it? I admit, I’ve become accustomed to the brandy.”

“They only let us use that for meetings. And if I try to book twice in a month I think McGonagall will transfigure me into an etiquette manual.”

“Shame. It was big of your father to let us use the Boardroom, once, I’ve been spoiled for it. What a building! Filled with history. If I live to a hundred I’ll never forget hearing Odin Davis delivering that speech. You missed it, Greg — it was the nine of us at the table, and Lord Nott had brought Mr. Davis to talk to us about careers in law enforcement — you remember Mr. Davis, from the attacks last year? We watered him up with brandy and oysters on the half-shell, and when dinner was over he told us the whole story, including how Lord Nott saved his life — he found him and raced him to St. Mungo's, even though it meant the savage escaped. That's nobility, for you. And Nott, do you remember his story about killing a whole den of them, in Wales? Four grown mongrels and a pair of bitches, one with pups. All dead. Merlin knows how many lives he saved."

"Werewolves, you mean," said Draco.

"If you like." Cassius turned to Draco and beheld him, at a distance, like a new and intriguing species of blind mole. "I don't believe we've met."

"No. You'd remember."

"Warrington, Malfoy," said Theo, waving boredly. "Draco, Cassius. Prefect, Head Boy, Hogwarts champion — the original, not the decoy. You may have sneered at each other before."

Cassius tilted his head in interest. "Pleasure."

"I'm sure it is. Well done, there, with the dragon and the birds."

Cassius' smile recalled the shade of shattered eggshells.

"Thank you," he said.

"Read it in a book?"

"Hm?"

"The trick with the egg," said Draco calmly. "Did you read it somewhere?"

"Ah — I understand. No. My family has a summer house in Romania. It neighbors a dragon reserve." Warrington flicked his eyes to the table in a winning imitation of bashfulness. It faded too soon. "I, ah… learned some tricks, as it were."

"Mm. Impressive trick to pick up on your own."

Another feint at humility, a smile too cold to be sheepish. “Well, I never said I didn’t have help.”

“No, of course. I’d heard it suggested,” said Draco, ignoring a slight jitter of danger, “that you might have been helped.”

Theo made a soft hiss in the back of his throat. Warrington merely blinked at him.

“It’s Malfoy, isn’t it?” he said, apropos of nothing. “Strange that we haven’t met. Ravenclaw, are you? The curious type?”

“No.”

“Then I must be thinking of another family.” He smiled, and it was a genial, beatifically handsome thing that Draco got the feeling he could wipe off with a napkin. “I apologize. As you can imagine, I have a great deal on my mind.”

“Certainly.” He drummed his fingers. “Give my regards to Miss Carrow, by the way. My mother’s aunt was a dear friend of her grandmother’s.”

“I’m afraid I could not presume to take that liberty,” said Cassius apologetically. “Miss Carrow and I are not socially involved.”

“No?”

“No.”

“I wonder how I could have been so mistaken,” said Draco.

There was a pregnant pause. Theo looked at Draco flatly over Cassius’ shoulder, while Pansy gave him a proud, sidelong sort of smirk.

“I am continually surprised by how people have treated the Ball as an exercise in matchmaking,” said Cassius. “That was not the purpose, as I understood it. In the classical Wizarding tradition, it was customary for brothers to serve as escorts for their sisters at social events. It prevented the appearance of impropriety and vouchsafed the family's virtue." He paused. "In fact, I had presumed that was why you took Miss Greengrass, Mr. Malfoy. I have made a point not to tolerate any rumors to the contrary."

Draco stilled. Then he twitched his mouth into a cold smile.

"They must have been very confusing rumors, indeed," he said, "since you didn't know my name before Theodore introduced us."

Cassius inclined his head, his expression half-indulgence, half-condescension, and a trifle of respect.

"One hears so many things that aren't worth remembering," he said. "I try to give every man no more or less than the credit I would ask for myself. My own name has been abused in all sorts of absurd contexts, you see; I'm sure you can sympathize."

The wind whistled in the eaves. Draco found himself tired.

He was tired of being cold. He was tired of tension and stress. He was tired of performing conversational acrobatics just to keep his head above water. He was even tired of Theo and Pansy, who for all that he liked them always left a sour aftertaste. They sat and drank and talked as if there were no human beings outside the walls of this dismal cellar, and apart from that — apart from the long list of things that he knew, with a deep and squirming discomfort, that Hermione would have said if she could hear them — he did not understand why, if at all, it gave them any particular comfort.

It wasn't warm. It wasn't civil. It was the world they came from; it belonged to them, it was made for them, carved in their bones and the graves of their forefathers; but he didn't have to like it. It felt puerile and small.

Once he would have done a great many things to be in this room, crossing glasses with the Head Boy, a Nott, a Parkinson, and a Goyle. There was another world, another blond boy in another tie, where he was the man Warrington wanted to please. He would have asked for entry into the Boardroom, and been granted it.

That boy had never seen the world from the top of Gryffindor Tower, with its windows full of starlight and mountains, its smoky firelit rooms. But he'd also never seen a werewolf's teeth under a full moon. He'd never seen the inside of a dementor's throat, how dark it was, how fathomless.

He saw the two rooms set against each other like opposed mirrors, reflecting a corridor that fanned out into oblivion, and down one path he could see himself here — drinking brandy in three-piece suits with men and women who would flay their own hands to kiss his signet, who adored him madly and easily and automatically, and he wanted it so badly it made him ache in places he'd forgotten. In the other, he was sun-blistered and sweaty on the Burrow's roof, exhausted and miserable and riddled with strange insensible guilt, and it was always hard, and it never got easier, and nobody cared for his ring or his name and one day he feared he'd wake up not caring, either, mundane and not caring, mediocre and not caring, no different and no better than anyone else.

And if he wasn't different, he was nothing. They would peel off everything that he was, and they'd burn it up, and whatever was left of him — if there was anything left of him — would have nowhere, no one, if not them. They'd consume him.

Which, in a way, wasn't so different from what Warrington's people would have done. It was just a different part of him that was dying. A different limb to shear away. Why couldn't his life fit all of him in it?

He wanted to talk to Hermione.

"What are you doing?" said Theo.

He had stood up.

When Hermione talked about these things, they became simple. The world through her eyes was moral and elegant and easily mastered through brute application of brilliance and will. When she disliked something, it was immoral, irrational, evil, and irredeemable. When she liked something, it was perfect and reasonable and good. She was ruthless and scant with her praise, but when it came, it came like sunlight, and just then he was terribly cold.

He wanted to capture the way she looked at him when he told her he would bait the dragon before the First Task, capture it whole, and lock it up somewhere that no one else would ever find. He wanted her to look at him that way all the time, and never look away. He wanted to never see it again. The two wants didn't cancel each other out, they just sat together in his ribcage, bleeding.

"I have an obligation. I just remembered."

"Did I say something?" said Warrington, politely, but it was clear he didn't really mind that Draco was leaving.

"I'll walk you out," said Theo.

"I will, too," said Pansy. Goyle didn't offer, and for some reason that stung.

They came with him to the door and squeezed into the small dank hallway over the stairs.

"Sorry for Warrington," whispered Pansy. "He's a bit of a pig."

"It doesn't matter," he said, which was true.

As he turned to leave, Pansy broke out: "Wait, I wanted to ask you a favor."

"Parkinson—"

"It's not for me, it's for Daphne." She pulled a small golden badge from her pocket and held it out to him. "Will you give this to her?"

“...Has she joined?”

“No,” said Theo quietly, “but it’s still an option for her. We want her to know.”

He curled his lip. “Has she expressed any interest, whatsoever, that she might someday be inclined to join?”

“No, but it’s not about the club, you ninny. You think Daph gives a fig for politics? We just want her to know we haven’t forgotten her,” said Pansy, with characteristic impatience, as if she didn’t understand why everyone in the world didn’t think the same things she did and on the same schedule. “We won’t ever. Tell her if she wants to come back, all she has to do is show that at the door.”

She pressed the badge into his hand. It branded his palm with a cold kiss. He curled his fingers over the curlicues of gold and felt hollow.

“So you want me to lie to her.”

Pansy’s mouth parted. Theo, tellingly, showed no surprise at all, but a toothless exhaustion that dug fresh trenches under his eyes.

“She can’t come back. You know that. So does she.”

“Millie will get over herself,” whispered Pansy. “She just—”

“Millicent Bulstrode isn’t the reason Daphne isn’t welcome in her own common room anymore.” He tossed the badge at Theo, who caught it. “Give it to her yourself, if you can find the audacity. I certainly couldn’t.”

He turned and went down the stairs. He had not made it three steps into the snow when he heard his name called, and Theo came hurrying after him, his boots crunching in the sludge.

“Hang on,” he said breathlessly, skidding alongside Draco. “Gracious, tarry a moment, would you? I still had something to say.”

“I really do have an obligation.”

“Right, okay, like everyone in the room couldn’t see through that for a barefaced lie. I know Cass is a strong flavor—”

“Again, it wasn’t anything to do with Warrington.”

“It could be,” said Theo indifferently. “He irritates Pansy out of her skin. But that’s not important. I wanted to invite you to the next League event. The next speaker is Quilliam Coalhend, he’s got a doctorate in Herbology from Oxford, revolutionized the use of aquatic plants in Potioneering. He’s a brilliant alchemist, a great connection for anyone in academia, I thought you might like—”

“I’m not joining. I thought I made that clear.”

“And I thought everything happening recently might have made you reconsider. Obviously, I should have known better, since you and everyone else I can possibly stand has a habit of calibrating your decisions to whatever makes my life hardest. Speaking of which, can you ask Daphne—”

“Daphne is besotted with you.”

Theo dragged his hands over his face. The snow had hastened and came down in stinging sheets, melting inches above his face into ice-cold rain.

“Did you know that?”

“Yes,” he said finally. He pulled his hands away from his face, newly pink, and blinked away sleet. “So?”

“So?” Draco had no idea what to say to that. He had assumed Theo would have some sort of answer. He hadn’t the first notion of what you were supposed to do when you were in love with someone, except hang around each other and snog a bit and then eventually get married. “So… I don’t know. Do something about that.”

“Like what?” Theo’s mouth crooked.

“Anything! Do I have to do bloody everything? I’ve already pulled more than my weight here. And don’t go proposing to her again, it’s a disgrace.”

“That was a moment of weakness.”

“You think so?”

“In my defense, I hadn’t slept in a while. While I maintain that it would have solved several problems—”

“When’s the last time you did sleep, speaking of?”

“—I concede that it was ill-founded. And I don’t know, I passed out after splinching myself at the World Cup, that must have been a good six or seven hours. It’s not important. I’ve got just two problems right now that don’t have to do with the Ministry of Magic, and that’s you and Daphne. Both could be solved, incidentally, if you and her could just get on side, join up, and let me protect—”

“I don’t like your friends.”

The snow settled into sad gray lumps in the alleys, like a stray cat.

“Cheers,” said Theo briskly. “I loathe yours.”

“Crabbe and Bulstrode are callous and insipid gossips.”

“The Weasley twins in particular I find crude and disrespectful of others’ property.”

“Goyle tried to hit Hannah Abbott for defending her prefect.”

“The She-Weasel is a violent hypocrite.”

“Marcus Flint is a barbarian.”

“Do you expect me to disagree?” he snapped. “They’re my friends, I don’t have to like them.”

Draco had no idea what to call the kind of sadness this inspired. It was big and quiet and painful.

“I’m going back to the castle,” he said. “I assume you’re not.”

“No,” said Theo, who seemed no happier about it than him. “I’ve obligations, too.”

Abruptly, to Draco’s surprise, he held out his hand to shake.

Draco did. It cost him nothing, and it put some color back in Theo’s face.

“You should stay with us again, next summer,” he said, without much heart. More words that cost him nothing, because they were rejected, predictably, at once.

“Dad wants me home.”

“For what?”

“He’s taken an interest in my education. I’m being groomed for leadership. I’ve already got a job offer upon graduation, did I tell you that? If I live that long.”

“Bugger that,” said Draco, surprising himself. “Run away.”

Theo blinked. “Where?” he said curiously. “With you and Narcissa?”

“She’d have you in a heartbeat.”

“And what would she do when my father came looking?”

“Nothing anyone would be able to prove.”

Theo put his head back and laughed. The snow laid a veil of frost in his dark hair, turning it, too, gray, like the sky, like the dirt.

“That’s the first one I’ve had in a while,” he gasped, blinking up at the dull clouds. “Thank you. I really mean it. I needed that a lot.”

“Is that a ‘yes’?”

“Of course not,” he said, still talking softly to the sky. “There’s no running away. It’s too late for that. And if you could ever hold your nose and actually show up to a League meeting, you’d know why. Hell, in a year, there'll be nowhere to run away to.”

“I am at my limits of toleration for riddles, believe me. What’s happening in a year?”

“It was a figure of speech,” he said, dropping his eyes. “Dumbledore’s going to lose the oversight battle, you know, in the Wizengamot. The Tournament was a smart concession, on his part, but he can’t hold off reform for long. Runcorn wants skulls. Trelawney, Hagrid, Burbage, they’re all on the chopping block — do me a favor and don’t break that before the Prophet does, by the way — and there are more staff changes coming at the Ministry. Names you’ve heard of. The old families are coming back.”

“Coming back from where?” He understood perfectly well what Theo meant, but he wanted him to say it. In him was a cold and mean sense of curiosity about how far Theo would go, out loud. He was also, frankly, frightened of it. “We never left.”

A pause. “I shouldn’t have mentioned it,” murmured Theo. “But you know I mean. Better than anyone, sometimes, I think.”

“Massive slight to Parkinson out of nowhere.” His voice was light, but he was unsettled. “I’m touched.”

“I didn’t say I liked you better than anyone,” he muttered. “But you do understand. You get it. I know you do, I’ve seen it. Your dad…

actually, perhaps that's why I kept thinking you'd fall in. You know? Eventually. You'd have your fun while we were kids, and run around with rabble, have your little Prince and the Pauper moment… but you'd come back home, when the time came. Once you figured it out."

It was very cold, standing out in the open snow.

"Figured out what?" he said tonelessly.

"That you're the same as I am," he said bitterly, "only luckier."

Draco tipped his chin back, considering.

"No," he said. "Braver, I think."

Theo put his head down and laughed.

"Yeah," he said. "Yeah. 'Where dwell the brave at heart,' indeed. Inarguably so."

Given time and opportunity, he would have wrestled Theo down, and forced him to justify his ominous prognosticating. Contrary to assertion, he did not, in fact, know what he meant, and whatever change Theo was referring to, it was a vague darkness whose contours remained obscure to him. But Theo had nothing more to say, and at length it became clear that neither did he; and they shook hands again, before they parted ways.

The distance between Hogsmeade and Gryffindor Tower vanished in the blur of deep thought. When he blinked back to reality, he was standing in front of the Pink Lady. She was fiddling nervously with her braid. When he told her "Cetus," she pursed her lips.

"If you're quite sure," she said. As soon as it unsealed, shouting swelled from the common room.

“—THINGS HAVE YOU BEEN SAYING ABOUT—”

“We didn’t say anything! God! Can you read? You’re being completely stupid!”

“STUPID, AM I? OUT OF PROPORTION, IS IT? YEAH, CLASSIC RON, ALWAYS MISSING THE POINT—”

“Mate, c’mon, you are being stupid, it’s all bunk, you’re the one making this up—”

“SHUT THE HELL UP, HARRY!”

He had never heard Ron yell at Harry before.

Draco scrambled through the portrait hole and pulled out his wand as he rounded the curve to the common room. What he saw made him feel like he had come stumbling into a playhouse halfway through the second act.

Harry and Hermione made an isosceles triangle with Ron at the tip, in postures of various placation, which had obviously failed to cool their bristling third. One of the desks lay fetal on the ground, bleeding from a shattered inkwell. Ron gripped a balled-up newspaper. In another universe, it could have been the scene of a comically unsuccessful fly-swatting, but the illusion shattered as soon as Hermione caught his eye and shook her head, trying to warn him back through the door.

Too late: Ron spun around.

“Oh! There you are! Bloody wonderful! Fantastic! The Trio’s all here!”

“What the devil is going on? I was gone for an hour!”

“You don’t know?” Ron snapped. “Ask your pal Rita Skeeter! She seems to know all about it!”

The newspaper flew at him. It collided with a crackling white Locomotor.

He lowered it slowly, and suppressed the urge to hit back with Levicorpus.

“What in Merlin’s holy name are you ever about?”

“Absolute utter rubbish, thanks for asking,” snapped Hermione. Each syllable dropped off her tongue like the stroke of a cleaver. Ron made an owlish sound of anger. “Skeeter wrote another piece of trash making you and me and Harry look like total prats, and he’s upset because he wasn’t included.”

“Hermione,” pleaded Harry, with a tired, thin diplomacy, “let’s just, you know, let’s just be nice for a second, alright, he doesn’t—”

“You be nice to him. That’s your answer for everything, isn’t it, Harry? Oh, poor Ron, he’s got it so hard, let’s baby him, let’s be nice to him, let’s let him say whatever he wants and never get angry — of course, it’s easy when you’re the only one he ever apologizes to!”

“That’s not fair,” said Harry indignantly, and now he and Ron were pivoting towards her, like the magnetic center of the room had shifted. “I’m just asking us not to shout.”

“That’s all you ever do! Let’s not fight, let’s not get angry, let’s shove it all down so that Harry doesn’t feel uncomfortable!”

“I didn’t say that,” he snapped, hurt. “I don’t like shouting. I don’t — I hate playing this card, so I wasn’t going to bring it up, but — but the Dursleys do it, a lot, and — and, you know, I d-d-don’t— I don’t like it when you do it. I don’t think that’s, like, this incredibly unreasonable thing.”

That was it. It earned a beat of incontestable silent observation from all.

Hermione set her jaw into a rictus that could have snapped through wood. She said, in a very tight, very small voice: “I’m sorry.”

He broke immediately. Ice shattered, the waters thawed, and he sagged out of his posture as if it had taken every ounce of strength in him. “That’s okay. It isn’t a big deal, really. I just — yeah.”

“Well, I’m glad that you two have sorted things out.”

Ron’s interjection was a bead of ink unfurling in a clear lake. It stained the waters swiftly and completely.

Draco finally consulted the newspaper. The article on the second half of the page caught his attention first: MUGGLE UNREST NEAR BRIGHTON, DARK MARK REPORTS UNCONFIRMED. This sent a jolt of something watery through his stomach before something even more striking on the page caught his eye: his own name.

[img: https://i.ibb.co/3dg1KwS/Screen-Shot-2023-06-02-at-8-25-49-AM.png]

The ensuing article proceeded to sketch out some sort of bizarre star-studded social clique including Harry, Hermione, and himself. This clique, as Hermione had suggested, came across as rather less attractive than insufferable, as Skeeter’s “anonymous source” seemed determined to augment their glamor through as many adjectives as possible: “reserved,” “coy,” “selective,” and “mysterious” all made double appearances throughout the article. At least twice, it hinted at a romance between Harry and Hermione, though Skeeter appeared to anticipate a plot twist on this score, and entreated readers to submit their opinions on “Hermione’s choice.”

The first page featured a moving photograph of the common room, empty save for a blurry head that might have been Seamus; on the second page, the three of them were captured in shifting black print, posing candidly on some sort of staircase. Ron was absent. The photo credit for both pictures was Colin Creevey.

“Where is he?”

“What?” snapped Ron, turning. “Who?”

Draco calmly ripped the newspaper in half. “Creevey,” he said. He tossed both halves in the bin, and set them on fire with a jab of his wand. “Where is he?”

“Don’t,” said Hermione shortly. “It’s not a good idea.”

“You don’t know what I’m thinking.”

“No, see, actually, I do, and I’m telling you, it’s not a good idea. I thought of it first.”

“Sod off. Why not?”

“Retribution,” she said simply, which slightly surprised him; he’d thought she would object to the prospect of grievous injury. Then again, the article hadn’t been too kind to her; it had used her and ‘coquette’ in the same sentence, which was going to cost Colin several fingernails and a tonsil, if Draco ever found him. “He’s got access to Skeeter. If you threaten him, he’ll just run and tell her. And if he tells a teacher...”

“He won’t.”

“You could face disciplinary action. Which gets us nowhere.”

“So you want to let him go?”

“I didn’t say that,” she said, her eyes glittering, and he knew he was mirroring the savage little smile on her face — he couldn’t help it; it was his second favorite expression of Hermione’s, the one he loved almost best, because when she smiled it there was nothing in the world except her and him and the poor dead bastards who didn't know what was coming for them — when Ron cleared his throat.

"Aren't you two bloody chummy," he said, in tones of pelagic depth.

Draco no longer suffered from any impulse to smile whatsoever. He turned his head to face Ron, slowly, and rolled out his wand-wrist. Silencio would do nicely.

"What now, Ron," said Hermione, and he knew at once it was the wrong tone, the wrong phrase. She came in hot and fast and this time even Harry was wringing his empty hands like he knew they couldn't stop her, while Draco gripped his wand and thought that it was possible he could, but found he didn't want to. He was holding a pocket ace, and he didn't even have to play it.

Because Ron and Hermione had built up about four years' worth of quarrels, petty and not, including some nastiness Draco was sure even he didn't know about. And they were catalysts for each other, high-intensity conflict engines without a decelerator, and he knew how they fought; he'd watched them do it all last year. Let them run long enough, and it would hit terminal velocity. Eventually one of them would smash into something unforgivable, and their speed wouldn't give them time to stop.

And that would be that, the birth of a new uncrossable distance, the sides drawn, the pairs cemented, Harry-and-Ron against Draco-and-Hermione, and the thing was — it would be all Ron's fault. Draco would have nothing to do with it. He and Hermione would be best friends, and Harry and Ron would be their other friends, and all the frustrating mercurial dynamics of their quartet would be laid to bed. People grow apart, he would say, don't blame yourself, Granger, not everyone can be like us, and Hermione would be sad and then less sad and she'd never give Ron her tears or her laughter or her secret smiles ever again.

Which was the kind of thought he might expect more often if he were a clinical psychopath, actually, or made a habit of using his soul as fishing-bait in a tar pit. The rest of his brain united in appallment. He'd never thought anything like that before. He liked Harry and Ron. He didn't want them to go away.

"Explain yourself," he said roughly. In actuality, he did not want Ron to explain himself. He thought there was very little about Ron's position that required explaining; it was himself he didn't understand. He wanted to go upstairs and take a minute to work through what he was about. He wanted for everyone to shut up, for at least thirty seconds, while he put his mind in order.

This was a request that would have made the very cosmos roll with laughter, if it could hear.

"It's always you two, isn't it?" said Ron, very calm, and very unhappy. "It always comes back to you. It's never 'let's all do this,' or 'let's plan something, the four of us,' it's 'what do Draco and Hermione think we should do?' How do Draco and Hermione think we should do the First Task? Polyjuice is pretty easy for Draco and Hermione, maybe that's how we should help Sirius! What do Draco and Hermione think the egg means? But at least you're nice enough to let Harry in on it!"

He scoffed. "If you objected to those plans, you could have used your grown-up words and voiced them. Did you expect us to send you a permission slip before we saved Potter's life?"

"When would I bloody object?" Ron roared. "When would either of us bloody object? I can barely get a word in with either of you when the other person's in the room! Sometimes Harry and I have to wait for you two to leave to talk to even each other—"

"What?" said Hermione, stricken. She turned to Harry, who cringed as if he wanted to fold himself into a box the size of his chest. "Is that true?"

"No, it's n— I mean — but it's not like that, honestly, I mean sometimes, but—"

“You know, I reckon I did have it wrong, earlier.” Ron’s fingers kneaded the flesh of his palms like gestating fists. “It’s not the three of you. It’s two.”

“We’re your friends, Ron. Of course you’re part of the group.” Hermione spoke as if to a small child, which was not the thing in any number of senses, but Draco was still reeling too hard to interject.

It was the way Ron said Draco-and-Hermione, like one word. At the bottom of his anger — and it was a very, very, deep bottom — there was a kernel of something else; not even disagreement, just a mild bit of proud rankling, as if Ron were saying the right thing in the wrong way.

“Yeah,” Ron said, blinking something shiny out of his eyes. It was tears, he realized, though whether tears of anger or distress Draco couldn’t parse. He couldn’t think of a time he’d seen a man cry before, and it was unsettling as hell. Ron scrubbed them away in humiliated haste before he could examine the feeling further. “Yeah, I’m part. The last part. The part you two always forget. Did you even notice you left me out of the First Task? Did it cross either of your big brains that I wasn’t there? Don’t answer that.”

Hermione spun from condescension to fury in the space of an axon tip.

“No! No, don’t you dare! You said you wanted to watch,” she said angrily, stabbing her finger at him. “You wanted to see what Fleur did —”

“BEFORE I KNEW WHAT YOU WERE DOING! Of course I wanted to watch! It’s a bloody DRAGON! That doesn’t mean I couldn’t have helped!”

“How?” snapped Draco. “By doing what, exactly? It’s not our job to make sure Ronald gets his playtime. What do you suggest you’d have done?”

“You’ll never know! Because you didn’t ask me!”

“Ron, it wasn’t personal, there really was nothing for you to d—”

“And there never is!” he bellowed. “There never is, is there? Not nowadays! Not when you two have Harry rigged up like a sockpuppet! But do you want to know what’s funny, Hermione—”

“Safely assume she doesn’t, thank you, and neither do I. You’re crossing a line.”

“Do you want to know? Do you? It’s that during second year, when that twat called you — you know what he called you—”

“Weasley, the ice where you’re standing is so thin it’s about to be steam.”

“—and it was just the three of us? I remember that. I don’t think you ever paid so much attention to me in your life, Hermione, and it was sodding great. And then he comes back, because, what, he bought you a whole stinking garden—”

“Go to hell,” said Hermione. Ron flinched; she had dropped from molten frustration to a quivering, cold fury.

“You can go straight to hell for that implication, Ronald.”

Harry inhaled on a wince. Shiny-eyed with hurt, Ron still hesitated only for an instant.

“Well — but — well, it’s what he did, isn’t it?” he snarled. “Little rich boy, isn’t he, with a castle and an inheritance? He can buy anything. He can even buy an apology.”

“That’s what this is about? Are you serious? You’re ripping into me because you’re jealous of something that happened two years ago?”

“So what! So what if I am? He gets EVERYTHING!” Ron was bellowing at both of them, now, and there were fresh tears he had made no effort to wipe away. “For four years, if anything in my life is worth having, Draco Malfoy’s got it, and he’s got a better one than me! Money, and grades, and quidditch, and better presents, and better broomsticks, and better clothes, and pretty girls, and whatever it is that makes you like him better than you ever liked me—”

“As if you don’t play favorites.” Hermione’s voice cut through his like a hot knife through sand. “I mean, I don’t even know where to start. I could say it’s disgusting and chauvinistic to talk about me like I’m somehow equivalent to a nice broomstick. I could say that things like ‘better grades’ and ‘quidditch teams’ require time and effort, not just money, and in any case it’s not my fault you don’t have them. And I could say that I’m a human being, and I get to spend time with who I very well please, and if you wanted more of my attention then you could have shown a little interest in my hobbies instead of complaining that I don’t make more time for you, but actually, I won’t say any of those things, because Ron Weasley, you look me in the eye and say you don’t like Harry better than me.”

Her voice cracked on the word Harry.

Harry froze, and stared at Ron, who rendered fully silent for the first time in the argument.

“I don’t,” he said, by and by, but it was strained. “I don’t. I like both of you — differently.”

“You’re a hypocrite,” muttered Draco. Ron sneered at him, but Hermione guffawed and turned away.

“And — and anyway,” Ron snapped, working back into it, “it doesn’t matter. Because at least Harry doesn’t — doesn’t look at me like I’m a species of bug or something whenever money comes up! You think I don’t hear you two talking about me? All the times you’ve said something about my robes, or my house? Yeah, bet you didn’t think I heard that one, did you! The two of you cozied up together, gossiping about how bloody awful it must be to be so poor— you both hated the Burrow! Admit it!”

“No! Ron, don’t be ridic—”

“I admit I’m not used to living in a house with more dirty dishes than blades of grass,” Draco said.

To his own surprise, it turned out that he didn’t need to wait for Ron or Hermione to cut the tendon, because his mouth was more than happy to go hurtling ahead with the knife. He was very angry. It was not entirely clear to him, until he heard himself speaking, how angry he had been.

“I admit that I’m accustomed to a house with more structural integrity than a sand castle. I admit that I’m not used to living in the same dirty kennel as ten other people” —this was a lie— “sharing beds and bathrooms and closets and God knows what else” —it was far past time for him to stop talking— “all crammed in together like an incestuous autoclave, no, I’ll admit, I’m not accustomed to it, and if my luck holds, I never will be.”

Now Ron was shaking like something was about to burst out of him. He had never been so livid. Draco thought there was something faintly relieved in the fury on his face.

“I know.” Somehow he kept his voice steady, despite the shaking. “That’s the thing, Malfoy. I know. You think you’re so clever and subtle, laughing at this big stupid oaf and his sorry life, but I know what you think. I’ve always known.”

Once upon a time, he’d said a word he would never repeat, and he had watched it slowly rip open the conversation beneath its terrible weight, wishing he could snatch it out of the very air.

This didn’t feel as bad as that did. He didn’t know how anything possibly could. But it was not an unrelated feeling.

Hermione was stony and silent. Draco tried to catch her eye, but she was gazing at Ron like he was the last man on the planet, and she was the last saber-toothed tiger.

“I love your family,” said Hermione quietly. “I think they’re wonderful. And I loved the Burrow.”

“Yeah, sure. Okay. The thing is — the thing is, Hermione? I don’t care. It doesn’t matter. I’d still rather live in a hovel and sleep on a dirt floor than be the— the—”

It was going to be bad.

“—the sidekick of someone who treats your parents like they’re animals.”

Hermione flinched. And that was it, that was all it took.

Draco rolled his fingers into position on his wand. His heart was playing a song on the inside of his ribs, and the song said hit him, hit him, hit him .

“Weasley, take out your wand.”

But he was too quiet. Ron barely seemed to remember him.

“Doesn’t he?” Ron demanded. He swept a hand at Draco. “Be honest. When’s the last time he asked after your parents? Can he name them?”

“You’re being cruel,” said Hermione. She was crying, but trying to speak through it, as if they could possibly fail to notice. “And you’re doing it on purpose. Stop it.”

He — he could, couldn’t he? He could— but it was an old memory, and he was too distracted, he couldn’t think, he needed a moment, he needed space—

He needed to put a Furnunculus Jinx so far up Ron’s nostril he’d be sneezing boils on his deathbed. Yes. That’s what he needed to do.

“I said take out your wand.”

Ron still didn’t. Fine. He’d been warned. Draco raised his arm.

“No!” roared Harry, and he threw himself between them. It was the first time he’d spoken in — Draco didn’t even know. Maybe hours. “No magic! Put it down! No hurting each other!”

“Too late, Potter.”

“Far too late, mate,” said Ron, staring at Draco’s wand with a hollow sort of shock. His eyes flicked up to Draco’s. He could see the wide bloody crescents of the whites in them, bracketing the rust-rimmed blue. “Missed the train by a couple years.”

Draco eyed him. He still hadn’t drawn his wand.

He twitched his wrist—but Harry was faster.

“Expelliarmus!”

His wand leapt from his hand, and Harry snapped it out of the air. Then he brandished it at Draco, instead of his own, as if to make a point.

“NO MAGIC!” The sight of Harry Potter shouting at him was so fearsome and irregular that his anger packed its bags and quite simply hauled ass. “Get it through your skull! No magic, not on each other, not ever! And what the hell do you think you’re doing, anyway? It’s Ron!”

Draco reviewed the ledger and found that he didn’t have any sort of response. Ron had made Hermione flinch; he obviously couldn’t say that, but it had seemed a perfectly reasonable answer, at the time.

“I don’t know,” said Ron. The air had gone out of him, but the anger was still there, like venom in a pufferfish skin. “I really don’t know what’s going on with us, anymore. But I guess I’ll give you lot some room to find out.”

For a moment it looked like Hermione was going to say something, and he wished she would: say something, say anything, unveil a sudden dazzling twist of ingenuity that threw the whole problem into perspective and saved them. But no such pearls were forthcoming and after a miserable sound of protest, she closed her mouth again.

“That’s one thing you’ve got to say for me,” said Ron. He was blinking like he had eyes full of sand. “I know when I’m the problem. I’m — that’s another way of looking at this, isn’t it? Maybe you three aren’t the problem, it’s just— it’s supposed to be three. Not four. And I’m the idiot trying to shove a spoon in a wandsheath.”

He turned, ignoring a chorus of his name, and fled up the boys’ stairs. This exit would have been more impressive if had not been executed at top speed, and with a terribly recognizable choking sound.

Harry sat down hard in an armchair. Hermione swiped her hand over her face. For a long time no one said anything, just listened to their own ragged breathing in the awful quiet.

Draco leaned on the back of the sofa and listened to the thunder of his own pulse running itself out. Unlike Harry, he didn’t take deep breaths or try to settle himself, because he didn’t want to calm down. He dreaded the moment the adrenaline receded. He heard his own voice rattled back at him like a cassette, and it made him sick. A dirty kennel. An incestuous autoclave. So easily, he’d said those things. He hadn’t had to think about them. They’d come bubbling up from a secret trench and surfaced without his consent, like was only a vessel for the cruelty, just a mouth and a tongue and the hard mean things they could do.

It was enough to make a man wonder just what kind of thing he was carting around in his chest.

“Here.”

Draco looked up, and found the handle of his own wand staring back at him.

“Sorry for disarming you,” said Harry quietly.

He gave a graceless jerk of his head and took his wand back.

“I— er.” Hermione rubbed her forehead. He stood up straight when she did, mirroring her, and still in him was that unfair hope that her next words would make the whole miserable situation go away. Or the next ones. Or the next. “I — do either of you want dinner?”

Both of them stared at her as if dinner was a word she’d invented.

“Well, we have to do something,” she said miserably. “We can’t just sit here reeling until — I mean, someone’s going to come down and find us. And I can go up, but you two — shouldn’t. So unless you feel like explaining to people—”

“It’s a good idea,” said Draco. She broke off with evident relief. “Dinner. Best thing. Potter?”

Harry was staring at the boys’ staircase.

“What?”

“Food. Come on,” he said, and jerked his head at the door.

“Shouldn’t we—” Harry hesitated over the fallen desk.

“Right,” muttered Hermione. “Yes.”

In a word, they cleaned up their mess. Hermione levitated the desk back onto its side and repaired the inkwell. The ink had to be siphoned from the floor, and what little remained, Harry went after with a rag. Draco cast Reparo on the chair, and after they had cleaned up as much of the scuffing as they could, they stood in the clean empty common room, holding in their minds the only evidence that there had been a fight.

When they were done, they stood shoulder to shoulder with their backs to the portrait-door. Hermione was between them.

“Well,” she said, in a small voice that made his stomach tie knots, “I suppose that’s everything.”

And it was.

At the risk of harpooning you with tonal dissonance: COVERS!! Cover images for this fic are available now on Tumblr and Imgur. Those include back covers, which I made for fun, because I sort of got carried away.

Miscellaneous other notes:

-I hate to leave you on such a dour image this week. You all know how much I love Ron, and I could talk for ages about his character arc in GoF, but suffice it to say he's quite simply going through it this year. As is everyone, in fairness. I like to think that a fight is a failure of problem-solving, whereas all parties had things they probably should have said earlier, and in different ways. But I'll shut up and play dead author, now.

-I’ve read in several circles that Lavender Brown is a pureblood, but the evidence for it is mostly secondary or inferential (e.g. JKR’s “original forty” list, the fact that Lav stays at Hogwarts in seventh year). Which is fair, and I grant she was probably intended to be a pureblood in the books, but Terry Boot stays on, too, and he’s muggle-born in early drafts. So there's a nebulous amount of creative license going on in my interpretation. Plus, one can always invoke the ancient transformative author's rule of My City Now.

-More generally, I think that having Lavender be a muggle-born is a lot more interesting in the context of her rivalry with Hermione, both in this fic and in the books. Because like, Lavender is not an academic weapon. She doesn’t care about “earning” her place at Hogwarts, and plays shamelessly into the stigma about muggleborns being insipid and more interested in muggle culture than magic. And she doesn’t care! Lavender does not give a stone cold hoot what other people think of her. I think that adds a few interesting layers to how much Hermione dislikes her. Put bluntly, there’s a reason she doesn’t want people thinking they’re in the same club.

-I'm always tickled when someone in the comments guesses something that's going to happen, and it's even more impressive when they call it from, like, fifteen chapters out. Someone called a major arc in Book FIVE the other day, just as errant speculation, and I remember sitting there like :O. No spoilers, but damn.

-I am never not staggered by how kind you are in the comments. I have hoarded messages like little treasures, and when writer's block hits, I go through and read them, and it gets me through the next one thousand, two thousand, five thousand words like gasoline on flames. I'm so eager and determined to do right by you, and if you've left any comment on the past few chapters, I hope you get — well, I don't even have a good metaphor, this week, but I just want to give you a really nice thing!

-NEXT CHAPTER: "Come Seek Us Where Our Voices Sound." It contains a feature appearance from Mad-Eye Moody, Invisibility Cloak shenanigans, and a bath.

-See you there.

Come Seek Us Where Our Voices Sound

Chapter 45: Come Seek Us Where Our Voices Sound

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

“Herbert and Denise.”

Hermione paused. Given that she did so with one hand on the sugar bowl, poised to turn a perfectly good cup of tea into a bioweapon, he judged his intervention a mercy.

“Gesundheit,” she said.

“Those are your parents’ names.”

“Quite,” she said, after another pause. Her eyes darted between him and the sugar spoon.

“What? Aren’t they?”

“Yes,” she said. “I am aware of that.”

“Shield your eyes, lest her brilliance astound you—”

“Oh, sod off.”

“—and lest mine, for I am, in fact, aware that you know your own parents.”

He returned to his own tea. It was cool before she ventured anything further.

“Were you asking, or…?”

“No,” he said crisply, and reached for the kettle, point proved. She made a quiet, contemplative sound, watching him.

It had been five days since the fight.

Ron did not return to them, and it was felt. It was very unlike Draco's own brief estrangement from Hermione earlier that year, when wide new cavities of time in his schedule had testified to the unpleasant changes at hand: at least those had been obvious. No single activity disappeared from his life, but all took on a slightly uncanny feeling. Ron's absence was like coming up the stairs in the dark, misjudging their number, and planting one's foot with erroneous confidence on a shelf of empty air.

When they went to dinner it became more apparent. All of them now read while they ate. Draco brought Potions homework or a novel stolen from Hermione — recently, The Count of Monte Cristo, chosen because its volume could get him through a good number of meals — while Harry flipped through Draco's old copies of Quidditch for Seekers. This unnerved Hermione, who would have been reading anyway, but every so often would look up with a queer bereft expression, trying to tune into a conversation that didn't exist. More than one meal elapsed without talking.

Harry began coming to the library. This was good for his education and terrible for everyone else's.

His idea of studying, of course, involved nothing so pedestrian as reading textbooks or writing things down. He took out the assignment sheet, paced several circles around Draco and Hermione's study table, and then paged through the book like it was a magazine, screening for pictures. The 'studying' aspect, if indeed there was one, seemed to come later. When asked whether many of his papers wrote themselves via immaculate conception, he was baffled.

It was also bothersome. Draco didn't consider himself a tyrant, but he was accustomed to a modicum of quiet, which Harry's shuffling footsteps and muttered pleas for understanding both denied him. It took him twice as long as it should have to write an essay on the use of peppermint oil in Calming Draughts, because every two sentences, Harry cleared his throat or blew his nose or went to get some water. A lesser man would have fused his anklebones to the chair, but Draco had discipline, and moreover, he had pity: Ron hadn't spoken to Harry since the fight. Even sitting next to each other in the Potions classroom, while Snape sneered and mocked their pitiful cauldron of curdled Doxycide, they exchanged only terse monosyllables, and afterward Ron swept out to walk with Dean and Seamus.

"Have you spoken to him?" ventured Hermione. This was bold of her; she herself hadn't talked to Ron since the fight, either.

"No. And that's fine," said Harry, lying pathetically. "If he doesn't want to talk to me, that's fine. He can talk to whoever he wants. Hell, he can — he can go spend all his time with someone else. I can't stop him. He can do that. If he wants."

"If… he wants."

"Yeah. If he's that angry at us, or you, or maybe all of us, I can't do anything about it if he doesn't talk to me. Which is fine, I guess. And it seems like he's having a great time off by himself with Seamus and Dean, they were really laughing it up together in Charms, so I guess if that works out he doesn't have a reason to talk to you or me or Draco ever again, and that's fine! Really! Awesome! I guess."

Hermione came in unexpectedly gentle. "Of course he misses you," she said. "He loves you."

"He's got a funny way of showing it," he said tightly. "Running away. But that's fine! He can do that. If he wants."

Hilarity. It was patently obvious to all with eyes that if anyone in the world needed Ron Weasley, it was Harry. The proof was in the way he slouched along unhappily behind Draco and Hermione wherever they went, falling silent during conversations about, for example, the antiinflammatory properties of various poison antidotes and their corresponding concentrations of antihistamines. He was adamant that he wasn’t bored, and that they could talk about whatever they pleased, but it was difficult to make a point about vascular permeability with Harry sprouting new abandonment issues in the background.

On a day in late January, they came back from a depressingly literate luncheon and found a flood in the third-floor corridor that usually conveyed them to their Defense Against the Dark Arts lesson. A film of greenish water lay ankle-high over the dark stone. Draco, who rounded the corner first, drew up short, and Hermione bounced harmlessly off his back. Harry quickly sidestepped her — preened, slightly, at his dexterity — and then, not looking where he was going, slipped on a wet stone and tripped headfirst into the soup.

A gnarled hand thrust out of the darkness and caught him by the collar. Mad-Eye Moody materialized from an alcove and hoisted Harry up, lifting eight stone and change like a sack of sickles. He grunted and tossed him on the dry stone.

“Watch yourself, Potter.”

“Er — thank you, sir.”

“I see you don’t check your corners. Malfoy does, that’s why he’s not wringing bilgewater out of his robes. Also why he’s not like to be jumped. You want to be jumped, is that it, boy?”

“No, sir.”

“No? How about petrified? Stunned? Shot?”

“Not really, sir.”

“Then what are you going to do?”

“...Check my corners?”

“That’s right, you’re going to check your corners,” muttered Mad-Eye. His glass eye swiveled at Hermione. “And you, too, Granger, I didn’t see you taking too much time with them, either.”

“Sorry, sir.”

“Not as sorry as you will be, if you don’t,” he muttered. “Not as sorry as I’ll be, come to think of it. When you don’t. And you won’t. That’s my misfortune. Cruel man, Albus Dumbledore, come-and-serve he says, do I deny him, I do not… and here I am, all the same people, only different faces… should’ve torn it down when we had the chance… Schoolchildren for soldiers… infants for infantry… Never grow old, kiddies, you’ll have to watch your own life happen twice.”

Draco wondered what medication Mad-Eye had missed, and where to procure as much of it as possible, immediately.

“Soldiers, sir?” said Hermione faintly.

But Mad-Eye had apparently met his quota of cryptic disclosures for the day. He tucked his thumbs into his coat pockets. “No class today,” he barked. “Not till Filch gets this cleaned up. If any of you need a soak, in the meantime, use the prefects’ loo, it’s nearest. Password’s ‘pine fresh.’ Not,” he added, with a rare double-eyed stare at Harry, “that you should go spreading that around.”

“...No, sir.”

“Those passwords are for Hogwarts personnel only. Peeves happened to catch a certain Frenchwoman coming out of there the other night, some daft nitwit must’ve given her a password into the tunnels… Though she’ll not be hurrying back, after I found her,” Mad-Eye added, with some satisfaction. “If Maxime hadn’t pitched a fit, I would’ve confiscated that egg, too. No special treatment! That goes for you, too, Potter. I’ll not make any exceptions for you, if I catch you lurking about after hours, you understand?”

“No, sir,” said Harry fervently.

Mad-Eye grunted in satisfaction. On that note, he hobbled away, his wooden leg rasping against the slick floors.

Hermione had put a strand of hair to her mouth and was nibbling it, which showed she was entirely lost to thought, and her body was more or less an autopiloted vessel for the brain. Draco, sighing, took the elbow of said vessel and steered it along while the brain did its work.

“Every day,” he announced, “I wake up and am made to imagine situations. Terrible situations. Distasteful ones. Why is it that no one ever asks me to imagine pleasant, flattering situations? Why does no one ever say: ‘Picture yourself quidditch captain,’ or: ‘Say you have just been awarded the Order of Merlin.’ No one does this for me, and frankly, it rankles.”

“Can you picture yourself quiet?” said Hermione distractedly, and he glared at her.

“What situations?” said Harry. “Are you talking about Moody?”

“Those ears of yours can do more than hold up your glasses, Potter, and if you use them right you might just learn something.”

“My fault, I usually turn them off when you’re talking,” said Harry. “C’mon, prat, what did he say?”

Draco snorted. “He all but told us Delacour’s been shacking up with Roger Davies.”

“Wh— I mean, I guess, but — how do you know it’s with him, though?”

“Only prefects and quidditch captains have access to that bathroom,” murmured Hermione, “and Davies is both. Sorry, but could you two possibly— not to be rude—”

“Shut up?”

“Pipe down?” suggested Harry.

“Keep mum.”

“Put a sock in it.”

“If convenient.”

“Or if it isn’t,” suggested Draco.

“Yes, thanks,” she said, too distracted to be polite. He directed his smile at the ceiling, so it wouldn’t end up in her or Harry’s crosshairs by mistake.

He climbed the stairs in silence, exchanging an amused glance with Harry behind her head. It didn’t take more than one flight. When she reached the top stair she stopped, one foot in the air, and then spun around and seized each of them by a shoulder.

“The egg.”

“What?” said Harry, but Draco held up a finger.

“Professor Moody caught Fleur coming out of the prefects’ bathroom, and he wanted to confiscate the egg. If she was meeting Roger for a — a late-night rendezvous,” she said, turning a lovely shade of pink, “then why did she bring the egg with her? Unless he was helping her with it — which isn’t very likely, if you believe what Cho has to say about him — and Moody didn’t mention anything about Roger being there, anyway. So she must have been doing something in the bathroom with the egg.”

“But,” began Harry, and Draco held up a second finger.

“But what was she doing with it? Yes, Harry, that’s the question! Moody said we should use the prefects’ ‘if you want a soak,’ which doesn’t make sense, because the third floor bathrooms don’t have bathtubs. But the prefects’ bathroom must! And we know the egg opens when it’s covered in water, but Fleur’s more than capable of an Aguamenti, so there must be something different about the bath.”

“Oh,” said Harry, “you don’t think, maybe—”

Draco raised his third finger.

“The egg has to be submerged,” she said triumphantly. “And I think we have to be submerged with it.”

It was a testament to how time had changed him that Draco felt almost no apprehension stepping down from the portrait-hole after curfew.

The castle corridors, painted with the squirming shadows of low-burning torches, held no terror for him now. He had mastered far worse than what lay waiting for him in the darkness. It was with a calm, weathered sort of confidence that he didn’t even reach for his wand once he stood outside the portrait-door — untroubled by the creaking floorboards, at ease with the odd deep croons of the building’s magic resettling itself into the foundations. It was just a school, which when you got down to it was only another kind of home. Nothing inside the walls of Hogwarts Castle could frighten him.

And, in fairness, he wasn’t much worried about being caught, anyway. He held in one hand the Marauder’s Map, which showed the dots labeled ‘Filch’ and ‘Mrs. Norris’ both puttering safely around the dungeons. In the other, he carried the Invisibility Cloak, which he shook out while Harry and Hermione stepped down after him and eased the door shut. Hermione held the egg carefully under her arm like she had laid it herself.

“This isn’t going to fit the three of us,” he murmured. “It barely managed me and Granger during the First Task.”

Hermione cleared her throat. “Well, it was tangled,” she said. He glanced at her, and she promptly turned away from him to adjust the egg. “But anyway, you’re right. Harry, you two are about the same height, so why don’t you and Draco—?”

“I’m wider than Draco is,” said Harry apologetically, like his wingspan had been an inconsiderate personal decision. “It’s easier with the two of you.”

“Oh,” she said. “Well — it doesn’t have to — I mean, it would also work with you and me. Since Draco’s taller.”

“Well spotted,” said Draco curtly. It was a more than cozy arrangement, and she seemed rather eager to get in there with Harry. “And I’ll just fetch my own Invisibility Cloak, shall I?”

“It doesn’t matter who gets it! I don’t even need it, my Notice-Me-Not’s better than yours.”

“I don’t know whether to be impressed that your attempts at manipulation are improving or dismayed that this can be considered ‘improvement.’”

“What? It is.”

“If you two aren’t under the Cloak in the next ten seconds, I’m getting Filch myself,” said Harry doggedly.

There was a lull in negotiations.

“Pushy,” muttered Draco.

“Bossy,” whispered Hermione, which was the pot calling the cauldron tenebrous, really, but he wasn’t going to mention it.

She folded herself under the Cloak beside him, forced against his side by the shortage of fabric going to cover his head. It became apparent that no amount of personal space could be preserved if this was going to be effective, so with a short pained sigh he opened his arm and jerked her unceremoniously against his side, where she went with a small squeak.

“Draco!”

“What? I haven’t got fleas.”

“You might have warned me,” she muttered, fussing at the Cloak. Harry, who could not see them and could not have looked more grateful for it if he tried, had still turned his back for some reason.

Perhaps vengefully, she burrowed into his side, suffusing the whole side of him in tingling — it wasn’t discomfort, but a keen awareness of contact, of a human being in all her fidgety warmth. Locks of hair tickled his neck and the underside of his jaw — if he found one in his mouth later she was a dead witch — and perfumed the world in florals.

“Are you comfortable?”

“We lack enough time left in the millennium, Granger.”

“Fine, then, I won’t bother adjusting my elbow.”

“By all means. My kidneys have become quite fond of it.”

“I’m going to start walking,” announced Harry, “and you two can stay here and sort out your situation, or — mad idea — one of you can actually come help me. Just spitballing.”

“Well, look who has a timetable—”

“Honestly, Harry, it’s only eleven—”

“—would think he’d got another appointment—”

“—no need to be pushy about it, like you’d even know how to open it —”

“—little bit of patience, for crying out loud, the Task’s not happening at dawn.”

“Can’t hear you,” Harry said, “too busy walking,” and then they had to follow, or he wouldn’t hear them complaining.

The Marauder’s Map located the prefects’ bathroom behind a statue of Boris the Bewildered, a famous Seer who had discovered several new forms of divination by accident. A high stone door, thatched by a somber deadbolt, held a jewel at its capstone, and this glowed faintly green through the castle gloom.

“It’s ‘pine fresh,’” Hermione whispered.

Harry rolled his eyes. “Yes, Hermione, I remember,” he said. He turned to his side, as if to mutter something to Ron, but then remembered the other thing, and shoved his hands in his pockets.

A voice from down the hallway stopped them all cold. It was a low male baritone, interpolated irregularly with a much fainter tenor, like the two speakers were at odds.

“...for a fact it was drugged, if you so much as glanced at the toxicology report, which I know you didn’t—”

“But you would,” said the second voice pleasantly. “And I am afraid I fear inefficiency too greatly, these days, to ever risk redundancy. Tell me what it said, if you please.”

“It would tell you, Albus, that four hours later, that creature was still approximately one-third diazepam.”

“A state one envies more and more, throughout this conversation.”

“Are you listening to me? The beast was tampered with! Even you can’t ignore—”

“Ignorance is not a synonym for patience, Severus.”

“—signs everywhere! Someone has conspired to back Potter in the Tournament! An adult! Someone capable of manipulating the ancient charmwork of the Goblet, and very capable potioneer, if I had to guess.”

“Now, this is interesting. I recall your initial hypothesis was that he had cheated his way in himself, for vainglory. Have you developed an appreciation for his better nature?”

“I’ve developed an appreciation for hard evidence. He’s a feckless child, but he’s no great potioneer. When will you pull him out?”

“Assuming, arguendo, that the Ministry will not fire me for doing so?”

“Don’t run and hide behind the Ministry. It might work with Minerva, but it doesn’t with me.”

“You think me far stronger than I am. That always was your mistake.”

“I know who you are. Besides, Runcorn prays for Potter’s downfall. It isn’t him.”

“Albert Runcorn is not the sole voice of the Ministry of Magic. Nor is he the most salient one, in the case of Hogwarts… you must trust me above perhaps all men, Severus, to know how very weak those at the heart of power are to wield it. We must act through the hands of lesser wizards, and lend them our judgment and trust, while they offer in return their freedom and strength…”

“Then where is your judgment and trust for me?” Snape’s voice was harsh and low. “If you will not heed me, direct me. How am I to answer Karkaroff?”

“Cautiously.” Dumbledore’s voice swelled around the corner. Hermione gasped and tried to duck behind the statue of Boris — forgetting, as was the perennial danger, that they were invisible — nearly tearing the Cloak from their shoulders. Draco hissed, wrapped an arm around her, and hauled her against him to keep her still. She wriggled and then fell slack, her chest rising and falling riotously under his arm.

Harry, however, had no such protection. He dove behind the statue, but the noise sent echoes skittering around the corridor. Dumbledore and Snape paused and turned to look. Snape's eyes narrowed, and he lifted his wand.

"Lumos."

Light blazed through the hall like a tiny sun, stinging the eye. The trouble with the Cloak was how hard it was to believe, on the inside, that you were hidden; it seemed impossible that Snape's dark little eyes didn't see right into him and Hermione, tangled together in plain sight, with only a thin layer of silk to shield them.

Hermione's heart was doing a scherzo against his arm. She had ceased breathing. Her hand found his wrist, somewhere around her hipbone, and squeezed. He exhaled hard into the thatch of curls against her neck, and her whole spine shuddered.

"Who's there?"

"It is an old castle," Dumbledore said mildly. "It would be more suspicious if there were no strange noises, from time to time; in my experience a silent building is far more dangerous than a loud one."

"Be that as it may," said Snape, and his lips crooked in unpleasant anticipation. "Locomotor Boris."

The statue trembled and then rose from its pedestal. Harry gave a slight groan and screwed his eyes shut as light washed the back of his head.

"Potter!"

Harry sighed, and with a graceful motion of his knees, he rose to face the music.

“Evening, professors.”

“Harry,” said Dumbledore warmly. “It is an unexpected pleasure.”

“You know, professor, I really wish it was.”

“Explain yourself,” snarled Snape. The statue of Boris dropped back down with a shuddering thunk.

Draco caught Harry’s sidelong glance. He almost mouthed ‘say something’ before he remembered Harry couldn’t see him.

“...Reckon I fancied a walk.”

“What?”

“You know,” he said. “Stargazing. Good for insomnia.”

Dumbledore was clearly repressing a much broader smile. “I’m afraid the rules do not recognize an exception for celestial contemplation,” he said, “no matter how much you and I might wish it. You should be in Gryffindor Tower.”

“Funny thing, professor, I was just on my way back. So if you’ll actually excuse me—”

“Wait.” Snape’s order froze Harry in his tracks. “Who else is with you?”

“No one,” he said immediately.

“You expect us to believe you came here by yourself?” Snape swept his wand around the chamber. “Where is your stalwart entourage? Where is Weasley?”

Harry shrugged.

“Answer me.”

“Ask him,” said Harry, mimicking the tone. Draco suppressed a snarl of frustration. “If you can find him, that is.”

“I see from your tone that you have already reconciled yourself to a well-earned detention.”

“I’ve reconciled myself to a detention,” he said. “I think I’m still working on earning it.”

Dumbledore lightly placed his fingers over his mouth, but the bundles of his cheeks were too high for him not to be smiling.

“Harry, why don’t you go back to bed?” he suggested gently. “We will see to your detention on Monday. In the meantime, I trust you can find your way back to Gryffindor Tower in the dark. Professor Snape and I have an appointment.”

“The meeting will wait,” Snape gritted out.

“Not happily,” said Dumbledore. “Surely you trust Harry to find his way.”

“It is not his sense of direction which I fear will lead him astray.”

Harry, ever the fair one, dipped his head to acknowledge a valid point.

Dumbledore sighed. “Then see him back to Gryffindor. But punctuality, and I mean this, is of the essence—”

“Fear not. I will be quite scrupulous.”

His tone shaved the adjective of all positive connotations.

Snape clamped a hand on Harry’s shoulder and steered him out with a grip that Draco knew, from personal experience, would remember itself with a bruise. Dumbledore watched them go, gave a quiet sigh to himself, and sent another glance at the chamber. A prickle of cold ghosted over Draco’s neck as the shock-blue eyes passed across his face — the Cloak held fast, so he must have imagined their lingering — and then wandered away, as did their owner, into the darkness.

In the silence that ensued, he heard only his heartbeat and Hermione's, which beat into his arm like a tattoo.

Belatedly, he noticed she was pushing against his arm. She was trying to get out. He still had her pinned to him. He'd — he'd not forgotten, but acclimated to it, so that he hadn't remembered she couldn't — well — leave.

He tore his hand away and stepped hastily free of her, throwing the Cloak from his shoulders.

"Finally," she gasped. "My lungs were about to explode. I thought we were cooked."

"—want to say straight away that it was an emergency procedure, Granger, I obviously didn't — we were what?"

"Cooked? Oh. Muggle thing, I suppose. Poor Harry, I feel so bad for him. And if he'd only been under the Cloak. But I don't know what else we were to do. One of these days, you and I should really figure out Disillusionment Charms — anyway, do you still want to go in?"

"So that his sacrifice might not be in vain?"

"Dulce et decorum est," she suggested, and he snickered, before realizing what he'd done, and sent a Muffling Charm racing after the echoes of his stupidity that went scampering into the dark.

A murmur of "pine fresh" sent the deadbolt rattling back, and the door creaked ajar.

His immediate reaction was of overwhelming adequacy. It was a nice bathroom. Big, pretty roomy, nice taps. The master suite at the Manor was better, but at least this one had a bath, which was more than could be said of the Gryffindor showers. He'd make a point to revisit in the future.

"I love Hogwarts," said Hermione softly.

That surprised him. He'd expected something more practical, a remark about ventilation, perhaps, or the high risk of slippage on the tile. But she gazed at the room with such starry unadulterated wonder that he thought he'd perhaps missed something in it, and turned back to look. At first he was amused, because it was just a bathroom, but by and by he came around to a certain reluctant aesthetic appreciation: it was a nice room, really, when you thought about it. The ceiling and walls were dappled with the buttery light of a candle-laden chandelier, and under this soft glow the marble floors were toasted yellow, with shadows burnt into the crown moldings. A wide sunken bath at the center was terraced in a hundred bejeweled taps, each inscribed with a different rune for scent, and a row of sculpted marble nereids along the wall offered stone armfuls of soaps, perfumes, and lotions of every possible variety. Across a triptych of stained glass windows, velvet curtains the color and consistency of whipped cream swirled their skirts shyly under a tickle of cool air.

"It's alright," he remarked. "Bit drafty."

She flicked her eyes at the ceiling, once, with a totally unfair and unexplained implication of ridicule, and then set down the egg. "I suppose 'hot' and 'cold' would be too pedestrian," she said, squinting at the runes. "I'm not up to date on herbs and flowers. Is that a melon? And that's cinnamon, I think… I'll just do them all, it's faster."

"By all means, if you want this room to smell like a bomb went off in a Chanel warehouse."

"I'm surprised you know what Chanel is. Aren't brands 'dismally middle-class'?"

"Well, I'm something of a prole, myself."

She laughed and went down the row, switching on a few at random. One spurted thick ropes of foam, while another poured a braid of purple rapids into the basin, and fluffy lavender cumulus clouds drifted off the water's back. The combination of colors and scents swirled together in a nacreous film at the bottom of the marble bowl, welling under snowdrifts of opalescent bubbles and cotton-candy colored foam, which rose in childish towers and buffets around the edges. When the pool at last brimmed with hot, iridescent water, and the room was cloaked in hot, overpoweringly fragrant steam, they shut off all the taps and stood together at the water's edge.

Hermione looked at the egg. She looked at the bath. She said, "Hm."

"What?"

"I didn't think about this," she said. "I didn't even think to think about this. I suppose… you wouldn't want to go stand outside, would you?"

"Oh, yes, and let me just go get my livery while I'm at it."

"A simple 'no' would have sufficed," she said balefully. Then she squared her shoulders, stuck the egg on the ground, stuck her courage to its sticking place, and said: "Well. Turn around."

In an egregious tactical error, he failed to do what she said. Instead, he glanced over and found that she had bent down to peel off her socks. These she layered neatly on top of her shoes, because of course she did, and stepped barefoot onto the cold tile, toes curling. Even then, he was such a contemptible idiot that it wasn't until she tugged out her tie — Merlin — and undid the top button of her shirt — Merlin's fucking blood — that something in his wretched thick head woke up and slammed a lever, making him spin around on his heel, face burning.

"What are you doing?"

"Well-for-heaven's-sake-what-does-it-look-like-I'm-doing!" Her voice was shrill. "It's a bath! What did you think we were going to do!"

“You might warn a fellow!”

“I told you to turn around!”

“You didn’t say ‘turn around, Draco, I’m about to put on a one-woman burlesque’—”

“Burlesque! Honestly!”

His brain was replaying the part where she’d reached for her button. He closed his eyes in the hope it might help. It didn’t. With his eyes closed he could focus on nothing but the small rustles of fabric coming from behind him as she undressed. Did people undressing always cause so much noise?

“This was ill-conceived,” he said thickly. “Potter and I should have gone it alone.”

“Oh, very nice,” she snapped, “and leave me out, just because I’m a girl? It’s not my fault you’ve got ridiculous hangups about a woman’s body.”

He desperately needed her to stop saying words like ‘woman’s body.’ “I haven’t got hangups!”

Too high. Far too high. Needed to talk in a lower voice, project calm. Didn’t have any. Needed to find some. In these environs it was a non-native species.

“You sure sound like it,” she said skeptically, and his irritation was an excellent distraction from the embarrassment. Hard to feel any kind of way about someone being naked when you wanted to get a handful of their hair and tug. No. “Sometimes I forget how traditional you are. I’ve still got my pants on, you know. It’s hardly any more skin than a muggle bathing suit.”

“That doesn’t — it’s the principle of the thing.”

“Of what? Seeing a woman’s shoulders? Will they throw you out of parties?”

“I’ve seen your shoulders,” he said informatively, which was not a riposte that sizzled. “It’s not about that. It’s about propriety. It’s — not done.”

“Well,” she said, a trifle sly, “obviously it’s done some- times, or you wouldn’t exist.”

“Granger!”

She laughed, either at her own joke or his tone or both, and there was a small splash.

He found the door where the thoughts were coming from. He slammed it. He deadbolted it. He piled it high with chairs and thoughts of an amorous Severus Snape. It held for a hearty nine seconds.

“You can turn around,” she said. She sounded not quite so confident as she had been before. “The bubbles cover mostly everything.”

“I beseech you to remove all ambiguity surrounding the word ‘mostly.’”

“Oh, please. I’m not going to flash you.” That went straight into the mental lockbox with woman’s body and hair-pulling. He was going to need a bigger box. And a bigger lock. “All you can see is my head.”

He forced a neutral face and turned around. She hadn’t been lying, although she’d neglected to mention he could see her shoulders, rising from the water in burnished crescents, her skin shiny and stark against the white straps. She had tied up her hair to keep it dry, but pieces of it had tumbled loose and floated in a dark shawl around her shoulders, buoyant on the white bed of foam, wet to the shiny brownish-black of wood stain at the tips. The steam had turned her skin rosy and damp.

“See?” she said meaningfully. She swam forward, parting the drifts of foam with an efficient sweep of her arms. “It’s deep. You can’t see anything.”

“Mmhm.”

“In fact there’s a part that’s deeper, if you’re anxious for space. Or propriety.”

“Mmhm.”

“Draco, for goodness’ sake, if you actually want to go outside—”

“No. I — fine.”

He sighed and stripped off both shirt and jumper with a wrench at the back of his neck. They went in a pile beside her shoes, and she made a noise like a bit of tinsel had an interaction with a paper shredder.

“What now?”

“You might warn me first!” But she hadn’t turned around. She was staring at his chest as if he’d spilled something on it; he checked, but it was clean. “Instead of just stripping!”

“There’s nothing to show,” he said, mystified, which wasn’t quite true — he had the beginnings of a rather nice chest, if he did say so — but as far as modesty was concerned, he showed more skin at quidditch practices. A shortage of shower stalls and an excess of impatient teammates tended to desensitize one to the male form. Katie Bell had seen his nude arse more often than his mother, at this point, and treated it with no more interest than a decorative sconce. Harry’s arse had become something of a team mascot. “You can close your eyes, if you’d prefer.”

“There’s — a double-standard at work here,” she said, in a strange airy voice, as he divested himself of shoes, socks, and trousers. He kept his pants on, and after a moment of thought, he slipped the signet ring off his finger and tossed it on top of his jumper. The stone landed on a cushion of cashmere and rolled upright, the engraved stone face-up and glinting in the soft candlelight.

“Feel free to close your eyes at any time,” he said, raising his eyebrows at her, and she turned such a radiant shade of pink that she could have blinded a sunrise.

Snickering, he slipped into the water.

It was deep, and hot, and his muscles sang from a relief long denied them. The bath was so wide that he could swim freely under the towers of phosphorescent bubbles and foam. He did a neat dive to the bottom of the pool, swam the length of it, and popped up at the other side. Hermione, treading water, twisted around to find him.

“You’re fast!”

“I ought to be. My mother didn’t go to the trouble of hiring a nereid just so I could dog-paddle.”

“Nereids are real?” She was caught between her natural skepticism and her fervent desire for him not to be lying, which was the best spot to have her.

“Never so much as when they’re harrying you around a swimming pool with a trident,” he agreed.

“And why was she doing that?”

“Pedagogy. Swimming is one of the cardinal talents, you know, dating back to the pre-Merlin Era. There was a time no wizard could call himself a man unless he’d mastered the arts of swimming, dancing, and French.”

“You’re joking.”

“Yes. The Manor has a lake.”

He dropped to the bottom, pushed off, and ribboned through the water. When he surfaced, he slicked some of his hair out of his eyes and deposited himself on a stone bench that ridged the wall of the bath. The egg sat in a small cradle formed by their clothes, and he had to hoist himself up on the elbows to get it, a taut assertion of his core muscles that drew him half-out of the water.

“Alright. Want to try this on, Granger?”

She said nothing. He twisted back into the water and found her transfixed by the middle distance between them as if it held a trove of profound and unsettling secrets. He snapped his fingers.

“Hello? We’re not here for a soak, remember?”

“What? Yes. Let’s hurry.” She was passionate, which showed she hadn’t lost her wits entirely. She tucked her hair around both ears and paddled forward bravely, her expression determined. Gryffindor to the last, was Hermione. Give her a biopsy, they’d probably find a lion carved on the inside of her ribcage.

He submerged the egg and twisted the clasp. It sprang open, and they both cringed away in anticipation of a sound that did not come: instead, a gurgling melody floated up, insulated by foam, muffled by the burble of water and the laving of waves against the tile.

Hermione gave a triumphant shriek. “Ha!”

“Ah, no,” he said, nearly giddy with success, “there’ll be no living with her, now.”

“I told you! I got it, didn’t I? I was right!”

“Don’t give away too much credit.”

“I’m good! I’m clever, admit it! Admit I’m clever, and I figured it out.” She bounced closer to him in the water, sending lips of foam lapping at his chest. Her face was a gloriously insufferable beacon of pride.

She could be a terribly haughty little thing, Hermione, and he liked it rather a lot.

“Yes, you’re clever,” he said. “You figured it out. Have a shout about it, go on.”

“Seventh year runes! And as a fourth year! Without help!”

“Right, none. Alone in the world, that’s you. A solitary savant.”

“Except for you,” she said, after an offensive pause. “Obviously. I mean, I did figure out the clasp. And the submersion—”

“Yes, and how many legs of yours did a dragon flambeé? If we’re doing a comprehensive accounting.”

“I didn’t mean you didn’t help!”

“Oh, I helped, did I. Thank you, Professor Granger, for the credit, I feel ever so appreciated.”

She rolled her eyes and swam closer, peering at the green glimmer under the foam. “I can’t make it out, though,” she said curiously. “Can you?”

“No. I expect we’ve got to put our heads below.”

“Right. Together, then?”

“On three?”

“One—”

“Two—”

They gasped and sank together below the waves.

Water rushed into his ears and blanketed the world. Under the foam the bath was eerie and quiet, like a marble chamber roofed in white clouds, webbed with shivering green light. The egg shone verdantly from the nub at its center. From its depths echoed a high, discordant choir of voices, and they were singing a song.

Come seek us where our voices sound

We cannot sing above the ground

And while you're searching, ponder this

We've taken what you'll sorely miss

An hour long you'll have to look

To recover what we took.

It took two listens to make out where the verse ended and began. By then his lungs had started to itch for air, and diamond chains of bubbles rose from his nose. Hermione had already once resurfaced and come back down. Her face shone from the egg's refracted glow.

In the water, everything was blurry. Her hair wreathed her head like a drop of diluted ink. Her bare arms and legs floated unmoored from the ground, less freckled than they had been in summer, save for a dusty scattering around her shoulders; and there was a long, bleach-pale plain of skin between the hem of her brassiere and the top of her waistband, soft and fair where the sun never touched. She had a birthmark on the swell of her left hip, just a tiny brown smudge like the print of a thumb, and he watched helplessly as that information went searing into the depths of his long-term memory, never to be removed.

She shook some hair out of her face, a slow, artless movement that sent billows of it rippling behind her head. Then she swam closer, until she was floating over the egg, and tendrils of her hair coiled in feathery loops around his shoulders, like soft strands of kelp. She was very close. One of her ankles accidentally bumped and collided with his knee. He whisked it away, but she didn't seem to notice. She was staring at the egg with her hands knotted over her mouth in concentration, face furrowed in intense and oblivious problem-solving that meant he could have stripped off his trunks and Transfigured them into a flying carpet without disturbing her. His skin was covered in prickling heat from the bath and his head was full of warm thick silence.

Abruptly she drew her hands away from her mouth and slid them over his. He had a heart attack.

Subsequently he realized he had not had an actual heart attack, merely something that felt like one, and disgorged an unwise volume of his remaining air. Oxygen deprivation had left his cognitive acuity rather under par. That was probably why he instinctively twitched his hands outward, into hers — assuming, reasonably, based on available data and a total lack of communication — that she wanted them.

His knuckles dragged against her soft pruney fingers, almost frictionless. Tingles followed across the back of his hands, distantly pleasant, almost unnoticeable. The egg slipped through his open hands and drifted to the bottom. He turned his cheek into the soft stroke of her hair, feeling his heartbeat kick down slow and hard in the base of his ribs.

She twitched her head up at him, squinting, and cracked a smile. Then pearly balloons of air bubbled out of her smile: she was laughing. And, still laughing, she dropped his hands and dove to the bottom of the pool, where she scooped up the egg — i.e., the thing she had wanted the entire time, as was obvious to anyone who wasn't an absolute goddamn dribbling moron, and he instantly began working on plans to kill himself.

He slammed his heel against the floor and rocketed to the surface.

Hermione surfaced a good few seconds after him, filled her lungs, and went immediately back down for another listen. She repeated this procedure several times. He was glad of it, because it gave him a few minutes to plant himself firmly on the other side of the pool, fill his chest with cold air, and figure out what the hell was wrong with his brain.

It was time to admit there was a problem. He could no longer depend on his own senses of perception. His first instinct was head injury, but the more likely option was enchantment. He ought to ask Daphne to see her Healer. At the very least, she could tell him if lobotomies required parental consent.

With a splash, Hermione breached for a final time and took three quick gasps of air. “It’s mermaids,” she panted. She hauled a curtain of hair out of her face and shoved it distractedly over her shoulder. “The Task is mermaids.”

“Obviously,” he said unevenly, though it wasn’t. He hadn’t thought about the bloody riddle at all. He still felt shaky and unsettled, and acting snide made him feel better. “You needed six verses to get that much?”

“No. I memorized it.” She snapped the egg closed and hocked it carelessly over the side of the pool. “It’s all laid out. Some riddle! ‘We cannot sing above the ground’ — that’s Mermish, of course, famously untranslatable, it wasn’t until the invention of the Bubble-Head Charm that anyone knew mermaids were even Beings because their voices are enchanted and need water as a medium—”

“Slow down. Binns isn’t lurking in the shadows with a gradebook.”

She didn’t, and blazed on with full steam. “But that doesn’t matter, of course, you’re right. ‘Where our voices sound’ has to be the lake. ‘An hour’ is self-explanatory, so is ‘recover,’ he’ll have an hour to retrieve something hidden. But ‘what you’ll sorely miss’? That could be anything. It could be a trinket, or a personal item, or even their wands… dreadfully vague, but I suppose it isn’t important, because the real thing is to get Harry prepared for whatever’s under the lake. Mermaids aren’t aggressive but they’re notoriously territorial, especially against wizards, and I don’t suppose they’ll take kindly to a bunch of students barging in and trying to take something... and I don’t know about you, but I’ve heard really nasty rumors, Lupin had a whole unit on grindylows—”

“Potter can handle the grindylows fine. That was the one class he ever paid attention in. I’m still hung up on how to keep him aspirating. He can’t do a Bubble-Head Charm, remember?”

“But we’ve solved that, he’s just got to practice.”

“That would be a waste of his time, to say nothing of ours,” he said grimly. “The time has come to accept what we’re working with. Even if he does manage to cast it, he would have to sustain concentration the whole time he’s underwater, on the understanding that if it breaks, he’ll drown—”

“Harry’s not totally useless, you know. I do think sometimes we haven’t been fair to him.”

“—and as someone who might, hypothetically, harbor some fondness for the sorry git, I am exercising a hard veto on any plan that requires Potter to concentrate on anything.” He paused. “Anyway, there are other ways to breathe underwater.”

She raised an eyebrow. “Such as?”

“...I don’t know, but there’s got to be some.”

“Oh, very helpful—”

“Listen, wizards have been faffing about for thousands of years. It is probabilistically impossible that we haven’t come up with more than one method for subaquatic immersion. We’ve just got to find one that doesn’t require concentration.”

“And one that we can do,” she reminded him stubbornly. “Or teach Harry to do. In a month.”

“Yes.”

“Easy.”

“We’ve done more with less.”

Her lips quirked. “Bootleg Polyjuice?”

“Three-headed dogs. Sodium lamps. Et cetera.”

The quirk doubled and spread. “I’d forgotten that,” she said. “That was years ago now. In the Vault, wasn’t it?”

“Yes, though I’m aghast that you apparently thought so little of my brilliance. I’ll have you know that was a fine moment for me.”

“No, it was very good. I admit it. I wouldn’t have thought to check the flames themselves, I would’ve spent all my time fussing with the clues.” She smiled at him through a sappy fug of memoria, bringing heat to his cheeks. “It was the first time I realized you were clever,” she said. “Properly clever, I mean. Like — well.”

“No, go on and say it.”

“Fine! Like me.”

“Humility, thy name is Granger.”

“I was impressed! That’s all! I was little and stupid and I’d somehow concluded that I was the only eleven-year-old on the planet who liked to read, and here you come, and you impressed me.” She laughed a little. “And then I wrote you about a hundred letters that summer, I think, trying to impress you back—”

“That’s what those were?”

“Yes. Why are you looking at me like that? Honestly, did you think I cared that much about the properties of hinkypunk vapor?”

“I read a book on that for you!” He was indignant. “I thought it would be on next year’s exams! I thought I’d fallen behind!”

“I was showing off,” she said, amused and a bit startled, like she thought it obvious. Had it been? He couldn’t remember. He’d been a bit caught up, himself, in the prospect of having someone to write letters to. “You were the smartest person my own age I’d ever met. I wanted you to like me.”

“I did like you.” It was a bit strange to say it out loud, like it was a remark on the weather, but it was true, and anyway, it was pointless to play his cards close to the chest, at this point. The kneazle was out of the bag. The kneazle had been out of the bag for so long that it had forgotten the bag altogether, roamed to new pastures, and started a dynasty that was now several generations bag-free. He couldn’t very well admit to liking anybody, if not her.

That made her beam. Sometimes it was bafflingly easy to satisfy her. She really ought to have higher standards than — what, a smile? The admission that he, having risked death a multiplicity of times at her side, did not disdain her company? Merlin, maybe she did need better friends.

“I liked you, too,” she said. She paused and blinked hurriedly. “I mean, you were my friend. Are. My friend. As in, you are my friend. Still. Like then — but now.”

“Are you having a stroke?”

“Quite possibly. Permission to change the subject?”

“Enthusiastically granted.”

“The water is getting cold.”

It was. The surface area of the pool was so great that it actually held heat quite poorly, besides which it was surely near midnight and Harry would be waiting for them in Gryffindor Tower, to hear what they had found out. They ought to be heading back.

He suggested as much, and she agreed. A hop brought him out of the pool, and he padded over to the muddle of his clothes, where he withdrew his wand and Summoned a towel from the annals of the room. He coursed it roughly over his hair and shoulders, used a Drying Charm for his trunks, and dressed quickly, shivering in the damp air of the vaulted chamber. A heat prickled at his back, but when he glanced over his shoulder, Hermione had turned away from him and stared pointedly at the far wall.

“Are you finished?”

“Nearly. I didn’t ask you to turn around, you know.” He abandoned the tie and jumper, from laziness, and left his collar unbuttoned. The cufflinks he ignored, and merely rolled the sleeves up to his elbows to avoid the appearance of complete slobbery.

“I know you didn’t ask,” she said, “but I realized you shouldn’t have to ask for a bit of privacy when you’re dressing, it’s common decency, and it’s no more than you did for me, and anyway, maybe I’m modest, did you think of that?”

She hadn’t been when he was getting in, but that particular can had ‘WORMS’ written in big red print all over it.

“Now you turn around, for me,” she said nervously.

He did.

“You know, it’s nothing I haven’t seen,” he said, for apparently no sodding reason at all, except possibly a sublimated death wish.

“What?”

“I meant earlier, underwater, and anyway you’re the one who said you’re in a muggle’s idea of wading gear—”

“That’s different,” she said, scandalized. “It’ll be all see-through when I get out.”

“Oh,” he said.

The ceiling was an exceptional work of architecture. The Founders really outdid themselves. Not one missing bit of ornamentation, not one tile out of place. If anyone wanted proof, they could consult Draco, who had personally checked them all.

“...Draco? Draco.”

“Good evening.”

“I’m decent,” she said, though he gave her a few extra seconds, just to be sure. When he turned, she had every scrap of clothing firmly and properly affixed to her body, and was winding her hair into a high bun over her head. “You’ve got the Cloak, haven’t you?”

Merlin’s tits. He’d forgotten that they had to get back to Gryffindor Tower. Under the Cloak. The same way they’d come.

“It’s fairly late. I doubt anyone’s holding a soirée in the hallways.”

“Filch is still on patrol, prefect rounds are still going, and we just watched Harry get caught by a teacher.”

“We’ve got the Map, remember.”

“The Map doesn’t show ghosts or Peeves. And knowing someone’s coming won’t help if we can’t find somewhere to hide.” She paused. “But I suppose, if you’re not comfortable—”

“That’s not it. I mean, it’s not, to be honest with you, but I don’t have any reservations about that.”

“Good, then,” she said after a moment. She gave a short, businesslike nod, and smoothed her skirts. “We’ll be quick. And, er—I promise not to tell Daphne.” She gave him a queasy smile.

“Why the devil would she care?”

But Hermione had already hurried away to drain the pool, and the sound of gurgling water drowned him out.

She insisted on getting the Cloak situated before they left the bathroom, which meant a lot of fidgeting and muttering and swearing and stepping on toes, mostly Draco’s, but no amount of engineering could produce a permutation of limbs that didn’t leave her veritably squished up against his side. That was fine. He was resigned to it, or would have been, if it didn’t mean her hair was wedged up against his neck like an ice-cold wreath of wire, making him yelp and squirm away wherever she brushed her head against him.

“Ow!”

“For goodness’ sake— sorry, but you keep wriggling around!”

“That’s because you’ve got a pile of sodding icicles on your head—”

“It’s hair, I’m sorry it doesn’t magically dry out when it touches a towel, but not all of us cut it short! Believe me, it’s on my head, it’s no more fun for me than you!”

“Why don’t you use a Drying Charm?”

A suspicious silence. Something was muttered so low that even in very close quarters he couldn’t hear it, which meant he was about to dine out.

“No, tell us, go on,” he said gleefully.

“It makes it frizzy,” she said sulkily. “Okay? Are you happy? I used to use them every day, until Lavender mentioned that Drying Charms make your hair frizz up, and I didn’t — know that, before. And my hair is frizzy, most days, as I’m sure you and everyone have noticed.”

“...And you… attributed that quality… to the Drying Charms.”

“Do you know, Flitwick said my Freezing Spell was exceptional? The best in years, he said.”

“Truce,” he said, but he was so close to laughing she could hear it in his voice, and she fumbled for her wand. “I — no, stop — Granger, don’t—”

He ducked away from her, laughing, as she sent a whistling bolt of cold over his shoulder. “I just meant to suggest that an eleven-year-old’s Drying Charm is probably not quite so — stop — sophisticated as it could be, and given the likelihood of confounding variables—”

“Singularly frigid, he said!”

“—I am making a number of purely hypothetical statements about the scientific method, and therefore cannot be blamed for them. And Brown is wrong, anyway, I use Drying Charms every day, and my hair’s fantastic.”

“It is,” she muttered vengefully, as if she thought this deserved capital punishment.

“So — and don’t jinx me, you little creature, or you’re going straight back in the bath — I’ll show you how to do one. If you’re nice.”

She eyed him doubtfully, but lowered her wand and her head in begrudging assent. Still snickering to himself, he drew his wand and stepped close.

The trick to a good Drying Charm was not to go quickly. Flash-drying your follicles in a bath of heat would leave them fussy and shriveled, which created the aforementioned woebegone frizz. He activated the charm with a murmur, and drew it in a slow halo around her head. At the touch of magic, the strands lifted and lightened to the same lustrous chestnut color it always turned in winter.

Which was sort of an odd thing to notice, wasn’t it. He couldn’t have described how Ron’s hair changed in winter, for instance. Let alone identify a unique adjective for it. His mental account began and ended at ‘red.’

He needed to have his head checked.

“That’ll do,” he remarked, once the charm had erased all but some lingering dampness at the ends and roots. He flicked his wand to put it out and put it back in its sheath, where lingering warmth on the tip pressed into his thigh. “Leave some to dry on its own, you don’t want to overdo it.”

She said nothing.

He looked down at her. “Did you hear me?”

She was standing so close the tips of their feet could touch, staring evenly at his throat, to let him reach the crown of her head. It put her eyes on level with the loose buttons of his collar, and belatedly he felt a bit self-conscious about them; he hadn’t thought they’d be getting any particular scrutiny. He probably looked like some sort of scurrilous ragamuffin.

When she turned her face up it startled him, a little, because she didn’t move away. There was a sort of fogginess in her eyes that made him fret he’d bungled the charm and Confounded her, only she was frowning. Or not frowning, exactly — anxious, perhaps, was a better word. Despairing? Not pleased, at any rate.

“Granger?”

“Yes. I heard you. Sorry. Thank you. Have you got the Cloak?”

She was rather more clipped than he thought he deserved, considering he’d done her a favor. This taciturnity did not dissipate with time, and, if anything, got worse. As they fumbled back under the Cloak, she remained stiff and uncooperative to adjustment, moving only when asked, and when they at last made it out of that damnable bathroom, she said very little on the way back to Gryffindor Tower except to remark about something on the Map, or remind him of a secret passageway that could shorten the journey.

He had no idea whatsoever what she was about.

The Pink Lady yawned and lilted lazily ajar upon receipt of the password, barely lucid enough to recognize it. It was midnight now, and the hour-bell was tolling twelve, sending its chilly moans all through the dark stone vaults of the castle. The torches guttered low, and from the common room beyond, there was only the faintest glimmer of firelight around the bend in the portrait-hole. Impossible to tell if Harry was there, or if he'd gone to sleep.

From courtesy, he offered his hand to her to climb up. It was a bit of a high step, especially for shorter legs. He'd done the same for half of Gryffindor House, including Ginny Weasley, Angelina Johnson, and Katie Bell, each of whom would gladly pop his nose flat, the muggle way, if he tried it on with them.

But Hermione glanced at him with wide-eyed unease, as if his hand were covered in neurotoxin, and hurriedly clambered up by herself. His hand floated there for a moment in stunned repose as she muttered something about having perfectly functional legs.

As he watched her vanish into the portrait-hole, reeling from what felt, against reason, like a subtle blow to pride, he nevertheless assured himself that it would be alright. He put himself to bed repeating this assurance: that a night's rest would dispel whatever delusions of sentiment a long day's turmoil had brought, and that daylight, that old harbinger of normalcy, would restore equilibrium.

He woke the next morning from a dream about soft wet skin and dark wet hair. And he admitted, with his burning face in his hands, that the problem had officially worsened beyond his capacity to ignore.

-It's angst, it's drama, it's... BY GOD IT'S ANOTHER UPDATE WITH A STEEL CHAIR!

-So, my justification for the double-hitter is that, one, I was literally considering a second update this week as soon as I hit Publish on the last chapter. I thought, "Hm, that ended on a downer, a chaser might be nice." And then not one but two people in the comments suggested it. And then I had a really good writing week, and finished TWO chapters of Book 5. And it wasn't any single element, but the rare confluence of all three factors made me think: hey. Drop 30,000 words in 8 days. Do it.

-draco, upon having a single physically awkward interaction with his crush: interesting. i'm going to kill myself. (been there!)

-One of the joys of writing from Draco's POV is that I get a live feed into his brain for every moment; one of the great sadnesses is that I don't get one into Hermione's. The sort of nostalgic conversations that they have in this chapter, about the Vault and second year summer, are real indulgences for me because I can sort of wink behind the curtain as to what was happening in Hermione's head during that time.

-Next chapter will go up on Friday, as usual. It will include a feature appearance by Daphne Greengrass, a terrifying conference with Draco's godfather, Speculations Concerning The Whereabouts Of Narcissa Black, and a special field trip to the Slytherin common room.

-Naturally, there's a ton of threads still hanging from Ch.44, and I will continue to tangle those up in my mean little hands for a while more at least. But the important thing is [avengers endgame title card] RON WEASLEY WILL RETURN...

-Thank you, thank you, thank you, for commenting. My God. I hope your Monday is wonderful, and contains a rare and beautiful bird.

We Cannot Sing Above the Ground

Chapter 47: We Cannot Sing Above the Ground

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Flitwick had them doing Banishment Charms, which was sorely needed stress relief. While each student had received a cushion on which to practice, it was almost impossible to enforce this rule against the base human appreciation for how very fun it was to hurl random objects as far as you possibly could. Only Hermione had calmly and perfectly returned her cushion to its bullseye, time and again, while Draco invented new ways to flick things at her without Professor Flitwick noticing. (This was not hard, since Neville had a tendency to miss his cushion and hit other, heavier objects, e.g., Professor Flitwick.)

When the fourth eraser bounced off the back of her head, she finally whirled around and hissed a Stinging Jinx at him, which he deflected harmlessly and smirked at her.

“Stop it! Prat!”

“Hm? Did you feel something?”

When she glared at him, it made her eyes into little dark wells of passion. She screwed up her whole face and did a thing with her mouth, like that one angry woman in the Caravaggio. It was lovely. It was also the first time she’d spoken to him with anything but monosyllables since last night, and frankly, it was a relief.

He twinged unpleasantly. Looking at her was reminded him of staring at a bad mark on a paper. It was a reminder of an egregious error that he ought to have avoided, but now could only hope to make up with time, given effort. It was, however, some comfort that she didn’t know about it; he could probably salvage the situation if he maintained decorum thereon. Whatever awkwardness she was feeling — not unreasonable, considering the frankly ghastly breaches of propriety they'd committed in the bathroom — would be temporary.

As usual, the world and everything important in it came down to his own personal ability to hold it together. He was hardly surprised.

Professor Flitwick docked them five points for being off-task. This left Hermione so apoplectic that she didn't speak to him again until lunch.

"It's a good thing you've got the knack of it, Harry," she said pointedly. "That'll come in handy with the grindylows."

"Yeah," said Harry, whose success had overdosed him with optimism. "Hey, think about this: you reckon I can just Banish the water and walk down?"

"Oh, bless, he thinks he's Moses."

"It's a perfectly fair question," said Hermione stiffly. "As I would say to Draco, if I were talking to him. But Harry, even if you could get one that strong, Bombarda is an acute spell, and once the force dissipates, the water would come back in. Which, at that volume—"

"Would be not dissimilar to dropping a building on your head."

"—would be painful, probably," she admitted, as Harry hauled open the doors to the Great Hall. "But it's a nice idea."

Harry considered this, thoughtfully, and then said: "What if I run?"

"Run… away from the water?"

"Yeah. Just like, run."

"Harry," Hermione began, in tones of strained kindness.

“No, let’s hear him out,” said Draco thoughtfully, who very badly wanted to watch Harry try it.

They found Daphne sitting unannounced at the Gryffindor table, where she was delicately annihilating a cask of French onion soup between pages of Witch Weekly. Some ways down the table, Ron made the fourth corner of a square with Dean, Seamus, and Ginny, the last of whom waved to Harry and the others as they came in — but she was the only one.

Draco dropped his bag like an anchor and sat next to Daphne. Harry stared longingly down the table, but when Draco cleared his throat he followed suit.

Then Hermione did a strange thing. She set her bag down next to Draco’s, stopped, picked it up again, and then circumnavigated the table to go sit on the other side, next to Harry. This put her across from Daphne, who looked up in oblivious cheer and said: “Hail and well met! You’ve got rubber in your hair. Where is Ronald?”

Hermione yanked out the offending article, mumbling an ungrateful thank you.

Draco studied her. She wouldn’t meet his eyes.

He frowned.

“Ron’s not here,” she said shortly. “We’re having a row.”

“A great pity,” Daphne said, and she sounded genuinely sorrowful. “Is he being a wanker?”

“It’s none of your business.”

“Dear me. Is it that kind of fight?”

Hermione flushed. “No,” she snapped. “Does everything have to come down to that?”

“Come down to what? Greengrass, explain yourself.”

“Oh, no. I believe I was told to butt out, thank you,” she said serenely, burying her nose in a goblet of pumpkin juice, “and I shall not be tricked into doing anything but.”

Having one know-it-all around was an amusement; two was starting to irritate him.

“You know what I reckon?” mused Harry. “I reckon our best plan is to say bugger it and Summon some scuba gear.”

With evident relief, Hermione turned away from Daphne. “And do what? You don’t know how to scuba dive.”

“I’d figure it out.”

“What’s a scuba?” Daphne inquired.

“Wheely thing muggles ride around on,” said Draco.

“Ah.”

“Scooter,” said Hermione. “Scoo-ter.”

“I see,” said Daphne politely. “And what is scooter diving, pray tell?”

“Lets you breathe underwater,” said Harry, “for a little while, anyway. Not that it’d work, Hermione’s right, you need weeks to learn. Aunt Petunia bought Dudley lessons for his fourteenth, he almost drowned.” He sighed.

“Take heart, Potter, it’ll happen eventually.”

“You always say that.”

“I see,” said Daphne, again, in the kindly tones of someone who understood nothing. “And why does Harry want to breathe underwater?”

“For the Second Task,” he said glumly, gazing into his bowl as if it contained the very waters that doomed him. “I have to go under the lake. Problem is, I don’t know how, and I reckon all the other champions are gonna use this one fancy spell I can’t do.”

“But it’s two weeks away! Cutting it tight, aren’t we?”

“We’ve been researching,” Hermione snapped. “We’ve done plenty of reading.” True. “We have lots of ideas.” Less true.

“Why haven’t you just asked the mermaids?”

“Why haven’t we — well, to start with, Mermish is an extremely hard language, and one that’s impossible to speak above the water, which obviously means Harry would need to know how to breathe water before he could ask them, so, return to Point A, about breathing—”

“No, I mean in the dungeons.” When she received no answer, Daphne leaned forward eagerly. “Ooh, you don’t know? This is delicious. I never get to tell you lot something new.”

“...There are mermaids in the dungeons?” said Hermione, dripping with skepticism.

“Not in the dungeons. But Slytherin’s under the lake. We’ve windows all over the place, and if you wait long enough, one will come swimming up and tap on the glass. I think they see us like goldfish,” she added thoughtfully.

“But you can’t possibly speak to them.”

“Not in Mermish! But they’ve got a hand language, to talk to land-dwellers,” she said, fluttering her fingers.

Hermione surveyed her with new interest. “Can you speak it?”

“All the Slytherin girls can. It’s something of a tradition. Holleen’s their favorite, they gave her a proper Mermish name and everything…”

“Can you translate?” There was a certain inquisitorial glow about her, which meant either an interrogation or an epiphany was swiftly forthcoming.

Daphne saw it, and so it was with faint alarm that she agreed: “If you don’t mind a bit of looseness with grammar, I suppose.”

Hermione beamed and leapt to her feet.

“Oh! You mean now?”

“Invariably,” said Draco, massaging his nose.

“Yes,” said Hermione, firmly. “Why not? You’re free, Daphne, aren’t you?”

Daphne looked mournfully at her bowl of soup. “Well,” she said.

“Wonderful. Come along, it won’t take a moment. Harry, put that down.”

Harry, who had been furtively reaching for the soup ladle, wilted.

“But I’m hungry.”

Without missing a beat, Hermione pivoted, pointed her wand down the table, and barked, “Accio.”

A Cornish pasty zoomed into her hand. She tossed it to a startled Harry, dumped his bowl of soup back into the pot, and threw back the last of her tea in one go.

Daphne falteringly raised her hand.

“What?”

“Can I have one?”

“Fine!” Another pasty was delivered unto its end, who nibbled it happily. “But hurry! Lunch ends in thirty minutes! No lollygagging!”

“Yes, sir, right away, sir,” drawled Draco.

Hermione pointed at him, opened her mouth, inhaled, and closed it; then, blinking quickly, and stalked away.

Bemused, he looked at Harry, who with palms raised to heaven he indicated that he was not touching it.

They followed Hermione down the staircase off the Entrance Hall, tripping down hairpin staircases with a haste that was perilous to ankles and necks. At first Daphne tried to offer directions, but soon fell into wondrous silence when Hermione forged ahead, taking turns unsuggested, and cutting through long identical hallways as if she had a map of them written on the back of her hand.

“Hermione,” called Daphne, “have you been to Slytherin before?”

“No. Why would I?”

“You just seem to know your way around, my dear.”

“Yes, I memorized the Map,” she said absently, peering around a corner. “It’s not quite the same, obviously, but once you get a sense of the pattern, it’s not hard to get a heading… this is it, isn’t it?”

She hooked around a corner without waiting for an answer, and they were in front of the Slytherin common room doors. Draco gave a slow, intrigued whistle, and she very slightly smiled.

Then she stopped and turned away. He scowled.

What was her problem? He hadn’t said anything— she’d been perfectly happy last night, right up until — anyway.

“I didn’t know there was a map of Hogwarts,” Daphne said idly. “Password’s ‘capricorn,’ by the way.”

The wall rippled, and a lacquered black door emerged from between unfurling wings of brick. Daphne hooked an arm around the handle and, with a playful flourish of a bow, she opened the door.

In the emerald vault of the Slytherin commons, the scent of tea cakes and mulled wine floated around the watery atria. Girls and boys in dark robes floated through the green light, exchanging cool murmurs that echoed on the stone. When the door creaked, half the hall fell silent, and a dozen pale faces turned like a den of arctic foxes to watch them come in.

Daphne took a sharp breath and quickly wove her arm through Hermione's. Hermione made an indignant noise and tried to tug it free, but Daphne refused to let her go.

With a prickle of heat on the back of his neck, Draco noticed the pattern of the other Slytherins' stares: they swept over and away from Harry in disgust, and flickered with dull disinterest over Draco himself; but wherever their eyes fell on Hermione, they stayed there.

Hermione made a small noise when he stepped in line next to her, as if he'd startled her.

"Come on," Daphne said, quite calmly. "My room's this way."

She bundled them out of the common room, tripping down a narrow corridor to a tall oak door.

The handle was sculpted in the shape of an adder, and when she put her finger to it, the lock clicked open. Behind it lay a high-ceilinged stone chamber with chocolate wood floors, furnished in old world abundance: a green leather claw-foot sofa, a twelve-foot bookshelf in gleaming mahogany, against which rested a long silver cane; a writer's desk sporting a tin of tropically colored quills. Throned amongst the quilts on the queen bed lounged the fattest, furriest, ugliest cat Draco had ever seen, and he included Crookshanks. It looked like someone had glued a face to a pile of cotton, and then punched it.

“You’ve a cat!” exclaimed Hermione.

Daphne threw the door shut behind Harry. “Oh, yes, that’s Duchess,” she said. “She’s my darling chubby baby girl, and you must pet her if you want to sit on the bed.”

Duchess peeled her ears back and hissed. Hermione cooed.

He’d forgotten that Hermione had a soft spot for small creatures of raw spite. Maybe she felt a kinship with them.

“Thank you,” said Daphne, quite proudly, and she locked the door behind them.

A giant window in the shape of a bay leaf was cut into the wall, and the turquoise waters of the lake strained green light into the room. Dark towers of kelp swayed in bleary distortion through the water, and schools of tiny silver fish glinted here and there across the glass. Daphne hauled a chair away from the desk and hopped up on it, where she lit her wand with Lumos and angled it around the window like she was searching for something.

“Normally I don’t do this,” she explained, “as they’ll come and go as they please, but in the interests of time — they respond to light more than noise, you see. Their eyesight is quite good.”

“It would have to be, at the bottom of the lake,” murmured Hermione, and she tapped her knuckles on the glass. Harry put his hand on the back of Daphne’s chair, carefully, to stabilize it. Draco leaned one shoulder against the glass and casually flicked a Knocking Charm at it, which made Hermione give him the silly sideways look she always did when he used magic for something she wouldn’t have.

He quirked his lip at her. She tilted her head and smiled with the corner of her mouth. The glow from the water turned her face a jeweled blue, and sent tiger-stripes of silver rippling over her. Her collar was still askew and the light went winnowing down across the shadows there, over the noticeable swell of her jumper, her slender legs skinned in black winter tights. It reminded him of the prefects' bathroom.

He inhaled and turned back to the window.

A shape swelled out of the water. Daphne clapped her hands together and gave a yelp of joy: as a humanoid silhouette emerged from the lake's indigo fathoms.

There were few words to describe how eerie it was: his brain told him, in some alarm, that there was a human being on the other side of the glass, but equally salient parts of his brain replied that it was wrong. The proportions told it for a lie. It had the chest of a starveling corpse, the ladder of its ribcage hanging over a ghoulish hollow of a stomach, and its bony arms were skinned in the leathery gray of dead flesh. An amphibious head perched on the pencil-thin column of its neck, with a wide frog-mouth and bulbous, watery eyes, the pupils dilated to the size of sickles, like fish. Its hips fused into a single, writhing snake of muscle, which it used like a rudder to steer itself through the current.

A hand slapped onto the glass. It was long, clawed, and webbed, its fingers more like bat-wings than human digits. Hermione jumped. Harry jumped, too.

Daphne, not startled at all, clapped again in delight. "Oh, good! She wants to talk!" she said. "Now, you all say hello, too. It's polite." She smacked her hand onto the glass, fingers spread.

Hermione and Harry tentatively placed their hands beside Daphne's. Draco preferred to watch, until Hermione kicked him in the ankle, and rolling his eyes, he flicked his sleeve back and applied his palm to the cool glass.

The mer slid her hand along the glass, leaving a trail of something yellowy and translucent, and aligned her fingers with Daphne's. When she peeled it away, it left a print in mucus. Daphne's hand left a print in fog.

Daphne made some gesture that involved tapping her mouth and scooping her fingers along her cupped palm. This she traced a hook-shape over her face, dotting it like a question mark with a tap on her chin. The mer yawped, a deep, haunting croon, and then mimicked her.

“Oh, bless, she wants to help!” Daphne clasped her hands and turned to Harry. “What did you want to ask her?”

“Merlin,” said Harry wondrously, gazing at the mer with the same stupid amazement he’d found for hippogriffs. Give it teeth and magic and a spooky affect, and Harry would just about keel over for it. “What’s it like to live underwater?”

Daphne started gesturing. Mermish hand language involved a lot of finger movements around the body and head, interspersed with sketches on the glass, like a visual pictography. That intrigued him. Hermione had found her notebook and was scribbling so fast he was surprised the quill-tip didn’t burn off from friction.

The mer swiveled its head at Harry and gave another low-bellied croon. It darted its hand in a half-circle around its face, and then pointed with two fingers at Harry.

“She says, ‘Like you live, only wetter.’”

Harry laughed. The mer yawped again and swished its tail with a certain animalistic satisfaction, like a purring cat.

“How does she breathe?” he wondered. “What does she eat? What are those pebbly things she’s wearing?”

“Goodness, we don’t have time for all that. Read a book, my dove. Hermione—?”

“Yes,” said Hermione quickly. “We want to know what’s in the lake, first of all. Start with that.”

“Hm. I’ll try if you like, but I’m not… entirely positive that’ll translate,” she admitted. “Bit like asking, ‘what’s on the planet,’ isn’t it? Or a bird, ‘what’s in the sky.’”

Hermione frowned. “I see. Tell her… try telling her that some wizards are going to be coming into the lake, and we’d like to know if there’s anything they need to be careful of.”

Daphne obeyed. After a short flurry of gesturing, the mer cut her off with a squawk and smacked her skull twice with the flat of her hand.

“Oh! She says she knows about that!”

“She does?” Hermione was fascinated. She huddled closer to Daphne, as if she could siphon knowledge through osmosis. “How?”

“She says… the wizards have been building something in the lake. Kicking up dirt. Bad for the fish.” Daphne watched carefully, her pale brows dented with concentration. “And… she says… the purple man said it was for the wizard game. Sorry — purple officer? It’s got the formal case, but Mermish is so strange, I don’t know how you’d make ‘purple’ a formal word.”

“As a title? Purple is commonly associated with royalty,” said Hermione curiously, “so it could be a type of king, or a lord, or someone powerful. Only the context, ‘man,’ suggests it’s a wizard, so perhaps that means it’s an important wizard, a kingly wizard, someone with high standing—”

“Ministry representative,” said Draco. The others looked at him. “If I had to guess. Their robes are purple.”

Daphne cried and applauded. “Clever clogs! See, this is why I’m terrible at languages, I’m hopelessly literal. We should have had Pansy do it, she’s much brighter than me, and she’s got a lovely Mermish accent — ooh, I missed the participle there, this is going to be rough. It’s a list, I think? Grindylows, for one… lobalugs… a hippocampus, but it’s domesticated… and the squid.”

“Oh, good! Just the squid, nothing else?”

“Hark at her,” said Draco, “one dragon, and now it’s ‘just the squid,’ is it? Why don’t we take down a confederation of giants, while we’re at it? And a griffin for dessert? Just another breezy Tuesday, for Hermione Granger—”

“Shut up,” she said, a touch pink. “What, are you scared?”

“‘What, are you scared?’ What are you, nine?”

“At least I’m not quivering in my boots at the mere suggestion of tentacles—”

“I’ll show you who’s quivering, thank you—”

“Hang on,” said Harry, speaking over their undercurrent of nonsense, though, irritatingly, just as they’d begun to approach their normal rapport. Hermione broke off at once and went back to scribbling with suspicious focus. “I don’t have to fight the mermaids, do I?”

He sounded very sincerely worried. Personally, Draco could think of things harder than jinxing a creature that looked like a skeleton hopped into a hydraulic press with a newt, but for Harry, the prospect caused some distress.

“Good question!” Daphne smacked her palm with the flat of her hand, and the mer lashed her hand across her throat. “Oh, that’s a strong ‘no.’ They’re only there to supervise. She says—” Her lips thinned in suppression of a laugh. “She says it’s immoral to fight a baby.”

“...Am I the baby?”

“Only by implicature.”

“Can you ask her if she knows what the champions have to do?” said Hermione, while Harry grappled with this. “They have to retrieve something from the lake. It's something they'll 'sorely miss,' if that narrows it down."

Daphne gestured again. The mer hesitated.

"She says no."

"Drat," muttered Hermione. She drew a line through something. "Alright. There's still… oh, does she happen to know how Harry might go about breathing underwater? Long shot, but it'd be helpful."

Daphne pointed to Harry, tapped her throat, made the half-circle gesture, and then the question mark.

The mer blinked, a slow shuttering of translucent eyelids. She swiveled her head back and forth, and Draco recognized it as a gesture of deep thought. It was thinking, he thought, abruptly; she was accessing her memory and using it to answer questions. It was capable of cognition and problem-solving and even some level of humor.

He didn't know what to do with that. There was something unnerving about the idea.

"She's asking whether you haven't tried gillyweed," reported Daphne.

"What's gillyweed?"

Not unreasonably, Harry addressed this question to Hermione, who shook her head and, not unreasonably, turned to Draco — who didn't know, because Herbology was an endurance trial and he hated it.

Daphne obediently relayed the question. "It's a plant, apparently! It gives you gills."

"Gills?" said Harry, slightly green.

"Gills," breathed Hermione. "Perfect. Exactly. How do we get it?"

“She doesn’t know.”

“She doesn’t know?”

“Well, it’s plentiful at the bottom of the lake,” said Daphne, defensively, “but if you could nip down for a scoop, you wouldn’t have this problem in the first place, would you?”

“Can she get it to us?”

“It’s not harvesting season,” said Daphne, after a quick conferral. “She’d be willing, she says, and she’s very sorry; she likes… er. She likes ‘the polite baby.’ But it won’t be prepared for months.”

“Sorry,” said the polite baby, raising his hand, “but do they stick around? The gills? Do we know if they wear off?”

“So we’ll have to find a store somewhere,” murmured Hermione. “Or buy it, I suppose.”

Draco leaned his head back, thinking. “Hogsmeade doesn’t have an apothecary.”

“Snape does.”

“Snape’s not an herbalist.”

“We’ve stolen before—”

“Of necessity—”

“This is necessity—”

“Of course it is, but it’s not a victimless crime, is my point.”

“Some victim!”

“Again,” said Harry, “gills? Permanent? Anybody.”

“Not likely,” said Hermione.

“Acceptably likely,” said Draco.

“Hard to tell,” said Daphne, “but for her part, she says you oughtn’t worry about it; she thinks they’re quite fashionable, and you’d look good with them.”

“That’s great,” said Harry plaintively. “Wonderful. Ask her if she can convince Cho.”

In the last, long, black days before the Second Task — days that opened in peals of thunder to a sky dark as nightfall, peppered the world with lightning, and then slipped wrathfully back into night, leaving the windows dim and darker — Draco sank gradually into despair. He had thought, with the innocence of a child playing a puzzle game, that solving the egg would solve their problems. He was wrong.

Hook and crook met no meat on this issue. Not a sick fool in the world would gamble his life on Harry’s Bubble-Head Charm, which at the height of his concentration could produce only a semipermeable barrier for three minutes. Even Hermione’s version, a wholly impermeable shield, petered out around twenty-six minutes — though she blustered that she could have sustained concentration with less noise — which said nothing good about Harry’s chances of managing longer. The Second Task leaked dourness into the days that preceded it.

Somewhere in these vanishing hours, they all passed an unspoken threshold of time where even if, at this point, they discovered a spell or enchantment that could save him, Harry would lack the time to master it. Everyone understood this, but no one said so, perhaps for fear of hearing it confirmed back to them by one of the others; and yet that enforced silence intensified the cold spell of ennui. Evening study sessions at the library became futile and ghoulish. Stacks of antique spell indices assumed a certain penitential affect, like bars on a cage. Hermione churned out pages upon pages of notes about grindylows and hinkypunks that Harry would read and silently put away, because nothing in them would help him if he couldn't breathe.

She had been friendly but religiously polite to Draco, ever since the prefects' bathroom — a frightening development, because on a list of her many virtues, 'politeness' would not appear given fifty feet of parchment and a pixie-sized hand.

"She just misses Ron," said Harry.

They had broken into the quidditch pitch. Steam rose from their bodies in the afternoon mist, the heat of their sweat melting the crust of frost on the bleachers below them.

Harry had grown into his Nimbus over the summer, and Draco often caught him marveling at its weathered name in gilt, the snitch-bright glitter of M.M. on the case.

His talent grew more disgusting every year, and Draco still, given his best efforts, could not beat him in an outright race.

He maintained cover by denying that any of these attempts were his best efforts.

"Yet again, you've classically missed the point," he said. "We're talking about me."

He didn't want to talk about Hermione, or how she might be missing Ron. They weren't talking about her. Or her and Ron. Or whatever Ron's sentiments for her were, which were none of Draco's business and made him feel oddly, vaguely resentful for no reason whatsoever, being that she hadn't shown evidence of returning them.

Which also would not be his business.

"It's all mixed up, though," said Harry. He leaned back on the bleachers and carded his fingers through his sweaty hair. "You and me and Hermione and Ron. In the hopper, right. Can't be normal when Ron's gone. Even though, again, it is his choice not to talk to me, which is, I guess, fine."

"Why."

"Why what?"

"I mean that doesn't make any sense."

"It's because we're all in the hopper together."

"I am not in 'the hopper' with anything. Personally, politically, or spiritually."

"Okay. But you are, though. Anyway, it's obvious she misses him," he said, "because now they're fighting, they can't pick on each other, and they're both miserable."

"She picks on me."

"Not the same. You do your homework and iron your shirts," said Harry, shaking his head, like this was an enduring character fault. "She's gotta work for it, with you. Ron and I are open season."

Fair. "Speaking of. She picks on you plenty."

"But she doesn't like to," said Harry peacefully. "I'm a nice boy."

"Oh, please."

"I'm a sweet lad, Draco."

"You're an upjumped cuckoo bird, is what you are."

"A perfect angel."

"As was Lucifer."

“You’d know,” said Harry innocently, and Draco was too lazy to do more than a rude gesture. “Anyway, Hermione’s going through it, just like the rest of us. The Task is driving her nutters, and now, with Ron, it’s all like a table. You cut one leg off a table, and like — it’ll still stand, but you can’t put anything heavy on it.”

“Legs do not generally part from tables of their own accord.”

“Wasn’t all his fault.” Harry bent forward, massaging his calf. “You two are a bit— you know.”

“Good Lord. Not this.”

“It’s true. He wasn’t imagining it, you two are always scuttling off to the library together.”

“To solve your riddle, thank you—”

“No. Before.” Harry smacked some dirt off his knees and turned to him, expression serious but not unkind. “You’re always partners in everything and you’re always gossiping about the homework before Ron and I’ve even looked at it. And then last year, with Arithmancy and Runes and the Polyjuice Potion… and then you two even dropped out of Hagrid’s class to go do your own thing—”

“I don’t recall McGonagall barring either of you two from Arithmancy,” said Draco coldly.

“Hop off my arse, wouldja,” said Harry, sounding strikingly like Ron. “I’m not trying to be mean. Just look at it his way, right? How’s he supposed to feel, with me in the Tournament, and you two going off on your own all the time?”

“He can feel however he wants about it. So long as he keeps it to himself, it’s none of my concern.”

“Right, so that's a lie,” he said patiently. “Unless you can look me in the eye and say you don’t miss him, which I still wouldn’t believe.

You've got to miss doing the little nose-wrinkle thing with him when me and Hermione act like muggles. You haven't done the nose-wrinkle thing in weeks."

Ron's vow of silence had dragged on into the new month. It was making relations in the Gryffindor common room somewhat strained, especially for Fred, George, and Ginny, whose lack of insight into the situation warred with a desire not to cross an emotional picket line. Everyone knew that there had been a fight of some kind, but no one knew what exactly about, and no one but Colin Creevey was tactless enough to come outright and ask.

Draco wished they would. At least Colin had taken his Ear-Expanding Hex on the chin, like a man, and been on his way.

"Plus," said Harry, "you were a real twat about the Burrow."

"He was something of a twat, himself."

"It's not different."

"Who was it that started the fight? Was it me? I don't remember that happening."

Harry granted this with an uncomfortable jerk of his head. "Wasn't just him," he muttered. "You missed the beginning. He came in with the article, right, and he was a good sport to start with — we all sat around and had a good laugh. But then he — I dunno — he started asking all these questions, about how Colin got the picture, and if we talked to any reporters, or if Hermione and I had been spending more time together — you know, weird questions, but not offensive, not really. Only Hermione kind of took it the wrong way—"

"Shock. Surprise."

"—and she said, ah, if he thought she and I were — er — I think she said 'closet snogging,' every time his back was turned—"

Draco choked on a snort.

“—then he was an idiot, et cetera — and then I said something about wishing they’d both shut up, which, you know, really set them off—”

“With diplomacy like that, who needs war?”

“Yeah, yeah. So they got to shouting, and I — you know, I shut down, because I can’t — when people shout, my brain goes all—” He shook his hand vaguely over his ear. “And then he said something about snogging Krum and Hermione really blew up, and she told him — er, I’m not gonna repeat what she told him, if that’s alright—”

“English lacks a sufficiently strong synonym for ‘thank you.’”

“But anyway, that’s what had him fired up before you came in. And he’s been feeling shit all year. He’s been doing his best to tamp it down, but it’s not like any of us have really had time to notice, with the Tournament everything.”

“How dare you be distracted by fighting for your life in a deadly game of skill and chance? Shame on you, for neglecting poor Weasley’s feelings.”

“I’m not saying we didn’t have good reasons, but he has good ones, too. And we all know he can get mean, he and Hermione fought all through third year. The point is, we should take it easy on him.”

“No.”

“...No?”

He chose his words carefully.’

“He has a bad habit,” he said, “of going after Granger when he needs a free hit.”

Harry frowned.

“No—”

“I wouldn’t mention it,” he said neutrally, flicking dirt from his knees, “but he won’t hurt you if he can avoid it, and evidently can’t come up with much to hurt me, so she’s caught the brunt of it. It’s why he spent so much time yelling at her, did you notice? I did.”

“She bites back more than you or I do,” said Harry, “maybe that—”

“More than I do? Really.”

“But he just—”

“Wanted to do damage? Certainly. Oh, yes. The only reason he mentioned me at all was to bother her. It’s a fine strategy, it’s the target I don’t accept. ”

“Yeah,” said Harry, “and— okay. That was a shit thing to do, but one, you’ve got a thing with muggles and everybody knows it, including Hermione, who sticks her neck out for you way more than you deserve; and two, going after his house, especially when you’ve got a mansion—”

“It isn’t my fault that I have a mansion.” He wasn’t going to touch the thing about muggles. Hermione understood how he was. Harry and Ron didn’t get it, which wasn’t their fault, but they just didn’t.

Harry gave him a look.

“It isn’t,” he muttered.

“Yeah. Okay. Well, do me a favor and don’t say that to him, whenever he comes back, right? If you ever want to talk to him again, that is.”

“The jury is out.”

“No, it’s not,” yawned Harry. He stood up and stretched so high that the joints in his shoulders crackled.

“What makes you think so?”

“A feeling,” said Harry, naming his favorite form of evidence. And he smiled a smile of rare confidence, an expression Draco had seen only sometimes, which took as its source the conviction that the gears and levers of the world worked in an inexorable rhythm towards goodness, and they would soon return to it, and when they did, the smile’s owner would have the double pleasure of being both right and happy about it. This was an expression Draco had never made and never would, and so whenever Harry showed it he had the faint awe of witnessing something impossible.

Which was not to say he didn’t look stupid. He did. Jammy moon-eyed git.

Harry turned the smile relentlessly up at the broad ceiling of clouds, and slinging a leg over his broomstick, he kicked off through the glacial winter morning, sailing up into the sky as if gravity had flipped and drawn him home.

The next time he saw Hermione was in Potions. She wanted to talk about the Second Task, which was about the only subject she would discuss freely with him anymore, and so he indulged her, mostly because the alternative was brittle decorum the likes of which made her seem frankly possessed.

“If you don’t want to steal, you could always ask him outright, you know.”

“Being known for his generous disposition.”

“He is your godfather.”

“Raise your voice a little, I don’t think the court reporter heard it—”

“Don’t be a worrywand. It’s worth a shot.”

“Fine. I have to ask him to take a letter to my mother, anyway.”

It had been three weeks, with no word from her. When he let himself think about it, it put him half of a mind to march himself home and see what all was going on, but Snape didn’t exactly make himself available for consultation. He’d canceled four in five office hours, and rarely stayed after class longer than it took to make an excuse and hurry out. His lessons had become somewhat hurried in tenor — even Neville was starting to relax, free from supervision, and his brewing showed improvement from it — while his interest in normal sources of joy, like docking points for sloppy Windsors, had plummeted alarmingly.

He looked tired. Draco worried about him.

She blew some smoke off the cauldron-lip and frowned. “Why would Professor Snape take a letter to your mother?”

“He’s my godfather,” he said evasively, slitting a murtlap’s belly with a deft stroke of the knife. “Pass the forceps.”

Forceps were passed. “I know that,” she said. “I’ve a godfather, too, but I don’t use him as a postal service.”

“Really? Such strange creatures, muggles.”

She scowled. He splayed his fingers, not quite an apology — more of an easing-off — but it acknowledged the ice was thinner than he’d seen.

It was a joke. She understood that.

“You’re avoiding the question,” she said brusquely, and poked him with a stirring rod. “Tell me.”

He thought about not telling her — Snape probably would have advised against — but Snape was a crotchety old bugger, and anyway, Draco didn’t see the point in hiding anything. It wasn’t as though she could change it, one way or another.

“The Ministry watches owl post.”

“What.”

She had stopped stirring. He made a distressed noise and repossessed the rod to remedy her mistake. “Some of it, anyway. I quite agree, it’s a devil of a thing—”

“That’s illegal!”

“Oh, Lord.”

“You have rights!”

“It doesn’t feel like it right now.”

“They watched you? For how long?”

“It doesn’t make a difference, to be honest,” he said. “Unless you’re worried about people reading your Christmas notes, which are, I admit, politically loaded—”

“I’m worried about people abusing your civil liberties.”

“The only person I let abuse my civil liberties is you,” he said, annoyed, “for reasons that currently escape me, as I’m working my fingers to the bone stirring this cauldron by myself, while you foment revolution.”

“I’m serious.” She touched his arm. He glanced at it and then at her and then at the cauldron, which was fascinating, or soon would be, once he remembered what he was doing with it. “Why didn’t you complain?”

“...To whom?”

“To Dumbledore! Or, fine, not Dumbledore, but someone important. Your lawyer! Or — you know — to me,” she said, faltering. He dropped his eyes to her hand, and she hastily withdrew it. “You never said anything—”

“About what? It doesn’t matter.” She was staring at him like he had missed something unfathomably important. Then she seemed to relocate her hand remained on his arm, and snatched it away, almost knocking over a beaker in the process. She resettled herself in her chair and did not look at him again.

“I would have told you if it were important,” he said tartly, wondering if she were peeved about being kept out of a secret. But it was his mother, and his post, so he frankly didn't see where she was entitled to know any of it, except that Hermione usually felt herself entitled to all the information in a particular room.

She ignored him. It needled him for the rest of class, her silence, and he was about to resort to pitching things at her when the hour-bell groaned.

It preceded a shriek of chairs and footsteps, including Hermione’s, who removed herself with a polite goodbye like the cracking of crystal. And Draco excused himself to go talk to his godfather.

He hated this. It would be preferable, in his mind, if they could reset everything to the way it had been right after the First Task, when everything was simple and delightful and he felt like the god-king of knowledge and adventure.

Snape’s cauldron was empty. The Potions Master erased the blackboard with a sweep of his wand and set about strapping his knives into his kit. His book lay open on the desk, beside the cauldron, the instructions ringed in familiar doilies of black scrawl. Even the title, ‘Choking Solution’ had been struck though, and replaced with an uneven line: liquid benzonatate (c30h53no11). Beside it lay a spindly chain of hexagons.

“It is a formula,” said a voice behind him. “You should familiarize yourself. They will appear on your N.E.W.T.”

The door swung shut, and the candles in the potions classroom flickered. In the dim, smoky room, studded with green luminescent bottles and burbling cauldrons, it felt like a sunken study, or an underwater cavern. With not an ounce of daylight, it could have been any time at all. Draco didn’t understand how one could tolerate a whole day without sunlight. It would do things to his brain. In fact, maybe that explained a good deal about Snape, come to think of it.

He turned around. Snape stood with his arms folded in a militant shield over his sunken chest. His brittle black eyes peered out from a face of malnourished thinness. The long, bony fingers of his right hand pinched the handle of his wand, which he pointed at the desk, where the book snapped shut.

“Hello, Uncle Severus. Does this mean you think I’ll pass my O.W.L.?”

He couldn’t help it. Fishing for compliments was one of his hobbies.

Snape made an irritated noise in his throat. Draco smirked and hopped up to sit on the desk.

“That is not a chair.”

“My mistake, sir.” He didn’t move. “Can I ask you a question?”

“I lack the time to instruct you on what a chair is.”

Sometimes he nearly suspected his godfather had a sense of humor.

“You’re hilarious, sir. Do you happen to have any gillyweed?”

“Why do you ask?”

Draco weighed his options, and decided for the rare honest play. “Potter needs it for the Second Task,” he admitted. “It’s rather rare, we don’t know where to find it. I thought you might have some.”

His godfather’s voice grew an edge. “And you think I would simply give it to you, if I did?”

“Please. I would remunerate you, naturally. I’d not waste your time with begging, nor mine, sir.”

Snape slowly lifted his hand to his face. Because his back was turned, it took a moment to realize he was massaging his head.

“Do you know, Draco,” he said, quiet with unhappy memoria, “sometimes you remind me so strongly of your father that I feel rather haunted.”

“Really? How?”

Oh, and hang him for that, honestly, that naked and humiliating pitch of eagerness. Stuff a sock in his throat and keep it there. Gag him until he was of an age to stop embarrassing himself.

Snape took a while choosing his next words. “A perhaps unreasoned confidence in his own powers,” he said, “and a truly remarkable collection of synonyms for bribery.”

To his ear, it sounded like Snape was calling him shallow, and he didn’t care for that at all. “Tosh. Bribery is the financial manipulation of a public servant,” he said, clipped. “What I’m suggesting is embezzlement, if anything.”

A mysterious tremor broke out in Snape’s cheek. “Another sentence that might come from beyond the grave. But I cannot help you. I have no gillyweed left.”

“Oh,” he said. Then: “What do you mean, ‘left’?”

“Precisely what I said. Ordinarily I should have several bushels, but the school apothecary has been mysteriously pilfered, of late, and several ingredient stores were eradicated completely. Gillyweed was among them. I am sorry to say that Mr. Potter will simply have to hold his breath."

"Someone stole it?"

"Obviously."

"Who? Do you know? Did they leave clues?"

"I have not the slightest idea," said Snape delicately, though his eyes cut sidelong at Draco. "I had suspected the same anonymous personage responsible for the disappearance of my prize boomslang skin, last spring. I inferred that it might prove similarly… of use… to them."

Draco cleared his throat and lifted his chin.

"Seems unlikely, sir."

"Mm."

"Just based on — probability, you know. The same person striking twice. I wouldn't put my money on it, personally."

"No? That is concerning."

Draco drummed his fingers restlessly on the desk. "You might… and sir, I don't mean to point fingers."

"How rarely that refrain precedes anything but."

"But before the First Task, the Restricted Section of the library was cleared of books on dragon-taming. Now, under normal circumstances, I wouldn't go so far as to suggest sabotage—"

"Then you are more a fool than I had believed," said Snape curtly. "Of course it is sabotage; it can be nothing else. This is the Triwizard Tournament. The prize, far greater than money, is the sort of glory that makes one's career. Books will go missing, potion stores will be stolen, and if Potter's competitors have not already conspired against him, I would be shocked at their lack of competitive acumen."

"Yes! Exactly!"

"Your exuberance is unmerited. It takes precious little cunning to infer. Potter is the youngest, the smallest, and the least legitimate, by any reckoning; he is the obvious target for a conspiracy. In eliminating him, each stands to raise their own chance of victory by eight percent. They will attempt to cut him out of the running in the Second Task, mark me, and compete amongst themselves in the Third." He jabbed his wand at the board, and the last few instructions sprang out of it in a pellet of chalk.

"Sir, I couldn't agree more. Now, about that—"

"You should let them."

He stuttered. "What, sir?"

Snape finished the inscription with a sharp flourish. "I do not repeat myself. Be candid: have you given any thought to what happens if Potter wins?"

Draco fumbled for an answer that wouldn't embarrass him.

"He gets a thousand galleons," he suggested. "Rita Skeeter writes several indecorous news features."

"No. Cassius Warrington will be humiliated."

That rankled. "I don't know about 'humiliated,' sir. It's a hard tournament, at the risk of redundancy."

"You cannot truly think it matters." It was the same scorn offered to students who gave exceptionally creative wrong answers. It stung. "Potter may be Merlin's gift to magic — I happen to know for a fact he is not — but politics is nine tenths optical. Cassius Warrington is a pureblood adult. Potter is a half-blood. The thesis of Albert Runcorn's political career has been that one of these things is indubitably superior to the other. This Tournament," he said, "is an empirical test of that hypothesis."

Which was a sobering kind of thing to hear, but not particularly helpful. He respected his godfather tremendously, but he was concerned that Snape severely underestimated the perils of 'let it ride' as a strategic game plan. Or he just didn't care. Considering his remarks about Harry, it was quite possible he didn't.

The hour-bell tolled again, signaling the start of dinner, and with a riotous complaint, his stomach reminded him that he hadn't eaten lunch.

"Professor. About my mother—"

"You worry for her."

"A bit," he said. "Occasionally. From time to time."

"She has been occupied, of late. She sends her regards."

"So — you've seen her, then?"

"Just last week."

"At the Manor?"

"Do you imagine your mother has been elsewhere?"

But she hadn't sent a letter? Not even a note?

He tilted his head. "Did she mention how the roses were doing, sir?" he said lightly.

Snape gave him the wary look of someone stumbling into a burgeoning lunacy.

"...Sir?"

“She did not,” he said icily. “Indeed, most anthological matters fell outside the scope of our concern, as I thought they did yours.”

Snape was lying.

His mother wouldn’t have sent Snape back without a message for him, even a coded one. The white roses are flourishing in the rains, or, the reds will wilt soon. Something to indicate if she was in danger. No message spoke louder than any could.

“I see. Well, when you see her next,” he said coolly, “would you tell her I asked? For politeness.”

“Do you presume that I have nothing better to do—”

“Never, sir. I just think she’d be glad to know that I haven’t abandoned her. She hasn’t replied to my last two letters, you see.” He slung his bag over his shoulder and said, casually, “Ostensibly because she was traveling. But if you say she’s at the Manor — I suppose I should believe you, shouldn’t I?”

Snape said nothing; he didn’t need to. The silence in the classroom turned gelatinous and oily, like a solution on the verge of breaking.

“Your mother is not well.”

He was sober, but sincere.

“She’s been—”

“Worse. Yes.”

Another silence. He wished the first one would come back.

“Is she…”

“Before I ask a question,” said Snape quietly, “I always inquire first, of myself: how much would it suit me to know?”

Which was its own kind of an answer.

“Thanks,” he said roughly. “Sorry to bother. Will you tell me—”

“Please understand,” said Snape, and he abruptly jolted into new levels of terror heretofore unknown, because that was worse than anything else he could have said; Severus Snape saying please was one of Armageddon's klaxons. “I take no joy in keeping secrets. It is an onerous, convoluted, and deeply unpleasant duty, and one that I should never have undertaken, had I a life that better suited me.” He paused. “As it is, I never go to the effort except from obligation.”

Draco nodded. He understood. He did. She was his own mother; he knew how she felt. If he were mad, he wouldn’t have wanted his son to hear about it, either.

He trotted down the stairs from the dais, hands in his pockets, while his insides fused into a single large knot of frustration and worry. He wondered if he could reach his mother directly, without having to pass through the medium of Snape, with all his apparently bothersome discretionary vows. Perhaps Hermione had some muggle contraption that could trace letters — of course, that would require telling Hermione why he was worrying for mother, which would raise questions, and that only made the knot bigger — what conclusions she would draw about a man with madness in his family line, it was impossible to tell, and unpleasant to contemplate.

He would solve the problem by himself. He was clever enough.

If some part of his brain was wary of the impossible arrogance of this task, it was at least decent enough to keep it to itself.

-EVERYONE LOOK AT THIS!!!

-I want to walk around holding this on a giant poster and standing outside of people’s windows like in Stand By Me

-you know how i said some people predict things in the comments? sometimes i'll see like, an interpretation of a non-POV character's thoughts, or a long-running motif, and i start uncontrollably barking and clapping like a great white seal. happened twice this week, it's grand. Writing serial fiction is the best.

-Draco: okay. it's getting serious. time to start suppressing my feelings, for real now, on purpose. [immediately turns around and flirts]

-Obviously, your author is a big fan of the "I Am In Control Of This [He Was Not In Control Of This]" phase of a slow-burn arc. We're going somewhere with this, though.

-Okay. Enough talk. Next week, we ARE getting our second task chapter, and it'll end what I think of as the "second act" of Book 4. Upcoming: "The Black Lake."

-It will contain... well, a whole lot of stuff. And Rita Skeeter.

The Black Lake

Chapter 47: The Black Lake

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

The night before the Second Task arrived on a peal of thunder that silenced the hour-bell.

The study table in the reference section squeezed to fit three, though one made very little use of it. At the nadir of his desperation, with approximately thirteen hours separating him from the frigid waters of the Black Lake, Harry had given up, laid down on the floor under their table, and started reciting any idea that came to mind.

“I should have become an Animagus,” he said. “Could ask Sirius. He’d know how.”

“Smashing,” said Draco. “Ask if they’ll put off the Task for a few years while you sort it out.”

“Cracking useful, innit,” said Harry distantly, as if he hadn’t heard. “Turning into an animal. Could become a fish… a frog, even...”

“A shark,” suggested Draco, tossing down his quill.

“Ooh, you’re right. Shark’s much better.”

“Yes, because life gets much easier when you don’t have opposable thumbs,” said Hermione. “That’ll obviously be worth the years of research you’ll have to put into it, plus the months-long alchemical conversion process, and the registration fee—”

“See, I was all in, until you brought up the registration fee.”

“—and don’t forget lots of juicy nightmarish consequences if it goes wrong…”

“Newts,” persisted Harry. “Eels.”

“Potter?”

“Hm?”

“I mean this from the bottom of my heart,” said Draco, and did. “I cannot overstate the amount of money I would pledge to your campaign to become a newt.”

“Thanks, mate. Knew I could depend on you.” Harry yawned. It was late enough that Madam Pince would soon come creeping around with a candle snuffer and throw them out.

Hermione’s nerves had suffered too much to tolerate the grating of hijinks. She snapped her book shut. “This is ridiculous. Harry, you’re not becoming a newt.”

“What an utterly heartbreaking sentence to walk into,” said Fred, swinging around the corner. “Harry, don’t listen to her.”

“Dream big. Prove ’em wrong,” echoed George, strolling in behind him. “Tell you what, when I was six, I wanted to be a wampus.”

“He’s not lying, he really did.”

“Ran around on all fours for a month before Mum straightened me out.”

“What’d she say to you, Georgie, that did it?”

“That I couldn’t be a wampus until I passed my N.E.W.T.s,” he said wisely, thumbing his nose, “and after that, God help her, it was out of her hands. Wise woman. Funny enough, McGonagall said the same thing. Speaking of—”

“She wants to see you, Hermione,” said Fred.

“Is she in trouble?” Harry sat up, and promptly smacked his cranial plate on the table.

“Dunno,” yawned George, amidst yowls of pain. “Don’t think so, but the old girl didn’t seem happy, either. She’s waiting in her office. Told us to escort you.”

“Actually, she told Ron,” corrected Fred, “but since he’s got a busy schedule—”

“Oh, packed — Sulk, Sulk, Double Sulk, dinner, Stare Out Window at eight, Cry Into Pillow—”

“—don’t forget Long For Harry’s Tender Embrace, that’s a staple—”

“Can’t blame him, though, that’s the Gryffindor pastime. Anyway, he delegated.” Fred rattled her chair good-naturedly. “Up with ye, Young Granger. Don’t look like that, bet you’re getting a commendation or something.”

Hermione was not reassured. She darted a look at Draco. He raised his eyebrow and pushed his chair back — but she declined with a tiny shake of her head.

“I’ll meet you in the common room,” she said. “Get a head start on Eighteenth-Century Charms, there might be something we’ve missed. And start with the appendices, they’re more efficient. And—oh!”

Trailing instructions, she made it only a few steps away from the table before she stopped, turned around, and hurried back to jab her wand under the table.

“Episkey!”

“...Thanks, Mione.”

“You’re welcome.” She turned to Draco. “Don’t let him concuss himself before I get back, would you?”

He lazily saluted.

Her smile was frail and transparent, like waterlogged paper. Then she followed Fred and George out of the library.

He watched her go. What could McGonagall want with her? Exceptional compliments on her paper? A chat about theoretical Transfiguration? A job?

“Jellyfish,” said Harry, thoughtfully, by and by.

He peered balefully under the table.

“Amusing as it would be, watching you transform into a creature that quite literally lacks a brain,” he said, “I do worry about being able to tell the difference.”

The clocks announced that it was morning, though the sky gave them little reason to believe it. It poured from midnight through breakfast, stopping playfully now and then for recesses, only to take up again whenever Harry started looking too hopeful about it. Draco dressed in layers of thick black wool — finding himself unexpectedly grateful for Mrs. Weasley’s warm, if somewhat lumpy, emerald jumper — and swept on his thickest cloak, an iridescently waterproof item in petrol black, with a spotted fur ruff and a cavernous hood that shrouded half his face. The sabled mantle broadened his shoulders and more than faintly evoked a viking.

Harry stumbled down to breakfast about ten minutes before it ended and collapsed across from Draco in a pile of wiry limbs. Hogwarts’ finest, he was not, at least not at this particular moment. Going by sight, Draco would set the over-under for his sleep quotient at three hours.

“W’zm’nee.”

Draco relocated a plate of eggs into Harry's orbit, Summoned a mug, and emptied all that remained in the coffee pot. "Eat," he said. "Drink. Elocute."

"Wuzza?"

"That was none of the above. Try again."

Harry sectioned a gelatinous ovum of egg with his spoon, held it at eye level, and grimly ingested it.

"Have you seen Hermione?" he said thickly, scrubbing his mouth with the back of his hand.

"No. Have you?"

She hadn't appeared in the common room last night, though they'd waited for her until one or two o'clock. Whatever it was she had to talk about with McGonagall, it had driven them far into the wee hours and perhaps even beyond, for when Draco came down that morning, Crookshanks was still lurking lonesomely in the armchair by the fire.

It needled him that she hadn't come back. Hermione wouldn't miss a single minute of preparation, not this close to the wire. And it would kill her if Harry went to the Second Task without saying goodbye.

"No. Stop looking at the door," said Harry. He shoved up his glasses and rubbed his eyes.

"I'm not."

"You are. It's making me nervous."

"I'm making you nervous."

"Yeah, you're not really projecting confidence, here."

"Confidence in what?"

“Exactly,” said Harry blearily. He refilled the coffee mug. “Did you see her last night?”

“No.”

“That’s weird, right?” He frowned. “Do you think it’s worth a look…?”

He was relieved he hadn’t had to suggest it. “Might as well, I suppose.”

“She wouldn’t like us doing this,” said Harry doubtfully, but he was rummaging through his satchel. “Something something, outrageous invasion of privacy...”

“Yes, yes. She can take it up with us when we know she’s not lying somewhere with her ankle shattered in a trip stair.”

“...And there’s something I wasn’t even worried about until you mentioned it, so thanks.”

“Really?” he said absently, clearing a space for the map between dishes. “First thing that occurred to me.”

The Map unfurled at the whisper of mischief managed, its inkblots flowering into towers and long labyrinthine corridors running into each other in many-axled joints. The whole castle opened up beneath them in a perfect diorama, fully studded, not one room neglected, not one name left out. Unfortunately, this was not an advantage. At this hour, there were so many people moving in so many different directions that the paper practically wriggled with the amount of ink that moved on it, and each name blurred into the ones around it. Draco could hardly pick out his own dot, trapped as it was in the smear of black lettering across the Great Hall. Across the grounds, more names, including several in French and Bulgarian, ran in ceaseless undulating waves that washed up on the shores of the Black Lake, where the names ran so thick it became an unbroken border of black: meanwhile, in the castle, the hallways were packed and streaming with names that winnowed in and out of sight as students dove off down hidden corridors or slid down staircases or simply hurtled along down to their destination. It was not picking a needle from a haystack; at least a needle was not a piece of hay. Finding any particular name on the Map just then would be like finding a single four-leaf clover in a field the size of a quidditch stadium — while sitting in the top box.

“I can’t see her. Can you?”

“Of course not, it’s hopeless,” he snapped, and flicked the Map back at Harry. “Might as well try to Summon the witch.”

He wasn’t worried about her. Obviously, if he was worried about anyone, it was Harry, who at the very least deserved to have all of his friends there to support him while he drowned.

“...Which wouldn’t work?”

“No. You can’t Summon someone, only their clothes. And anyway—”

“HEY! ’ARRY!”

Hagrid came swaggering into the hallway, trailing an eighth sea from the rain-slick tail of his greatcoat.

“Beau’iful day for it, innit?” he inquired, without a trace of irony. “Been out gettin’ the unicorn babies back inna their paddock. Their horns’ll be comin’ in any day now! Anyway.” Hagrid sat down on the Gryffindor bench, which shrieked in alarm at the unexpected load and sent a first-year flying on the other end.

“Nervous, eh, ’Arry?”

“Bit,” said Harry.

“Ha! Tha’s alrigh’. I’d’ve bin worried before I saw yeh take on tha’ Horntail, but I know now yeh can do anythin’ yeh set yer mind ter. I’m not worried at all. Yeh’re goin’ ter be fine. Got yer clue worked out, haven’ yeh?”

“Yes. Well,” said Harry, when Draco made a shrill inquiring noise, “we worked it out, Draco and Hermione and me. Together. Us.”

“Us?”

“They’re alrigh’, you know, those two,” said Hagrid, and Draco could have sworn on his mother that the half-giant winked at him. “Now, no belly for real work, mind. Can’t hardly tell a dugbog from a bowtruckle, neither. But tha’s alrigh’, you’ve got loads of tha’ yerself. ’Spect you’ll be fine. Nothin’ yeh can’t do with a few good friends.”

Except breathe, unfortunately.

“Thanks, Hagrid.”

“Don’ thank me yet! Dumbledore says I’m ter take yeh down to the Lake.” He patted Harry on the shoulder and rose to his feet, sending a cascade reaction down the bench that displaced a sixth year into his porridge. “Give yeh a chance to practice on the way down, eh? Get yeh all warmed up?” He mimed a boxer’s circling fists, grinning; to everyone’s luck, he did not actually feint a punch, which might have caved in Harry’s skull. Harry, oblivious, laughed and hopped up like skull-crunching was simply his idea of a good time.

“Keep the Map,” he told Draco. “See if you can find Hermione on it — come to think of it, you could ask Ron if he’d seen her.”

This last was adorable. Draco’s reply was silent and scathing.

“...Or not, I guess. He, er… well, if you see him, would you let him know where I am? And Hermione, if you find her?”

“Certainly. Any other messages that need sending, while you’re at it? A tax filing you’ve left overdue?”

“Git,” said Harry. “Thanks. Well, wish me luck; hope I don’t drown.”

He sounded like he was preparing to step off a cliff and trying to manifest himself a parachute through force of will.

He followed Hagrid out of the Great Hall, a pair comically mismatched in size. In the entrance, Hagrid opened his umbrella, and holding it carefully to shield Harry's head, he ushered him out into the rain.

Draco watched them and found himself wondering who would have collected Draco, if he had been in Harry's place. Who would Dumbledore have sent for him? Professor Snape? He couldn't imagine Snape holding an umbrella over his head; he'd be as likely to scold him for forgetting the Water-Repellent Charm. Professor McGonagall didn't dislike him, but he wasn't her favorite, either.

Harry had shown up at Hogwarts with nothing, and now he had a small army. How'd he done that? It had to be some sort of skill. Certainly Draco hadn't ever had the knack.

As the hour crept closer to nine, the Map swarmed with print. He peeled open every flap and pored over it with refreshed intensity. Hermione was not in the Gryffindor common room, where no one lingered but a few house-elves; she was not in the library, nor the girls' bathrooms, an exercise in extraordinary impropriety that he justified by reasoning that one could just as easily break your neck on a slippery bathroom floor as anywhere else; nor, he found, with increasing unease, was she in the Hospital Wing. She was not in the dungeons, which were empty, nor in the Defense Against the Dark Arts classroom, where, oddly, RONALD WEASLEY was loitering.

He changed tac, and searched for the Weasley twins. Those two at least could give her last known whereabouts. But they were floating uselessly down the lawns, along with most of Hogwarts Castle, to the cluster of black lines around the lake.

When his eyes drifted there, to the very furthest corner of the paper — just where the castle's borders melted into the uncharted thatching of the Forbidden Forest, which not even the Marauders had dared to plot — he found a cluster of names lurking in a small egg-sized hemisphere to the south of the castle. CHO CHANG…

FLORA CARROW… GABRIELLE DELACOUR… HERMIONE GRANGER.

The Map had planted her in the middle of the lake.

Which was absurd. Was he supposed to infer she'd opted for a morning swim? With a cohort of strangers? The Map must have been glitching. With so many people on the grounds at once, it had to happen. Enchantments misfired.

But he didn't know where else she would be. More to the point, it didn't matter. She should have been here. Hermione would have mowed her way through ten scores of grindylows just to wish Harry goodbye.

He left the Great Hall at speed.

The doors to the entrance hall floated open, buttressed by arms of icy wind and waves of half-frozen drizzle. He shoved through the packed mass of black cloaks and umbrellas, sidestepped a group of Hufflepuffs puppeteering a paper mache badger, and tripped down the lawn.

A dandelion bloom of fog lingered over the heart of the lake. The rest of it had peeled back from the banks, revealing sets of high wooden stands, dressed in the banners of the four champions.

Though miserable, the weeks of thunderstorms had paid them one favor by melting the ice on the lake, the only remnants of which now clustered in small trimmings of lace around the shores, and dangled in jagged knives from the trees. For the purposes of Harry's survival, this was an improvement. For purposes of comfort, it was not. The waters bucked and swayed, stained dark by the roof of thunderclouds above them, and the wind ripped big ribbons of water across the surface, like stripping fabric from a dress. Foam crashed each time a wave folded onto itself, and the stands groaned in the wind.

He side-checked a short Ravenclaw out of the way and ripped apart two canoodling Gryffindor third years with relish, sweeping down the mud-slick pathway to the lake like he had a hellhound on his heels. A group of girls in long leather dusters and berets giggled when he swept past them, and one whistled, calling something he didn't make out.

Rounding the bend by Hagrid's hut, he sidestepped a rat-nosed Ravenclaw and slammed into a wall.

Or what felt like one, anyway. He went keeling into the side of the hut and slipped on a glassy crust of frost, pinwheeling into the mud.

When he blinked his vision back, starry-eyed and snarling, he found the brick wall was actually a person, though going by expression, the difference was frankly scant: it was Ron. The boy was sprawled across a pumpkin like the centerfold of Redheads Monthly.

"Watch where you're going!"

"You watch where you're going," snapped Ron, shoving himself upright. "What's got you in such a hurry?"

"One, none of your business. Two, none of your business, and three, how the hell did you get down here? I thought you were in the Defense classroom. Also, none of your business."

Ron's nose wrinkled.

"How—" He stopped, winced, and gave a metered exhale. "The Map?"

"No, there's a tracker on the rod up your arse. We've had your location for weeks. What do you think?"

"I've got a rod up my—" Again, Ron stopped himself. He placed his hands together and breathed deeply, and when he opened his eyes, they were the clear, fierce blue of whitewater rapids. "Never mind," he snapped. “There’s a secret passageway from the Godric statue into Hagrid’s cellar. The twins showed me. That’s not important, though. Listen, Malfoy: what’s the plan?”

Draco blinked. “What’s the plan?” he said incredulously. He rolled up into a kneeling position, massaging his spine where Ron had knocked it practically through Hagrids wall. With his luck, he’d have displaced a disc. “Oh, now you’re taking an interest, are you? Have you got money riding on it?”

“Shut up. I know you and Hermione came up with something for him, so what is it? And if you say it’s the Bubble-Head, I’ll give your head another knock, because we both know Harry can’t, and it was a waste of time—”

“You’ve got an exceptional nerve, you know, coming in at this hour —”

“Malfoy!”

“Fine,” he said, startled. “There isn’t a plan. Currently, Potter’s best bet is to part the waters like the Red Sea.”

Ron’s eyes bugged. “He can’t do that.”

“No, really?”

“I just — Merlin, what have you been doing for the past month? You sent him out there with bloody nothing?”

“Fat lot of help you were!”

“I thought you had it handled! I thought you and Hermione would figure it out!”

“Well, next time you take a sabbatical from caring about Potter’s life,” snarled Draco, shoving himself upright, “we’ll be sure to give you some take-home assignments.”

“Oh, fuck you!”

“Fuck you!”

“Fuck you more!”

“Fuck you for running off and leaving him—”

“Fuck you for what you said about Burrow—”

“Fine!”

Ron blinked in surprise.

“But admit you were horrid to Granger.”

“Wh— I didn’t say anything about Hermione!”

“Parents? Animals?”

“Oh. Don’t give me that. You are a shit about her parents,” snapped Ron. “I don’t know why she lets you get away with it, when she damn well wouldn’t let me or Harry do the same.”

“Are you joking? She doesn’t let me ‘get away’ with anything. She jumps down my throat every time I mention blood—”

“You’re lucky you still have a throat, after some of the things you’ve said,” said Ron incredulously, “and she cuts you massive slack, mate, I don’t know how you miss it. You’re a big — big bloody elitist, is what you are. Do you even know how much it bothers her, the way you talk to Daphne?”

“Why,” he said, his teeth gritted so tight they’d soon crack, “does everyone insist on bringing up Daphne Greengrass?”

“Because it’s bad as French, sometimes! The way you get around each other!” Ron threw up his hands. “Like you’ve got this secret club you don’t even bother to explain to us, the airs and the etiquette lessons and the ‘suitable’ dates and everything, and then you’re surprised when we’re offended, like: ‘Gosh, don’t be stupid, you’re so far below us it’s not even offensive for us to exclude you! Oh, but don’t worry! It doesn’t really matter! The only people who really care are, you know, all of our families! But we’re willing to sit with you peasants, so clearly, we’re the good ones!’”

When he was finished his breath guttered in steaming bursts from his nose, like dragonsmoke.

“And Hermione just — takes it,” he gasped. “For you. And I don’t have a bloody clue why.”

Draco drew himself up to his full height. It put him roughly at eye level with Ron.

“What you don’t know about me and Hermione could fill a library.”

A cool splash of light rain stung their faces, like a wave of sand.

“No shit,” said Ron, like he was very stupid indeed.

Draco closed his eyes. It occurred to him how deeply silly the whole thing was.

They were shouting at each other in the middle of a pumpkin patch. Meanwhile, Harry was standing alone on a dock in the lake, the poor bastard, preparing for a Task he wasn’t remotely competent to handle, and Hermione was still missing.

“This is, you realize,” he said, “the worst possible place, or time, to have this conversation.”

“What doesn’t happen now, happens never.”

“What?”

“S’ what my mum says,” he mumbled. “Usually when she wants a chore done.”

There was a sober beat.

“Is she well?”

“Huh?”

“Your mother,” he clarified. “How is she?”

“She’s… good, I think.”

“And your father? Enjoying his work?”

“I reckon,” said Ron, bewildered.

Draco nodded stiffly. “They were generous hosts,” he said. “Custom demands a certain level of reciprocity.”

“...What?”

“They can come for tea,” he snapped.

Ron blinked at him. His mouth twitched.

“Be careful with that,” he said. “You don’t want my mum getting a good look at your inheritance. She’ll be auctioning off Ginny’s maidenhead over sandwiches.”

“Dowry haggling is a hallowed tradition. My mother would give her a fair price.”

Ron snickered. Draco took a deep breath.

“I have said things.”

He stopped snickering.

“Uncharitable things.”

“Malfoy,” Ron began, tiredly.

“I have,” he said, “a talent for it.”

Ron quieted, his head cocked, like he was more interested than offended. “So, what?” he said. “It just ‘slipped out’? I’m not s’posed to take it seriously, because you call takesies-backsies? You were fucking awful.”

“You know, I do actually — never mind. You — it was inconceivable that you wouldn’t take it seriously. That was the point. If someone had said that to me, I would have dueled them.”

“And that’s what you wanted? To hit me? Do you honestly think that’s better?”

“My point,” he said, with difficulty, “is that I am exceptionally good at lying.”

They surveyed each other, furtively.

“You’re such a twat,” sighed Ron.

“Fine then, never mind!”

“I figured it out,” he muttered. “While I was away. I knew I’d botched it as soon as I left, I was a shit. I know. It was my... I started the fight, me and my stupid mouth, but that's why I felt like I couldn't... I wanted to come back, but I didn’t know how. I thought maybe — and this makes me sound like a total arse, okay, I know that, but — have you ever just wanted to be missed?”

“Obviously.”

And Ron seemed surprised.

“You're not the first one to do this, you know. I thought you had remembered.”

“Oh,” he said, pausing. “Yeah. Did you... I mean, but everything's easier, in second year.”

“Typical Weasley, putting the work off to the last minute.”

Ron snickered.

“Yeah,” he said vaguely. “Like — I dunno. They respected you, though, even when they were pissed at you. And they need you. Harry needs all of us, that’s how he is, he hasn’t got anyone else, and Hermione — I mean, sometimes I think you’ve got remote control of each other’s heads or something, I dunno what all’s going on with that, but whatever it is, ‘need’ is probably in it somewhere. And yeah, I’m jealous of that, sure. No point trying to put the kneazle back in the bag on that one, I guess. But that’s not all it is. You get it, don’t you? How it’s different?” He paused. “And then you come in talking about my house—”

“I didn’t mean that.”

“Okay, sure, but you said it, though—”

“Fine. You called me a twat.”

“No, I meant that one,” said Ron at once.

Draco waited for offense to settle in, but it drifted over him harmlessly, stinging lightly without taking.

“So what?” he said. “What do you want?”

Ron considered him. “I want you to say something nice about me,” he decided.

“That’s it?”

“Yeah. I want you to say something nice.”

“Fine. You’re good at chess. Square?”

“I — no, I mean — well. Hang on. You think I’m good—?”

“Oh. Not this.”

Ron was perplexed. “What d’you mean?”

“If this is about being needed,” he said impatiently, “then there’s a boy out there who stops wanting to live when you’re not talking to him, and I assure you, he doesn’t feel the same way about anyone else. Also, if you don’t come back soon he’s going to try to teach me to arm-wrestle, and I will quite simply never forgive you.”

A horn crooned from the stands, rippling queerly across the water. A bellow of excitement followed from the crowds.

“Shit!”

“Well said.” He broke into a run.

“Wait — hang on! Malfoy! Draco!”

“What?”

Ron seized his arm and hauled him back, and nearly dislocated his shoulder, at that. He really did have an arm for quidditch. “Here,” he blurted, fumbling through his pockets. He wrenched out a handful of something that looked like shoelaces marinated in bile, and Draco balked in horror.

“What the hell is that?”

“Gillyweed,” Ron said proudly. And, ignoring Draco’s cry of horror, he slapped the pustule of gray noodles into Draco’s palm. The texture was worse than it looked, and that was no small thing. “Get that to Harry and tell him to eat it. It’ll let him breathe underwater.”

“What? How do you know? And where did you find it?”

“Explain later. The Task’s starting. Go!”

He gazed with doubt at the slimy hash in his palm. He had a very hard decision to make: whether to let Harry take his chances, alone, with nothing, or to trust Ron Weasley — a man with no great knack for Herbology, or any other field of magic, really — when he said that he had solved a Task meant for seventh-year wizards of tremendous skill.

He closed his fist around the gillyweed and ran.

“Oi! And where’s Hermione? I couldn’t find her!”

He ignored him and raced down to the lake, his cloak sweeping the mud behind him in a small spray of displaced frost.

The precise combination of acrobatics and violence that carried him to the top of the stands would later elude him, though he had a keen physical memory of his ears clouding up from the intermittent roars and his legs tingling from the strain of a breathless ascent up the stairs. It was the only way into the stands, though he knew Harry would not be there. The judges sat in a gilded box of their own, framed by scores of crowded stands. There was a tent on the dock, tucked under a hemisphere of shimmery Heating Charms. It was gold, and embroidered with the Hogwarts crest.

A harsh wind lifted from the scalloped bowl of the lake and thrust its icy fingers into the stands, snatched a loose red scarf from its owner’s neck, and passed it into the waiting hand of Theo. He was the youngest member by a decade in a box full of Ministry officials, his father among them.

“Lost your seat?” he roared to Draco. “Come up, we’ve a spare! You remember my father!”

Sibelius Nott inclined his face from beneath the deep cowl of an umbrella, observed him, and gave a thin-lipped nod. Behind him sat Brutus Travers, looking small, wet, and miserable, clutching a dragonhead cane, and on Theo’s other flank sat a man Draco vaguely recognized, though not by name, for he had last seen him when he'd dropped a bookshelf on him.

He was an auror. He wore a bowler hat, and a ghoulish scar running up his right cheek, plunging through his eye, and splintering off at his eyebrow. The scarring on his cornea was glassy and thick.

"Draco, this is Odin Davis," said Theo, "my father's right hand, which makes him the Minister's, what, right knucklebone, I suppose? Number one silver bullet stockpiler in Britain, by the way, if you ever need one, just don't call on full moons—"

"Theodore."

Sibelius' mouth moved little when he spoke. Most of the sounds came from growling ululations in his throat. Theo's mouth, meanwhile, kept running like a carriage careening down a slope.

"He vetted Mad-Eye for the Defense position, did you know? Did you even know Mad-Eye was vetted? Of course, it had to be an auror, after last year, and Mad-Eye was the only one Dumbledore could get my father to agree on."

"Theodore!"

Theo waved a hand over his shoulder and drew Draco out of earshot. "Anyway," he said conspiratorially, "the good money's on Cassius to win it, but I've put my whole inheritance on Potter for second place, after that performance with the Horntail, and also to shut Goyle up about Krum. Didn't want to, mind, but Pans said I had to start showing off these so-called 'principles' I'm hiding up my bloomers. Don't tell her I said that, her darling head won't fit through the doors. This is all to say I'll have to snap my wand and kill myself if Potter takes third, so I hope he's a strong swimmer."

"He can't swim," said Draco, who had heard only half of this. He was scanning the crowd for a way into the champions' tent.

“What,” said Theodore flatly.

“He can dog-paddle, he’s not helpless. But he can’t swim properly. His m— his family never taught him.”

“He can’t swim?”

“Nott, I didn’t realize you cared. Have you told him how you feel?”

“Draco! Really! Do you realize how embarrassing it’s going to be if Hogwarts finishes last? After what Diggory did at the dance?”

“It’s a low priority at the moment. And — hang on, what’s your problem with Diggory?”

“Are you blind? That business with Macdonald, are you serious?”

“That? I never understood what your problem was — you’re already friends with Zabini, and he’s the loudest rumor in the castle since Godric’s harem—”

“A rumor I’m fairly certain Blaise started, because he thinks it’s funny, and that’s different. Blaise is rich and discreet and irrelevant, he’s basically an upjumped merchant, but Diggory is a Diggory, which is, supposedly, important — but listen, does Potter have any hope? At all?”

“He might. I need to get to the champions’ tent.”

“You’re killing me here,” said Theo, dumbfounded. “Now?”

“Or anytime before the Second Task starts, you know, you’ve at least forty-five seconds to decide—”

“Fine! Fine! Give me a moment.”

Theo wrestled back into the box, clambering without much dignity over Odin Davis’ knees, and grabbed his father’s shoulder. Sibelius cast him off with a sharp gesture of the elbow, and chastised, Theo drew back; but then his father turned his head, and they had a brief, fast exchange in low voices interspersed with nodding, talking like coworkers engaged on a joint project. Sibelius reached into his robe pocket and with an almost bored expression dangled a small billfold of purple leather, hooked on one finger, which Theo plucked out of his hand and made off with. He gave neither acknowledgement nor thanks. Neither of them looked at each other when it was done.

Draco had never known his father, except as a young boy. The proper conduct of fathers and sons, in public, or otherwise, would forever be a mystery to him. If Lucius had lived, it was quite possible he would have treated Draco the same way, and it wouldn't have meant that he loved him any less. But he couldn't imagine Arthur Weasley doing the same.

"Here," Theo said tightly, stuffing the billfold into Draco's breast pocket. "That's a Ministry pass, it'll get you through the wards around the tent. Down the staircase, around the back, second door, and if anyone asks you what you're doing, just scowl."

"Thank you," he said, after a stunned beat. Half of Theo was utterly insufferable, half of him downright decent, and the problem was that he could also be both at once.

"Don't thank me," he muttered. "This isn't generosity, I really do have a bet with Greg. Go."

Perhaps to relieve any lingering awkwardness of gratitude, he shoved Draco down the stairs.

He plummeted past three rows of seats before catching himself, which both gave him a head start on running and freed from his lips a word that made every man in Sibelius Nott's box turn their heads.

The wards around the champions' tent admitted him with a burble of magic. A Ministry attendant squeaked at him as he swept past, and he flashed the billfold without opening it. The attendant quailed and scuttled back, thankfully declining to inspect it any further. The flap to the champions' tent bulged and parted at the twitch of his wand.

The tent, lit well by camping lanterns, was warm and crowded. Fleur and Cassius lay on sofas around a deep fire pit, relaxed supine like marble statues, adorned with as little clothing as possible to reveal the artist's talent for form — close-fitting swim shirts and pants that terminated high on the thigh, in pale gold and ice-silver. Behind them lurked the dark idol of Krum, his red undershirt pulled taut across a bear's chest of muscle, and as Draco swept in, they traded chilly looks.

Harry sprang up from his chair. "What happened? Is Hermione alright?"

"Eez it time to start?" said Fleur, eyeing him with so little curiosity it registered as active disgust.

"Nothing. Possibly. No. Potter, come here."

Cassius' eyes followed them as they went.

In a musty corner of the tent, he flashed the slimy contents of his palm, wedged them firmly into Harry's hand, and then wiped his fingers on Harry's shirt.

Harry reacted as any cogent person would: he yelped and jerked his hand away.

"Ew! Yuck! What?"

"That's gillyweed, you ungrateful brat, and don't drop it. It'll probably taste worse with dirt on. Here's what you're going to do. You're going to put that in your mouth, and you're going to keep it there, and when the Task starts, you're going to swallow it."

His eyes swelled nearly beyond the rims of his glasses. "And it'll work? I'll breathe underwater?"

“Yes.”

“How?”

“Magic, idiot.” He had no idea.

Harry grinned. Draco, having been around this block more times than he cared to acknowledge, sighed and held out his arms.

The hug punched open valves in his lungs he’d forgotten about, cracked that disc from earlier straight back into place, and, had he been choking, would have forcefully dislodged any solid objects loitering in his trachea. Harry had a promising career in mediwizardry.

“I knew you’d figure it out!”

“What are you doing back zhere?” Fleur shrilled over her shoulder. “Champions are not to receive ‘elp!”

“Nothing! He’s not! He — er — brought me a bite to eat,” blurted Harry.

Fleur’s mouth thinned. “Personally, I do not like to win by cheating,” she said. “But perhaps zhis eez because I am French.”

Draco narrowed his eyes. “Votre dossier suggère que vous n'aimez pas du tout gagner.”

Cassius snickered.

She whipped her head around, smacking Cassius in the face with several newtons of blonde. “Qu'est-ce que tu m'as dit, petit furet d’homme?”

She was filling her lungs for another run of inflammatory French when the tent flap burst, and in flounced Percy Weasley, followed by Dumbledore, Karkaroff, Maxime, and Crouch.

“Champions! Gather!” announced Percy, who was clearly having the time of his life. “Miss Delacour, Mr. Warrington, thank you! Mr. Krum! Hello, Mr. Potter!”

“Percy, mate, we shared a shower.”

“Speak up if you have a question, thank you, Mr. Potter!” said Percy loudly. “Otherwise, silence, please! We’re in a hurry! And you, Mr. Malfoy — Mr. Malfoy?” He peered hawkishly over his spectacles, blinking, and for a moment he resembled his mother very much. “What are you doing?”

“...Leaving?”

“Indeed! Please do!” said Percy, strangled.

Dumbledore smiled serenely at him as he passed. If there he caught a wink somewhere, hidden behind that crag of snow-white beard, then he ascribed it to a hyperactive imagination running on adrenaline afterburn.

He climbed back up the rickety staircases into the stands, and crested a row of seats so packed there was no hope of recovering a good one for himself. He searched the stands, navigating by the ginger constellations of the Weasley clan: Fred and George led the Gryffindor boxes in chorus, while Lee Jordan conducted from his mount atop their shoulders. Ginny and Neville bundled together beneath a fleece blanket near the back. Ron sat with Daphne in a box by the railing. He had loaned her his scarf, and she was swaddled in an unusual shade of red, warm, preening, and happy as a clam.

He wanted to know where Hermione was. He would have seen her by now. She was impossible not to notice, with the hair, and the magnetism, and whatnot.

Across the lake, the fog curdled. He wondered why the Ministry was bothering to maintain the Disillusionment Charm, even now, when it was obvious the Task would be in the lake.

Where was she? It was distracting.

The Map said she'd been on the lake. But that wasn't possible. She couldn't be on the lake, and unless she was in the dungeons, she couldn't be beneath it. The dungeons didn't extend that far, anyway. She would have to be in the lake. Under it.

Draco almost tore the Map when he ripped it out of his bag.

"WELLLLLLLLCOME TO THE TRIWIZARD TOURNAMENT!"

A hiss of its password sent ink blooming over its pages, slower than it had ever been before.

"Our champions have prepared for months! Studying! Practicing! Training! Learning! AND! It was all! For! This! Moment! Deep in the fathoms of the Black Lake, champions will have precisely one hour to recover something taken from them! Any later… well! They won't have a second chance!"

Curlicues of ink twined together into the shape of the lake, and one darted across its surface, swirling into a cluster of names at its heart. Hermione Granger.

Flora Carrow had come to the Yule Ball with Cassius. Cho had gone with Harry. Gabrielle Delacour he didn't know, but he could muster a guess.

And Hermione, of course, had made the mistake of going with Krum.

"WISH THEM LUCK, LADS! We'll start on my whistle! On the count of three: One! Two! Three!"

People. Something taken. She was in the lake—

"Weasley!"

At least four heads turned. A lash of his wand cut a path through the crowd, scattering people and cries of dismay, and he darted through the fleeting chasm.

“Oh, hello, Draco!”

He ignored Daphne. Most of his brain had been shifted onto autopilot.

“She’s in the lake.”

“What? Who?”

“Look! Harry’s doing something!” Daphne pointed. A wide white screen of rippling parchment so large it must have been skinned from dragonhide had unfolded over the judges’ table, and across this screen spilled a bleary vision of the four champions, flickering between them, in the same way as the World Cup’s Spell-O-Vision projector. First a wide shot of Cassius and Fleur, still standing on the dock, flicking flawless Bubble-Head Charms from the tips of their wands, and executing a pair of nearly synchronous swan-dives into the water; then to Krum, who had done something to the upper half of his body, and now hurtled through the water in a blur of gray, cutting too deep into the kelp for the Spell-O-Vision to follow him; and then, finally, Harry, who was thrashing under the water, clutching his neck. He did not seem able to breathe.

“I’ve killed him,” Ron said hoarsely, transfixed.

“I don’t care. Do you hear me? Granger’s in the lake. The prize is hostages.”

Ron tore his watery eyes from the screen. “What?”

“THEY’RE OFF!” bellowed Bagman. “Now, I said first thing, a Bubble-Head is the way to go with this one, and that’s just what Warrington and Delacour have done. Textbook Charm work, flawless execution — of course, it’s down to them to keep concentration, which will be no easy thing, with what we've got in store! Now, Krum, on the other hand, he's taking a risk with human Transfiguration, devilishly hard, sometimes irreversible if you get it wrong, and he's done a full head-and-shoulders, which is even harder. He'll be aiming to get points for sophistication, he lost those in the First Task… and Harry Potter, well, he's just not having a good time, is he?"

Harry had stopped thrashing and started to sink. His hands floated above his head. Through the green filmy texture of the waves, the light winked through pale webbed slits between them. Rough ridges scarred either side of his neck, and a marbled vein of blood spiraled from one flap.

"What are we s'posed to do?" Ron said helplessly. "If she's down there, it's up to Harry."

"We find Dumbledore—"

"Tell him what? Lodge a complaint, will you?"

"—slap him with a lawsuit that'll make the Board piss itself, I'll take this place to the fucking cleaner's—"

Harry's eyes opened, and they were luminous, with wide slitted pupils, like a frog's.

"GILLYWEED!" howled Bagman. "Yes! There's something I didn't think we'd see today! Rare as hen's teeth, only grows in certain underwater conditions, farmed by mermaids, and they won't sell it for less than a pound of flesh, those greedy gulpies! But Potter's found some! And he's moving fast!"

"—or hex his beard into snakes, if that doesn't work — this is heinously fucking irresponsible— she could drown!"

"Oi!" someone hollered at Draco, waving him down. "Siddown! You're blockin' the view!"

Draco wrenched out his wand, and the fourth year paled as he realized his mistake.

Now the projector switched to Fleur. Cassius had dove deep to the bottom of the lake, while she floated near the surface, her swimsuit silhouetted by cool sunlight.

“You’d think that was safer,” remarked Bagman, “but in fact not! She’s very visible up there, which means — unless I’m wrong — ah, but I’m not!”

Grindylows swarmed out of the weeds at Fleur’s feet. Their horned faces leered out of the dark, a knot of tentacles swirling behind each one. They shot tiny, wriggling jets of boiling water from between their fangs, and Fleur didn’t see them until they were too close; one leapt up and snared its tentacles around her ankle.

“Ooh! Bad luck, Miss Delacour! You want to deal with grindylows early. Otherwise—”

Otherwise, they’ll swarm. The voice in Draco’s ear was Lupin’s. It had been a cool, bright day in November, and the D.A.D.A. class had been on a field trip to the Lake, and Lupin had picked his way through the shallows in waders, shouting: They’re pack hunters, grindylows! Nothing to sniff at, if you get one on its own — carnivorous, paralytic venom, but stupid as the day as long. Their real strength is in numbers. Give them five minutes, and it’s not one you’re dealing with, it’s fifty. I — whoops! There’s one, now!

And then he’d reached into the water and hauled one up by the tentacles, shaking it around like a beater’s bat, and laughing as it squirmed helplessly. Lavender had swooned. So had Harry.

It had seemed a lot more helpless in Lupin’s hand than it did now, with three latched to Fleur’s legs, and pulling. She kicked and screamed. Senescent cracks of light flared and soared from her wand, curses that veered shy of the grindylows and blackened nearby fronds of kelp with char.

“She can’t try anything too nasty, or she’ll hit her own legs,” remarked Bagman. Four more grindylows rose out of the weed.

But the Spell-O-Vision changed, and it was Krum, hurtling through the water, as a dark shape of immense size shifted and roiled in the depths below him.

Harry was cutting through the water like something born to it. The same couldn’t be said for Cassius, who was floundering through a kelp thicket, but even he fared much better than Fleur, who had taken on so many grindylows that her Bubble-Head was starting to flicker.

Beneath the screen, the judges had taken to chatting with one another. Karkaroff and Maxime were conferring politely, with occasional gestures to the lake. Meanwhile, Barty Crouch appeared very green indeed, and somewhat thinner than Draco had last seen him. Dumbledore was speaking to him in a harsh murmur that left little room for interjection, his whole body turned towards Crouch, while Crouch himself gazed unseeingly at the lake. At one point he shook Crouch by the shoulder, jolting him, and still Crouch barely turned his head.

What was the point of this thankless misery? The Task was bad enough: why leave him feeling like he was drowning, too? The champions would have done anything the Tournament told them to do. They didn’t need to take hostages. There wasn’t a reason Hermione was at the bottom of the lake. If Harry didn’t make it— if she drowned—

Think. He twisted his signet ring around his finger and bent hard, stabbing a ring of pressure into the flesh of his finger. Pain twinged. It reminded him of his mother and father. It reminded him of the world outside the Tournament. This wasn’t quidditch. There were other games to play.

None of the hostages were purebloods. Scratch that — Carrow was. But Carrow had a stain on her ledger. Hermione and Cho both had muggle parents, and if Theo was right, the Delacours were half-breeds. And why hadn't they taken Roger Davies, for Fleur? Everyone else's Yule Ball date had been taken, but for her, they took family. Krum had family, too, didn't he? He'd barely known Hermione for a month. How did she count as what you'll sorely miss?

He was going to sorely miss the structural integrity of his skull, if he didn't save her.

Minutes ticked by. Fleur had turned to panicked hacking at the grindylows with erratic curses that missed as often as they struck true. Krum was fighting something too vast for the projector to capture correctly, with tendrils that kept flickering in and out of view. Harry and Cassius hadn't been in sight for full minutes. It was hard to think. He wanted to know what they'd used for her breathing apparatus. They wouldn't make her do her own, would they? They'd give her something to keep her breathing. Her Bubble-Head Charm was strong. Not that strong, though. And Hermione's focus turned to eggshell under pressure.

The pressure in his head intensified. No use. He was going to stop breathing.

He should never, under any conditions, have felt helpless. That was the point of having everything, wasn't it? He was heir to fifteen generations of pureblood breeding, an exceptional potioneer, a consummate spellcaster and curse adept, a natural on a broomstick, a perfect swimmer, and he could do what? He could do bugger all. If she drowned then that was that, and a great use he'd been, very bloody grateful she'd be that he'd come into her life. What fucking use was any of it if he was going to stand here like the fat stone legs of Ozymandias with a front-row seat to her murder.

The wind cut a filmy knife of freshwater spray into the air, catching the first several rows of seats. Siphoning Charms erupted over the sea of cloaks like a garden of silvery flowers. Karkaroff and Maxime raised their own wands in defense, Siphoning the spray from the very air, but Dumbledore ignored them, so engrossed was he in his heated conversation with Crouch. Crouch didn’t raise his wand, either. He just kept staring at the lake.

On the Spell-O-Vision, one of the grindylows leapt for Fleur’s face. Its claws scored the side of her Bubble-Head Charm, and it popped. A small explosion of air bubbles bleached the water around her face and she vanished under them. No one could hear her scream — it was eerie and silent, like Colin’s moving photography — but the stands compensated with a roar of dismay. Bagman was hollering something about keeping calm. The Beauxbatons students were the loudest, but people from Durmstrang and Hogwarts were on their feet, too: it didn’t matter that they were rooting against her. Nobody wanted to watch a young girl drown.

Dumbledore leapt to his feet. Maxime was already up, shouting something at Crouch, but he remained unresponsive, and in any case, Dumbledore didn’t wait on his cue: he swept down the dock and shook out the billowing sleeve of his periwinkle robe, aiming his wand at the lake.

The incantation was lost to the roar of the stands. The effect was not. An invisible cleaver plunged deep into the lake, and towering wings of water soared up like the white pinions of a forty-foot swan. Water surged from the spell’s path in a thousand glistening strands. Spears of foam raced to pierce the iron shield of the sky. The sound followed after a heartbeat’s delay, like the lagging trail of thunder: a clap like a sonic boom. It rocked the stands and brought the whole howling mass of students to their knees, clasping their ears.

From between the wings of water, Fleur rose like a gothic Venus. She was limp, her skin pallid and clammy from water and cold, her hair twisted in soggy rattails, like a dark gold collar around her neck. Her head lolled on her shoulder.

Dumbledore drew back his wand, the other hand outstretched, as if balancing a length of invisible wire. Fleur drifted forward, her toes skimming white foam from the surface of the lake, and floated onto the dock. She settled onto the wood, and her body was still. Then Dumbledore touched his wand to her temple, and there was a flare of light like the striking of a match.

Fleur shot up, rolled over, and vomited about a gallon of water onto the dock.

The water from Dumbledore's spell plummeted back into the lake. The splash folded up and pounded the stands. Almost too late, Draco threw up a Shield Charm, and water slammed into the translucent shield like the backhand of a great beast. It shuddered, white lights of pressure flickering across the surface, but it held.

Not all students were so lucky. Ron and Daphne caught the full force of it, and emerged from the deluge a moment later, soaked to the bone and gasping for breath. Screams of commingled delight and irritation broke out; some people found the impromptu splash much more charming than others. Ginny was wringing her hair out, cackling madly; Lavender, whose makeup had been turned into something by Monet, was not.

Residual water drizzled from the stands above him, dampening Draco's hair. Most people had been doused. But even this indignation was met by an approving roar of relief: Fleur was alive.

Bagman was bellowing something about disqualification. Dumbledore had returned to the judges' table, where he was arguing with Crouch about something. Mediwizards, Ministry workers, and a few teachers, McGonagall among them, were racing down the stairs to the docks as if there was a prize in it for them. Maxime had flung herself to her knees beside her student, and was holding Fleur's head to her chest with an oddly maternal affect; Fleur, disgruntled, pushed her aside and leaned over to vomit some more over the dock.

"Beauxbatons doesn't teach Care of Magical Creatures," said Daphne, breathy with relief. "Poor thing. She couldn't have known."

“What kind of bloody school doesn’t teach Magical Creatures?” demanded Ron.

“Their focus is a very — ah — abstract kind of magic, Beauxbatons. No creatures, no Divination, no quidditch team. Easily the best school in Europe for magical theory, though.”

“An UNFORTUNATE END, for Miss Delacour!” said Bagman, far too chipper. “But she seems well! Thank you, Professor Dumbledore! But don’t sit down just yet! I believe our first SUCCESSFUL return may be upon us!”

Fleur’s face suggested that she had a few ideas for an ‘unfortunate end’ of Bagman’s own.

The lake stirred. Bubbles rose from the soup of foam left by Dumbledore’s spell, and colors shimmered under the water.

A pair of heads broke the surface. Disappointment lanced his gut. It was Cassius and Flora, who clung to his back the bucking current and took greedy gulps of air. Flora looked like she had been run several times through a centrifuge with a bucket of soap-water and a weasel. Cassius lifted his arm weakly, to wave at the stands, which had exploded for him; Flora hid part of her face in the water, and shivered.

“WELL! WELL! PLEASE, QUIET!” Bagman was trying and failing to contain the stands. Draco had rarely seen Slytherin so wild. Marcus Flint and Millicent Bulstrode were half out of the box, roaring; Gregory Goyle was doing some sort of fan-dance with his jersey. Theo was on his feet, applauding heartily, but he was quite pale, and Draco wondered belatedly if he hadn’t been anxious for Cassius, after all. It must have been stressful to have the performance of Slytherin House on trial, before the Ministry and all three schools — but Sibelius Nott didn’t appear to be pleased or displeased, either way, so perhaps it was his father’s presence that set him on edge. Fair enough. It certainly did Draco.

Madame Maxime and some Mediwizards helped Fleur limp off into the champions' tent, while several more waited with Dumbledore, at the end of the dock, to help the pair. Cassius hauled himself gracefully onto land, where Dumbledore shook his hand and said something that made Cassius' smile flag, just for a moment.

"THE FIRST CHAMPION!" cried Bagman, with gusto. "CASSIUS WARRINGTON, FROM HOGWARTS, HAS SUCCESSFULLY COMPLETED THE SECOND TASK! LET'S HEAR IT FOR HIM— oh, well, you're doing that already."

Mediwizards swarmed. A blonde woman with an alligator handbag was hurrying down the dock, full-speed, while camera flashbulbs peppered the air with lightning. Cassius leaned back to help Flora from the water — but once she was wobbling upright on two legs, he withdrew his hand and stepped away, with a brisk, cold double-step that made clear its sole purpose was the establishment of distance. He tucked his hands behind his back. Flora ducked her head and let her hair hang around her face, glowering silently, while Cassius lifted his head and his hands to the roaring hundreds. They didn't look at each other.

Then Madame Pomfrey swept Cassius and Flora under one arm each, and like horses, she drove them fiercely toward the champions' tent, very nearly bulldozing the blonde woman under her feet. A pair of Ministry workers took her by the arm and led her away, squalling in protest, while the water once more turned to froth.

"AND ANOTHER!" roared Bagman. "OUR THIRD CHAMPION RETURNS — JUST OVER THE WIRE — WHO'LL IT BE?"

He hoped it wasn't Harry.

As soon as he discovered this feeling, lurking insidiously under his breastbone, he reeled in unhappiness at it, and tried to shove it into a drawer — but it wouldn't go. It had to be Krum. A mutinous share of his will demanded it. He wanted Harry to live. But it had to be Krum.

The worst part, he thought, was that it didn't even surprise him, that feeling. It settled in with the faint cold sting of snowfall, seen approaching from a distant sky. He knew the reason. He'd known for a while, really. It was just horrible. Only in a moment as horrible as this could he let the other thing come into his brain, because there was nothing to fear in it now — not like there would be at any other time, anyway — and so he could take it and glance at it, peripherally, with the closest he had yet come to acknowledgement of the thing that for several months had been living in the cellar of his mind.

He liked her. He liked her too much.

Two more heads broke out of the lake. Neither was Harry's.

Krum burst from the water with a hoarse shout, and latched onto the side of the dock. Hermione clung to his shoulders. He had never seen her less happy in his life, and that included several interludes of mortal peril. She was spluttering, soaked, spitting water and rage, her hair a damp wilderness trawling in the water behind her, a Waterhouse's Circe to Fleur's Venus — certainly not lovely, unless you had a taste for drowned cats — but alive, and breathing, in furious good health.

He leaned on the railing and ducked his head in a humiliation of relief.

Hermione clung to Krum as if he were the last buoyant object in the world. The usual irritation swelled and then passed feebly through him like flour through a sieve. He could not give a real goddamn, in that moment, if she was cozied up to Viktor Krum, or even if she went and snogged him — which would still be disgusting — because the wretched dunce had gone and saved her. Which put Draco in the intolerable position of having to be grateful to a man he otherwise wanted to divest of all his toenails, individually, serially, and creatively.

This could not be allowed to happen again. The peril part, or the watching part, or the someone-else part. He refused it. It was not to be borne.

“IN SECOND PLACE: VIKTOR KRUM! COMING JUST INSIDE THE TIME LIMIT — WHOOPS, CAREFUL, THERE—”

Hermione was struggling to get out of the water. She slipped on the dock, almost toppled back into the lake, and was caught at the last moment by Krum and a mediwizard. She snapped at them in displeasure and pulled herself up, but having both the dexterity and upper body strength of a robust twig, she ended up almost hauling the mediwizard into the lake. Krum laughed, and she shouted some more at him. Draco smirked.

Finally they deposited her on the dock, and she crawled up. She surged to her feet and shoved away the mediwizards, grimacing, only for her ankle to twist, knees stiff from the frigid waters, and pitch her immediately face-first onto the dock.

He sucked a breath through his teeth.

Hermione sat up, pressing the back of her hand to her nose, her face a crumple of pain. When she lowered her hand, a stem of red laced the distance from lip to nostril. Krum extended a hand to help her up, and she swatted it away, saying something sharp and inaudible. The mediwizard appeared to have progressed from pleading to orders, and was gesturing for two more mediwizards to come assist him.

She lashed the back of her hand across her lip, a short, sharp gesture of irritation more than pain, and he recognized it. It was his gesture. It was also hers.

If he could have Apparated to the dock, he would have. If he could have performed a Disillusionment Charm, he would have. He would have given her — privacy, at least, or some room to breathe. He would have jinxed one of the mediwizards who kept bothering her, astoundingly, as if she hadn’t just been dropped in a freezing lake and punted out, soaking wet, in front of everyone she’d ever cared about impressing. If asked, he could write an article on everything

Hermione would have hated about this situation, and she could have written a book.

The feeling of indignation, none of which was wholly his own, swelled to fill the full breadth of his chest and permeated him with the heat-dizziness of anger. The least they could do was not touch her.

He hated that feeling. It usually meant he was going to do something stupid or dangerous.

Draco eyed the distance between the railing and the dock, judged it, and sighed.

It was a ‘both’ kind of day.

He vaulted the railing.

Several screams broke out. Someone shouted something about stopping him, which was nice, but unnecessary. He floated for a moment in freefall, and landed with a hard shudder on the dock. His knees buckled and he dropped into a crouch — Madam Hooch’s first lesson had been how to land a fall — and then let his momentum carry him back upright, sweeping his cloak out of the way. With admirably little wobbling, he swaggered down the unoccupied dock.

Several people were shouting at him, but he ignored them. McGonagall had managed to scuttle Krum and Hermione back to the champions’ tent, and he swept in after them, tagging on the heels of a group of mediwizards too distracted by their work to bother about one extra head in their midst.

Inside the bustle was so intense that no one paid attention to him. This was convenient, because it meant no one threw him out, but irksome, because it meant that — well, no one paid attention to him.

“Granger!”

Hermione heard him. It gratified him that she turned at once — away from Krum, who huddled near a space heater, shivering and scowling at anyone who came near, especially one voracious bottle-blonde woman with a camera.

Her face was drawn and pale, framed by dark wet picots of baby hair. A brave mediwizard had wrangled her into a thermal blanket, which might as well have been a bedsheet, for all he was concerned, so little was it doing to allay her shivering. She stumbled to her feet, still stiff and awkward with cold; she breathed a hard, long sigh, and then — as he opened his mouth to yell at someone for another blanket — and she jumped him.

He caught her. Whatever he had been going to say fell dead in his throat, and the sound that emerged instead was a bleak strangled thing.

“Granger, you’re wet.”

She was. She was soaking, and the cold pierced through the front of his robes like he’d been dropped belly-first in the snow. A hiss of discomfort issued through his teeth. Her arms wound around his neck and her small fingers threaded up the back of his head like chips of ice, leaving a dazzling little map of numbness up his nape. She buried her head in his chest, and her hair soaked through his shirtfront in seconds. All the heat in his body staged a hasty retreat and regrouped in his face.

She was shivering. It was hard to tell if that was the cold, or the shock, or both. It wasn’t like her. He didn’t mind it. Oh, he would be furious at her for getting him wet, in a few moments, but apparently his sense of self-interest was still enjoying its vacation.

He placed his hand on her back and drew his thumb across one shoulder blade. The pressure drew her into his chest, and he could feel her worming her way into his body, seeking heat.

“Shameless,” he said, thinly. If he’d had any more sense he would have said about half a dozen worse things, but he didn’t, clearly, and he was very close to throwing in the towel and filling in the cavity where his sense used to be with something more dependable.

Her nose dragged an ice-cold line against the underside of his jaw. A shudder rolled up his spine, like someone had threaded a needle up his vertebrae.

“Is he alright?” she whispered.

“What?”

“Harry!” Her breath was a cold wash on his ear. “Did he have a plan?”

It was reassuring, in one sense, to suddenly understand her. She didn’t want to be overheard. To give the judges reason to think Harry would cheat.

On the other hand, he hated her, and himself, and also thermodynamics. And he felt more than a twinge of spite.

He palmed the back of her head and threaded his fingers through her hair. Because of their closeness no one had interrupted them, though the mediwizards hovered only as far away as propriety required, and Viktor Krum rubbed his hands impatiently to warm them, his eyes fixed darkly on Hermione. Draco caught his eyes, held them, and he did not bother to school his own smirk.

Dimly Draco felt her breath trip against his throat, once, at the graze of his fingers across her skull, and the swipe of his thumb through the hair over her ear. Vaguely he noticed the fingers of her hand not occupied with his neck increasing from a grip to a vise in his shirt. The place where her embrace had thrown her against him, now secured by a hand at her back, was veiled in two layers of very wet clothes, and it was impossible for her to breathe in without flushing against him. He hoped, somewhat spitefully, that she was having trouble breathing; it might do her good to see how she liked it for a change.

“Yes,” he said softly. Hermione twisted her hand deeper into his shirt — a gesture of triumph, or possibly of anxiety. Then he blew cold air into her ear.

She freed herself with a shriek.

“Draco Malfoy!”

“You asked for it.”

“I hate you,” she said brightly, but there were roses in her cheeks, and the relief made her too happy to be credible. He wanted to laugh, too, for no reason: triumph, perhaps. “You could have just told me.”

“Where’s the fun in that?” he said casually, peeling his soaked shirt from his chest. “Besides, you could have told me you were going for a swim.”

“They didn’t tell me either! They just said I’d be sleeping for a while, and I’d wake up when the Task was over! Anyway, they kept me in the Hospital Wing overnight, so I couldn’t tell Harry it was me.”

“Did they?” He glanced at Professor McGonagall, running a Warming Charm over Flora’s fingers, while the girl hemmed and hawed and tried to squirm away. The professor didn’t look happy.

“No, I—” Hermione dropped her voice. “They said I could opt out,” she said, “but it meant they’d have to get someone else — someone Viktor would care about, to make it fair for the other champions. And the only person they could get, on short notice, is his brother.”

“And how old is this brother?” he said, vaguely exasperated. So she’d had a choice, and she’d done the dangerous thing on purpose.

That was typical. He couldn't even be angry at her, for that, it was too textbook.

He should have gone and developed feelings for something easier to deal with, like a hippogriff.

She folded her arms. The effect would have been more impressive if it hadn't unloaded enough water to fill a loch and drawn attention to the fact that she was shivering. "I'm glad you asked, because I did, too. In fact, he's only twelve. It's far too dangerous for someone so young—"

"Said the fifteen-year-old."

"An age of difference, from twelve," she said. He rolled his eyes. "Anyway, I wasn't going to force someone else to go in my place."

She said it as if it were simple. Like two and two makes four, moral arithmetic.

"Is that what happened to Davies?"

"Who?"

"Roger Davies. Her date. I'm assuming he had the good sense you lacked, because Delacour's hostage is a relative of some kind. Not that there's any hope for them, she lost out to the grindylows after ten minutes."

"Bad luck," said Hermione distantly. Her eyes were floating in the middle distance over his shoulder, and fast receding into thought. He had five, perhaps ten seconds of her attention left before she was dead to the world. "It's a simple Relashio… I don't know what happened with Roger, I suppose he must've opted against. I don't suppose he cares very much about her, or he wouldn't have let her little sister… What did you say Harry used, again?"

"Gillyweed."

“Gillyweed! Where’d you get it?”

“Long story. Don’t praise me yet, he still might have drowned—”

A boom sounded. Bagman’s voice roared blearily through the tentflaps, and Hermione nearly bowled him over in her haste to get outside. McGonagall followed her, almost bowling him over a second time, and once he’d righted himself he joined them outside the tent.

Harry knelt on the end of the dock, flanked by a pair of girls. The first was Cho, spluttering and quite bemused. The second was a short blonde pixie of a thing that Draco recognized from the Three Broomsticks.

Fleur threw herself out of Maxime’s arms and almost knocked Harry back into the water. Cho caught him, scowling.

“Gabrielle! Gabrielle! Is she alive? Is she ’urt?”

“She’s fine,” Harry gasped, but his voice was hoarse. The gillslits on his neck had sealed over, and only a faint thread of webbing lingered between his fingers.

“It was ze grindylows… zey attacked me… oh Gabrielle, I thought… I thought…”

“Come here, you,” said Madam Pomfrey. She seized Harry, bundled him in a blanket like the world’s largest pasty, and almost gagged him with a tall vial of Pepper-Up Potion.

Hermione hurtled down the dock, slipped on the wood, and bowled into Harry with a hug at terminal velocity. Draco wondered why nice things were always happening to other people, and never to him.

“You did it! Thank God, you’re alive!”

“He did it?” said Draco.

“Kind of,” said Harry, strangled. “I lost time — I wanted to stay until all the hostages were gone, but Fleur didn’t come.”

“You haff a water beetle in your hair, Herm-own-nee,” said Krum, significantly.

Draco peered at him in disinterest. He had reintroduced himself to their conference, unwelcomely, and was now holding out another fur-lined robe for Hermione, as if he expected some kind of medal for it. Perhaps he thought he was entitled to her attention because he hadn’t let her drown. He could take that idea and shove it up the same place it came from.

“You,” said Draco sharply. Krum’s eyebrows hiked up at his tone. “You’re the reason she was in the lake.”

The eyebrows plummeted. “I had nothing to do vith this.”

“Right. Because wasn’t a single girl in Bulgaria—”

“I do not condone this,” interrupted Krum grimly. “This vas badly done. I vill speak to Karkaroff on it.”

“Oh, will you, now.”

“Vhat do you imply, pale Englishman?”

“I don’t know. You seemed fairly comfortable in the water.”

He drummed his fingers against his thigh, under the place where the wandsheath rested.

Hermione flicked the beetle away and cast a Warming Charm on Cho’s fingers. She ignored them, and that was probably for the best. “It’s certainly noble, but you were well outside the time limit, Harry. I don’t think you’re going to get full points.”

“Oh, Merlin, well,” rasped Harry, lying spread-eagle on his back, “I might as well just hop back in, then.”

The judges had gathered to confer at the water's edge with a small delegation of reedy-haired merfolk who had surfaced from the waves. Fleur had many cuts on her face and arms and her robes were torn, but she didn't seem to care, nor would she allow Madam Pomfrey to clean them. With a trembling dignity, she lowered herself to kneel beside him.

"You saved 'er," she said. "Even though she was not your 'ostage."

"Yeah," said Harry, thickly, regarding the sky as if he wished it would swallow him.

Fleur gave a stiff nod. She bent down, kissed Harry on each cheek — Cho made a sound of distress — then said bravely to Cho, "And you too — you 'elped."

Cho's eyes widened. "Erm," she said. "I dinnae, really."

It didn't matter. Fleur seized her and kissed Cho on both cheeks. When she pulled away, Cho was the color of beets, and looked terribly conflicted. Harry, also, looked terribly conflicted.

"Excuse me," said Hermione, strangled, and Fleur rounded on her wildly — Draco decided warily that if she continued this carnival of promiscuity, he was going to start throwing Shield Charms — but Bagman's voice thundered over them, offering a merciful interruption.

"Ladies and gentlewizards, the judges have reached our decision." He clears his throat, running a fingertip down a slip of paper. "Once again, marks for each champion are awarded out of a possible fifty."

He pauses for a moment, seeming to expect cheers, but the audience is quiet, waiting. He looks back down.

"Fleur Delacour, though she demonstrated excellent use of the Bubble-Head Charm, was attacked by grindylows as she approached her goal, and failed to retrieve her hostage. We award her twenty-five points."

"I deserved zero," said Fleur throatily.

"Cassius Warrington, who also used the Bubble-Head Charm, was first to return with his hostage, though he returned one minute outside the time limit of an hour." Enormous cheers from the Slytherins in the crowd; Goyle leapt up and punched the air. "We therefore award him forty-seven points.

"Viktor Krum used an incomplete form of Transfiguration, which was nevertheless effective, and was second to return with his hostage. We award him forty points."

Karkaroff shouted something, but he was quelled by a look from Madame Maxime.

"Harry Potter used gillyweed to great effect," Bagman continued. "He returned last, and well outside the time limit of an hour. However, Mr. Potter was first to reach the hostages, and the delay in his return was due to his determination to return all hostages to safety, not merely his own. He was incredibly brave, incredibly daring, and, if I do say so, demonstrated the finest sportsmanship yet seen in the Tournament, which, one might think, is a virtue worthy of considerable reward—"

"Merlin's sake," Hermione muttered.

"Most of the judges," said Bagman loftily, while Karkaroff scoffed, "feel that this shows moral fiber and merits full marks. However! Mr. Potter's score is forty-five points."

"Moral fiber?" Draco demanded, but everyone else took the good news of this announcement in the spirit it was meant, which was to say, riotous cheering. He'd taken second place, over Krum. With the cumulative scores from the First Task, which now rolled over the Spell-O-Vision screen, that put him seven points ahead of Krum, and only two behind Cassius.

Somehow. Inconceivably.

Cho screeched and tackled Harry. Being that he was already lying down, this couldn't do much, but she did smack a kiss onto his forehead, rendering him even more catatonic than before.

Draco spun on his heel, flushing.

"When," he said plaintively, "did everyone at this school become libertines?"

"They're celebrating," shouted Hermione, "it's sweet."

"It's not the bloody Folies Bergère!"

"Prude."

He was about to shoot back a question about just who had been prudish in the prefects' bathroom, but then he considered how it would sound, and what the natural interpretation might be for any eavesdroppers, and he fell silent abruptly with a constriction of his throat.

The natural interpretation then presented itself eagerly for consideration. He hauled it out in the yard of his brain and shot it.

He ignored Hermione's querying look.

"The third and final task will take place at dusk on the twenty-fourth of May," continued Bagman. "In accordance with their rank in the Tournament, each of the champions will receive different standing. That standing will determine their gate of entry into the Third Task. Thank you all for your support! And now: Bonjour! Do svidanya! Goodbye!"

And that was the Second Task.

The wind came snapping up the bluffs like a wet towel, slapping them with shards of mist. Hermione shuddered under the patchwork of blankets Madam Pomfrey had thrust upon her. Krum had a hushed conversation with Hermione — which made her giggle in what must have been hysterical discomfort — and slumped back to the Durmstrang ship. Cho departed with another shy kiss to Harry's cheek, and went with a silent, mulish Flora Carrow to get more Pepper-Up Potion. Fleur and Gabrielle had scurried off into the waiting arms of a blonde witch and wizard who must have been their parents, and Draco felt no sympathy at all for Barty Crouch, whose berating carried all over the glen.

Theo and his father left the stands in a hurry, and were not to be seen on the way back. Draco thought he glimpsed them momentarily through the vast crowds streaming back up to Hogwarts, and called out, meaning to return Sibelius' Ministry badge — but the mousy head bobbed away, unhearing, and after a moment he decided it must have been Terry Boot.

"Funny hint, about the gate," said Hermione. "Better than nothing! But why would they only give you a month? I suppose they mean to give you a break from all that thinking."

"Yeah, fat load of thinking I was doing," said Harry, with a grin. "Maybe McGonagall noticed you weren't raising your hand as often, and wrote to complain."

"Harry Potter, I raised my hand exactly as much."

"Okay, okay. Sure."

"Harry! I did. Draco, tell him I did."

"I abstain," he said, because, for one, he hadn't noticed, and for two, he was miserably cold. He cast a Warming Charm that scarcely worked, through the windchill, and Hermione's head had left a damp spot over his heart where the air burned with particular cruelty on his breast. “What do you suppose the gate is for?”

“A fence,” said Harry promptly. Draco kicked him. In return he was nearly shoved over sideways.

“A puzzle about land,” said Hermione. She fumbled for her notebook and cursed when she didn’t have it. “I think that’s what it’ll be. The First Task was dragons, fire, and the Second Task was water. Following the pattern, the Third Task should be earth, or air. But air would be hard, because you can’t force all the champions to fly, can you? Although I suppose that could be the challenge, scaling something…”

“Blimey, can’t give us a minute’s rest, can you?”

“No,” said Hermione and Draco, at once. “And anyway, this means we’ve got to prepare you for everything. I want to get you up to speed on Banishing Charms, they’re very dependable, and just your type of magic.”

“You mean they’re easy.”

“No, they’re — direct,” she said, valiantly. “Straightforward. Theoretically linear.”

Harry was laughing, however. “You can call me thick, Mione, it won’t be the first time this week. Draco does it about once a day—”

“In the erstwhile hope that it might change.”

“You’re not stupid! You’re honest.”

Draco had something for that, but someone shouted for them.

Behind them, Ron came floundering up the hill. He was disarrayed from a quick escape from the stands, and had made remarkable time of it, too: the greater share of Hogwarts’ hordes still muddled below them on the hillsides.

“Hey,” he said, in between lungfuls. “Hey. Harry — you — you alright?” He swallowed and staggered to a halt, his threadbare cloak battering his legs. “You’re — not hurt, or anything?”

The awkwardness of the past weeks collapsed under the pressure of his anxious stare. It was impossible to hold onto anything else.

Draco remembered how it felt. Being fourth of three. He didn’t enjoy the inside view any more than the outside. It was like seeing a naked reflection, and not a flattering one, either.

Harry sighed.

“Thought I was fine, at first,” he said bleakly. “But the thing is, it’s been two hours, and my right foot’s still a flipper. They can’t get it to turn back. Pomfrey reckons they’ll have to amputate.”

“What?”

He paused; Ron had turned ash-gray and made a sound like a dying frog.

“McGonagall’s been arguing that I should get to keep it,” he continued, “but Fred and George want to auction it off for charity — you know, to raise awareness for totally gullible idiots—”

Ron roared and tackled him into an embrace that was as much a wrestling match as it was a hug. When they freed themselves, Ron turned to Hermione, with the same anxious expression, and she prompted him before he could speak:

“I’m perfectly fine, thank you.”

“Yeah? You’re not — cold, or anything?”

“Obviously I’m cold,” she sniffed, “but I’m not hurt.”

“Yeah,” he said obliquely. “It was bloody mad, putting you in there like that. I can’t believe Dumbledore…”

He trailed off. The three of them stood at awkward orthogonals, shivering in the rancid cold.

“Sorry,” said Ron, after a moment. “I’ve been stupid. I thought you two were… I’m really sorry. I should’ve been helping.”

“Oh, Ron,” said Hermione, nasal and thick, like she had a headcold. Draco rolled his eyes. Oh, Ron, indeed.

“Don’t be stupid,” blurted Harry. “You were entitled. We should’ve told you — I should’ve told you — all of us want you here.”

“No, but it doesn’t matter, right?” said Ron hoarsely. “I could’ve — I dunno, done something sooner, I shouldn’t have left it off. It’s your life, mate. Who cares if my feelings got hurt?”

“I do,” said Harry, very intensely. “I do.”

Ron ducked his head, shuffling his feet. “Well,” he said, “erm. Thanks. I, er — reckon I’ll just — hang with you lot, then. If — oh. And, er, Hermione. What I said about — about you and — you know. I was — that was all wrong, I reckon, I was asking for a hard knock on the head. You're not... you're not a thing, like you said. I know that. I was stupid. It's not your fault I don't... But I was thinking maybe you could tell me about your hobby — what's it — Scrumpy? Yeah? And we could talk about that, you know? Maybe?” He wore an embarrassment of hope on his face.

“I love your family,” she burst out. “I love the Burrow. I’m sorry I said anything that made you think otherwise — I didn’t mean it — it’s beautiful, and it’s my favorite place on earth, after Hogwarts. I was happier there than — than I even am at home. It’s wonderful.”

He faintly glowed. “Really?”

“Yes.”

Draco thought, privately and snidely, that she might reevaluate her rankings if she had ever been to Malfoy Manor.

But then, whose fault was that? He hadn't invited her. He couldn't. It was one thing to negotiate the question of his mother, which would be a diplomatic ordeal unto itself, but the Manor itself wasn't all unicorns and nifflers. It was a pureblood house, and it took its identity seriously. There were objects that he'd have to warn her off, rooms where she'd have to tread carefully, portraits he'd have to warn her not to disturb, and all manner of traps and things buried under the floorboards. The pleasure of a stress-free summer holiday was something Ron could offer guilelessly, and he couldn't.

Then again. Hunting for historical artifacts in a haunted house with nothing but her wits and her wand to protect her might very well have been Hermione's idea of a good time.

"You can come back anytime," said Ron, with the shameless eagerness of someone closer to what he wanted than he had ever been before. Draco narrowed his eyes. "Really. Mum would love to have you. Dad adores you. You're always — always welcome there, you know."

Hermione gave a wet sigh and hauled Ron into a hug. Ron buried his head in her shoulder.

Draco watched them. He hoped she left his shirtfront soaked.

They drew back. Ron glanced at Draco. Draco lifted his chin. They exchanged a freighted stare.

"Krum's a knob, isn't he?" said Ron, apropos of nothing.

"Yes," he said immediately.

Ron nodded. "Big ponce," he remarked. "Overhyped, I reckon."

"Wildly overvalued, as a player."

“He’s not even that fast, he’s just tricky with it.”

“Put him on a slower broomstick—”

“—he’s not impressive at all. All style, no substance.”

“Exactly,” said Draco.

Ron nodded jerkily.

Draco sighed.

“Potter,” he said, “you might ask Ronald where he procured the gillyweed. Since it was his idea.”

“His — what — you came up with that?” Hermione whirled on Ron. Her obvious pride conflicted with a poorly hidden sense of surprise. “But that’s brilliant! Where did you get it?”

Ron was taken aback. “I didn’t come up with it on my own,” he said at once, hastening to defuse her expectations. “To be honest. I wouldn’t have had a clue, except I overheard Mad-Eye talking about it. I was headed out of Potions, and Mad-Eye had come down to have a word with Snape, and he asked Snape if he had any gillyweed left, because Mad-Eye was running low, and Snape said no, someone nicked it—”

“Nicked it?” said Draco sharply. “Someone stole from Professor Snape?”

“We stole from Professor Snape, last year,” Harry reminded him. “You say that like it’s harder than it is.”

“That’s different. I’m his godson.”

Ron shrugged. “I figured it was Warrington. But he went and used the bobblehead thing, so I dunno where it went. Anyway, I figured that Mad-Eye might have some left, so I snuck in—”

“Into Mad-Eye’s office?” demanded Hermione. “Alone?”

“It wasn’t so hard,” he demurred, but his cheeks tinged with pleasure. “Honestly, I reckon he might have wanted me to do it; he wasn’t being too quiet, with Snape. And all I had to do on the office was ‘alohamora,’ which is pretty weak, for an auror.”

“You think he wanted to help Harry?”

“Might not’ve wanted his student to drown, yeah,” Ron said.

“Certainly, but why not be direct? He could’ve offered the gillyweed to Harry whenever he wanted.”

“Guess he wanted to be subtle. Raises less questions. Don’t think the teachers are allowed to help, either, though if you ask me, Maxime and Karkaroff have gone right off that rule, Krum’s shark transformation was way too advanced for a seventh year…”

“Thank you,” said Draco, pointedly.

“Anyway, who knows why he does anything? They don’t call him ‘Sane-Eye Moody.’ I’m not checking the gift unicorn’s horn.”

“No, you’re right,” she said, but she sounded doubtful, and Draco suspected that if it had been left to her, she would have hauled said unicorn in for a biopsy.

As a winter’s midmorning faded into a dull, tinselly clear afternoon, they finished scaling the hill. The path, which had so comfortably fitted four in their first year, now winnowed to a tight squeeze for three, and out of awkward mutual respect, the group broke symmetrically: Harry and Hermione drifted forward, pressing more hurriedly through the cold in their wet blankets, while Draco and Ron found themselves lagging on the path behind.

“It isn’t a trio, by the way.”

At first Ron did not acknowledge him, and Draco thought his voice had been perhaps lost to the wind.

“The article was a pathetic rag,” he said, “and it misquoted my birthday. It hasn’t any interest in the facts.”

Ron grunted. “S’fine. I’m getting over it. We’ve all made up, there’s no use—”

“Peace, Ronald, I’m making a point. If there were any permutation of three, however—”

“Mate, you’re in a ten-foot hole and you’re calling for a shovel.”

“If there were, ” said Draco, flatly, “you wouldn’t be the one outside of it. Surely you realize that.”

The castle was crowned with a faint dusting of snow, the last of the season, and from beneath this jeweling of silver the windows gleamed like gold bangles against the coarse skin of its walls. When the winds blew, the snow lifted and swirled tender fingers around the parapets.

“You’re off your rocker,” said Ron, but it was guarded.

“Modesty flatters no one, and least of all gingers. You’re Potter’s favorite person living. Full stop. And Granger would give her right arm for your sake. They pined like ripe fools for you. And as you said — in second year, you were fine, all three of you. Without me. So I don’t know where you get the idea you’re dispensable. I have a much better claim to it, and it rankles.”

“Harry likes you, idiot.”

“Of course he does. I’m marvelous,” he agreed. “I said he had preferences, not that he was insane.”

“Come off it. You know damn well that Hermione—”

“Is beholden to you in ways that she isn’t to me,” he said. “And never can be.”

“‘Beholden’? Are you joking? It’s not the nineteenth century,” he said incredulously. “She’s a person, she can do as she likes. And so can you, for all your bellyaching.”

“There are things I cannot do.”

If unburdening himself was supposed to bring relief, he was sorely disappointed. The declaration still left him feeling hollow and cold, like the words had emptied out a place in his chest where he was holding them.

“If this is a pureblood thing, you don’t have my sympathy, mate. Boohoo, you’re afraid of your mum—”

“My mother isn’t a threat to anyone. I’m not talking about her. There are people whose minds I can’t change, who have power the likes of which you cannot fathom, and I don’t— I can’t—”

“Merlin, you’re scared.” For the first time in his life, perhaps, Ron sounded sorry for him. “They’ve really got their teeth in you, haven’t they? What do you think is gonna happen? Someone’s gonna pop out from under your bed if you whisper ‘muggle rights’ three times in a mirror?”

“The good name of the House of Malfoy is all that stands between myself and a significant danger,” he said, thinly. “The likes of which I am thankful your family has never contemplated. But it is contingent on my ability to sustain it. There are things I have done to jeopardize it, and — I have walked a very thin line, and I have walked it admirably, but I am approaching the limits of my dexterity.”

Ron rolled his shoulders.

“That’s crock,” he announced. “If someone comes after you, we’ll just whack ’em.”

“No.”

“Whadja mean, ‘no’? You’re the one always bragging about being this great stinking wizard. What’ve you got to be afraid of?”

“It surprises me that I have to explain this,” he gritted, “but if I am — indiscreet — if my name is brought into question — the punishment for my failures won’t fall on me.”

Ron kissed his teeth while he thought about this. Ahead of them, Harry and Hermione were giggling about something together, shooting looks over their shoulders. In the dim light, with their hair stained identically dark by water, they could have been siblings.

Abruptly he wanted to steal them somewhere far away from Hogwarts, put them in a secret room under the world, and lock the door against everything that wanted to harm them. He could pile up charms and locks and then sit outside the walls with his wand out and a curse on his tongue, and then he would never again have to stand on the lakeside while they toiled against something he couldn’t change, drawing desperately on his own thin supply of little luck and less faith.

The feeling inflamed his nerves and seared through up the aching core of him, a rash of yearning so keen it tipped the threshold into pain. He was helpless to it. He was terrified of it. The feeling didn’t care.

What was the point of having power, if you couldn’t use it? It hadn’t saved his father. That felt treasonous to think, but in the reeling aftermath of that feeling, it seemed like only a minor treason, a forgivable one. And it was true. Lucius had never been safe, and his family still wasn’t safe now. The question sunk into the bottom of his mind: what was the point? What was it to be pureblood if it couldn’t save him from that feeling? What was the point of Malfoy, if it didn’t mean my word is Merlin’s?

“Here’s my advice,” decided Ron. “Grow up.”

Outrage kindled.

“Piss off!”

“Wot! You’re being a nancy! Three-headed dogs, giant spiders, dementors, werewolves, Quirrell, Yaxley — dragons, for you and Harry — a murderer, a convict, a hippogriff, and whatever else Harry got in the lake, maybe he socked a mermaid or something — you’re telling me you’ve faced all that, and what scares you off is a pack of snot-nosed anemics with a grudge? Get a grip,” said Ron incredulously.

“You won’t be so cavalier when they’re on your doorstep.”

“Better mine than yours, from the sound of it,” he said. “Least I won’t piss myself if they call me names.”

“I resent you passionately.”

“That’s the spirit,” he agreed. He was walking with a spring in his step, and picked his way across the grass as if each blade ushered him eagerly towards his destination. “Anyway, none of this matters, because there’ll be no trio, or threesome, or what-all. It’s four against millions, alright? We’ve got to band together to meet the enemy.”

“Death Eaters?”

“No, mate. Keep with it. Krum.”

He snorted. The matter slipped into an uneasy state of rest.

Under the archway to the Transfiguration Courtyard, a blonde witch accosted them. She had been there in the champions’ tent, but only now did Draco take note of her, from the starched bottle-green polyester of her pantsuit to the thin, savagely plucked hook of each eyebrow, which perched in a leer of perpetual shock above her cat’s-eye glasses.

“Congratulations, Harry!” she said, beaming at him. “I wonder if you could give me a quick word? How did you feel? Were you worried? Was it fair? Do you think they chose the right girl?”

Draco made a quick deduction. Hermione must have done at the same time, because she gasped and ripped out her wand.

“You!”

“Hermione,” said Harry, in alarm, “hang on—”

“You petty, miserable, jealous cow—”

She lashed her wand. Skeeter leapt clear. The jinx shattered against the castle wall behind it, erupting in a jagged crown of crystal spikes.

“Hello,” said Draco, intrigued. That was a wonderfully nasty jinx; he’d never seen her try to curse anyone before.

Hermione’s hair was starting to crackle the way it did when her anger infected her magic. She was bristling and straining against Harry’s guarded arm, and some part of him drifted into imagination about Harry letting her go, just to see what exciting thing she’d do next. It was a marvelous thing to see. Showing off made her very nearly lovely.

“Touched a nerve, I see!” shrilled Skeeter. “Good journalism will do that, my dear! But my! What a temper! I’m sure my readers would be terribly interested to know that the Gryffindor princess has a mean streak—”

“Princess? Princess?”

Draco laughed softly. It was possible she was going to kill her, and it was going to be absolutely wonderful.

“Hermione, come on,” Harry muttered, “let’s just go—”

“Harry Potter, you let go of me.”

“Let her go,” Draco said coolly. “She’s every right.”

Harry shot him a plaintive look. “She can’t jinx her—”

“’Course she can. I’ve got a great lawyer. Granger, carry on.”

Hermione’s wand wavered, darting her eyes from Skeeter to Harry to Draco, torn between vindication and doubt.

“I know what you’ve been doing,” she said suddenly, and this, more than anything she’d said before, made Skeeter flinch. “I know you’ve been creeping around the castle, and I’ll bet Dumbledore doesn’t know about it. I thought it was Colin, at first, but then you wrote about the Yule Ball, and I realized — it’s you. You’ve been sneaking around, haven’t you, Rita?”

Skeeter pursed her lips.

“I haven’t a clue what you mean, my dear,” she said, with the saccharine condescension of someone talking to an animal about to be put down. “I don’t know who this ‘Colin’ is, but gracious me, Miss Granger, if you’ve been hallucinating a woman crawling around in the walls—”

“Does Dumbledore know you’re around?” interrupted Ron. “Because you’re not Ministry, and you’re not wearing a press pass, so I’d reckon you’re not supposed to be here.”

One of her pruned brows arched impossibly further. “Professor Dumbledore supports a free press,” she sniffed. “But if you’d care to comment, I will gladly take a quote, my dear. To whom may I attribute it? I’m afraid I don’t know who you are.”

Ron bristled. Harry shoved his way in front of all of them.

“Here’s a quote. Write this down,” he said clearly. “I’m not dating Hermione. She’s off-limits, and so’s anything about my parents, or my friends, or me. If you do want to write about someone, here you go: this is Ron Weasley. He’s the best chess player in Hogwarts history, he’s got a right hook like a battering ram, and we shag nasty like rabbits every night. Ask Draco, he watches. If you or your readers have a problem with that, you can, and I quote: ‘get bent.’”

And he dragged Hermione off to the castle, with Ron cackling madly in tow.

Draco waited for them to fade out of earshot. Skeeter was scribbling furiously, and her Quick-Quotes Quill had already covered half a page. She made an inquiring, hopeful noise when he stepped closer. He lowered his voice.

“Count yourself lucky that she missed,” he said. “I wouldn’t have.”

He left her to linger on that remark, reflecting that having power was still good for something, after all.

-There it is! I hope it was worth the wait.

-Not many notes this week; it's the end of act 2 of Book 4, and I'm excited to inform you that everything Gets More in the third act.

-It's not a neat-and-tidy ending, for that fight, but things are finally getting better instead of worse.

-Thank you, thank you, thank you. If you commented in the past week, I'd owe you your favorite magical object from the series. This is a stressful handful of days, so it's been really great to have someplace to escape.

The Misfortune of Amos Diggory

Chapter 48: The Misfortune of Amos Diggory

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

My dearest, darling, beloved boy,

Mea culpa. Forgive me. I am bad, faithless, and thankless, a low creature of little brains and less heart. If you can find it in your power to absolve me, I will bear the debt of it for ever.

How embarrassing it is to admit, but in a fit of girlish foolishness I stumbled upon a Dark artifact — stall thy hand! Hear my defense! — and mistook it for something far less insidious than it was. Its curse left me paralyzed for a fortnight, capable of doing nothing but singing Pirates of Penzance. Dreadful! I much prefer Yeomen of the Guard! I recovered steadily, thanks to Severus. Never worry for me. I am a Black! Fiercer than wolves, smarter than foxes, and stronger than bulls.

A final recommendation — I know you will detest me for failing to attach reason to directive, but every once in a while, I must exercise a mother's prerogative to command, while her son is still young enough to listen. Please limit your acquaintance with Alastor Moody. He is a dangerous man, and I fear that his great age has made him volatile and foolish. Severus and I both worry that he will take this chance to grind old axes, and finish the work that he failed to execute during the War.

You ask me what I fear, precisely; I return that I cannot tell you, at least not in print. But that man is no friend to any Malfoy that ever lived, nor any Black, either. He is a creature without loyalties, and without a leash. I leave it at that.

Say hello to all of your little friends for me. I have attached a letter for Theodore; please deliver it to him, if you can.

I love you more than tea and biscuits and silk dresses and the first thaw of winter, young prince of all my kingdoms.

All my heart,

Mummy

It took two readings for suspicion to set in.

Professor Snape had slipped it in with a set of test results from Potions and he had torn it open on the way to Herbology, reading under the desk while everyone else troweled away diligently.

A ridged smear of something rusty colored the side of the seal and the line of the envelope. Narcissa always used the Black seal, which was a crest of three ravens and a skull, impressed on a round of bone-white wax.

He checked the smaller envelope she'd enclosed, but the letter for Theo didn't have the same mark. She must have sealed it before his, and nicked her finger on the paper. That made sense.

He quashed his unease and pocketed both letters. There was nothing he could do about his mother's condition from here. Running awry of a Dark artifact wasn't unlikely, in Malfoy Manor. It did raise questions about what the help was doing, however; maybe he ought to ask Dobby to check on her.

He missed her. He missed her sensibility and her grace and her easy way of making problems disappear with a twitch of her wand or her lip, and the way the world around her was easily sectioned into the good and the distasteful, the elegant and the improper. Perhaps she could even tell him how to make his feelings simple again. She would say something like: Don't be absurd, Draco, one always goes a bit mad in the winter, but you'll be yourself again come June. And then the feelings would disappear, and that would be that.

The dry winds of march aired the last of the snows from the rooftops, and a blustery spring gnawed their faces numb each time they poked their heads out of doors. Post was delayed because owls had to batter their way through windstorms. The trees had no sooner sprouted their first green nubbins of hope than the wind cruelly sheared them away. A brown owl with a harrowed, flustered affect landed atop Harry's egg muffin, seized it, and left in its place a letter from Sirius, which Harry's expression soon revealed to be a bad trade.

"He's coming to Hogsmeade." He threw the letter down, expression stormy. "If he's caught, I'm going to kill him."

"Made it so far, though, haven't they?" said Ron genially. Ever since their reconciliation, he had been remarkably optimistic, and eager to please; he had done his Charms homework a week early, on Hermione's suggestion, sung Harry's praises in the Second Task to anyone who could be plausibly accused of asking, and had even complimented Draco's choice of pocket square that morning. He was, altogether, being a surreally good sport about the whole thing, and it was this that made Draco suspicious; Ron's turn had been too extreme, and too prompt, for him to think the matter settled.

"Uh oh," said Ron, squinting at the ceiling. "Incoming."

The day's Prophet landed in his outstretched hand, and he unfolded it furtively, hiding it from Harry and Hermione.

"Don't tell me," muttered Hermione, hunched over her book. "I don't want to know."

Ron scanned it, mouth twisted askew, and then shrugged. "Well," he said, "it's not as bad as it could be."

“Oh, God.”

“I, er… she doesn’t say you’re… Harry’s… girlfriend anymore.”

She grabbed for the paper. Ron whisked it out of hold, but this only brought it into Draco’s reach, who snatched it from his other hand and wrenched it open.

‘HARRY POTTER’S SECRET HEARTACHE,’ declared the headline. He was on the verge of voicing his monumental amusement when he noticed a name several paragraphs beneath it.

…Krum, who is openly smitten with the devious Miss Granger, has already invited her to visit him in Bulgaria over the summer holidays, and insists that he has ‘never felt this way about any other girl.’ However, it might not be Miss Granger’s doubtful natural charms that have captured these unfortunate boys’ interest…

Draco thrust the offending article back at Ron, nonplussed.

“I’m going to speak to Dumbledore about her,” said Hermione, deadly serious, as if this were on the order of capital punishment. She also didn’t answer him, which made his fingers itch for a wand and something to point it at. “I’m going to get her press pass for the Tournament revoked.”

“On what charges?” Harry said wearily, steering the Prophet away with his fork. “Criminal hearsay?”

“She oughtn’t be allowed on the grounds!”

“She oughtn’t be allowed to hold a quill,” snapped Draco, and shoved away his plate, his appetite lost to bad temper.

The results of the Second Task had failed to improve the atmosphere at Hogwarts one bit. As it became clear that the Tournament would come down to a horse race between two Hogwarts champions, it became more popular to pick a victor, and the choice was not, in anyone’s estimation, altogether difficult. Cassius’ success had infected all of Slytherin with extreme bigness of the head and smugness of the face. Victory made patriots of many a reluctant ombudsman, and green pins and scarves fluttered in the hallways, paired besides ties of yellow and blue, and even once, memorably, of red — though Dennis had been forcibly parted from his delusions about bipartisanship by Ginny Weasley, who unceremoniously ripped it from his chest and punted it in the common-room fire as soon as Harry stepped into the room.

Gryffindor, of course, swore by its underdog — Seamus had started taking public pledges to tattoo Harry’s name on his chest if he won, the proceeds from which went to a fund for the celebration party — but one quarter of a large school, especially when the rest was strongly allied against, could very easily feel like none.

The other schools seemed to find Harry’s second victory in two runs suspicious. Black looks abounded from the passels of blue- and red-clad students. Some of them broke into hissing when he passed. Draco declined to translate some of the things that were said about him in French. Hermione, meanwhile, must have known a bit more of the Bulgarian than she let on, because at one point a group of passing boys from Durmstrang shouted something that made her mutter a Lace-Knotting Jinx over her shoulder.

Over the unmistakable yelp of someone tripping down a flight of stairs, Harry said tiredly: “Bad?”

“I haven’t any idea what you mean,” she sniffed, sweeping a de-linting charm over her sleeve.

“Think that was Peeves,” agreed Ron, and they went into Defense Against the Dark Arts.

Moody had them practicing Counter-Curses. Moody’s curriculum in general leaned more on the spellcasting aspect of Defense than Remus had; where third year had taken them on a tour of Dark creatures, fourth year introduced defending themselves from Dark witches and wizards. It was unclear whether this was curriculum or Moody himself.

Hermione swished her wand out and cast a few warmup jinxes on the table, hexing an inkwell into a mushroom and back again. Draco rolled his wand between his thumb and finger and watched Moody as he mercilessly ripped through Lavender's weak countercurse, then moved on to Dean.

"You should have hit her," Draco murmured, and Hermione worked her jaw as if another curse sat inside it.

"Who? Skeeter?"

"Yes. If you're going to use fear to get what you want—"

"That's not what I was doing," she said quickly. "I wouldn't do that."

"It was, you would, and it was perfectly fine, except you didn't commit," he said patiently. "You didn't scare her, you pissed her off. That's worse than doing nothing. If you're going to use fear, use fear, but then you've got to keep up the pressure, or no one will take you seriously."

"You think it would be better if I'd taken her nose off?" she said scornfully.

"Better her hands, it'd stop her from writing. Give her a while to think about whether she wants to risk it again."

She shook her head and flicked her wand, conjuring bluebell flames that flickered out as soon as she twitched her wrist. She repeated the exercise several times, making the flames dance in small shapes on her wand-tip, like a sparkler.

"It's funny," she said distantly. "I wonder if Viktor talked to her."

"It's possible. Does Viktor often read Vhitch Vheekly?"

“Don’t be childish.” She spun a ring of flames and rotated it like a lasso, thoughtfully. “But he did ask me to visit him over the summer. Right after he’d pulled me out of the lake.”

“What.”

“It’s odd, isn’t it? I know. We were alone, even you didn’t hear us, and you were standing right there. And she knew about the Yule Ball, even though it didn’t have press. We assumed that Colin was her source, but he didn’t even go.”

“Are you going to Bulgaria?”

“What?”

“You,” he said shortly, “were invited somewhere. Are you going?”

“I — well — frankly, I don’t know. I have lots to do for S.C.R.U.M.B.Y., and I’ll be too busy for much traveling. Then he said he could come visit me, to help—”

He snorted.

“What?” she inquired sharply.

“In muggle London? Viktor Krum?”

“Yes,” she said hotly. “He’s interested in muggle-born rights—”

“Oh, I expect he’s fascinated.”

“And he promised to use his connections to get me in touch with someone in the Wizarding Civil Rights Union.”

“From the goodness of his snow-white heart,” he drawled, and lashed a Freezing Curse at the far wall. It shattered into frost against the window, and startled Neville so badly he toppled over.

“Merlin’s sake. What is it?”

“I would just be careful with what offers you accept.”

“Draco Malfoy, I’m sure you’re not implying what I think you are.”

“I’m not implying anything. I’m telling you he fancies you. Whatever conclusions—”

“He doesn’t fancy me,” she said, shocked, like the idea was intellectual anathema.

He barked a laugh.

“He doesn’t! He just likes to talk to me, that’s all. Most people don’t treat him like a real person. It’s very sad, actually.”

“Which is why took you to the ball. To talk.”

“Yes. Yes, to talk! And you took Daphne, but that doesn’t mean—”

“That’s different.”

“How?”

“Because I’m not interested in Daphne,” he said pointedly, and her flames plummeted, hitting an inkwell. The inkwell exploded.

He examined it with interest. So did several others. Hermione watched the ashes gutter and burn, blinking at them.

“So—”

“Don’t say it.”

He pressed his lips together.

“I did—”

“Don’t say it!”

He glanced at her.

“Are you smiling?”

“Dreadfully sorry, I know you’re allergic,” she said.

He watched her curiously. She twisted up the side of her mouth in that bunched-up smile she did when she couldn’t help it, like she was too full of fondness and it was welling up in her mouth. He made a sound of amusement and tilted his head at her, mirroring her, sort of gently mocking — imitating her, a bit, with the corner of his mouth. To remind her. She went tsss with her teeth in that way that meant you think you’re so funny, and his smirk was a strongly worded yes, and then she was saying— it was tricky, but he could usually get it — it was a close-lipped smile and a line between her brows and a softness around the eyes, which were typically so stern and full of fire, as if to say: You are the most fascinating thing in a world that has magic in it, which was a line he’d thought himself ten seconds ago, looking at her.

And there went the Charms classroom. Pity about it really, lovely space. They’d replace it one of these days.

Mad-Eye’s leg scraped the floor. Hermione pivoted and presented a different kind of I am a forty-year-old career professional in the body of a fifteen-year-old smile, meanwhile Draco contemplated bleakly that fancying her might be the worst thing to happen to his class rank in years. His heart rate was doing him an embarrassment and he was reeling in his thoughts with a fishing net. When Mad-Eye took out his wand, he was actually grateful, because the jolt of anxiety gave him something to steer with.

Staring down the end of the grizzled old auror’s wand was an unwelcome confrontation with mortality that he tried not to let bother him. Moody, for his part, appeared to be having too much fun; he feinted at him three times, cackling every time Draco dodged.

Finally Draco planted one foot behind the other, a duelist's stance, and he did not flinch, the next time Mad-Eye jerked at him.

"Better," grunted Mad-Eye. "Stay still. Stop trying to dodge every curse, boy. Just parry them. You've got the knack."

Then he raised his wand.

Draco caught the Reductor at three feet — a bolt of writhing white energy, crackling in midair — and with a sharp wrist movement, he redirected it into the wall. It exploded a small tuft of stone, which Mad-Eye conjured back into place with a flick of his wand.

"Good," said Mad-Eye approvingly. "Square work. Careful with that refraction, though. They're faster than diffusing it, but in melee, they're riskier, and a reckless one could hit one of your friends."

"I assumed we were dueling," he muttered, but Mad-Eye had moved on to Hermione.

She held her wand perfectly in front of her eyes, shoulders square, feet apart. The stance was flawless. The countercurse, however, was not: when Mad-Eye feinted, she flinched and took three scrambling steps back. Mad-Eye grunted, shook his head, and finally leveled his wand at her.

When the curse came, she yelped and threw up a Shield Charm that bounced the curse straight back at him.

Mad-Eye squawked, ducked, and the curse soared into a glass paperweight on his desk, which promptly exploded.

A titter of laughter came from the class. Mad-Eye straightened up and glared at her.

"That," he said, "was not a countercurse, Granger."

"I know," she said, in a very small, very high voice. "I know, I know it's not. I'm sorry. Can I try again?"

“Care to first tell us why you chose not to use a countercurse?”

“I panicked.”

“So we think, girlie. Say more.”

“I panicked, and — and I went for the first spell I knew would work. That I could do.” She lowered her chin.

“That being a Shield Charm.” He used his wand to scratch his eyebrow. “Oi. Brats. Does anyone want to tell Miss Granger why a Shield Charm is a piss-poor idea for close combat?”

Draco flicked up his hand, lazily. No one else did.

“I know why,” she interrupted sharply. Mad-Eye gestured for her to go on. “The Shield Charm has part of a Refractor Curse built into its magical footprint. It reflects everything. If it absorbed all the energy that struck it, the charm would create an enormous energy well for the caster, and eventually it could make them pass out.”

“Very good,” grunted Mad-Eye. “Full marks. Except that reflecting spells leave you liable to do what I just warned Mr. Malfoy against. Hitting your friends. Or, in this case, your teacher.”

“Yes, sir.”

“A countercurse is a defense for close-quarters, precision fighting. Brawling. Not a lot of people appreciate this, because most wizards couldn’t fight a niffler in a paper bag, but brawling takes more precision than dueling. Why? You fumble a dismount, send a curse wide — boom. That’s your lieutenant. Your brother. Your wife. No. A good Shield Charm is what you want on your vanguard. And for what it’s worth, you’ve got a very good Shield Charm, Granger.”

“I… thank you, sir.”

“We’ll do it again,” he barked, and she raised her wand, but her wrist was trembling.

Two more efforts, and she finally caught the white bolt on the tip of her wand, instead of dodging it. It wasn't as far away as Draco's had been, but she held it there, her brow shiny with concentration, until the energy winnowed out of sight, and vanished in a crackle of static. When it finished her whole body went slack, and she lurched forward to lean on the desk, sweat beading on her cheeks. Draco cast a quiet Summoning Charm at her chair, and it slid up to nudge her ankle, whereon she summarily collapsed into it.

"Textbook," muttered Mad-Eye, though it was hard to tell if it was a compliment. "Keep practicing that, Granger. In the field, you won't get three tries. That's it, for the rest of you. And I don't mind if you leave early, so long as you check that corner, Finnigan!"

Seamus, who had been about to sneak out the door, jumped and waved guiltily at the professor. The hour-bell groaned. Harry and Ron waited for Draco and Hermione at the door, both worried and impressed.

"That was a good catch," Harry told Draco. "You got it farther away than mine."

"Yeah, but yours was faster, Harry," said Ron loyally. "Better reaction time. That's key."

"I don't know that it matters," said Hermione stiffly. "He was going easy on us. In a real duel, he would've had all of us down in seconds."

"No kidding, brains, he's an auror," Ron said amicably. "I should hope he can take any one of us, or we're all doomed." He turned to Draco. "It was a neat counter, though."

"Thank you. For the record, diffusing a curse is a waste of energy," Draco muttered, as they rounded the landing beneath the D.A.D.A. classroom. A wide, spacious atrium lay between theirs and the grand staircase, with a set of windows overlooking the Transfiguration Quad, and students milled around, chatting, to fill the passing period.

“In a duel, you’ve got seconds to respond to every opening. Refracting a curse saves the effort of casting your own. I was being efficient.”

“Which you know, since you’ve been in so many duels,” said Ron.

“I might have. You don’t know how I spend my summers.” There was a book on it in the Manor library, but Ron didn’t need to know that. The book had been rather old, anyway; its focused on traditional pureblood honor duels, not freeform fights for survival. It was possible some of the advice was out of date.

“I wish they let us join Dueling Club as fourth years,” said Hermione suddenly. “I would’ve liked to know something about it, before I had to do it in front of everyone.”

Draco side-eyed her. She’d never shown much curiosity about dueling before. It wasn’t her style of magic; it was fast, instinctive, and required more than a modicum of hand-eye coordination. “Contemplating a career as an auror?”

“No, but — I mean, it’s helpful to know, and it’s not like we haven’t been in magical fights before — wouldn’t you like to know these things? Preferably before we’re having jinxes thrown at us willy-nilly?”

“Are you sure you’d have time?” said Ron. “Even with Scrumpy?”

“It’s S.C.R.U.M.B.Y.!”

“Sorry! Sorry. Right. Got it.”

“Maybe if you shortened the acronym, you’d save enough time for another club,” said Harry.

She huffed in irritation.

“Granger, why did you want to d—”

Someone shouted. A surge of movement from the center of the atrium sent students scattering like water displaced by a stone. Red lights flared from the center of the crowd, the sign of magic, and someone roared.

Draco cast a Buffering Charm and shoved through the crowd, which was wrestling past him to get in the opposite direction.

A circle yawned in the center of the atrium, where Marcus Flint was squalling on the floor with Neil Macdonald, who'd hooked his elbow around the bigger boy's throat in the most textbook headlock of all time. It was almost embarrassing. Neil lacked four inches and at least a stone of Flint's girth, but he was hauling him around like a puppet on strings.

"TAKE IT BACK! You lying, trollsucking shit, take it back—"

"GERROFF," howled Flint, scrabbling at the arm on his throat. "G'RROFF ME—"

Neil hauled him up, and with a mighty flip, threw him onto the floor. Flint went sprawling. Now with both hands freed, Neil lunged for his wand, which had been knocked astray. Flint did the same, but Neil was faster.

He whirled on Flint — BANG! — and a blast of white light filled the hall.

Draco threw an arm across Hermione and hauled them both around as the light momentarily blinded them. In the bleary blinking that followed, there was only one boy in the circle; and he dangled from his fingers the squealing, writhing body of a garden snake.

Hermione shoved her head under Draco's arm, peering into the circle, and gasped. "Is that — is that Flint?"

"One suspects," said Draco, queasily, as Neil levitated the thrashing snake up and down on his wandtip, then bounced him forcefully across the stones like a coil of wire. Chill echoes of uneasy laughter erupted from the crowd around them, mostly Hufflepuffs, who failed to show much dismay at their fellow student's misfortune; whatever Flint had said to Neil must have been remarkably bad.

"Full human," said Ron wondrously. "I've never seen McGonagall do that."

"Because it's illegal," snapped Hermione. "You can't use involuntary transfiguration on another subject, wizards have gone to prison for less."

"Good," said Harry firmly, "it'll build character."

"Harry!"

"What? Flint's a git, and I'm not sorry it's come back to him."

"Flint? Who cares about him?" she demanded, and Draco blinked in pleasant surprise. Harry, too, seemed startled by her vehemence. "He'll be fine! Or he won't be! But Daphne nearly got thrown out for being mean to Millie Bulstrode, and she's a pureblood! Neil could get himself expelled!"

"You didn't hear what he said to him," said a low, sullen voice. Hermione jumped, and Susan Bones appeared at her elbow, her plump jaw set in stubborn satisfaction. For a girl whose face was usually slack and jolly, this was a strange new expression, and not one that set Draco at ease.

"Oh! Susan," Hermione said, pressing a hand to her chest. "I didn't see you. What — what did he say, if you don't mind?"

Susan gave her a disgruntled look, as if unable to tell if she was serious; and then turned to stare coldly at the scene unfolding before them.

"Amos Diggory lost his job this morning," she said.

“What?”

“What?” said Ron loudly. “Old Amos? You’re kidding!”

“My aunt told me,” she said slowly. “They fired her, too, but she knew it was coming for a long time now. She was a Fudge appointee. It was just a matter of time.”

Her mouth held the words in a strange, brittle way, tinged with a cynicism that she couldn’t quite sell. They weren’t her words, but someone else’s, someone older’s, and she clearly didn’t believe them.

“I don’t suppose your aunt gave a reason,” said Draco.

Susan gave him a plaintive, piercing look. “Unprofessional conduct,” she said. “At least, that’s what they said for Diggory. They just said my aunt was a security risk.”

“Security?” demanded Ron. “Bones has been head of Law Enforcement for ages, what’s the risk?”

“There isn’t one,” snapped Susan. “She’s a brilliant Secretary. And she was always loyal to the Ministry, she kept working for them even after Runcorn won and everyone told her to quit— but—”

“But what?”

“But my dad’s a muggle,” she said.

Then she cupped her hands around her mouth and bellowed: “STEP ON HIM!”

Another billow came from the crowd. A crest of gold hair appeared over the forest of dark heads, and a prefect badge glimmered through the sea of robes — Draco felt a whisper of hope that it was Cedric, come to set his boy straight — but this was a gravely misplaced hope. A group of Slytherins swelled out of the crowd, bound in packs, as it always seemed they were, these days — among them Theo, Pansy, Daphne, and the sneering blond idol of the Hogwarts Head Boy.

“Oh, Merlin,” said Theo, massaging his eyes.

“Bloody hell,” said Pansy, eager.

Cassius Warrington gripped a pair of first years by the hair, wrenched them apart, and swept between them into the circle. “What’s going on?” he demanded. “Just what the hell sort of situation do we have here, anyway?”

“Remedial etiquette,” said Neil casually, whipping Flint to and fro like a riding crop.

“Remedial—? Is that a student?”

“Technically, right now, he’s your closest genetic relative,” said Neil.

Warrington’s jaw dropped. He lagged for an understandable beat of astonishment; and when he recovered, he snapped, “Twen—th—fifty points from Hufflepuff! For inappropriate use of magic! And if you don’t put him back on the count of three, I’ll take another fifty! One; two—”

Neil’s eyes glittered. “Take them.”

Susan whistled in approval. A cluster of Hufflepuffs roared, signifying their consent to this sacrifice.

“Cass,” said Theo, blinking tiredly, “leave it, would you? Let’s go get Snape.”

“Nott, I’ll be about my business, and you go be about yours,” he snapped, which made Theo scowl. “I don’t question you about your obligations. Now. Macdonald, set him to rights, and we’ll handle this like gentlemen.”

“See, Cass, but that depends,” said Neil, “on your interpretation of ‘rights.’ For instance: I would say he’s found his calling.”

“Another fifty, then,” said Warrington, coldly, “and a month of detentions for you — with Snape, so don’t get any ideas about watering flowers with that pansy of a house-head you’ve got. And I’ll be having a word with Dumbledore. And my father. And put him down.”

Neil kissed his teeth. “As you like,” he said, and then wrenched his wand high into the air.

The snake soared. It just missed the arm of the chandelier, and before it could return to earth, Neil flicked his wand, and another BANG! filled the chamber. Flint sprang into being somewhere around the chandelier, and then hurtled back to earth, roaring, while the crowd erupted in screams and peeled apart.

Draco was rocked back on his feet. He groped for a handhold and found one on Hermione’s shoulder, who stood her ground and drove her elbow hard into a fleeing Ravenclaw — shoved her way through the crowd, sprinted into the center, and flung her wand high, crying: “Wingardium leviosa!”

Blue blossomed from the outstretched limb of her wand, flowering up her arm and crystalizing around the tip of her wand. Fingers of ghostly light rose and caught Flint in a perfectly symmetrical net of hexagons. The spell snapped him up just in time to whisk him over the heads of the crowd — sweeping his shadow precariously over Neil, Cassius, Theo, and Pansy, who had all dropped to their knees. Theo had thrown himself across Pansy like a human shield, though needlessly, because Hermione’s net buoyed Flint gently and carefully to the ground, where he dropped to the ground and curled into a ball, shuddering.

Hermione turned, her wand still gleaming faintly blue, and breathed shakily, wiping away a spray of sweat-damp curls that had sprung loose from their clip. She glowed slightly with the fear and exertion of the magic, and her collar had been rumpled slightly in the crowd, with sweat jeweling her temples, but her eyes were narrow and sharp and focused, and she was just — incredibly good. It was a spell even Draco couldn't have managed, not that strong, not on a weight like Flint's, with the force of gravity bearing down on it. He'd known it before, but — there was a difference between knowing and seeing.

"What?" she breathed, and he looked sharply away.

Neil planted his boot on Flint's shoulder and pushed. "You see that?" he said. "That's Hermione Granger. She saved you. Say thank you, twat."

"Stop that," she said. "Neil. That's not—"

Flint rolled upright, utterly wrecked: his hair askew, blood dribbling from each nostril, and a glaze of bloody, unseeing hatred painted across his ugly face. "How dare you," he rasped.

"Cass." Theo stepped into the circle, reaching for Warrington's elbow. "Cooler heads, lad. Pans, get Flint—"

"Hell do you want me to do, levitate him? I can't manage a Leviosa that strong."

"How dare I?" Neil said pleasantly. "Hurting you doesn't take half the daring you seem to think it does, friend. You were always piss at spellwork."

But Flint wasn't looking at Neil. Neil didn't seem to exist to him. The black inkpots of his beady eyes, crusted with red, swiveled and tightened on Hermione, who took a startled step back.

"Pans," said Theo flatly. He shouldered past Warrington, fumbling for his wand. "Now—"

"Now what?"

Flint lifted his chin with awful dignity. “I don’t need your stolen magic, mudblood.”

And he lifted his wand at Hermione.

And several things happened more or less at once. For one: Daphne let out a bloodcurdling scream which appeared to come from a different body altogether. For two: Theo roared, and lunged for Flint, reaching for his outstretched wand-arm.

For three: Draco ripped out his wand and executed the most flawless Bombarda since Filius Flitwick took his Board Exams.

Flint shot into the wall. Crack, skull on stone, a horrible sound. Draco stalked forward, shaking out his wand-hand, and the Impedimenta caught Flint in the stomach. He slowed like he’d dropped into tar. The third spell was a jinx Flitwick never taught, and for good reason: a lash of his hand fused Flint’s teeth together into a seamless plate of cartilage. Flint screamed, but the sound was arrested by the smooth grill covering his throat.

There was screaming. The crowd broke into chaos. The circle snapped closed in a dead crush of fleeing students and someone was hauling on his arm but he shook them off and wrenched his wand back up at Flint. A spell shot past his head from behind — flickers of magic threaded the riot behind him — and he dodged, swiveling away from the immobilized boy. He shot a point-blank Petrificus Totalus at Warrington’s head, which toppled the boy like a felled redwood. When he spun around on his heel there was another Slytherin — one of Flint’s friends, a chaser — Stupefy — another one — Impedimenta — and he was still whirling, so he used the momentum to send another Petrificus at Flint, for good measure, and it was strange, but there was a rhythm to it, like racing, like flying, like the best games of quidditch — jinx, parry, jinx, a dance in three-four time.

He couldn’t see Hermione. She had vanished into the uproar. His pulse was warm and fast in his temples, and he could hear it rapping out the beat of a skirmish, the swift twostep of charm and countercharm.

Where was she? She wasn't that tall. A body crush would sweep her under like a riptide. She could get trampled. He should have moved her.

He lifted his wand, but then a thunderclap split the air, and everything froze.

It was like time had stopped. He could feel his body, but couldn't move it. The air slowed and stilled like tar. Even the jinxes flying overhead slowed and fizzled out.

The high and furious brogue of Professor McGonagall split the newfound silence.

"What is the meaning of this?"

She swept down the staircase like Michael descending from the clouds, her robes billowing, her wand sweeping across the whole tumultuous assembly, as if she couldn't decide where to point it first. Mad-Eye Moody hobbled a few paces behind her, jaw set grimly. "What is going on?" she bellowed. "Who is responsible?"

The freeze broke. The crowd collapsed, most people dropping to their knees at the sudden reintroduction of gravity; Draco was among the first to stagger upright, followed swiftly by Theo, who had swept Pansy under his arm. Draco swept the crowd with his eyes and found Hermione hunkered near a gargoyle with Neil, Harry, and Ron, protected by a pair of glittering and electrically bright Shield Charms. As McGonagall thundered down the stairs, Hermione flickered one of the charms out, met Draco's eye, and gave a little nod of reassurance; he nodded back jerkily, and hoped that the deep unclenching of relief in his stomach did not otherwise reveal itself.

She was fine. And he was an idiot, for worrying.

Flint was making sounds that would have been shrieks if he could sieve air through the smooth plate in his mouth, and struggling in ways that would have been violent if he could move. Irritably, Draco snapped his wand behind him and muttered a Silencing Charm.

“Malfoy!”

Damn.

McGonagall swept down on him, and palpably staggered back when she saw Flint. “Did you — could you — who did that?”

She hauled Flint up by his collar, jabbed her wand at his mouth, and unsealed his teeth with a silent spell. Flint gasped for air like a drowning fish.

He shoved free of McGonagall and tore off down the hallway.

“Flint! Come back here!”

“Want me to get him?” offered Mad-Eye. He fingered his wand longingly.

“No, Alastor. You stay. Malfoy — don’t think I didn’t see that Silencing Charm, you’ll be coming with me—”

Mad-Eye snorted. Draco glanced at him, and Mad-Eye returned a cool, cryptic stare that made him wonder if perhaps the Defense professor had seen more than he let on.

“And Warrington, as for you — Warrington? Oh, wonderful! Our Head Boy is petrified. How useful.” McGonagall’s diagnostic spell glittered over his face and dissipated. “At least it’s not worse,” she said tightly. “Poppy can deal with the superficialities. Potter! Weasley! Granger! I don’t suppose any of you can point me to the perpetrators?”

Harry and Ron offered her identical good-natured shrugs of the un-snitching, and she sighed.

“Am I right in assuming all three of you have suffered an errant episode of acute collective blindness?”

“Sorry,” offered Harry. She waved him off, too exasperated to speak.

“At the risk of stating the obvious, professor, it was a riot,” said Theo calmly, tucking his wand back into his robes. “No one saw who cast the first spells.”

Pansy cleared her throat, which turned into a yelp, for Theo had elbowed her. He caught Draco’s eye and tilted his head. Draco nodded back.

“You seen many riots, boy?” Mad-Eye remarked.

“Pleased to say not many, sir.”

He grunted. “Thought so. Well, take it from one who’s seen plenty: they’re not spontaneously occurring phenomena.”

Neil said, “It was my fault, sir.”

He stood up straight, nursing a long bruise spanning the length of his jaw. The rind of purpled skin failed to quell his calm aura of triumph.

Mad-Eye’s tongue probed his cheek thoughtfully. “Alright,” he said, at length. “How?”

“I jinxed Marcus Flint. He called Cedric Diggory a word I’m not going to repeat, so I turned him into a garter snake,” said Neil calmly. “I know that’s against the rules. I’m sorry. If you want me to talk to Dumbledore, I’m happy to do that. But professor, let me just say, it was a cracking good piece of human transfiguration, and if you’re going to expel me, you should at least let me sit the N.E.W.T. first.”

McGonagall covered her face in her hands. Mad-Eye barked a harsh laugh, sobering when McGonagall glared at him.

“We do not condone human transfiguration on other students,” she spat, “or any wizards, ever, no matter what was said to you, Mr. Macdonald.”

“I know, professor.”

“You may very well face serious disciplinary consequences for this, I hope you realize. Pomona will be horrified; your parents, of course, will be informed. Do you understand? Are you taking this seriously?”

Neil rubbed his jaw. “Yes, professor, very much. And I’m sure they’ll want to know about it, if only because — well—”

“What? Spit it out!”

“The jinx was my mum’s idea,” he admitted.

McGonagall turned around and walked away to the foot of the stairs. Mad-Eye was giggling to himself.

“Yes! I expect it was! I will be writing a long letter to Miss Mary Macdonald, explaining that the rules of Hogwarts Castle have not changed since she was enrolled, nor have the standards of her house wavered such that I am any less disappointed in her— do you find this amusing, Alastor?”

“Bit,” admitted Mad-Eye.

“It isn’t!”

Neil began to grin, tentatively; abruptly, Mad-Eye snarled at him. “What’s so funny? Think it’s a joke, boy?”

“N-no—”

“Think that punishment is funny, do you? Want me to give it a go? Think you’ll find it funny, then?”

“N-n-no, sir.”

“That’s right.” He pulled back, sneering. “Malfoy. Nott. Parkinson. You’re coming with me to Dumbledore’s office.”

“Sir?” said Theo, like he’d been clubbed.

“Why me?” demanded Pansy. “I didn’t have anything to do with it!”

“I’ll be the judge of that.”

“Alastor,” said McGonagall, impatiently, but Mad-Eye flicked his fingers at her.

“Clean it up, Minnie. I’ll sort them out.”

She rolled her eyes and swept off, muttering. Mad-Eye jerked his head at the stairs and started his slow, lilting ascent, without waiting to see if they followed. Trading a dismal look, Theo and Pansy followed him, lifting their chins in similar angles of snobbish objection.

Draco tucked his wand away and picked his way through the quiet hall. He felt a pressure on the back of his neck. He turned his head, and caught Hermione staring from across the atrium.

She didn’t seem to realize she’d been caught; she was watching him distantly, with the warm curious pressure of a scientific examination, like her mind was operating at an altitude several thousand leagues above her body. Her eyes flickered down to his shoes and up again, and a shiver ran down his back.

He wanted to demand what she was about, but Moody was fast leaving, and Harry and Ron were calling her away to help with Warrington.

Hermione tilted her head, her lips just so slightly parted. He raised his eyebrows at her, a bit defiantly.

She wet her lip and blinked twice, and he watched as some cognitive instrument visibly reset itself. She jerked away, and hurried after

Harry and Ron.

He wondered if he'd frightened her.

The weight of her gaze could have suffocated him. He wasn't sorry for jinxing Flint — it had happened and there was no use regretting it, even if he had gone further than the situation merited — but he did worry that she might not see it the same way. She might begin to think he was the kind of person who couldn't control his impulses. He could control his impulses. He just hadn't felt like controlling that one. Marcus Flint was a savage person and whatever he would have done to her would have been worse than what Draco did to him.

Or maybe it wouldn't have been. Draco found, refreshingly, that he didn't care. He only cared if Hermione thought differently because of it. Which would — frankly speaking — make her something of a hypocrite, because she had used aggressive magic on people before, and she never seemed too hesitant about Stunning people last year. But then, he hadn't Stunned Flint, had he? He'd chosen a jinx for pain.

She mightn't like that. Might be that it tested one of those iron scaffolds of moral compunction. He twitched, sullen and restless, and stalked the rest of the way to Dumbledore's office.

The headmaster's suite stood behind an eight-foot statue of a griffin, its wings cupped around the sharp double-helix of the stairs.He climbed them. A faint draft jingled lonesomely through the high atria of this part of the castle. A door of shining cherry wood explained by way of gold placard that behind it lay ALBUS DUMBLEDORE, HEADMASTER, and it sat ajar. Inside the office, it felt like he had stepped abruptly into another time of day, and another time in history: ribbed marble pillars twined up to the dark stone vault of the ceiling, while row upon row of big dark oil portraits formed a conference of stone-faced observers who kept a silent and haughty watch over the room. Silk-shaded lamps burned low, and around the room a host of magical instruments — sextants, Sneakoscopes, cauldrons, crystal balls — hovered in magical suspension, drifting around the ceiling like a host of glittering silver planets. At the back of the room sat a vaulted platform upon which sat a very old harp, a very old mirror, and on the shelf above it, a very, very old hat. A wide rip in the brim evoked a mouth. Draco had worn it once, a century ago.

Beneath the podium rested a titanic claw-foot desk, encircled by plush red armchairs, and in two of these slouched Theo and Pansy. Moody presided, at left, pouring tea into blue china cups on a silver tray. It must have been Dumbledore's, but the headmaster himself was nowhere to be found.

Predictably, Theo was complaining. Draco shut the door with his heel and leaned against it, listening.

"...going to be done soon? Not to be a brat, but we've other things to do today."

"Yes, and I will be a brat, if he won't," said Pansy. "I'll have you know we've another obligation—"

"Got a meeting to make, have you?" growled Mad-Eye. That shut both of them up. "Worried the League won't make do without you? Oh, I know all about that," he added meanly, when Theo twitched. "I know what you two have been up to, scuttling around the dungeons. There's not a thing that goes on in this castle Dumbledore doesn't know about, including your little social club. I told him to get rid of it, but he picks his battles, does Albus."

"Sir—"

"But never think," he boomed, leaning over the table, "that picking his battles means he's taken his eye off the fight. If he's not picked your battle, it means it doesn't matter if you win it. You understand?"

Theo blinked. "Not in the least," he said. "Does Professor Dumbledore oppose the League of Promising Youth, sir? I thought he supported adolescents developing political connec—"

“Don’t play dumb with me, boy.”

The table rattled. Theo jumped, nearly spilling his chair, and Pansy seized her wand.

“Smarter men than you haven’t fooled me,” snarled the auror. “Far smarter, and far shorter-lived. You think we don’t know what you’re doing down there? I lived through the Wizarding War. I was a general before you were a notion in your father’s head. Don’t think your age will spare you, either. Maybe it will — if it’s Dumbledore. Maybe, maybe, if it’s Snape. But not if it’s me. I’ve seen soldiers younger than you, boy, I’ve fought with them. And against them. Regulus Black took the Mark when he was fifteen. Evan Rosier: sixteen. Barty Crouch—”

“Sir—”

“All dead!”

“Sir,” said Theo calmly, “Mr. Crouch is alive and well. In fact, I spoke to him at the Second Task. And I can quite assure you, it would be the shock of my young life to find he had the Mark.”

“I don’t mean Barty. He’d have hunted the Death Eaters until they ground his limbs to dust, and even then, his ashes would chase them across the world.” His tone, in describing the unerring bloodlust of his embittered old colleague, was the closest Draco had ever heard the grizzled professor come to affection. “No. His son. Junior.” He drummed his fingers restlessly on the wandhilt. “My godson,” he said quietly.

Draco jerked, and knocked his elbow into a silver sextant. It ceased hovering and clattered to the floor, loudly, making Theo and Pansy whirl around. Mad-Eye did not move; his only reaction was a minute swivel of his glass eye. He must have known that Draco was there.

“Good of you to join us,” he grunted, and reached for the teapot. “Tea, Malfoy?”

“No, thank you.”

He poured one anyway.

“He named you godfather?” demanded Pansy. “Good Lord, why?”

Mad-Eye made a series of rasping grunts, like a knife scraping the rough edge of a plate. It took a moment to realize that he was chuckling.

“Don’t let it surprise you. I was green back then, and we’d been together since auror training.”

“You were aurors together?”

“Fastest rise the Ministry ever saw,” he grunted. “Most arrests in a year. Most convictions, too, though that was all Barty. I was a wreck on the stand, I couldn’t nearly ever get the jurors to listen to me, but when he spoke, a courtroom did what he said. He could sell water to merfolk. And he was good. Never broke a rule, and it wasn’t like there weren’t chances. ‘By the book, or not at all.’ Probably why the courts loved him. And he trusted me more than anybody. No one better to keep his boy safe.”

“Well, that didn’t work out,” said Pansy.

Mad-Eye slowly turned his head toward her, like an owl. Theo made a fearful noise, glancing between the two of them, and his hand shifted toward his wand-pocket.

Then Mad-Eye threw back his head and laughed. Pansy smirked.

“No. Can’t say fairer than that. It didn’t.”

“How did he die?” she demanded. “Did you do it?”

“Pans,” exclaimed Theo.

“Oh, shut up, Teddy, they’re only questions. He doesn’t have to answer them. Was it you, professor? Or his father? Was it a battle? The Killing Curse? Did he get tortured? Or—”

“Severus Snape,” said Mad-Eye. “He’s how.”

Draco recoiled. The glass eye slid in his direction, and Mad-Eye’s mouth twitched up.

“Don’t like that, do you, Malfoy?” he said. “Of course you don’t. Snape’s your godfather, isn’t he? Expect I’d be nervous, in your position. Well, don’t be. I don’t believe in an eye for an eye.”

His fingers drummed on his wand-hilt.

“...Thank you for the reassurance, sir.”

“Professor Snape killed Barty Crouch?” said Pansy, rapturously. She sounded like the mental image of her Head of House committing murder was the highlight of her day.

Mad-Eye jerked his head. “No. Not that simple. When Snape turned coat — after the Potters died, when the war was ending — he brought names. Junior was the biggest. He and Black — but Black had disappeared, by then, he wasn’t around to hunt, and wouldn’t have been much danger if he was. It was Crouch and Rosier. They’d gone after the Longbottoms. We hunted him down, rounded him up. Barty himself presided, at the trial, and goddamn if Dumbledore didn’t pitch a fit over that — but I told him, you’ve got to let him. And he pulled through, did Barty. Sent his kid straight to Azkaban, two life sentences, no parole. The jurors wanted just one, but it was Barty who said no. He said two. One for Frank,” he added, with nearly imperceptible softening, “and one for Alice.”

Pansy buried her chin in her palm, enrapt. “That’s awful,” she said, admiringly.

“Awful,” agreed Mad-Eye, “but right. And necessary. Sometimes they all sleep in the same bed.”

“I know,” she said.

He cocked his head at her. She shrugged. Theo’s hands wrestled together like mating snakes, though his face revealed nothing but polite boredom.

“He died in Azkaban,” said Mad-Eye. “Crouch. And Rosier. But he died. Picked a fight, got his head bashed in. Dead. Probably suicide, if you want my theory. Happened the same day they caught the Lestranges — reckon he heard about it, and figured the war was over. Nothing left to live for.”

“Oh,” said Pansy, disappointed. “That’s boring.”

“That’s death,” said Mad-Eye, with a grim leer. “Boring as it comes, girlie.”

“The day they caught the Lestranges,” repeated Theo, frowning. “But that — I’m sorry, correct my memory, professor, but that was a while after the war, wasn’t it? Wouldn’t that be around—”

“August, 1988,” said Draco quietly. Three pairs of eyes settled on him. But that was when they had caught Bellatrix. He remembered because his mother hadn't left her room for a week.

“Aye,” said Mad-Eye, softer than he’d ever been. “A bit later than. Near the end of the summer. Tracked them from Witherfell — took us a damn long time, too. Didn’t help that Travers kept sniffing around the department, throwing red herrings, probably trying to get his job back—”

“When you say ‘us,’ do you mean you and Crouch, sir?”

“No. He was gone by then.” Mad-Eye folded his arms.

“They fired him?” Pansy was indignant.

“Fired him?” croaked Mad-Eye, indignantly. “Barty, who knew that office better than his own wand-arm? No. He knew they couldn’t keep him after what happened to Junior. You can’t have a man like that on the force, bad for cohesion, bad for morale, and he knew it. He resigned, and Fudge was grateful enough to give him another post in International Cooperation — a desk job, but he’d get to work with the Wizengamot, like he always wanted. Only kind thing Fudge ever did for him, too, because if they’d made him leave his next job would’ve been a tall glass of Living Death. My next partner was Kingsley.”

Theo sat up. “Shacklebolt?”

“You’re familiar,” said Mad-Eye, pleased.

“Yes. I mean, I’ve heard of him. He’s on the Wizengamot, now, isn’t he? My father—”

“Hates him. Yes.”

“I — w– sir, my father respects everyone he works with—”

“I told you not to lie,” snapped Mad-Eye. “He hates him, and believe me, the feeling’s mutual. Sibelius Nott was one of the worst men I ever met, and if that offends you, I can give you a list of reasons that’d make your toes curl.”

Theo smiled without teeth. “Respectfully, sir, I doubt you could surprise me.”

“Respectfully, boy,” said Mad-Eye, “I reckon I could.”

There was a beat.

“I got him, you know,” he added. Mad-Eye leered, warping the scars on his face into grizzled new constellations. “I had him. Had him. If I’d been half the man Barty was on the stand, he’d have been in Azkaban right now. He’s a shit duelist, your father.”

“I’ll tell him you said so.”

“Do that.”

This time, Theo showed his teeth when he smiled.

The door rattled. Another twist, and it swung open, admitted a pair of figures whose silhouettes, it seemed to Draco, had never been more diametrically opposed: one tall, imposing, graced with a fount of white hair and beard, and the other short, lanky, and dark, buried in a volume of black robes. Dumbledore and Snape came in on the heels of a cold whisper of air, their robes stirred, the wind’s touch lingering in their hair, as if they had hurried in from a run about the grounds.

Draco sat up straight, his posture reverting to propriety at the sight of Snape. He itched to ask him about his mother’s letter — its inconsistencies, the stain, the fact that she’d been injured and neither she nor Snape had even bloody told him — but Snape’s eyes slipped over him without purchase, as if he were one more part of the furniture, and fixed on Mad-Eye.

“Marcus Flint has contacted his parents,” said Dumbledore calmly. “Professor McGonagall is with him. Poppy reports no evidence of lasting injury.”

“Maybe next time.”

“It was our profound good luck that Minerva intervened when she did,” snarled Snape. “It is our fathomless luck that his parents appear disinclined to press charges, and Mr. Macdonald should go down on his knees before his better angels that no lasting harm was done, so the Ministry will not have yet more cause to surveil us—”

“Piss off, Severus, the boy’s not connected. Ask him.” Mad-Eye nudged Theo, who jumped.

“I — I couldn’t possibly comment,” he spluttered. “I’m not — particularly familiar with Marcus’s family—”

“And that just says it all, doesn’t it?”

“It doesn’t matter!” Snape surged at Mad-Eye, who stood his ground, uninterested and unfazed. For a moment, Draco was shockingly certain he was going to hit him, but the Potions Master heeled at the last moment, and stabbed a finger in his face instead. “Do you think the Commission will care whether the boy was rich or not? We face Ministry audit as it is—”

“Pipe down,” said Mad-Eye coolly, and placed his hand on his wand-hilt. Theo shifted his leg in front of Pansy.

“Thank you, Severus,” interrupted Dumbledore. “I appreciate your passion in defending this school from everyone, including its teachers. However, I must ask you not to shout at Professor Moody within reach of young ears, or mine.”

“Ministry audit,” muttered Mad-Eye. “God forbid we get a blessed Ministry audit. What if the quill inventory doesn’t add up?”

“I am not surprised you fail to take this seriously. Those of us who have been teaching for years, however—”

“Hark at him, trying to pull rank,” said Mad-Eye, with impressment. “Adorable. Look around you, Snape. How many Ministry men have been on the grounds since September? Do you think we’re free as birds? Do you think it’s easy for Albus to run this school with a puppetmaster’s hand up his—”

“Alastor,” said Dumbledore. “The children.”

Pansy let out a high nervous giggle. Snape was turning a color Draco had previously seen only in root vegetables.

“You question my credibility? You lock yourself in your tower every time he sets foot on the grounds,” he snapped. “You run from Crouch like a child from chastisement. You, who have taken emeritus duties for fourteen years, retreated to your hidey-holes and your paranoia, while some of us have continued to serve—"

"Some of us were plum short of other options, besides Azkaban," said Mad-Eye comfortably, his eye glittering. "It's rich of you to expect gratitude, Severus. And the next time you accuse me of 'hiding,' I'll take it as a warm invitation to discuss your whereabouts on a certain thirty-first of October."

From his tone he clearly expected this to be a brutal hit; but Snape's face hardened into a gleaming sheet of malice, and he said crisply, "Better absent than holding the knife, don't you think, Alastor?"

Mad-Eye gave a hard jerk. He stepped forward— and Dumbledore said, "Enough."

It was the kind of word that could quell an avalanche. Both professors stepped apart, abruptly, and Draco hauled his mouth shut.

Dumbledore turned and smiled at Draco. "Hello, Mr. Malfoy; Mr. Nott; Ms. Parkinson. I apologize for the disruption in your schedules, and for my own tardiness in particular. I trust Professor Moody has had more than enough time to perform an inquisition. I see no reason to waste more of your time with my repetition of the same. Professor Snape will escort you and Mr. Nott back to Slytherin, and I will tarry here a while with Mr. Malfoy, before I return him to his own dwelling."

"What do you want with Draco?" snarled Pansy, and Draco was faintly touched that she bothered. "He didn't see any more than we did."

"I believe you. But I would like to speak to Draco about other matters. Severus—?"

"Come," snapped Snape, and Theo and Pansy shot up. Draco rose, too, and caught Theo as he was going to leave.

“Here’s this,” he muttered, passing along Narcissa’s letter. “From my mother.”

A glimpse of strange, intense relief passed over him. He tucked it carefully into his breast pocket, straightened his lapel, and then swept out, along with Pansy, Snape, and Mad-Eye, who sent Draco a queer look and then shut the door behind them.

In the empty office, the instruments tinkled and clicked softly overhead, like an orchestra of wind chimes. Dumbledore eased himself into the chair behind the desk and reached for a cup of tea. He wrapped his wizened fingers around it and gazed pensively into its depths, as though he had forgotten anyone else was there.

By and by, Draco began to fear for the rest of his evening.

“You wanted to speak to me, professor.”

“Hm?”

“...About the fight.”

“Oh — yes. I am sure that Mr. Flint will have a great deal to say to the Ministry, when all is said and done, and it will be none too pleasant for me; but it will, at least, give me all the information I require. Your testimony, though certainly appreciated if you would prefer to give it, is not necessary.”

“...Alright.” He leaned back, skeptical. “Then why am I here?”

Dumbledore delicately rested his saucer back on the desk, and adjusted the teacup to sit at a precise angle. The tiny click of china filled the room. The headmaster’s expression was complex, closed, and deeply old.

“I am sorry for the question I am about to ask you,” he said. “You have every right to refuse to answer it, on any number of grounds. I would not ask unless I thought that the information was important, and so important that it was worth the potential breach of your friend's confidence."

"Caveat emptor," said Draco, warily. He racked his brains for what he'd say if Dumbledore accused them of cheating in the Tournament. He could always deny it, of course. He knew Snape had found his potion in the Horntail's toxicology report, but there was no way to trace that to Draco, unless one of the dragonkeepers had seen them — but then, why wait this long? And if it was about the Second Task, then what was Dumbledore's problem? Harry hadn't cheated at all, for that one. Did it have something to do with Snape? His mother? Crouch?

Dumbledore peered soulfully over his pince-nez. "Has Harry complained of unusual pains in his scar?"

Draco drummed his fingers on the chair for a moment, waiting. When no follow-up was forthcoming, he reclined in surprise.

"Is that it? That's all you want to know?"

"It would be an impoverishing remark on my intellectual character, if it was," said Dumbledore, "but presently, it is what I want to know most. Compare it to the first stroke of a sculptor's chisel upon a vast and untouched stone."

"Yes, alright, but what does his scar have to do with anything?"

"I am not trying to obfuscate my intentions, Draco, but my answer to that question very much depends on yours."

"Fine. I don't know. Once or twice, maybe. But it's Potter, he doesn't complain much in general."

Dumbledore leaned forward intently. "Do you have reason to believe that he has experienced pains that he has not reported to you, or others?"

“I don’t know what he’s said to others, obviously, I wasn’t there. If you want to know what Potter’s feeling, you should ask him. Come to think of it,” he added, sharply, “how do you know that his scar’s hurting him?” Belatedly: “Sir.”

Dumbledore’s mouth gave a twitch at the delayed honorific. “I keep in correspondence with all my faculty,” he said, “current and previous, insofar as I am able.”

It only took him a beat. That nagged him — it wouldn’t have taken Hermione any time at all.

“Lupin writes to you?”

“Occasionally. When he has reason for concern.”

“And he’s worried about Potter.”

“Harry reported episodes of acute inexplicable pain,” said Dumbledore, not exactly answering, “accompanied by severe emotional distress, and nightmares. If someone dear to me did the same, I, too, would endeavor to alert his custodians.”

“Of course he has nightmares. If you’d seen half of what he has, you’d have nightmares, too.”

“You are precisely correct,” said Dumbledore solemnly, with a readiness that made Draco wonder what Dumbledore dreamed about. “I am sure that part of his malady is a reasonable reaction to intense compounding stress and a series of traumatic episodes. But I am asking about his scar.”

“I told you everything I know. He’s mentioned it twice—”

“When?”

“When? I don’t know, I don’t keep a journal. Once, over the summer. And then once, again, a few months ago. Why?”

Dumbledore lowered his head. He pressed his fingers to his mouth and closed his eyes.

When he lifted his head, his eyes were shockingly bright.

“I appreciate your confidence in me, Draco,” he said. “If you have further questions, I will answer them to the best of my ability. Otherwise…”

The request was clear. He rose to his feet, then paused. “I do have a question,” he said. “It concerns Professor Snape.”

Dumbledore adjusted his spectacles, silently entreating him to speak.

“What’s his issue with the Potters?”

“...Have you raised this question to your godfather, Draco?”

“Yes. He won’t say. Which makes me imagine that it’s either so horrible he won’t tell me, or so petty he can’t admit it.”

The headmaster disguised his amusement by hiding his mouth behind his steepled hands. “I understand. Without breaking his confidence, I can say only that James Potter was not always the great man he would become; and that, indeed, sometimes the most admirable men of their age begin as very unadmirable little boys.”

Draco’s fingers rolled an impatient drumbeat on the chair. “So he was a prat,” he said flatly. “Is that all?”

Dumbledore gave a slight smile. “You carry much of Severus, yourself,” he said. “I hope you will forgive me for saying so, but in some ways, you carry as much of him as Lucius… then again, in others ways, not… No; while I am certain that Professor Snape would agree with your characterization of James, I do not think it would be apt to distill his feelings so simply. That was not ‘all,’ or even most of it, I’m afraid.”

“Fine. Don’t tell me. It’s private, I understand that.”

“Draco.”

He stopped halfway to the door.

“When you see Sirius, ask him about Lily Evans.”

The name Evans rang a small, inauspicious, and thoroughly rusted bell.

“Who?” He paused. “And how do you know about S—”

“If I answered that question every time it was asked of me,” said Dumbledore pleasantly, “I would not have half the time I require to do anything else. Say hello to him for me, would you?”

He smiled. The door creaked open, apparently of its own accord.

“And — Draco — I thank you wholeheartedly for your assistance. I swear not to forget it.”

Draco expected that was meant to be reassuring, and at first, it was; but as he descended the stairs from the headmaster’s office, and the draft reasserted itself with a cool finger trailing down his neck, so, too, did a claw of doubt — that it wasn’t a reassurance at all.

Back! God, the last week felt like the longest of my life. It feels like I've been months away, not weeks. I did move, and I've been starting a new job, so there's been lots to color in the time. But it's really nice to be back. Every so often, in a long project, you get phases where you feel unconfident in what you're doing, and you get anxious about whether you can live up to the promises you're making — but the comments section is my cure for that. I have no idea how to express my gratitude for the reassurances you've given me. I feel like I would be amazed if anyone thought my writing was good enough to write some of the things you've said about it, and every week, you guys rise to the occasion so astonishingly. I dunno. It's been a hard week, so I'm extra grateful to have a place to go. (It's also been a short writing week, which is possibly responsible for the mood!) Anyway. Thank you, thank you, thank you.

-This chapter goes out to the unexpected fun that is writing Mad-Eye Moody and Pansy Parkinson. Whose regard for the other can be summarized as "thank god at least one child at this school seems appropriately grizzled and cynical."

-Next chapter: an appearance from Harry's least responsible uncles; and a conversation that has been about 400,000 words in the making.

-Title: "Padfoot's Return."

Padfoot’s Return

Chapter 49: Padfoot’s Return

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

On the last day of March, a rumble broke out over the castle, and flickers of lightning painted the parapets white. Rain followed a heartbeat later, and the castle firmaments groaned in greeting to the first storm of spring.

They were returning from dinner short one member; Ron had been held up by McGonagall for wedging a third-year Slytherin in a broom cupboard. The context included some remark about Harry cheating; Draco’s charmwork had been involved, but she didn’t need to know that.

“No wonder it broke bad for him,” Harry muttered. “Raised by Barty Crouch and Mad-Eye Moody… Tell you what, that kid definitely checked his corners.”

Draco snorted.

“So Snape was a spy,” said Hermione. The Pink Lady swung forth with a murmur of Ariadne. “Which means — at one point — he was a Death Eater.”

“He was a double agent. He had to convince the Dark Lord, of all people, that he was loyal. Small wonder he was convincing.”

“He must have done a pretty good job pretending, if they were going to put him in Azkaban.”

“Wish they had done,” said Harry mutinously. He had received a well-earned T on their Potions essay.

“Harry!”

“Not for long, but c’mon—”

“Dumbledore vouches for him,” said Draco impatiently. “And it’s been fourteen years. I know what you’re thinking—”

“Oh, but I do love sentences that begin that way.”

“—but he’s long since disavowed them. He’s not a Death Eater any more than I am.”

The Gryffindor common room glittered in the artificial night of the storm. Draco climbed through the portrait-hole, relating the last points of his conversation with Snape to Harry and Hermione, and walked straight into a detonating flashbulb that reminded him of lightning.

“Creevey!”

“Jesus, Colin,” snapped Harry, somewhat breathless, and then scrambled at once to stop Draco from jinxing him. The ensuing scuffle ended up getting him a hard whack on the head and an elbow to the gut, but he was still better off than Colin would have been, who skittered out of range behind a table. “Just leave us alone, would you?”

“Sorry, Harry! Sorry, Draco! Accident, promise!” Colin wiggled the camera slyly. “Experimenting with the exposure! Didn’t mean to!”

He turned tail and fled.

“Colin, wait—”

“Harry, the photograph—”

“I know. I’ll get him,” Harry said, pained, and he took off after Colin, who darted up the steps to the boys’ dorm, and was gone.

Draco gripped his wand, entertained a few vivid mental images, and then reluctantly pried his hand away.

“I’m going to speak to McGonagall about him,” said Hermione, quietly. “I suspended him from S.C.R.U.M.B.Y., but I expect it wasn’t enough.”

“No S.C.R.U.M.B.Y.? Think of the Geneva Convention.”

She smiled and crossed to the fire, warming her fingers over the persimmony glow. The common room was empty, though voices murmured from upstairs, thumping footsteps, muffled by the rasp of rain at the window. “Trust me, I have other ideas. But I need him to tell me where Skeeter gets her information, first.”

He did like it so when she schemed. It added a charming bit of chiaroscuro to her moral slate.

Draco shucked his robe over the sofa and leaned on the mantle beside her, sharing its warmth. “He’s her contact, obviously.”

“Obviously. But he can’t be her only one. There are things in that article Colin wouldn’t have known.”

“Causes of action for libel, for instance?”

“That you and I are Potions partners,” she corrected, “and what I wore to the Yule Ball.”

“Anyone could have told him that.”

She rolled her eyes. “Yes, because I’m sure everyone was talking about nothing but.”

“You’d be surprised.”

“Honestly. You act like I rode in like Godiva on a warhorse.”

“I can think of less apt analogies.”

“It was just a nice dress,” she said, which was rather like calling the Titanic a ‘pretty nice boat.’

He was going to have a Healer locate his mind's eye and surgically remove it. It would, at the very least, stop him thinking about her coming around the staircase. That was the image that recurred to him, now, and whenever his mind floated away from the work of his hands. The colors of it, the brilliance. The lights, the gold, the smiling. That had been his downfall, in retrospect. If he'd never seen her like that, all dressed up like a grown woman, he would never have started thinking about everything else — the hair, the shoulders, the mouth. He never would have opened his eyes under the water in the prefects' bathroom, and then it would have been safe to look at her now, darkly shaded in firelight, with her hair coming in thick gold-tipped coils down her shoulders, like a flowering vine of marigolds. It might even have been possible to look away.

There were things he could not do.

He remembered this. He remembered his mother. There were things that happened to people who broke the rules.

But you understand, darling, don't you? And you will be careful?

I'm a Malfoy. I can do as I like.

I'm sure you can.

He touched his ring, bent the knuckle, and twisted. The pressure left a red crease that lingered after the pain.

"You don't think I'm cruel, do you?" she said abruptly.

He scoffed. It was an instinct; he wasn't at all prepared to answer that, and had to grapple first with the shock of being asked in the first place.

"Is there an angle to this, or am I supposed to take that generally?"

"I was thinking about Skeeter. Because of Flint. I've been thinking about the things I said to her. And did. Or want to do."

He watched her warily. “And your findings?”

She was rolling her wand over in her hands, an absent fidget, grinding the tip against her palm. “I haven’t decided. But I have this… suspicion,” she admitted, “that I shouldn’t have to think this much.”

“You think it should be easy?”

“No, but I — sometimes I feel — angry. It wasn’t Skeeter’s fault I was in the lake, but I didn’t care. I was angry, and she was there, and I knew it was alright to hurt her because no one would stop me or care. And sometimes I want to do these awful things to her, or, or Flint, or — and I don’t know what to do with it, because I know I’m in the right. I don’t know how much that matters, though.”

“So?”

“It bothers me,” she said simply. “I don’t want to be cruel. I never intended to be a cruel person, and I don’t like the idea that being here has made me one.”

When she said here, he didn’t know if she meant Hogwarts, or the Wizarding World, or both.

Unbidden, he recalled a very distant memory, from a very different conversation, between two very different people.

I intend to be a thinker and a doer! I’d like to make some positive change in the world.

“And I know you might think it’s simple, or simplistic, and maybe it is,” she was saying. “But I’m asking you because I think you’d tell me. I know you’d tell me. Right?”

“I would,” he allowed, and her shoulders sank infinitesimally in relief. “But you’re not cruel.”

“No?”

“Don’t be ridiculous.” He discovered he believed this with a confidence he rarely felt about anything, these days, and it was comforting to discover he still had the capacity for this sort of belief. The bedrock kind. The temple floor.

“You don’t have to say that to make me feel better, by the way,” she said, feigning indifference. She wasn’t good at it. She spoke with her hands, and they were too honest; they were already trying to wring themselves for the mistruth. “I can take it. I’m tough.”

“Hermione Granger.” He wondered if it sounded too fond. It was worrisomely close.

She stopped.

“If they cut you open, and withdrew a fragment of a particle of marrow — if they drew a single drop of your heartsblood, and laid it together with one cell of your gray matter — if all that remained of you was a constellation of particles, in other words, you profoundly intransigent idiot — the distilled essence of you, your vanishing remainder, would still hold more goodness in it than this school has under its roof without you.”

She rested her head against the mantle and looked at him frankly for a moment, like she’d never seen him before. He discovered that it was pleasant to say the things that he believed. What a terrible shock.

“So for God’s sake, pull yourself together,” he said.

She laughed with less humor than surprise. Her eyes were shining.

“Sometimes I used to think I imagined you,” she said.

He’d imagined she might come back at him with some sort of equivalently nice or affectionate thing, so this was moderately disappointing. He was brave about it, however.

“That must have been depressing.”

“Did I ever tell you that? Especially over the summers,” she said. “You are so intensely, naturally ridiculous. I cannot imagine you in my primary school, it’s impossible. And so when I went home, I’d think—well, you obviously imagined that. People don’t talk like that. Only you do. And years later, you still do. You remain, without exception, the most ridiculous person I’ve ever met.”

He ran through four or five different replies of varying bemusement and stupefaction, before settling on: “I talk perfectly normally, thank you very much.”

She wrinkled her nose, shook her head, and snickered. Her laugh blunted his edge of anxiety.

“Thank you, by the way. For Flint.”

“You don’t have to thank me for that.”

“I know,” she said calmly, “and I would’ve stopped him, but I appreciate that — I mean, I know it cost you something, with the Slytherins. I expect they won’t soon welcome you back. And I hope you’ll be careful with them, too, in the future — I mean, I know you think you’re Merlin’s gift to dueling and all, and you are quite good at it, but these aren’t sporting people, and they like to gang up.”

“They’re not going to attack me—”

“I know you think so, and you might be right, but listen to me anyways. You’re not used to these people hating you. It’s a very different place to stand.”

His lip curled. There was something slimy and repulsive to the way she described it like an exchange. A sacrifice of capital. It wasn’t like that. Flint wasn’t allowed to touch her. That wasn’t something he’d decided, it was a fact.

“Don’t concern yourself,” he said shortly. “It’s very little to do with you. I’ve been wanting to try out that jinx for months.”

“Right. Well — I’m glad you had the opportunity. To try. They were — a bit unorthodox.”

“They’re independently researched,” he said casually. “If you’re interested, I can show you.”

She thought about it. “For self-defense purposes only,” she decided, “I suppose.”

“Naturally. And French.”

“I don’t need you to teach me French.”

“But if you did, you admit—”

“Why are we back to French? I don’t care about French.”

“—just saying, I’m a man of many talents—”

“Not that it even matters, because frankly, I’d rather not know what any of those girls are saying when I walk by them, I hear them giggling and I know it’s not kind—”

“—not just curses and potions, I’ve hidden depths—”

“—like that girl at the Three Broomsticks — her tone was quite enough. ‘We sleep there.’ Good Lord. I understood perfectly well what she meant when she said that, thank you, and let me tell you, I’ve no interest in hearing more.”

“Ça sonnait mieux quand tu l'as dit.”

“What does that mean?”

“If only someone could teach you, perhaps you’d find out.”

The portrait-door introduced itself to their conversation with a noisome creak. A gasp of voices issued from the hall outside, voices that fell short when they came into the common room, for reasons that became clear as soon as their source became clear.

Ron stood framed in the dark round of the portrait-hole, addressing them with a lingering stare of fascination and dismay, like an archeologist unearthing the remains of an animal that oughtn't exist. His gaze rebounded from one to the other across a distance of so little space his head didn't even move.

Draco stepped back, which he realized too late only made it worse.

"Hello, Ron," said Hermione, and though it warbled with awkwardness, it was with a stilted, hoarse gladness that she turned to greet him. She took a half-step toward him as if he'd shifted the gravity of the room.

"Hi," he said. "Sorry to interrupt."

"You didn't." She drifted another few eager steps forward and latched to the back of an armchair, as if she needed to staple herself in place. "Do you — do you want to sit down, and have a cuppa? We can go over the Charms homework."

He softened when Hermione spoke; it was obvious, and it provoked a sharp stab of discomfort in Draco to watch. Making up had left her treating Ron somewhat gingerly, with uncharacteristic softness, and one didn't begrudge him it so much as one found it awfully hard not to notice.

Ron fancied her. Daphne had been getting at it, at the Yule Ball, but he'd been too thick and distracted to listen. It was embarrassingly obvious, now that he had rediscovered how to operate his bloody eyeballs. Ron looked at her like he was the first dirty-kneed fourteen-year-old to invent the idea of a crush. Sappy and timid and longing and standoffish, not a single bit of it original, but all horribly, earnestly felt. Daphne had been right. The more fool him, not listening to her.

Amidst a wave of amused disdain, he felt an unexpected peal of sympathy. It must have taken a toll on Ron, the anxiety of it, the horrible quagmire of fresh feeling. What awkwardness, what jealousy. He must have been — Merlin, he must have been jealous; it was quite impossible not to be. Naturally he'd feel resentment. Draco couldn't blame him a bit for that, and in fact very nearly forgave him on the spot. All that would be enough to drive a man mad, even putting aside the fact that she didn't fancy him back.

Which she didn't. Wouldn't. Couldn't possibly. He wasn't being a prat, merely applying the available evidence to the question at hand. Ron was a good mate and a nice fellow and pretty clever when you put him in front of a chessboard, but he was a human bloke, and that was one thing. Hermione was quite another.

For one thing, she was actually, properly deranged — half madness, half fury, all brilliant, approximately nine-tenths natural disaster — all bound up around a moral backbone of dazzling raw platinum and not one spare iota of tact. If she were going to fancy someone, it would be — it would be no one. It would be Merlin come again, with better cheekbones. It would take the second greatest wizard of her age to even hold her attention.

The poor unlucky bastard. Fancying Hermione Granger was a bit like flying into a hurricane and hoping you'd hit the eye before you drowned. He ought to know.

Through a rather inhospitable volley of spring rain, a slim fraction of Gryffindor waded down the wet slopes for the last Hogsmeade trip of the year. It was amusing to watch Harry eagerly skip ahead of the group, stall, and then dither impatiently while the rest of them tramped through thick sluices of mud. It was almost amusing enough to compensate for the wet.

A winding lane behind Hogsmeade led up to the Shrieking Shack. On the razed hill, encrusted with black dead trees, the old building sat under a deluge of rain like shipwreck, jutting black tongues of splintered wood into the rain. The windows were dark, but at the garden gate, a great black dog sat on its haunches, its nose probing the air eagerly for something.

It shot down the path at a breakneck pace. Harry made it three bounding steps forward before the dog hurled itself into the air, tackled Harry to the ground, and let out a bark of such excitement that it scattered crows from the trees.

Boy and dog went rolling through the mud, and somewhere in the braid of brown and white and black, the dog shifted, leaving in its place a tall man with a great black shag of rockstar hair, who sat laughing in a pile of limbs and dirt and absolutely defiled clothes, one arm around Harry's neck, grinding his knuckles mercilessly into Harry's head.

"Hey! Oi! Gerroff!"

"Oh, you want off, is it? Not so big and strong, are you, now, boy? Still not big enough to tangle with your old Uncle Pad— whoa—"

Harry had squirmed and flipped Sirius into the mud, sending him skidding to the bottom of a hill. The man gave a bellow of delighted laughter as he went.

"Good arm! Course, you got lucky — caught me off guard—"

"Hello, Padfoot," said Hermione, "and it's nice to see you, and everything, but someone could hear us."

"Aw, yeah, but they won't know it's me," said Sirius, grinning, as he stumbled to his feet. "We've been around for a few days now, and nobody's come up here. It's the weather, keeps everyone indoors. Alright, you lot?"

Draco dipped his head with dignity. Ron shuffled forward and clapped hands with him.

“Good to see you, mate.”

“And you,” Sirius said generously. “Let’s get you inside. Moony’s making tea.”

They rushed in from the rain, and Sirius shucked his raincloak carelessly over a banister, revealing a long, sweeping black tailcoat that hung over his sunken bare chest. Black runic tattoos latticed the feeble landscape of muscle there, deflated slightly from his emaciation, though a promising fullness had returned under his cheeks. He wore thick-soled boots of scabbed leather, which creaked on the withered floorboards of the Shack as he wandered into the living room, hollering: “Moony! Company!”

The stairs gave an announcing creak, and Remus came hurtling down, almost fumbling the last steps. “You took your time getting them,” he said breathlessly. “I was starting to worry—”

“And here it comes,” said Sirius, rolling his eyes. “You would’ve worried if I’d Apparated them. What don’t you worry about, old goat, that’s what I want to know.”

“—why I never ask you to do anything that needs doing in the next fortnight. Oh, shut up,” said Remus affectionately, and clapped Sirius hard around the shoulder in what might have been an embrace, or possibly just a hello. Sirius clucked his tongue and fussed at him. “Harry! Hello! Merlin, you’re getting tall!”

“That’s what I said,” said Sirius. “Dunno where the hell it comes from, James never was.”

“Pft. Lils had, what, an inch on him, I think? In heels?”

“My dad was short?” said Harry, whose delight at receiving information about his father warred with his obvious dismay.

“Yes.”

“Not exactly.”

“A munchkin.”

“In a tall group—”

“Needed to stand on the seats at matches.”

“He was five foot ten,” said Remus.

“Four eight on a good day, bless his soul,” said Sirius, with one hand over his heart. “I can still hear him, sometimes, asking me to fetch a stool.”

“Right,” said Harry, trying not to sound disappointed. “But my mum, you know, I might get it from her. The height. I mean, you never know.”

He shot a furtive look at Ron, who could already look Sirius in the eye. Ron smirked at him.

“Oh, sure,” said Sirius, flopping into one of the chairs. His leg hooked over the armrest, and he laced his fingers behind his head. “Came from a family of ceiling-dusters, she did. Mary liked to call her the Amazon. And the other Evans girl you could use as a maypole.”

“I think you made that joke to her, once,” said Remus. “She didn’t take it well.”

“Mm, no. Never did have the sense of humor Merlin gave a rock.”

“You’ve met Aunt Petunia?” said Harry.

“Against my will,” said Sirius, lifting a finger, “twice. The first time, I was unprepared. The second time—”

“Was your fault,” Remus said amusedly, leaning against the wall.

“Was an accident! How was I meant to know the dress was supposed to be that color? I was trying to help!”

Draco straightened. The connection between Aunt Petunia, Lily Evans, and Petunia Evans suddenly resolved.

He still hadn’t the foggiest what all that had to do with Snape.

“Come have some tea, Harry,” said Remus, tipping his head to the kitchen. “We haven’t much food — we’ve been having to steal from the Hogsmeade general store, and whatever people toss out—”

“You should have told us!” Harry was upset. “We could’ve brought you something!”

Sirius flapped his hand. “We’re fine. We’ve both been making do on our own for years. We hunt when we camp — very easy on full moons—”

Hermione shuddered. Only Draco seemed to notice, for Sirius steamed right along: “...and salt whatever we don’t eat, pack it up, go along. Buckbeak’s a great help, too, he’s off in the mountains—”

“Won’t he get lost?” said Ron.

“That creature? Not if you paid him to,” said Sirius. “Wretched thing’s part homing pigeon. He’s been following us around for months now. Thinks Moony’s his mum, not that I blame him—”

“Yes,” called Remus lightly, padding into the kitchen on bare feet. “It appears that all sorts of dangerous things like to imprint on me. I’m sure I haven’t a clue why. Now, Harry, how do you like your tea?”

Sirius turned pink and blew a raspberry. Laughter from the kitchen informed them all what Remus thought of this.

When tea had been served, they gathered in the living room, with Remus and Sirius throned in a pair of adjacent armchairs, the four of them planted in file on the couch. Remus lit a few candles, and the wind moaned helplessly on the grime-stained windows of the Shack, while a draft hurried in mad circles around their ankles, and chipped tea mugs warmed their fingers. The chill sank into the wet tips of Draco's hair, and lingered there, while the conversation wandered in happy irrelevant circles — Sirius and Remus were very interested in Harry's life, and listened gladly to his tales of Divination lessons, trips to Hagrid's hut, and romantic woe with the kind indulgence of those for whom such trials were long past — until it eventually paddled into deeper waters.

"What's this about Ludo Bagman?" said Sirius finally, setting his empty mug on the ottoman. Remus flicked his wand and conjured a coaster underneath it. "You mentioned him in your last letter."

"What? Oh, yeah," said Harry, blushing and breaking off a heinously long digression on what kind of flowers might be preferred by Ravenclaw seekers. "We think he's got a bet on me. He was trying to coach me, in the First Task — we think, anyway — and then before the Second Task, he came into the tent and started sort of, like, talking to himself about how to deal with grindylows? Which I already knew, anyway," he added, with a nod at Remus, who gave a small smile. "But I think the Ministry's caught on, or at least Crouch has, because they didn't look too pleased with each other, after the Second Task."

"Ludo's bet on you?" said Remus, frowning. He leaned forward on his knees, folding his hands between them. "Why?"

"He needs money to pay Fred and George," explained Ron. "They bet all their savings on the Quidditch World Cup, you see, seven thousand galleons, two-to-one odds, but he gave them leprechaun gold, so now he's trying to get them—"

"No," said Sirius absently, flicking a hand to cut him off. "Sorry, Ron, but a man like Ludo's not concerned with a pair of sixteen-year-old creditors. That bet's not even legal, anyway, your brothers aren't of-age."

“You’re not wrong,” agreed Remus, “but you don’t have all the facts. Ludo Bagman — the Bagman I knew, anyway — is a high-roller. This is a man who collects Rolex watches. On a high-profile match like the Cup, he’d easily have six or seven figures riding on it. Seven thousand galleons is nothing to him. He’s got friends who could buy that debt for the cost of a lunch.”

“Well, but he could still have other people going after him,” argued Ron. “Fred and George weren’t the only people he talked to. He was betting big on Bulgaria, right? Bet he made the same wager to other people, too. Maybe some rich ones. People you wouldn’t want to piss off.”

“But why Harry?” added Sirius, squinting in thought. “I mean, assuming you’re right, and that this is a matter of money, which I’m not altogether sold on— Bagman is in Games and Sports. He’s got a finger on almost every match that happens in Britain. If he wanted to rig something — why go this big?” He spread his hands. “The Triwizard Tournament? First in a century? Proctored by Barty Crouch, the greatest narc of all time? Why not just, say, give the Chudley Cannons a good season, for once?”

“Oi!” said Ron. “But fair.”

“That’s another thing,” said Remus suddenly. He lifted his head. “Are you sure he’s trying to rig it?”

“Pretty sure,” admitted Harry. “He was laying it on thick.”

“I believe you, but what help has he given you, exactly?” Remus tilted his head to one side. “Besides suggesting a very common spell for dealing with dragons, and feeding you advice from the third-year Defense curriculum? He’s not exactly putting his back out.”

“In his defense,” said Draco, “this is not the spit of Merlin we’re dealing with. Bagman was a quidditch player. It may be the case that ‘poke it in the eye’ is his idea of grand strategy.”

Sirius snorted. “Yeah, he’s a mediocre wizard,” he said, “but he’s a wicked gamesman. He’s not rich because he was born that way, let me say that much. If he wanted Harry to win, he’d be winning.”

“I’m in second place,” Harry reminded them, a bit tetchy.

“Not because of Bagman, though,” said Hermione, knitting her brows. “We’ve helped you loads more than him… but honestly, I don’t see why any of this is important. If he’s not hurting Harry, then what does it matter? Maybe he feels bad for him being forced to compete. I would.”

“Sympathy?” Sirius snickered, tossing one leg over the other. “Yeah, that sounds like old Ludo.”

“...Well? Why not?”

Remus gave her a teacherly smile. “Ludo Bagman is not a good person,” he said. “He doesn’t have a selfless bone in his body. He was arrested after the War for selling Ministry secrets to Death Eaters.”

Hermione’s jaw went slack. After a moment, she demanded: “And they still gave him a job?”

“Told you he was connected,” yawned Sirius. “The Bagmans and the Rookwoods go back. Crouch tried to put him in Azkaban, but of course, that business with his son sort of overshadowed the case… And honestly, it’s not like he’s the biggest threat to the Wizarding World, is he, little washed-up scumbag—”

“But he worked with Death Eaters!”

Draco rubbed a small circle into his temple. The couch was small, and her mouth was not far from his ear.

“A lot of people worked with Death Eaters,” said Remus, not unkindly, but not gently, either. “And a lot of Death Eaters were fairly powerful people. If they cleaned out everyone who had a dirty connection somewhere, they would've had to clean out the whole Ministry."

"Then they should've done that!" Hermione sat up very straight, holding her spine like a lightning rod. Draco subtly leaned away, wary of getting tagged with a stray elbow. "Maybe we wouldn't have a pack of horrible people running the Ministry now, if everyone had just done it right the first time, instead of sticking their heads in the sand! There was a war! People died!"

"We know," said Sirius. "We were there."

Hermione fell silent.

Remus eased upright gingerly, his hands flexing on his knees. "You're entirely right, Hermione. I've often thought the same thing. But there wasn't anything we could do."

"But the Order—"

"The Order was never part of the Ministry. That's what made us effective."

"So you were a paramilitary group."

Sirius gave a honk of surprised laughter. "Is that how they talk about us, now?" he said, grinning. "That's ripping. Makes us sound properly cool."

"It seems so organized. It didn't feel like that at all."

"No. I mean, Mad-Eye was always getting on us about discipline and chain of command, but I don't think we ever got close to meeting his standards. He'd trained in the Auror Academy, and we were a bunch of seventeen-year-old guerrilla fighters. Remember when he tried to make Frank a corporal—?"

“Yes,” said Remus fondly, “but he wouldn’t stop taking orders from Alice, even though he outranked her. So Moody promoted her over him, to commander, and made him the only member of her unit. Just to keep the chain of command intact.”

“Just as well! Once saw Alice down a bloke with three pencils and a torch. Worst thing Frank ever did for the Cause was knock her up.”

“Frank and Alice?” said Harry curiously, and Sirius froze. His smile calcified and then shrank, slowly, into something brittle.

“Longbottom,” he said, after a beat.

“Like Neville?”

“His parents,” said Remus. He and Sirius were both looking at the ground.

“...Are they dead?”

“No,” said Sirius. But neither elaborated.

Ron cleared his throat and stood up. “My tea’s cold,” he said. He jerked his thumb over his shoulder. “Gonna put another kettle on. Anyone want some?”

“Yeah, thanks,” said Harry, clearly grateful for much more than the water, and he stood up. “You, Sirius? Remus?”

“Sure, sure,” said Remus, distantly coming back to himself. “Speaking of Moody, I hear he’s replaced me, this year… is he much better?”

“No,” said Harry immediately.

“Not even close,” said Ron.

“Not at all,” said Hermione unhappily. “He doesn’t stick to the book! I don’t think he’s even read it.”

“That’s fair, I didn’t either,” said Remus indolently, wandering into the kitchen. Hermione spluttered.

Draco remembered something.

“He’s on bad terms with Professor Snape,” he said. “And Mr. Crouch. Professor Moody has been absent at the Tournament, and Snape thinks he’s avoiding him.”

Remus paused in the doorway to the kitchen, and turned back. “Well, Snape, I understand,” he said. “Mad-Eye hated spies. He thought they were slimy. Dumbledore had to argue him down from dosing Snape with Veritaserum every time he showed up for a meeting—”

“Which I always supported,” said Sirius, “on the grounds that it would’ve been bloody hilarious—”

“My mother,” interrupted Draco, suppressing a flare of irritation, “thinks he’s dangerous. Professor Moody. Any idea why?”

Sirius spoke. “Your mum’s probably not the head you want on this. The last time she would’ve seen him was fifteen years ago, when he was firing curses at her husband’s back.” He shrugged. “I’ll say this for Moody, though: he never ran from a fight. He was a tough nut, and there was no living with him, but he never turned his back on an enemy, not once.”

He pointed at Ron. “If your brother is Crouch’s personal assistant, though, you might ask him if there’s something afoot with Moody and Crouch.”

“I can try,” said Ron doubtfully. “I already wrote him about Diggory and Bones—”

“What? What’s wrong with them, now?”

“They were fired,” said Hermione.

Remus startled. “Fired? Amy? Why?”

“Amy’s sister married a muggle,” she said, “and Diggory — I don’t want to presume, but I think it’s a fair inference to say that Diggory was fired because some people at the Ministry are bigots, and don’t like that his son is seeing Neil Macdonald.”

“Macdonald?” Sirius sat up. “Mary’s boy?”

“I — w— that’s not the point, Sirius.”

“And he’s seeing a Diggory?”

“I… I mean, I can’t speak for them, personally…”

“But that’s fantastic!”

“No! I mean, yes, but not for Amos! And not for Neil, either! He was almost expelled for turning Marcus Flint into a snake!”

“I don’t know who that is,” said Sirius, “but if Mary’s boy thought he deserved it, he probably did.” He gave an unwholesome little smile. “If they’re going to play with people’s families, they ought to expect some of us to come back swinging. Might teach them to think twice.”

“You know it won’t,” she said impatiently. “And it’s a bad sign of which way the wind’s blowing at the Ministry. The firings aren’t the only thing that’s been suspicious. There have been more attacks, but no one’s done anything — the Dark Mark at the Quidditch World Cup is still under investigation, Merlin knows what happened there — and Bertha Jorkins’ disappearance hasn’t been followed up on at all. Not that that’s any surprise, seeing as she’s muggle-born; if I went missing tomorrow, I’m sure they wouldn’t bother to look—”

“Granger,” Draco snapped. That was a horrid thought, and it demeaned them both to consider it.

“What?”

“There’s no need— that’s an exaggeration.”

“Barely!”

“It’s not a remotely appropriate comparison. You’re a student at the safest place in the world. Jorkins was a grown adult somewhere she shouldn’t have been.”

“Somewhere she shouldn’t have been?” Hermione’s head cocked at a dangerous angle. “So it’s her fault?”

“It’s incredible, you know, the way those words never came out of my mouth, and yet you seemed to hear them.”

“It doesn’t take a genius. She’s a muggle-born, right?” Her tone vaulted precipitously on every third word. “And us muggle-borns, we have to be careful where we go, or we might accidentally trip into a Death Eater, and they’ll have no choice but to hurt us.”

There was a silence of five facets, each one ogling each other with a wary curiosity about whether they would speak first. If it was any thicker it could be used for mortar.

With the grimace of a man striking black ice, Sirius said, “Hermione, I happen to agree with him.”

“Oh, do y—”

“Obviously it’s not her fault,” he said, carefully easing himself upright. “But there’s danger and then there’s danger, and better witches than Bertha Jorkins have gone missing in Romania.”

“But you said it was because she was a muggle-born. That it wasn’t safe for people like her. Like me, that is.”

“Dumbledore would never let you come to harm,” said Remus, calm and measured. That was more than anyone else seemed to feel: Draco, for one, had a tight squirming feeling in his chest that wanted to hex something into as many shards as possible, and the other boys didn’t look like they were on much better terms with their innards. “At Hogwarts, you’re under his protection, and he—”

“Like Daphne was?”

There was a silence like the quiet of the mountains after an avalanche. The wind moaned.

Remus leaned on the arm of his chair and touched his mouth with the back of his knuckles like he was going to be sick.

Harry gawked furiously at Hermione. Draco drummed his fingers on the armrest, debating whether to broach the silence.

He didn’t think she was wrong, actually. Out of order, possibly. Certainly unkind, with respect to Remus. But her point, concerning Dumbledore, was far from wrong.

“I — oh, God, Remus, I — I’m sorry,” she said, after a moment. “I don’t know why I — I don’t know what’s wrong with me.”

“It’s alright,” said Remus, in a voice so thin it was a whisper. “It’s an entirely fair point.”

“No, it’s not,” snarled Sirius.

“No, it’s not,” agreed Hermione, blinking quickly. “I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to… I don’t blame you at all, it’s not—”

“Nobody thinks it’s your fault,” said Harry, still glaring at Hermione. “It’s not your control. It’s the Ministry’s fault. And Snape’s.”

“Hang on,” said Draco.

“No, yes, Snape’s. If he hadn’t told Nott about Remus—”

“On the understanding that there would be aurors to contain the problem,” said Draco coldly.

“You can’t seriously be defending him! He thought he was sending Lupin to Azkaban.”

“He thought he was protecting the school. Did he accomplish it, perhaps not—”

“He was servicing a twenty-year grudge,” interrupted Sirius. “I’m sure he didn’t intend any kids to end up hurt, but let’s not get ideas about Severus Snape’s better angels.”

“He’s been working for Dumbledore ever since you went to Azkaban,” Draco snapped. “If you think he’s not on your side—”

“He was a Death Eater,” said Hermione, in clipped tones, like she was firing a Stunning Spell. Like she expected that to put down the argument, no objections, no debate, just Hermione and her sodding Right Opinions all the time, and honestly, feelings or no feelings, sometimes he really couldn’t stand it.

This was the sort of thing that Theo and Pansy would have understood. It was the sort of thing they wouldn’t even bother to talk about, they understood it so well. Maybe he’d been wrong about them. Maybe he ought to have given them more chances, instead of running off to throw in with a passel of block-headed numpties who couldn’t understand the slightest degree of moral ambiguity. Who’d write you off as soon as you so much as flinched in your convictions.

“He turned coat.”

“At the last possible minute,” muttered Sirius, clambering to his feet. “Because he happened to be obsessed with a woman who hadn’t spoken to him in years. Don’t be fooled, that man’s moral compass is a weathervane. If Voldemort had gone for Alice instead of Lily, Severus Snape would be in Azkaban.”

“...What?”

“Yeah,” said Harry, like he’d been clubbed. “What d’you mean, about my mum?”

“Even if he did turn, he was still a Death Eater,” repeated Hermione, in short sharp syllables, like she was pruning a rosebush. “That means, at one point, he was perfectly alright hunting and killing muggles and muggle-borns.”

“You have no proof he ever did that. You don’t know—”

“Yes, I do. I do, actually. Do you want to know how?” She didn’t stop for an answer; she barely stopped for breath. “Because you told me. You said so to my face. ‘Death Eater was a real title, it referred to a fledged soldier of the Dark Lord, and there aren’t that many of them left.’ Remember? You don’t get to be a fledged soldier just by showing up at the meetings.”

Hermione had an almost perfect memory. He usually liked that about her. Admired it. Envied it, sometimes. He’d never hated it before.

“Fine.” It wasn’t. “So what?” He knew what.

“So what? So what! I don’t know, it’s irrational, but you see, I’m a bit troubled, Draco, honestly, by the information that at one point, one of my professors would’ve killed me if he had the chance.”

“No, he wouldn’t,” he snapped. “Nobody’s killing you. Compose yourself—”

“Excuse me?”

Ron stood up. “Oi,” he said roughly. “Time out. Enough. Hermione, c’mon, let’s get some air.”

“No. I want Draco to explain what he thinks.”

Inside him a cold set of claws dragged their points into the soft lining of his stomach.

“Yeah, and I don’t think you actually do want him to do that, right now,” said Ron, with a shocking degree of calm. “I think you want some air.”

“Ronald Weasley, don’t you dare tell me what I want.”

“I’m not. I’m not, alright? I’m saying, this is a great chance — Malfoy, close your mouth, I swear to Merlin — this is a great chance for us to go get some air, and let Harry,” he said significantly, “talk to Moony and Padfoot. By himself. You know, get a bit of a family chat.”

“Butt out, Weasley.”

He flashed Draco a short cool glance. “Anyway,” he said to Hermione, “I don’t reckon we’re going to hammer out all our differences before we’ve got to go back, so we might as well table it, right? It’s not like someone’s demanding our urgent opinion on whether Severus Snape’s a bastard. Or Draco Malfoy, come to think of it.”

She snorted.

“I don’t suppose I need to say how rich it is that you’re playing peacemaker, Ronald.”

“Yeah, because rowing with you two was shite,” he said angrily, “and I don’t fancy doing it again.”

“Fascinatingly, I don’t recall inviting you into it,” he said.

“You’re not the only people in a conversation just because you’d prefer to be, mate.”

“Excuse me?”

“Fine,” Hermione snapped. “We’ll get some air. As a favor to Harry —”

“Hang on,” said Harry uncomfortably.

“—and to you, I won’t ask Draco to explain himself — even though I don’t think any of us would be particularly surprised—”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

“Nothing,” she said, and stood up. “Absolutely nothing at all. In fact, I apologize for — losing composure.” Her cheeks were a rich floral color, almost unreal, as if the words she’d suppressed were suffusing her face with tint. She snatched up her mug and saucer, shot Draco a look that sent searing pain lancing through his stomach, and then delivered both cup and sneer into the kitchen. Ron sucked a breath through his teeth and hurried along behind her, catching the kitchen door on the backswing, and the last thing that could be glimpsed before the door sealed shut behind them was Ron reaching out to touch her arm.

Draco’s stomach had nearly doubled over with cramping.

Remus delicately cleared his throat.

Harry said, “Um. Sorry, Remus.”

“Quite alright, Harry. Consider it forgotten.”

“I mean, she’s been — it’s been really hard on her, with the Tournament, and school, and the stuff about muggle-borns, and everything—”

“You don’t need to apologize for her,” rasped Remus, and smiled thinly. “Your mother said far worse to me, when she was fifteen.”

“...My mum?”

“Oh, I reckon. Lily the Great,” said Sirius, flicking his wand at the teacups, which lifted and danced a merry caravan into the kitchen. “Once called me — what was it, Moony? That one row in fifth year? Flat-arse inbred?”

“Cheese-eating inbred, I think.”

“Cheese-eating! And she called you a chav.”

“What?” Harry was stunned. “She didn’t.”

“In fairness, she was more a chav than I was,” said Remus.

“It was true enough, for me,” said Sirius, stretching. “The inbred part, anyway. I resent ‘cheese-eating.’ I think she meant I was being a coward, which, at the time… never stayed sore for long, though.”

“Then she is unlike Granger in at least one respect,” said Draco. His voice was steady. His heartbeat was tolling in his head, harsher than the muffled clash of voices from the kitchen. He was glad he couldn’t hear them.

He didn’t know why none of them could understand. There were things more important than guilt or innocence. It wasn’t like Snape had always had a choice.

One couldn’t choose one’s family. That was what Harry couldn’t understand, and what Hermione and Ron never seemed to have trouble with, because they had the good fortune of families who had never obligated them to any danger with their beliefs. And it wasn’t as if he liked what his family was, in fact he tended to abhor the things it might require — he had no desire to see himself in a bone mask with a black scar eating up his arm, it scared him like death, worse even — but if there wasn’t a choice, if it was that or a wand at his mother’s head—

He almost choked on the fury that he might not be offered a modicum of understanding for it. They didn’t have to agree with it, but he had earned, in his opinion, the right not to be thought a monster for having the audacity to love his mother.

That had been the soul of his father’s sacrifice. His father was dead for reasons that none of them would ever understand and frankly he didn’t either, not entirely, but if they couldn’t forgive Severus Snape — who had turned coat, who had done the only thing a man could possibly do to redeem himself — then it took no particular exercise of the imagination to think how they would rate Lucius Malfoy's great gesture of devotion. In fact, most people in the room would have celebrated his death.

At least two of them probably had.

His gorge rose.

He stood up and walked out.

Harry called his name. This was ignored. Draco ripped open the door with a swish of his wand and swept it closed behind him, tumbling down into the stinging teeth of the rain.

Mud scattered under his boots. He made it four long strides into the coursing wet before the door clattered, and the voice that called after him, surprisingly, was not Harry's.

"Oi," hollered Sirius. "Hang on a minute."

He trotted down the stairs and caught up with Draco in moments. The rain flattened the great black carpet of his hair into a long curtain, and pressed his clothes to the slender ligatures of his frame. He swung around to stand in front of Draco and planted his feet in the dirt, his hands planted on his bony hips.

"Dunno where you think you're going by yourself, kid," he said.

"I don't know why you think it's any of your business."

"Firstly, I'm your uncle—"

"Second cousin, and technically neither, by the Laws, now get out—"

"Hang the Laws of Blood," said Sirius indifferently. "Dumb relics. Never liked them."

“Considering you’ve never suffered from an iota of filial duty in your life, I’m not surprised.”

“Excuse me?”

“You’re excused. Move yourself, or I’ll do it for you.”

Sirius blinked. His eyebrows lifted in a great, slow arc of black shag. “Aye,” he said. “Wondered when this would come up. Held out on me, you did.”

“What? The fact that you’re a blood traitor? Yes, I’m rather surprised it hasn’t been an issue before. Believe me, I blame the lapse wholly on myself.”

“No,” said Sirius, with unnerving calm. “I mean, maybe it is, I’m sure your mum’s told you all sorts of resentful rubbish about me. But I don’t think you really care.”

“An exceptionally rare observation. Now that we’re in agreement, would you please— ”

“I was a blood traitor when you met me,” he said. “Didn’t bother you, did it?”

“I’ve made clear that I was in an exceptionally poor period of judgment, and that any errors in conduct, idiocy notwithstanding, are being corrected forthwith. It bothers me now, and so I’m giving you one more warning to get out of my way.”

“You’re a blood traitor, you know.”

He drew his wand.

“Take it back.” His head was washed clear with vitriol and the scalding impulse to level something. If that something was Sirius Black, so be it. He’d make peace with Harry later. “I’ll have your tongue out for that kind of insult, Black. Take it back.”

“No, you won’t,” said Sirius calmly. He didn’t even twitch in the direction of his wand; he just kept standing there, his hands on his hips, one knee cocked, as the storm-black sky knit and furled over their heads. A dull roar of rain lashed the treetops. “For one thing, I’d be shocked if you could land a curse in this state. That hand’s shaky as a doxy on —oof!”

The spell caught him in the gut and hurled him backwards. Sirius soared and landed in a tumble of rags and hair in the dirt, a small mushroom of mud, the hard wet sound of his body denting the earth.

He sat up and spat a thick mouthful of mud into the grass. “Fuck!” he said, clearly and powerfully, but without any particular vitriol.

Draco gripped his wand with red knuckles and took a few quick steps back when Sirius staggered upright, increasingly aware of the thirty-something war veteran he’d jinxed; cold fingers scrabbled up his spine, but he rooted himself to the spot, swallowed, readied himself for the counter. He could do it. He could. He’d practiced.

“Alright,” said Sirius, after a moment. “Wrong about that one. I see that now.” And he clambered upright, grimacing, rubbing his tailbone, muttering something inaudible: “...all to hell, James… sod Cissa… said I was never having kids.”

“Black, I hit you.”

“Yeah, don’t do that again,” said Sirius.

He cracked his neck and stepped forward; Draco stepped back. Sirius rolled his eyes.

“Put that away. I’m not going to duel you, you dull ponce, you’re fourteen.”

“I challenged you,” he said, fear crumbling against indignation. “You — you insulted my family, and I demand—”

“Satisfaction? Tough. Life’s a bitch,” said Sirius indifferently. “You’re not the first half-decent little inbred twat who’s figured out he’s going to have to let the side down. Find some other outlet for the disappointment. I, for one, got in a fistfight with Regulus.”

“...What?”

“You’re a blood traitor,” he repeated. Draco’s wand twitched up; Sirius calmly stepped forward and plucked it out of his hand.

He made a noise of fury and disgruntlement, but then Sirius cuffed him on the ear, and the shock startled him into silence. “Filthy worthless no-good disappointment of a blood traitor, that’s you, and if you had a brain and a spine you’d be proud of it, but you’ve decided to have a tantrum instead, which is awfully pedestrian of you, just saying.”

“I am not—”

“A blood traitor. You are.” Sirius pointed his own wand at him judiciously. “It’s what they’ll call you, your family, when they figure out you’re not a monster.”

“Go fuck yourself.”

“Better,” said Sirius, almost pleased. “Getting somewhere, now. Go on.”

“Go fuck yourself,” he snarled, “with the rusted spoke of your own presumption, mutt. I am not a blood traitor. I’m the heir to the Houses of Malfoy and Black—”

“Deliciously ironic, but otherwise irrelevant.”

“—the son of Lucius and Narcissa Malfoy—”

“A misfortune from which you have recovered laudably,” said Sirius.

“—I am the greatest pureblood of the age. I am traitor to nothing. I have done nothing — I will do nothing to, to violate, to besmirch — you are nothing to me, your words are nothing to me—”

“Sure seems like it.”

“You don’t understand. I’m the last one. If not me — if I cannot—”

He struggled, failed, and his throat closed over. He was suddenly embalmed in radiant self-loathing, like bathing in scalding feces.

“You’re panicking, you poor twit,” said Sirius. “Sit down before you pass out, why don’t you.”

When his order was ignored, he reached out and gave Draco a firm shove on the chest. Draco’s heel slipped in the dirt. He fell hard on the hill, cold mud soaking his back, and when he struggled up, Sirius planted a boot on his chest.

“Stay.”

Draco curled his lip, awash in loathing; but he relaxed, and uncurled his fists.

The shoe removed itself. Draco stayed down.

Sirius neatly flicked out his coat and sat down next to him, leaning on his haunches, a rather canine position. He yawned and stabbed Draco’s wand into the mud, its handle jutting up like a spindly bald flower. Draco wrenched it out and began cleaning it furiously on his shirt.

His uncle yawned and began to whistle, drumming his fingers on his knees.

Draco despised him more than most things living or dead. He contemplated several means by which he could kill him, and then, upon realizing that it was actually making him feel better, fell once more to acute misery and distress.

With his wand cleaned and returned to its sheath, he steepled his fingers in front of his mouth and breathed as well as could be managed, under the circumstances.

“Wet as Merlin’s fucking twat out here,” said Sirius, by and by.

Draco made a sharp noncommittal noise. The two of them marinated in the loud silence of the rain, which was, verily, wet as Merlin’s fucking twat.

“Birds or blokes?”

“What.”

Sirius flicked his fingers in an off-the-cuff gesture of indifference. “You’re that age. Started to figure it out for myself, when I was around there. Birds, blokes, or both?”

Of course that was what Sirius Black wanted to talk about while Draco’s world collapsed. Smashing. Exceptional. His life was a perfect arc towards everlasting happiness.

“...Not blokes.”

“Well, nobody’s perfect.”

Draco stared at him. Then he returned his eyes to the sodden, rain-black earth.

“I have a question,” he muttered.

“Good for you.”

“Was Potter’s mother named Evans?”

“Oh, yeah,” said Sirius mildly. His nose wrinkled. “Why?”

“Dumbledore mentioned her when I asked him why Professor Snape hated Potter’s father.”

The wrinkle count doubled. “Dunno about that,” he said. “He hated James because he was a bully and a stinker, not because of anything to do with Lils. Originally, anyway. Changed later on, but that was after she ended the friendship.”

“With Potter?”

“No, Snape,” snorted Sirius. “Joined this snotty little gang in fourth year, went around playing jokes on muggle-borns. James loathed them. Everyone did, they were miserable.”

He fidgeted with his signet ring. “It was a different time.”

“Not for the rest of us,” said Sirius. “Anyway, James was a bit of a ponce, but he was handsome and clever and good at quidditch, and we all were ponces, back then. The other thing was, later on, Snape had a thing for Lily—”

“A thing?”

“Yeah, properly obsessed. She was the only one his little gang never went after. Not that she ever asked for it. She hated them all, except Severus, which — they had this weird kindred spirits bit, both ripping good at Potions, were real cozy. For a while, anyway. Then she got sick of him being a bigoted shit, and he wasn’t all too keen on self-improvement, so she ditched him and started palling around with us.”

Draco was silent for a long time. From where he sat he could hear the rain lashing the rooftops of Hogsmeade, leaving a soft thin film where it met the gutters, diffusing the cords of smoke that lifted from each chimney. His heart thumped dully against the cage of his chest, hard and decadently slow. It was an empty landscape, a cold one.

“You’re scared as hell,” said Sirius, like it was some sort of goddamn insight.

“What.”

“I shouldn’t have been so flippant, earlier. When I was your age, I already hated my family, and I had another one waiting for me. I had sisters, Mary and Marlene, and Dory, and Lily, they kept me straight… I had James, my brother, there aren’t even words for James and me… I even had Remus. But you’ve got a longer fall.” He clapped the side of Draco’s shoulder, retreating before Draco’s withering stare could force it to. “And you don’t trust them to catch you. Even though to look at them, they’re desperate to try.”

“I don’t need rescuing.”

Sirius ran a hand through his matted hair, through the wet flaps of black rope. “No? You happy, then?”

“Are you?”

“Sure am.”

“Well, so am I. I don’t have your problems. I would never run away from my family.”

“Even if they hurt you?”

“My mother would rather die.”

“Fine. Likelier case. What if she went after Harry?” Sirius cocked his head. “What about Hermione?”

He scowled and turned his face into the rain.

No one was permitted to hurt Hermione. She had to be alright for the rest of the world to make sense. She was a cornerstone of the comprehensible universe. But it was hard to say so without outright saying, Hermione is the cornerstone of the comprehensible universe, and sounding like a vapid useless prat.

“I wouldn’t allow it.”

“Yeah? And how’d you do that, tiny? You’re making all this noise about protecting people, but ten minutes ago you walked out on them, called me a blood traitor, and jinxed me — and all that after we’d had a nice chat over tea. Hermione’s a muggle-born. What happens when you remember how you’re supposed to feel about those?”

“Do not make the mistake of believing I have ever forgotten.” His tone was so clipped he almost bit his tongue. “There are things I cannot do.”

“Rubbish.”

“Black—”

“You can. I know,” said Sirius, “because I’ve done it.”

“I don’t know how many times I have to drill this through your thick skull, but I’m not you. I love my family.”

“Yeah?” said Sirius. “And who’s that, exactly? Two disgraces, a dead boy, a mad bloodthirsty bint, and the four dead old prats who raised the wretched crop? Or your dear old dad, rotten piece of work that he was?”

“My father was a great man.”

“He was a miserly old shit who hated muggles so much he lost the chance to watch his son grow up,” said Sirius flippantly. “And he might’ve disagreed with me, but that’s tough for him, because I’m the one still here. And he’s not. Come to think of it, it’s probably the best thing he could possibly have done for you.”

“You are asking me to desecrate the memory of my father.”

“Dead men can’t be proud of you,” said Sirius.

It lodged like glass in his throat.

“Fuck off.”

“Lucius Malfoy is never going to tell you he loves you, kid.” It was the brutal unkindness of a Healer cleaning a wound with salt. “Not never, not ever, not once. He can’t. Might be he wouldn’t, if he knew you, but that doesn’t matter. Because he’s dead. Worms know that man better than you do. And you’re going to go in there and fuck up the life you’ve got without him, and for what? A fistful of leprechaun gold?”

“Fuck off!”

“You’re butchering your own happiness over the opinions of a corpse,” said Sirius, ruthlessly cold. “You deserved to have someone tell you.”

Draco pushed off the hill and looked at the vast, endless braid of hills, crested with distant streaks of rain. The size of the moors and the mountains impressed itself on him as it never had, the whole empty world rolling out at his feet, making even the grand vaults of Hogwarts Castle seem small. He’d thought that coming to Hogwarts would make him feel closer to his father, as the place that made him the man he was, and that the same mold would have shaped him into an image of his like. Another turn of the wheel — another Lord Malfoy. Another white-haired boy with a ring and a sneer.

Which was a pissant child’s wishful dream, because he had never felt farther from his father in his life. He was wretched with the understanding that for all his best efforts, he only ever seemed to move farther away.

There were a hundred thousand things about himself that he couldn’t ask anyone to understand.

“Alright,” said Sirius carefully. “On consideration. Shouldn’t have said that. That was… that was a bit tough. But seriously—”

“If you say my father’s name again,” he said, “it will be the last thing you say.”

Sirius eyed him. Abruptly, he snorted.

“Shame you never met your Uncle Reg,” he said. “Would’ve got along like boggarts in a cupboard, you two.”

Draco made an irritated noise and turned his head away.

Sirius worked his mouth for a moment.

“I’ll say this, and then I’ll shut up,” he said, apropos of nothing. I never met a pureblood happy enough to justify what they’ll ask you to do. Maybe you have. Maybe you don’t care. That’s not my business. But you’d be the first in my time.”

“Look who’s preaching about happiness. You’re a penniless convict living on the run with a werewolf and a hippogriff.”

“Oh, I know,” he said. “Some days I can’t believe my own luck.”

And his smile was a terrible little heartbreak of a beam, so sincere, so utterly unadorned with irony in the least, that it burned to look at.

How dare he be happy with his miserable lot. How dare he look at Draco like he pitied him, like there was anything in Draco’s situation that Sirius Black had to fear.

Sirius shook something out of his pocket. It was a white box with a blue crest, and he had tapped out half of a cigarette before he lifted his head into the rain and frowned. “Bugger,” he said. “Forgot.”

Draco rooted in his pocket and withdrew a silver lighter, inlaid with ornate filigree. The flame sprang out and flickered brightly, despite the coursing rain.

“Bang-on,” said Sirius appreciatively. “That’s a neat trick. Where’d you pick it up?”

He could have laughed.

“It was my father’s,” he said. “In whose possession it was almost certainly never lowered to this purpose, so hurry, before I change my mind.”

A little chuckle. “If you believe that, then you definitely didn’t know your father like I did.”

“Right. Or I can put this away, and you can light that off the friction from the nice wank you seem to be having—”

Sirius laughed, free and heartily, and shuffled over to light his cigarette on the silver cradle. Then he offered Draco the box.

“Thought you said I was too young.”

He shrugged. “Eh. What’ll you do? Tell your mum?”

Draco snorted and took one. He lit it with his father’s lighter — the rain delayed success until the third or fourth attempt — and drew smoke in a thin stinging column down his throat. Warmth bloomed in his lungs like a blazing coal.

When he exhaled, the smoke diffused into the rain with a bloom of grey on silver.

Sirius smoked half of his, and then tossed it out in the brush. “I’m going in,” he said. “Give you a bit of peace. Come in when you can.”

Draco said nothing. He ignored, too, the soft little sigh that Sirius gave as he clapped Draco on the back, and then marched up the wet path to the house, his boots splashing in the dirt.

He smoked until the nubbin was stinging at his fingers, and then flicked it out. Then he put his hands in his pockets and walked back to the castle, alone, through a forested path that was silent save for the violent dirge of the rain.

-Never in history has there been a simple relationship between two sons of the House of Black.

-I'm interested by our capacity, as people, for self-persuasion. Not even delusion, just... the importance that labels have to human beings, and how we'll labor to avoid them even as we completely fulfill it by any standard, that's weird, right? Because so long as you don't have the label, it's fine, you're safe from the consequences. Maybe people won't notice, if you don't say the name.

-At a point, that becomes unsustainable, of course.

-Something something that point when the personal being political means you have to make personal choices. Tfw your boundless faith in the righteousness and goodness of another human being means you have to reckon with the possibility of your own damnation. Or something. Maybe.

-(tfw you are hermione granger and you make a rebel of a careless man's careful ~~daughter~~ son) jk jk

-Shoutout to softkombucha, who has so kindly made several pieces of art for this fic and also goes hard for the marauders; sorry about the angst! short king james potter for life.

-Shoutout also to mary_sue_apologist. you know what for. insanely good.

-can i be real, beloveds? can i be brutally honest? this arc right here is my favorite part of a love story. it's the point when the match hits the pilot light. it's my favorite to read and so far it has been my favorite to write.

-i really do love draco with my whole heart. and i am going to give him the absolute worst time. it’s going to be great. i swear.

-as may be clear, I'm back to having fun again. thank you so much for people who reached out on tumblr and on here to reassure me about The Process. you all deserve the world or at least an exceptionally nice box of swiss chocolates where all of them have the good fillings.

-the next chapter: prepare for more castle intrigue, amateur spycraft, and the largest action sequence since the First Task in "Secrets of the Undercroft."

Secrets of the Undercroft

Chapter 50: Secrets of the Undercroft

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

He swept into the Entrance Hall, swept excess rainwater from his sleeves with a rake of his wand, and then stood in the nearly empty atrium, struck momentarily by the absence of direction.

The faithful arm of the marble staircase reached down from one direction, feeding students up into the airy halls, where the Tower houses laid in wait; Hufflepuffs bobbed in and out of the cheery rain-shadowed corridors that branched off from the hall; and drifting from the antechamber beyond, warm, rich foodsmells emanated from the Great Hall. Gold light spilled from the slender V of the cracked doors, and the echoes of a chattering crowd drowned out the sound of the rain.

Draco turned and descended the stairs to the dungeons.

Light cooled and then dimmed to an artificial glimmer from the torches. The course downward wrapped around hairpin staircases with a haste that was perilous to ankles and necks. Long identical hallways spanned out in a dizzying landscape of orthogonal squares, flat lanes of black tile, corners that vanished into a darkness flat as night, when just two floors above, daylight still dappled the floors of the Entrance Hall. He cut through a passage hidden behind a tapestry of Barnabas Deverill and stepped into a wide hallway terminating in the Potions classroom, the locked door to which succumbed at a simple Alohamora.

In the cool, dark room, there was a soft silence, broken by the weeping beads of dew that formed from crevices in the roof, and the patter of candles sweating wax into their brass holsters. None of the burners crackled. Snape was gone, absent from his normal post at the front brewing station, where he often fretted and scowled away the hours between classes and meals.

Disappointment tasted bitter, though that could have been the cigarette residue on his teeth.

He wandered around the table and peered into the empty cauldron. A leatherbound book lay prostrate on the desk, and he picked it up, flipped it open in the cradle of his arm: it was a recipe. Veritaserum, read the heading, in a nearly unintelligible scrawl, followed by two pages of instructions so brutally annotated that most lines read like an unbroken trawl of black ink.

In the margin above it, in ink old enough to flake, someone had scrawled: Ulceratio. There was a wand movement diagram beside it, sketched on a clumsy four-point cross, and beneath that, a concise summary: Good. Messy.

Interesting. He replaced the book on the table as it had been.

A voice crested through the door to the office, and then subdued again. Draco startled. He hadn't thought anyone was there; he'd assumed that Snape must have been at dinner.

Once it became clear that the voice was not in any hurry to emerge, his curiosity cornered his discretion, and he approached.

The thick wood muffled the sound, but that was his good fortune, because those inside must have trusted it enough not to mask their voices with spellwork. Leaning against the wall beside the door, the dull strains of a conversation among two clamoring men became audible.

"...powerful accusation you're making. If you're right, he belongs in prison."

"I am aware of that."

That was Snape, then. The disdain was unmistakable.

“If you are correct in your suspicions — and they are not so credible as to bar all doubt — then this is a man of such reckless narcissism it verges on sociopathy.” It was Barty Crouch. “I am merely raising a possibility.”

“A possibility that the evidence cannot sustain. Someone has forced Potter to compete, and they have continued to work on his behalf in the Tournament. They sedated the Horntail—”

“That was an accident. The dragonkeepers dosed them all beforehand to keep them manageable, and one of them miscalculated. We closed that investigation weeks ago.”

“An accident? Someone fed it an industry-grade sedative on accident? Never mind — does the Ministry seriously contend that its dragonkeepers, N.E.W.T.-holding wizards in magicopharmacology each to each, cannot perform the simple arithmetic that divides one dose from fifty?”

“Even if that were enough to convince me, which it isn’t,” said Crouch tiredly, “you’d have to persuade a jury, and the first question they’ll ask is how a man who, by every account, was nowhere near the dragon paddock for the duration of the First Task, somehow managed to sedate the Hungarian Horntail all by himself. Can you answer that question? Because if you can, please do, and we’ll set you up to testify.”

“Fine. What about my gillyweed?”

“I presume you are still unwilling to tolerate the possibility that Potter stole it himself,” said Crouch, “though why, I am not sure, since he did, in fact, use it.”

“Potter doesn’t know what gillyweed is.”

“Well, he obviously figured it out,” said Crouch impatiently. “Or someone else did, and told him, but that doesn’t mean some conspiracy—”

“I found him, Crouch.” Snape was triumphant; he seemed to think this was a trump card. “The night before the Second Task. He was creeping around the undercroft. He said that he was looking for something he’d lost, a bit of parchment, a billfold… obvious lies. My inventory was wholly untouched before I caught him; and the next, the gillyweed is gone.”

“That’s not proof! That’s inference! Strong inference, I admit, but you can’t possibly expect me to act—”

“He has been acting suspiciously all year—”

“He’s a dodgy man, and what do you expect, after the war—”

“—jumpier than I ever knew him—”

“What do you mean knew him—”

“I have an option,” said Crouch stiffly. “I can bring him in for questioning. Voluntarily.”

Snape scoffed, but Crouch spoke over him. “I don’t have a pretext for arrest, but if I tell him he’s been named in an investigation concerning Harry Potter, it’s possible he’ll go on the record to avoid the possibility of serious charges.”

“He’s not going to confess if he’s guilty, you punctilious fool. You’d leave him free to run for the hills—”

“I’m doing my job,” said Crouch.

“But it isn’t.” Snape’s voice was rich with the savor of malice. “Not anymore. There’s only one auror in this castle, and he isn’t in this room.”

Draco physically recoiled from the abrasive silence that followed it. There was a creak, closer to the door, and he hurriedly stepped away from the wall. The conversation shifted and slipped into indistinct murmurs, and satisfied that he'd heard as much as he could, he crept back through the silent Potions classroom, his mind turning so furiously that the world seemed slow and foggy by comparison.

The last remark threw the whole exchange into focus — it meant Mad-Eye. He had to infer the conversation had been about Moody. The suggestion that Crouch had 'gone soft' on him, that they'd worked together for years — not to mention that the gillyweed had been found in Mad-Eye's office — he'd never thought to question where Mad-Eye acquired it, but how else could he have come by it on short notice? Moody had even pointed them in the right direction for the egg, telling them about Fleur and the prefects' bathroom; had he offered other hints that they had missed?

Come to think of it, he didn't have any great reservation about endangering students, either. He'd seemed fairly nonchalant about throwing jinxes, and he'd barked orders at Hermione like he expected war to break out before lunch. Watch your corners, indeed.

Which was advice that Draco shortly thereafter wished he'd taken, because he rounded the corner coming out of the Potions hallway and almost slammed into a girl who was hurrying in the opposite direction.

His wand came out without thinking; she fumbled for hers, but a Disarming Spell twitched it out of her none-too-nimble fingers, and it skittered uselessly into the hallway. Only in the hackle-sinking aftermath did he identify the girl, a reedy Slytherin with a fox-like face and hair the color of dirtied wheat.

"Carrow?"

"Oi!" she snapped. She doubled over to snatch up her wand, and a streak of marbled blue bruising gaped from the lip of her collar. A moment later, however, it was hidden again. “Watch where you’re going, gobshite.”

“You first. What’s on your neck?”

“What are you, a prefect?” she shrilled. “I could ask you the same question. Your common room’s not even around here!”

“Neither is yours,” he pointed out, which was true: the Slytherin common room lay in an entirely separate wing from the Potions classroom. He’d learned that the hard way, trying to find the blasted thing.

“Mind your own business!”

“Gladly,” he said sharply, “and eagerly. I haven’t the slightest—weren’t you a hostage in the Second Task.”

“Oh! Wow! Good for you!! You have a long-term memory!” She tried to brush past him. “I don’t have time for this — I don’t know you — goodbye!”

He ignored her shrill invitations, of increasing profanity, to extricate his proboscis from her affairs. He stepped into her way, and found, to his satisfaction, that she stumbled back. “Why didn’t you opt out?”

“Why didn’t you bluh bluh bluh? Get out of my way!”

She was shrill, and unusually urgent, considering he’d only disarmed her. That was interesting. He touched his wand when she tried to shove past him a second time, and she jerked back, eyeing him warily.

“They didn’t force any of the hostages. Davies declined. Granger could have, only she didn’t, because she’s mad. You’re nothing to Warrington,” he said, curiously, “or at least he claims you are, so why go to the trouble? Why didn’t you pass it off?”

“Not so I could stand here and have you yammer at me about it!” she shrilled. “I didn’t know what they were asking; I thought I’d only wake up once we were out of the lake.”

He tilted his head. It was a lie: the hostages hadn’t been told they were going into the lake. At least, Hermione hadn’t, which raised the question of why Flora Carrow was a different case. No one gained anything from telling her; she hadn’t helped Warrington, so far as he could tell, and none of the administrators had any interest in her. Dumbledore wouldn’t have given her special treatment, and he doubted Crouch or Bagman even knew her name.

He pocketed the information for later. “How did you know Warrington would win?”

“Are you serious? Cassius Warrington, up against a half-breed, a half-blood, and a mudshagging quidditch player—?”

“Careful, Carrow.”

“Warrington’s the best wizard at this school, and every real person here knows that.”

She spoke with the anguished pleasure of someone who had no real right to the pride they were feeling.

“Has he promised you anything?”

She made the face of a woman sipping bile. “...What are you talking about?”

“Because if he has, he’s lying.” He was impatient with her, and vaguely irritated at himself for taking the time to help, but it was necessary for someone to take her in confidence about her delusions, and he sincerely doubted that Theo or Pansy would shoulder the responsibility. “Warrington doesn’t think he’s obligated to you. He’s not going to offer you protection. He said—”

A sound skittered from the end of the hallway. Flora yipped shrilly; Draco started; and she took the chance to duck under his arm and run, vanishing around the corner before he could call her back.

Voices issued from the corner where the noise had come from. He weighed between investigating and following her, found he held not the slightest interest in submitting himself to any more of her company, and went in the opposite direction.

Something ran over his shoe. He grimaced and kicked away a small beetle, which buzzed off into the musty shadows, leaving him irate and ill at ease. All sorts of fauna nested in the castle — there were rats and beetles aplenty in Gryffindor Tower, and that was infinitely better kempt — but down in the dark everything felt more iniquitous and seedy, making him itch to cast Inciendo and scour the whole place as it had earned.

Voices bounced queerly from the narrow passages, warped by the shape of the high, vaulted walls. When he turned the corner he ran into an ancient stone clock set into the wall, its faces set in blue lapis lazuli, with gold arms that pointed at hours marked in constellations instead of numbers. The face of it hung slightly ajar from the wall, and when he prodded it with his wand, it creaked and swung out, suspended on an invisible hinge in the brickwork.

The passage beyond was a hole of shadows, lit only by a glimmer at the other end.

This being the beginning to any number of memorable stories where the subject ended up in a bloody tangle of limbs at the bottom of a mineshaft, Draco promptly pivoted on his heel to go do something else.

“...don’t hear… find him?”

“...most of it… message.”

Even these would not have been curiosities enough to tempt him into a Guaranteed Toll-Free Mauling, but he was too slow in his route of egress, and caught the tail end of a thin, reedy sound that made him wince and stop dead in his tracks.

It was a shriek. A child's shriek, to be more precise. A very young child, if one wanted Granger-esque levels of precision.

Which just roped him into a Gordian knot of moral culpability, damn the thing.

He closed his eyes and pinched the bridge of his nose, in the vain hopes of repelling an oncoming migraine.

"...shut him up, eedjit, he's gon…"

"...s'the bloody point…"

"No — no! No, no! Please don't!"

This was Hermione's fault, really. Somehow. He'd figure out how once he'd had some time to think about it.

He cast Lumos, stepped over the threshold of the clock, and crossed into the passage, muttering to himself.

What do you mean, you heard someone screaming, and you didn't do anything, Draco? What kind of a person doesn't do anything? I went lake-diving in February for a twelve-year-old I never even met, and you can't spare a moment to see if a child is dying?' Notwithstanding the last time we went poking around in odd corridors, we ended up squaring off with a three-headed dog and the embodied vessel of the Dark Lord, but no, we're Gryffindors, so let's just stick our necks out for anything that whimpers in our general direction —

The light coming through the grate was the color of bilgewater, strained through a large, vaulted stone space populated by columns the side of oak trees, walled with barrels and braziers so old that rust smeared jade patinas on their chains, and the miscellaneous detritus of a basement clustered under the shrouds of dusty sheets. It was large enough to fit a quidditch pitch, and its size shattered every sound into echoes, which bounded in dizzy loops around the ceiling. This meant that it was hard to tell whether one child was shrieking, or three, though as he approached the mouth of the passage, he made out the three squabbling figures at the foot of one column.

There were three of them, two big and one small, two green ties and a red one, shouldering each other roughly against the marble. He felt a touch nauseous. It was Colin Creevey.

Goyle had a fistful of his hair, and was dangling him against the column like Sebastian on the cross.

“—leave anything on his face,” Goyle was saying, earnestly, “cuz Cass said he won’t help us if—”

“Bloody hark at you, Cassius’s bitch—”

“No, jus’ saying, it’s easier to tell…”

“...up and piss off, Greg, get this over with.”

Flint did something that made Colin give a ludicrously high scream. Draco took three quick steps into the light, cast up the grate with a flick of Leviosa, and stepped into the room as the shrieking metal played herald for him.

The Slytherins greeted his entrance with not one iota of the respect he was due. They dropped Colin in a crumple of robes and pain, correctly judging that he wouldn’t try to escape, and pivoted shoulder-to-shoulder, with a slightly ridiculous unison, like the world’s dumbest-looking pair of beefeaters.

“Well, if it isn’t Malfoy,” said Flint, grinning.

Draco rolled his eyes. In the hierarchy of ways to open a confrontation, ‘if it isn’t so-and-so’ ranked near dead last. It also made him feel a bit better, frankly, since it reminded him that he was dealing with dullards.

“Flint,” he said. “Goyle. Odd place for a threesome, but don’t let me interrupt.”

Colin hadn’t moved since Flint dropped him. That was concerning, but not immediately resolvable. Draco made a note of it without taking his eyes from the bigger boys.

“Doesn’t meet your standards, dozzit?” Flint’s grin was fleshy and a touch nervous. “Scouting places to suck off Potter? Would’ve thought by now you’d worn a hole in the Tower floor.”

“Would’ve done, but your mother says it hurts her knees. Anyway, what’s this?” He twitched his wand at Colin, who squirmed slightly, groaning.

“None of your business, is what it is,” grunted Goyle. “Go ’way.”

“Like a scalpel, your wit, Greg.”

“Don’t call me that,” he snapped. Draco and Flint both looked at him with surprise. “You can’t call me that. You’ve no right.”

“Fine, Gregory,” said Draco, disgruntled, but Goyle fished out his wand and stabbed it at him.

“It’s Goyle. You’re no friend of mine,” he snarled, “after what you did to Marcus.”

“Been whinging about that, has he? You might recall it wasn’t me who Transfigured him. This is a red tie, not a yellow one. Don’t fret, I know colors are hard.”

“You attacked him!”

Goyle's shout reverberated around the undercroft. Colin twitched and whined in pain.

Draco eyed him. It wasn't clear at all what Flint had done to him; he wasn't bleeding, and apart from some minor scrapes and bruising, he didn't seem badly hurt. That was more chilling, not less.

"After Granger saved him from turning into a pavement stain, sure."

"He wouldn't have been there if not for the fairy, and you still jinxed him afterwards — Merlin knows what the mudblood would've done if the teachers hadn't come—"

"So you're going after Creevey?" It was hard not to sound incredulous; the internal machinations of the profoundly stupid never failed to amaze. "Because he's in the same house as me? That's a thin pretext, even for you."

"Either way, he's not your lookout," said Flint. "Run away, Malfoy. I'm sure you remember how."

"If I don't, I'll know who to ask." He twirled his wand through his fingers. "I got a nice long look at your back the last time we saw each other, Flint."

"Wasn't a fair match, was it. You and the rest of bloody Gryffindor. Would've been different if it were just you and me."

Draco's mouth experienced one of those rare moments where it acted totally without clearance from any of the better parts of his head. He blamed Ron Weasley.

"It's just you and me now," he remarked, still twirling his wand. "Unless you count Goyle, although one can treat his tactical value as a rounding error."

Flint snorted. Goyle, who didn't seem to understand he'd been insulted, did too.

“Is that a challenge?”

“It’s an observation.” They were standing close to Colin. If he fired something at them, they’d likely dodge or try Protego, and the rebound could hit him. It would be more prudent to move the brat before they tried to duel, but he’d have to come up with a reason to do it.

He didn’t much fancy dueling Flint. In the best of all worlds, he’d have grabbed Colin with a Levicorpus and hauled him off, with nary so much as an Expelliarmus exchanged in either direction. That dream seemed increasingly hopeless, however.

On the other hand, if Flint dueled him, he wouldn’t have to worry about him and Goyle coming on at once.

Colin groaned, lurched up, and vomited a steady stream of something black onto the stone.

Flint and Goyle danced back, hooting with laughter. In contrast, Draco’s stomach and kidneys interlaced, and he stared hard at the black sludge foaming from Colin’s mouth before realizing what it was: it was mud. Thick, black, oily mud, veined with blood and bile.

“You know, I’m almost impressed,” he said, battling dizziness. “That’s not a simple spell.”

“Dunno what you mean,” said Flint. “Pretty sure mudbloods just do that on their own.”

Then he grinned, and Draco broke out of his reverie. The nausea vanished. He drew his wand and took a sidestep into Flint’s line of fire.

“Formal challenge,” he said, and tried to remember what all the book had said he was supposed to do next. “Wands and hands. Clavicle to sacrum. First to disarm.”

There was a stunned beat as everyone tried to figure out whether or not he was serious, himself included.

“You haven’t got a second,” said Flint.

Fuck. Well.

He jerked his head towards Colin. “Creevey. Indicate.”

Colin moaned and heaved another mouthful of sludge onto the stone. Goyle barked a high peal of glee.

“Sure,” said Flint, grinning beatifically. “Hell. Good enough, I reckon.” He drew his wand and shook out his arm, sending sparks twirling into the floor, like he was limbering to dance.

Draco turned to Goyle. “Call us,” he said.

“I’m not your second.”

“And I’d ask mine, but you’ve packed his gastric tract with silt, so he’s preoccupied,” Draco snapped. “Flint, tell your second to call, or it’s off.”

“Greg. Do it. This’ll only take a minute.”

He lifted his wand at Draco.

“To the wizard’s disarm,” called Goyle, with clear dislike for both of them. “Clavicle to sacrum. Wands, hands. Call.”

“Marcus Flint,” said Flint, shifting into an underhand grip. He held it with the tip arrowed down, leering from a great height.

“Draco Malfoy.”

With their names still skittering around the ceiling of the undercroft, they dueled.

Flint's echo was still fading when he realized that he had made a mistake. To his credit, he was a seventh year student at Hogwarts, with the very bare minimum of knowledge that credential entailed, and so he knew how to dodge a spell— probably having tempted more than one of his peers. He also knew how to cast one, and he was quicker than expected. His arm was fast and his aim was good, his posture flexible and limber, like a chaser's should be. He came barreling down the duelist's line with an avalanche of footsteps, hurling jinxes on every half-step. He moved well. He moved intimidatingly well.

Draco moved like fire on a fuse. He was up the line and under Flint's guard before the first spell shattered on the stone behind him, two jinxes tossed off like a courtesy greeting, parrying a Knockback and shattering it harmlessly against the column. He sliced a Diffindo up the front of Flint's shirt and swept down with an overhand Langlock, which hit belatedly as a red line bloomed over a bisected Slytherin tie, and Flint gagged himself trying to voice his pain with a mouth that couldn't move.

He made his first mistake when he paused for a quarter-second, looking for a quick way to disarm, instead of following up with another assault — because in the exhilaration of winning the first movement, he, the idiot, had forgotten that seventh years learned nonverbal magic.

The Bombarda lashed at him in a white blur, and he hurled himself back before it slammed into the ground where he'd been, cratering stone. He fumbled the footing and just barely got his feet under him before Flint unsealed his mouth and roared something that sent ice spikes soaring from his wand. Draco dropped and slid sideways, ruining the line, but sod the line, because a row of spikes erupted from the place where he'd been and melted harmlessly away.

Flint launched another three at him on the backhand sweep, and this time he had gathered enough of his wits to parry, exploding the spikes against a Shield Charm that saved his face from getting ribboned. Then Flint lunged, and with a fractional motion of his wrist, Draco moved the shield, using Flint's own momentum to crack him in the skull.

Flint staggered upright, blood beading at a nick on his forehead, where one of his own ice shards must've rebounded at him. Draco's shield flickered out, and he lifted his wand again, hesitant.

Flint was strong and trained, but he was muscle, not brains — Oliver Wood had figured out how to beat him years ago, and the trick was bothering to think even a single move ahead. Draco rolled his wrist and feinted right with an Expelliarmus, then another to the left, slipping back inside his guard, so close that he could have reached out and shoved him, if he wanted to — and Flint, mistaking haste for desperation, brought his hand down in a bellowing Flipendo that would have shattered a slower man's ribcage.

Draco cast Protego.

His own Knockback Jinx exploded against the shield and hurled Flint half the length of the hall. He landed on his back and skidded, with a roar that thundered in the echoey hall like a full set of church bells. His wand flew from his hand.

Draco dropped his arm, warm, fervidly perspiring, and jittery with victory. "Disarmed," he said.

Flint shifted upright, clutching his arm, and gasping for breath. His eyes were shining and wild with a resentment that was shockingly near hatred. Draco took a step back.

"Alright, Flint?"

"Alright?" rasped Flint. "Alright, you pissant? Are you joking?"

"I'm asking if you need the Hospital Wing," said Draco, as calmly as he was able, which was not much. His body hadn't figured out it wasn't in a fight anymore; his stomach had transformed into a loose and watery medium, and his arms jittered whenever he stood still.

He shifted his weight onto his back foot, hoping to burn off some of the excess cortisol. “I’m taking Creevey. Gentleman’s honor; Madam Pomfrey won’t know a thing.”

“What honor?” Flint spat. It was pink and viscous. “If I slit you open, tits to bollocks, you’d bleed black as him.”

“Careful, Flint. That’s the second time I’ve beat you. The third time, I’ll be less patient.”

“You pestilent little shit,” croaked Flint. “You worthless muggle-loving fruit. No wonder you’re not in Slytherin, thank God, I’d have had to kill myself from shame—”

Draco’s wand moved. From deep within the fog of a furious daze, he was intrigued to know which spell would first reach his tongue — but he never found out, because something hard and powerful collided with the back of his head, and the world was a lightless slate of stars and pain.

When his mind reunited with his skull, he was kneeling, gasping for a breath that wouldn’t come, while jarring waves of nausea rolled ceaselessly over his head. In his periphery the blurry silhouette of Goyle drifted in and out of focus. The world kept slipping out of focus. Blinking failed to clarify it. He swiped at the back of his neck and found it reassuringly whole, no blood, no warmth, but his fingers felt oddly numb, and kept slipping away when he tried to apply force.

In his right hand, Goyle held a long lead pipe. In his other hand was his wand, but it wasn’t hard to see which weapon he’d elected.

“You — absolute — arsehole, Greg.” It was hard to concentrate. His tongue kept slipping around his teeth. “We’re not dueling.”

“Dunno why we have to be,” said Goyle, which was, hang his life and every object in it, not a bad point.

He swung.

Draco didn’t quite collapse, but he didn’t quite execute the smart duck-and-roll he’d wanted, either. In actuality he flopped over sideways and tumbled onto his back, dodging the whistling sweep of the pipe over his head. Goyle stepped over him and brought it down again, cracking it on the stone with a horrible shriek that jangled in his newly-throbbing head, and Draco threw himself aside. He got up on one knee, poised to stand, and then the pipe came sweeping around and connected with his kneecap.

He went down. There was nothing he could do to prevent that. Everything in his leg was an unbroken continuity of pain. He didn’t even strictly feel like he had a leg anymore, just a searing starburst of a raw nerve where his knee once was. He didn’t scream, but that wasn’t for lack of desire, or some manly impulse not to. The pain actually closed his throat, so all he could manage was a deep gasp of shock.

“Don’t kill him,” called Flint warily.

“Not gonna kill him,” Goyle grunted. “M’not stupid.”

The breadth of permissible harm contained under that ceiling would give any man good reason to panic.

Goyle hefted the pipe, but as he did, there was movement behind him. A shadow in the passageway that lead out to the dungeons — a light, someone’s wand-tip — and Draco could have cheered in relief.

Cassius Warrington’s square white face appeared in the passage, his wand clasped lightly in his outstretched hand.

“Evening, gentlemen,” he said, at length.

Goyle lowered the pipe. Draco sagged against the floor, blinking away dizziness, and thanked the ceiling in a silent reverie of relief.

“Cass,” said Flint. He wet his lips, and began to say something — but as if on cue, Colin rolled over and emptied his last bellyful of mud onto the stone.

Cassius watched the boy unearth the sordid contents of his intestines with one acutely arched eyebrow. When he was finished, his lip curled.

“Marcus,” he sighed, as if he’d caught him with a hand in the biscuit jar. “This wasn’t what I meant.”

“The hell was I supposed to know that?”

“I don’t know. Discretion, perhaps?”

“We were being discreet.”

“I dread to think of the alternative. Greg, put that down, for God’s sake, you’re not a hired goon.”

“Warrington,” called Draco. “Creevey’s been cursed.”

“I can see that,” said Cassius calmly. To Flint, he added, “And what message is that supposed to send, exactly? Besides leaving something for the house-elves to clean up?”

“It’s not exactly pleasant, is it.”

“I know that, but I can’t give you license to hurt him,” said Cassius calmly. “Scaring him is one thing; this is quite another. I don’t actually get any pleasure from inflicting pain on first years, Marcus, it isn’t my cup of tea. In fact, it’s my job to protect them.”

“That’s not my fault,” he said sullenly.

“No, but that is,” agreed Cassius, indicating the unmoving Colin. “And having witnessed it, the rules of the Hogwarts School Handbook give me no choice.”

“Aw, c’mon—”

“Detentions,” he said crisply, pointing two fingers at Flint and Goyle. Goyle cried in betrayal. “Saturdays and Sundays, seven o’clock sharp, for the rest of the year. Scrubbing silver. No magic. And fifty points apiece, from Slytherin.”

“Mate!”

“You’re joking!”

“I am absolutely not,” said Cassius calmly. He folded his hands behind his back. “And if any professor asks me what you were doing in the undercroft, I intend to tell them the full and unvarnished truth: I found you brutalizing a pair of defenseless younger students, stopped it immediately, and issued punishments of a severity proportionate to the wrongdoing.”

Draco figured out what it was about Cassius that had bothered him: he was missing his tie. He’d never seen the Head Boy in anything less than uniform-to-code.

“Busybody,” muttered Goyle sullenly.

“That’ll be ten more points.”

“Oi!”

“Don’t you raise your voice at me. This is embarrassing and unconscionable. If this gets out to anyone, I’m taking it to Snape.”

“You wouldn’t.”

“Try me, Marcus,” said Cassius. He gestured at Colin. “And if he’s not in the Hospital Wing by tomorrow morning, you’ll be in Dumbledore’s office by the next.”

He turned on his heel and walked away.

“Warrington?” demanded Draco. Flint was still holding his wand. “What—”

Cassius didn’t appear to hear him. He strode unhesitatingly out of the undercroft, his head high, his eyes fastened resolutely forward, like the whole sordid scene had ceased to exist when he finished talking. He was deaf to the calls of his name.

The Head Boy flourished his wand over his shoulder, and the grate shuddered down behind him.

Draco stared after him. Deep in his stomach, fear raised its head again, shaking free of its leash.

“He’s going to the Hospital Wing anyway,” muttered Flint.

Goyle was still holding the pipe. He and Draco realized this at the same time.

With a half-second of grace, a shield blazed to life and met the hard crack of the pipe. The impact sent white fissures arcing through it. The pipe swept around a second time for his ankles, but Draco found his footing and sprang away.

The movement ignited a minor supernova of pain in his leg, and his knee buckled under his weight. Flint cast something yellow and sinewy that lashed through the air over his head and he rolled, but his leg was bad, and the next one whipped him off his feet: he lashed out and shot a Furnunculus into Goyle’s eye, making him scream as welts erupted in a profusion that closed over the socket; he was not even slightly sorry for the pain in his voice.

He set his teeth and thought of Sirius sitting on the bank in the rain, and the anger wiped out the pain, let him stand up and fumble a clumsy duelist’s stance, as Flint came sprinting down the line with a Knockback Jinx. He parried, shot back with Stupefy, Diffindo, Bombarda.

Lights flickered over the undercroft like a pair of dancing birds.

It was bound to happen: Flint's backhand caught him in the arm. He was a half-step slow because of the knee and he only noticed when the right side of his sleeve erupted in red — hardly painful and far worse than it looked, it only just broke the skin, but that didn't stop his hindbrain's gorge of panic — and more importantly, the distraction stopped him from blocking Petrificus in the leg. He dropped to a knee, Goyle's pipe whistled, and then something in his ribs happened that really shouldn't have, structurally, which his body politely informed him by setting every nerve inside it summarily on fire.

He moved on instinct. With a voice thin from breathlessness — he wasn't actually sure he could inflate one of his lungs — he lashed his wand at Goyle and cast Levicorpus. The boy was hoisted into the air by his ankle, and snarling, Draco hauled him into the column. His head smacked against it like a ragdoll and went still. The pipe clattered to the ground. Draco dropped him, and he fell twenty feet with a dull thump .

"Greg?" Flint bellowed. "Greg! You alright?"

Draco had no idea how badly he'd hurt Goyle; he was approximately one-tenth anger and nine-tenths eye-watering pain, and in absolutely no temper to care. He swiveled his wand around at Flint and cast a clumsy Stupefy, scattering red against the wall behind him.

"Malfoy—"

Draco replied with an inarticulate snarl. His knee hurt worse than anything in recent memory and his chest pinched like a knife was going in every time he tried to breathe, and his head was still dizzy from the pain that ebbed in his wound, and when he cast the spell it was through a clean red slate of anger, at Flint, at Goyle, at Colin fucking Creevey for getting himself in the situation, and at himself, for being in the dungeons and leaving the castle in the first place, for going to Hogsmeade and talking to the brainless Sirius Black, for getting it wrong, for being on this side, the one that got bloodied and beat-up on because they were weaker and he couldn't stand that, being weak.

"Bombarda maxima."

Everything happened slowly. Flint wheeled away as the spell came arrowing for his heart. It clipped his arm — started to detonate as he spun away — and flourished fully when it connected with the marble. Light blossomed; the pillar exploded like it was home to a newborn star. A full column of the undercroft erupted and sprayed shrapnel like a wave breaking on sand, and Draco threw himself sideways, slid between Colin and the explosion, and cast Protego as a wall of grey dust and white splinters descended like hail. The castle gave a great groan, like he'd wounded it, and he briefly feared that the whole undercroft was about to come down over them.

Out of the smoky rubble came Marcus Flint, cradling his arm, which — Draco's stomach turned — did not so much resemble a limb as a string-tied assortment of raw meats. His face loomed down through the fog like the snarl of a wild boar, deaf to reason, fed on rage.

He fumbled his wand into his off-hand and pointed it at Draco, who tried to stand and found his knee had finally given out, once and for all. Two spells missed him by a hair, but the momentum of dodging spilled him over onto one side, where he caught himself on his hands, trembling with the effort of bracing himself.

Another Blasting Curse detonated inches from his face. He rolled away, but Flint stepped into his path and kicked him in the gut, driving him into a fetal shell.

Draco snapped his teeth shut around a groan. He couldn't stand. If he couldn't stand, he couldn't duel. Flint was playing with his food.

"Cru—"

"Draco!"

Another voice skittered from the tunnel. There was someone at the grate. Flint whirled around, his wand aloft.

With a groan and a screech and what sounded like an enormous effort, it ratcheted up a few feet, its black teeth sinking into the wall above it.

Hermione ducked into the room. She pocketed a white piece of parchment; a scuttle of moving ink vanished from its face. The Marauder’s Map.

She straightened up and dusted off her robes, which were wind-tousled and embroidered with dirt. Rain soaked the crown of her head and darkened her hair, drawing a sharp contrast to the pale rictus of her face. She was, in a word, furious: she clenched her wand like it was a murder indictment.

It was probably the head injury, but he had never been so glad to see anyone, bar none, in his life.

At the same time, he wondered why it couldn’t have been anyone else in the castle at all — literally anyone, except the single person that his animal hindbrain found it singularly intolerable for Flint to lay hands on, as he was assuredly about to do. Because now, on top of everything else, there was a fear so poignant it was like sickness, and the intense urge to order her out.

Flint twitched at her, and she startled back. The boy grinned.

Her eyes flit over the undercroft. They lingered on Draco, fretful, and she mouthed something to him, but he was too far, and too dizzy, to make it out.

Flint kicked Draco again, which was frankly just unsporting.

“Don’t touch him.”

It was hard to say who seemed more surprised at her: Flint, Draco, or Hermione herself, whose demand reiterated itself in defiant echoes as Flint turned away from Draco and began a leisurely stroll across the smoking undercroft.

“Is that an order, mudblood?”

“No, it’s a threat,” she said. Slightly tremulous: “Just so we’re clear.”

“It’s a threat, is it?” Flint was delighted. “Well, that’s just pure provocation, innit?”

He lifted his wand at Hermione, which was — no, that was worse, come to think of it — and Draco struggled upright, but his head immediately vetoed the act, because all the colors of the room swapped places.

Hermione squared her jaw. “For the record, I never liked you,” she said. “But if you’re going to attack me, it’s worth pointing out that I did save your life, or at least spared you quite a bit of suffering, and if you were a better man, that would matter to you.”

“I don’t owe you nothing, mudblood,” he said. “S’not your magic in the first place.”

Her eyes flickered to Draco.

“Come and take it back, then,” she said, a bit breathlessly. And she ran.

Flint shot after her, lashing his wand in a sloppy overhand. She slid behind a column and vanished as a glittering Bombarda sailed through the place where she’d stood, detonating a stack of crates. Novae of shrapnel erupted, sawdust blooming. Flint hurtled around after her and ran into a Stinging Jinx, roared, and then whipped back around the column, following her on a mad race over and through the shattered remains of the crate piles — she threw a Shield now and then over her shoulder, ducking the bright darts of curses as they peppered her shoulders — but she wasn't fast, and she wasn't agile, and she was half his size if she was an ounce, and it felt like everything in Draco's body was a hollow vehicle for sickness and dread.

With a roar of laughter, Flint snagged her arm and wrenched her back. Hermione jerked so hard her shoulder almost popped out of its socket. She stumbled back, and Flint's wand bit into her neck. With one arm, he pinned her.

"Do you know what they used to do to thieves?" he crooned. "They'd cut off their hands. Hard to use a stolen wand if you don't have hands, ay, mudblood?"

Her chest rose and fell in quick breaths. She closed her eyes.

And then Hermione, who had never dueled in her life — who sometimes gave Draco palpitations because of how quickly she forgot her head under the slightest touch of pressure — thrust her wand over her shoulder, into Flint's face — Merlin's blood — and set him on fire.

Bluebell flames erupted over his head like a candlewick igniting, like an eruption of hungry fast-blooming freesia. Flint screamed in a way Draco had only heard someone scream once before, at the Quidditch World Cup — a scream not so much of pain as it was of shock and fear, a child's scream, high and thick with the utter strangeness of hurting. He leapt away and rolled onto the floor, flinging his body this way and that, while smoke guttered from his clothes in thick rancid-smelling clouds.

Hermione walked forward briskly through the steam and pointed her wand at his head. Draining out his fear, through the pain, came a narcotic wave of pride: for here was his girl, a lovely, clever, brutal girl, with a steady hand and a cold clear eye, and if she wasn't the most magnificent thing to walk the halls of that castle since Godric Gryffindor, then nothing good ever had.

Red light zipped into Flint’s temple, and he was still. She drew her wand over his body, and the flames guttered out, like she was sealing them back into a pocket in the air.

In the lingering quiet, there was only the creaking whinge of the undercroft; the smell of burned cotton; smoke, dust, shrapnel, and Hermione Granger, standing in a wreath of all three.

She visibly gave a little intake of breath. Then she spun on her heel and sprinted across the room, dropping to her knees, and scrambling to him in a clumsy landing of limbs that was very much at odds with the image she’d been a moment ago: much more juvenile, more like a girl who’d only been twice on a broomstick and almost fallen off both times.

“You came,” he made out, before she came down like a thunderstorm of elbows.

“And you’re an idiot!” She was breathless with rage. “Of course I came, you vacuous skrewt-brained pigheaded git of a boy, you ran off in the rain and made me cry thinking I’d scared you away, and then you went and did this, I hate you, oh my God, I could cry—”

“But you — were angry at me.”

“I’m a lot angrier now!”

“That’s — apparent — scared me off?”

“What was I supposed to think? Sirius said it was something to do with your dad and I thought, oh, good job, Hermione, really nice, because everyone really loves when you shout at them — and I was actually ready to apologize, even though I was right and you know it — but then you were gone. I was so mad I almost didn’t even come looking for you, so you’re really lucky I was so angry, if you think about it—”

He gave a delirious laugh.

“This isn’t funny. You left, and I thought you hated me. And have I mentioned, by the way, I hate you so much—”

“I’d never hate you—”

“You could’ve! You ran off in the middle of the visit, what was I supposed to think?”

“I needed a moment!”

“Then ask!”

“That’s beside the point! But good to know if I don’t announce my intention to leave a social occasion, you’ll take it as a declaration of everlasting loathing, thank you for telling me—”

“You arse,” she spat. She shoved him. “Stop it. How would you have felt? If I vanished and showed up like this.”

He veered away from that thought, which felt like several buildings collapsing on top of each other at once. It was easy to ignore; breathing felt like putting his ribs through a woodchipper.

“Ribs — broken—”

“Shit!” She scrambled back, scrubbing at her eyes, which had a bright wet affect that made him feel like death. “Sorry! Sorry!”

“Alright,” he said, and her hands flexed clumsily on his shoulders. He put his head back on the tile and closed his eyes and the cool kiss of stone bore like an edge through waves of hot headache. “Not your— not… ow.”

“What’s wrong? Where are you hurt? Are you alright? Obviously you’re not alright, that’s stupid — I’m stupid, this isn’t the time, I’m sorry — oh God, your knee.”

“Don’t tell me, whatever it is,” he said, his eyes screwed shut against the light. “I haven’t looked.”

“What happened?”

He flopped a hand ineffectually at Colin. Hermione made a sound of panic, like she hadn’t actually noticed him before.

“What happened to him?”

“Flint… and Greg… having a bit of fun.”

“And you intervened?”

He flourished his fingers: Evidently.

“But that was stupid,” she said, and his irritation was so poignant he actually cracked an eyelid.

“And you would’ve done different, would you?”

“Yes! Or — maybe! You could’ve gotten a teacher! Or a prefect! Instead of dueling them yourself!”

“You try doing that when someone’s screaming in your ear, and by the way, I’ve a head injury the size of Wales, just now, so if you could keep your voice down—”

“Sorry! Sorry. Sorry.”

She drew her hands down his chest and patted softly down his side, hitching her breath where he flinched, then did the other. Her fingers were light and shuddery. He realized she was terrified, and the irritation in his chest folded up and Disapparated, leaving a soft velvety ball of something helpless and warm.

Sucking in a breath, she pressed her wand to his arm and cast Episkey, and it felt like running water was coursing over his skin, sealing it up, leaving only a soaked red sleeve and a slightly itchy patch of skin over the new scar. He rolled his arm and flexed it.

“We’ll get Madame Pomfrey to fix that,” she said, lightly touching his ribs. She did something on his thigh that made a cool numbing sensation drip down his leg, easing the pain, and he let go of a long breath; he hadn’t realized how much of his pain was coming from the leg. “I’d try, but it’s bones and tendons, and those are the hardest to fix if you get them wrong... I can try to numb it up a bit, though.”

The anesthetic in his leg had improved his situation so dramatically that he might have been riding a dopamine high. “Sure,” he said, closing his eyes, and rolling his head back against the pavement. He luxuriated in the newfound pleasures of not having one million knives in his leg. “Whatever you want.”

“Draco? Draco. Dra-co.”

A sharp smack landed on his cheek, and he popped his head up, glaring.

“What?”

“Don’t go to sleep!”

“I wasn’t, damn you,” he said irritably, bracing himself up on his elbows. “I’m not going to nod off with a head injury, I’m not entirely thick.”

“Evidence notwithstanding,” she muttered, poking her wand intrusively under his collar to inspect for bruising. He lifted his chin up and away and allowed it, glaring, because he frankly shared her concern. She picked around to the back of his head and saw something that made her flinch, but then her wand probed the sore spot, and more cool pinpricks washed over his head, bringing a euphoria of relief. He rolled his head back into her hand from instinct, luxuriating in it. The tension seeped from his body like a poison.

“That’s excellent,” he said. His tongue felt large and cumbersome. “Did you learn that from Molly?”

“Yes, but it’s not advisable to do it twice,” she said, shaking out her wrist. “I thought I could make an exception, under the circumstances. You’ll have to walk, I can’t levitate you and Colin at once.”

“Bet you could,” he mumbled. The world was blurry through his small, spinning window of it, and he lolled his head back at the stone-carved ceiling. “If you tried.”

“You’re nice when you’re concussed.”

“I’m always nice to you.”

She snorted, a little bit more loudly than he strictly deserved.

“Did you really set him on fire?” he inquired, watching her through one slitted eyelid. “Or was that a pleasant hallucination?”

“Technically, I set his clothes on fire,” she said coolly, tucking her hair behind her ear. She was faintly embarrassed. Adorable. “The bluebell flames are synthetic. They’re much easier to control, and they don’t leave deep burns.”

“Deep burns, or any burns?”

“...Deep.”

He closed his eyes and smiled absently. “Good.”

“I didn’t… I wasn’t quite thinking.”

“Do you hear me complaining?”

“I didn’t mean to hurt him. Badly. I really didn’t.”

“We’ll work on it.”

“Draco,” she said, a touch sharp, and jabbed an Episkey into a scrape on his palm.

“What?”

She withdrew and folded her hands neatly over her wand, like someone completing an examination. It was woefully endearing.

He was concussed. That was the sort of thing he was allowed to think, when he was concussed. He had just decided, on the grounds that it made him feel better, and everything hurt, so he deserved it.

“Can I—”

She fingered her wand. She said, in a brusque, stony sort of way: “Carefully, I mean, but—” and jerked her head at him, which took him about three full seconds to understand, because he was, see above, concussed.

“Oh. Carefully, yes,” he said, “if you must.”

Hermione hugged him. It was not a comfortable hug, being, like all of Hermione’s hugs, absurdly warm and full of hair, and she was driving her knee into his one intact rib, and the floor of the Hogwarts undercroft was an inhospitable locale for any sort of intimacy. Her arms were around his shoulders in a tight vise and her head locked into the spot on his collarbone where it went under the Invisibility Cloak, a place that she seemed to have elected on despite it being not even slightly comfortable for him, and like all hugs it was uncomfortable and too much contact and his emaciated sense of propriety was announcing to all parts of his brain in audience that this was highly inappropriate.

He wrapped an arm around her back. Fuck appropriate.

“I thought you were hurt.”

“Well spotted.”

“I mean really, irreparably hurt. I thought— it was my fault, at the Shack, I’d yelled and you ran away—”

“Holster your apologies before they hurt someone. And stop acting like I’m some consumptive waif, it’s emasculating. I’m not going to die in a duel with Marcus bloody Flint.”

“—and I was thinking, well, that’s what I get, isn’t it, for being awful to you and Lupin. That’s my fault, he’s practically dead and it’s because of me.”

“You’re never awful,” he said, which was probably a lie, but he was still concussed, so he was allowed to say it.

She gave a little twitch, and he could feel her heartbeat change, under his fingers on her back. “I shouted.”

“Oh, yes. There’s a special place in hell, you know, for shouters. They call it Gryffindor Tower.”

“I threw Daphne in Lupin’s face.”

“He’s had worse in it.”

“I shouldn’t have implied that he was dangerous.”

“It’s not an insult to call someone dangerous,” he said, which they both knew very well was besides the point; she snorted and shook her head. He shifted her leg slightly, so it didn’t rest so heavily on the tender bone of his hip. “Dangerous people are helpful to know. You’re dangerous, and thank Merlin you are, frankly.” He nearly said Thank Merlin for you, but his tongue slipped in a fortunate place, and the head injury compensated for the rest by slurring it, so he didn’t think she necessarily heard.

Then he said: “You were right.”

“What?” she said, distracted by his injuries. “I mean, yes. But on which thing?”

“Muggle-borns.”

She frowned.

“Head injury,” she decided. “That’s not good.”

“It’s not — okay, funny, but also irrelevant. I meant.” It was hard to remember what he meant. His thoughts were a kaleidoscope that rearranged every few seconds. “I meant. I didn’t like… you were right about what’s going on. It’s dangerous for you, and it isn’t for me. You think I don’t see it, but obviously I do, I just don’t like it. So I said it wasn’t true. I do that. Have you noticed?”

“I think danger finds you just fine,” she murmured, but there was a touch of satisfaction in it. She smiled at him, quickly, and he relaxed. She understood. She always did.

“I don’t like thinking about it,” he said, idly, mostly to the undercroft ceiling. “You. Danger. It isn’t fun.”

“I don’t like you being in danger, so let’s start there,” she said mildly, feeling around the back of his head. Her fingers carded through his hair, and he leaned back, sighing.

“I’m good at not thinking about things, you know. I’m very good at it. Some would say I’m one of the best.”

“I’ll say.”

“Or I used to be good at it, anyway.”

“Hm.”

“What, ‘hm’?”

“You have dilated pupils,” she said. “Are you sure you’re lucid?” At some point she had shifted her leg over his other hip, settling herself gingerly on his stomach. She didn’t seem to realize she’d straddled him. She was holding his shoulders and peering quite closely in his face. Her expression was clinical and curious and not sentimental in the least, which was exceptionally lucky, because the rest of him had absolutely no sense of decorum whatsoever, and the whole front of his chest was burning.

She smelled like flowers and rainwater. Earth, but not dirt, just the fresh scent that sighed off the ground when it rained. There was a tiny drop on the fringe of her lashes, maybe sweat, maybe a tear. His hand still cradled her knee where he'd moved it. Her mouth was a soft pink thing very close to his face and she wasn't moving or speaking anymore and he wanted to touch it, with the fervid, simplistic want of the entirely illucid.

She breathed deep. He could feel the motion all down her body, from the rise of her chest to the infinitesimal movement of her hips. He moved his thumb absently over the swell of her knee.

Then he did the very best thing he could have done, or the worst, and looked into her eyes. They were as wide as telescope lenses, dark and shining.

Everything in the whole world, especially her, was warm.

There were things he wanted, and the things had names. He couldn't do them, but he could think about them.

She hauled herself off him like she'd remembered an urgent appointment with any other place in the universe, and he elicited a groan as his organs rearranged themselves.

He was stiff as a fossil and every joint in his body was filing a lawsuit against his cerebellum. The painkilling spells were pulling their weight, but the rest of his body had taken the absence of mind-ending injury as an invitation to submit its own complaints.

"Can you walk?" she said, in a high crisp tone that strongly evoked McGonagall.

He wasn't going to let her levitate him, not after that. He was considering a restraining order to ensure that he never had to deal with what happened to his body when she touched him, ever again. He gritted out some affirmative and struggled to his feet, one arm braced on the pillar. “Fine,” he snapped. “Great, even. Get Creevey.”

Her hands hovered like a pair of fretful birds. “You’re not really suited to walk. You’ll have to lean on me—”

“I won’t be doing that, thank you.”

“But you can’t—”

“You’ll find, as so many have before you, that I can do exactly as I please. Now get out of my way.”

She stiffened. “I was only trying to help.”

“I — I do know that,” he said, and tried to be less curt. “But certain persons with us have a greater need. I’m being selfless, really, you ought to be proud of me.”

His tone failed to convince her, but it was effective at waving her off. She sniffed and went to poke over Colin, who was whining through an unpleasant return to consciousness. Draco didn’t envy him.

With her attention diverted, he sagged against the column and dragged his hand over his eyes. He was in horrendous shape. He was in pain and irritated and he didn’t even have good cause to be in a snit with her, only he was, and she knew it, and never being less than game, she was gearing up to be in a snit of her own.

And on the floor were two boys who, in another universe not very far from this one, would have been his childhood friend and his quidditch captain, and he had very nearly torn both of them apart without any remorse.

And he still didn’t feel remorseful. He waited for it to happen, but it didn’t; when he reached for the place where the feeling should be, there was a picture of Flint holding Hermione up by the arm, her features twisted in a grimace of discomfort, prefiguring pain. The image followed his mind's eye no matter how he tried to divert it, as if nothing else could occupy his attention, as if nothing else mattered. And perhaps it didn't. But that didn't make him feel a hell of a lot better, either. If anything, the opposite. Knowing what mattered didn't help him like it at all.

"We should leave," said Hermione. She was coated in dust and rainwater and tiredness in the extreme. "Go to the Hospital Wing. I want to get you looked at, and poor Colin… selfishly, I'd like a nap, but I don't think I'll get one." She levitated Colin, who gave a moan and a twitch. "And someday, ultimately," she said, wistfully, looking down at the film of dust and ash on her clothes, "I'd really fancy a wash."

His life was fundamentally and unalterably bent in the wrong direction, and he had no idea how to iron it out, or even what the right direction would be, if he could unbend it.

"A wash," he said tiredly, "would be lovely."

-NEW ART posted on Tumblr: @coolmanchocomilk drew this breathtaking illustration of Draco and Lucius; and my dear recurring collaborator softkombucha offered a lovely rendition of this scene from Chapter 48! and certainly one of these days I will figure out how to stop thinking about either one, but it hasn't worked yet.

-you are all so very wonderful I do not know how to handle it even slightly. the analysis the power the energy the eloquence. harold bloom wants what my comments section has.

-flora carrow is one of those girls who is just unrepentantly awful about everything. i have a lot of affection for her. not wise or reasonable affection. but still.

-shoutout to that person on tumblr who asked if Hermione still set Snape on fire in this AU. She didn't, but fear not; she is still very much That kind of girl, obviously. this one's for you.

-very bold of taylor swift to drop content on the same day as i do. only one week after i make a taylor swift reference also. crossover event of the century perhaps.

-you already know when the next chapter drops! it will take place on the eve of the Third Task, and it will have the conversation that a lot of you guessed would be in the last chapter, actually. It's long as hell and half of it is a single interaction. in my outline, the margin says "this is the most drama the owlery's seen in decades." also known as Hermione Granger Officially Loses Her Shit. and she's earned it.

-it's called "The Insider."

-I owe you everything. I hope the rest of your day has low humidity and a cool breeze.

The Insider

Chapter 51: The Insider

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

“In my fifty-seven years of service to this school,” said Madame Pomfrey, “I assure you, Mr. Malfoy, I have heard all sorts of unlikely accusations leveled at the Hogwarts staircases; and yet oddly, in fifty-seven years of traversing said staircases, never have I once witnessed the kind of violence that students would have me believe them capable of.”

It had to be said: she had a sense of humor, did Madame Pomfrey.

Draco sprawled extravagantly over the hospital bed, taking up as much real estate as he could. His knee wore a rosebud of bandages, its range of motion fully restored, though he refused to admit as much to any of the people who were fussing over him. If he groaned and touched it often enough, the nurses would fetch him hot cocoas from pity.

Hermione, perched at his bedside with an archival copy of the Hogwarts Enquirer, gave a discreet, high, “Hmph,” and he replied with the laziest, slimiest smirk that he could summon while in not-insignificant pain.

“I’m glad to hear it,” he said seriously to Madame Pomfrey. “They’re an existential risk. I’m lucky to have survived.”

Madame Pomfrey did not dignify this by voicing her doubts. She planted her hands on her hips and directed the full force of her instructor’s disapproval at Hermione, who was the weaker target, admittedly. “And you, Miss Granger, you witnessed this… exceptionally dynamic fall?”

Fortunately, the sting of disapproval seemed considerably easier for her to bear when it wasn't a professor asking. "I didn't say that," said Hermione crisply, turning a page. "He was like that when I found him, Madame Pomfrey." This was true. "I wish I could help you, but I really can't."

Less true, but delivered flawlessly. He rewarded her by generously electing to share his third hot chocolate in an hour. She sipped it, idly, while perusing the classifieds.

Madame Pomfrey threw up her hands, as if to vault her own deniability into the rafters, and stalked off to pry apart the Creevey brothers, who had been bundled together in an inseparable knot in one of the other cots ever since they brought Colin back to the Hospital Wing.

Hermione followed her with her eyes. When she was gone, she snapped the newspaper shut and dropped her voice to hiss in his ear. "I hate this."

"Merlin, fine, give it back."

She placed it on his bedside table, mere inches out of his reach; Hermione could be downright mean when she wanted to be.

"No — the lying. Anyone with eyes can tell you didn't fall down a staircase, even Neville never looks this bad, and you spend half your time skating down those banisters like they're a monorail. Your reflexes aren't slow enough."

"You think I've good reflexes?"

"Flint and Goyle deserve to be expelled."

"What they deserve was outlawed by international convention. However, I don't fancy dancing that particular number again, so I'll be keeping my lovely undamaged mouth shut about it, and you'll do the same, and when Colin recovers his inclination to speak, he'll have our examples to learn from."

"It's not fair. You're hurt. Something should happen to them," she muttered. "Something. I don't care what it is. But they shouldn't get to walk away."

"Keep your voice down," he said, though dizzily charmed. Her face was bright with anger, and full of pink blooms like a striated tea rose, and he was still concussed, technically, so none of this counted as admiring. "The walls have ears. And habits of violence."

Flint and Goyle had been brought in an hour after Draco by a Slytherin prefect, who claimed that an anonymous tip-off had floated up to them and gave them each a paper cut in the nostril.

He liked a bit of fun, did Harry.

Hermione took her lip between her teeth, worrying it. He watched her, his head lolling on the pillow. It wasn't a crime.

"They can't be allowed to go on," she said, after a moment. She didn't sound happy about it; she sounded like she'd found the solution to an Arithmancy problem floating an order of magnitude off her preferred estimate. "They can't think they can attack people without consequences. And the prefects won't… if they can't do anything about it, they don't have a reason to stop."

"A healthy respect for being set on fire might do it."

"Dennis doesn't know how to do that," she said. "Most people can't do that."

She said it absently, like it didn't even occur to her to be smug, which was how he knew she was really lost in thought.

A commotion of hinges and footsteps broke the solemn respite of the Hospital Wing. Robes and voices fluttered at the doors, and a nurse’s complaints failed to deter the two visitors, who swept down the aisle and snapped back the curtain to Draco’s cot with a haste that made both him and Hermione spring back as if they’d been doing something more indecent than plotting vengeance.

Dumbledore and Professor Snape were framed in the curtain. Both were harried. Haste rumpled their robes. There was a bloodless affect to Snape’s face, mirrored in the stiff bar of Dumbledore’s mouth. It looked as though they’d received news of an impending comet angled directly at their heads.

“Merlin. Who died?” said Draco, who never saw a moment he was unwilling to step on.

“Draco,” said Snape, with a thin issuance of breath. “What happened?”

“Took a fall. Why, Professor? What did you hear?”

They had come together, which suggested they’d heard at the same time, and hadn’t parted ways since he’d heard them conferring in the dungeons. He noticed that Crouch wasn’t among them, and he wondered if Mad-Eye had already been arraigned.

“Pomfrey makes a note to inform me,” said Snape, with a curl of his lip that meant he was mounting a sermon, “whenever my godson enters her care; she takes special pains to inform me when he does something especially gormless.”

Draco shifted his leg sourly. “It wasn’t gormless.”

“You fell down the stairs?”

“I — there were extenuating circumstances.”

“Such as gravity, perhaps?” Snape folded his arms and leveled ten volts of straight malice into Draco’s undeserving face. “Momentum? Shocking developments, each to each.”

“Like you’ve never tripped anywhere!” He was outraged. In his opinion, this was a powerfully motivated persecution, and it wasn’t fair.

“Never to the effect of shattering three ribs and a patella. Those of us with the vanishingly little intellect it requires to refrain—”

“Oi, aren’t you supposed to be worried about me? I’m lucky I didn’t break my neck!”

“You are indeed very lucky to have so little to regret, and you will be doubly lucky if you remain so after your mother finishes with you.”

“You’re not going to tell her!”

“Your powers of prediction are uninspiring. Professor Vector must be sorely dismayed in you.”

“Uncle Severus.” He ignored Hermione’s wide-eyed stare of warning. He wrestled himself upright. “Don’t be a ponce. I tripped! I’m fine! Don’t ruin her day over nothing—”

“You are profoundly arrogant to assume the frustrations of raising a witless child are enough to ruin your mother’s day,” snarled Snape, with such venom that Draco flinched back, honestly wounded.

He wouldn’t have said so under torture, but his godfather’s anger was a melee weapon, and he had never received the force of it so directly before. It made something small and selfish in his chest throw its tail between its legs and want to cry.

“Well, that’s—” He found his throat stiff, cleared it, and tried again. “That’s not — that’s just — it’s rude, is what it is, Professor.”

Dumbledore, who had been leaning heavily on a chair by Draco’s foot, at last raised his head. “I concur,” he said quietly. “Severus, please leave your godson to his recovery. You may notify Lady Malfoy as you wish.”

Snape’s parting glance swept over Draco like a sheet of stinging hail, imparting a last impression of the Potion Master’s frankly ludicrous levels of anger and fear; and then he stalked out of the room, sweeping his cloak after him like the dramatic old git he was.

The headmaster relaxed when Snape was gone, though this still left so much tension in his body it was like undoing one knot of a vast, ancient rigging. “I apologize for your godfather, Draco,” he said. “He is a man under enormous pressure. The likes of which do not often make men kinder.”

Draco was tempted to say, I know, with some snide comment about Ministry investigations, but he held his tongue.

Dumbledore adjusted his spectacles and gazed sympathetically at Draco’s injured knee. “How do you feel?” he said softly.

“Fine.”

Hermione made some sort of obnoxious naysaying cough. He huffed.

“I’m fine. Once they let me out of this blasted hospital, I’ll be cartwheeling to class. Happy?”

“Never less so than when in this room,” said Dumbledore. He cast a look over the wing, with its four occupied beds, one still holding the entwined lump of the Creeveys, and shook his head. “For a teacher, to see any student housed here is a notice of profound and exceptional failure.”

Draco frankly could imagine a few more profound and exceptional failures before this one, a lot of them rhyming with Lournament, but held his tongue once more.

“Can I ask why you came, professor?” said Hermione, politely. She had folded her legs and held her back straight, as if she were asking a question in class, bless her. “Aside from an interest in Draco’s wellbeing.” Her tone made it courteously obvious that neither she nor anyone reasonable considered this an appropriate reason for the headmaster to make a personal visit.

“The grievous injury of a student notwithstanding?”

“If that’s the reason, you must spend quite a lot of time in the Hospital Wing, Professor.”

Now it was Draco’s turn to shoot her a wide-eyed look.

Dumbledore’s wry expression only grew wryer. “You may not believe me,” he said, “as is your right, but Mr. Malfoy’s wellbeing is the sole occasion of my visit.”

“Respectfully, professor,” she said primly, “I think I’m going to exercise that right.”

Dumbledore tilted his head, an open smile now gracing his weathered face. “Gracefully done,” he said. “I enjoin you wholeheartedly to continue, if you like. How fare our fellow friends of Buckbeak?”

“—Oh! Moony and Padfoot? They’re quite well. They’re… accessible, at present, if you’d like to go… see a hippogriff. They’re… in an old bolthole.”

“How positively delightful to hear,” said Dumbledore. “I may do just that. These days, one can never spend too much time with old friends.” His eyes slipped into the middle distance, as if he could hear a conversation happening on the other side of the castle, and it was far more interesting to him than their own. Then he patted Draco’s leg, made an excuse, and tottered out of the Hospital Wing.

When the creaking of the doors subsided, Hermione said, “That was dodgy.”

He snorted.

“It was! He spent five minutes talking to you, glanced at the Creeveys, didn’t so much as mention Flint or Goyle—”

“Can hardly blame him, I wouldn’t, either, after what they pulled.”

“He doesn’t know that,” she said, and then frowned. “Or does he?”

“At the risk of sounding like an apologist for the various inadequacies of Albus Dumbledore, headmaster and all-around fop,” he said, “which, for posterity, I am not: even he can’t know what’s going on in all parts of the castle, all the time.”

“No, I suppose not,” she said. “If it hadn’t been for the Map, even I wouldn’t have…”

She trailed off and grasped the railing of his cot, firmly, as if he were about to slide off somewhere. He ignored the implication and turned his head away from her searching glance; they weren’t going to talk about it. There lay madness. There lay the fact that he’d looked at her in that chamber for three whole seconds and wondered if Merlin himself hadn’t deployed her for his benefit.

Increasingly he got the feeling that if he so much as tapped the dyke of feeling that he’d walled up in the back of his mind, if he cracked the seal an inch, the whole of it would burst forth in flood, and shatter him.

Blood traitor. Blood traitor. Blood traitor blood traitor blood traitor.

It meant death. It meant no more Malfoys. It meant dead men can’t love you, and Draco didn’t need his father’s love, never had done, he’d lived just fine without it for frankly long enough as to make a lesser man resentful, but that didn’t mean he wanted the other thing.

If he didn’t look at her, the voice wasn’t so loud. So he didn’t.

Problem being that he liked looking at her. That was how everything had gone wrong for him in the first place. He liked looking at her too much, and he'd made a habit of it, and now whenever he didn't, it felt just as bad, only in a different part of his brain.

Other times he thought that part of his mind was a histrionic twat, so there was really no winning, being him.

They kept him in the Hospital Wing for several days. A caravan of visitors made his visit enjoyable, and the myths that arose from his injuries made it even more so. Fred and George started a rumor that he had taken his licks by kickboxing a centaur, a story that the first-year friends of Dennis Creevey carried on fleet feet far and wide over the castle, and made him the subject of much reverence. A healthy crop of flowers and cards sprouted from his bedside, some from Gryffindor, and some, pleasantly, from various anonymous persons with an affection for glitter and pink script; these were flattering up until Ron and Harry got hold of them, at which point the dramatic recitations immediately spoiled any sincere pleasure, and made Hermione scoff so hard she might soon disgorge her uvula.

By the end of the week, Pomfrey discharged him with some Numbing Potion and a crutch, which he used only because it made everyone get out of his way when he came scraping down the halls, and gave him a great excuse to hit people's ankles. On the way back to Gryffindor Tower, taking the first opportunity to converse without the threat of Pomfrey or her fleet of wide-eared nurses overhearing them, he told the others what he had overheard.

"What a slimy old git," announced Ron, visibly annoyed. "Just can't stand to see Harry winning, can he? Soon as anything starts going well, he's got to stick his greasy nose in."

"He's not wrong. Someone did put Potter's name in the Goblet," said Draco.

Harry was conferring with Hermione about an old newspaper clipping from a Triwizard Tournament in 1814, barely glanced up at the sound of his name. In Draco's opinion, the pair of them were wasting their time, as they had not one ice chip's chance in Tenerife of blind guessing the Third Task before it happened; but as the month of April dwindled to a close, it eased the crawling dread for them to try.

“Better him than Warrington,” said Ron. “Anyway, I bet Snape’s just sore at Mad-Eye. They’re always at each other’s throats, you said so yourself.”

“Not the point where he’d send him to prison.”

“What,” said Ron flatly, “like he did last year, you mean?”

There was a beat while Draco regained his footing. “He never said anything that wasn’t true.”

“Yeah, except that Lupin was a danger to kids. Knowing full well he was on Wolfsbane. Or do you believe that, too?”

“Of course not, but if one attempts to sympathize—”

“Maybe I don’t want to sympathize with him,” he interrupted briskly. “Ever think of that? Maybe I’d rather not sympathize with the old Death Eater over my pals, and Harry’s godfather.”

“Snape is my godfather.”

He must have spoken louder than he meant to; Harry and Hermione broke off, and Hermione’s voice drifted down from the stairs over them. “What’s this about?”

“Nothing,” said Ron tautly. “Finishing off some business from the Shrieking Shack.”

Blood traitor.

Draco’s fingers flexed on his wandsheath. He wanted to run back and jinx Sirius again, for leaving words like that in his head, where it could float around knocking into things and leaving bruises.

“Speaking of which,” he said shortly. “Have they left?”

“Oh, yeah, you wouldn’t know,” said Ron, not quite airily, “seeing as you took off without us. No, they’re staying. Gonna try to watch Harry in the Third Task, if they can find a way to do it. Harry loaned them the Invisibility Cloak, we’re hoping Moony can use it to sneak in.”

“You what?”

“They need it more,” said Harry stubbornly. “It’s just until they leave again. I’m not giving it away.”

“What if you need it?”

“Why would I?” he said. “I’m not gonna be sneaking around much before the Third Task. According to Hermione’s drilling schedule, I’ll barely have time to sleep.”

“They’re adults. They’re more than capable of a Disillusionment Charm. Or a Concealment Charm. Or any other one of a dozen spells that Remus Lupin should know—”

“Oi!”

“Careful, mate!”

“Moony,” insisted Hermione, “it’s Moony, remember, we’re in the castle.”

“Sod it, it’s a stupid name,” he snapped, stalking around the last stairwell.

They had ruined his day. He had been in decent spirits, leaving the Hospital Wing, and prepared to overlook the rather grievous insults against his dignity that transpired at the Shrieking Shack, but Ronald Weasley had punctured that slender balloon of contentment like he was practicing marksmanship. He took the last four stairs in two jumps, ignoring the questionable flicker in his knee, and let his stomps echo in claves of displeasure. They could herald him from the Astronomy Tower. Good. Let them take precautions.

When he reached the Pink Lady, he barked, “Ariadne,” but then was too distracted to hear the Pink Lady’s murmur of, “Oh, no, not anymore,” for he almost tripped over someone on the floor.

Daphne Greengrass was curled in a ball against the Pink Lady’s foot. She had gathered her knees to her chest and took a percussion of little breaths as though her throat was struggling to stay open. She was ruddy and wet as a freshly watered rose, her shirt wrinkled, one sock slumping in undignified asymmetry with its twin, and her CASSIUS WARRINGTON badge winked sadly ajar on her jumper.

She peeled her face up and blinked at him.

“Hello, chaps,” she said. “I’m quite sorry. I didn’t know where else to go.”

“What happened?”

She opened her mouth, closed her eyes, and burst into tears.

“Oh, God,” said Hermione, hurrying up the stairs. Ron and Harry followed, hastened by the sound of her warbling. “Are you hurt? Did the Slytherins do something to you? Who was it? Harry, go get Professor McGonagall—”

“No! Don’t! It’s nothing — I’m not, I’m, no, nothing, nothing’s wrong —”

“Pish,” said Ron, quite angrily. He crouched beside her, doing a none-too-subtle sweep for injuries. “What’s going on?”

“I’m not, no, it’s not, really, I’m not hurt, don’t make a fuss. Please don’t get Professor McGonagall.”

“Fine, but Daph—”

“Oh, don’t everyone look at me like I’ve been expelled from the church,” she said hoarsely. “I only… I just didn’t… nobody was speaking to me, and the common room was empty, and everyone was gone, and I was so lonely, I don't know why I did it, but I went to a meeting — I'm sorry, Hermione, don't be disappointed — and it was awful, just so incredibly awful, they're not like they were last year, it wasn't a fun party at all!"

"What meeting?" said Hermione, bewildered. "Disappointed? Daphne, what are you talking about?"

"The League of Promising Youth," said Draco. He prickled with discomfort.

Daphne bobbed her head. "I'm sorry. I'm really sorry, Hermione, I don't believe in it! I don't even care about politics! You know me, I don't give a fig for what they do at the Ministry, it's all the same to me! It's all the same, both sides, it's just hogwash! I was just so sad, and everyone said it was fun, so I wanted to see if — but it was horrible!"

"What happened?" said Ron, fishing a mangy handkerchief from his pocket. She snatched it up and offloaded a full sinus. "What'd they do?"

"It was this dark small room and all these grownups and Sibelius Nott and Theo was there but he was stuck in a conversation with his dad and Cassius, and everyone else had their own little cliques and I didn't know where to go, and I look around and I see Odin Davis was there — Tracey's father, you know? The auror? And he wasn't doing much talking so I thought, well, Daph, just be a sport and introduce yourself, so I went over and gave him the full smile and 'hullo, I'm Daphne Greengrass, I go to school with your daughter,' and everything, and he looked at me and I sort of felt he thought I was odd but he gave me a hello and shook my hand and everything, and then rightaway he asked about my scars and I thought well, that's very rude, we've only just met, but I can be a good sport, you know? But then when I told him he started asking me all these questions and it was obvious what he meant and he thought I was some sort of — oh, God — half-breed," when she breathed it sounded like sand rasping through a pipe, “and I told him I’m pureblood as they come and he said — he said — he said—” She burst into a volley of sobs.

“We don’t have to do this now,” said Ron hurriedly. “Into the common room, yeah? There’s chairs in there. For sitting on. Much better than a floor, you won’t believe it. It’s plush. Here, away from the door—?”

“He said what a waste!” cried Daphne, and buried her head in her knees.

“He did what?” Ron was furious. “He said that to you?”

“Y-y-yes, and then he said something else, and it would’ve been alright if nobody heard but Millie and Tracey had come over and they started laughing, and I, I was so mad I don’t remember what I said even, but I made a scene and I slapped him — right in the face! I slapped an auror! Oh, God, I’m going to be sick — and there was a horrible scene and Theo was yelling and Mr. Davis had his wand out and Mr. Nott looked like he was going to kill me, and so I ran away and hid in a broom closet for a few hours because I didn’t want anyone to find me, you know? And then I only went home when it was late and no one would see me come in but I went to my room and the door,” she was breathing in greedy gulps, “the door was jinxed, it nearly broke my nose, and when I opened it someone got into my room and D-D-D-Duchess — oh, Duchess—”

“Sorry,” said Ron, looking wildly from Daphne to Draco. “What? Duchess? Who’s Duchess?”

“Her cat,” said Draco stiffly.

“She was gone,” she sobbed. “And there was cat fur everywhere.”

Harry drew his wand and turned down the stairs. Draco grabbed him by the collar and hauled him back.

“Oh,” whispered Hermione. “Daphne, I’m so sorry.”

Daphne scrubbed her cheeks, but her hands were so wet with tears she only succeeded in smearing them around. “I’m sorry,” she said wetly. “I shouldn’t have gone. I know the things they say about muggle-borns, but I was so lonely I didn’t care. And I didn’t — I didn’t realize that I was — that they wouldn’t—”

“You didn’t realize they were saying it about you, too,” said Hermione. She was strangely calm.

Daphne’s reply was a sob.

Hermione said, “Well, that was a bit of an oversight, wasn’t it?”

“I know,” she wailed, “I know, I know I’m stupid, everyone says I’m stupid, Teddy and Pansy and Mummy and Daddy all tell me so and I don’t listen, I’m just a dumb dummy who never learns—”

“Come off it,” said Hermione, with a trademark briskness that made Ron shoot her a displeased look. “There’s no need for self-pity. You’re not stupid, you were just scared and sad, and besides that you knew full well what you were doing — but I’m not angry at you, Daphne.”

“...You’re not?”

“No,” she said stiffly. She grasped Daphne’s hands and pulled her up with a jerk, and Daphne was so surprised that she went, sailing to her feet like a porcelain poppet. “Anyway, it wasn’t my cat they went after. After all, you won’t soon go back, will you?”

“No! Never — I can’t ever — I won’t ever—”

“Well, there you go,” said Hermione, awkwardly. “Honestly, Daphne, just try to — buck up a little, have some perspective. It’s not the end of the world, you know, and — I suppose you’re an alright sort of girl, deep down and everything. When it matters.”

She extended her hand and patted her shoulder stiffly.

This, from Hermione Granger — whose chief qualifications as a friend included a ruthlessness with homework reminders and a willingness to set one's enemies on fire — was a gesture of extraordinary emotional sensitivity and nurturing.

Daphne burst into tears and threw her arms around Hermione, who reacted as though someone tried to shank her. She attempted a series of scrambling evasive maneuvers that ultimately failed, and left her floundering in Daphne's grip.

"Never mind — never mind — that wasn't an invitation!"

"Oh, just let her, go on," whispered Harry, "be nice—"

"I can't breathe, Harry!"

"—good for the immune system, too—"

"Harry Potter, help me!"

"—talking about having female friends—"

"I'm going to jinx your hair blue!"

"Do it, I'll match Cho."

They hauled Daphne into the common room, a multi-step process that left Hermione haggard and Ron rather more wet than he'd been on arrival, where she sank into a leather armchair with the airs of an aged queen. A first year game of draughts was scattered to make space, and a small coterie of gawkers came to loiter, including the girls from upstairs.

After a few hours of crying, Daphne calmed. She didn't say as much, but she grew fidgety and prone to giggles, and resisted attempts by Harry or Hermione to redirect the conversation to serious matters by launching charm offensives against the nearest creature in sight. Four people offered to take her to the headmaster's office, each rejected; the question of where she would go after she left the Gryffindor common room was flagged twice by Hermione, but only when Ron brought it up did Daphne finally quail and fold into herself with the dignity of a surrender.

“I don’t know,” she admitted. “I can’t… I won’t sleep there, I just know it.”

“Because they’ll go after you?”

“Because they hate me,” she whined. “And I can’t get up in the morning and walk around and say hello to them. Either they’ll say something, and it’ll be horrible, or they won’t, and it’ll be worse, and either way I don’t know how much longer I can take being the outsider without going mad.”

“...But you have to sleep somewhere,” said Hermione.

Daphne fidgeted.

“I don’t suppose… I mean, it’s not so very long until the end of the school year,” she said, in suggestive tones.

“What do you mean?”

“Well, I’m very neat, you know, and I’m sure I wouldn’t bother a soul if I just tucked myself in here on the couch—”

“But you can’t just sleep in our common room, Daphne.”

“Course she can,” said Ron jovially. “Lee does it every other night anyway, there’s someone napping all the time.”

“That’s different! It isn’t a dorm!”

“I’ll be quiet,” Daphne assured her, which Draco thought was an impressively gutsy lie. “You haven’t even seen how quiet I can be. You’d be astonished. I’m like a mouse! You won’t know I’m here.”

“That’s well and good, but you haven’t got a bed,” said Hermione, with patience warmed by earnesty, “and we can try to transfigure one for you, but I really think you should think this through first, because it’s not an easy place to sleep, and you’d essentially be camping — we’d like to help, we really would, but you have to think practically.”

Harry and Ron were both at a loss for what to do. Draco, being no richer in ideas, consulted the ceiling for inspiration.

A crowd of fourth years had gathered around in the common room to chat, and unexpectedly, from amongst the whispering many, Lavender Brown heaved a titanic sigh — stepped forward — and rose to the occasion like the morning sun.

“We can squeeze her,” she said, without any particular eagerness. She massaged the bridge of her nose. “It’s a pinch, but I’ve done worse at sleepovers. I’ll share with Parvati tonight, and we’ll like, do a rotation, or whatever.”

Daphne gave a small gasp. Hermione stared at Lavender like she’d announced her intention to join the Red Army.

“You’re serious,” said Hermione.

Lavender shrugged. She looked at Parvati, who nodded. Lavender turned back to Daphne.

“Snore once and you’re out,” she said. “I’m not kidding. I need nine hours or I will kill.”

Daphne put a finger in the air and silently began to weep.

“Stop,” said Lavender, alarmed. “Jesus. Your mascara.”

She ushered a kerchief into Daphne’s hand.

“Thank you,” said Daphne, tearfully moved. “Thank you. Oh, thank you,” and he couldn’t tell if it was for the tissue or the other thing.

Lavender, with a dictatorial style befitting a fifteen-year-old girl, directed the efforts to move Daphne's bag and things up to the girls' dorm. Daphne herself bobbed somewhat uselessly in the midst of the crowd, fielding sorrowful looks and sympathetic touches. Katie put an arm around her shoulders, and Daphne fastened herself to the other girl's side with a quick frightful sound, like a current of air might carry her away.

Hermione drifted over to Lavender and spoke in a low voice.

"That was a very nice gesture," she said, with a tad too much surprise to not be altogether insulting.

"Yeah, I know," sighed Lavender. "I'm like, a saint, probably."

"They're not big beds."

"Yeah? And you got straight O's in Transfig for like, what, exactly? 'They're not big beds.' Jesus. Brightest witch of fuck all, tell you that."

"Can you even do an Engorgement Charm? Or did you assume I'd do it for you?"

"Can we go back to the part where you were talking about how totally sweet I was, and not being literally parked directly on top of my arse?"

"Can you — never mind. I just wanted to check that you're sure," said Hermione, and then, with a gentleness never before directed at Lavender: "Because — you know, no one would think less of you if you weren't. You don't have to… prove anything. You know that, don't you?"

Lavender popped her gum thoughtfully. She tilted her head at Hermione, and then smirked.

"No," she agreed. "I don't. But she let me borrow her Maybelline's Magical No-Mess Mascara wand for the Ball, and honestly, Hermione, there's such a thing as priorities."

In the last days of May, as the Third Task slipped into the anxiety event horizon, time moved like someone had cut it with paint thinner. Harry drilled jinxes with Hermione during lunches, coming back to the table with singed fingers and quivering legs. At night, in his four-poster, Draco heard him muttering the incantations to himself before he went to sleep.

In the library, Hermione ripped through old newspapers for clues about the Third Task. Draco told her that it didn't matter, and she agreed with him, but it didn't stop her. She needed something to do while Harry was sleeping. Ron took an unusual interest in these preparations, too, coming to join her in the library, though he would be the first to call these efforts a waste of time.

The event horizon spanned past the ranks of students. Mad-Eye Moody — who had appeared to retain his place on the faculty, immune to whatever Crouch had said or done to him — had made a habit of keeping Harry after class. When Harry caught up with them, he usually had a new list of hexes or counter-jinxes to research, often ones that didn't appear on the curriculum.

"Starting to think Snape might've had the right idea," Ron remarked, when a bark of his name sent Harry hurrying off into the Defense professor's office. "Love the old goat for trying, but he's kind of showing his hand, isn't he? Teachers aren't supposed to help."

"If you believe that, you must suspect McGonagall, too," said Hermione, fighting to wedge her textbook in between old volumes of spell compendiums. Giving up, she stabbed her wand in and Shrank them, wedging them in beside three inkwells and enough parchment to handprint a volume of Dumas. "She let us use the Transfiguration classroom to practice."

"Because she got sick of Potter knocking down tapestries," muttered Draco.

“Yeah, probably,” admitted Ron.

The Monday before the Task brought with it the last double Potions block with the Slytherins, and Hermione was late. Or her equivalent to lateness, which was bustling in a good five minutes before the bell; whereupon she sat down, ignored the (beautifully and single-handedly arrayed) potion kit in front of her, and bit down on her knuckle, so deeply lost in a warzone of thought that he feared for the integrity of her phalange.

“Idle hands are the boggart’s plaything, Granger.”

The countershot about his own hypocritical idleness was so obvious that she could have probably knocked it off in her sleep. She didn’t.

He set down the stirring wand and looked at her.

Her knuckle was starting to blanch from pressure. She was very pale, a mien that he took for fear.

A claw of unease traced down his vertebrae. He leaned between their chairs, lowering his voice.

“Granger?”

She drew a copy of the Prophet, and smoothed it with uneven hands over the potions table. Furtively, he ascertained that Professor Snape was entangled in Neville’s hash of a Phthisis Solution, and then jerked it in his direction to read it.

The first article was a new release from Rita Skeeter, entitled POTTER VS. WARRINGTON: CLASH OF THE CHAMPIONS. The article above it was much darker: HOUSE-ELF ARRAIGNED IN WORLD CUP DARK MARK INVESTIGATION: “JUSTICE DONE,” SAYS NEW SECRETARY.

The elf, which formerly belonged to Lord Sibelius Nott (Chief of Staff for the Minister of Magic), was arrested and faces four charges...

“I see Potter’s no longer the favorite.” He slid it back to her and reached for the stirring wand, keeping his tone level. There were places to discuss that, but Potions wasn't one of them.

Several rows behind them, Theo and Pansy were quietly doing knife work, with swift strokes that fell in almost eerie unison, and conferring in cool low whispers that reverberated with the susurrus of burbling pots. The Potions classroom was a dark, musted, steamy cave of a room, and he blamed it for the sweat that filmed his neck. Daphne was carefully mincing scallions at a table to their right with Parvati, who every so often would peer at her work and wince.

Draco checked again for Snape’s attention and found it diverted. He folded the newspaper in half, leaving Skeeter’s headline intact, and leaned across the aisle.

“Oi. Potter.”

“Hm?” Harry was engrossed in his scallions.

The paper smacked him in the back of the head.

“Ow!”

“Have you seen this?”

“No, see, the problem is, Draco, the back of my head is the one place I can’t see. Confuses me, too—”

“Shut up. Ronald, I’m delegating. Give ‘Seeker’s Reflexes’ over there his news.”

“Sure.” Ron caught the paper before it fell and held it under the desk, scanning it. He whistled. “That old cow,” he marveled. “A week before the Task, too.”

Harry shrugged. “I did tell her to get stuffed.”

“Should’ve used a stronger word, if she was gonna write this anyway,” said Ron. “In for a knut, you know? Let’s see what she says on page seven… oh, good, she’s got a hundred words on Warrington’s pecs. Pass me the scissors, I’m saving this for when I need a laugh.”

“When I need to puke, more like,” muttered Harry. “Draco should offer to introduce her, that’d put her off my case.”

“I can think of no two who deserve each other more,” said Draco, but he was distracted. The line about Cassius’s father bothered him: Warrington (son of Rufus Warrington, the renowned pewter cauldron magnate and senior advisor to the Minister of Magic...

Why was that interesting? Most people in Slytherin had fathers who were either rich, political, or both.

Hermione was silently dicing scallions. She picked up the board and swept them into the pot with a stroke like she was bisecting a jugular.

He drummed his fingers on the table. Warrington had a father at the Ministry. High-ranking. Enough to have Runcorn on a private Floo network, probably. Which would put him in the limited circle of people with knowledge of the Triwizard Tournament. It was a small number. There couldn’t be that many men with seventeen-year-old children at Hogwarts. Nor any as prominent as Cassius. Head Boy, Slytherin Prefect, admitted magical talent.

What went wrong with the Goblet of Fire had never been explained. The Ministry hadn’t told anyone how it worked, had they? They had just hauled it in and said it would spit out a name for every school. There were no established standards of virtue, or even of merit. Well. Dumbledore had suggested them, but that was Dumbledore. Nobody from the Ministry had claimed as such. No one had even said the Goblet necessarily made the decision for itself.

Flora Carrow had known the Second Task was happening in the lake before she was taken hostage. The only person who remotely cared about her enough to say so was Cassius.

Who, of course, could have figured it out himself. All the other champions had done it. He was a Head Boy; he could have taken the egg to the prefects' bathroom any time he liked.

His fingers slowed to a three-four step.

"How did Warrington know about the dragons?"

"Hah?" said Harry, scrutinizing an advert for a new Comet model.

Draco twitched in irritation and snatched the newspaper back. "Pay attention. I'm talking about the First Task. When we went out with Hagrid, Charles said that Warrington had been there 'earlier that week.'"

"...Who the hell is Charles?"

"Ronald's brother? The dragonkeeper? I know your memory's not what mine is, but please try—"

Ron spluttered. "Charlie? "

"—to keep up. Warrington was there before Maxime, before you, and obviously before Krum, by extent. That means he knew about it long before you did. Who told him? It wasn't Hagrid."

"Might've heard about it some other way," suggested Harry, while Ron kept up a stream of muttering.

"'Charles' Weasley, sodding ridiculous, sounds like a pimply old git with sideburns. 'Aye, forsooth, 'tis my oon brother Charles, and yon eldest, William, of the Weasel Clan—'"

"Merlin, do you ever shut up? I'm working to something."

Ron snickered and slumped in his chair, gesturing to continue.

“How did he know? Besides poking around in the forest, which, incidentally, few people outside of you lot are inclined to do unless they have to.”

“D’you mean he had a tip-off? Because Charlie didn’t tell him, I promise you that.”

“I’m saying that he knew somehow. His father’s aide to the Minister. How far up do you think the Tasks were planned?”

Hermione spoke, though she was acting much unlike herself in that she had pulled nothing near her weight in the conversation, let alone the usual two-thirds of everyone else’s. “You think there’s a leak, then.”

“Put it this way: if my father were senior advisor to the Minister of Magic, and I were a Triwizard champion, I wouldn’t let him have a moment’s peace until he’d told me something.”

“Fascinating. Well, that’s a mystery that didn’t need solving,” she said coolly, “but thanks for that.”

“Excuse me?”

“Yeah, hang on,” objected Ron, “if Warrington cheated—”

“Then he’s only done the same thing as Harry, and made use of his resources in an otherwise utterly unfair and barbaric game of blood sport. I don’t know what any of you expect to do about it, besides wish him well.”

“Barbaric!”

“I don’t know about that, ‘barbaric’—”

“No? No?” She threw down her knife. “You think that holding four children for an hour under a lake and daring them not to drown doesn’t count as ‘barbaric’? How about locking them in a cage with a fire-breathing monster?”

“I agree with you,” said Ron tentatively, “but Mione — to be fair — everyone else was seventeen.”

“In the muggle world,” she said, with a hard edge in her voice, “adulthood begins at eighteen.”

“We’re not in—”

“I know where we are.”

They completed their potion in silence.

Hermione’s ability to communicate with Draco in shorthand, previously a pleasant convenience and sign of mutual understanding, now seemed a rather mean-spirited and purposeful way to avoid discourse on any subject, because she declined to answer anything with more than a hand gesture or a certain tilt of her head for the rest of the class.

The walls of Hogwarts always had ears, but they never had so many eyes as when one walked beside Harry Potter. Least of all in the immediate aftermath of the Skeeter article, which provoked an entourage of whispers to accompany him to the Great Hall. Perhaps part of it was the unusual addition of a green tie to their melange, because Daphne had tagged along behind them, talking forcefully and constantly about something to do with Paris and hats.

Her strategy failed, not from any shortcoming of her own, but because in the Entrance Hall someone had planted themselves in the center of the room, redirecting foot traffic around them like a current. The person was Theo. Daphne gave a thin groan.

“Right. I’ve had enough of this bloke,” announced Ron. “I think it’s far past time I saw less of him, to be honest.”

“Don’t, don’t scrap with him, please,” whispered Daphne. “Let’s just sneak past. Can I duck behind you?”

“Yeah, sure. Hunker down. Want my hood?”

“Oh, could I?”

“Daph!”

Theo had seen them. He crossed the hall quickly, sparing a jerk of his head for Draco, with a brisk: “Heard you took a bad fall, chap.”

Draco folded his arms and tilted his head.

Theo paused, his eyes flickering up and down. “What?” he said, a touch doubtful. “Didn’t you?”

Draco narrowed his eyes.

Theo checked over his shoulder and lowered his voice. “Listen. I had words with Goyle—”

“Oh, you had words. When’s your Order of Merlin coming?”

“I — alright, not undeserved, but I straightened them out. I mean, it’s not going to happen again.”

“It’s not going to happen again because they’ll need tweezers for what’s left of him if he tries.”

“Noted. Will you forgive me if I push the quaking and weeping for later? I’ve a tight schedule,” he said. “Daphne. Do you have a moment?”

“No,” said Ron.

“Nope,” said Daphne, gazing at the ceiling.

“A moment, Daphne. Really.”

“No, not one, I’m afraid, my dear.”

“I’m not trying to unburden myself here. It’s a logistical meeting. Twenty seconds.”

Hermione’s patience, none too great on good days, was reaching negative readings. When she stepped forward, he bore very little hope that cooler tempers would prevail.

At the same time, there was a part of him — the same part that had seen her drop Flint with one spell, and often returned to that image in idle moments — that was just as happy to let her at him.

“If she’d wanted to negotiate, she would’ve said so,” said Hermione coolly.

Theo’s hand swept at her, palm-out, as if to try and silo her from the conversation. “Thank you, Granger, for that ever-so-helpful translation of a two-letter word, but I don’t have time to discuss—”

“Good,” she snapped. “Neither do I.”

She drew her wand. Draco moved his hand to his own, and Theo stepped back twice.

“What are you going to do,” he said slowly, “set me on fire?”

“Nott, stop.”

“Teddy, come on.”

“Let him,” said Ron, suddenly, and Draco looked at him sharply. Ron hadn’t touched his wand, but his arms were folded.

Hermione lifted her chin at Theo.

“Maybe,” she said. “Depends how quick you are, doesn’t it?”

She stepped forward. Theo stepped back.

“Being a generous man, I’m going to interpret that as a bit of banter, and not a formal challenge.” He smiled thinly. “Though not for my own sake. In fact, if you put me in the Hospital Wing, you’d be doing me a favor. Most rest I’d have in a year.”

“You’d be very welcome,” said Hermione.

She was angrier than he’d realized. In the lines of her body there was a tension so old it had frayed to web-thin cords, and he wasn’t sure that the person she saw at the end of her wand was Theo at all. If she cursed him, it would be magnificent. It would also be horrible. He ought to have stopped her, but he liked being behind her, not between whatever she was pointing her wand at. He felt the chilled wonder of someone watching a shipwreck at a distance.

But if Theo cursed her, he’d put him on the floor.

Maybe Theo knew it, too, because he put his palms to his head and turned around and took three short steps and then flung his hands at the high atrium. “Fine! Fine! No, that’s perfect! Never mind — listen, if one of you happens to get a word in with Daphne in the next forty-eight hours, would you tell her I called? I don’t have time for this juvenile haggling.”

“That’s a new one,” said Daphne shortly. Theo stilled.

“Daph?”

“I don’t have time, he says? I don’t have time! Wow, are you busy, Theodore? Too busy for me? I hadn’t noticed! You’d only told me once a day for the past always!”

“Shut up,” he said, with a sincere and breathy hurt. “Don’t be simple.”

Daphne shoved through Harry and Ron and stomped in front of Hermione, who slipped her wand away, blinking in surprise. “Go away!” she snapped. “Just go away! Leave me alone, if you won’t have me, can’t you pick one thing or the other? I’m so sodding sick of you and Pansy and the blessed Mission I could just puke at the sight of you most days, you slimy, callous, weaselly, pompous twat!”

“It’s not my fault!”

“Another new one!” she shrieked. “‘Not my fault’? God! I’ve never heard that from Theodore Nott!”

“Greengrass,” muttered Draco, as the crowd began to form a wide hemisphere, offering an arena for what at least some clearly expected to be a fight. He didn’t know if they were wrong.

Reflected in Theo’s wide dark eyes was Daphne’s glower. He held one hand out, and it was unclear what he was trying to do, to touch her or shake her or stop her or just make a universal gesture of don’t hurt anybody, but it was unsuccessful on every score. “It isn’t,” he said. “It isn’t. You said so, too. You agreed.”

“Go piss on a gas fire, honestly! What the hell did you expect me to say?”

“ You still can’t possibly anything is my fault.”

“What?” said Hermione sharply. “What’s his fault? Did Theodore have something to do with Tracey and Millicent?”

“No!”

“Take your nose out, muggle-born,” snapped Theo.

Draco touched his wand. Theo’s eyes flickered at him, and narrowed.

“Shocker,” he said quietly, like an accusation. It was. There was heat on Draco’s neck. There was heat everywhere. Panic licked up the inside of his throat.

Daphne spat. It landed on the floor.

“I hope Harry wins,” she said loudly. “I hope he thrashes Cassius. I hope they put him on the podium and make your sorry father take a lot of pictures with a half-blood. I hope he invites all of his muggle-borns and half-breeds up with him, the veela and the giant and me, Theo, and the Minister has to shake our filthy hands, and I hope he flays the skin off his fingers trying to wash them afterwards.”

She shoved past. He stumbled, and it didn’t look feigned. The crowd parted around her like she had cast Bombarda.

Theo reached out and snatched her wrist. She hissed and tugged.

“Let me go—”

“Don’t do this,” said Theo softly. “Daphne, you’ll kill yourself if you do this.”

Ron lunged forward and punched him.

Shouts, shrieks, an explosion of movement on all sides, and when the struggle cleared the cloud had cleaved around the wriggling nucleus of Ron — writhing to break out of Harry’s clutches — and Theo, who was hunched over in a crouch, trying to hold the blood into his nose.

All this time Hermione had been getting closer until she was standing in front of Draco. When Theo’s head snapped up, there was a red ring on his eyes, and Draco edged his shoulder in front. If he lunged, he could move between them—

What was he thinking? It was Theodore. They’d flown seeker drills on the sands of the Riviera. He’d kissed Narcissa’s hand, and slept on a beach beneath a starry sky.

There was a film on the world, a bad lens, refracting everything funny. This fear, this deep alien horror in the midst of the familiar, it wasn’t school. This wasn’t how it felt to be here. It was Hogwarts, but it wasn’t. It was his friend, but it wasn’t. His fingers were cold as the nitrogen shackles they clasped on Azkaban inmates and he could feel his wand-handle folding his palm in half.

“Alright, touché,” said Theo, in a voice so brittle you could crack it with a fingernail. “You really did get me. Going for Daphne? Low blow, I wouldn’t have seen it coming. I’ll give you that one for free.”

“Nott.”

“Actually — never mind. Give my best to your mother. If you can find her.”

“What?”

But Theo sidestepped them and vanished down the stairs to the dungeons.

Draco nearly went after him. It took Hermione grabbing his wrist to stop him from tripping down the stairs, his brain hazed with dread.

“Let me go.”

“No, I won’t.”

“Did you hear what he said?”

“It was a taunt. It doesn’t matter. He only said it to be cruel.”

“How do you know?” he demanded, but she shook her head, obviously reluctant to say what they both knew: she didn’t.

Daphne’s breath shuddered. Draco glanced at her, but she was staring intensely and nakedly at Ron, who was quietly wiping a bit of blood off his knuckles.

“Ronald,” she began, faintly.

Harry bellowed. He clapped his hand to his forehead and screwed his eyes shut.

“What’s wrong?”

“Harry?”

“Potter, what’s the matter?”

“Scar. It’s… it’s a bad one.”

Daphne perked up. “Do you need some ointment?” she said, rummaging in her bag. “I always carry some. My scars act up when it rains.”

“Not like that.” He cringed with his whole body. “It’s like… it’s a headache. It doesn’t hurt like normal.”

She paused, ointment pot in hand. “Are you sure?”

“Yeah. Yeah, I’m fine.” He shook it out, blinking, and then flinched away from a group of Hufflepuffs who were gawking. Draco gave them a black look, and they scattered.

Lunch had been well-scoured from the tables by the time they found their plates, and the last quart of a tureen of spiced seafood soup was meagerly split amongst them. Draco ate nothing and scraped his spoon in loud fractals along his dish until Hermione tired of it and Summoned the instrument across the table. The food was bad. The mood was worse.

When the dishes vanished there was a collective breath of relief, though it shriveled up and died a sad death when Dumbledore stood up and clapped for attention.

“Good afternoon! Tarry, please, before your next classes; I have an announcement.”

“Merlin,” muttered Ron. “What now?”

“There has been a minor adjustment in personnel,” he cried. “Mr. Ludo Bagman has been called away on urgent business, and he will not be able to join us for the third and final installment of the Triwizard Tournament. He sends his regrets and the very best of luck to all four champions."

There was a small detonation of porcelain down the Gryffindor table. Fred had dropped his teacup.

"Being that Mr. Bagman served not just as commentator but adjudicator for the Tournament," said Dumbledore calmly, "his role must be fulfilled with a neutral ombudsman to ensure that the balance of judges remains fair. Should it be necessary, Mr. Odin Davis will fill his place as a judge if Mr. Bagman's business prevents him from returning to Hogwarts before the Third Task."

"Oh, Christ," said Hermione, with a venom that surprised everyone.

"Quiet, please," said Dumbledore calmly. "Thank you! Mr. Davis will arrive on Friday morning. We appreciate his service very much. In the meantime, I will let the champions continue their preparations. Good afternoon."

He released the podium, and retreated to the high table. Daphne threw down her spoon.

"Who the hell is Odin Davis?" said Harry, with the resignation of someone lifting a rock he expected to house many worms.

"He's an auror," muttered Draco. "And a lapdog of Sibelius Nott, lest you nurse any hopes of fair adjudication."

"Put those to bed in September, mate."

"What I don't understand," said Hermione, slowly and tautly, "is how Nott can possibly have that level of influence on the Tournament."

"Political corruption? Well, Granger, it's quite simple if you want to get into it, it starts and ends with having cartoonish amounts of money—"

“No. Listen. Crouch is the head of International Magical Cooperation, which is jointly running the tournament with Games and Sports. That’s two people he could pay off, and Padfoot says Crouch wouldn’t take a bribe, so I believe him. That leaves Bagman, who just left—”

“Hermione, Lord Nott is the Minister’s Chief of Staff,” said Daphne, not unkindly. “I don’t know who Mr. Padfoot is, but perhaps he’s not wholly in possession of the facts. It may not be like this for muggles, but here, the power system’s quite hierarchical. It’s very easy for him to have a say.”

“I know that, thanks. What I want to know is why Nott would care enough to throw his weight around for the Tournament. I mean, yes, yes, the optics of it all, the politics, and so forth, but they just replaced the Secretary of Law Enforcement and concluded a major investigation, so you’d think they had bigger fish — and Draco, I agree with you, I think Warrington probably is cheating, which raises the question of who at the Ministry is helping—”

“Oh, of course he is,” said Daphne. It was followed by a silence like a rimshot.

Draco raised his eyebrow at her. “Something to share with the class?”

“Theo’s been helping him all year,” she said. “That’s what half of those League events are, is strategy meetings for Cassius. They bring in Ministry blokes and talk about it. Takes a village.”

Four stares leveled her with enough joint force to raze a building.

“That slimy shit,” whispered Ron.

“Huh,” said Harry thoughtfully. “No wonder he was ripping mad when I tied him for first.”

“Are we surprised?” said Draco, intrigued. “I’m not. I inferred that was happening, anyway—”

“I inferred,” said Hermione, “that the Slytherins were helping him, not that the whole Ministry was involved.” She seemed to be trying to fuse her jawbones together by pressure.

“I thought you knew,” Daphne said apologetically, mostly to Ron. “Sibelius Nott has simply oodles of money, that’s how he and Rufus Warrington know each other. I happen to know the Ministry has a backdoor shipping arrangement for the Warrington Company, which is why they killed that bill last September.”

“So Davis is going to pull for Cassius, and that’s that,” said Ron. “Harry hasn’t got a chance. Essentially.”

“Unless someone puts Davis under Imperius,” she agreed. “Mr. Warrington owes Lord Nott enough money to mortgage Gringotts, twice. Not an uncommon situation, I hear, for most people at the Ministry! Nott is loose with principals and tight with interest. My father said he’s an absolute goblin when it comes to gold.”

“Pejorative,” said Hermione, quietly, staring at the table.

“Yes,” said Daphne, “he tends to be.”

“That’s how Runcorn took office, isn’t it,” said Ron, in a stroke of cogence. “Nott bought it for him. Basically.”

“Or funded his campaign, rather, yes. Called in a frightening number of debts to do it, too,” she said, reaching for the tea. “I’m sure that little Floo call had a lot of family accountants walking out of high windows. If he’d had to do another radio advert, I think the national economy would’ve tanked.”

Hermione put down her fork and knife. She stood up and picked up her bag and calmly, without complaint or explanation, walked out of the Great Hall.

There were three seconds where four seats remained at the table.

Daphne fretted. “Did I say—”

Draco threw down his silver and stood up. He turned to the table and opened his mouth, temper short, for the shortest excuse he could muster, but—

“Go on,” said Harry quietly. Behind the screen of his glasses, his eyes were cool and startlingly clear. Ron inhaled, and Harry cut him off with a jerk of his chin. Something passed between them. Ron cleared his throat and went back to his soup.

It occurred to him that while Ron might not understand anything — nothing, truly, not one fiber of one thread of it — that lay between Draco and Hermione, there was a great deal he didn’t know about Ron and Harry, either.

Draco made quick work of the distance to the doors, spotted the tail of Hermione’s cloak vanishing up the grand stairwell, and followed it. This course took them up a course of increasingly cramped staircases, which he followed until the sixth, seventh, eighth floors of the castle were spinning away below him in fractals under the bannister, and up the last rickety spiral to the Owlery.

The Owlery was a round stone cask of a room, riddled like a honeycomb with owl berths, from whence a panopticon of great dark eyes peered cooly and judiciously at whatever stirred the door. Straw papered the floor in patches striated with brown, redolent with the acidic reek of all animal keeps, and through the rough-hewn slots in the stone, the queer and changing light of a spring afternoon in the highlands rolled in errant waves over the hills.

Crouching in front of the window was Hermione, a sheet of parchment on her knees, a quill in hand, and some volume of ink already starting to bleed from her haste in writing. She was struggling with it, too, and made soft little noises of frustration whenever the materials failed her, like an agitated cat.

He shut the door. The lock clicked at the touch of Colloportus.

“Oh,” she said, without turning. “You.”

He didn’t know how she had known. His footsteps were dampened by the straw.

“Rather.”

That earned him a cursory glance. “What are you doing?”

“Girding myself to ask you the same question.”

“I’m writing a letter.” She dotted an I, viciously. “To Madam Portia Magnussen.”

“Of the Allegiance for Muggle-Born Wizards.”

“The same.” She swirled something ugly and blotted that might have been a signature. “To see if she can do something about this.”

“...Namely?”

“Mimsy. The house-elf.”

The straw floor was mobile, and it perambulated around the room unobtrusively, rustling in a stray whip of wind.

Hermione shook her head. Her quill was going to crack any minute.

“Listen—”

“They framed her,” she said quietly.

“Yes, and everyone intelligent knows that. No one thinks that a house-elf could summon a Dark Mark, it’s absurd.”

Finally she put down the quill and turned her face up at him. It was small and writ in anguish, and with her kneeling, the distance between them seemed long.

“That’s worse,” she said faintly. “Surely you see how that’s worse.”

“How?”

“Because it means nobody cares.” She was shaking in the hands, but not in the voice. That was steady. It almost always was. “She didn’t do anything wrong, but they’re going to send her to Azkaban anyway, because it’s easier than trying to go after someone really dangerous. And nobody gives a damn.”

“That’s not true.”

“Yes,” she said, louder, “it is.”

“It isn’t.”

“Don’t be dense, I can’t stand it right now.” Her voice cut through his. “I’ll have a row with you, if you like, I’m serious, I’m so far beyond caring you don’t even — because they don’t care. I know they don’t! Because I’ve lived in this world for years, and I know how it works, and they don’t care! They don’t!”

Owls cast off from the parapets, racing the echoes of her voice into the long shadows of the afternoon.

“Fine,” he said shortly. “Have it your way. For the record, I’m not unsympathetic. But this isn’t the time—”

“You’re going to tell me I need to keep my composure?” Her serenity was like a faceful of cold water. “You really needn’t worry. I’ve a lot of practice by now.”

“That’s not what I was going to say.”

“Yes, it is.”

“No, it’s not.”

“Yes, it is. Here’s another one: ‘Granger, don’t be ridiculous.’ ‘Granger, don’t be extreme. ’ Well, I’m not. I’m stating the facts. Mimsy is going to Azkaban for a crime she didn’t commit, and the Ministry is going to say it’s a problem of beasts and wizards, instead of muggle-borns and purebloods, and the person who did it is never, ever going to be caught.” Her hands were white knots. “Never. And then it’s going to happen again.”

“Granger.”

“And then, after that, it’ll happen again. And again, until someone dies, and they’ll say, ‘this was a tragedy! This was a shock!’ But it won’t be. And then it’s going to happen again, and it won’t be as shocking. Because these things happen. And so on, and so on, and then, one day, it won’t be a tragedy anymore. And maybe, that time, it’ll be me.” She shrugged, a jerky little movement. “And they still won’t care.”

He set his jaw and turned his head to stare out the window. He was beginning to feel sincerely angry in ways that made it difficult to look at her.

“If you tell me to keep my composure,” she said, very even and calm, “I’ll never speak to you again. You’re my best friend, and you’ve saved my life, and I’ve saved yours, but if you don’t believe me, I have nothing else to say to you.”

He had a terrible sense that he could say something just then that would hurt her, and that it could break whatever was between them, and it was one of the rare moments when she was angry enough to let him. If he did that then there would be nothing afterward.

No: not nothing. In fact, he could see the path very clearly. He would leave her there and walk down the stairs from the Owlery to the dungeons, and he would go knock on the door and ask for Theo, who would come out, maybe with Pansy, and they would shake hands and he would understand everything without needing to be told and Draco could stay there as long as he wanted without ever saying what it was that had happened. He could spend the rest of his life doing that, if he wanted to. And Theo and Pansy would never ask questions and they would always be kind, because they liked him, and they understood parts of him that he hoped to God Hermione never understood, even though it was part of the reason that she was angry at him.

The idea frightened him badly enough to make him clamp his jaw shut. As if it might come out without him meaning to. His hands were shaking.

Maybe he wanted to do it. Part of him did want to do it, in fact. But thinking about it made him feel dizzy and outside his own body, like watching some other creature use his own hand to pick up a knife and drive it very slowly and gently into his own heart.

“What?” she demanded. “Say something.”

Breathing was the only thing he could do without shaking, so he focused on it.

“I don’t know.”

“You don’t know… what?”

“I don’t know. What do you want me to say? I don’t know what I don’t know. Would you give me a minute?”

She turned toward him, took in his face, and whatever she saw in it made her take a slow step in his direction. “Draco, tell me what’s wrong.”

Anger to concern in three seconds or less. That was Hermione, for you. Textbook case. First chapter, first page. He could have laughed.

“Nothing.”

“No, not nothing, it’s obviously not nothing. Talk to me. You always do this, you lock down and you don’t tell me anything, and it makes me feel like I'm outside of my own friendship, so just say—"

"What's wrong is you keep buzzing in my ear."

Fuck. He closed his eyes and sucked his cheek between his teeth and bit down, hard, until he could taste blood instead of acid, and at least that pain was predictable.

"Excuse me?"

"Nothing. It's nothing. I didn't mean it."

She didn't say anything.

"Granger."

"Do you know," she said suddenly, like pond-ice cracking, "I had a row with Ron about you, after the Second Task."

He tipped his head back and let the feelings happen to him. Maybe if he didn't try to fight the discomfort it would leave him alone. Like playing dead.

"Another one?"

"Yes. He came to apologize to me, and he was pretty nice about it. He'd made a whole list of the things he'd done wrong. A list! Ron! 'Because I know you like lists.' That's what he said. And he said he wasn't going to fight with you any more, because he knew it made me unhappy, and he didn't want to do that. Even though, he said, he didn't like the way you spoke about his family, or mine. And I said: 'Neither do I.'" She shook her head a little, as if marveling at it.

"Merlin's sake," he said lowly. "Now? Really, now?"

"And he said—" she lifted her voice— "he said, 'I don't blame you, but why don't you say something about it, then?' And I asked him what he meant. And he said, 'well, you let him get away with it, and you don’t let me.’ And then I got angry. ‘Because it’s not fair,’ I said. ‘He tries.’ And he said, does he? Does he really try?”

“I would prefer to leave Ronald out of this conversation, if we’re going to have it.”

“And I said yes. And anyway, it’s not all his fault, I said, when he’s never been around muggles, it’s hard to understand.” She wet her lips, the tiniest of hesitations. “And he said, ‘Neither have I.’”

Well. There it was.

“Fine.” It was clipped. “Perfectly fair. Good observation. Shall we make a list of the qualities I have that Ronald lacks? For parity?”

“Stop it.”

“Start with how I can hold a conversation with you for more than ten minutes on a subject of your choosing, instead of mine—”

“You’re dodging.”

“Or try how you like me because I’m worse than him, how about that? You like it. You like that I’m meaner than you are, too, because it makes you feel better, because you can’t stand the idea that you might not be the best person in any given room, and I’m your one friend who’ll never fight you for it, aren’t I — Malfoy, he’s the ”

“Stop trying to pick other fights,” she said steadily. “We can have that one, but that’s not what we’re doing now. And stop making this about Ron. It isn’t about him.”

“Though perhaps you’d like it to be.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

“It means what it means. You have a bad habit of comparing us. I notice that Potter never gets a column in these sorts of tables. Why’s that, I wonder? Never made it in the running, did he? Poor kid.”

There was a beat.

“That’s a remarkably nasty thing to imply,” she snapped. “That’s — remarkably nasty, even for you.”

“Yes, well.”

“I compared you to Ron because — because he pointed it out! Because he brought it up! But frankly, you know, if you’d like to go there—”

“Be my guest,” said his mouth, for some reason, while the rest of him violently disagreed.

“—then it’s not the worst comparison in the world! Because unlike you, Ronald has made every effort to make me feel welcome. Outside of Hogwarts, I mean, in the real world. In his home. And it’s funny, because I can name every member of his family, and I didn’t even know how you and Sirius were related until Remus told me.”

“Hang on,” he said, with a very unkind edge of laughter. “That’s lovely. That’s just perfect. So when I don’t know about your family, it’s my fault, but when you don’t know about mine—”

“I’ve told you about my family! Draco! You know their names! You know what they do! You know my cousins, and my aunts and uncles, and you know that I’ve got two cousins and family in Leeds, and my grandfather’s deaf, and my grandmother thinks I go to a special ed school because when I come back over the summers I don’t know basic muggle curriculum, and my mum’s heartbroken because she can’t tell her the truth, and last July we got in a fight and I called her a muggle and she hasn’t looked at me the same way since!”

The owls were screeching at them, agitated by the sound of yelling, and the flutter overhead silenced them both momentarily.

“You didn’t tell me that,” he said. Hermione sucked in breath like she was dying for it.

“Maybe not!” she said tightly. “Maybe not. But I don’t even know what your father did for a living. Besides ‘be rich.’”

That rankled.

“That’s not equivalent.”

“Uh huh.”

“What he ‘did for a living’ was being Lord Malfoy. Anything else was a courtesy position at best, and the title certainly didn’t matter. I don’t think I even knew it.”

“Is that supposed to make me feel better?”

“Frankly, yes.”

“Oh? That’s all? When my parents ask where you live, the best I can do is a radius of two thousand kilometers.”

He couldn’t help but scoff. “What, like they were going to visit?”

She barked in laughter and stormed over to the window, her hands knit in her hair. “No! They couldn’t! As you’ve made perfectly clear! No one from my family has ever been invited to your house — even though your mother said she’d invite me, which I was thrilled about, by the way, and I waited all summer for the chance, but that’s not really your fault, because even I can admit I was being a daft idiot with delusions of — delusions of I don’t know what — but that’s alright, I thought, at least I have met his mother, that’s something, though Theodore Nott still apparently knows more about her than I do! So there’s that!”

“You’re not entitled to know my mother.”

She whirled on him. “I’m not entitled to know Molly Weasley, either,” she spat. “But I do. Very well, in fact.”

He turned his head like she'd struck it and breathed and focused on that, the breathing. And the biting down. His cheek was numb so he bit the other one, until that was numb too, and his mouth was full of copper.

Hermione took a sharp breath and swept her hand over her cheek, subtly, like she didn't want him to notice.

In his head he was standing in the Slytherin common room, and Theo was there, and they were shaking hands — and Cassius had an arm around his shoulders, and Flint and Crabbe and Goyle and Millicent Bulstrode were laughing and smiling at him, with him, and there was no part of Draco that didn't feel dead.

"There are parts of this world that are dangerous to you."

She dropped her hands and waited. By and by, she frowned.

"I'm sorry," she said acidly, "is that supposed to tell me something?"

"There are parts of my life that are dangerous. To you. My family isn't like the Weasleys. And," he said unevenly, "the reason you are not acquainted with my mother is not — it has nothing, you understand, nothing to do — with what she thinks of me."

Hermione paused.

"Is that why?" she said. "She hates muggle-borns?"

There was a hard silence.

"Well, I knew that," she exclaimed.

"Granger—"

"Is that all? You were scared she'd be mean to me? That's your answer, honestly? After four years at this school, you think I'm afraid of your mother?"

“Let me f—”

“I mean, maybe,” she said, belligerently, “maybe, yes, I am, but I’m sorry, and your mother seems like an imposing woman and all, but if she’s not going to actually, literally curse me — unless she is, in which case, you might have said—”

“Maybe it’s not about you,” he said sharply, pivoting from the window. “Did you think of that? Did that occur to you? Maybe there are some things that do not, in fact, come down to how Hermione Granger feels about them. Do I astound you?”

“Really! That’s rich!”

“Yeah? Touch a nerve, did I?”

“You’re a real hypocrite!”

“Am I.”

“And you have some nerve suggesting I’m selfish, when everyone in Gryffindor if not the castle knows you’re a greedy, caustic, overbearing narcissist!”

He ground the heels of his hands into his temples.

“But you know what? Fine! I trust you,” she said, and though it was scathingly acidic, it was still sincere. It was a little helpless, in fact, with how sincere it was, and it made him feel odd and nauseous and weak in the legs, which was horrible. “Tell me, then. Enlighten me as to what it is about the way you treat me that supposedly has nothing to do with who I am.”

“My mother is mad.”

He wondered whether it was possible to perform a Tongue-Severing Curse on oneself.

Hermione was staring at him. He didn't dare look at her, but he could feel it, just the same.

"She has — episodes. She thinks she's in the past. She forgets the past decade, at least, sometimes more. She calls me 'Lucius.' Sometimes," he said, "it takes hours for her to remember where she is."

Hermione wet her lips.

"Snape doesn't know how to cure it," he said. He braced himself on the window, suddenly exhausted from the strain of simply existing in the world as it was. "His professional opinion is that it's impossible. To cure her. Even if we knew what she has, which we don't. There's no other symptom; it's not a curse, it's not a spell, it's not a haunting, it's not any disease known to healers. But sometimes she doesn't know who I am." He slipped his hands in his pockets. "That's why you haven't met." He jerked his head at her. "And the fact that she hates muggle-borns."

Hermione pressed her lips shut, and covered them with one hand.

"I'm very sorry."

"Don't be. She hates you," he said swiftly. "Not even you, personally, Granger, but you as a category. As a concept."

"She's your mother whether or not she's a good person, and that's still awful. It's allowed to be awful for you and awful for me at the same time."

He probed the cut in his mouth, and the pain was a solid thing, unimpeachably real.

"In the muggle world," she said, carefully, "there are doctors who focus on treating mental illness. There are things you can do. Therapies and medications."

“Yes?”

“Many of them are quite effective.”

“Doesn’t matter.”

“No?”

“Not if it’s muggles.”

She folded her arms. “That’s absurd.”

“Yes.”

“She’d refuse help—”

“Yes.”

“Hurting herself, hurting you, rather—”

“Yes.”

“What if it was you?” she demanded. “What if you were sick, and the only cure came from muggles? What would she do?”

He had to think about it.

He had to think for a long time.

Hermione scoffed in disgust. “You’re not serious.”

“Am I dying?”

“You’re not serious.”

“It’s germane. Am I dying, or could I survive?”

“It doesn’t matter!”

“To you.”

“You’re her son!”

“Which is why it matters.”

“You want me to believe that your own mother would let you suffer to make a point about blood purity. That’s how important it is, to her. More important than her own son’s happiness.”

“Than my happiness? Fathomlessly.”

“Well, that’s incredibly stupid,” she snapped.

He recoiled.

She was fucking impossible sometimes, actually impossible, she couldn’t wrap her head around anything that didn’t already fit in there. He wanted to grab her and shake her until she saw stars and sense. His head was a hot dark room full of creatures with teeth.

“It’s not stupid. It’s how my family’s stayed alive—”

“Which has really worked out for them, hasn’t it,” she shot back, and then froze.

But he wasn’t angry at her. What he felt instead was a startling prick of relief.

Because she was impossible. Impossible and ferocious and a lot meaner than anyone gave her credit for. But that was what he would’ve said, too.

Because she was impossible, but it was nice to know that he wasn’t insane. That it wasn’t a ludicrous idea, that thought, and though it stung like salt on a scrape, it was real, and it was honest.

They fought in the same way, dirty, heel to cranium, wands and hands. When it didn’t feel awful, it felt nearly clean. It felt good, in the same way that it felt good to get your thumb on a bruise and push.

He started to laugh. He put his hand over his eyes, and laughed, and it felt good.

“I didn’t mean that, Draco.”

He rolled off the wall. “You did, but it doesn’t matter,” he rasped. “You’re right, anyway. My father’s dead. Fifteen generations of pureblood lineage, the greatest fortune in wizarding Britain, and they knocked him off like they were putting down a dog. Which gives you just a preliminary fucking suggestion,” he said, his voice low and dark and cold on purpose, “of what they’ll do to you, if you let them.”

Her throat moved; he watched it. It was the worst possible time to want to touch her.

“Your position being, essentially,” she said, “that I should run far away, and stick my head in the sand, and let the purebloods sort these matters out for themselves. Like you’re all so good at doing.”

“My position being that you should be frightened.”

“Done,” she said briskly. “Anything else?”

He ground his teeth.

“My position being, more specifically, that you should act like it.”

“Not on your life.”

“Granger.”

“I chose to be here. You don’t seem to understand that,” she said, with a dreadful false calm. “I could stop coming to Hogwarts, you know. I could go to school anywhere. My mum would love me to. But every year, I come back, even though I know it means danger and nightmares and Hospital Wing visits and possibly dying, probably dying, one of these days, and that’s fine, because at least I get to choose how and when I face the people who want to kill me, and I choose now, and always, and with my eyes open, thank you!”

“The wrong choice, in other words.”

“Wrong?” Her voice vaulted into nonexistence. “Wrong!”

He snarled at her. “Yes, wrong, and if you want to stake your life on every sorry creature you find, and run headfirst into every Killing Curse, I can’t very well stop you, but I don’t want it on my hands when it comes back to you.”

“On your hands. On yours. So it’s about you, is it? What you can live with?”

“That’s right!”

“Once again, everything’s about Draco Malfoy, the only victim, the only one with anything to lose—”

“Yes, actually, Granger, the decisions I make do tend to be about me. I apologize if that offends your sensibilities.”

“It’s all about you?”

“Yes!”

“ All about you.”

“Yes.”

“Alright! Alright, fine! Explain that, then. What’s so awful,” she snapped, “what’s so very bad for Draco Malfoy? Hm? I don’t think anyone’s lining up to kill you because of who your parents are. What about this is scary to you?”

They were standing very close together. The warmth coming from her body seeped through the front of her shirt. It was the worst of all possible times to remember what her hair smelled like.

“You need to back off.”

She didn’t. “Are you scared you’ll get shunned by your Slytherin pals? That you’ll end up like Sirius? Pretty frightening, isn’t it, not having a mansion to run home to?”

“Stop it.”

“Make me. Tell me. Go on, do it. What can’t you live with? Say it.”

“Stop it.”

“Tell me! What’s so worrisome to you? What, if I’m dead? Make it easier for you, wouldn’t it?”

There was a thin, feeble string of something, somewhere in him, of name and nature unknown, but whatever it had been, it was gone now. He moved and she was moving and then he wasn’t and he had pinned her against the wall.

She made a noise. With one arm he crossed her collarbones; she couldn’t very well move, though she didn’t try. Her eyes were wide but her heart wasn’t fast, merely stubborn, drumming gently on his skin. If he’d startled her she swallowed it and any fear with the same platinum bravado she’d shown a Hungarian Horntail, five feet even of hair and glower, and if she’d ever been scared a day in her life it would shock anyone looking at her.

He hadn’t meant to hurt her, only to make her stop talking.

“Don’t you ever—” He was floating somewhere in the hot white brainspace where coherent sentences collapsed from gravity.

She swallowed.

“Don’t,” he said, finally, which was, after all, a complete sentence. “Fucking— don’t.”

“Don’t what?”

“Hermione.”

His tongue made a curse of it. It was a snarl with a bilabial. She went still with a stillness to match the stone at her back, like he'd struck a tuning fork.

Her eyes were so large that the stars in them had orders and constellations. Rhythms and relationships. Her freckles migrated during the winter, but one always stayed on the swell of her cheek. He thought about that, sometimes. He thought about its range of motion, which was great, because she had an inordinately expressive face, and the long course from rage to happiness could take that freckle almost everywhere, right up to the corner of her great smiling eyes. All of her was in there, really, right in the stupidly large deer eyes, where once every so often he — not anyone else — not as well as him, anyway — could peer in and see whatever her mind was doing, for a moment, like glancing through a series of telescopic lenses at the perfect moment to watch a star bloom.

What her mind was doing now, namely, was getting well and truly angry. Once or twice he'd wondered if he was ever so transparent to her, but he didn't think so. His face didn't have the same open affect. The idea was queasy and indecent, like walking around offering a handful of marrow to whoever came by.

Reading her was not an intellectual thing any longer, not really. It was more of a muscle, or a retained sense, like riding a broom. If he lived to one hundred and ten years old, he would remember these things from Hogwarts: the western underhand, and the full Windsor, and what Hermione Granger's face did when she laughed. Even if they never spoke again and she went off to live fast and die stupid in her glorious justly wars and he went to live a very long, relaxing, comfortable life full of people who were nice to him, that was something he'd have to walk around with, all those little expressions — what her fingers did when she was worried, how she touched her mouth in thought. He would die knowing that, probably. One way or another.

She worked her mouth. That was another one.

“I’m sorry,” she said, after a while, though none too happily.

“Yeah?”

“I didn’t mean that.”

“Yeah.”

“I get— you know how I get.”

“Yes,” he said, “rather.”

She touched his wrist, and he eased off.

Owls crooned a mournful harmony. The wind came into the reopened space between them and hollowed it of warmth.

“If it’s ever up to me,” she said, “I’m taking you to a muggle doctor. I’m sorry if that upsets you. But I don’t give a damn about your family’s legacy. You’re too important to me, and I’m not going to let you be hurt by anybody, even if you love them. Your mother can deal with me if that upsets her.”

I’m not going to let you be hurt by anybody. He couldn’t think of the last person to make him that kind of stupid, dangling, big-hearted promise. Certainly none that he’d been capable of believing, and he did believe her. That was the stupidest thing of all. It was a silly, impossible promise, and he seized it and locked it up in his heart, preening over it, like it was a piece of solid gold.

But one couldn’t just say that kind of thing without perishing of embarrassment afterwards — that was a ‘deathbed confession’ sort of item, a ‘letter from the deceased,’ sort of item, if anything — so he said, “If I’m ever mortally injured, I would consider it a sign of esteem if you did not assail my mother while I lie bedridden.”

“Noted,” she said, which was not a promise and he did not fail to notice. “If I’m ever mortally injured, by the way, you should feel free to take me to the nearest doctor, magic or no.”

He shrugged, which was also not a promise. If she were mortally injured, he would be gunning down the doors of St. Mungo's, and her parents could take it up with the unfriendly end of his wand.

"I don't care," he said, with great effort, "that your parents are m— aren't magical."

She lifted her head and fixed him with an owl's stare.

"It isn't—" He paused, working his jaw. "You — a certain sort of person — it isn't like — at a certain point, it becomes impossible—"

"Draco?"

"You are," he said, measuring each word carefully on his tongue, "the finest magical talent of this or any generation." He paused again. "The world that produced you is beyond reproach."

Hermione made a stifled, horrible sound. She spun to her right, abruptly, shoving her hands into her eyes.

"What," he said, alarmed. "Granger?"

"Nothing! Nothing! Shut up! I'm fine!"

"Merlin. Would you give a man credit for trying? I'm doing my best here — I know it wasn't Keats—"

"I hate you," she said into her hands. "Oh, God. I'm going to bawl my eyes out, and it's going to be so damn embarrassing, and it's your fault. Why did you have to say it like that, I'm going to cry, oh God—"

"Fine. As you like, I'll say it the stupid way. 'Rah, rah, muggle rights,' et cetera, and listen, I'm frankly not behind you on all of it, you're still going to have to hard sell me on autobomiles."

"Automobiles," she said wetly, "you absolute idiot, it's automobiles."

"That's what I said."

“It is not what you said.”

“It is precisely and exactly what I said.”

“Never mind, you’re annoying again,” she said, but she wasn’t near crying anymore, so he could stop pretending he didn’t know the word.

“I shouldn’t have said that, about dying,” she said, after another pause.

“No.”

“I don’t think,” she began, and frowned. “I don’t think that of you. I never would. I know that if—”

“Let’s not.”

“Yes,” she said, somewhat relieved, “alright, sure.” She tilted her head at him, and then smiled, a little, a crooked expression that probably could have made him jump out the window if directed. “In any case, I’d want to spare you ‘the disastrous inconvenience of finding a new potions partner.’”

She did her imitation of him. It was, as usual, hilarious.

He did not, as a philosophical matter, take life in its concept as a series of irreversible moments; he preferred to think that his options remained generally open, and his course changeable, like a ship given to adjustment by its rudder, rather than a carriage down a series of one-way lanes. But there were some moments in a voyage, inevitably, when one occasioned to look back, and he saw how far the shore now lay — and realized, more or less concurrently, that to row back, to change course, now, would mean wrestling the brute arm of the wind.

‘Traitor’ was a word with a classical pedigree. He happened to know it was the same in French. Traitre. As in traître de sang. As in mort aux traitres. In fact, the root was so old it came from the Anglo-French, who had only nicked it from Latin, anyway: from traditor, from tradere — to hand over. To submit. Surrender.

There were always worse ways to ruin one's life.

"Are you offended? That was a joke, Draco. I didn't actually mean it. And honestly, I thought it was pretty good, mys— what are you doing."

The last bit was muffled by a squeak. He stepped into her and put his hands on either side of her head and held her that way, uncertain of what else to do; he had slashed fuel lines to the part of his brain that governed that sort of intellectual decision-making. Her hair was never unsurprising in its softness, more like chiffon than anything else.

"Hello?" she said, bewildered.

Her hair moved when he exhaled. It stirred back and forth in the tide of their shared breath.

Daphne had made it look much goddamn easier than it was.

So he looked her in the eye and said, "If you die before we get our N.E.W.T., Granger, I'm going to learn necromancy just to make you watch me do it without you."

"You should be so lucky," she said, and he had to credit her nerve, because she hadn't pulled away, not a little bit, not even flinched. Which meant that either she wasn't bothered, or her stubbornness didn't permit her to show it, either of which was equally credible, unfortunately. "I'd still get top first as a ghost, and we both know it."

It was really outrageous, now that he was allowed to think about it, how bad the temptation was to kiss her.

The sides of her face were warm in his hands, and turning warmer. The Owlery had a chill.

Someone pounded on the door.

They were on opposite sides of the Owlery in record time. They might actually have broken some sort of land record, or Apparated; certainly lightspeed had been approached.

“OI! LET ME IN! ARE YOU IN THERE?”

“Alohamora,” he snapped, and the door whipped around on the next blow from the intruder’s boot, hammering the wall with a gong that lifted a small parliament from the rafters, hooting in distress.

Pansy stalked into the Owlery, radiating triumph from her battle with the door. “There you are,” she exclaimed. “My God, wear a bell, would you? I’ve been giving myself a stitch.”

“Parkinson, what the hell are you doing?”

“Great question! I’ve had plenty of time to rehearse my answer, in the several years it’s been since I left the Slytherin dorms!”

Hermione began rubbing a small circle on her temple, discreetly.

“I’ve been trying to find a Gryffindor with a brain cell and enough patience not to jinx me for the tie I’m wearing,” she snapped, “which, unfortunately, limits my options to two, and they both decided to distance themselves from me with literally the largest possible number of stairs! And yet! And yet! Selflessly, I persisted. Why, you ask, I do not know; certainly it was not in my interest, nor the interest of my thighs, which will have to be sectioned and auctioned for meat, so little use to me will they offer after this miserable trial—”

“Not to be rude,” said Hermione rudely, “but do you have a point?”

Pansy sniffed and thrust out her hand. In its clutches rested one more-than-slightly crumpled fold of paper.

Draco took it. It was a page torn from a book, complete with a page number and a title partly obscured by an inkstain. One paragraph had been circled, thrice, in black ink.

“‘...the use of Portkeys can circumvent normal magical permission thresholds, such as Anti-Apparation fields or Floo wards. Because the Portkey creates as a temporary extradimensional thoroughfare between two locations, it does not activate traditional magical defenses against ingress or egress, since the enchantments do not perceive that the wizard has traveled: merely disappeared. Evidence of Portkey enchantments can be detected through a routine magical diagnostic—’ Sod this. Parkinson, see Granger: is there a point?”

“Search me,” she snorted. “Theo said it was important. He was ripping mad, too, and late for a meeting with his father, so you should be flattered he took the time to write a note.”

“He didn’t.”

“Did too, you dunce, turn it over.”

He did. On the back of the page — scrawled in the white box under the end of a previous chapter — there was one word, underlined, in the blotted scrawl of a man with time for no other.

CUP

Thank you, thank you, thank you. Next chapter, going up next Friday: "Into the Labyrinth."

Into the Labyrinth

Chapter 52: Into the Labyrinth

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

“Hm,” said Daphne. “Not very helpful.”

“A fitting epitaph for Theodore Nott, in general,” said Draco. “If I outlive him, I shall take pains to inscribe it on his grave. Granger?”

Daphne passed the artifact to Hermione, who tucked it into her journal. “Thank you for that verdict,” she said dryly.

“I’m sorry, my dear, I don’t know what you want me to say.” She folded her hands in contrition. “There’s just not a great deal to work with.”

They were clustered in a corner of Gryffindor Tower that was as close to hidden as you ever truly be, in Gryffindor. May’s loveliest day drenched the alcove in sunlight so thick it was almost viscous, turning white on the varnished tabletop, warming the stone floors. Discarded robes and jumpers adorned the back of each chair. Harry and Ron lolled in the window seat, passing a pocket snitch back and forth, the tiny glint of gold like a darting firefly in the sunshine. Hermione had rolled her sleeves up and thrown her hair into one of those tiny metal claws, her wand notched behind her ear.

“Could he be asking us to set up a Portkey?” She drummed her fingers in thought.

Draco was rolling his wand around his fingers, making an intricate figure-eight. He’d figured out how to do the knuckle thing, and the effect was desirably impressive. “Where?” he said. “For whom? And why would he ask us?”

“I don’t know. He clearly wants you to know about it, so it must be important to you somehow.”

“Are you sure that he meant it for you?” Daphne pillowed her chin in her hand, curious. “It’s not addressed.”

“Parkinson almost broke a door down to deliver it, so I’d say so.”

“No, but she’s right,” said Hermione thoughtfully. “Pansy said ‘a Gryffindor.’ She went looking for you because she knew you, not because Theo told her to.”

“Hey, A-Team,” said Ron, yawning. He pitched the snitch sidelong at Harry. “Glad you’re all having fun, but this bloke does actually go here, yeah? He lives downstairs. Just go ask him.”

“Oh, thank you, Ron, why didn’t we think of that?”

“I dunno, but hey, you’re w— ow!”

She retracted the newspaper and arched her eyebrow at him.

“Nott’s gone,” said Draco. He intercepted Harry’s toss and vaulted it overhand at Ron, who nearly keeled out of the seat for it. “Hasn’t been in for three days.”

Harry frowned. “Is he sick?”

“Well, he’s not on a field trip.”

“Pansy says he hasn’t come back to the dorms,” said Daphne worriedly. “I suppose he’s gone home, but I wouldn’t have expected it. He’s never been sick before, and he refuses to see Pomfrey for anything.”

“And he was obviously in a hurry when he wrote this.” Hermione’s fingers drilled on the desk. “Which makes me think he knew he’d be gone for a while. And wouldn’t have a chance to tell us whatever he meant in person, at least before it mattered.”

“A good point,” said Draco, “which ferries us no closer to understanding what he actually meant.”

“I don’t know that that’s even possible, based on what he’s given us. One word and a page of a book on Portkeys isn’t exactly Agatha Christie. We don’t even know that ‘cup’ is the right word — it could be an abbreviation or an acronym.”

Ron caught the snitch and then leaned on his cocked knee. “Hang on,” he said, gesturing at them with the ball. “This is Theodore Nott, yeah? Rich prick? Daddy’s boy?”

“Only by default,” said Draco.

“He’s nice, sometimes,” muttered Daphne.

“Right, yeah. That one? He hasn’t done bugger-all for you or me or Harry, ever. Why are you so keen on what he’s got to say?” Ron was disbelieving. “This is the bloke who’s been helping Warrington cheat, remember. I’ll bet anything he’s just trying to distract Harry before the Third Task. Mind games, mate.” He tapped his forehead. “S’what I’d do.”

Draco wrinkled his nose. “Because Potter famously attributes his success to his diligent work ethic.”

“Nah, but he knows you and Hermione are probably helping him, right? Gotta be. And he knows you two like a good puzzle, which the Third Task isn’t, so all he’s got to do is offer one.” He snapped his fingers. “Distracted. The both of you. And if I’m him, and I want Warrington to win, that’s my first priority. Getting you two out of the way.” He shrugged, and then leaned back into the window. “But I’m not a genius, so what do I know.”

“I’m flattered, Ron, but I sincerely doubt Theodore Nott thinks about me at all,” said Hermione, with an edge of amusement.

Daphne, meanwhile, blinked at him.

“That’s a very good idea,” she said. “Ronald, why weren’t you in Slytherin?”

“Told the hat I’d off myself,” said Ron grandly, casting the ball high over Harry’s head.

“A shame,” said Daphne, presently. “You’d have been lovely.”

“I think Ron’s right,” announced Harry.

Draco caught Hermione’s eye and touched his chest, feigning shock. She smirked.

He tilted his head at her. As usual, a warm sensation happened in his chest and unfurled in billows under his ribs — but he was coming to know quite well how far it could progress before it tempted him to do anything about it, i.e., at which point it became a nuisance. So he could enjoy it until then. Then, when the temptation to smile became considerable, he averted his face.

He could manage this. All things could be tolerated, one way or another. It was a question of dosage.

“We know which side of this thing he’s on, and it’s not ours,” Harry added. “I’m not talking about the Tournament.”

Daphne made a fretful sound, but she didn’t disagree. Draco tipped his chair back, balancing on its hind feet, and carefully held his tongue.

With a sweep of her arm, Hermione cleared the table of her notes and the conversation. “Alright,” she said briskly. “Fair enough. We’ll sidebar the Portkey question until after the Third Task, or until Theodore comes back for us to ask him. In the meantime, Harry, you should’ve been drilling the Impediment Curse an hour ago.”

“Aw, Hermione, I didn’t mean now—”

“On your feet,” said Draco, throwing back his chair. Unlike Harry, he quite liked drilling sessions; it was rare that he got the chance to shoot jinxes at someone without Hermione shrilling at him, and even rarer for her to stand there and holler at the other person while he did. It was a highlight in an otherwise dreary and confusing week. “You, too, Weasley, there’s no reason you shouldn’t know it. And we’re drilling Patronuses, after that, so you can give pointers.”

“Speaking of which,” called Harry, jogging her chair, “would you show us that jinx from last week? The wobbly one?”

“The Jelly-Legs Jinx? It’s fairly simple. The aim is the trickiest part, because you’ve got to hit a joint, or the effects won’t be as strong.”

“You know, that makes ever so much sense, and I’m glad you said so,” said Daphne, idly putting her arm through Hermione’s, and steering her out. “Because I’ve struggled for ages with mine, and I always went right for the shins.”

“No, that’s where you’re wrong. It’s a common mistake, though, so you shouldn’t feel badly about it. Flitwick explained it all to me in office hours, it’s best if you go for the knees, because that’s the major joint, although the ankles aren’t terrible, either. In fact, the anatomical component is fascinating—”

It wasn’t. All the same, her explanation of the Jelly-Legs Jinx, rich in detail and useless context, lasted them to the Transfiguration classroom, where Harry became intimately acquainted with the anatomical component of quite a few other curses, including a sensational number concerning distal phalanges that Draco had discovered that morning over tea.

For all the rest of that week they were harried and sleepless, soldiers in arms marked by the dark circles under their eyes — even Draco’s, to his horror, for any tarnish on his complexion was rather as ink on parchment — driven up late by efforts to prepare Harry for the un-preparable. In the back of classrooms, they read spellbooks instead of the day's lessons, leaving Hermione to throw up a hand and cover whenever someone was called on; during meals, Harry scarfed bites of sandwich while dancing through jinxes from Draco's wand; at night, when Hermione and Daphne retired to the girls', Harry stayed up with Ron, their fretful murmurs moving through the parted curtains on Harry's bed, and sometimes Draco woke to hear twin sets of snores from the four-poster.

Hermione didn't help; the night before the Third Task, she ordered everyone to bed at nine o'clock, which meant, naturally, that Harry lay awake muttering to himself for three heinously unrestful hours, instead of doing anything useful, like letting Draco jinx him. Not that Draco didn't try; a quarter after midnight, he executed the most productive Langlock of his young life.

He must have slept, but it felt like no sleep he'd ever known. Instead, he rolled over, closed his eyes, and opened them to thin fingers of sunlight walking their way through the latticed window of Gryffindor Tower.

A cohort of Ministry wizards roved up the lawns like a pack of migrating bluebells. The dew reflecting on the pale sun-washed lawns was so bright it made the black of their shadows seem violet. He watched them congregate around the quidditch pitch, talking amongst themselves, until the grass had sweated out its crown of frost, and the sunrise ended with a cataclysmic blossom of pink in the east.

It was the day of the Third Task, and it was beautiful. It was odd how the mornings of his worst days always seemed so lovely, like the world was trying to convince him of something.

An hour later, a host of the same purple robes appeared in the Entrance Hall, milling around and generally obscuring foot traffic through an intently traveled region of the castle, which caused in Draco the strongest political leanings he'd felt all week.

“Couldn’t have done this sooner,” Hermione muttered, shoving her way between a pair of gossiping bureaucrats, “would’ve killed them to set up on a Saturday, I suppose?”

“Remember this, when you’re Minister,” he said.

“Remember what, exactly? ‘Don’t stand in doorways’? I had that locked down in primary school.”

“That,” he said, “and anything that gets between the masses and their daily bread will tend to be unpopular.”

Ron exclaimed: “Oi! Perce? Is that you?”

A redhead in a rich purple Ministry robe, suit acceptable, haircut atrocious, turned away from a passel of scowling administrators and peered over his spectacles. “Ronald,” he said, with chill dignity. “It’s good to see you.”

Ron ambled over to his brother. “Didn’t know you’d be here, you git! Why didn’t you write?” He slung an arm around Percy’s shoulder.

Percy made a noise like parchment shredding and disengaged himself. “Please contain yourself,” he snapped. “I’m at work.”

“Merlin. Fine. Didn’t realize I had to file a permit to hug you, prat. Anyway, what’s with the robes? Where’s Crouch?”

“I no longer work for Mr. Crouch,” he sniffed. “I’m a legislative advisor to the Wizengamot.”

“You’re what? You? Why? When?”

Percy’s eye-roll ought to have strained a nerve.

“I suppose you mightn’t have read the papers,” he said, “but Lord Runcorn has seen fit to remove Mr. Crouch from his position.”

“Crouch was fired?” said Draco sharply.

“Yes. And quite rightly, too! His management of the tournament has been an utter disgrace — allowing a second champion to compete, let alone a fourteen-year-old — Lord Runcorn was furious, especially for your sake, Harry,” Percy added. “It was outrageous to make you compete. A clear sign of senility and judgment compromised by pressure — honestly, I was shocked Lord Runcorn didn’t remove him earlier—”

“What are you talking about?” Ron was incredulous. “You were all up Crouch’s arse last year.”

“I worked for him, Ron,” said Percy, in the tones of someone so exhausted by another’s stupidity that even condescension was too much effort. “I did my job. Let’s not exaggerate.”

“You bit Fred’s head off for calling his mustache funny!”

“I never did more than my due. Lord Runcorn agreed, and he put me in contact with Lord Selwyn, who found a position in the Wizengamot — he said that a bit of legislative experience would round out my profile, and I quite agreed—”

“Selwyn?”

“Selwyn!”

It was rare that Draco and Ron were aligned on any subject; it prompted Harry and Hermione to stare.

Hermione said, “Who?”

“Lord Selwyn is a member of the Wizengamot,” said Percy, impatiently. “A senior ranking member, at that—”

“He’s a Cavalier!” Ron stepped into his brother’s face. “He’s the enemy, Perce, what the hell?”

“Oh, please. He’s a public servant.”

“That’s Runcorn’s party, Hermione,” Daphne whispered. “Very traditional. My family’s Cavs, if that tells you anything, and so’s Draco’s—”

“I know who they are,” she said shortly, “thanks.”

“—barmy puffed-up ponce! At least Crouch was a Pop! Have you told Dad?”

“If Father has any sense, he’ll be pleased that one of his sons is making something of himself,” said Percy, purpling unpleasantly. “And he never liked Crouch, anyway.”

“At least Crouch wasn’t trying to fire him! They just sacked Bones, how can you help them?”

Percy threw a panicked look over his shoulder and seized Ron’s collar, hauling him away from the other Ministry workers in a startling show of strength.

“Listen to me,” he snapped. “Keep your voice down. Those people are important men, back there, and I’m making great headway into a position that would let me do real work at the Ministry. If you ruin this, I swear you’ll regret it.”

“Make me regret it? You’re threatening me?”

“You are in no position to speak loudly of such matters. That is all I am saying.”

He still had Ron tight by the collar, leaving a pink line on his throat. Draco decided he had had enough of that. If too many people fancied they could run around yelling at Ronald, it wouldn’t feel fun when he did it.

“Off.”

Percy stumbled back when he was pushed. Draco shook out his hand and planted it on his hip, above his wandsheath.

“Gentlemen don’t roughhouse in public,” he said coolly. “Congratulations on your new position. Give my best to Lord Selwyn, and tell him my mother appreciated his Christmas card.”

Then he steered Ron into the Great Hall, which Harry followed expeditiously. Hermione bobbed at his side, muttering to herself.

“—Crouch only days before the Third Task, what are they playing at? No wonder nothing happened with Moody! I expect he didn’t get the chance!”

“Voice down, if you please. I’m fairly certain Percival is still watching us.”

“Oh, bet he is,” whispered Ron, with faint jubilation. “Bet you just ruined his week. But also: seriously, mate, you get Christmas cards from members of the Wizengamot?”

“No, and if I did I’d bin them, Selwyn’s got no class and less sense. He hasn’t had a committee assignment in seven years. It’s a shame your brother doesn’t realize he’s being stuck on a shelf for safekeeping.” Between the breakfast rush with the exchange students about, finding seats at Gryffindor was next to impossible. Instead of complaining, however, he elected to take what Hermione called a ‘solutions-oriented’ approach, and dealt a hard kick to the bench, scattering a gaggle of first years from their seats.

“Stuck on a shelf?”

“To keep him quiet about Crouch,” said Hermione slowly, sinking into her seat. She was too lost in thought to scold him. “Percy knew what Crouch was doing better than anyone. If Runcorn fired him for a suspect reason — like going after Moody—”

“Or anything, really. It’s probably the same sweep that got Bones and Diggory,” said Draco, reaching for the teapot. “Runcorn’s cleaning house. Which reminds me — Ronald, I’d advise your father to mind his P’s and Q’s in the next few months, and keep his head down, if possible; they won't fire a pureblood if they can help it, but all they need is a whisper of a legally viable pretext."

Ron swallowed. "Right. I'll tell him."

"I don't think it was a sweep," said Hermione.

He filled his cup and dosed it with cream and lemon. "Of course it is. Bones has been a Populare for years."

"But they're not random firings. Diggory's came out a few months after his son started seeing a half-blood—"

"Speculation, but continue."

"—and Bones was cut a week before they closed the Dark Mark investigation. That's bizarre, isn't it? If you think about it? She would have overseen the whole case, start to finish, all the evidence, all the testimony, and for months there wasn't a word about it, nothing! Not even a suspect! But then she leaves, and a week later, they've finished it? Not even 'breaking developments,' just: 'look! We've arrested someone!'" She stabbed the table for emphasis. Silver rattled. "That's not how an investigation works. Not in the muggle world, anyway."

"You think she wouldn't have closed it?"

Hermione's finger almost assassinated a jam jar. "Better. I think she had a lead they didn't like," she said intently. "I mean, a house-elf? Really? You yourself said it wasn't believable even to people who hate house-elves, and you'd know—"

"I resent that, thank you!"

"—so why bother? Unless you needed a reason to tell everyone involved to stop looking?" She sat back, faintly glowing from satisfaction, and then, nodding to herself as if she'd just solved a puzzle, she reached for the tea. "Anyway, if Crouch was poking his nose into maladministration with the Tournament, it's not farfetched to think he would have stumbled into the cheating scheme for Cassius."

He swatted her hand away and poured her a cup. "So, to be clear," he said, "you're taking the firing of two political operatives in entirely different branches of the government to be evidence of an illegal conspiracy to commit miscarriage of justice and conceal the identity of a domestic terrorist, a charge that you levy against persons no less significant than the Minister of Magic himself."

"Yes."

He shrugged and passed her the sugar bowl. "Alright."

"Alright?"

"Yes, alright. It doesn't make a difference," he said, "because you've got no proof, and if you're right, having proof would only put you in danger, so I'd rather we didn't pursue the possibility. But theoretically, you could be correct."

"I don't even know how I'd prove it," she said, frowning.

"Did you hear the part where I said it was a bad idea to try?"

"I suppose I could write to someone in the Department of Law Enforcement. Or ask Percy for a look at Crouch's daybook."

"Of course, I understand how you could have misheard me, I was only looking straight at you when I said it."

"Actually, I should just write to the Minister's office, shouldn't I? Why not be direct? Do wizards have citizen's arrest?"

"Granger," he said, appalled, but then she gave him a flat look. He scowled and broke into muttering about mean-spiritedness.

Daphne and Ron were snickering; Hermione snorted a laugh of her own. “Really,” she said. “I mean, really. ‘Citizen’s arrest’? You thought—?”

“Before you proceed, recall that you have nowhere near the track record to mock me for taking that suggestion seriously.”

“Oh, please. Name once—”

“Horntail,” he said, cutting her a sidelong look. She flushed.

Then — very maturely, with the dignity befitting a young woman at the top of her class — she stuck out her tongue at him. He made a face and kicked her ankle and presently his kidney was reacquainted with a long-lost friend, her elbow, which made him hiss and glower at her over his tea for a good while, sulking. But a bit later — Harry was recounting the story of how they’d solved the egg to Daphne and Ron, apparently because Daphne had asked — Hermione gave a little smirk when they reached the part about the prefects’ bathroom, just a quirk of her mouth into her tea, and her ankle connected with his.

He twitched like she’d slapped him. Daphne cut him a curious glance, and he gestured to ignore it. Her eyes flit to Hermione, and then back to Harry with suspicious speed.

Draco cleared his throat, and she moved her foot away.

He still fancied her when she was being annoying. It was horrible news. A dismal forecast for his dignity. He’d expected to come out of this ordeal with some version of his self-respect intact, which was increasingly looking like a pipe dream.

“Potter!”

Harry popped his head up brightly.

Professor McGonagall strode down from the faculty table. “The champions are congregating in the antechamber after breakfast,” she said. “The champions’ families are invited to watch the final task. This is a chance for you to greet them.”

“Oh,” said Harry.

He didn’t move. McGonagall cleared her throat. He fiddled with his napkin.

“I apologize for my ambiguity,” she announced. “I will rephrase. Potter: get up, and go greet your family.”

“B— okay.” He slowly peeled himself out of the bench, moving sluggishly, as if with enough time she might forget about him, and go bother someone else.

Abruptly, Ron gripped his robe and hauled him back down. “He’s not talking to the Dursleys,” he said loudly. “If they want to talk to him, they can come in here, and do it through me.”

Harry cast him a look of blinding gratitude.

“An admirable sentiment,” said McGonagall crisply, “but I told Mr. Potter to come greet his family, and I will not tolerate rudeness in the members of my House.”

“But professor—”

“Mama!”

It was the unmistakable croon of Fleur. She dispatched from a flock of Beauxbatons students and went flying down the aisle, bowling over unfortunate underclassmen with every step, and vaulted herself into the arms of a tall and staggeringly well-shaped older woman in the entrance.

And there — shoulder to shoulder with a pair of tall, slender blondes whose sneers savored of the Bordeaux region, and a scruffy, short family of dark-haired people with familiar glowers — stood a nervous Arthur and Molly Weasley, dressed in their least shabby set of clothes. Bill leaned on his father’s shoulder, sporting an earring and a ponytail and whatever you called the opposite of a Sunday best, grinning.

Harry did not so much stand up as erupt from his seat, trip over his shoes, pinwheel into Professor McGonagall, and then clear off down the aisle at such a speed that it appeared his own legs were struggling to keep up with him.

The resulting embrace was vast, sappy, and overwhelmingly ginger. Ron loped after him, and whatever transpired after that was mercifully inaudible, though there were tears and exclamations and intense hair-ruffling, and in the wake of it all, Professor McGonagall strolled over to chat, smiling a terribly decorous little smile.

“Oh, how darling,” said Daphne, leaning on her fist. “I didn’t know he was adopted.”

“Neither did he,” said Draco.

Hermione gave a tender sigh, and he rolled his eyes.

McGonagall ushered them out, making to clear the entrance. In his last glimpse of the Weasleys, Molly had found some fault with Harry’s tie knot, and was fussing at it while issuing a scolding; Harry was beaming.

Breakfast finished shortly thereafter, plates shimmering out of existence at the order of the hour-bell. When they departed for History of Magic, the champions and guests still lingered in the Entrance Hall, shepherded by a small coalition of faculty including McGonagall, Dumbledore, and Snape. Beside Cassius, there stood a man with a mustache and sideburns that threatened doorframes everywhere, and this man was saying something to Snape that made the Potions Master balefully contemplate the middle distance.

As the three of them passed, Viktor Krum glanced over his shoulder and noticed them at the foot of the staircase. Abruptly, he broke off a sentence in Bulgarian, stepped away, and waved, calling: “Zdraveĭ, Her -mione!”

Hermione stopped, pinked, and waved back. “Zdrasti, Viktor,” she called. “Good to see you.”

He took another step toward them. Draco eyed the distance between them and irritably wondered how close he needed to be to make himself heard. He had lungs the size of church bells, it wasn’t near.

“Her -mione, you vill be coming, yes? To the Third Task?”

“I think everyone is,” she said, “but yes.”

He shuffled his feet, nodding stiffly. “This is good,” he said, “this is very good. I vill see you, then — later.”

“I’m sure you will,” she said, dramatically flustered, and just then the dark-haired boy beside Viktor’s parents burst into a chitter of annoying, pubescent laughter.

“Боже, Ти си такава девствена. Виждал съм прасета с повече чар—”

Viktor turned sharply. “Млъкни, идиот.”

“О? О? Слушам: Her-mione! Her-mione! Nyeh! Така звучиш— ai!”

The boy ducked the urgent sweep of his brother’s arm, then rocketed off across the Entrance Hall, while the Bulgarian national seeker gave chase. The two eventually tumbled into a flurry of limbs at the foot of the grand staircase, which resolved in the younger boy squalling and shrieking with glee as his older brother, cheeks aflame, hauled him into a firm and well-earned headlock.

“My goodness,” said Daphne, peering over Hermione’s shoulder. “I hadn’t seen him up close. He is handsome, isn’t he?”

The stares she received were withering on both counts.

“Goodness gracious. Can’t a woman can’t have eyes around here?”

“No,” snapped Draco, and she went off to Charms in a snit, which made two of them.

The day passed as the night before had: quickly and involuntarily. The distance between classrooms had never been so great. Partly because anxiety was infectious, and people kept interjecting to offer Harry their opinions on the Task, or the Skeeter article, or whatever else crossed their head; celebrity seemed to mark him, inexplicably, as a subject for testimonial. Two seventh year Gryffindors asked to shake his hand. A group of Ravenclaws came to express their earnest hope that no matter what happened, he would take second place.

At dinner, Harry and Ron were once more escorted away by McGonagall to sit at a special table for the champions and their families, adjacent to the faculty. Ron appeared to enjoy this very much, and struck up a vigorous conversation with Viktor Krum’s father, to his right, while Bill chatted easily with Harry on the end of the table, apparently blind to the intrigued looks that Fleur sent him throughout the meal.

After three courses of cream-of-parsnip soup and braised beef and trifle, Dumbledore announced the schools would be departing to the quidditch pitch for the Third Task, and the resulting surge of movement was vast.

It was all quite surreal, Draco thought, perhaps because there were so many people, but also because the evening itself did not quite admit of the possibilities that were approaching: it was cool and temperate, the sky a lavender bowl scattered with silver, and the fresh warm wind carried the scent of wild jasmine and heather down from the empty, gorgeous moors. The lawns thronged with people like a school of fish, moving with one mind of such intensity that it barred dissent; the few who tried to swim against, and turn back for any reason, were swept aside and buffeted far off course, before they had any chance; and yet the crowd's one babbling voice was breathy and light from anticipation, anticipating the entertainment that would ensue. It was like they were going to see a play. The stage was there; the audience in high spirits; the weather compliant. The production had been executed flawlessly. It remained only incumbent on the actors to deliver.

In his stomach there was a small cold node of worry, but he set these feelings aside. They had done all they could. There was nothing more inside their power; if he had failed, then anyone would have. It was this comfort, and Hermione's circulation-killing grip on his arm, that kept his step light and his expression indifferent on the way down to the pitch.

"Draco," called Hermione, hopping up on her toes, "where's Harry? Can you see him?"

"Coming down last, I expect, with the other champions. Why?"

"I didn't say good luck, earlier," she said anxiously. "I didn't think that it would be the last time — I thought I'd get to — and then at dinner — but I didn't think of it. I thought there'd be time for it."

"I'm sure he knows."

"Yes, but I didn't say so! And — and! I found an easier version of the Trip Jinx this morning, and I thought I'd told him the incantation, but I don't remember. I want to make sure — I want to tell him."

"Because that'll really even the odds, won't it, a Trip Jinx."

"You don't know what's in there! Neither do I! It could! And even if not, I don't — I'd still want to — I mean, you know, if he doesn't…"

Her lips pursed in a fretful knot. She stared at him, plaintively, with eyes so wide and entreating that one would think she was asking him for a kidney.

Apparently, he'd have given it to her.

"Merlin," he said wearily, "fine. The champions enter from the lockers, we'll go wait for him."

"Oh. That would be — yes. Perfect. But how are we going to… I mean, it'll be locked, isn't it?"

"Do you remember your first exposure to tandem flying?"

Her lip twitched. "With Gryffindor's only Reserve Seeker?"

Never mind. Find her own damn kidney, she could.

"Third chaser, thank you," he said crossly, and shoved through the crowd.

The east and south turnstiles into the locker rooms had been sealed up to direct traffic into the stands. Slipping through the padlocked gate was much harder than it had been when he was eleven, especially since it was warded from the outside against Alohamora — but it was also much easier to scale than it had been then, besides which, he had benefited from watching an eleven-year-old Harry Potter do it first, after which failure could not be tolerated. He dropped neatly down on the other side and charmed the lock open from the inside, holding the gate for Hermione to hurry in.

The turnstiles were frozen, so he vaulted on neatly and turned back. Behind him, Hermione feinted at it twice with a grim expression, palms pinning her skirt to her thighs, like it would soon try to bite her.

"Up you get, go on."

"I can't."

"I've seen you clear more than that with a werewolf at your back and ill-fitting robes."

“Yes, but back then I wasn’t — I wasn’t dressed. I’m in a skirt.”

“Is that all? Merlin’s sake. I’ve already seen your pants.”

Her cheeks could get brilliantly red.

“You looked?”

“No, I didn’t — that’s some mind of yours, you know, that would assume — but the point of it was —never mind. Sod this. Come here.”

“What? What are you doing?”

“Helping,” he said shortly, and held out his hands. She raised her arms and he hoisted her up by her waist, depositing her on the turnstile. Her legs swept up and he hooked his arm under her knees, lifting her altogether.

She yelped and grabbed him. One of her hands got his shirt, and the other got his hair. He winced.

It was a warm day. She wasn’t wearing tights. The skin on the back of her knees was softer than skin had any right to be. She was easy to carry, too, and he could swing her around in a way that made her yelp and grab his shirt like she meant to use it as a ladder, her hair everywhere, flush everywhere, and this was, actually, maybe the worst idea he’d ever had, dragons and werewolves and all.

He turned her around and tilted her on her feet. Her skirt rode up as she slid down. That was fine. She had faint tan lines on her legs, actually, right above the ruffled hem on her thigh, and that, also, was strictly her business, and certainly not the kind of thing a gentleman would remember, or think about when he was supposed to be doing other relevant things, like walking in a straight line.

“You might,” she said, “have given notice.”

She forcefully tucked in her shirt where it had slipped out of her waistband. Militantly professional, was Hermione. Especially about appearances. If she knew that one of her socks had ridden down, lapsing just under the knee, then she would've attended to it immediately, instead of allowing the discrepancy to distract her peers.

"I do beg your pardon," he said, sidestepping her. "I thought we were short on time. Next time, jump."

"Prat."

"Prat who's doing what, now?"

"Helping," she muttered, none too gratefully, and they headed to the champions' tent.

Floodlights filtered through the stands, peppering white keyholes over carpets of sawdust. It smelled of wood and peat smoke and cigarette butts, and thunder pounded from the footsteps of hundreds filing into their seats, as well as the trumpet of fanfare. It reminded him of the World Cup, but with none of the same easy thrill; this was anxiety, not entertainment, not sport.

In the champions' tent, there was a much larger crowd. It appeared that some sort of reception was being held, because there were at least a dozen Ministry officials, plus half of the faculty, and the champions' families, and — of all people — Ludo Bagman, in the worst shape of his life.

He had dropped at least a stone and the loose flesh sat low on his jowls. He direly needed a haircut and a night's rest, if not a Calming Draught: he kept jumping whenever someone spoke to him, and flinched away at the sound of his name.

"What happened to him?" Hermione whispered. "And why's he here? I thought Dumbledore said Mr. Davis would be replacing him—"

“He might be. He’s here.” Draco nodded at a dark-haired man in an Auror uniform. “Bagman must have finished his business.”

“But what happened—”

“Draco? Hermione!” Ron pressed through the crowd, holding a flute of something blue and fizzling. He beamed and gave them both a one-armed hug, which Draco permitted only to honor the solemnity of the occasion. “There you are! Look at this! Cracking, isn’t it? They’re going to let us watch the Task from in here, they’ve got another Spell-O-Vision thing — d’you want to see? I know Mum and Dad would have you if you want to stay.”

“We just came to say goodbye to Harry,” said Hermione. “Speaking of which— where—?”

“Harry? Oh, I dunno, he’s probably hiding somewhere. Been dodging Skeeter all night. When he wasn’t dodging Bagman, that is. I think we’re right about the gambling, you know, Mione, I don’t care what Padfoot says; he’s been on Harry like white on rice ever since we got in, trying to get him alone.”

“Skeeter’s here?” demanded Hermione. “Who let her in?”

“Dunno, since Dumbledore said he revoked her pass. Anyway, she can’t do much harm from here; Mum’s got her locked in a conversation about Celestina Warbeck.”

A drumroll broke out over the stands, and the Bulgarian national anthem blared. “Oh, reckon they’re headed out soon,” said Ron, pointing at the Spell-O-Vision. “They’re starting the anthems. Better find Harry soon, if you want to — let me get Bill, he’s got good lungs, he can holler—”

“Don’t bother.” Harry popped out of thin air, wearing his red Hogwarts competition uniform, thoroughly disheveled. Ron yelped and upset his drink.

“Sorry,” Harry breathed, shucking his Invisibility Cloak. “Been hiding ever since Skeeter showed up. Between her and Bagman, I mean, really— oh, hello, Hermione! Draco! What are you doing here?”

“Saying goodbye,” said Hermione anxiously, “and — and good luck, and everything, and — by any chance, do you remember the jinx I taught you this morning?”

“The Trip Jinx?”

“Yes!”

“No,” he said confidently. “That’s alright, though. I’ll do fine, I reckon.”

“Oh, God — listen, take out your wand, we’ve got time for practice—”

Another horn blared.

“We really don’t,” said Harry apologetically. Then he squeezed her. “S’okay. Show me afterwards, alright?”

“No — I mean, yes, of course, but Harry, I mean, please—”

“Be careful?”

“Don’t die,” she said, wringing her hands.

“I understand this is a high standard,” added Draco, “but you have excellent tutors.”

Harry snickered. “Arse.”

“Pissant.”

“Pedant!”

“Peon.”

“That’s not even an insult,” said Harry, wisely, “that’s a kind of poem. You’re not the only one who knows posh things.”

Draco sighed.

He held out his hand. Harry shook it.

Then Hermione, possibly feeling left out, gave him another hug. She was interrupted by a throat clearing.

“Oh, give us a moment, for the love of Pete,” she snapped, “we didn’t get the chance to say goodbye!”

“No,” agreed Viktor Krum, “ve did not.”

He swelled out of the crowd like a mountain attempting a stealth attack. With his arms folded, he nearly doubled Draco in size. Draco still liked his chances.

Hermione choked back an undignified squeak, and sprang away from Harry.

“Hello,” said Viktor, after an awkward pause, directed vaguely in the three boys’ direction. Ron scoffed.

Draco folded his arms and shifted his weight onto one hip.

“I do not suppose,” Viktor began, eyeing Hermione.

“And you shouldn’t,” said Draco.

Viktor’s fingers drummed on his bicep. At length, he turned to Hermione. “Speak privately? Yes?”

“Erm — no. No! I mean — I’d like to, but — but can’t we do it after? It’s going to start in a moment, and I really came to say goodbye to Harry.”

He nodded and then, surprisingly, gave a little smile. “You are not being distracted,” he said. “Loyal. Hearty girl.”

“I — well, that’s very sweet, thank you, but it’s really—”

“I am thinking of this, in advance,” he informed her, and he offered her an envelope. She took it tentatively, like she was inspecting it for anthrax. “I am speaking to Karkaroff, and he is making exception for me. To the rules.”

Hermione’s head snapped up. “You’re joking.”

“I am not good at that,” he said comfortably.

“What about the International Statute of Secrecy? They’re muggles!”

“Then they vill like it very much, I think. You vill come now, yes? To Durmstrang? Bring your parents?”

“They’d — love to,” she said breathlessly.

“And you vill, also?”

“Yes,” she said, stunned, and Viktor smiled, then, for real: full and truly, like a seventeen-year-old boy catching the first real stroke of good luck in his life.

Draco reached for his patience, summed up every ounce that remained to him, and did nothing to Viktor Krum but sneer.

“CHAMPIONS!”

Bagman’s voice ripped through the tent. Viktor and Harry both winced.

“TO YOUR MARKS!”

“Right,” said Harry. “Okay. Well! Goodbye. See you on the other side.”

He and Viktor headed to the front of the tent, where they stood shoulder to shoulder with Cassius and Fleur. Then trumpets shrieked, the flaps wrenched back, and they strode forth as one into the floodlights.

Hermione took a sharp breath and grabbed his wrist. He turned to look at her, and the flush had drained from her cheeks, now turned grey and lusterless as chalk.

He looked down at the place where her fingers braceleted his arm. He carefully twisted his arm — she slackened her grip, drawing away — and he caught her hand before it went, sliding their fingers together. Her pulse careened against his wrist, and he pressed their arms together, curtaining their hands with their robes.

Then he turned back to the Spell-O-Vision screen before he could see her reaction.

The floodlights cleared, and there was a smattering of yells and applause as the four champions swelled to life, echoed by the thunder of greeting from the stands above.

The Third Task was a maze. Twenty feet of hedge so densely packed that it resembled an ornate green wall more than any plant nature ever touched, crowned with a sheer silver film of Anti-Sensory Charms that floated like fog over the dark lattice. Before the four champions stood four gates, each wrought from a different metal, and each marking a different entrance to the maze.

Madame Maxime led Fleur to stand in front of the iron gate, where they stood with their noses at identical lofty angles to the air. Krum and Karkaroff stopped in front of the copper, Krum surly and silent, Karkaroff whispering hurriedly in his ear. Dumbledore hung back with Bagman and Davis while Professor Snape stalked alongside Cassius to the golden gate, and McGonagall — with one hand clamped firmly on his shoulder, for whose benefit it was hard to say — steered Harry to the silver.

“LADIES AND GENTLEWIZARDS! FOR THE THIRD AND FINAL TASK OF THE TRIWIZARD TOURNAMENT, I GIVE YOU: THE LABYRINTH!”

The stands quaked. Draco winced and cast a Silencing Charm on his own ears, but it barely held for a moment.

“THE TASK IS SIMPLE! AT THE HEART OF THE LABYRINTH RESTS A SPECIAL REWARD. THE CHAMPIONS WILL RACE TO ACQUIRE IT!”

Hermione hummed thoughtfully.

“What?”

“Nothing. No — no, it’s nothing. It’s just… did you ever read the rest of that book on the Greeks? The one that Viktor left us?”

“I was rather busy brewing you a Sleeping Draught, as I recall.”

“Yes, yes. That’s fine, I’m sure it doesn’t matter; but when he said that, I just remembered… Labyrinth isn’t just another word for ‘maze,’ you know.” She was frowning. “It’s a very specific maze, in Crete, and the thing inside it… it’s not a reward.”

“PROFESSORS WILL BE PATROLLING THE OUTSIDE OF THE MAZE! IF AT ANY POINT, ANY CHAMPION REQUIRES ASSISTANCE, ALL THEY MUST DO IS SEND RED SPARKS IN THE AIR,” Bagman sounded faintly hoarse, “AND THEY WILL BE RETRIEVED! I REPEAT, AT ANY POINT WHATSOEVER!”

“Oh, good,” said Hermione, with feeling. “Finally! Where was this in the First Task, honestly? He can just shoot up red sparks as soon as he gets in!”

“If he’s got any brains at all,” Draco agreed, much cheered. Even Harry wasn’t so stupid as to stay in the Task longer than he had to. And they’d all agreed that his objective was to live, not to win.

McGonagall was saying something to Harry. She gave his shoulder a gentle shake, and Harry nodded up at her.

“SO! ONNNNNNN MY WHISTLE, THEN!” Bagman was certainly taking his sweet time; each word was drawled out to the point of parody, syrupy and trilled. “GET RRRRRRREADY…. ONNNNN YOUR MARKS….. GEEEEEEETTTT SEEEEEEEET…”

“God, I’m going to kill him if he doesn’t just get on with it,” muttered Hermione. He wondered distantly if the affection he felt at that was normal.

“ANNNNND! GO!”

The gates all swung open at once, with a thunderous clang. The cheers blotted out any sound from Bagman’s whistle, and the champions shot forth like sprinters off the mark — with the exception of Harry, who sort of trotted in after them, shooting a last anxious look over his shoulder.

The gates swung forth again with an identical clamor of metal, and there was a moment where the Spell-O-Vision swirled, flickering into a dull image of four dark lanes, lit only by the identical gleams of Lumos — resolving into that quartered screen from the Second Task — and then there was a crack like a firework detonating several inches over one’s head, and the screen went dark.

A heartbeat passed. Another. Then the shouts erupted.

“OI!”

“WHERE’D IT GO?”

“WHERE ARE THEY?”

“GET IT BACK ON—”

“What happened?” demanded Ron, shouldering in close.

“It’s — it might be a technical problem,” said Hermione, her voice pitched like a prayer. “These things happen, in areas with lots of magical activity — if you Apparate on the same frequency as a Spell-O-Vision projection, or a radio broadcast, it can disrupt the connection—”

“You can’t Apparate at Hogwarts!”

“No, of course not, but it might—”

Someone shouldered into Ron and he spilled his drink. “Sod this,” he snapped. “Let’s just go out and see, yeah? Maybe the big one’s working.”

“Yes— yes, absolutely—”

They wrestled their way through the crowd at the reception center, wading through a roaring knot of legs and dismayed Ministry workers, and spilled out onto the quidditch pitch in the same profusion as a flood of Ministry workers, all of whom were shouting at each other so furiously it was impossible to hear anything. Ludo Bagman was bellowing into an inert microphone like a soundless picture.

But outside, it was worse. The floodlights had gone out, and the whole pitch was lit by the emergency will-o-wisp lights that bobbed along the stairs, as well as the scant lingering daylight in the sky. Ministry workers raced back and forth, hurling screams and orders at each other, while the crowd bayed in furious bedlam at the upset. The champions were gone.

The worst of it wasn’t the chaos, however. The chaos was fine. Draco had been in bad crowds before.

The worst was that the Anti-Sensory Charm over the Labyrinth had been sealed over with the crackling, faintly glowing blue screen of an Anti-Enchantment Charm.

The champions, wherever they were, had been sealed off. And the Spell-O-Vision screens were all black.

Hermione's hand in his was a tourniquet. He was hers. A Ministry worker shoved past them and knocked her off her feet, and he caught her, hauled her upright against him, and held her there, which pressed into his wrist the ratcheting pace of her heartbeat, the rapid acceleration of her breaths, the strangled scream that was wrestling its way out of her throat, like an illborn creature—

"Granger."

"No! No, no, no, no, no! Harry!"

"You need to breathe."

"He's gone! He's gone! Harry's gone, they took him, something's wrong, it's like the World Cup again, he's gone!"

"I know, but you need to breathe."

"I can't! I can't breathe! They've taken him, oh, God, he's going to die —"

"Nobody's dying," he snapped, "unless you stop breathing, which is what's going to happen if you don't calm down— you need to think, alright, think rationally— "

"NO!" she screamed, and she bucked so violently he almost dropped her. "Don't tell me to calm down! Don't you dare! Look at what's happening! Look! And I told you it would, I knew it would, and now he's gone, and nobody knows what's going to happen to us—"

"I need you here."

Her voice cut off like someone took a razor to it. She breathed in ragged harmonies with him, crushed to his chest by the press of the crowd, her hand still knotted so tightly with his he would be surprised if either of them could feel it.

“I need you to think. You need to think. That’s your job. Potter is going to live,” he said, with confidence he didn’t feel, “but he needs you to think.”

“I — I can’t.”

“Yes, you can. Listen to me. We’ve done this before—”

“Not like this!”

“—you and me, Harry needs you—”

“I can’t help him! What are we going to do? This isn’t like doing his homework, this isn’t an exam, Draco, it’s real—”

“Fine. Help me. I’m your partner, remember? I’ll handle the knifework. Tell me what’s next.”

She screwed her eyes shut. Her first deep breath was a jagged, pointy thing, full of wet edges, but she held it with the stubbornness of someone guarding a treasure. Then she let it go.

Roughly, she said: “Stay close?”

“Obviously.”

“Obviously,” she whispered.

Her hand was still tangled in his, so she clumsily extricated it, wiping her palms on her robes. He flexed his fingers and planted his palm on his wand, willing away the phantom warmth.

“Talk,” he said. “You’ve had a full fifteen seconds to come up with something.”

She blinked once, and her face was a clean picture of terror.

Twice, and it was the cool stare of a girl glancing down at her exam book, reading a list of problems she already knew.

“We could—” She turned around. Purple cloaks swirled among black and blue, shouts bled into screams, spells glittered across the night like a panoply of falling stars. “We could — and then — no, maybe — but we’d have to find someone who knew—”

“Orders, Granger.”

She stopped. “We need to find Ron,” she said, and pulled his arm — didn’t look back, didn’t wait for him to catch on — she knew he would — and they were running at once to the tent, through the flap, a Knockback Jinx and a Bombardment Charm issued at the same time.

She only had to shout Ron’s name twice for him to appear from the crowd, rumpled and breathing fast, and clamp his hands on her shoulders.

“Hermione! Are you alright? I didn’t see you—”

“Fine, now, doesn’t matter, we have to go,” she snapped. “We’ve got to get into the maze—”

“In!”

“Yes, in. Harry’s alone, and something’s wrong, and we’re not going to wait—”

“DRACO!”

There was a bellow from the front of the tent. Draco turned on his heel and nearly walked into Theo’s fist.

Theo had seen better days. ‘Better’ included all of them. Soot and bruising purpled his face where it wasn’t black, with an earring of blood dribbling from a deep gouge in his ear.

“What the hell happened to you?” Draco demanded hoarsely. He turned away from the others and stalked towards him, half of a mind to do the other ear. “What kind of a time do you call this? This is some week you've had, you know — row with Greengrass in front of the whole school, make Pansy do more stairs than she's had in her life, vanish from the planet for three days—"

"Excuse me?" Theo, who was holding most of his blood in with one hand on his ear, was outraged. "Fuck off, Mum!"

"—come back looking like the cat wouldn't drag you in for fear of tetanus—"

"Oh, God, I cannot deal with you right now, mother of Merlin," he snapped, "I leave for seventy hours and you have an aneurysm. Don't you have better things to do?"

Draco shoved him. He squawked and shoved back.

"Daphne was worried about you, prat."

Theo took a sharp, short breath, and his eyes flickered over Draco. "Just her?"

"Entirely. I myself was enjoying the peace and quiet."

He gave a shaky gust of a laugh.

"Draco Malfoy," he said, "you're a remarkable fool."

An explosion sounded outside. Something shattered; a bulb went out. When the emergency lights came up, Theo seized Draco's shirtfront. "It's a trap," he hissed. His eyes were panic-wide and bright with a gleam of something slightly unfettered, some infant cousin to madness. "The cup is a Portkey. You have to tell Potter. You can't let him touch it. They're going to kill him."

"What?"

"What do you mean?" said Hermione. Her voice came from somewhere far away — faintly, through the screaming, but also through the thunder in Draco's ears. She was strangely calm. "A Portkey to where? Theodore, who's going to kill him?"

"The cup! The Triwizard Cup, they're going to take him and kill him and I can't stop it, they'll kill me, my father, but you have to get him —"

Another explosion, and Theo tore away from him as if burned.

"This didn't happen," he said, breathing fast. "I never said that. You understand?"

"Theo—"

"No. Listen to me." His finger held them at bay, as if it were a rapier, a wand, anything stronger than a fourteen-year-old's naked plea. "Tell anyone I said that, and you've killed me. Do you understand? I'm not being figurative. If you tell anyone, I'll be dead, and it will be your fault. Yours. And I hope you never find peace for it."

It would have been more impressive if his voice hadn't cracked when he snarled. His shoulders rose and fell with a wild dog's ravenous breaths.

"We're not going to tell anyone," said Hermione, still very calm. On some level, Draco appreciated it, because shock had stilled his tongue. "Thank you, Theodore. What you just did was tremendously brave."

"No. It wasn't. I told you, I never said that," he snarled. "Are we clear?"

"Perfectly. No one will ever know that you risked your life," she said calmly. "But I won't forget it."

She held out her hand. He glanced down at it for a long moment and swallowed. It was like watching a dog being held back from a bone.

“Spare me your pity, mudblood,” he said. Then he whirled around and stalked out of the tent, vanishing into the crush of the moving crowd.

Ron made a noise like he’d been punched.

“What an arse,” he said, thick with fury. “I hope he does get offed, raging bastard, after everything he’s said to you.”

“Doesn’t matter.” Hermione dropped to her knees and tore through her satchel, searching for something. “Where’s the sodding — tell me Harry didn’t take it — oh, he did, damn him! I didn’t want to go by memory. There’s a secret passage that runs under the quidditch field,” she blurted, by way of explanation. “I found it on the Marauder’s Map. It’s a steam tunnel, it’s built to carry water to the quidditch showers, and it terminates in a hatch under the east goalposts. That hatch is inside the maze.”

“Is it big enough?”

“Has to be,” she said breathlessly, shoving her bag onto her, “because they need to do maintenance work on the pipes. Only problem—”

“You memorized the Marauder’s Map?” said Ron faintly. “All of it?”

“No, I’m still working on the towers. The only problem, though, is the entrance, because they divert the steam—”

“Into the lake,” said Draco.

She nodded. “You’ve seen it?”

“No,” he said, “but there’s always steam on the lake after quidditch practices.”

“Quite. So — it might be flooded. Technically.”

“Technically?” repeated Ron. “And — sorry to ask — but on a scale from ‘oxygen’ to ‘no oxygen,’ where is ‘technically’, exactly?”

“Oh, I don’t know — enough oxygen? Probably? How’s that?”

“Uncomfortably subjective, frankly, Mione!”

“I’d love to hear your other ideas!”

“Doesn’t matter,” said Draco suddenly.

They gave him identical stares of disagreement.

“No, it doesn’t. Listen. It’s not a long walk from the lake to the pitch. Five minutes, possibly. Your Bubble-Head Charm,” he said, pointing at Hermione, “taps out at seventeen.”

She stared at him. Her mouth had curled, a little, under the rictus of fear, though the expression wasn’t quite happy — it was just fascinated, like he’d said the most interesting thing she’d heard all month. Like the whole world ought to get together and have a symposium on whatever came out of his mouth.

It was very nearly as good as her smile.

“Right,” said Ron loudly, “that’s great for her, but you and I—”

“Are at thirteen and four,” he interrupted, “and I’ve seen you swim. You can hold your breath for a minute.”

“I would prefer not to!”

“Then come up with another way to get into the maze,” he said, helping Hermione to her feet. “And do it soon.”

Hermione shook her head. “No,” she said. “Ron, Harry’s your friend. This is our best plan; what do you think?”

Ron blinked at her, surprised.

“What d’you mean?”

“I mean that I want your opinion,” she said. “Preferably sooner rather than later—”

“See above, soon,” said Draco, “and relatedly, it’s said that truly brilliant wizards can walk and talk at the same time—”

“—but all the same, if you think this isn’t a good idea, we can do something else. We’re not — we’re all here for Harry. Draco and I aren’t doing this by ourselves.”

“Yet,” said Draco significantly, hauling on her arm, as they stumbled toward the exits at an excruciating pace.

Ron raked one hand through his hair in amazement. Then he swept his eyes around, like he was flitting between squares on an invisible chessboard.

“I — I reckon it’s good,” he said. “Better if we had the Cloak, better still if we had a teacher, but one’s in the dorms and the other’ll be a nightmare to find in this mess.”

“I know. I was thinking McGonagall, but I couldn’t see her.”

“Nah, and they’ll all be with the Ministry. I saw four of them with Sprout trying to pry the walls open, but there’s something wrong with the maze, it’s not letting anyone in.”

“And I don’t want the Ministry to know what we’re doing, either — who knows how deep the conspiracy goes, but if Theo knew about it, then I’d wager his father does, too, and we’d make ourselves targets —”

“You wouldn’t need to wager,” said Draco darkly. “His father’s in on it.” He flicked out his wand and cast Bombarda at the turnstile, blasting a hole through which the three of them walked swiftly into the warm night air. The stars had begun to glint in the bolt of indigo overhead, in between wreaths of clouds like snuffed candlesmoke, and the faint black shapes of trees lingered like palimpsests on the horizon. The lake glowed eerie with starlight.

“How d’you reckon?” Ron broke into a jog, catching up with Draco, and Hermione put on speed to keep up with them.

“He said ‘they’ll kill my father.’ That means they would be able to identify him as the source of a leak.”

“Blimey. So he’s in it? With the Death Eaters?”

“Or someone of comparable malice.”

“But why Harry? He’s not done anything to them!”

“And it doesn’t make sense,” said Hermione. Her cheeks were bright from running. They scrambled down the pebble shores of the bank. “Theo was helping Cassius cheat, not Harry, and if the Cup is a Portkey, you wouldn’t want Cassius close to it at all.”

She cut through a knot of cattails with a slash of her wand. “Which is another thing! The entrance gates were based on tournament rank, so Cassius has the best chance of getting there first! It’s certainly far more likely than Harry, who might do the sensible thing and just stay put!”

“In an awe-inspiring lifetime first,” said Draco, razing a hank of reeds like scything wheat, “from one Harry James Potter.”

“He might. We don’t know what’s happening in there. It could be anything.”

“In my experience,” he said, “‘it could be anything’ is rarely a statement of optimism.”

They waded into the water, a cold shock like several volts of electricity straight to the ankles, and through a tall clump of marshes that parted before them to reveal the gaping lip of a metal pipe rising over the water like a sunken eye. The pipe itself was a flat black lightless disc that told some part of the hindbrain STOP, DO NOT GO, and emitted various smells that made the same argument. It was flooded, with only a slender crescent of air hovering between the waterline and the top of the pipe.

“After you,” said Ron.

“No, I insist.”

“Really, be my guest.”

Hermione huffed and shucked her robes onto the bank. “I’ll go, stop it. Just don’t touch the sides of the pipe, you’ll burn yourself.”

“What?”

She swirled a Bubble-Head Charm around her mouth, braced herself, and dove into the gloom of the gurgling steam pipe.

The water sloshed and swirled around her, and the darkness soon swallowed her up.

“Granger?”

There was a muted call, and a splash.

Draco cast his own charm and followed her.

The Bubble-Head protected him from the worst of the smell, but the best of the smell was none too pleasant, either. Scummy pondwater and mold and the peaty acidic smells of spongy things that grew in the damp, an ample helping of fecal matter, and whatever else had been embalming in the water since the beginning of forever. The water was oily and warm, filmed with things he couldn’t see too well and didn’t want to, and whenever something brushed up against his arm on the current he had to steel every nerve in his body not to jump.

Breathing slowly made the air last, but it was stale and clammy within thirty seconds. It was thin in a minute, musty in two, and foul-tasting besides. The intellectual understanding that he could survive on recycled air failed to convince his lungs, which insisted he was suffocating.

It was the last time he let Hermione make plans. Bathrooms and sewage pipes. Madwoman had some obsession with plumbing, come to think.

From deep within the pipes there was something churning, a burble like the indigestion of a buried beast, the deeper counterpart to the babbling current through the tunnel. His eyes adjusted to the dark gradually, making out the undulations of the water, and Hermione's silhouette wading through the path before him. The walls were ribbed with metal frets and behind them the light from the lake had faded to a ghostly gray pinprick. The minutes passed like hours.

By and by the darkness at the end of the tunnel changed in texture, and he belatedly recognized it for a wall. Faint gray light emanating from above suggested a channel overhead, and when he reached it, he craned his neck back and saw that the tunnel bent at a ninety-degree angle and ran upward. They were at the end of the pipe. Hermione was fussing at something on the ceiling, hauling like she were trying to do a pull-up on the roof; bemusement gave way to understanding when a shriek of metal let a bolt free, and a ladder came racketing down from the channel over their heads.

It cut the water with a splash. She hauled herself up, bringing her head fully free of the current, and dispelled the Charm with a gasp. Her shoulders heaved. Scummy water trailed from her shoulders and dyed an inky line of stains along her collar, running from the soaked ends of her hair. He gripped the ladder and pulled.

The Charm broke at a jerk of his head. The first breath of air was wonderful, being the first fresh oxygen he'd had in full minutes. The second was less so, as his brain recovered from the relief enough to actually smell it. He clung to the ladder and breathed shallowly through his mouth, loathing everyone who had ever been involved in the invention of plumbing, and none more so than himself.

Ron erupted from the water behind them, spluttering like a breaching whale.

“Ron!”

“Weasley, watch it.”

“Lost the charm,” he gasped, his voice hoarse and guttering wet. “Something grabbed my ankle. Lost focus. Had to hold m’breath.”

“It was probably a bit of kelp,” said Hermione absently, already drawing herself up the ladder. Her clothes clung to her frame like they had been sewn to it. When she had climbed several feet out of the water, she carefully hooked her legs over the topmost rung of the ladder and leaned out, reaching for the hatch at the top. “There’s lots of rubbish floating around down here.”

“It wasn’t kelp. It grabbed me, I swear.”

“Keep an eye out, then,” said Draco, and he hauled himself up to join Hermione at the top of the hatch. Heat radiated from the sides of the channel, and a sting on his elbow informed him he’d brushed the walls; he flinched it back, hissing. “Or come help us.”

Hermione wrenched on the hatch, to no avail. The handle refused to yield. “Damn,” she said, “it’s stuck—”

“Let me do it.”

“Well, go on, but I warn you—”

He drew his wand and pointed it at the hatch.

“No! Wait, don’t—”

“Bombarda.”

The explosion flared like a white bloom in the tunnel. The shockwave hit the hatch and ricocheted back, wrenched him free of the ladder like tearing tissue paper, and he was hurtling back down into water that caught him like a hard clap to the back, solid like real ground. The pain lasted only a moment before he was underwater, head spinning, his balance scrabbling to reassert itself, and no idea which way was up, no air, no light, no upwards, just the dark filthy water like oil in his throat.

A hand grabbed his collar and hauled.

He came up with a wild sound, gasping.

Ron let go shirt and threw him aside, snarling, "—serves you right, you sodding idiot, she told you not to— where'd she go? Hermione!"

He dove back into the water.

There were two seconds where their heads were both gone. Draco breathed hard, air scraping his throat like the wind carried a serrated edge.

They came up with a pair of shouts. Ron hauled Hermione up by the armpits and shoved her against the ladder, where she fastened and clung like a soaked limpet, breathing in high short bursts. She was soaked down to the bone, now, her hair thick and ropy with water, and shaking.

"I told you," she snarled, "to wait! There's a Runic seal on the hatch!"

"You might have said that," he snapped, raking wet hair from his head. His heart was fast. She had been underwater for several long seconds.

"You might have seen that! I didn't think you'd go whaling on it like a first year—"

“—being efficient, ‘it’s stuck’ you said, the hell am I supposed to infer, unless ‘stuck’ means ‘Runic seal’ in madwoman—”

“I’m the madwoman? I am?”

“SHUT UP,” bellowed Ron.

His declaration bounced off down the pipe at a gallop. He shoved his hair out of his eyes and stabbed a finger at Draco. “Don’t do that again,” he said. Then he turned his finger on Hermione. “Go solve it.” Back to Draco. “You help her.”

“Hark at him — who died and made you king of the steam tunnels—”

“Shut up! I’d do it, but I don’t know how,” he snapped, drawing his wand. “So you get up there and break out some parchment, or whatever the hell you swots do in Runes, and I’ll keep watch.”

Hermione scrambled the ladder, muttering invective. Draco glared at Ron and clambered up after her.

The seal was a Runic triad, three concentric circles of engravings that rotated when pulled. Hermione cast Lumos, peering at the tiny scablike engravings, and was muttering something to herself as she ran the wand over each mark.

“Triad,” she decided. “It’s like a rotary lock, mechanically. There’s some combination that defuses the Lock enchantment. But you’d have to know the combination.”

“What?”

“The combination, the sealbreaker, the word that makes it unlock,” she said impatiently. “Whatever they set as the runic key.”

“Like ‘unlock,’ for instance?”

“That’s ridiculously simplistic. Who would use ‘unlock’ as a password?”

“This thing was built for plumbers, they’re not trying to wall it up like Gringotts. You’ve got the ingredients for it, there — the negating article, and two for the word, ‘lock,’ laguz, there, and othal.”

“Yes, but they’re on the same ring, so they can’t both be used in the combination. Besides, you’re trying a phonetic translation, that’s not proper form.”

“See again, plumbers, you think they’re cross-referencing with the Old English lexicon—?”

“I think that whoever knows runes well enough to engineer a triad seal for these plumbers you’ve so little respect for would probably know the correct translation of ‘unlock,’ Draco, yes!”

“Fine. Have it your way, but you’ll have to conjugate, I was arse deep in Sleeping Draughts the week we did all those sodding charts.”

“Hey? You lot?” Ron’s voice floated up the tunnel. “Something’s in here.”

“Probably fish,” called Hermione, hauling the first ring into place. “Keep an eye on it.”

“It’s not a fish. It’s — eugh!”

Splash. Ron jumped, and ripped his hand out of the water: it held a grindylow, which thrashed and writhed, its tiny pink tentacles slapping wetly and inertly at his arm. He thrust it away from his body, yelping.

“Grindylows!”

“Rats.” Hermione was still fixated on the seal. “Must’ve come in from the lake. Can you deal with them, Ron?”

“Reckon,” said Ron uncomfortably. He Stunned it and tossed it away with a wet plorp. “Not too keen on them if they swarm, you remember what Lupin said.”

“We only need a few minutes.”

“Yeah, sure.”

Another splash, and he grunted, wading up the tunnel. Now that he was paying attention, Draco noticed that the water had more chop than it did when they’d come in, still writhing white and foamy from the Bombarda. Three more grindylows encircled Ron’s ankles, and he ripped them out of the water, hurling them back up the pipe.

“Where’s thauris?” Hermione swept her wand over the seal. “Or is that wunjo? It’s so eroded I can’t tell.”

“Thauris, it’s curved.”

“Thought so too, but it’s missing a notch.”

“Guys?” Ron’s voice was louder. “Lot more of them.”

“Almost got it,” she called. “Babbling said simple triads use the infinitive, so we needn’t worry about subject agreement—”

“Guys!”

Something splashed, and something shrieked, and at least one was Ron. They whipped their heads around to see him vanish under the black water, covered in a circlet of churned foam. Hermione screamed.

Draco let go of the ladder and dropped. He landed in the water with a hard jolt and a small explosion of waves, stabbed his wand at the last place Ron had been, and cast Relashio.

Ron’s head thrust out of the water, spluttering furiously, while something enormous flipped and slithered back into the current.

“The hell was that?” Draco demanded, hauling him up.

“I dunno, but it wasn’t a grindylow,” he gasped. “It was bigger than me.”

Grindylows had started to swarm, their bony fingers pricking greedily at the bottom of Draco’s robes. He cut through them with a disgusted sweep of his wand, and they swam away, regrouping at the mouth of the tunnel.

“There’s something else in here, then.”

“I reckon,” breathed Ron, rubbing his wrists. “Whatever it is, it’s got fingers, and it wants us out. Nearly dragged me back into the tunnel.”

“You didn’t see it when it grabbed you?”

There was a long groan, and then something shuddered into place. A gust of steam shot up the pipe, spraying their faces with rancid hot air, and Draco hauled his shirt over his nose.

“How’s it going, Hermione?” Ron called bleakly, eyes watering.

“Good! It’s good! I’m close!”

The black water refused to grow still again. It thrashed and lapped at the sides of the tunnel, leaving fresh watermarks on the iron.

Draco frowned.

“Granger, how high was the tide when we got here?”

“I don’t know,” she called. Her voice was tinny. “My elbows, maybe?”

“It’s getting higher.”

The water lapped around his arms, soaking new stripes of his shirt. The current coming down from the lake was faster, more purposeful. The tunnel was filling.

“Oh, God,” said Ron thinly. “Great. We’re going to drown.”

“No we’re not, you louse, we’ll do a Bubble-Head.”

“Fat lot of good that’ll be when a sea monster sucks you under, idiot, it’s a concentration spell! Remember what happened to Fleur?”

“I’m not Fleur Delacour,” snapped Draco, but he spoke with more confidence than he felt. He’d never tried to do a Bubble-Head while under attack before.

“More’s the pity,” muttered Ron. “Now the last thing I see’s gonna be your weaselly face.”

“If that’s true, it’ll be because I strangled you before the water gets the chance.”

“Boys!” Hermione’s voice echoed sharply. “Do something about it, please!”

“Like what? Mione, it’s coming up, there’s no use—”

“For Pete’s sake! Shield Charm!” she cried. She turned away from the hatch, dangling from the ladder with one hand, and pointed at the tunnel. “Over the pipe, like a seal! The pressure will build, but you don’t have to hold it for long.” She wheeled back to the runes without waiting for agreement.

Ron squinted at her. “You can do a waterproof Shield Charm?”

“I can do an anything-proof Shield Charm,” she said absently. “That’s the point.”

It wasn’t even arrogance, just an absentminded statement of fact. Draco laughed, a little, just because she didn’t seem to hear herself. She wasn’t wrong, only egotistical, which was all the better.

The water rippled. Grindylows swarmed and then parted, as if split by an invisible edge, and something long and black rippled through the water toward them, arcing to and fro on a sinusoid curve.

“Shield Charm,” said Ron quickly, “shield, shield, Draco, shield—”

“Shut up! Hang on! Do you hear that?”

There was music drifting from somewhere; music in the water, a thin, warbling voice.

“What’s that?” said Ron.

Draco closed his eyes, briefly.

“Mermish,” he said.

He cast Protego as the mermaid surged from the water, eight feet of towering gray skin and a furious, ghoulish scream, the trident clutched in its skeletal fist.

The trident slammed into the shield and bounced off. The mermaid floundered back into the water, its tail beating thunder on the walls. The Shield held.

“Merlin’s fucking sack!”

“Calm down.”

“What the hell is that?”

“A mermaid.”

“What the hell’s it doing here?”

“She’s likely trying to chase us out,” Hermione called. “They’re tasked to defend the lake, and we’re not supposed to be here—”

“With a big fucking trident?”

“It could have killed you earlier and it didn’t,” he snapped. “So not only is it probably peaceful, it’s also incredibly good at resisting temptation.”

“Peaceful! Peaceful? Looked peaceful to you, did it?”

“I said ‘peaceful,’ not ‘pleasant,’ and have you noticed it hasn’t tried again?”

It hadn’t. The mermaid swirled in the water, its reptilian head just cresting the tide, glowering at them with its luminous, candle-yellow eyes. Its expression seemed faintly scolding.

“Thanks to your Shield Charm,” muttered Ron. “Give it a bonk on the head if it comes nearer, I don’t like the look of those teeth.”

The mermaid gave a shrieking bark, like the clap of a seal. Ron stumbled backward.

“I think the feeling’s mutual,” said Draco. “Granger, how’s it coming?”

“One circle left!”

“Grand. This thing wants to haul us out by the hair, and it’s got cavalry coming.”

Faint harmonies of music echoed queerly down the pipe, the echoes twisting into new pitches and striking new, gloomy minor chords.

The mer bucked out of the water, its teeth bared in a gravelly hiss. It slapped its hand against the Shield Charm, which buckled white, but held fast.

“Merlin,” swore Ron.

The mer blinked at Draco intently, a lightning shutter of transparent eyelids. It slapped the Charm again, twice, and let out another shriek.

There was another Bombarda on his tongue, this one well-suited for the task at hand. He could have cast it with a twitch. It was nothing to him if a mer lost a few fins, or if some grindylows were charred on the way up. Anything that stood between him and a healthy serving of oxygen could well be seen as asking to be deprived of it, from his point of view.

And yet the mer was palpating the shield, not like it wanted to break it, but like it wanted to get his attention. Like it was knocking.

“It’s talking to us.”

“Yeah, and I’ll tell you what it’s saying,” said Ron. “‘Get out or I’ll bugger you with this pointy bit.’”

“No, you moron. Put your hand on the shield.”

“What?”

“It uses hand language. Put your hand on the shield.”

“What happens if your shield breaks?”

“Then it’ll be the funniest thing I ever did, and your twin brothers will write hymns to me once they’ve executed my murder. Do it, Ronald, it’s not going to break.”

Ron muttered something about tyranny and shuffled forward to press his palm gingerly against the shield. It flickered and warped around his fingers.

The mer reared up and slapped its hand against his, palms flush through the crackling layer of blue. It shrieked long and hard in Ron’s face, and he grimaced, leaning back, but kept his hand firm.

“Good. Now—” He tried to remember what Daphne had done. It had been so fast, and he hadn’t cared about it at the time, so he hadn’t thought to pay attention. “Touch your mouth. And then touch your palm.”

“Have you gone mad?”

“I’m sorry, are you busy? Do you have other things to be doing?”

Ron grumbled and obeyed him. It was clumsy, and not half as elegant as Daphne had done it, but the mer peered at him and gave a querulous croak.

“What does it mean?” muttered Ron.

“‘Help,’” said Draco.

The mer peered between them, and gave another suspicious shriek. It pointed a clawed finger at Draco.

He slowly touched two fingers to his lips.

“What is that? What are you saying?”

“No idea.” He spoke through his fingers. “But I suspect it’s ‘please.’”

The mer screamed, once more. Then she whirled and dove into the water. The snaking tip of her tail vanished into the current.

Distantly, the chorus of voices stopped swelling, and grew fainter, as if a roving band of carolers were moving away.

“Got it!”

Hermione’s cry of victory was swallowed by a shriek of metal. Golden bolts seared under the runes, and the hatch spun, the ancient tumblers rattling into place. When she pushed, it sprang free, pouring pale blue light into the tunnel from a hole in the ceiling so bright the world turned momentarily white.

“Finally!” Ron shouted. “Get up!”

Draco dispelled the Shield and clambered up the ladder, which was no easy task, dragging several stone of waterlogged clothes on arms that were already tired. He was faintly fatigued from spellcasting and filmed in scummy water, and when he hauled himself through the hatch, his arms gave a hard quake, not giving in, but warning him that the possibility was not so far as he might prefer.

Hermione was already there when he surfaced, grabbing his arms, trying to haul him up. Her strength being what it was, this failed to be of much help, but it was a comfort. He listed onto the ground and laid for a moment on his back on the damp grass as the air turned his wet clothes to a girdle of ice.

“Draco? Are you alright?”

Ron wrestled his way out and scrambled upright. “Damn,” he breathed, kicking it shut. “Think I’ll never swim again.”

Hermione prodded Draco again, fretfully. He groaned, waved her off, and rolled to his feet.

The walls of the maze cast deep shadows, and the wind moaned coolly between the hedges. Overhead there were no stars, only the blue glaze of the Anti-Enchantment Charm, like they were still suspended in some kind of subterranean realm.

The hatch swung closed with a cold toll like a steel bell. A black flutter of ravens lifted from one of the hedges and rose baying into the dead blue sky.

They were in the Third Task.

-Viktor's brother is speaking Bulgarian, which is written in Cyrillic script. The exchange, if you're wondering, is basically what you think it is.

-Harry is thinking of "paean," but he's trying.

-I always thought it was funny that in Chamber of Secrets, they could get the whole plot from one piece of paper with a word on it. Like, if that was all I had to go on, I would be wildly out of my depth. Even Hermione had to go to the library; that sort of riddling is pretty far-fetched.

-And we're off!! Thank you so, so, so much to all the love and encouragement — it's the reason I stay posting. Incredible love to all of you. I hope you have your favorite dessert soon this week.

-Next chapter: "The Triwizard Cup." In which we see what our respective champions are made of.

The Triwizard Cup

Chapter 53: The Triwizard Cup

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

The race through the maze was stiff competition for the worst thing he'd ever done for Harry Potter. It was worse than any he'd ever done for any other reason, too, though those adventures were far and in between, being that he had only one friend who was this much goddamn work to keep, and really, he would've saved a lot of time and effort if he'd bought a cat.

Tendrils of Devil's Snare sprouted from beneath the hedges and lunged for his ankles, and he cleared these with blasts of Confringo that would've had Neville weeping. Sap and something viscous splattered on his trousers and he knew he'd have to burn them, likely on a funeral pyre, and if he was lucky he wouldn't be wearing them when they lit it.

If he was very, very lucky.

So he ran.

Through dark corridors of trawling vines and narrow blind corners, tight thorny archways that ripped at his shirt, ducking into and out of an alleyful of Blast-Ended Skrewts, running at such a pace that his breath turned to a constant harsh drumroll in his throat, Hermione's shirt fluttering in his periphery like a frantic white dove, the warm scent of spring on the grass and smoke from somewhere and above it all the silence, the intolerable fucking silence, the silence like a kettledrum that said no one can hear you scream—

He rounded a corner and almost stepped into a jet of red light.

The kettledrum broke with a shrill scream. He hauled around and shoved Hermione back with an arm that nearly sent her flying — but she had her wand out, and the Shield fountained in front of them, deflecting the second curse of Fleur Delacour.

Fleur wasn’t well. Thick columns of blood trailed both nostrils, and her nose was crooked, the cartilage bent where something unforgiving had been introduced to it. When she screamed, rivulets laced her teeth. Long bolts of her flaxen hair was crusted with a rind of dark red clots. It was rather like a grotesque painting from one of those nasty bastards in the Baroque movement, the ones who liked killing almost as much as naked women.

“D'où viens-tu!” she screamed. “Quelqu'un m'a attaqué! Il a essayé de me tuer! J'aurais pu mourir, tu m'entends? Quel genre de misérable putain d'école—”

“Fleur!” Hermione ducked under Draco’s arm and tripped forward, hands aloft in pacification. “Oh, God, what happened to you?”

“Qu'est-ce qui m'est arrivé, putain de crétin insipide? J'ai embrassé un dragon! Imbecile!”

“Alright, that translates, but If you hold still, I can do something about —”

“Do not touch! Je vais crier si tu me touches, je ne peux pas le supporter!” Fleur tipped back her head and let out a long, tearful wail. “Où est ma mère? Je veux aller a la maison!” She started sobbing, deep ugly heaving sobs that brought new volumes of blood out of her nose. Hermione made an appalled sound.

Draco grabbed Fleur by the wrist and hauled her around. She screamed, and he plucked the wand from her hand.

“Fermez-la. Ressaisissez-vous. Ce n'est pas le théâtre,” he snapped, and stabbed her wand back at her.

She gasped herself into apoplexy, and then fell blessedly silent.

“Thank you,” said Hermione. “Now — Fleur, what happened to you?”

“A wizard,” she said stonily. “’E comez out of nowhere, a big man, and ’e curses me. And ’e breaks een my noze — PAF! — my beautiful noze! I am ruined, my face is ruined— ” Her mouth wobbled. She daubed at her lips and then spat. A red gobbet sailed into the grasses.

“None of that,” said Draco curtly. “What wizard? What did he look like?”

“I do not know! ’E wore a mask, I did not see his face!”

“A white mask?”

“Zhis is not fair! We were not told zhere would be wizards hunting us!”

“There aren’t,” said Ron grimly. “The Tournament’s off. The Task’s over. You have to get out.”

“What? Why? Why are you telling me zhis, and why eez it only you here? Where iz Madam Maxime? Where iz Dumbledore?”

“We don’t know,” said Hermione, with diminishing patience. “Outside, probably. They’ve closed the entrances, the maze is walled off. Fleur, listen to me. You have to get out of here. The man you saw was a Death Eater. Everyone is in danger.”

Fleur stared at her dazedly. “You are ze golden girl,” she said. “You came to ze Ball. With Viktor.”

“What? Yes! No! It doesn’t matter! Are you deaf? There are men in this maze who want to kill Harry, and believe me, they won’t hesitate to kill you, too!”

“They – they do?” She blinked. “Why?” she said, and her voice was harder, almost brittle, as if it were a personal annoyance.

“Because they’re shits,” said Ron calmly, standing up. “Because if you could bottle Harry’s luck, you’d have a weapon of mass destruction. We don’t know. It doesn’t matter. You have to go.”

She frowned, and rose to her feet. “No,” she said. “I cannot. ’Arry cannot die. I do not permit zhat.”

Hermione choked. “Oh, you don’t?”

“Non! He saved Gabrielle. I ’ave,” she said, “a debt.”

“No. You don’t. Really! He wouldn’t think so. Go! Right now! It would make it easier, in fact!”

“I do not know how they do zhese things in Britain,” she said haughtily, “but I ’ave my honor to think of. I will fight for ’im, as ’e fought for Gabrielle. I will find zhese terrible men in masks — these weak, pathetic, cowardly men, who do not show their fazez to fight! — and I will avenge my nose. And you will not zay of me, ‘zhat Fleur, she eez weak, and shallow, and zhinks only of ’erself.’ No, you will not! Zhey will zay: ‘Fleur Delacour, she eez brave, and good, and she did not forget zhe kindness zhat was shown to her!’”

Her chest heaved. She whirled on her heel and marched deeper in the maze with the panache of someone at the vanguard of the July Rebellion.

Hermione’s jaw dropped. She stalked after her.

“Fleur, you know he didn’t actually save her, right?” They followed, more or less from necessity, because it was the only path ahead. “The Second Task was on a timer. They weren’t going to kill her if you failed, that was never an option.”

“And ’ow you know zhat, I will be fazzinated to ’ear!”

“I know because I was in there with her!” Hermione was belligerent. “Are you listening to me? You’re putting your life in danger!”

The path winnowed and plunged under a gated archway of wrought-iron. Through the gnarled braids of iron wove a brilliant pepper of blue-and-yellow flowers, percolating fragrance, like the passage into a fairy garden. There were no hinges, nor handles, but the gate clearly was meant to be opened: the path continued on the other side, swallowed by gray mist.

“Zis eez a puzzle,” said Fleur, which made Draco begin to doubt the use of bringing her along.

Hermione drew her wand and used it to prod one of the flowers, which sighed a spring of yellow pollen at her touch. “Do you suppose there’s a pattern to the flowers?” she wondered. “Like a combination, or a code? I — oh, yuck.”

She whisked her hand back. The skin where the pollen touched started to flush and crack, beading little scabs of dead skin like sheddings of soap. Hermione made a panicked noise and smacked it off.

“It’s acid!”

“Technically, eet eez a base,” said Fleur, peering through the wrought-iron. “Ze acids hurt when you touch zem. Ze basez are more dangerous, for zey do not hurt, but zey will shred ze skin from your ’ands before you will even notice.”

Draco snatched Hermione’s wrist and cast a Scouring Charm. The pollen scattered, along with a skein of dead skin that fluttered into the wind. She sucked a breath through her teeth, and his stomach turned.

“Alright?”

“Fine.”

Fleur hopped up and down. “Oh! Eet eez a riddle!”

“Oh, good,” muttered Hermione. “The last one we had was a real treat.”

He tilted his head. “Do you think we solve this one the same way?”

“What?”

“Nothing.”

There was a plaque inset into the center of the gate, engraved with ornate script.

Halfway up the hill, I see thee at last

Lying beneath me with thy sounds and sights —

A city in the twilight, dim and vast, with smoking roofs, soft bells, and gleaming lights.

Fleur peered at it. “Hm. Eet eez not very clear, non? What eez zhe hill? And why can you not see it before?”

“It doesn’t matter,” Hermione said shortly. “It’s a riddle, it’s not supposed to make sense. They don’t actually give you clues, because the point isn’t to help you solve them, it’s to suggest a plausible relationship post facto —”

“Eet eez lying beneath you… why beneath?” Fleur tapped her wand against her mouth, thoughtfully. “Why repeat zhat? And why is only zhe city in twilight? Why eez zhe speaker not also?”

“Because it was written by someone who didn’t care about narrative continuity. Listen, I think a good Freezing Charm and a Blasting Curse should be able to get us through here, we just need to check for holding runes. Ron, can you see—?”

“Aha!” Fleur snapped her fingers. “Ze past!”

The arms of the gate shrieked and pried apart. Each reaching curl of iron unwound and wriggled like it was a living tendril, transforming the complex lattice of metalwork into a writhing knot, like an anemone. The flowers shuddered and disappeared in tiny detonations of yellow dust.

“No,” said Hermione. “No. Really? That’s all? That’s absurd!”

“Jealous,” he said.

“I’m not! I’m just saying there’s no way to infer that from the riddle itself!”

“Eet eez not about inferenze, cyprin. You must think abstractly, creatively. Ze riddle,” said Fleur, with relish, “eez about ze observation of possibility.”

“I’m observing several possibilities right now,” Hermione muttered, and stomped after Fleur into the passageway.

They had made it only a few steps into the next corridor when a figure appeared in the fog. It was Cassius Warrington.

He came striding around the corner, his wand still glowing from the remnant of its last spell, and at the sight of Fleur, he barked and dropped at once into a dueling stance.

“Delacour!”

“Oh, perfect,” hissed Hermione.

“This git,” said Ron aggressively.

“Warrington,” Fleur said coolly. “Allo.”

“The devil are they doing here?” His wand skated from Ron, to Hermione, to Draco. His grip tightened. “Malfoy?”

Draco drew his wand and rolled it through his fingers. He narrowed his eyes.

Nobody would know. One curse, and they'd be the only ones to know. Could say it was a Death Eater. None the wiser, really.

"You'll be disqualified," Cassius told Fleur, his voice reverberating queerly in the gloom. He was faintly excited. "Once I tell them about this, you'll be done for. It's against the rules to get help in the Tournament."

"Zhe Tournament?" demanded Fleur. "Zhere eez no Tournament, you gormless shit."

"I beg your pardon?"

She gestured at the three of them. "Look around! 'Ave you not seen zhe men in here? Zhe Task is finished! Eet eez over! We must band togezzer, and escape!"

"I don't know what you're talking about," he said stiffly. His wand stayed level with his eyes. "If this is some sort of ploy, it's failing."

"Eet eez not a ploy! Ridiculous boy! Look at me! I was attacked!"

"Yes, that's clear. Your struggles in the Task are your own misfortune, not mine. What's not clear is why you felt the need to invite three children—"

"Children!" cried Ron. "Rich!"

"—into the Task with you, perhaps because your own magic isn't enough—"

"Ow dare you!"

"—to do the same work as real wizards, which isn't surprising—"

Fleur spat on his shoe. Cassius snarled and brandished his wand.

“Wouldn’t do that, Warrington.”

Cassius curled his lip at Draco, who rolled his wand through his fingers.

“What?”

“Flora Carrow,” he said. “Running around the dungeons looking like a vampire went after her. It’s the sort of information I’d want to keep contained, personally.”

“...That’s all?” He arched his eyebrows. “This is how you threaten me, Malfoy? A handful of — what? Vague insinuations?”

“You’re committing an indiscretion. I think your father might be interested to know about that.”

“You think my father gives a damn what I do behind closed doors? What licentious rumors my enemies care to spread are of no interest to anyone of substance.”

“Which is why you took such pains to hide it.”

Cassius shrugged. “Fine,” he said drolly. “Shout it from the rooftops, see if I care. It’s her reputation at risk, not mine. She’s a young woman of no prospects; really, Malfoy, you can hurt her if you like, but don’t imagine you’re touching me at all.”

Draco tilted his head and examined his face, the square set of his jaw, the pinched set of his mouth.

“You’re lying.”

“You’re free to think so.”

“And it still wouldn’t matter. Being a rake isn’t the headline you want running alongside the picture of you with the Triwizard Cup.”

“No?” Cassius smiled indulgently. “I quite agree. Which is why it’s terribly convenient that Flora will deny anything you say about it, like the good girl she is. And if you suggest anything she wouldn’t agree with, then I imagine a lot of newspapers will find all sorts of interesting things to do with the fact that you took a lycanthrope to the Yule Ball.” His smile widened. “And did a bit more, as I hear it.”

Ron gave a hard exhale. Draco’s fingers found the handle of his wand, and it stilled on the last spin.

“You’re a slimy little toad,” said Hermione.

Cassius quirked his eyebrow at her. “And you’re nothing,” he said indifferently. “I suppose you think I’ll take offense at that, but I can’t, because you’re not even real.”

“Warrington—”

“Your magic is an act of theft.”

“My magic is mine,” she said, with an awful little tremor.

It ought to be a hanging offense, that tremor. Or worse.

“You’re at this school on the charity of men like me.”

“No—”

“And when everything is sorted out,” he said calmly, “they’re going to send you back to your shack, or your cave, or whatever it is, where the other muggles live, and I’ll expect you to thank us for the privilege of borrowing our magic. Because it is, you know. A privilege.” He flicked his wand at her. “In fact, you ought to start now. Say ‘thank you.’”

“Stop eet,” said Fleur harshly. “Be quiet. Horrible boy!”

“Say ‘thank you, Cassius,’” he said, stepping forward. “‘Thank you for the magic.’ Say that, why don’t you? You’re rather clever, after all; you only need to learn to mind your manners. Maybe I'll tell my father to take you on as a secretary. Might even let you have robes, like a real witch, instead of those little skirts that muggles wear—"

"Ulceratio."

The jinx was fast. Too fast for him to see it, let alone dodge. Draco had a fast hand.

Snape's curse was a dark salmon pink, like raw meat, and unlike the glitter of a normal spell, its body was thick, viscous, almost muscular in shape. He didn't have time to examine it before it collided with Cassius's cheek.

Sores blossomed on the side of Cassius's face, wide wet weeping red pustules that scrambled over the skin like a hungry parasite. They swallowed his cheek and one ballooned over his eye, swelling it shut, while his shriek was garbled by the white pustules exploding on his mouth. Draco's second jinx was the same, only lower, spreading the rash of bubbling flesh down his throat, and he savored the scream for a rare moment of pure satisfaction at a good hit, the clean running-water sensation of magic moving through his body like it was a river and he was the dam, the channel, the source of power.

Also, he now knew what his godfather did in his spare time, and it was horrifying.

Cassius went down on a knee, his hand palpating the sticky horror of his face. He gave a strangled whine, and Fleur said, "Mon dieu," in hushed tones. Then she hurried forward and Stunned him. He toppled over with a groan of what might have been relief.

"Merlin," said Ron faintly. Hermione had one hand over her mouth, her expression unreadable.

Draco ran his wand over his fingers. The power and the anger still danced like lightning over the surface of his skin, a lovely little waltz that looked at the Dark curse unfolding and thought, lovely, lovely, lovely . Lovely like Hermione when she got a spell right for the first time, lovely like pulling out of a dive. Lovely and deserved.

Not a real person… those little skirts.

There was a well in the bottom of his stomach and when he looked into it there was no bottom, and he wondered what would happen if he slipped into it, went deeper, reached for other spells he'd read in those books. Now he knew he could do it, with just a wand and a whisper and the still reservoir of rage in his navel.

"Draco."

It was Hermione's voice, so he listened. She was sheet-pale, and that wasn't necessary, was it? He hadn't done anything wrong.

"What?"

"What was that?"

"It's a Boils Jinx," he lied. "Sixth year Charms."

She stared at him.

"Flitwick teaches that?" she said, and it was about as credulous as it ought to have been.

"I'm not a sixth year. I wouldn't know."

While she struggled to decide whether to call his bluff, he sheathed his wand and walked away. His heart was hammering. He could feel her watching his back.

Ron and Fleur were fussing over Cassius's body, rolling him onto his side.

"We cannot leave 'im like zhis. 'E will be attacked."

"Yeah, here's hoping."

“Ronald! ’E is a bad man, but we must not let ‘im die!”

“Somehow, I don’t think the Death Eaters are gonna go after him.”

“Even so,” she said throatily, “ze maze eez full of ozzer creatures. Zere are scorpions, occamies, redcaps — I ‘ave seen zhem. Zhey will not ‘esitate. If ze Blast-Ended Skrewts come for ’im, ’e is defenseless.”

“Might be good for his character,” said Ron. “You never know.”

There was a faint shout, muffled by distance and fog. All stood at attention.

“Who’s that? Can you tell?” Hermione peered into the distance.

“We should hurry,” said Ron.

Green lights danced at the other end of the path, not spells, but the reflected glow of one against the dark hedge-wall. Shouts and roars of an animal that wasn’t human, and one animal that definitely was, more or less in the same amount of pain. Lights peppering the wall like the reflection of a fireworks display, and then an explosion, followed by screams plural and voices slightly less plural, signs of a pyrrhic victory.

“Death Eaters,” whispered Hermione. “We have to run—”

“Oh, Merlin,” said Ron, in a high-pitched voice. “Oh, Merlin, Merlin. Those were green lights. D’you think…?”

“Who cares, who cares! We still have to go! Hurry, hurry!”

“What! And leave ’im ’ere?” said Fleur, gesturing to Cassius.

“Yes,” said Hermione, bluntly, and for a moment Draco felt something in his chest that was very sharp and bright and pleasant, a sort of cutting pride — she was in fine form like this, cutting off a worthless bit of deadweight who would’ve left her to die, free at last of that pesky all-souls-on-board streak that would shackle her to the sinking boat — but then she said, “They won’t bother with him if they’re in a hurry. Probably.”

“Getting closer,” said Ron reedily. “Pretty fast, actually, maybe we should run—”

“We can’t make it.”

“Well damn, Mione, I guess we shouldn’t try!”

“That’s not what I meant, and you know it!”

“No,” interrupted Fleur. “You will. But you must ’urry. I will hold zhem off.”

“Absolutely not,” said Hermione, although her tone suggested her concerns were probabilistic, not moral.

“Yes. I am ze finest witch at Beauxbatons. I will hold zhem for a while.”

“You don’t understand what you’re offering, Fleur. These aren’t students. They’re grown wizards, and they could kill you.”

Fleur drew herself up to her full height, which was not considerable, but still taller than Draco had initially thought. He remembered her at the drawing ceremony, all of none and zero inches, tripping down the aisle like four solid ounces of ballerina, and it seemed that he was recalling a different person altogether. She was no one’s ornament. She had approximately a third of the blood in her body worn on her face like war paint, half the nose she used to, and the distinctly red-eyed glower of a girl not so far removed, genetically speaking, from a Dark creature as anyone else in the outing.

In short, she was precisely the kind of person you might want between yourself and any sort of trouble.

“I hope zhat zhey will try,” she said.

“That’s not — oh, fine, but Fleur — if it gets bad, you have to run, alright? Don’t be stupid.”

Fleur nodded. “Fly fast, cyprin, mon chou,” she said. “Be quick. Get to ’Arry.”

“Yes’m,” said Ron, and then blushed furiously when she kissed his cheek.

“Go,” she cried, “run!” And standing, she spun a long, glittering charm in the air over her and Cassius, forming a silver ball.

“A hemispherical Shield Charm,” said Hermione, wondrous. “Those are… I can’t believe it. They’re impossibly difficult. The theory alone…”

“Yeah, almost like she’s good at this or something,” said Ron. He grabbed her arm and hauled her along. “C’mon, we’ve got a job to do.”

Their job, by joint understanding, was run like hell. Their job was move, yesterday, and Draco executed it with vigor. He didn’t even remember which turns he took, whether they were doubling back or getting any closer to the maze center, and he shamed Mad-Eye by not checking his corners. By his thinking, whatever was ahead couldn’t be worse than the cost of slowness. He might’ve been wrong about that, but he was lucky enough that it didn’t matter.

The maze was an eerie lattice of corridors, dark and narrow and misty without exception, and they swallowed echoes to the point where space itself seemed to twist sound; the distance between each turn felt unreal and inconsistent. Sounds came spearing out of the night and then vanished. Something about the unique poison of adrenaline and dread stifled conversation; perhaps they were all silently afraid of drawing attention. When they hit dead ends he didn’t even bother to speak, just snarled and whirled into the nearest corridor they hadn’t taken, Hermione hissing curses a half-step behind him. Sometimes he would stall and let her run into him at corners and junctions. The combination of sharp pressure and reprimand when she stepped into his back was a comfort as much as it was a precaution. The clasp of her fingers on his wrist when she shoved his arm out of the way to duck her head around a corner. It reminded him of running through the Forbidden Forest on a night like this one, nearly a year ago, her hand slippery and tight in his.

In the fug of focus and tension some part of his brain whirled and demanded of its other: Really, now? Here? And the other part replied, in a whinging voice: Yes, always, everywhere.

Besides which, if he was about to round the corner into an Unforgivable, he would do it having had as much as he could of the things he wanted in life. One of them being Hermione's firm insistent little hands pushing up against his back, and the soft rasp of breath against her set teeth, and the impatient little exhale that she made of his name.

Not that he had ever been all too strong in the muscle of self-restraint, but he was certainly not about to develop it here.

It was abnormal how fast they could move. It was the Third Task, and he would have expected something to leap out of the bushes and try to decapitate him, or at least get a few hits in before moving along. He'd read up on previous Tournaments, the sorts of things administrators liked to line up for the grand finale — runespoors and occamies and chimerae, just the sort of nasty customers he'd grown distressingly adept at imagining — but the maze was clear as a duke's garden, simply endless rows of darkness and the beckoning fingers of mist. This was highly suspicious, and he said as much.

"Don't jinx it," muttered Ron. His voice was thin and tinny in the fog. "Maybe they've gone to eat someone else."

"That isn't comforting," hissed Hermione.

"It's not not comforting," said Draco, thinking of Krum.

Something scuttled around the corner. It was a newborn fire salamander, barely large enough to muster a puff of smoke, but when it skittered across Draco's shoe he sucked air through his teeth and hiked his leg back as if bitten. This he elected to blame on poor visibility and the general atmosphere of creep, but it also stalled him at a junction, and in that time Hermione stopped dead like a startled bird, her hand aloft, stalling movement.

The susurrus of wind through the branches cleared and coalesced into human murmur.

"...find him in all…"

"...told to give us a map…"

"...a moving maze…"

Hermione took a half-step back, gesturing frantically for them to retreat, but the whispers abruptly cut.

"Wot — OI!"

"Reducto!"

"BOMBARDA!"

"Stupefy!"

Spells crackled in a blaze of light around the corner, and then there were three soft thuds. Quick footsteps stirred the rustling grass.

"Behind me," said Hermione firmly, her wand up, and there was a bit of blue light at the end that foretold a Shield Charm; and with a noise of irritation, Draco grabbed her arm to haul on it, because she was properly mad if she thought he was going behind anything — him having a better arm than she had, and also being of no mind to watch her get mowed down the first time she met a spell stronger than a fifteen-year-old's ability to cast Protego.

None of which came to pass: Viktor Krum stepped around the corner and let out an exclamation.

“Hermiown?”

“Viktor!” Hermione exclaimed.

“Vat are you doing? You are not supposed to be—”

“I know! It’s off. The Tournament is off. The Task’s compromised—”

“I know this,” he interrupted, patiently. “I haf just Stunned three men. This is not in order. Vat is going on?”

“Death Eaters are trying to kill Harry, we’re trying to stop them, I know it’s a lot but we don’t have much time—”

Viktor frowned. “Death Eater?”

“Bad men in masks who want to kill us for reasons that are complicated but not particularly relevant right now, and we’re running, you should go—”

“Harry Potter, they are trying to kill?” His expression darkened. “Your friend, Harry Potter?”

“Do you know others?” said Draco.

Viktor ignored him. “Harry Potter vill not be harmed,” he said stonily. “Ve must find him.”

“Yes! What?” Hermione blinked. “Why? I mean, I know why — it’s rather selfless of you, of course, but I didn’t think you two—”

“He is coming to help me. Vhen the First Task is still ahead. He comes to me, for nothing, and he tells me of the dragons. For vhat? No return. Who is he? A child. And still he is vorried for his rival of seventeen. The other man, Varrington, he is not doing this.

Varrington, he is doing his duty, and only that. He is serving his country only."

"Could have this conversation on the move," said Ron, edging away. "A movable thing, this conversation."

Viktor ignored him. "For Potter, it does not matter. He is only a boy trying to protect another boy. Of me, he is thinking: 'He is Bulgarian, and my enemy, and but I vill try to help him, for because it is right thing to do.' Vell. He is right. This is as great athletes do, I am thinking. This is sportsmanship."

"A questionable decision, since this may get him killed," said Draco, thinly. "And us, too, come to think of it."

Far from being offended, Viktor nodded. "For you, I am sorry. You have had no choice in this. Great misfortune. Vould it vere not this way. But I chose this task. I am the champion. I put my name into the fire." He drew himself upright. "Harry Potter will not die tonight. You have the word of Viktor Krum."

He cast Lumos, and sent its beam sailing into the dark.

"Onvard," he ordered.

Onward they went.

At the mouth of a wide circular junction they approached with more care than was necessary, since the space's only population was corpses. Six of them, to be precise, all lizardly little things with wide mouths and mushrooms sprouting around their backs, arrayed in the limp sprawl of deadness, half of them in states too bad to identify.

"Dugbogs," said Ron. "Hagrid had us doing them."

"Thank you for that. I had taken them for kittens."

"How d'you reckon Harry did this?" Ron probed through the clearing, astonished. "I wouldn't think… he loved these things, tried to teach one to fetch."

"It's not Harry, it's the Death Eaters," murmured Hermione absently. She was checking the next courtyard for traps. "Trying to clear a path for him, I'd expect."

Ron touched one with the tip of his shoe. "You don't even have to kill them," he said sadly. "Hagrid taught us the tricky bit. You just bop 'em on the snout, they go stiff as a board."

Draco flicked a glance at one, and cut through the clearing. No use dwelling on it.

They broke into a run. A choice of paths ahead winnowed to one with Hermione's whisper of " Point me," which cut them due north, through a volley of arrows that loosed at a height perfect to cull any healthy seventeen-year-old — enough for Viktor and Ron, anyway, though because Hermione reached it first, they triggered a hair too soon — and under coiling arms of Devil's Snare, which erupted from the side of the hedge to meet a swift end with her "Incendio!"

By and by, when she cut ahead a ways, Viktor checked that she was enough ahead to struggle hearing behind her, and touched Draco's arm.

"What?"

"You," he said. "I haf not known your name until now. But you are Malfoy."

"This isn't really the time, Durmstrang."

"She speaks of you very highly," said Viktor seriously. "Herm-own."

"Of course she does," he said tartly, "she's got a brainstem and an optic nerve. Now, about running—"

"I am vishing to make your acquaintance," he said, "because of how she is talking about you. But I am not knowing I haf made it already."

“Listen, if there’s a point to any of this—”

“I know you are not liking me very much,” said Viktor calmly. “And that you are not liking me because you are not liking that I am friendly vith her. I am understanding some things. I am also having vat you call ‘brainstem’ and ‘optic nerve.’”

Draco had nothing to say to that. He kept walking, briskly, and silently, in the hopes that Viktor could learn by example.

“But I am trying to know her friends, as vell. I am not having many friends,” he admitted freely, “except for team. I am flying too much often for that.”

“That’s your misfortune.”

“So I am thinking, you come to Bulgaria vith her,” he said, “and come see game. Ve vill play — vat you call it, here? ‘Friendly’? In off season. She says you fly. She says you are a good flier.” Then, slightly nonplussed: “ Very good, she says. She is alvays remembering it.”

“Does she,” he said, coolly. Then, with all the suspicion it was due: “That’s not a real invitation, I take it.”

His brow furrowed. Or furrowed more, rather. It was hard to alter something that was already one contiguous caterpillar of woe. “I am not being this insincere person,” he said, with more offense than Draco had ever managed to inflict before. “I am not making offers that are not good. You come vith her to Bulgaria. You vatch. You fly. Ve talk. Ve drink. Ve vill come to know each other.”

“Are you serious?”

“I vish to know you,” he said simply. “She is saying you are man vorth knowing. Good man.”

Draco tilted his head and probed his cheek with his tongue.

“Well, it’s perjury, if it’s not slander.”

“Vat?”

“Never mind. If we survive this, then I’d be delighted to go to Bulgaria, though I want it stated for the record that I shall be most unsurprised if an owl somehow mislays that invitation.”

“Vat do you mean?”

“I mean that you’re not subtle, either,” he said irritably. “I’m not eager to act as chaperone on your — courting holiday, and I don’t imagine I’ll be welcome there, either.”

Viktor blinked at him. His eyes were wide and dark as coffee grounds, the fine soft ones fresh out of the grinder, the ones that glittered.

“She is kind,” he said. “She is speaking to me in library, and I am thinking: she is not afraid. She is not vanting anything except to speak, and haf me listen. This is how it is, to haf a friend. You understand.”

“Daring of you.”

“You are understanding,” he urged. “Ve see it both. Every day of my life, the vorld is like this.” He laced his hands together. “But vhen she is speaking, the vorld is like this.” He spread them out, fingers splayed.

“...I’ve no idea what you mean.”

“You do. You are not liking me, because I see vhat you see, and you think I am vanting to take it for myself. No. I am not like this. I do not vant to take her away.” Viktor smiled, tentatively, like his face wasn’t used to it and was afraid of hurting itself. “I vant to come in.”

Draco was quiet.

Because that showed what he knew, really. Showed the colossal, hateful innocence of one Viktor Krum, a seventeen-year-old quidditch star who still somehow managed not to acquire any sense for what other people thought, because that wasn't what Draco felt at all.

If he could have said anything to Viktor — at any rate, anything that he could live with, and anything that didn't run the risk of being overheard — it would be that he was wrong. Wrong in his assumptions, wrong in his suspicions of some good-natured core of him that was soft and sweet and only wanted the best for her, and would just roll over and pant and share with as many people as she pleased. It wasn't like that, his feeling.

He did want to take her away. He wanted to put her somewhere that the world couldn't do anything to do with and hoard her up, every smile, every laugh, every single wink and smirk and nice thing she ever said, all of them only for him, and the worst part was it still wouldn't leave him anything but starving. Which was the whole fucking problem.

He wasn't like Viktor Krum. He didn't want things the same way this boy did, apparently, which was so fucking wholesome butter wouldn't melt. He was a Malfoy. He took the things he wanted. He didn't give them back.

Hermione ducked against the next corner and glared at them, jerking her head: Hurry up!

Viktor hurried up. Draco hung back, striding a heartbeat slower than he could have, because he knew it would annoy her. And because then he'd have another thing that Viktor didn't, another one of those expressions, the could-have-done-it-faster meets glad-you-did-it-at-all. And that was his. It was a glare for him. She didn't let anyone else get away with it.

Around the corner, there was a cobblestone courtyard, and upon a stone plinth at its center stood a silver cup. It was nearly Harry's height, smithed from crystal, and glowed faintly with an ethereal light at the center of the maze. There was no one in the courtyard.

“Thank God,” said Hermione, faint with relief. “We’re in time.”

“Don’t jinx it.” He crept into the courtyard and swept his wand around each of the branching lanes, probing them with Lumos. “He could’ve run into someone else. Oi— don’t you dare.”

Viktor paused, one foot on the plinth, and tore his awestruck stare away from the cup. “Is beautiful,” he said. “Goblin-make. You can tell, by the striations.”

“What striations?” said Hermione curiously.

“My father, he is vorking as metalsmith. He is showing me. Come, come.” He beckoned her.

“Get away from that,” Draco snapped. “It’s a Portkey.”

“Portkey?”

“Yes. It’s a trap for Potter. Touch it, and you’re dead.”

Viktor took back his hand and rubbed it, glancing guiltily at the cup.

Draco turned his back. He shook out his wand and cast Incendio up one of the lanes, setting the grass on fire. Within seconds, tendrils of Devil’s Snare struggled out of the lawn, wriggling for freedom in the dense thicket of the maze walls. Hermione and Viktor were inspecting the Cup, and began discussing something about goblin-silver in low voices.

Fatigue was beginning to settle in. He’d used enough magic that day that his body was faintly warm, with whispers of energy drifting over his skin in an unpleasant crackle, like he was a rapidly disappearing fuse. The strain of casting another Shield Charm would be considerable.

Ron gave a shout. Draco whirled around.

Three figures appeared at the end of the path. They were tall and hooded — he mistook them for Dementors, until he saw the glimmer of bone-white over their faces.

His innards turned to cold water.

The three of them broke into a run. The first brought back his wand — who were they? — and yellow light clustered at the tip — at least it wasn't green — and loosed it in a bolt that soared across the courtyard — Travers? Avery? — and he was the last one to duck, when Ron screamed at him, but he did so, leaping sideways and slapping ungracefully onto the stone.

Yellow magic shattered into the maze wall and set it on fire. Flames billowed up the side of the maze, belching smoke, while the thick scent of burning greenery rose over the clearing.

The Death Eaters were a wall of black gliding down the lane. In his throat there was a knot of something so large and thick it hurt, and it left his lungs burning. Who were they? Igor Karkaroff? Sibelius Nott? Runcorn? Snape?

In the cold gleam of the mask there was nothing, no humor, no mercy, not even a pair of eyes to seek for understanding when they cut you down. And he understood, for perhaps the first time, why they wore them. Not for cowardice, but for strength.

You couldn't plead with a piece of bone.

It's me, I'm Draco, I'm a Malfoy. You knew my father, you served him.

And what would they say? He wasn't Cassius Warrington. He could have been, but he wasn't anymore.

More flames ripped up the sides of the maze, springing from the wands of the other two Death Eaters. The first reached the clearing and pointed his wand at Viktor, who drew his own, grim-faced, and settled into a crouching, eastern dueling stance.

The other two came into the courtyard like a creeping ink stain, nearly silhouetted against the flickering flames. The handle of his wand was a sharp line in his palm, and he couldn't remember a single spell, not one, that would work. The terror was poison. It made him feel dead.

"Clear the altar."

The voice from behind the mask — he was pathetically relieved — it wasn't Snape. It was a deep, nasal Sussex, and he didn't know it. Not that he long dwelled on it, because the man lifted his wand.

"Serpens—"

"Stupefy!"

Something darted out of another path, dark and blurred. The Death Eater sidestepped the red light, letting it sail harmlessly into the flames, but its caster shot into the courtyard and skidded to a halt in front of Hermione, his wiry shoulders heaving with effort.

"Potter!"

"Harry!" roared Ron.

He was scratched and bleeding a bit from his cheek, with all manner of twigs and leaves in his hair, like he'd escaped a rather cutthroat production of A Midsummer Night's Dream, but otherwise, he was patently whole. One of the Death Eaters surged forward, but then — it surprised Draco — the other, their leader, threw out his hand and stopped him.

Then a Death Eater crooked his wand, and blue light forked like lightning over the clearing. Harry whipped around and rolled upright, casting two Stunning Spells like a one-two punch over his shoulder, and skidded around to Draco.

“Alright, Draco?” he shouted, half-wild.

“Me?”

“Yeah! You! Not hurt? No! Hermione—”

Hermione’s Shield Charm exploded into force at the center of the field, catching the bulk of a curse that was red and nastily viscous. Viktor was dueling one of the Death Eaters in a deadlock on the other side of the courtyard, their wands moving in almost inverse motions of spell and counterspell, like a remote ballet at lightspeed.

“Don’t touch the Cup,” Draco snarled. He grabbed Harry’s collar and shook him. “Listen to me. Don’t touch the Cup.”

“Merlin’s taint, really? No shit, I’ve got other things on my mind!”

“That’s not—”

The ground of the courtyard surged and rippled in a shockwave. Viktor’s Death Eater had cast a spell. Bodies flew: Harry’s, who was tossed freely into the air, like he was on an invisible broomstick; Ron, who flipped and landed hard on his stomach; Hermione sailed into one of the maze-walls, and the quick use of a Cushioning Charm stopped her face from being shredded on twigs. Draco backhanded another one on the ground beneath her, and she dropped safely into a round of shattered cobble.

One of the Death Eaters pointed at Harry. He didn’t seem to say anything, just extended one long gloved finger across the burning courtyard, like Death marking out the next head for his scythe.

“Potter!” Viktor roared. Two Death Eaters had cornered him against one of the burning walls, and he was struggling to prevent being herded into the flames. “Run!”

And Harry did — in the wrong direction. He cut sideways, sprinting through the shattered remains of the courtyard, straight for Viktor.

Draco was going to seize. Hermine stumbled up beside him, bleeding from a cut on her lip, and screamed: “Harry!”

It was unclear what he meant to do: at any rate, they never learned, because the third Death Eater sprang forward and swept a long current of force from the side of his wand, sending Harry sailing at the podium. Draco’s heart teleported several stories down out of his body—

But Harry missed the Cup by inches, and instead knocked against the plinth beneath it, his body landing with brutal force on the stone.

One of the Death Eaters whirled to pursue. Draco saw him. The man’s elbow was up, hand poised in the overhand to cast, which opened up his flank for an attack from the right, and Draco didn’t have an eye on him anywhere, he could move fast, he could move freely. He didn’t remember telling his wand what to do. The curse rolled down his arm like it had always been there, like he was passing the quaffle through a basic underhand, his muscle wiser than his brain.

“Reducto.”

The curse bit its target and vanished. There was a piping scream, which he realized belatedly came from inside the mask, and the Death Eater swiped at his side, which had dissolved into a curtain of fine red dust. Flesh and bone sieved into a curtain of glitter on the smoky wind, and viscera spilled from the hole in his chest. The Death Eater went to his knees. Hermione gave a small scream and clapped her hand over her mouth.

Draco’s stomach quaked, once, and then stilled. The instinctive roil of discomfort disappeared. There was a moment when he was staring at a living man, with real flesh and real pain — but he blinked, and it was a Death Eater again, the thing that would've killed him if it could have.

He could put the feeling away. That was interesting.

Viktor, meanwhile, roared approvingly, and kicked the fallen Death Eater in the head. He went over, and Viktor brought his boot down hard once, twice, three times on his face, until the mask gave a hard CRACK, and split in half. Viktor snarled and kicked his head again, letting the mask skitter free in two pieces over the stone.

The man flopped over sideways, unconscious. His hood and sheaf of dark hair spilled over his face, hiding it from view — nauseous, Draco took a half-step forward, and raised his wand, to cast it off, and see who it was—

Harry stirred against the plinth, groaning. Ron barked and took off running for him, but a Death Eater cut his wand back at him and hurled him into one of the burning walls, where he floundered, bellowing.

"Ron!"

Hermione tripped into a run. The Death Eater's wand followed her path across the clearing. Draco broke into a sprint after her.

"Stop!"

"Hermione!"

He got to her before the curse. He didn't exactly know what reservoir of his life's luck he'd spent doing that, and he didn't want to know, but he wasn't too late. He shoved her down and went down hard on top of her, covering her body, and the curse moved harmlessly over their heads, detonating in the air over their heads. His ears rang. He put his hand over her head and shoved it into the ground, and he didn't care if she was furious, he didn't care, didn't care, didn't care. The curses passed over them like a firestorm happening six inches from their head. Her clothes were hot with smoke and exertion and her own residual magic, and she wrestled under him, trying to throw him off, shouting about something he couldn't make out and didn't care about.

He rolled up onto his knees and saw what had happened while he went down. Harry had staggered up on the podium, holding his head in one hand and his wand in the other. His glasses were askew, and one lens was cracked. The Death Eaters had turned back to him.

The first spell wasn't a jinx at all. It was Flipendo, the telltale green pinwheel. Harry dodged it, and the next, and threw back a few feeble curses. His foot slipped back onto the platform, and something sank into the plinth. A rumble like a grinding whetstone took up under the platform, and the cup began to sink into the plinth, its glow sharpening, like it housed the birth of a star.

His ears cleared somewhat, and he finally heard what Hermione was screaming. It was Harry.

A Death Eater threw his wand out, and Harry dodged again, with the seeker's reflexes that had never failed him once. A perfect sidestep.

Which meant the Death Eater's Summoning Spell hit the Cup behind him. And it hurtled off its plinth as if it meant to embrace him.

"POTTER!"

They were all too far. Ron was rolling in flame, Hermione pinned, and Draco too far away.

So it was Viktor who, with a monumental effort of the body — his great, lumbering, ungainly quidditch player's body, that never once moved on land with a tenth of the grace it did in air — launched himself at Harry. So it was Viktor who knocked into him, slamming him sideways, and for a moment the two boys hurtled free, wrapped together, spinning in air like the twirling arc of a helix.

Then the Cup knocked Viktor’s ankle, and gleamed white.

The clearing became a field of light. It outshone the flames. Someone was screaming. The light was so bright that it seemed to blot out even sound, like the world was glitching.

When shadow and figure returned, Death Eaters were gone, and so were the two remaining champions. And the clearing was full of three children, rubble, and smoke.

The riddle is a modified excerpt from Mezzo Cammin, a sonnet by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.

Bottom of the ninth, and we're really in it now. I hope it doesn't disappoint. Thank you so much for everything.

The Last Stand of Barty Crouch

Chapter 54: The Last Stand of Barty Crouch

The sound was shrill and high, ragged with the horrible harmonies of grief. Draco fumbled for Hermione — for her arm, her shoulder, any evidence that she was still there, and hadn't vanished with the light — and she was, fumbling back at him, her hand knotted in the front of his shirt like she could haul him out of hell by that grip alone — but it wasn't her scream.

The sound was Ron, who staggered out of the burning bush, smoke still trailing from his singed cloak, and reached for the plinth like it had taken one of his lungs.

"He's dead!"

Hermione's breath hitched, and her grasp on Draco's shirt tightened. "No," she said. "It isn't — maybe he might not — Viktor's with him, he could—"

"He's dead!" Ron was wild. He raked his hands through his hair, dislodging clouds of ash. "That's what he said, remember? They're taking him to kill him. And they got him, and he's gone, and oh God, oh my God, he's dead. Harry's dead."

"Stop saying that," Draco snapped. His throat stung from the smoke. He pushed himself upright, found that Hermione refused to let go, and nearly toppled over again. Fumbling, he hauled her up, too, by the elbows, and set her on unsteady feet. "We don't know anything. Do you see a body? No. Me neither."

Ron ignored him. "We failed, and he's dead," he said hoarsely. "The last thing I ever said to him — it was 'Good luck.' That's all. I never told him… he was… he was my brother. I never said…"

“He knew that,” said Draco, full of a deep, painful alchemy of fury and pity. “Merlin. Is that what you’re worried about? Dead or alive, if there was one thing he knew, it was that. Don’t be absurd.”

A deep groan emitted from the ground, like the earth was rolling in its sleep. The walls trembled, and then they began to fall: row upon row of hedges keeling over, as if the process of growing had been cut in reverse. Their gnarled limbs shriveled into stumps and shrank into the grass. The Anti-Enchantment spell overhead cracked and peeled back, shards petering into nothingness like a great split egg, and the quidditch stands emerged from behind the toppling walls.

The maze fell, and they found themselves standing in the wide open arena of the quidditch pitch, under the cruel bath of the floodlights.

The stands had been evacuated, but the Ministry remained, in a huddle with several professors and mediwizards, all of them hunched together under the dull glaze of wandlight. When the maze fell, shouting erupted, and there was a massive surge towards the three of them — Draco raised his wand, instinctively, afraid on some level that the next thing he would see was a Stunning Spell — but then one shoved in front of the pack, crossing the pitch at professional speeds.

Minerva McGonagall executing a dead sprint was one of the most terrifying things he’d ever seen in his life.

“Malfoy! Weasley! Granger! Are you alright?”

“Professor! No — no, it’s Harry—”

“Are you hurt? Weasley? Weasley! Come here! You’re burned! And you, Granger, you’re cut—”

McGonagall gave Draco a hard rattle, and her hands found his cheeks, his temples, his hair. He was disgruntled and stunned still by the way that she handled him, with a rough, ruthless kindness that his mother wouldn’t have dreamed of — but it wasn’t unlike his mother’s gestures, either, the way that she silently asserted an almost proprietary discretion in interrogating his immediate bodily safety, as if his body were something that she had loaned him for safekeeping and she was furious with him for endangering it.

Satisfied, she gave him a hard, absentminded shake, and swept immediately on to Hermione, healing her cuts with a single brisk flick of her wand. “What on earth are you doing here? How could you be so reckless? Foolish girl! Students were ordered to evacuate!”

“Harry,” Ron said numbly. He was still staring at the place where Harry had disappeared. “We were going to… we were s’posed to… get Harry.”

“What? And where is Potter?”

“The Cup was a Portkey,” said Hermione. She took a step forward, swayed perilously, and lurched sideways. Draco caught her and held her up, letting her use his arm as a brace. “Harry touched it. With Viktor. And they disappeared.”

“What?” McGonagall froze. “What do you mean, Potter disappeared? Where did he go?”

A roar of noise swallowed them. The others had finally caught up, and they were thronged with people, mediwizards first, and then the Ministry men, bellowing for order, and the professors: Dumbledore, first, his face more grave and drawn than Draco had ever seen, and Fleur, Maxime, Karkaroff, Madame Pomfrey, and a dozen others he didn’t even get a glimpse of before the crowd surged, and they were packed in, being dragged in a dozen different directions, being interrogated by at least a dozen voices, his thoughts drowned out by the shriek of a panicking body of people.

“WHERE IS HE?” Karkaroff was roaring. “WHERE IS VIKTOR?”

And he wasn’t even the loudest: the Ministry workers were trying to wriggle in between the mediwizards, snarling at them for answers, and Dumbledore and McGonagall had converged on Ron, who had sunk to his knees and started to scream again, both of them hunched down in the universal kind postures of caretakers tending to a frightened animal.

Someone shoved them sideways, and Hermione was thrown into his chest. She snarled, kicking at them, and he dragged her out of the way.

She pressed close to him and shouted in his ear: “—to — find o— Harry is!”

“How?”

“Theodore Nott!” she shouted. “—plan — knows — taking him!”

“We don't know where he is, either!”

“—check the castle! Students were evacuated! He knew what was happening — he wouldn't stay around—”

Right. Well, then.

He dug in his heels and grabbed her hand, and shoved through the crowd with all his strength. The bodies parted, not willingly, but he muscled through and wriggled through the tight channel of deadlocked bodies, ignoring the horrible smell of sweat and must and smoke, breaking at last onto the open field and breaking into a run.

There were shouts; they ignored them. They raced over the pitch and broke the stands, rocketing up sawdusted hallways and around old corners littered with cigarette butts, breaking at last into the starry windless night and onto the long clear hill up to the castle. A distance of how far he didn’t know, but he knew the fastest path up the pebbled hills, the little foxholes that hid to snare your legs, and he knew where to put his feet so he could very nearly fly, running like he and the ground where in agreement on the need for haste, and it was ushering him along.

A dark figure stepped onto the path in front of them, and in his frayed state, he very nearly mistook the white pallid face for a mask. His wand was out and spitting red before he could tell the difference.

Barty Crouch roared in surprise, recoiling, and knocked his jinx aside. Draco flew to a halt, and Hermione nearly tripped into the dirt.

“Boy! What the devil are you doing?”

“Mr. Crouch,” Hermione gasped. “We’re so sorry—”

“Don’t apologize to him, he’s the one who jumped out of bloody nowhere, serves him right—”

“—what are you doing here? I thought you were fired!”

“That’s correct,” gritted Crouch, and he lowered his wand. “I am here in an unofficial capacity.”

“...What does that mean?”

“It means that many men here tonight have abdicated their duty,” he said grimly. “I will not be one of them. Come. I will take you to the castle, Professor Moody must speak with you.”

“Professor Moody?”

“The hell does he have to do with anything—”

“—can’t spare the time, sir, I’m very sorry—”

“—think he is, sending you to fetch us—”

“—we have to get to Gryffindor Tower, there’s something there I really need—”

“—if you had any idea what we’ve been through tonight—”

“If you want to see your friend again, you will come with me, and quickly,” said Crouch coldly. “I have no time to dwell in this field of sorrow. Haste is key.”

“...You mean Harry?” Hermione was stunned. “What do you know about him? How do you know—”

“It is my misfortune that I was not swift enough to save young Potter. But there may still be time. Come; you must trust me.” He turned, but when they did not follow, he exhaled sharply, in irritation. “Children! Come! I demand it.”

“Who you are to demand anything,” Draco said icily, “is of interest to me, being that you’ve neither title nor authority, and we’ve little reason to trust strange men insisting that they’re acting in our best interest. It’s nothing personal; it’s only been an issue, previously, and I’m not keen on it happening again.”

“I am not Corban Yaxley.”

Hermione twitched; Draco kept his wand-hand steady.

Crouch repeated, low with frustration, “I am not Sibelius Nott. I am here to save a child’s life. That is all.”

“You’ve done a fine job, then, haven’t you?”

“Now is not the time to litigate my failures.” Crouch didn’t even flinch. His expression was simply flat, like a bit of slate. “My name is Bartemius Crouch, and I mean you no harm. I swear it.” His eyes, like cold pieces of flint, slid to Draco. “I swear it,” he repeated, stiffly, “on the land and the blood and the name of my father, which is now mine, and ever will be.”

Draco set his jaw.

“It bears mentioning,” he said, stabbing his wand into its sheath, “that I don’t know your father, or whether you give a damn about him, so that could still mean nothing, as far as I’m concerned.” Still, he flicked his hand irritably at Crouch, indicating him to lead the way.

Satisfied, the man turned and began marching up the hill. They followed.

“What? What was that?” Hermione’s voice was low. “What did he say? Was that a special kind of promise?”

“It’s a very serious vow.”

“A magical vow?”

“No. But if he’s lying, it’s a curse on his house.”

“What? A real one?”

“As real as it can be, without magic.”

“So — not real,” she said doubtfully, but he shook his head.

“It’s not a promise you make lightly. It’s not a ‘cross my heart’ kind of thing. It’s a ‘death and ruin on my descendants if I lie to you’ type of thing.”

“But it isn’t properly magical,” she insisted, though they were now climbing into the shadow of the castle, which suggested her objection was more pedantic than pragmatic. Crouch swept back the door with a motion of his wand, and they hurried into the dimly lit Great Hall, where small beads of torchlight peppered the gloom. Through the eerie, dusted hallways, they ascended, following the whisper of Crouch’s cloak up the stairs to the third floor. “So you could say it and not mean it.”

“No. You could, but culturally, it’d be repulsive to — put it this way. I wouldn’t say it without meaning it, and you know my position as regards lying.”

“‘Safely, well, and very often’?”

“‘Acceptable when necessary,’ thank you, and either Crouch is the same, or he doesn’t think he’ll live long enough for it to matter. Either way, I don’t think he’d let us totter off to Gryffindor Tower if we said no. Do you?”

Hermione pursed her lips, and her silence agreed.

Moody’s office door was ajar when they reached the third floor, but Crouch surprised them by breezing past it, soaring up a set of stairs, and ducking past the open wing of a griffin statue. They were going to Dumbledore’s office.

“Why are we going to the headmaster’s office, sir?” Hermione called curiously.

“The headmaster’s office has an operational floo grate. It is the only route of magical ingress inside the castle.”

“Are we expecting someone, then?”

“You will see.”

He swept up to the door and burst it open without knocking. Inside that old dark wood study, the silver instruments twinkled slightly in the breeze of the flying door, and there, cast in golden light by the guttering fireplace, were Mad-Eye Moody and Theodore. His face had been healed, and the bloodstains on his collar had no twins on his face. Only faint crusts of brown on his neck marked the places where he’d been hurt, earlier; he was twisting and wringing his hands.

“Draco,” he gasped, and hurried to the door. “Thank Merlin.”

The jinx caught him in the face, with a wet POP! , and capillaries bloomed over his eye.

“OW! WHAT THE HELL—”

Draco snarled and lunged.

He landed three more jinxes, laying bright beautiful welts over Theo's wailing face, before Mad-Eye got between them and hauled him off with a grunt, shoving him against the wall. A flick of Mad-Eye's wand threw Theo into a chair and lashed him to it, where he wrestled and snapped, blood weeping faintly from one of his welts.

"How does it feel?" said Draco. His blood was fire. He could feel every nerve in his body, and they were all glowing with magic, fatigue gone, eager to serve. His wand wanted to move, it wanted to curse, it liked to do it. "How does it feel to have killed someone? Tell me."

"I didn't! It wasn't me! It wasn't my fault, you arse, I tried to tell you!"

"I asked you how it felt—"

"Enough," snarled Mad-Eye, "enough of that, now, enough!"

"—to be a killer, Nott."

Theo roared. It wasn't a pleasant sound, and it didn't seem directed at Draco, either, but at the world in general: an issuance of complaint, the expelling of something inside him, dark and built-up and long-suffering, that now came out in a rattling roar that scraped his windpipe raw.

"I didn't choose this! They'd have killed me if I didn't, Draco, you shit, don't you understand, I never chose— "

"Then you should've—"

Hermione made some sort of sound, but he could hardly hear her over the roar in his ears.

"Should've done what?"

The expression on Theo's face was indescribable. He repeated, "Should've done what?"

"Enough."

Mad-Eye shoved Draco against the wall again, and he fell silent. "You're no Auror, boy. Stop playing inquisitor. There's whole dimensions of this you don't know."

"I know he helped the Death Eaters." He made eye contact with Theo over Mad-Eye's shoulder, caught the glitter of panic there. "Did you know that? He let them into Hogsmeade last year. He conspired with them to plant the Portkey. I wouldn't be surprised if he put Potter's name in the Goblet—"

"No," interrupted Crouch. He shut the door and stood in front of it, his arms folded behind his back, like he was presenting a report. "He didn't."

"Then who did?" said Hermione.

Crouch jerked his chin at Mad-Eye. Mad-Eye grunted and released Draco, who dropped to his feet and straightened his shirt. His blood still boiled. He eyed Theo, but didn't jinx him, and after a probing glare, Mad-Eye stepped back.

"Theodore Nott is a protected witness," Crouch said quietly. "His safety is vouchsafed by the Ministry of Magic."

"He's what?"

"More importantly, it's vouchsafed by me," grunted Mad-Eye, hobbling over to Dumbledore's desk. He leaned against it, resting his wooden leg. "So quit jinxing him, boy. It's not unimpressive, but he's not your enemy."

Draco ground his teeth, and by a hair-thin margin of self-control, he obeyed.

“Granger asked a question.”

“Ludo Bagman,” Crouch said briskly, crossing to the desk. He began rifling through papers.

Her jaw dropped.

“Ludo Bagman? The gambler?”

“The same.”

“How did he—and for what purpose?”

“Ministry administrators have permissions to cross the age line,” said Crouch, examining one document before tossing it away, “and Bagman had the particular responsibility of tailoring the Goblet’s enchantments before the Tournament. It is my suspicion that he entered Mr. Potter’s name under a fictional fourth school, and during the reaping, it selected Mr. Potter as the only candidate. However, since he has fled the country, we shall never know.”

“Fled the country? He was here just earlier today!”

“Indeed. Once the Third Task collapsed, he was seen fleeing to Hogsmeade, where Apparation traces suggest that he made several short-term jumps to dispel tracking enchantments, before finally leaving the country. I do not believe that there will be much effort to find him, however; he was not the true culprit.”

“Not the true culp— why on earth would he do that to Harry?” She voiced both of their confusion. “Is Bagman a Death Eater?”

“No,” said Theo, hoarsely. “But he owes my father two million galleons.”

Hermione mouthed wordlessly at him. “Million,” she repeated. “Million? As in…”

“Million as in million, yes,” he drawled. “Million as in debtor’s prison, if certain creditors get restless. So he’s very keen on cost-efficient deals, such as, ‘You put this bit of paper in that big cup thing, and I won’t liquidate your organs for cash.’”

“We thought he was gambling on Harry,” said Hermione, staring. “We thought—”

“Oh, I’m sure he was. No reason to let an opportunity go to waste, is there? I suspect he grew guilty about it, especially once the Tasks started, though; he kept whinging about his conscience.” Theo snorted. “His conscience! Bloody hypocrite. He was downright nasty to me, too, at the end there, blaming me for getting him involved, saying I’d put blood on his hands, with Potter… which might be fair enough, honestly. My father only had to get him involved in the first place because I’d failed with the Goblet. Banged up my hand something ferocious, too, since apparently Aging Potion isn’t worth the piss it tastes like.” He smiled bitterly at the floor.

“But you didn’t really want Harry to win,” said Hermione, like she was trying to convince herself of something. “You were helping Cassius. Because you knew… you didn’t want Harry to…?”

“What, Cassy? He was an extracurricular project. He’s practically the Minister’s nephew, he couldn’t very well lose. And he was leaning on me pretty hard, near the end there— couldn’t sneeze in the dungeons without a ‘What ho, Nott, what’s this Third Task about, then?’ Utter idiot. But he’d be suspicious if I didn’t help him, and my father was under orders to ensure the Tournament went a certain way.”

“To fix it, you mean.”

“The Ministry didn’t spend all this money to haul in some foreigners and ship the trophy off with them. This was Runcorn’s baby. It would be good for morale, he said. It would inspire faith in Hogwarts, after the past three years’ failures. The alternative being a complete administrative overhaul, a few sackings, and far more money than anyone wanted to spend on installing closer Ministry supervision at the school. Which is going to happen anyway, now, I expect. So that's my silver lining." He laughed hollowly.

"It was a morale exercise?" Hermione was furious. "A bit of, what, advertising? Dragons? Drowning? All that for some stupid—"

"—piece of political philosophy? That was my reaction, too," said Theo calmly. "I voted for a quidditch tournament. But anyway, I've made a hash of it, so don't you worry. They'll not be advertising bugger-all about this. No ideas were communicated in the making of this disaster."

The silver instruments above twinkled discordantly, like windchimes. One of them had started to spin and let off a thin, panicky whistle.

"But Sibelius Nott had his own agenda," interrupted Mad-Eye. He clamped a gnarled claw on the back of Theo's chair, like a roosting vulture. "Tell 'em what you did, boy."

"Lord, must I? Fine. Draco, you know about the dragon tip-off, and it appears you made the best of it. Cheers to you. I had some books for you, too, if you'd ever sodding bother to ask—"

"You stole the library books?"

"It's not stealing, I got a permission slip," he said mildly. "I happen to attend this school. I would've tried harder with the Second Task, too, but Draco was unusually obstinate — I think I've you to thank for that, Granger, and tell the Bleeding-Heart Bureau to give you a commendation, you've got hooks in him I don't think even he knows about."

"What are you talking about?" she snapped. "You never so much as offered—"

But he had.

“Quilliam Coalhend,” said Draco. She broke off. “You invited me to his talk at the League meeting in January. ‘Revolutionized the use of aquatic plants in Potioneering.’ He was going to talk about gillyweed, wasn’t he?”

Theo shrugged. “Might’ve done.”

“And the gillyweed stolen from Snape’s stores. That was you, as well.”

“I had to make sure Cass didn’t get it,” said Theo, annoyed. “After all, he came to Coalhend’s meeting, and you didn’t. First thing he did afterward was pop off to Snape and ask for it. Not my fault you’re thick and slow.”

“Did you flood the bathroom, too?” Hermione interrupted.

“What?”

“The third floor bathroom flooded. That’s how we solved the egg, Professor Moody gave us the password to the prefects’ bath. Did you engineer that?”

“I didn’t do anything to the bathroom,” said Theo curiously, craning his neck about Mad-Eye.

Mad-Eye grunted. The glint in his eye was crafty and only slightly sheepish. “Caught the Warrington boy skulking around somewhere he oughtn’t have been,” he admitted. “Reckoned Snape was helping him out. Thought it might be fair to even the odds, score-wise. With Potter.”

Crouch pivoted, his hands on his hips, and shot him a look.

“Really, Alastor.”

“The boy was cheating!”

“That isn’t some sort of license—”

“It was more than hard enough for Potter on his own—”

“—interference in a Ministry event, if I’ve told you once I’ve told you a thousand times—”

“—no use pretending this was a fair fight—”

“—should’ve contacted the authorities if you suspected wrongdoing —”

“—jinxed the brat’s legs into a pretzel and it still wouldn’t have been even—”

“—against the rules, which exist for a reason, need I remind you.”

“You needn’t,” said Mad-Eye, and Crouch made an irritated sound, rolling his eyes.

“Anyway,” said Theo, faintly, after a moment. “Potter got second seeding in the maze, for being the runner-up. Father said there’d be men along to keep Cass out of the way until Potter could get there; it was only a matter of making sure nobody got to it first. Of course, Cassius had to be the winner by default, so once Potter was… taken care of… they would announce… anyway, it was a — delicate thing. I can’t tell you how many sleepless nights—”

“How strenuous for you,” Hermione said coldly. Theo winced.

“You were talking about Ludo Bagman,” Draco said to Crouch. “You and Snape and Dumbledore. You weren’t talking about Moody, you were talking about Bagman. Going after him.”

Crouch quirked a thick grey eyebrow at him. “How you know that,” he said, “I would be intrigued to hear.”

“Walls have ears in this castle,” Mad-Eye grunted. “Don’t be surprised. No, it wasn’t me, boy. Snape thought Bagman came rifling through his gillyweed stash, sent Barty after him. Had him arraigned for questioning and everything, recitation of charges, the great sodding idiot, might as well have sounded the bells. So this one—" He kicked Theo's chair, and Theo yelped— "ran to Papa, and told on him, and they put paid to that. Had his office clean by five o'clock. I don't suppose I need to tell any of you what would've happened after that, now, if Junior here hadn't ratted out to me. I assume none of you have heard lately from Bertha Jorkins."

This last was rather pointed, and aimed in Crouch's direction. Crouch's mouth flattened. "It was the right thing to do," he said. "There were protocols."

"It's the reason Ludo Bagman's somewhere buried in the Caribbean instead of hog-tied at my feet, Barty."

"Which makes them no less compulsory," he said, "for an employee of the Ministry, much less one who is no longer an Auror."

"You should've come to me, then."

Crouch said nothing, but the look that passed between them was tremulous and old, like an ancient bridge worn thin by traffic, and held now only by the surface tension of its crumbling pillars.

"Doesn't matter, though," said Mad-Eye gruffly, turning away. "Doesn't matter. Worked out alright, just the same."

Draco wasn't paying all too much attention to the geriatric melodrama happening to his left; he was focused on the boy at his right.

"You ratted?"

"My father said he was going to kill somebody," Theo snapped. "Of course I ratted. I told you, I didn't want this."

"Why Moody? Why not Snape?"

"You trust Snape?" Theo gave a shrill laugh. "With Dumbledore's leash on him? You're even more foolish than I thought."

“But you knew,” said Hermione, whirling on Mad-Eye. “If Theo told you everything, then you knew the Third Task was compromised! And you didn’t do anything about it?”

“Hold your hippogriffs, girlie. Young Nott told me Barty was in danger because of who he’d gone after, not what his father was doing, or why he’d got Bagman in a headlock. I didn’t have all the information until an hour ago.”

“And besides,” said Crouch calmly, “we had no ability to influence the Tournament’s operation. Lord Nott controls that machinery. Attempting to use young Mr. Nott’s testimony to halt the proceedings, absent stronger evidence of wrongdoing, would have placed his life in great danger for no profit.”

“As opposed to now, when we’re doing what, exactly?”

Crouch hiked up his sleeve to check his wristwatch. “Waiting,” he said.

“Waiting for what?” she demanded.

“For Sibelius Nott to receive word that I have his son in custody,” said Crouch calmly, “and have administered to him four ounces of veritaserum, as of nine twenty-two P.M., Greenwich Mean Time. And that I expect him in the study of Albus Dumbledore, Hogwarts Headmaster, at no later than ten o’clock P.M., to report for arrest.”

“What!” Hermione was shocked. “I — but that’s highly — did you?”

Theo snorted. “I’d bite his fucking finger off if he tried.”

“It strikes me as unnecessary to inform Lord Nott that Theodore testified willingly,” said Crouch. He drew back his sleeve and folded his hands behind his back crisply. “I am not in the business of endangering star witnesses.”

“But he’s his father,” said Hermione.

Theo guffawed. She stared at him.

“No, really. He wouldn’t… would he?”

“It’s a great joke, Granger, that you’d dare to suppose what my father would and wouldn’t do,” said Theo. “Did you know he’s been in contact with Peter Pettigrew since August? Pettigrew, who happens to be involved in things so deep my father won’t even tell me about them? And for perspective, here’s what my father thinks is an age-appropriate assignment for me — how about I help put a Herald in the air over a symbol of international magical unity, eh? How’s that for a character testimonial?”

She looked like she’d been struck.

“You’re Mimsy’s family,” she said. “The house-elf they have in custody. She’s yours, isn’t she?”

“Property of the state, now, technically.”

Hermione’s knuckles were white on her wand-grip. “I thought your father didn’t have his wand at the Cup.”

“He didn’t have his wand,” said Theodore comfortably, kicking his feet up on the ottoman. “That was missing all day. Which he complained about. Loudly. To several prominent people.”

“You fetched him a spare, didn’t you?” said Draco. He found that the few reserves of pity he’d withheld for Theo, at the mention of his betrayal to Mad-Eye, had vanished rapidly at the reminder of the Dark Mark. He recalled the nights he’d woken in cold sweat from dreams of floating bodies in the sky, and Hermione’s scream dwindling on the air, and he found very little fucking forgiveness in himself at all. “That was why you were Apparating around. Trying to be in multiple places at once. Was it your wand he used?”

“No,” said Crouch, relieving an increasingly uncomfortable Theo of the need to speak. “The boy’s wand was tested in the initial investigation. Hawthorn, seven and a half inches, brittle. Guilty of several minor incidents of underage spellcasting, attributed at the time to accidental magic—"

"Apparation," grunted Mad-Eye.

"—but not Morsmordre. It was checked."

"The wand that cast the Mark belonged to Bertha Jorkins," said Theo. To this he was answered with a fourfold silence.

He added, "While living, anyway."

Hermione made no sound, but if her knuckles got any whiter on her wand they'd be transparent. He wondered what spell she was holding on her tongue.

It was the first thought he'd had in a while. The rest of his brain was reeling to haul all of the filing cabinets back into place from where they'd been knocked over. Put the papers back in order, try like hell to alphabetize. Get the facts in the row, then figure out what to do about them. If there was anything to do about them. Which there might not be.

When the fireplace burst green, only the children jumped. The two adults turned with expressions like men watching the bottom fall out of a gallows, and did not evince slightest surprise when Sibelius Nott strode out of the grate.

"Good evening," he said, and took a long, cold look around the room. After the initial beat of silence, he nodded to Crouch. "I received your note."

"'Night, Dad," said Theo, quietly.

Sibelius gave him a considering glance. "They've hurt you," he said, and though it wasn't exactly affectionate, it wasn't pleased, either.

"What, are you jealous?" said Theo, and tried for a grin.

Sibelius narrowed his eyes. But the corner of his mouth bent, in a wretched, crooked little snarl, and with a pang of disgust, Draco recognized it as humor.

He'd seen that smirk. He couldn't remember where.

"Lord Nott, you are under arrest," said Crouch. He drew his wand, oddly formal, like he was unsheathing a sword. Mad-Eye just yanked it out and stabbed it at Nott as if it were a shiv. "You are charged with conspiracy and treason against the Ministry of Magic. You are charged with child endangerment, child abuse, criminal neglect, and attempted murder in the first degree. You are charged with aiding and abetting terrorism against the British Empire."

"I always thought we should've killed you, Barty," said Sibelius, quietly, reflectively. "There were opportunities. You always were such a hatefully lifeless creature, no faith, no loyalty to anything that wasn't part of parliamentary procedure."

"You are charged with the performance of illegal magics. You are charged with inciting others to perform illegal magics on your behalf. You are charged with the creation of forbidden imagery, including the Dark Mark of Lord Voldemort. You are charged—"

"The only reason I bothered to keep you alive was for your son. He begged the Dark Lord for your life. He went down on his hands and knees, and said that he would keep you drugged, harmless, under Imperius, if only alive. Did you know that? I must thank Alastor for liberating me of that inconvenience." Sibelius indicated Mad-Eye with his wand. "I imagine that was the last time he was useful to anyone."

Mad-Eye spat.

Sibelius looked at it, then at him. His lip crooked further.

"He never begged for you, though."

Hermione’s breath caught. Draco stared into the heart of a fourteen-year grudge and realized that what lay at the heart of it was that, just that, plain and simple: a dead boy and the fathers who failed him, the scent of his corpse still hanging in the air between them, his existence still as fresh a wound as the day they laid him in the dirt.

He rolled his wand into a western underhand, and shifted his feet apart. Magic crackled like static in the air. One of the instruments whistled keenly.

It was the Sneak-O-Scope. He could have laughed.

“Commend your soul to whatever creature will take it,” said Crouch, and lifted his wand. “My son is dead. When you see him, tell him he is not forgiven.”

With a whisper of static, bolts of magic crossed and glanced off each other in the air. Each spell piped and shattered against some instrument or bit of furniture in the overstuffed office, sending chairs rocketing into walls, shattering decorations, fountaining glass into the air. The air was thick with energy and hot with woodsmoke and the dry useless air of summer, sickly sweet, flowers on the glen. Sibelius marched forward like an automaton for a duelist’s class, block, parry, pivot, but Mad-Eye was right, Nott wasn’t a duelist, and even if he had been, he still wasn’t Mad-Eye Moody.

The old auror kicked a table into Sibelius’s face and roared, sent two hands of snarling rope at his ankles, ribboned a current of fire into his face, and followed it with a flying spear of shattered glass, all in the first three heartbeats of the fight — dueling like genius, dueling like a duel was something he’d invented five minutes ago. Draco had thought he himself was fairly good at dueling — he’d been a fool, a bare wretched fool, but in his defense, he hadn’t realized there was this much good to be had. At that moment, someone could have convinced him that Mad-Eye single-handedly ended the first Wizarding War himself, with five minutes and a sock of coins.

“Merlin’s blood,” marveled Theo, sounding like he’d had similar thoughts.

Behind him, his partner followed with a volley of defensive spells. Compared to Mad-Eye, Crouch was less flashy, but there was something in the perfect lockstep of his execution — shot, backstep, counter, forestep, shot, backstep — and his speed, which made it almost hard to tell everything that he was doing perfectly. He snapped aside one of Sibelius’s curses and whirled it around like it was a physical piece of string. This was how dueling was supposed to look, dueling-as-theory, the violent potential of magic made manifest in two men who knew the wide dark universe of what it could do.

Sibelius couldn’t hold them for long. He sprang back and nearly hit the grate, ripped a Shield out of the air and thrust it at them. Mad-Eye and Crouch dropped into a holding pattern, waiting for the Shield to drop, and Sibelius feinted right. This fooled nobody but made unanticipated the leftward flick of his wand, which sent a green bolt leaping across the room, sailing wide of Crouch, in a spell that would have missed dramatically had its target not been instead Hermione, whose arm — the world was moving slowly, now — was rising with apparently exaggerated lethargy, up, up, to summon a Shield Charm.

For the second time that night, he found himself lunging for her. For the first time, he wasn’t fast enough.

Crouch was, though.

He stepped between Hermione and Sibelius, raised his wand, and dispelled the curse with a brisk flick of his hand.

“A second charge of attempted murder,” he said, “against a Hogwarts student.”

“You can’t prove murder, Barty,” said Sibelius. His breath came fast, and he still hunkered behind the shield. Mad-Eye prowled to and fro around it like a caged wolf. “That was always your problem. You could say it, but you couldn’t prove it.”

“I do not require proof,” said Crouch, with the first ghost of real anger on his face. “I am not an auror. I follow no law in this except the oldest. Know that when I do this, I do not act on behalf of the Ministry of Magic.”

Then he snarled and said, “Cru—”

“Expelliarmus.”

Crouch’s wand sprang from his hand and soared high. It pinwheeled into the waiting hand of Theodore, who stood, slack ropes piled in the chair behind him.

Sibelius’s shield flickered out.

“Theo,” said Draco, sharply. He hauled Hermione behind him — she let out an aggrieved shout, trying to shove him away — but he wasn’t making any more mistakes. He just had to convince Theo not to, either. “Nott. Theodore. Be intelligent about this.”

Theo turned to him. He had no smile on his face, no laughter, not even his characteristic smirk. In him was only dread, the dull dread, the kind that didn’t even bother to steer away from the cliff face.

“Sorry,” he said. “He’s my dad. You understand.”

“No, I don’t.”

Theo lifted his wand at Crouch, who slowly raised his hands. His face was stern, but not hateful. The anger was gone. Left in its place was only the miserable vestiges of regret. The unfathomable tiredness of a man who, perhaps, knew that he was about to speak in vain.

“Put it down, boy,” he said. “There’s still time—”

“Avada kedavra.”

It wasn’t Theo. It was his father, whose spell whistled through the air left by his dispelled Shield Charm.

Green light.

Thump, ,muffled on the carpets, crumpled on the floor.

Hermione, screaming.

Time seemed to trip over itself, as if it had seen Crouch’s body drop, and feared trodding on it. Crouch’s wand rolled free of his hand, which was slack, all its muscles relaxed, with an ease that life had never given them. For once, that hunched, tightly wound body slipped into a pose of utter rest, and was gone.

Hermione shoved him. He stumbled behind the bookcase while the colored lights flared; she was trying to herd him out of the way, and it took his numb brain a moment to pick up on it. He pulled her into the little alcove and wedged them both against the wall. Body over hers. Head over her shoulder, his hand cradling her head.

Heart doing something it shouldn’t. Breath doing something it shouldn’t. Brain doing something it shouldn’t. Well, what else was new.

He’d watched a man die and his head was a clean white series of instructions, which were: not her; not you. Not her, not you.

Press his face into her neck, breathe. Hear her screaming the bloody obvious, inches from his ear. In her hair, the smell of smoke and flowers, like someone had set the glen alight. Fire. That was Hermione, at her core, wasn’t it. The fire, the gleam, the little gold things that sat at the bottom of a hearth.

He didn’t want to die.

Mad-Eye was roaring. Spells sounded and explosions rattled the office, silver instruments plummeting like falling stars of flame like comets, and Sibelius and Mad-Eye were dueling again, while everything in the earth screamed except for him. More green lights, reflected on the small glimpse of wall he could see.

Then there was a horrible, fleshy sound, and a howl, and when he turned Mad-Eye was down, clutching his face, while blood poured from between his fingers.

Sibelius lifted his hand, and through the slick coat of blood in his palm, Draco glimpsed the shine of a blue glass eye.

“Why, you’re asymmetrical,” he said wryly, and closed his fingers over the eye. He pointed his wand at Mad-Eye’s face. “I’ll assist you.”

“Dad,” said Theo raggedly. “Let’s just go. It’s enough. Can’t we just — let’s go?”

Sibelius shrugged him off. “Leave,” he said. “To Hangleton. Go.”

“But—”

“Now, Theodore.”

Theo went. He crossed to the Floo and took a handful of powder, hesitated, and turned back — not for his father, but to Draco.

“Tell her,” he pleaded, and it took a confounding second to realize he wasn’t talking about Hermione. “Tell her what I did. All of it, not just — this.”

Draco lifted his wand for a spell whose name he didn’t yet know and was saved from ever knowing when the door burst open. Theodore hastily stepped into the fireplace, blurting something that Draco couldn’t make out, and disappeared in a blaze of green.

And then there were people coming into the room, many people, enough that he couldn't see them all, but he knew the one who came first, because the lash of white through her dark hair was the same shade as his own.

"Stand down," ordered his mother, with the cold tone of a woman not given to issuing ineffectual commands.

Sibelius whisked his wand around at her, but hesitated.

"Narcissa," he said, in faint dismay.

She took three quick steps across the room — advancing right up the duelist's line, he noticed — and in all that time, Sibelius didn't touch her.

"How dare you? How could you?"

"Narcissa—"

"Stand down!"

"There is yet time—"

"Electrosempra."

It was like a divine invocation. Lightning forked from the tip of her wand — not just spell-energy, not just the electric crackle of spellwork, but true, honest-to-God lightning: white and shuddering and volatile, the trembling knife of God that left whole trees blackened and set forests alight, channeled in a single finger that shattered Sibelius's lone effort at a Shield like it was glass. Narcissa's curse caught Sibelius in the chest and hurled him against the wall, convulsing horribly.

She shook out her wand, which scattered sparks, and pointed it at him again.

"That will be quite enough, Narcissa."

Dumbledore and Snape stood by the doorway, their wands drawn but unused. Dumbledore took in the gruesome scene that laid on the floor of his office, and let out a quiet: “Oh, Barty.”

“Mum?” said Draco, faintly.

She lowered her hand and sent Dumbledore a black look.

“And you. I haven’t forgotten you,” she hissed.

“I understand. And believe me, I do not look forward for whatever accounting you have planned,” said Dumbledore pleasantly. “But please refrain from killing Lord Nott. He is much more useful to us alive.”

“Killing!” she spat. “Don’t talk to me of killing. I’ve forgotten more about killing than you’ve ever known.”

But she sheathed her wand, and stalked away from the motionless Nott.

It took Draco a moment to process what he was seeing. He was so glad to see her that he very nearly didn’t have the heart to be angry, but then his anger regrouped, and found he was quite capable of doing both.

Narcissa didn’t give him a moment to mull it over. She swept down on him and wrenched him to the side, took a deep, searing look at his face, and then she buried her face in his shoulder, her arms a throttle around his neck.

“Oh, my boy, my darling Draco — oh, Draco, Draco, Draco—”

The whiplash could have broken a man’s neck.

“Mother, what the devil—?”

He jerked his head back. He was taller than her, now. Had he been taller than her at the start of the summer? He couldn’t remember.

Snape crossed the room swiftly and pointed his wand at Nott's head.

"Obliviate."

Draco's breath hitched. Dumbledore said sharply, "You are about to render his testimony unusable, Severus."

"I'm aware."

"If he cannot remember committing the murder, it may be difficult to demonstrate his guilt."

"He saw Narcissa," Snape said flatly, and Dumbledore abruptly dropped the argument, turning away.

"Speaking of which. Lady Malfoy," he said, and she detached herself from Draco.

"I know," she spat. "I know. May I have a moment with my son? My son, whom I have not seen for a year, I will remind you, as often and as loudly as I am able?"

Draco couldn't make heads or tails of that at all; it was her fault they hadn't seen each other. She'd been the one who went away and made it so he couldn't come home.

Dumbledore folded his hands behind his back, serene. "I was going to say," he said, "that I believe Mr. Malfoy may require medical attention, of the sort that I am happy to provide, if he consents."

He checked himself over. There was some blood on his shirt, and a bit of charring here and there, little nicks where bits of glass from the duel had rebounded at him. Hermione was the same, scratched here and there, a coronet of snapped twigs buried in her hair, and when she twitched up her sleeve he caught sight of a bad burn lacing the length of her forearm, pink and flushing from the recent touch of fire.

Snape had knelt over Mad-Eye and whirled his wand in swift motions over his face, muttering frantically.

“How is he, Severus?” said Dumbledore.

“Alive,” said Snape shortly. “But he’ll need a transfusion. Or four.”

“Easily done. Poppy stocks plenty of Blood-Replenishing Potion.”

“Does she stock eyeballs, too?”

“I’ll inquire,” said Dumbledore. He held out a hand to Narcissa. “Please — if I may?”

Hermione stepped out from behind Draco. She was touching her burned arm, and she lifted it, hesitantly. “Professor,” she said, in a steady voice, “I’d like someone to see about this, at some point, if there’s time.”

“Certainly, Miss Granger, I can—”

“But it can wait,” she interrupted. “Theodore Nott is gone, and someone should be sent after him as soon as you can. I read that you can trace someone through the Floo network, if you do it quickly.”

“Theodore?” Narcissa’s tone was sharp. Hermione hesitated, then nodded.

“He helped his father rig the Tournament.”

“Well, for Merlin’s sake, why didn’t you catch him?” she snapped, and after a jolt, he realized she was talking to Dumbledore, over Hermione’s shoulder.“Whinging all year about having to stay put and run the school, and you can’t even stop one fourteen-year-old boy —?”

“A fourteen-year-old boy with several very capable Dark wizards backing him, and need I remind you, Narcissa, that I was otherwise occupied this year, as well?”

“You shouldn’t have been! Is Minerva McGonagall so very incapable —?”

“Mother,” he said, “could you please hold off on abusing my headmaster — it’s glorious, truly — and bother to call me in on what the hell is happening at all? Thanks ever.”

“Don’t mouth off, darling.”

“Excuse me?”

Snape straightened up. “Nott first. The elder. The boy matters little.”

“Excuse me,” said Hermione hotly. “Theo’s the reason that Crouch is —” She jerked her head, choking on something, but forced out: “— the reason he’s dead.”

“He’s a child,” said Narcissa coldly.

“He’s an accessory to murder. He knows that, that’s why he ran,” she said, and she lifted her chin a little. “Crouch promised him amnesty, but the deal is gone, because he’s dead, and now he’s going to find the Death Eaters, and tell them—”

“Pure speculation. Albus, remove the girl.”

“Miss Granger has a right to answers,” said Dumbledore, with faint warning, “and this is her school. I would warn you, Narcissa, of your tone—”

“Of my tone? I come here to find my son huddling for his life in the floor of your office, a dead man on the floor, and you dare to speak to me of tone?”

“I do,” he said, “because it remains my office, for the time being. Speak as you will to me, but you will address the students of Hogwarts school with respect, or you will not address them at all.”

Hermione raised her voice again. “I don’t care,” she said loudly, “but you really need to send someone after Theodore, because he’s going to warn the Death Eaters that their plans have leaked, and he also might know where Harry is.”

There was a beat.

“Well?” she demanded. “Someone do something!” She drew her wand; Draco moved forward and took her arm, mindful of the burn, but hoping to hold her back from saying anything she might not be able to recant at leisure. She was shaking and her voice was much higher than usual. It was more than likely that she was in shock. They both were.

“Where Harry…” Dumbledore began, frowning. Then his expression cleared. “Ah. You have been here since the Third Task ended.”

“Yes! Obviously!”

“Granger,” he said quietly.

She shrugged him off. “And nobody’s told us what the hell is going on, either! Why did it take you so long to come get us? Why is Draco’s mother here?”

“I might ask the same of you,” said Narcissa.

She whirled on her. “Because I’m Harry’s friend, thank you,” she snapped. “I’m sorry that Draco was in danger, but that’s no need to be nasty. If it helps, I’d rather he wasn’t, either—”

“As you have so clearly demonstrated.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

“I suppose it was my son’s idea, was it, to run into the labyrinth? To follow Crouch into the castle, to seek out Sibelius Nott? Was he the mind behind these proposals?”

Hermione’s jaw dropped. “But — that’s not fair,” she gasped. “That’s completely unfair. I didn’t make him do anything.”

“I daresay you didn’t need to. You don’t fool me, you know, I was a girl once—”

“That will be enough,” he said, and when he heard his own voice he was surprised that it sounded so very deep and cold.

Narcissa gave a full-body flinch.

Severus tilted his head, one ear pricked.

“Thank you, Mother,” said Draco.

Narcissa’s mouth folded into a miserable pucker, and she turned her head away. The guilt settled in like a polite visitor and lingered in the antechamber of his heart, waiting for an opportune moment, but he was too angry to entertain it now.

He knew that Hermione was staring at him, but he avoided her eyes on purpose. “Professor Snape,” he said stiffly, “there’s a body. Is there a procedure?”

Snape gave a short nod. “I will deal with Crouch,” he said crisply. “First, however, the problem of Nott—”

“I will manage him,” said Dumbledore.

“I have suggestions.”

“Which I will consider.”

“To wit,” said Snape, ignoring the rather obvious gesture at a dismissal, “if you do not make use of Veritaserum, at this of all times, I will make a point of reminding you of your failure in each and every subsequent avoidable disaster.”

“For one, I should never fear but that you will do so anyway, Severus,” said Dumbledore, “and, more importantly, for two: it may surprise you to know that I do not generally discuss my plans for interrogation in front of schoolchildren.”

Severus cut Draco and Hermione a cursory glance, as if he’d just remembered they were in the room. “Send them away, then.”

“In a moment. I must speak with them first.”

“Why—?”

“They will stay because they need to understand,” said Dumbledore curtly. “Understanding is the first step to acceptance, and only with acceptance can there be recovery. They deserve to know for what purpose Barty Crouch was killed.”

For the second time that evening, the door burst open and snapped against the wall. The doorstep splintered.

The Minister of Magic stood in the doorway, haggard, dark circles like caves under his eyes. His eyes swept over the scene and the extended point of his wand jumped around, apparently seeking a target: Dumbledore, Snape, Narcissa, the body on the floor.

It took him a moment to conceptualize what he was seeing, and when he did his wand sank in horror. “Merlin’s wounds,” he murmured. “What a pity.”

Brave as an idiot, Hermione demanded: “And now what are you doing here?”

Snape jerked his head at her. “I would ask the same,” he said quietly. “Who summoned—”

The answer came with the second figure who poked his freckled nose into the room.

Percy Weasley, dressed in purple robes and the most ruffles Draco had ever seen not on a woman, edged around the Minister and stood by the doorway, transfixed by the body of his old employer, his face slack and pale with unbelieving horror.

“Oh, you slimy git,” exclaimed Hermione, after a moment. “You ran to the Ministry?”

“It was hardly a secret, Miss Granger!” he snapped. “The Third Task had collapsed; word was flying to every corner of the Wizarding World—”

“But you had to fetch the Minister!”

“It was an emergency! He deserved to know—!”

Runcorn silenced Percy with a lifted finger and stepped gracefully into the room, where he bent to press his hand against Crouch’s throat.

“He’s dead,” said Dumbledore, calmly. “I assure you, everyone here can identify a Stunning Spell from a Killing Curse.”

“Certainty is worth a moment’s hesitation,” he said, but he rose to his feet. “I understand. Who is responsible?”

Dumbledore folded his hands and looked calmly at the unconscious body of Sibelius Nott.

Runcorn paused, and a hard, disinterested expression shuttered his face. It was like a light going off.

“You witnessed it, I presume?”

“Not directly. But being that the only wizard in his company at the time of his death was Alastor Moody, I feel comfortable in my assessment.”

“What about the children?”

Runcorn turned, and Draco was electrified by the full force of a rather accusatory stare.

“The children were present,” said Dumbledore, “and may testify as much. However—”

“So you’ve interrogated them? You’ve ascertained that their story is correct?”

Snape let out a brutal bark. It might have been laughter.

“The alternative being,” he said, sounding very near to enjoying himself, “as you suggest, that one of these two fourth years produced a Killing Curse capable of felling a fully grown auror? Albus, let him take it to the Wizengamot, I beg of you.”

Runcorn blinked. It was a strange, lizardlike movement, and then he gave a small, unfelt smile. “I’m only trying to be thorough, Severus,” he said. “You must understand; this man was very close to me, and I should prefer to indict him on nothing but unimpeachable evidence.”

“You will indict him on the evidence before you,” said Dumbledore, “or I will make certain that you do not have to.”

“I beg your pardon. Is that a threat?”

“No, Lord Minister. Only a reminder that Mr. Crouch was a thorough man, and he documented his inquest rigorously.” Dumbledore’s tone was light, but the words were not. “He took extensive precautions. The testimony of Theodore Nott should suffice for whatever prosecutorial purposes you require.”

Runcorn sighed. He set his hand on his hip, tapped his wand on his thigh, and then gestured tiredly at the body.

“Sibelius Nott,” he said, “is hereby charged with the aggravated murder of Bartemius Crouch. I take him into custody on behalf of the Ministry of Magic, where he will await further questioning.”

He flicked his wand, and glowing silver cuffs fashioned themselves around Nott's wrists and ankles.

"No," said Hermione. Her voice was hushed.

Runcorn was now saying something to Percy, who was taking notes. As he watched, the Minister ran one hand through his hair, as if the whole ordeal was a vaguely tiresome logistical exercise.

Draco elbowed her. "What is it?"

"No, he can't… the Ministry's not going to do anything."

"Keep your voice down."

"Dumbledore can't let them take him," she said. "Don't you see? He cast the Dark Mark. He's the one they were covering for, firing Bones. It's all corrupted."

"Runcorn just put him in chains—"

"Runcorn is standing in front of six witnesses, one of them Dumbledore," she hissed. "Of course he did."

"Thank you, everyone, for your patience," Runcorn announced, turning back. Percy hurried out of the room, clutching his notepad to his chest. "The Department of Magical Law Enforcement will soon be notified. In the meantime, I ask that all of you not present at the time of the incident — that would be Professors Dumbledore and Snape, and Lady Malfoy, if you would — would vacate the premises so that the witnesses can be questioned—"

Suddenly, Snape gave a piercing cry, and dropped to his knees.

Draco started forward, alarmed; Narcissa darted to his side and caught him before he crumpled entirely; Dumbledore closed his eyes, and gave a very slight shudder.

"Professor?" Hermione's voice was shrill. "Are you alright?"

“Severus.” Narcissa was shaking him. “Severus. Be alive. Stand up.”

Snape struggled upright. He was clutching his right forearm, his face a knot of pain.

“What’s this?” said Runcorn sharply.

Snape ignored him, and turned to Dumbledore. “Albus,” he began, expression hoarse, but Dumbledore held up a hand.

“Go.”

Snape fled. In his haste, he shouldered past someone in the hallway outside, who gave out a faint cry of surprise.

“What absurdity is this?” Runcorn demanded. “Does Professor Snape have an alternate engagement? Did we wear on his patience? It seems you know something I don’t.”

“Oh, almost certainly I do,” said Dumbledore calmly. “But first, Minister, be assured that if you have to excuse yourself, you are more than welcome to.”

There was a long beat.

“I have no idea what you mean,” said Runcorn, with palpable frustration. “I sincerely don’t.”

“That may be so,” said Dumbledore, and there was another loaded silence; but then he set it aside, and turned to the doorway. “That being said. We have guests.”

“Wonderful,” said Narcissa tartly, “more people, just perfect,” which was exactly what Draco had been thinking, but then someone coughed and the door creaked open, and Hermione gasped.

Harry edged into the doorframe. It was the worst he had ever been. Were it not for the beautiful, undeniable fact of his living uprightness, Draco would swear for a jury that he was dead.

Pallor and white ash turned the planes of his face to a chalk relief, pitted by the two bright wet pits of his eyes, which were bloodshot from dust and rimmed in red, like wounds. Blood streaked his face and trailed from a bandaged wound on his wrist, and he was holding the hand of Minerva McGonagall as if it were his last tether to the living world.

McGonagall herself, though unhurt and visibly unharmed, had the expression of someone who had just marched through hell to haul him back.

“Harry,” said Hermione, almost silly with happiness, and she hurried forward — but stopped, then, when Harry didn’t answer her, or even seem to really hear. The boy turned his head and fixed her with a gaze that was searing in its emptiness, no happiness, no pleasure, even, at finding her alive and relatively unharmed; he might have been alive, but Harry Potter was not home.

“He’s back,” he said.

Then he turned to the middle of the room, and kept staring.

“What?” said Hermione, after a moment. “Who’s back? What’s back?”

“So we have been asking Mr. Potter since he returned,” said McGonagall, quietly.

“He’s back.” His voice sounded like it hurt to speak. Smoke inhalation and strain; it sounded like he’d been screaming.

“Potter,” said Draco, who was beginning to be unnerved. He could only suffer so much in a day. There was only so much you could take. He’d watched a man die — he’d watched a man die — there couldn’t be more, there couldn’t possibly. Days had to end, at some point.

But what if they'd done something to Harry? Something worse than torture, worse than death maybe, like Longbottom's parents—?

"He's back," repeated Harry. He worked his jaw, and then gritted out: "The portkey — took us to the graveyard — and Viktor tried to Apparate us — and they — he was trying to save me, and they—"

No more; his struggling throat gave up again, and closed off.

Hermione made a noise and sank immediately into the nearest chair, clutching her chest. Draco's legs sent up a warning about integrity and he lurched hard against the chair.

But then Harry stepped aside, Hermione gave another cry. Floating on a stretcher behind Harry and the Minister was a body under a white shroud.

The body had wide shoulders and more height than the stretcher rightly was meant for. A hand spilled from the side, the dirty cuff of a Durmstrang uniform just visible above the wrist.

It hung unmoving, like the pendulum of a frozen clock: proof that Viktor Krum had kept his word.

The Victor

Chapter 55: The Victor

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

It couldn’t be.

Viktor was seventeen, and young, and he laughed like a lion, and he flew like a poem, all that talent and verve and fire — and he was a pureblood; not that it mattered, not that it could possibly fucking matter, but the men who killed him were supposed to care — you couldn’t kill someone like that, it wasn’t right. He was supposed to be one of the best. That was supposed to keep you safe.

Runcorn was speaking.

“—happened to him? Potter! Answer! Who did this?”

He reached for Harry. Draco tensed, and he wasn’t the only one; Narcissa made a noise, and reached for her wand.

McGonagall stepped in between Harry and the Minister.

The Minister of Magic stumbled back, and for a fleeting moment, Draco saw an entirely new expression cross McGonagall’s weathered face. He realized, in a surreal moment, that all he had ever thought he knew of McGonagall’s anger had in fact been the sunlight zone of a trench so deep the bottom was only theoretical.

In the meantime, Dumbledore put his hand on Harry’s shoulder. “I apologize, Harry. Understand that you are under no obligation to answer that question. I know you are experiencing extraordinary grief, and we will have time to speak of this later.”

“No.” Harry lifted his head. An angry ring of red circled his tear-swollen eyes, but he spoke evenly, without doubt. “I’ll tell you who it was. Voldemort."

Narcissa hissed a little, at the sound of it, like someone had burned her.

Hermione said, "No, but — it couldn't," and her voice was thick with something that wasn't even fear, it was beyond it. It was the place where fear didn't matter, because the worst was staring at your back, and you were soaring toward something so bleak you had never even thought to worry about it. And there was a strange, black peace in that, the knowledge that even the worst couldn't happen now, because it already had.

The world was upside-down. Draco closed his eyes. It didn't help.

"Dumbledore, enough of this farce. The boy is mad."

"I was not aware you were a medical expert, Albert," said Dumbledore loudly. "I am amazed and delighted that you may be of such service to us, in this very dark hour."

"The Portkey took me to a graveyard," said Harry, speaking over the din, "and there were Death Eaters — forty or fifty of them — and there was a potion, and Wormtail was there, and he cut off his hand and — and put it in the cauldron, and then they said my blood would make him stronger than if he'd used someone else's. He said the protection my — my mother left in me — he'd have it too. And he was right — he could touch me without hurting himself, he touched my face."

Hermione was crying. Draco reached for her arm without knowing why, or what he could possibly do about it — it was above him, all of it, the upside-down world — and then, somehow, he was holding her, and she was clinging to him, her face buried in the front of his shirt. He put his head against hers and shut his eyes and then the world wasn't upside-down, merely crooked, irreparably crooked. Cracked down the middle. Cracked around a word in Harry's shaking voice.

Lord Voldemort. Lord Voldemort. Lord Voldemort.

Narcissa gripped his hand.

“And then I — I got my wand, and he tried to kill me, but something happened, and then some people came out of his wand — and it blew up, and I used the Portkey—”

“And you are prepared to accept this story, Dumbledore?” said Runcorn coolly. “You are prepared to believe that the Dark Lord has returned? On the word of a dead man and a boy who has just watched his friend die?”

McGonagall scoffed.

“Look, I saw Voldemort come back!” Harry shouted. He tried to stand up, but McGonagall grappled him back down. “I saw the Death Eaters! I can give you their names! Peter Pettigrew! Brutus Travers! Orpheus Greengrass—!”

Narcissa made a sudden movement toward Harry, but when Dumbledore cleared his throat, she fell still.

“You are raving,” said Runcorn calmly. “You have experienced an extraordinary trauma tonight. Your mind has confused Lord Greengrass with a person you saw in that graveyard. But I assure you, he has spent the whole night at the Ministry.”

“Macnair!”

“Whom we shall find at home with the same bout of Spattergroit he has been battling for two weeks. Would you like to Floo his wife and ask her?”

“Avery — Crabbe — Goyle—”

“You are merely repeating the names of my staff,” snapped Runcorn. “I am sure you found those names in the papers. You are looking for scapegoats, and finding them in men who have long since acquitted themselves through service to the Ministry of any crimes they might have done."

"Minister, what is the point of this?" hissed McGonagall. She patted Harry's shoulder, as if to comfort him, though Harry did not seem to need comforting anymore; what he needed was someone to stop him from jumping up and clocking the Minister in the face. "Have you no heart? After all that has transpired, you would question a boy's credibility to his face?"

"My point is simple. Harry Potter should be taken to St. Mungo's, where he can be treated properly for whatever psychiatric problems he may or may not have manifested in the wake of this understandably troubling evening."

Narcissa inhaled sharply.

Hermione tore herself away from Draco's chest and rounded on Dumbledore. "Veritaserum," she exclaimed. "Harry's not lying. He's not, he wouldn't. Professor Snape said he had Veritaserum — it's simple—"

"Thank you, Miss Granger, but Harry has been through an extraordinary night," said Dumbledore patiently. "I will refrain from dosing him with anything except a sleeping potion, for the time being, though your suggestion is not unheard. As for yours, Albert, I would prefer I could unhear it; you may take your leave with Lord Nott, or stay and confer with us, but if you attempt to compel a student into medical custody without a court order, I will defend him with the full force of my authority, as a headmaster, a wizard, and a human being."

Alarmed, Runcorn touched his wand. Dumbledore folded his hands and smiled.

"No, I like Hermione's idea," said Harry, and then broke into a fit of coughing. "I can — I'll prove it — give it to me — I'll prove it's the truth."

“No one is asking that of you, Potter,” snapped McGonagall.

Runcorn was shaking his head. “I don’t know what you and your staff are playing at, but I have heard enough. I have no more to add. I will be in touch with you tomorrow, Dumbledore, to discuss the running of this school. I must return to the Ministry.”

He levitated Nott’s body alongside him to the Floo grate, where he paused. He turned around and walked over to Harry’s chair.

“Your winnings,” he said, taking a large bag of gold out of his pocket and dropping it onto Harry’s lap. “One thousand Galleons. Paid in full, to the victor of the Triwizard Tournament. Use—” He made a short, acidic expression, very near a smile. “Use it in good health.”

He straightened his cloak and walked into the fire, which signaled his exit in a flash of green.

Harry made a strangled noise, like he’d been burned, and shoved the gold off his lap. The coins spilled across the floor like a bloodstain.

“I don’t want them,” he said. “I don’t want it, that’s horrible. It’s Viktor’s money, I don’t want them, I don’t need them—”

With a sweep of her wand, McGonagall scooped the coins up and punted the bag safely onto Dumbledore’s desk. “Quite right,” she said. “Dumbledore will hold them until such a time as you desire.”

“No, no. You don’t understand. I don’t want him to hold them, I don’t want them, do you get it? I don’t want that gold, I didn’t win anything!”

“We understand, Harry,” said Dumbledore quietly. “Put it out of your mind.”

“Good!”

“In the meantime, Minerva, could you take him to the Hospital Wing? He has some visitors that I believe will be growing—”

A door slammed in the hallway.

“OUT OF MY WAY!"

“Never mind,” said Dumbledore.

The voice came through the door, still ajar from the Minister’s entrance, and rattled the floorboards. “WHERE IS HE?”

Harry’s head snapped up.

“Narcissa, please step away from the door,” said Dumbledore.

“WHERE DID YOU PUT HIM? GET THE HELL OUT OF MY WAY — MOVE — THERE HE IS! HARRY!”

The door whipped around and slammed the wall. Dumbledore stepped to the side, and McGonagall hastened behind him — cleaving a path for a red-faced Arthur Weasley, who burst through the doorway like he had a battalion at his back.

He crossed the room in three long steps and ripped Harry out of his chair.

Harry stumbled, gasping for a breath he choked on, and tried to lean around Arthur to see the body in the hallway, but Arthur would not let him.

He barely got out: “Victor—"

Arthur heard no more. He hauled Harry into his chest and buried the boy in his arms so tightly that Harry all but disappeared.

“It's alright," he said. “It's alright, son, it's alright. You did the right thing. It's alright."

“But he, he, he's — he's d-d-d—"

“I know.”

“He died—”

“I know. I know. I understand, son. You don’t have to tell me.”

Harry choked twice, three times, and then started to cry. In the hallway beside them, Ron, Molly, Bill, and Charlie huddled together, their eyes like a small coterie of blue planets.

“It's alright,” said Arthur. “It’s not your fault. You understand? Listen to me, Harry. It's going to be alright. It’s not your fault. You're a good boy, and you did the right thing."

Harry gasped and clung to him, and they stayed that way, knotted together on the floor, rocking back and forth together, like the child he’d been, once before, in a different world than this.

And Draco was sympathetic — he wasn’t heartless, he was glad that Harry had someone to do it — but in the grungy corner of his mind, he wondered where his own slice of comfort would come from. Where was his Arthur Weasley, to come and hold him, and tell him that he was good? Only gone. Not coming back. Never coming through the door.

You’re ruining your life for the approval of a dead man.

He hadn’t understood it until now. He saw that there was no version of Arthur Weasley that wouldn’t come for Harry. It didn’t matter what he’d done or not done in the graveyard. Arthur would find him, hold him, and tell him he was good.

Which, of course, were three words that Lucius Malfoy would never say.

Hermione’s arm was tight around Draco’s waist, and she was still half tucked under his elbow, hoarded against his chest. She made a small sympathetic sound, might've been pity, might've been gladness. He ran his thumb over her shoulder and felt the involuntary shudder go down her spine, a reflex, a wave like a bird arching its back before flight.

He might have cared, in any other universe, that his mother could see it. But this wasn't any other universe. There was a dead boy in the hallway and a dead man on the floor, and he was allowed to hold Hermione Granger if he wanted to.

And he had to. If he couldn't, he couldn't see a way of getting through this, any of it — the next minute, the next five minutes, the next fifty years. The rise and fall of her ribcage under his palm was one of the few remaining vital organs of the world.

So he was allowed. He was a Malfoy, and it meant he could have what he wanted, and he wanted this. Her. Alive and next to him and closer to him than anyone else.

If nobody else had been there, he might have said as much to his mother, who kept looking at him from the corner of her eye. Pointedly. As if he couldn't read her. He was half her, of course he knew what she wanted to say.

He put another hand around Hermione's head and ran his fingers into her hair, and that was a pleasure, itself, the reliable spring of her curls at his touch. There were some things that didn't change. This was something real — the texture, the smell, the color. It would get everywhere, and he would be peeling long brown hairs out of his shirts for weeks, and that was good, that was another real thing. The next few weeks would still happen. The world hadn't ended, just lost direction.

From the doorway, Molly, Bill, and Ron hurried inside, collecting around Harry, forming a kind of human shell. For Draco it would've been a nightmare, that many persons trying to get personal at once, but Harry drank it in like water for the parched.

A terrible voyeurism flooded him, pity and discomfort, the jangling unease of something he wasn't supposed to watch. He turned, but the other things to look at were not much better: his mother's long accusatory stare, Dumbledore's quiet conference with McGonagall, a dead body, or the unconscious one-eyed man.

And Hermione, who was scrubbing out her eyes, and he found that was best. She had teartracks like railroads splitting her freckles and she was trying to rub them out before anyone could see, but new ones kept spilling down involuntarily, even as she tried to hide them.

It occurred to him that her father wasn't coming through the door, either. Her father was a hundred miles away, probably sleeping beside his wife, and had no idea that his daughter was crying, or why.

He understood it. How hollow it felt, how lonely. It was a different kind of orphaning, but it couldn't feel all that different, could it? It was the same for both of them — it didn't matter how hard they yelled or cried or hurt. Their fathers weren't coming to save them, couldn't. They would never even really know how great they were, would never look on them with the same pride that Arthur might Harry or Ron; for all that Hermione's muggle father must have loved her, it didn't matter, because his daughter was no longer any order of creature he could understand. And no matter how long Hermione waited, Herbert Granger would never be coming through that door.

He suddenly wished that they were alone, so he could tell her that he understood. He'd tell her—

He'd tell her that he'd come for her. Through the door. And any other door she'd care to stand behind, anywhere in the world, always. They could do that for each other, couldn't they? Who said it had to be a parent? They could do it themselves. Find each other. Tell each other they were good.

His father had already given him the most important things he'd ever need, which were the name and the blood, and the rest of it — the rest of it he could do on his own. With her. He could be Draco Malfoy, the scion of the two greatest houses to ever live, un-fucking-touchable, and he could have her, too, and if anyone told him he couldn't, he would make it their problem. Immediately. Violently, if necessary. Vincit semper.

"Draco," said his mother.

He startled. The situation reasserted itself: Arthur was escorting Harry out of the room, cocooned by Ron and Bill; Dumbledore and Molly were talking in low voices together, their expressions identically businesslike and firm. Dumbledore was talking quickly, and making some kind of list; Molly was doing a lot of nodding. McGonagall had knelt over Moody, and resumed Snape's work tending to the fallen man's eye.

And Narcissa had one hand on his shoulder, with the same grip a sailor might apply to a rudder.

"A word," she said.

"Fine."

She looked at Hermione.

Hermione said, "Oh," quite embarrassed, and started wriggling out of Draco's grip. Draco didn't let go.

"What," he said.

"A word alone."

"Perhaps later."

"Draco."

"No? Then speak."

Narcissa pursed her lips. She murmured, “If I have done something to offend you—”

“I don’t know,” he snapped. “It’s possible. What do you think? Vanishing for a year, no announcement, no explanation, shipping me off for the summer, three letters in as many months, all but ordering me away from the Manor, and forcing me to beg Severus for answers to make sure you hadn’t died— does that strike you as offensive?”

“We will discuss this at length. I promise you. There are apologies,” she said, haltingly, “to be made. But here—”

“No, we’ll do it here,” he snarled, “because you’re the one who decided we needed to speak now, when you were perfectly content to leave me in the dark for months as long as it suited you, but when you’re asked to wait a fucking hour—”

She had nothing for that, but her eyes were sharp.

Hermione cleared her throat and gingerly extricated herself from under his arm. His side turned cold without her. “I actually wanted to go visit Harry,” she said, in low tones. “They’re taking him to the Hospital Wing, and I want to speak to him without… I want to speak to him. And I still have to get this looked at, so.”

She gestured to her burned arm. Narcissa made an appreciative noise of discomfort. Draco’s stomach twisted.

“Do you need help?”

“They didn’t burn my legs,” she said.

They stared at each other. She gave a shrill giggle.

“God, I don’t know why I said that,” she said. “I, er… I think I might be in shock. Actually.”

“Quite reasonable.”

“I’m going to talk to Madam Pomfrey,” she said faintly, nodding to herself. “I’m going to… I’ll find you later. Alright?”

He nodded. She touched his wrist — furtively, like she wasn’t sure she was allowed — and then left, skirting a wide circle around Crouch’s body, and her heels crunching quietly on the broken glass.

He’d walked these halls for four years now. He knew them as well as the Manor, or near enough. So he chafed at the way his mother took lead of him on their way downstairs, her steps ringing on the stone like some kind of military fanfare, as if he needed the instruction. He was a week short of fifteen years old, and he needed no one to lead him. He lived on no one’s leash.

So it was no small amount of pettiness that he overtook her on the grand staircase, and cut ahead, taking advantage of a newfound edge in height and speed. He took her destination for the Great Hall, or perhaps the dungeons, which was why it surprised him when she turned off only at the seventh floor, passing halls upon halls of study rooms and crossing through a narrow channel walled on either side with windows that cut away to a dizzying drop below. This was a part of the castle he hadn’t visited, though he was vaguely aware they were close to Ravenclaw Tower, since he remembered streams of students in blue ties always toddering off this way at the evening’s end.

With a rustle of black skirts, she swept around the last corner and came upon a dead end. She marched up to the wall and began pacing in front of it, her hands behind her back, dainty brow knit in concentration.

“Mother?”

“In a moment, Draco.”

That stung a part of him he thought he’d lost years ago. When he was nine, he’d found a way to jimmy the lock on his father’s broom collection without tripping the alarms, and made off with one of his antique Thunderbolts, selected chiefly because the solid bronze dorsal fin flaps were, in a nine-year-old's estimation, 'really sodding cool, Mum,' and 'not tacky at all.' He wasn't found out in his theft so much as caught hovering about five feet north of the chimney stacks — though even then, he likely could have beat the charges if he hadn't resisted arrest, forcing Dobby to scamper around the Manor roofs like a foxhound while he bobbed and weaved between the wrought-iron embellishments, sometimes pretending — and this was the thing that did it, probably, he could admit — to spear himself on them; a pantomime which he acted out, for his mother's benefit, with bloodcurdling screams.

He still got phantom tingles from the aftermath of that episode, sometimes, in his eardrums. That or tinnitus.

Nostalgia prickled, deeply and dissonantly out-of-place in a miasma of horror and grief. The first year without his father had been horrible, and he hadn't made it easier, but his mother's frustration had been something familiar and old even then, a trustworthy constant, just as her forgiveness would be, ten minutes after it was over. It felt the same way now that it had then.

Now he was older and taller and smarter, and he understood his mother like few other things in the world, beside the wand at his hip and his own face in the mirror, and knowing that she would forgive him in ten minutes didn't help anymore. It didn't make him worry less.

Narcissa stopped. "There," she said, with satisfaction.

The bricks rippled, peeling back to reveal a tall door of dark wood, crosshatched with iron deadbolts.

"What—?"

"Not here," she hissed, glancing down the hallway, and she ushered him inside.

If the ornate door had raised his expectations, what laid beyond it quickly punctured them. It was a wide stone room, half the size of a quidditch pitch, absolutely resplendent with dust. Whoever had touched it in the last half-century had not done so with a custodial affect. Its windows bore clouded smears of age, and chandeliers cloaked in sheets. A fireplace glittered weakly at the far end of it. It was completely empty, save for a small table and a pair of chairs near the fire, and a coat rack by the door.

The door closed behind him with a dull creak.

Draco ambled curiously around the room, peering into some of the windows, scuffing his shoe on the ancient blue carpets.

“What is this room? I don’t know it.”

“It’s called the Room of Requirement,” she said briskly, stripping her coat and gloves. Both floated onto the rack with a twitch of her wand, and the rack, if he wasn’t mistaken, seemed to bend over slightly to accommodate them. “In my time, at least. It goes by several names. Some of the Slytherins called it the Come and Go Room.”

They sat down at the table. Narcissa snapped her fingers, and a tea set shimmered out of the aether, crafted in the same bronze as the teaware in the common rooms and the Great Hall. She reclined, and he poured her a cup.

“That’s helpful,” he remarked. “Is there a trick to that? It would save me a lot of time in the library.”

“It’s not a spell. The Room isn’t just a ‘private place.’ It responds to the needs of the person who calls it. You remember how I take it?”

“Don’t insult me.” He dropped a single lemon wedge into her tea and slid it across the table. “Under what limitations?”

“Theoretical ones,” she said, lifting her teacup to her lips. “Space and time are constants.”

“Obviously. I understand that the laws of magic don’t change here.”

“Don’t get lippy. I tolerated your cheek earlier, because we were in company, but I’m not your little muggle-born friend. And you’ve grown rather loose in your manners all around.”

“Do you mean Hermione Granger?” He dropped his cup onto the table with a bit too much force; it rattled. He sat back in his chair and crossed his legs. “Because I’m almost certain you know what her name is.”

Narcissa gave him a flat look.

“Do you want to talk about it?”

Her look continued, but harder.

“I’m offering,” he continued, blithely, though he was approaching the level of anger that jittered. “I’m glad to talk about it. Perfectly delighted. We can have it all out, right here. Spare us the trouble later on.”

“I doubt anything needs to be said,” she said stiffly. “You know what I think—”

“As does everyone you’ve ever met,” he said sharply. “Granger included. I told you we were friends; I thought that might buy her a modicum of courtesy.”

“You are asking far more than you know of me, Draco.”

“No,” he said, now sailing past the jittering point, and straight up in volume. “Because you think I’m asking you to accept her, and I’m not. Frankly, I don’t give a damn whether you like her, or whether it bothers you that I keep her company. I’m asking you to shut up and pretend, in the same way I have—”

“Draco!”

“—faithfully pretended to like everyone you’ve ever asked me to, which incidentally is not a short list, and exercise some level of dignity and forbearance in the face of someone who, whatever else you think of her, is at least graceful enough to look past the fact that you want her dead.”

Narcissa blanched. She put her teacup down hard on the saucer, and the crack was loud.

“I don’t want her dead.”

He gestured at her irritably. “See? You’re doing it already.”

“I don’t.”

“I told you, I really don’t care. All I’m asking for is an old fashioned grin-and-bear it. The rest, you can hammer out with whatever deity that cares.”

“I don’t want them dead,” repeated Narcissa, in a voice that was thin but firm. “I’ve never been one of those people. You know that.”

“You just married one.”

Crack.

She set down her teacup.

“I married your father.”

“I’ve gathered,” he said.

“Do you want to talk about him?” Her tone was velvet.

“Not really,” he said. He felt belligerent and restless. “Apart from my having spent the afternoon being traumatized and hunted, it strikes me as the sort of conversation that keeps.”

She smiled.

“I know it makes you sad when I mistake you,” she said, “and I don’t mean to. But there’s a reason. It’s not just the hair and the eyes.”

He stared at her. She had never admitted, in so many words, that she was mad before. Her episodes had been an untouched invisible thing that sat over their heads, while he fretted over them, and she pretended that the world above was nothing but sky.

It was a relief.

“How?” he said, trying for ‘casual,’ and ending up at ‘concussed.’

“A certain affect,” she said. She was fidgeting with her signet ring, spinning it around and around her third finger, the same way he did with his. “A way of speaking. He showed me this room, you know.” She paused, glanced at him, and quirked the corner of her mouth up. “The Come and Go Room. If you will.”

He gave a horrified start.

“Mother.”

“For Merlin’s sake, darling, you’re nearly fifteen.”

“I’m sitting here!”

“It’s been twenty years. I’m sure whatever remnants that prior occupants have left behind—”

“Will haunt my memory forever, thanks to you! Merlin’s beard!”

“And that’s another thing you two would have in common, you’re prudes,” she remarked, and sipped her teacup.

“I wish it was something you and I had in common,” he said disgustedly, and escorted his tea back to the table, as far away from him as possible. His stomach had violently submitted its resignation.

Awkward silence sank in like nightfall. Dourly, he raised his eyes to meet his mother's, and found her watching him with a fond but tentative sort of expression, as if she were seeking something she didn't know if she'd find. Probably she was frightened. She'd never had these kinds of conversations, either.

"What was your business with Theo?"

She frowned. "What business?"

"You wrote him letters. You're not obligated to tell me, but I'm curious."

"It's no particular secret," she admitted. "I only thought he seemed like he needed a bit of affection. And he's a good boy, under everything. He reminds me of a boy I used to know, I… a boy who would have profited from having a better kind of mother." She sniffed. "I imagine Theodore would have, too."

His throat tightened, but he didn't chase the point.

It was a principle of their family — which, he was now realizing, might have been erroneously instantiated by people with very different problems than themselves — that they didn't talk about everything that was wrong with them. The general theory being that there was no point, because the things that were wrong with Blacks and Malfoys couldn't be fixed.

"Uncle Severus said that your condition deteriorated. Over Christmas."

Then again, he was the head of his family. He decided what they would or wouldn't talk about.

She considered.

"It didn't," she said.

"I gathered."

“I gave license to Severus to speak on my behalf.”

“I assumed.”

“He was attempting to find a pretext that would not alarm you.”

“He failed.”

She pressed her lips together. Abruptly, she vanished the tea set with a wave of her hand, and leaned over the table on her elbows.

“Draco.”

“What? What is it?”

“I am taking you into my confidence. I require your oath on our house that you will not discuss the contents of this conversation with anyone except Albus Dumbledore and Severus Snape.”

“Albus D— why does he get to know?”

“I require your oath before I can answer that question.”

“Mother, it’s me,” he said incredulously. “I’m your son. I’m not going to gossip—”

“I am sure it has not escaped your notice that Harry Potter and Hermione Granger are not included on the list of people whom you will be permitted to take in confidence. If that is a problem for you — if you feel unable to commit yourself to that promise, knowing that it may be difficult to harbor secrets from them — then I urge you, now, to refuse me, and I will tell you as much of the truth as I am able.”

“But not all of it,” he said, after a moment.

“No.”

He sighed.

“I swear secrecy. On the copious land, the spotless blood, and the dread name of my father, Lucius Malfoy, which is now mine, and ever will be, I swear to share confidence in this with none but Albus Dumbledore and Severus Snape.”

“Thank you.”

“Whatever. Now you’ve promised, so talk,” he said, flicking his hand at her. “This had better be worth it, because if I learn you’ve been pub crawling with Aradia Burke—”

“Do you remember when there was a break-in at the Manor? In your second year.”

He blinked. “It was one of the more wretched nights of my life. I have the main points.”

“They were former Death Eaters. Corban Yaxley. William Jugson. They stole a book from your father’s library, a Dark artifact.”

“I recall. Yaxley wanted it,” he said, frowning. “He said it was of use in… something or other, for the Dark Lord.”

“Yaxley was a fool, but he was correct.” She fidgeted restlessly with her ring. “That book… the diary, rather… was created by the Dark Lord himself.”

He sat up straighter. “What was it doing in my father’s possession?”

“Being protected,” she said. “Hidden. Kept, I believe, for some point in the future, when your father would either require leverage with Dumbledore and the Ministry, or…”

“Or?” He paused. “Or what, Mother?”

“Or proof of loyalty,” she said. “If he decided to go back.”

“That’s not possible. Nobody thought it was possible for him to return.”

“It was,” she said quietly. “Your father was one of perhaps ten people who knew it was possible. Who survived the war.”

“What on earth do you m—”

“The Dark Lord is immortal,” she said.

His head shook. It was a tiny movement, not voluntary, just instinct.

“Immortality is impossible,” he said, reflexive. “Even through the use of magic.”

“Is it? Is that a law, that it’s impossible?”

“No, but it’s — it’s the Peverell Paradox, right, no amount of living can prove immortality, but whereas one death proves the converse —”

“What about a resurrection, then? What does that prove?”

His jaw snapped shut. Quiet descended like a shroud.

“The Dark Lord has split his soul among several vessels,” she said calmly. “His body being only one. When the body was destroyed, he subsisted in transient forms, as a revenant, until he found a vehicle that could carry him to power. That creature found its way to Hogwarts, where Harry Potter killed him, and in so doing almost certainly saved your life, as well as the life of everyone who witnessed his weakness; the Dark Lord cannot permit evidence of the machinery he uses to survive.

“The number of the Dark Lord’s vessels is uncertain, but Dumbledore believes, as do I, that it may be seven; it would be traditional, and we have reason to believe that he would honor tradition, all else being equal. The diary was one. It was given to your father upon his ascent to the highest rank of Death Eater, the innermost circle, to whom less than ten people, living or dead, were ever made party. They were his lieutenants. His knights, some called them."

He slowly raised his hand to his temple and massaged it, head throbbing.

"The night Yaxley stole the diary, Severus brought me to Hogwarts," she said solemnly. "Dumbledore revealed to me his theory about the vessels — a theory that was confirmed, at the end of that year, when the diary came back into his possession. Severus and I helped him to destroy it. What I saw that night — I cannot speak of it — but it made clear that he was correct in his assumptions, and that whatever creature lurked in the diary, it was not only a fragment of the Dark Lord, but a work of magic more vile than anything your father ever conceived of, even at the height of his powers."

This was the first good news he'd heard in what felt like years.

"They can be destroyed?" he croaked.

"Not easily. A soul is a resilient thing, as you may imagine. Fiendfyre was our third or fourth attempt, and it took considerable ingenuity on Severus's behalf."

"What's fiendfyre?"

She flicked her fingers dismissively. "There's theory to it, which I never bothered about, but the essence is a kind of necromancy. You summon a revenant—"

"Oh, good, so it's easy, then."

"—and bind it to a magical fire, which gives it a sort of corporeal form, though of course it's a devil to get rid of, now you've given it a permeable floating vessel — I'm sorry, this was never my area, you should ask your godfather. But he did it, and the thing… died, I suppose, or whatever you can even call it, and then Dumbledore asked me to swear an oath."

“And you refused him.”

She said nothing.

“Mother, you didn’t.”

“I made a good bargain.”

“What did you give him? What on earth did you get?”

“I swore to provide him with any and all services he may require in his efforts to kill the Dark Lord,” she said, without one ounce of regret.

He stared at her.

“You swore your service. Full stop.”

“In a very specific capacity. I am not a house-elf.”

“For what? What could possibly be worth that?”

“Albus Dumbledore has promised to keep you safe,” she said, and it was rich with triumph. She thought she’d won, he realized; he thought she’d swindled him, Albus Dumbledore, the great pigeon himself, the latest in fifteen generations to be manhandled into the losing side of a deal with a Malfoy.

She was an egomaniac. He didn’t know why that surprised him, she was his own mother.

“To keep me safe.”

“Correct.”

“You’re joking.”

“Why do you say so?”

“Because he’s not very good at it!”

“He raised his own concerns about your growing appetite for danger. We negotiated broad parameters.”

“Is ‘broad’ closer to ‘alive’ or ‘well’ in this context?”

“He is sworn, specifically,” she said, with cool satisfaction, “to protect your life, health, and happiness, in that order, insofar as he is able, and to do whatever he must, in the pursuit of his objectives, insofar as it does not cause you significant or avoidable pain; to which the only exception, in any instance, is an act that may through its direct and immediate consequences bring about the death of the Dark Lord.”

She folded her hands in her lap, awaiting judgment.

“I see.” He paused. “Did you get Gatz to draw that up?”

“I obtained counsel.”

“Merlin.”

“That was a joke. You’re allowed to joke, but your mother isn’t?” She arched her eyebrow, amused. “It’s not so grave as you make it sound.”

“It’s a suicide pact. It’s exactly as grave as it sounds.”

“It’s a formalization of an arrangement that we would have held anyway. We have each other by the throat, you see.” She settled back in her chair, still distinctly proud. “If I betray him to the Dark Lord, then he will know that Dumbledore has learned the secret of his power, and will act swiftly to secure his vessels, erasing what little progress we have made in discovering them. If Dumbledore allows harm to come to you, meanwhile, I will find him and kill him, and the Dark Lord shall reign eternal on a throne of muggle bones.”

His stomach turned. She tilted her head and said, “Well— not bones, exactly,” in a tone that was grotesque, frankly, in its abstract consideration of something all too clearly remembered — and he found his voice.

“‘We’ have made?”

“Hm?”

“You said ‘progress we have made.’ Implying that you’ve been involved.”

“Yes. I have been hunting them for him,” she said. She ran her ring up and down her finger, rolling the stone here and there in the light. “I believe I may have found one; but I have yet to find a witness who can confirm it. There are not many alive who harbor such information.”

“That’s what you were doing in Romania.”

“Yes.”

“You were hunting his… vessels. Because you thought he might have hidden one there.”

“Correct. I no longer believe so,” she admitted, “but Dumbledore wanted to be sure. He argued that it would be tactically superior, in abstract, to disperse the fragments as widely as possible. Which is true. But it does not fit with the custom of the Dark Lord. He would never permit them to be so far from Britain, his homeland, his magical terrain… Severus and I are of one mind on this.”

“So Severus is in on this, then.”

“Don’t use such pedestrian phrases, Draco, it wants for an understanding of how I hate them. He is not ‘in on’ anything. We are parties to a confidence.”

“Fine. Alright. Do you know what the… ‘vessel’... you’re hunting will look like?”

“No.” Narcissa slipped her ring back into place on her knuckle and folded her hands under her arms. She leaned on the table, weary. “In the old days, there was a certain… ceremony involved, when he raised a servant to the highest rank. He would offer them a gift of some sort, a rare jewel, a historical artifact, a personal item... Something they were to protect. With their life, if necessary. I don’t remember now what all they were — I wasn’t there, you understand, I learned all this through your father, and we agreed that I wasn’t to know everything… But there was a gilded chalice, once. For Roddy.” Her expression was distant. “A necklace, for Regulus.”

“And were they told what it was?”

“No. I don’t know if anyone realized what, exactly, they were protecting… Even your father never knew, in so many words, although he came to understand that it was more than a test of loyalty. But it was important, they all understood that much.”

“Who else had them?”

“Not many. Your father was one. Bella. Regulus. Rodolphus, too, though I always suspected he rode there on Bella’s coattails... Those were the ones I knew. Others, I’m sure, now dead or missing.”

There was a lot of ache in him. Mostly in his head, which was in levels of discomfort both physical and mental, as he tried in vain to wrap its weary corpus around yet another set of facts far too enormous for reason or sense. His body was going to be sore probably forever. The lines on his forehead were soon going to be geologically classified as caverns and be studied by anatomists for years.

He struggled to keep his tone even. Narcissa’s hand found his across the table, and he let her take it, too stunned to deny the simplicity of a minor comfort.

“You turned coat,” he said, which was not what he’d meant, but it was the first thing he could haul out of the flaming office system in his brain.

“No.” She was calm, and it was grounding. He wondered why his mother could never have been like this, in the moments after she resurfaced from her episodes — cool and still, a pillar of something harder than steel. “I never swore an oath to the Dark Lord. I made no promises.”

He hadn’t known that, actually.

“You understand that he won’t care,” he said. “You do understand that, though. That if — when. He comes. He won’t care what you did or didn’t say.”

She nodded with dignity and acknowledgement. “I do. And he will hear the truth: that with your life in the balance, I had no choice.”

“What? So it’s my fault?”

She gave him a look full of sorrow and reproach. His knee was starting to jog, his hands twitching, and actually, hang tiredness, hang soreness, he wanted to run somewhere. He wanted to strike and throw curses and feel like he was bigger than something, like the world wasn’t one great totem of cruelty that he’d never understand.

“You aren’t going to understand this, and in fact you’re going to find it rather patronizing,” she said quietly, “because I found it to be extraordinarily so, when my mother told me; but someday, Draco, you will hold your first child in your arms, and you will find yourself capable of almost anything.”

He gave it the consideration it was due.

“You’re correct. I do find that patronizing.”

She smiled slightly. She stood up. Her chair vanished, and it was as good as a dismissal.

“I love you,” she said, quite seriously. It did not sound like a happy statement. He didn’t know how to feel about that. “From any distance, from any height, from any disappointment, from every betrayal, just as I have loved everything that was ever worthy of it.”

“Mother,” he said, wishing fiercely to shuck his own skin and temporarily vacate it for less humiliating pastures.

Then she smiled at him, warm and twinkling, like it had all been an excellent joke. And perhaps it had been. Perhaps it could be, her smile said, if they wanted it to.

They were Malfoys. The past was what they wanted it to be, between them. If they made it so.

Except. Except.

He rose. Table and chair vanished. Now the room was empty, and they were alone in it.

“Come home tonight,” she murmured. “You’ll be happy at the Manor.”

Which was true, on the one hand. But then, on the other.

I’ll find you, Hermione had said.

She was going to be looking for him. And he had a promise to make her.

Through any door.

“I’ll be home in a week.” He offered her his arm. “You’ll have me for the summer.”

“A mere instant.”

“So you think. I want to try the Thunderbolt again,” he said. “I think I’m big enough for it, now.”

Her slender fingers pinched his arm, punishingly, but she was laughing when they left the Room of Requirement. When he looked over his shoulder, the last thing he saw was the pale brick curling back over the iron lattice, walling it up, sealing the echoes of what they’d said inside.

Somewhere amidst the horror, the night must have passed, because inconceivably, it was morning: a dull cyan pigment that stained the sky and stripped it of blackness like paint thinner, letting the black furrows of the Forbidden Forest gradually swell into existence against a softening shade of blue. Ghosts and torchlight flickered over the vacant halls as he and Narcissa crossed the castle, out of ancient stone passages and past classrooms of rich dark wood, moving into the airy chambers of the Hospital Wing.

Hermione sat on one of the long benches outside it, cross-legged, reading from a copy of Defensive Magical Theory. A quill and leatherbound journal levitated close within reach, and a pair of ink pots orbited her head slowly, like binary stars.

Their footsteps made them known. Pots, quill, and journal all settled to the bench, and she closed the book, lifting her head. She had been cleaned up, her face was clear if deeply tired, deep circles under eyes raw with bloodshot and crying. She had changed out of her uniform, and wore what were obviously someone’s spare clothes: a baggy cardigan with sleeves cuffed thrice, a pair of brown muggle mud boots, a paper hospital band still encircling the smooth, healed skin of her forearm.

She stood up.

“Don’t tell me,” he said. “He’ll survive, but he’ll lose the baby.”

It was gratifying that she smiled, even if it had all the humor of Mad-Eye on a bad morning. “We’re still deciding how to tell Ron.”

“Don’t fret, he’ll have other chances. Is the full clan in attendance?”

“Yes. The Weasleys are all there. And a few others.”

She held something up. It was a flap of old parchment, weathered to hell, and it was bare, so it took him a moment to recognize it as the Marauder’s Map. Which meant Lupin and Sirius.

Narcissa was examining one of the oil portraits of old school nurses.

“I’m sure Madam Pomfrey wouldn’t welcome more company, then.”

“She’s been dropping hints.”

“Hints such as ‘get the hell out of my ward’?”

“Loud commentary about the difficulty of working in crowds.”

“Subtle.”

“She’s a light touch.”

He laughed. Hermione snickered, and then wiped something out of her eye.

“Granger, you remember my mother.”

He extended a hand to Narcissa, who floated back into the conversation with the grace of someone who had never been outside it.

“Miss Granger,” she said. She was staring down her nose at Hermione as if the secret to eternal life was inscribed on her forehead in a language she didn’t speak. Draco had never been so miserably aware of being powerless to do anything about his own problems. He felt like a child crushing two puzzle pieces together, wanting them to adhere, even as the wood splintered.

“Hello, Mrs. Malfoy,” said Hermione.

“I beg your pardon, dear one; I assume you have not been informed, and so I entreat you not to think me rude, but the title of a Malfoy’s wife is ‘lady.’”

She was back in the formal register, the soprano flute of parties and dinners, a voice that carried between clinking glasses and humming violins. He ought to have been grateful, but what he found instead was a profound disgruntlement, and a lonely sort of melancholy.

Hermione tilted her head. “That would imply Draco was a lord,” she said skeptically.

“It does, by law. Custom forestalls the use of that address until his seventeenth birthday.”

“Is that a formal holding, or only a title?”

“I beg your pardon?”

“I’m asking if you have vassals, Lady Malfoy.”

Somewhere along the line, she’d picked up Harry’s knack for making a title sound like a silly headdress.

“Not quite so many as we did two years ago,” said Narcissa, and then Hermione gave a cold little smile.

“I see.”

“Mother—”

“Does Binns still teach History of Magic?”

Hermione went frozen. She looked like someone had jumped her in a dark alley with a pop quiz, and her wariness was warring with her natural instinct to rip out a quill and ace it.

“Yes?”

Narcissa sniffed. “Has he reached the life of Emeric the Eminent?”

“Mother: what?”

“Do you mean Emeric the Evil?” said Hermione, somewhat pointedly.

“Apparently not. I will educate you. Emeric was a great wizard of the middle ages, and he drew many followers,” said Narcissa. “One Yuletide, two followers came to him with a white stag, and both claimed the right to make a tribute of it in their liege’s name. Emeric gave judgment: he would sever the stag in half, with one stroke of his mighty wand, and a half would pass to each claimant. To share the tribute. And the first follower said: ‘Lord, I yield claim. The tribute of half a dead thing is no tribute at all.’”

The notes of condescension were neither missed nor ignored by Hermione, who on her most patient days did not ooze restraint.

“I know what this is,” she interrupted. “It’s just the story of King Solomon. Two women bring a baby, both saying it’s theirs, and he offers to cut it in half, and the one who objects is the real mother — did someone adapt it for wizards? Because the Bible’s much older.”

“And Emeric replied,” said Narcissa stiffly, ignoring her, “‘it is true, half a stag is no fine tribute; but it is better to destroy one’s enemies than to give them succor, even if in the pretext of nobility.’ And he cut down the first follower, for weakness, while the second follower received the tribute and his favor.”

Hermione blinked, aghast.

“What a horrible story,” she said. “That’s a terrible way to treat your followers. His retention must have been awful.”

Narcissa said, “The man who forsakes his claim easily is not worthy of it. Nor any other kind of service.”

Hermione made a skeptical sound like a creaking hinge.

“Fine,” she said. “Literarily, that isn’t really — but sure. What I don’t understand is this: you’ve implied the stronger wizard was willing to let Emeric kill the stag.”

Narcissa inclined her head. As near a thing to surprise as she ever showed in public.

“You disapprove?”

“Of course I do,” she said. “Apart from the fact he’s evil—”

“A simple word for simple-minded people.”

“No, it’s actually, literally, true in this case — but apart from that, I don’t see how the kind of man who thinks ‘cut it in half’ is any kind of equitable solution to the problem of limited indivisible resources could be worthy of tribute,” she said, mildly indignant. “And there’s two of them. They ought to just kill Emeric, and let the stag go.”

Draco’s face did something entirely unlicensed and probably unremarkable, or at least not the sort of thing he’d want in print.

For her own part, Narcissa looked like Merlin had just swaggered up and taken a knee.

“Interesting idea,” she said, her voice wooden and odd. She rolled her signet ring around her knuckle, pensive. “You’ve an innovative mind. I hear you are somewhat formidable with a cauldron.”

“Or without it,” said Hermione, who never could take a caveat lying down.

It was a sign of who he was dealing with that he wasn’t sure if the interaction was going well or not.

His mother turned away from Hermione and took his face between her hands. She gave him a kiss to the top of his head, like a crown. It felt nice, but also vaguely pointed; perhaps it would have been less so if she had ever done it in public before.

But he didn’t mind it, either. Especially because she bookended it with a cryptic murmur of: “Remember to come home, darling.”

Her palm cupped his cheek. She cut a glance at Hermione, wordlessly turned her back, and walked away.

On the way out of the Hospital Wing, another figure hobbled into the hallway, and gave a cry. It was Filch, his ratty coat flapping at his hips, his keyring jingling with the quake of his wizened shoulders when he saw her.

“Lady Black,” he gasped. And — Draco squinted, sure that the night’s terrors had at last broken his powers of perception — without reservation, he swept into a deep bow.

“Hello, Filch,” said Narcissa, and in her tone was a startling warmth. “I know it’s after hours.”

The caretaker gave a toothy grin. “Never did give an old man no rest.”

“Goodness, no, darling. Time enough for that when you’re dead. How fares the Widow Norris?”

“Still kicking. Just here, in fact. ’Spect she remembers you.”

“I should say. No creature of taste has ever forgotten.”

Narcissa bent, and held out her fingers to the aged cat, who mewed and shoved its head into her waiting hand. He had never seen the creature take kindly to anything before, much less permit itself to be touched.

Filch stepped out of her way, ushering her down the stairs, and she swept ahead of him. He followed two steps behind, hobbling along like the world's oldest living footman.

Hermione made a curious sound. They both stared after his mother for a moment, reconfiguring their assumptions.

"I didn't think Filch liked anybody," she said. Her voice was small and echoing in the wide corridor.

"No. Nor I."

In the windows, the blue had thinned to watercolor, streaked with paper-pale veins of clouds, and the lavender light of morning spilling out in the east. There were voices now, in the castle, murmuring from behind the doors and in the creak of staircases shuffling from landing to landing. The Beauxbatons carriage caught the first sparkles of sunlight on its spire and twinkled. The masts of the Durmstrang ship were a dark forest of crosses on the lake.

Hermione brought her arms around herself and held tight, as if an internal entropy was driving her apart at the atomic level.

"I spoke to her." It was important that she knew this. This was the first thing he thought she ought to know. "About the— blood issue."

"Oh, God, please d— I'm sorry." She broke off, cringing. "That's just — I can't take it. Not tonight, please? I don't care. Or, rather, it's not that I don't care, but it isn't… If the resolution wasn't 'I'm forswearing your company forever and camping in Slytherin,' then let it wait, please."

"Do I act like a man who's forsworn you?"

She went thoughtfully still.

In the silence, he could hear everything he wanted to tell her.

The Dark Lord is immortal. He's split his soul, my mother is Dumbledore's agent. They're hunting him. He was never dead, not really.

Dumbledore has an Unbreakable Vow to keep me alive.

My father was the highest kind of Death Eater there is. You were right about him. He'd likely have killed you.

I wouldn't let him.

"It doesn't feel real that he's dead," she said, by and by. Lost in the fugue of thought, he very nearly mistook her for speaking about his father, and in that haze he almost agreed. "He can't be. I keep thinking that he's going to… to wake up. That I'll see him again. Like he's gone on some kind of vacation."

At first, he thought she meant Crouch.

"I'm sorry, Granger."

What an awful distance there was between the word itself and what it tried to convey.

"It's alright. No. Sorry— no, it's not. Actually, it might never be alright," she said, oddly calm. "He's dead. I keep trying to think about it, because I hate it whenever I forget, and then have to remember it again. You'd think remembering would be easier. But it's just as bad as learning it all over again."

"I know."

"His family was here earlier. To collect him. And Dumbledore spoke to them, first, because I… I didn't want to. Isn't that horrible? I didn't want to speak to them."

"You're not awful, Granger."

“But Mrs. Weasley said I should, and I did, and they were… they were so kind. They invited me to the funeral. Harry’s coming, too. And Ron, I suppose. You can—” She broke off. She could not look at him. The place between her shoes was hoarding all her attention. “You could come, too, if you wanted to. I mean, I would invite you, and I don’t think they would… I didn’t ask, but I’m sure you could. Oh, God, that’s terrible phrasing. Who wants to come to a funeral? Never mind. I don’t know what I was—”

“Of course I’m coming. Don’t be stupid.”

She might have had the decency not to look so hopelessly relieved.

“Thank you.”

“You and Potter don’t seem to understand this principle: you don’t have to say thank you for that.”

It occurred to him that Hermione had brutally exacting standards in almost every area except the way people treated her personally, where she had almost none. Or perhaps that was unique with respect to him.

“He has a little brother,” she said hollowly. “Had.”

“Etiquette dictates that you can table issues of verb tense until after the mourning period.”

“What?”

“I knew what you meant.”

“He was — he was seventeen,” she said, “and— and he said he liked talking to me, because he’d never had a real friend before. And he took me to the ball, and now he’s— he’s dead.”

“I assure you, the two events had nothing to do with one another.”

She hiccuped a laugh, and promptly started to cry.

“Oh, hell. That wasn’t meant to be flippant. I meant it sincerely. Survivor’s guilt, and that rot, you know.”

“I’m such a twit,” she said thickly. “When Molly and Arthur and Bill and the Krums all came and they were nice to me, and I couldn’t stop crying for ages, and then you come here with your stupid accent and you say something utterly stupid—”

“Go on then, blame a man for trying.”

“—and you make me feel better, which is horrible,” she said, savagely. “I’m not supposed to feel better. I’m supposed to be miserable. Because he’s dead, and I’m — I was his only friend, and — it hasn’t been a day, and I’m laughing. I’m a bad person.”

“I beg your pardon,” he said, as his concerns multiplied in dizzying arrays.

“I lead him on. Rita Skeeter was right—”

“Are you joking? You’re crying over a muckraker who’s approximately two thirds plastic?”

“Don’t make me laugh!”

“That was a factual statement, one, and two, and if I can’t have irony, then the enterprise of this conversation is simply sunk. You vastly overestimate my emotional range.”

“I’m serious.”

“Fine. What would you prefer?”

“I should be crying!”

“You are crying,” he pointed out, and she froze, full of mixed dismay and surprise.

He was tired. It had been almost twenty-four hours since his head had touched a pillowcase and his body was triggering every alarm that told him so. His arms were full of ache and his brain was still riding out aftershocks from several consecutive earthquakes in reality, and he had no more patience for this nonsense, when he wanted her sensible and bright and present.

There was a dead boy in the room. Not present, physically, but he was still there. It dawned on him with some fear that there might always be a dead boy in the room.

“Granger.” He cut through whatever the hell she was saying about him, and eased himself down on the bench beside her. Merlin, but it was good to sit. “You’re tired.”

“I’m a bad person,” she said, very quietly, with terrifying certainty.

He scrubbed his eyes with thumb and forefinger, straining for something that would make her understand. Abruptly, he turned to her.

“No, you’re tired,” he said flatly. “The fact that you’re upright speaks to an ungodly level of stimulants being wrung from your pituitary gland, and I simply will not think about your cortisol levels for the sake of mine. I’ve never known you to be this stupid about anything in your life, and you should be religiously grateful that it’s only me to witness it, because if it were anyone else they’d mistake what you’re doing for some sort of tearful emotional catharsis — instead of what it is, which is a raw biochemical punishment for your brilliant life plan of fighting everything evil that moves, ever. And then you’d have to kill them, so the secret doesn’t get out that you’re mortal.”

She shook her head, still crying silently into her hands.

“You’re a good person,” he said quietly. “Krum knew that, it was part of why he adored you.”

“He didn’t know me.”

“I do.”

“You could be wrong.”

“Not likely.”

“You don’t know what I’m thinking,” she said thickly. “I tried to save Harry, and I couldn’t. I failed him, and I failed Viktor, and now I can’t even mourn properly. I was relieved when Harry came back with his body — do you know that? Relieved. Viktor is dead, and I was relieved, because it wasn’t Harry. How can you do that to someone you called a friend? What kind of horrible — thing — feels that way? I didn’t deserve his friendship. I don’t deserve anyone’s friendship, I’m hateful—”

“If you were anyone else, I’d have their tongue out for saying that about you.”

She scoffed, wetly.

He consulted the truth, found he had nothing better, and deployed it warily, without any particular expectation that it would work. It rarely had before.

“If you’re hateful, then nothing in the world is anything but,” he said tiredly. “I’ve destroyed three hundred years of tradition just so I can sit here next to you, Granger, don’t go telling me you’re not worth following.”

She wrenched her head out of her hands, stared at him, and made a sound of inchoate rage and incredulousness.

He didn’t quite understand where the rage was from. He thought it was a perfectly normal thing to say, if admittedly somewhat saccharine. Perhaps she thought it was overdone.

Then there was a blur of motion, and he reeled back in alarm as something warm and wet slammed into his collarbone. She’d scrambled into his lap.

“Granger—”

“Don’t.”

“I said one word.”

“Too much.”

“Excuse me?”

“Shut up,” she said, clearly and calmly, though still crying quite furiously. “You’ll ruin the moment.”

“It’s my moment, too.”

“So don’t ruin it, then.”

She was holding his chest as if she had to protect it from a band of chest-thieving ghouls.

“You annoy me,” he told the top of her head, which was nestled firmly against his collarbone.

“You,” she told his sternum, “make me feel murderous,” and her breath washed through his shirt.

He touched her waist, a recollection of the waltz position, fingers spread over the plane of her back.

“Better than anyone else, and never you forget it.”

It wasn’t a hug, exactly. He had by now experienced enough of them to make an authoritative judgment. It was more of an informal, etiquette-to-the-wind, thank-God-we’re-not-dead type of grapple. Of which he had also experienced more than one, but few like this.

Her head fit neatly under his chin, and it was easy to dip his head and be lost in her hair, which was always so wonderfully warm, even in a cold castle, even when the rest of him was prickling numb. The points where they were touching were pleasant anchors to the physical world. It was nice, for a change, to want to be in his body, to feel the things he was feeling, and not to escape them.

The door to the Hospital Wing creaked. He turned his head.

Ron stepped through the crevice in the door and stared a stare of such distance it could be charted in lightyears. For a moment he thought he was going to comment on how it looked, the two of them, toss off a sneer and a sour remark that would spike the memory of the whole occasion with a bad aftertaste.

Just then, on the heels of the night he'd had, Draco was fairly certain he would start a firefight in the hallway if he tried.

But Ron shut the door, folded his arms and firmly addressed the eastern window.

"Can come in now," he said. "Pomfrey's waiving the limit, now Harry's awake."

Hermione breathed out, long and slow. "How is he?"

Ron shrugged. "Better than before," he said. "You?"

"Not very good," she said.

His mouth crooked. "Yeah," he said. He nodded at Draco. "And you?"

"I'm still here."

"Right. That's something, isn't it." He reached for the door, to pull it back, and Draco realized that there would be a whole crowd of people on the other side of the door. The identity of the people didn't strictly matter; it was overwhelming by itself. He wished that everything would have the common fucking decency to stop happening for five minutes, so he could get it all straight, and sort things out with Hermione. He was fairly certain they could cobble together a ten-step plan to set the world to rights, if only they could get five invulnerable minutes.

Four and a half, with Ron.

“Ron—”

With one hand on the door, he stopped, and looked at Hermione — a queer, furtive thing, out of the corner of his eye, like he didn’t really want to see her.

“Does anyone know what’s happening?” she asked, in one breath, like an exorcism.

“No. And I reckon they won’t, not for a long time.”

“But did Dumbledore say anything to your parents? About what’s going to happen to the Ministry, or to Nott?”

“I dunno. Maybe. He’s been coming and going a lot, and he and Padfoot and Moony went into a room with her and Bill and Dad, and they talked for a long time. But they didn’t let me or Charlie in.” He nodded at Draco. “What about you, do you know anything? Did your mum let on if she knew what’s coming?”

He could hear the question under the question. They were both watching him in sad vain hope of an answer, and he had two answers on his tongue, one a lie, the other a broken promise, neither one of which would satisfy.

What’s going to happen to us?

“Nothing,” he lied. “I don’t know.”

The next chapter, and the last of book 4, will be called "They Shall Not Grow Old."

Thank you — for everything.

They Shall Not Grow Old

Chapter 56: They Shall Not Grow Old

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Harry stayed in the Hospital Wing for a day, and then he moved out of the dorms. Professor McGonagall helped him carry his bags down to the Shrieking Shack, where Sirius and Remus were waiting for him. He spent the last week of class skipping school and living in the Shrieking Shack, where Dumbledore and Madam Pomfrey would come down to visit in the afternoons, and various Weasleys could drop by through the Floo grate as they pleased. If the appearance of Sirius Black, wanted murderer and fugitive from the law, disturbed any of them, they resolved it behind closed doors with Dumbledore and Sirius himself. Remus was welcomed by all, and spent fifteen minutes locked in the dead heat of a hug with Molly while she sobbed an ocean into one of his shirts.

At school, Harry's absence was filled with rumors of its cause. It was in one sense fortunate that the last week of exams was a series of silent periods and study halls, not much opportunity for conversation, and though Dumbledore offered to let all three of them to skip the tests, as Harry had — and Ron accepted — Hermione put her hand up and became the first person in Hogwarts history to beg permission to sit an exam.

Draco sat them, but only because they were easy, and he wanted everyone else to know it.

Most people, he noticed, were skirting him in the corridors, avoiding his eyes. Whispers trailed him, as did their less common cousin, which was questions. He could blame no one for their curiosity about what had happened when the maze went down. He could blame everyone for the delusion that they were entitled to ask him about it.

It would have been easy for McGonagall to make a killing on House points, especially for the five minutes that Zacharias Smith spent floating up-side down over the breakfast table when he asked why Harry had gotten to “lark off” after the Tournament. But she ordered Smith to class and instead gave him a detention that was to be served out on Saturday afternoon in the Shrieking Shack.

“Thanks, professor,” he muttered.

“It is unorthodox to thank professors for giving detentions,” she sniffed, but then she touched his shoulder on the way out of the hall, and murmured: “It was well done, Mr. Malfoy.”

He doubted she was talking about Smith.

Which was worse than if she’d yelled at him. Kindness from her and other members of the staff did nothing to calm him, and in fact made him feel surreal, like he’d tripped into a wonderland where everything was cotton and rainbows and glass. It made him even more terrified about what would happen when he’d left it. What was the point of this pretending? The world was over. The Dark Lord had returned, and everyone was fucked.

Professor Snape didn’t return from wherever Dumbledore sent him by the end of the week. Potions exams were proctored by the Bloody Baron, who whisked up and down the aisles, cackling whenever he saw a student struggling with an answer; Defense Against the Dark Arts, whose professor had been transferred to St. Mungo’s for advanced tissue damage, was finished out by Dumbledore himself.

Cassius Warrington was admitted to a private ward in the Hospital Wing, where Madam Pomfrey spent three very long nights attempting to dispel what she called a “remarkably resilient” Dark curse. Flora Carrow could be found floating in the hallways near the east wing, often crying, and snapping at anyone who tried to help her.

In Harry’s absence, life was quieter. It was also worse. He spent sunlit afternoons reading in the window, orchestrated by the soft etch of Hermione’s quill on the desk beside him. He lost four in five games of wizard’s chess a day with Ron, who had become so unmercifully bored that he started to make up new variations on the rules, duplicating the chess board, playing in three dimensions, giving pieces new powers and ranges of motion, and other modifications that Draco enjoyed puzzling out the enchantments for while Ron mused on the strategic possibilities. By the week’s end they had developed spins on blitz chess that would make Ernie Macmillan, captain of the Hogwarts chess team, soil his trousers.

And still, it wasn’t enough. On nights when sleep eluded him, he would creep out of bed, unlatch the window, and draw his Nimbus from its case stored under his bed; and there, stepping out into the cool rich air of a cloudless summer’s night, he would fly long circles from Gryffindor to Ravenclaw to the Astronomy Tower, pushing until his thighs burned and his chest hurt from breathing, and float there with one foot barely brushing the tallest spire, watching the moon’s reflection on the lake spill like cream from a pale glass.

Dreams brought narrow corridors, hedges that closed in on him as he ran, bone-white masks that never flinched, and green lights that always found their target. In the worst ones, there was screaming — sometimes his, sometimes his mother’s, and sometimes a thin high girl’s scream that he would have known at any distance. He woke up fumbling for his wand and a curse that he knew with dreadful certainty would be too slow, sick from panic. Once, he found himself halfway up the stairs to the girls’ dorms before he realized what he was doing, and went to get his broomstick.

Hermione started drinking coffee in the mornings. Dark circles were her constant accessories. She was sharp as always in class, but tired quickly in the afternoons; when, as she sometimes did, she fell asleep during their afternoon study halls, her head wilting gradually and unwillingly onto the desk in front of her — or memorably, once, his shoulder — he didn’t wake her.

On some level he was afraid of what would happen when they left Hogwarts. For himself, of course — the people they had to fear could breach the Manor walls, and in fact had already done it, once. But he had his mother. He had the Manor, which was a fortress, properly used. Nobody stood watch at the Grangers' door. Their house wasn't even warded. And yet Hermione was intransigent to the suggestion that she spend the summer somewhere else, like the Weasleys'. The last serious discussion of the idea escalated to a shouting row, and that more or less put paid to it.

He wanted to inquire if Dumbledore could do something about it, but the headmaster didn't seem to have a free moment to ask: when he wasn't in class, he was pacing the halls, usually accompanied by a man or two in Ministry robes, discussing something in tones that always seemed dour and on the knife-edge of becoming uncivil.

There were things happening, somewhere, in closed rooms, and behind locked doors. Everyone knew it, but nobody knew what they were. Daphne's father revealed nothing except to warn her away from "the Potter boy," a loophole that she gamely exploited to continue sharing a room with Lavender and Parvati. Pansy, meanwhile, had withdrawn from school the day after the Tournament, and had supposedly taken her exams from home.

On Saturday afternoon, three fourth years crossed the lawns under a sweltering profusion of sunshine to take the passage under the Whomping Willow, and emerged into the Shrieking Shack.

Inhabitation had transformed it. The windows had been cleaned and repaired, filling the living room with summer's yellow dust-strained glow, and the furniture had been resuscitated with stitching. Fuzzy throw pillows and blankets heaped high on the sofas. Stacks of books tumbled sideways and over side tables for want of a shelf. Flowers bloomed promiscuously from a legion of vases, white roses and white lilies and white tulips and ferns laced with tiny clouds of baby's breath, bereavement flowers, like a wild meadow leached of color. Harry usually sat under a blanket on the sofa, reading Quidditch for Seekers or One Thousand and One Tricks For Broomsticks, or studying the gnarled chessboard on the ottoman, while Remus or Sirius puttered around in the kitchen and pretended not to be watching him.

When the three of them came in he smiled, and it was very nearly not sad at all.

Ron came over, glanced at the chessboard, and moved a knight. “Check.”

“Ah, no! Really? I’ve worked on that for days.”

“Bad luck, mate. I’m not going easy on you because you’re bedridden.”

“I’m not bedridden,” Harry informed him, peeling back the throw blanket.

“No? Just lazy, then.”

“Oi! I wanted to go flying, but Remus said it wasn’t a good idea. They want me where they can see me.” He checked over his shoulder and lowered his voice. “I think they’re worried I’m going to do something reckless.”

“That wouldn’t be like you at all, would it,” said Draco, and dropped himself languidly into one of the armchairs. Hermione drifted into the room, lingering to inspect one of the books on the ottoman, and then perched on the arm, where her ankle slightly brushed his leg.

She’d been touchier, this last week of classes. She sat closer to him at meals, where a shift of her knee or elbow could find him, and she’d made a habit of walking with him in hallways — not that she hadn’t, before, but now she would take his arm or his hand sometimes, coming down stairs, the little flourishes of etiquette she’d always called frippery before.

It was for comfort, he supposed. It didn't bother him, except that it made it hard to focus on anything.

Ron leaned down to snag one of the tarts on a platter beside Harry's afternoon tea.

"Hagrid," warned Harry, too late. Ron's teeth sank into the confection and stayed there.

"He came to visit?" said Hermione, flipping through one of Remus's books.

"Yeah, to say goodbye. He's going away, after the end of term," he said. "He's not coming back to teach next year."

Ron gave a sad cry, muffled by glue.

Harry looked at Hermione. Then at Draco.

"Oh, no—"

"I mean, that's awful."

"I do hope he'll stay as groundskeeper."

"The lawns never looked better."

"And of course it's sad, he's a dear friend—"

"A reassuring constant, in these trying times. A large, hairy, constant."

Harry snorted. "Alright," he said. "No, he'll be coming back, but not for a while. Dumbledore's sending him to go liaison with the giants. He's worried about them siding with… you know."

"Voldemort?"

"D'n sheh ih," Ron warned, and Hermione rolled her eyes.

“They will, you know,” said Draco. “The giants.”

“Dumbledore thinks they might not, though.”

“But they will. They were better off with the Dark Lord than they ever were with the Ministry. Unless Dumbledore can promise to let them wander around eating people as they like, he’s got nothing in his arsenal that will compare.” Draco slouched into his armchair, freshly dispirited.

“Why do you call him that?” said Hermione, curiously. “The Dark Lord? Instead of—”

“Hr mnee!”

“—instead of You-Know-Who.”

“It’s what he is, isn’t it? It’s a title, like anything else.”

“But he’s not lord of anything,” she said. “He’s just a man.”

He wasn’t. He was an immortal creature of Dark magic. But he couldn’t tell them that, and wouldn’t have wanted to, even if he could. What use was letting them know the case was hopeless?

Hermione was watching him keenly. He shrugged and crossed his legs, removing his ankle from hers. She thinned her lips and folded her arms.

“Oh, Hermione,” said Harry suddenly, reaching for the ottoman. “Here’s something I found — this’ll cheer you up! Did you hear that Rita Skeeter got fired?”

Hermione paused. “Why, no,” she said, in an odd voice. “That’s excellent news. Did her editor finally happen to read one of her articles?”

It perturbed Draco that she was so calm. The downfall of a sworn enemy was the sort of occasion that ought to be met with drinking and dancing, and declarations of one's eternal glory, etc., etc.

"Better. It's right here," announced Harry, rustling open the newspaper. "'Former Prophet staff writer Rita Skeeter was arrested yesterday on charges of operating as an unregistered animagus. The Improper Use of Magic Office, unusually, took her into custody the previous morning, when the Office received an unmarked parcel by owl post, containing within it' — listen to this! — 'containing within it the animagus form of Ms. Skeeter, a horsefly, entrapped in a jar.' " He crowed. "In a jar! It goes on: 'Representatives found that the jar had been perforated and stocked with foodstuffs for the unfortunate Ms. Skeeter, suggesting that she had been in captivity for some time. The identity of the culprit remains unknown.'"

Ron gave a cheer.

"It's a shame that owl post doesn't use return addresses," said Hermione. She turned a page of the book. "The muggle government would've been able to trace the sender."

Ron pried his teeth free and spoke thickly through a crust of fudge. "Who cares? Ding dong, the witch is dead!"

Her lip quirked. "Where'd you get that from?"

"I dunno, I heard Dad say it when Thatcher resigned. Anyway, that's great! No more adventures in newsprint, eh?" He elbowed Harry.

Harry smiled thinly and tossed the paper back on the ottoman. It fell with the front page up, and Draco could read it by tilting his head.

MURDER AND MADNESS: HARRY POTTER SOLE WITNESS IN SUSPICIOUS DEATH OF BULGARIAN SEEKER. Column two: A CRIME OF PASSION? AN ORAL HISTORY OF THE RIVALRY BETWEEN KRUM AND POTTER. Under the fold, top line: KRUM KILLED, BUT POTTER PROFITS: MINISTRY AWARDS ONE THOUSAND GALLEONS TO ILLEGITIMATE CHAMPION.

None of the bylines were Rita Skeeter.

Hermione cleared her throat and surreptitiously flicked her wand at it. It flipped over to an advertisement for broomstick polish, in which Oliver Wood, decked in a Pud U jersey, wielded a keeper's mit and a maniacal smile.

She was being quite reserved about the situation, for someone who had more to loathe about Skeeter than any of them. He might have expected a little fanfare, at least. 'Reserved' was not generally a word apt to describe Hermione.

Abruptly, Harry grimaced and reached for a chipped brown mug on the table. He finished the dregs of it and wiped his mouth without much pleasure. Ron picked it up and made a face at whatever he smelled in it.

"You've got to stop letting Sirius make your tea, mate."

He laughed gratefully. "It's Pain Relief Potion. And lemonade."

Draco checked the time. "It's ten to five," he remarked. "Early in the day for sedatives, no? I'm sure Granger would be glad to go over the History of Magic exam, if you need rest. Ow."

Her foot swung back, guileless. Tempestuous creature.

"It's watered down. Pomfrey says I should take some whenever my scar starts hurting."

"Does it often?" said Hermione.

Harry shrugged.

"Is it bad?"

He shrugged again.

They lapsed into reflection.

Remus came in from the kitchen and leaned on the back of Harry's sofa. "Plotting and scheming for next year, you lot?" Harry craned his neck up and grinned at him; Remus gave his hair a ruffling that would have rendered it disastrous if nature hadn't seen to it already. "What's next? Occamies, lethifolds? Basilisks?"

"Worse. O.W.L.s," said Ron.

"Oh, you'll do all right. Defense Against the Dark Arts, at least, you've got locked down. 'What are the properties of a werewolf'?" He winked at Harry. "Clumsy… bad cook… fond of cardigans…'"

Harry laughed. Remus visibly relaxed.

"You're not a bad cook."

"Lucky for you, I don't believe you. Dinner's coming from the Three Broomsticks, what's your pleasure? Oh, no, hang on — it's the Closing Feast, isn't it? You'll want to eat at the castle."

There was a beat.

"Remus," said Hermione, with as much softness as she could — which still wasn't perhaps all that much — "the funeral's tonight."

This landed on Remus like a bird dropping. He screwed up his face and tried to make the most of it, but it was clearly not his preferred forecast.

"Ah," he said. "You'll all be going, then."

"Yes. Dumbledore arranged a Portkey for us. I don't know why we can't just Floo."

"Floo networks don't cross international lines," said Draco. "It's regulated."

"Why don't we table foreign policy," said Remus. "Harry — are you alright to go? It's a long way from home, and Sirius and I can't come with you.”

Harry shrugged. “I’ll be back by midnight,” he said. “Anyway, saves me having to go to the Closing Feast. I dunno what I’d do there, besides have people stare at me. Ask me whether I’ve really gone loony. Or what Voldemort’s like, if they happen to believe me. Bet Colin would ask me to draw him a sketch.” He laughed forcedly.

Hermione cleared her throat. “They wouldn’t…”

But she could convince no one, and seemed to realize it, because she left the sentence dangling there.

Remus didn’t seem at ease with Harry going, but whatever his doubts, he swallowed them. The door creaked, and a dog came panting through the doors, shaking sweat from its coat.

“Kill you to do that outside, would it?” Remus called.

Sirius transformed and swaggered in from the foyer, holding a bundle full of something dark and fragrant. “And deny myself the pleasure of your sweet reminders? Wouldn’t do. Hello, you lot. Hermione, Ron.” He nodded. “Draco.”

“Hello, Sirius!”

“Wotcher, mate.”

“Black.”

“Harry’s going to the funeral,” said Remus.

Sirius paused. “Well, ’course he is,” he said gruffly, after a moment. “Got to. Right thing to do.”

“Yes, but it’s quite far—”

“We’ll be there," said Ron, folding his arms.

“It’s just one night,” said Harry. “I’ll be back before we leave tomorrow.”

“Before you all leave?” said Hermione sharply. “Are you going with him?”

Harry opened his mouth, closed it, and looked at Sirius. Sirius smiled.

“Dumbledore managed to dig up an old safe house for me,” he said. “He’s been secret-keeper for the past fifteen years, and he’s letting me take a loan on it. He reckons with a good Fidelius, we’ll be safe there — and Harry, too.”

“No,” said Hermione, alarmed. “There’s a blood protection, through Harry’s aunt, you can’t take him, it’ll break it—”

“When Voldemort took my blood, the protection broke,” said Harry quietly. “So he can kill me now. But that means I don’t have to stay with the Dursleys anymore.”

This was delivered in a tone of reassurance and relief. Only to Harry Potter could being hunted by a violent demigod be an acceptable sacrifice.

“But — but — where are you going? Can we visit?”

“Oh, you can!” said Harry eagerly. “It’s cracking, Hermione, we’re going to be in London, not far from you — you and I can see each other every weekend, it’ll be grand—”

Draco twitched. Wouldn’t that be a lovely summer they’d have, popping in and out of each other’s living rooms, having a ball of a time palling around the city. Just like the Burrow, wouldn’t it be, and then everyone would’ve met the Grangers but him.

“—and Ron, you’ll get to come up and we’ll have you, it’s going to be mad— you’re welcome too, Draco—”

“Give us the address, and I’ll check the datebook,” said Draco, polishing his fingernails. “I haven’t much free time in the summers, but we’ll try a visit if it’s convenient.”

“Number Twelve, Grimmauld Place,” said Sirius, grinning.

Draco stared at him.

“You’re joking.”

“Am not.”

“But it’s not yours.”

“Is too.”

“Isn’t. You were disinherited, if I recall. Usually, that means no inheritance, either in cash or real estate.”

“Not from Mummy Dearest,” he said smugly, “but Twelve wasn’t hers to give away. Pollux bequeathed it to Uncle Alphard.”

“Who was also disinherited—”

“After mon Grandpére kicked the bucket, I’m afraid. Not that it mattered during the War, he was off sleeping with half the blokes in Manhattan, but when I got out of Azkaban, I came to find out he left it to me — one last ‘go stick it to them, kid,’ from one disappointment to another. Bloody inspirational, really. Anyway, it’s not part of the Black estate proper, anymore.”

“What,” said Ron, “it’s some kind of mansion, is that it?”

“No,” said Draco.

“More of a manor,” said Sirius. “It’s this big silly townhouse with lots of frills and unnecessary rooms. Harry, you’d love it, you can fly your broomstick through the drawing rooms—”

“Which he won’t, Sirius.”

“—so long as no one prissy and boring is watching, you’ve got to be careful, there. But there’s loads to explore…”

They led off in a grand discussion of summer plans, and he watched Harry drift into the dreamy haze of excitement for the months to come. And then he realized what Dumbledore was doing, letting him leave the Dursleys, after three successive summers of insisting on a return. It wasn’t just that the charm had expired; frankly, he didn’t know if it had ever been. He’d never heard of a blood protection that depended on residence with one’s aunt.

Harry was being hidden.

Grimmauld Place was a war safehouse. That meant defensive charms, wards, fortifications. It meant that Sirius, as the adult master of the house, held control of the manor with household magic. Real household magic, like the Manor, or Knotscliff. It meant that no one was coming in unless Sirius Black wanted them to.

It also meant Dumbledore didn’t think the muggle world was safe for him anymore. And he was willing to risk sacrificing Harry’s blood protection for that purpose.

And Hermione was walking right back into it, her head high.

He was going to be ill.

The conversation stalled when he stood up, scraping his chair back.

“Black.” He jerked his head at the kitchen. “A word.”

Sirius sauntered in after him, sharing the heat of four curious pairs of eyes at their backs.

He secured the kitchen door and cast Muffliato before he spoke. Sirius leaned against the counter, arms folded.

“Dumbledore expects the first attack soon, then?” he said brusquely, without preamble.

Sirius exhaled slowly, turning his head aside.

“It’s possible,” he said quietly.

“How possible? Likely possible, or known?”

“Depends on how much Nott and Wormtail have been able to do since last year. We’re waiting on intelligence from Snape.”

A small warm thread of relief unspooled down his spine. “So Snape’s alive, then.”

“As far as we can tell,” Sirius muttered, without much happiness. “Trying to worm his way back into his master’s good books, and expected to have great success, no surprises.”

Draco narrowed his eyes. “He’s risking his life for you, you know.”

“He’s risking his life because Dumbledore’s got him by the bollocks.”

“It doesn’t — never mind. It doesn’t matter.” He folded his arms. “How much does Potter know about what’s happened?”

Sirius set his jaw and gave him a hard look.

“Nothing? You’ve told him nothing?”

“Not by choice.”

“You haven’t told him that he’s about to be hunted by the most dangerous men alive? Do you think it’ll be any difficulty for him to guess? Not to mention this smacks of duplicity, incidentally — he thinks you’re taking him in because you’re adopting him, because you’re his godfather—”

“We are adopting him,” snapped Sirius. “I am his godfather. Harry belongs at home. With his family.”

“Couldn’t agree more. Why isn’t Dumbledore letting him stay at Hogwarts?”

Something flashed across Sirius’s face. He opened his mouth, but with a sickening pang, Draco answered his own question.

“Because he doesn’t think Hogwarts is safe, does he?”

“It’s not—”

“The Ministry’s been sending men around. Do you know anything about that?”

“Dumbledore’s been in negotiations with Runcorn,” said Sirius quietly. “That’s all I know, and it’s all I could tell you, even if it wasn’t.”

He was quiet. He twisted his signet ring back and forth, grounding pressure.

“I didn’t know Uncle Alphard was dead,” he said.

Sirius shrugged. “Neither did I,” he said. “Think one of the dementors ate my funeral invitation.”

There was a pause; and then they both laughed, a little, at the ridiculousness of it. At the ridiculousness of the world, that let the two of them stand in the kitchen together, discussing what they discussed, knowing what they knew, and didn’t combust from intolerance.

When you were flying into a dive, there was always a moment before you crashed when it was still possible to pull up — the last possible moment when you could even out, and still fly away free — and the tricky point was that you never knew exactly where it was. So you could keep going, in theory, well past it. If you didn’t notice in time. But there was still some distance between that point in the ground, and so you could go sailing on for a few more dizzying seconds, and it was only when you tried to pull up that you'd realize you were going to crash.

Which was all to say that his current feelings weren't unfamiliar. Asphyxiating, perhaps; nauseating, certainly; but not unfamiliar.

When a wizard died, there were certain customs to observe. Draco knew these customs very well. He had already done them once.

Funerals took place at sunset. At seven o'clock, they reported to Dumbledore's office, and traveled by Portkey to the embassy in Sofia, where they were hastened through a series of low-ceilinged bureaucratic rooms and then handed another Portkey, which deposited them on a grassy hillside sloping down to a riverbank. Through a crest of poplar trees, a river glittered under a harsh, slanting sunset, so bright it hurt the eye. Deep shadows striped the grass. A squat brick cottage sat under the arm of the hill, so low its roof sat almost level with the slope, with deep-set windows and a single lonesome chimney.

Dumbledore wore robes of pure white, hemmed in gold, and a fine gold wizard's hat with tassels and a gold bulb at the tip. His beard was groomed neatly and tied with a gold ribbon. It was a touch flashy, in Draco's opinion, but presentable enough.

He'd opted for subtlety. His proper funeral things were locked in some closet at the Manor, but he'd found in one of his deeper trunks a black double-breasted coat with gold bars embroidered onto the cuffs, which matched the metallic glint of the buttons. It was a militant sort of thing, terribly out of fashion, but he doubted the Krums would judge. Harry came in his dress robes; Ron wore his uniform, but he'd Transfigured a gold handkerchief that sat in his breast pocket, and they'd both combed their hair, which showed if nothing else that they were living in unprecedented times.

Hermione wore a black dress that fell wide around the shoulders, though she hid it with a gray jumper. A gold pin, which she confessed came from Lavender, and a ribbon in her hair, though its grasp on her curls seemed temporary at best. Someone had done her makeup. He suspected Daphne's signature in the flick of eyeliner.

They were the only people of Viktor's age. The oldest after them were the other members of the Bulgarian quidditch team, who filed in at the back of the glade with a quarter to the ceremony. They all wore quidditch uniforms dyed in black and gold.

Viktor's parents wore distant expressions, their responses slow if given at all. The only time they seemed to wake was when Dumbledore arrived and produced a bouquet of lilies for Viktor's mother, who seized his hand and began speaking frantically in Bulgarian, and refused to let go until her husband dragged her away. Dumbledore made no effort to free himself, and watched the pair of them stumble off with a sadness that was deeper than words.

He leaned down to speak in Hermione's ear. "What did she say?"

Hermione twitched. "I didn't get all of it," she whispered. "I don't… it was something, something, 'great wizard,' and — 'return,' I think."

"'Return' as in 'leave'?"

"No. Sorry. Return, transitive," she said, her voice roughening. "As in — return something. Return him."

"'Bring him back.'"

"Yes," she said, and her voice broke, and she fumbled furiously for her handkerchief. Ron put his hand on her shoulder and offered her his.

They were not the youngest guests, however. That fell to Viktor's brother, a dark-haired boy called Ivan, who did not say one word but scowled at everyone as if prepared to swing at them.

Igor Karkaroff wasn’t there. No one knew where he was, but Draco could take a guess.

At sunset, four members of the Bulgarian team bore forth the coffin on their shoulders. It was plain wood, lacquered, with a spray of golden roses lain across the top. It was placed on an altar near the riverbank, under an arch woven of elder branches. Dumbledore lifted his wand high, and a gold carpet unfurled over the lawn, where the guests knelt. Hermione lagged, watching the ceremony in disorientation, until Draco tugged her down.

The river rolled past without noticing them. The chatter of birds threw singsong echoes down through the thatched green pergola of the trees, among the slender chinks of sunlight and the weeping wind. Viktor’s parents huddled together near the front, not weeping.

Hermione leaned into Draco’s ear.

“Are we—”

He put his finger to his lips. She fell silent.

By and by, his knees started to hurt. He’d forgotten that, from his father’s funeral. He hadn’t noticed much about it at the time.

When the coins of sunlight on the lawn had closed, and a dusky film of twilight had settled over the river, lights gleamed to life in the canopy. Viktor’s mother stood up on wobbly legs, staggered to the coffin, placed one hand on it, and began to speak.

It was in Bulgarian, so he understood nothing, but it wasn’t necessary. There were only so many kinds of eulogy in the world. Nor was it a surprise when she started to cry, broke off, and went back to kneel with her husband.

Then Ivan Krum stood up and went to place his hand on the coffin, where he withdrew a piece of parchment from his pocket, and read slowly, in a thick, lilting accent that cloaked surprisingly strong English.

“Good evenink,” he said stiffly. “Thank you for coming to celebrate v — with. Me and. My family.” He looked up, glowered furtively at the audience, and returned to his script. “I vvv will speak. Briefly. About. My brother.”

Hermione tapped him on the knee. He glanced at her, and she tapped her lip curiously. He shook his head, and nodded at the coffin.

“My brother’s name was Viktor,” said Ivan, struggling on. “He liked to fly.”

His face crumpled, and he lowered the paper — but rallying, he lifted it and continued.

“Many people thought his flying was good. Some even called it beautiful. This made him happy.” He cleared his throat and brandished the paper like a shield. “He was fifteen when he was rec… rec… rec-ruited. But by then, he had been — flying — for many years. He would practice it. Here.” He pointed at the earth. “He would get up. Very early. To fly over this water. And would not come down until the sky looked like this.” He reversed his finger’s direction into the sky. “He always doing this. So he is. Never helping. With chores.”

He glared at the crowd. After a moment, Dumbledore gave a soft, obliging laugh, and Ivan visibly relaxed.

“But I ask him, sometime: Viktor. Why do you — do this? Why so much? There are many good f-flyers who do not do so much.” Ivan flipped a page, fumbled, and shuffled them together. “And he… he says to me: ‘you are asking a bad question.’”

Hermione’s breathing came short and raspy in her throat. He passed her his handkerchief.

“I am saying. Okay. Big brother. You are so smart. Tell me, then. What is the right question? And he says.” Ivan wet his lips. “‘I do not fly like this, ‘so much,’ or ‘so little.’ I fly until I have flown enough.’ I say: Okay, smart guy. So for big man you, there is never no enough? Is that point? He says, ‘No, beetroot.’ And he hits me on head, like this. Paf! And he says: ‘Of course there is enough. Enough means that today I fly farther than yesterday. Enough means I fly farther tomorrow than I have today. And though—” He wet his lips again, and he was struggling with it much, now: “And though each day, farther is only inches, in a week — in a year — in fifty years — I will look behind me, and see one thousand leagues of sky.”

He closed his eyes, and then he was crying, somehow, without ever having started.

“And I will see what no one has ever seen,” he said. “And the sky will know me, when I—”

He gasped, wrestled back some groundswell of emotion, and swallowed his breath. “‘And the sky will know me,’ he said, ‘when I come home.’”

Ivan crumpled up his pages and shoved them in his pocket. “The sky has never loved anyone like it did my brother,” he said, “and it never will again. He is gone home.”

He quickly sat back down. His father put his hand on the back of his neck, but Ivan shrugged him off.

Hermione was crying silently into his handkerchief. He could see the rigid lines of her shoulders as she tried to keep herself still.

A few minutes passed, and then Dumbledore stood up. He passed silently to the coffin, and placed his hand on the weathered wood.

“Good evening, friends,” he said. “There is much that I would like to say to you all tonight, all of it commemorating the loss of a fine young person, whom I did not have the pleasure of knowing half so well as I would like. He should be here with us. He was a good and loyal son; a proud brother; an exceptional athlete, and one of the greatest wizards of his generation. All this, and much more, I could tell you; but I find that in times of grief, I can do no better than the poets, whose magic grants them an immortality so perfect even the greatest wizard cannot rival it."

Draco tilted his head, ears pricked. That couldn't have been accidental.

Dumbledore closed his eyes, and then spoke as if he were reading from something.

"They went with songs to the battle, they were young,

Straight of limb, true of eye, steady and aglow.

They were staunch to the end against odds uncounted;

They fell with their faces to the foe.

They shall grow not old, as we that are left grow old:

Age shall not weary them, nor the years condemn.

At the going down of the sun and in the morning

We will remember them."

He opened his eyes. "Thank you," he said softly. And he knelt again.

The ceremony came to a close when the light was almost gone. Viktor's parents came to the front, and his mother passed her wand over the coffin, murmuring a spell in Bulgarian. The coffin transformed from dark wood to a solid cask of pure white marble, veined with black and gold, and her husband's spell engraved an epitaph in Cyrilic over the front. It was seamless; the hinges and the crevice under the lid had disappeared in its transformation.

Another sweep of her wand gouged a cavity in the earth below the casket, and together, they levitated it deep into the ground. When it settled with a low thump into the bottom of the well. What came next was not dirt, but items: his mother emptied armfuls of what looked like baby toys, his father a collection of books, and Ivan came forward with a long, state-of-the-art racing broomstick — scuffed slightly at the back, because its former rider liked to sit low in the saddle — and tipped it into the grave.

Then they piled the dirt back on, folding the earth in with long sweeps of their wands, and the grave sat fresh like a wound upon the lawn.

By and by, one of the quidditch players at the back of the lawn raised her wand into the sky. She barked, “Viktor,” and lit her wand. Lumos flared into the fresh dark hole of the night sky.

Dumbledore followed her example. His blazed brightest of all, casting a fine white beam through the trees, like an inverted pillar of sunlight.

Draco pulled out his wand and lit it, too. He lifted it the way he hadn’t been able to for his father, and sent the light shining on the dark underbelly of the canopy.

Hermione dug hers out and murmured a watery “Lumos.” Harry and Ron lit theirs, too, and pointed them at the place Ivan’s brother had called home.

Viktor’s grave was still and cold, and a dozen wands shone softly in the dark glade, like a tiny constellation of earthbound stars.

Someone was playing music. Through the trees, there were sounds of strings and distant drums, a band of ghostly troubadours, and he didn’t know if that was part of the service or not. His father’s funeral had been silent. But this wasn’t his father’s country, and his father had died a long time ago.

Hermione held his hand like it was the last thing on earth she could touch. He laced their fingers. Maybe it was. He wouldn't have been able to tell. Nothing in the world was real, just then, except for her cold palm, and the lights dim and bleak over their heads.

When the lights started going out, one by one, he extinguished his wand and put it away. The grove faded to near-complete darkness, and the gold carpet dissipated under their feet. People started to move around and talk to each other, in the low respectful murmurs, and Viktor's mother led the party in from the lawn, a long train of black-and-gold figures floating toward the house.

Hermione spoke, and her voice was thick.

"Was that it?"

"That was it."

Harry and Ron came over, and Harry took Hermione's other hand.

"Dumbledore says we can stay as long as we like," said Harry. His voice was low and dull. "The Embassy won't send a Portkey for us until we're ready."

"I don't really want to stay," said Hermione. Then: "Sorry. That sounds awful."

"Nah. Me either." Ron gestured to the house. "Besides, they'll want a moment to themselves, I reckon."

Draco said, "Quite," and was surprised by his own vehemence.

"To be clear," he said, "that's what I wanted. At the time."

There was another lingering moment of appreciative silence. He wished he hadn't said that. There was no need to be weepy and insipid. It had been years; there was no dignified reason for him to be harboring anything but an appropriate amount of sober regret.

Hermione pressed her head against the side of his arm. He leaned away, deeply uncomfortable — not at her touch, but at the implication that he needed comforting.

“Time to go,” said Ron hoarsely.

“Yeah,” said Harry, staring at the mound of earth. “Yeah. Time to go.”

Ron wrapped his arm around Harry’s shoulder, and thus joined, the four of them trudged into the starless night.

In the morning, while the nation of Bulgaria flocked to the official state funeral being held in Sofia, Draco learned that he had passed Defense Against the Dark Arts, despite the fact that he had watched the professor be violently enucleated. He had scored 100% on the exam, tying Hermione’s perfect O, though because she had bested him in Transfiguration and History of Magic — he never could be damned to pay attention to Binns — and dropped only one point in Potions, he would get second rank in the year. It was expected. Under normal auspices he would gloat until hoarse, but with things as they were, nobody cared, and one couldn’t really blame them.

On the last day of fourth year, he woke up to a screech even stronger than Ron’s snoring. In the darkness of what must have been an ungodly distance from sunrise, an owl with sabled feathers was demanding entrance at his window, and through the fug of irritation, he nearly dropped the small brown parcel tied to its claws.

Inside was a black velvet box with a snakeshead clasp, and it nipped his finger when he tried to open it. When he was finished hopping around and hissing curses at it, the snake licked up the pinprick of blood, flickered its forked tongue, and pried open its jaws, unlocking the box.

A pair of silver cufflinks sat on a bed of green satin, inlaid with the letter ‘D,’ and a tiny diamond chip apiece. A strip of parchment nested between them.

Happy fifteenth. Not that you deserve it.

I’m s orry

He debated whether or not to pitch the things out the Tower window.

Ultimately, it was settled by Ron waking up and demanding to know why it was so bloody cold in the dorm, which led him to shut the window and wedge the cufflinks into his trunk. He could always hurl them into the Manor lake, if he changed his mind.

The four of them went down to Hogsmeade for the train. It rained that day: the kind of light summer rainstorm that left the forests damp and shuddering with green new life, the scent of wet fertile earth, fresh flowers, perfumed wind.

Rain followed them to the platform and drizzled from the eaves. Gray skies, condensation beading on the engine, umbrellas bobbing like black valves with the movements of the crowd. Students with their hoods turned up, hats turned low. No great boom of Hagrid’s voice, directing traffic; no shouts and panicked fumble for forgotten things. They lingered a while under the platform to say goodbye to Harry, who would be Flooing to Grimmauld Place with Remus and Sirius later.

Arthur and Molly took turns bruising him with hugs, and then Bill gave his nose a tweak, and told him to send a list of possible birthday presents. The idea of creating an entire list of things he wanted seemed to leave Harry flabbergasted; Draco offered to send him some templates and a spreadsheet.

Then, in the awkward, shoe-shuffling silence of deciding who would say goodbye first, someone’s voice floated over the din: “Arry! Eez that you?”

Through the crowd came Fleur Delacour, wearing a pale blue raincoat with matching heels and cloche, like some sort of fashion advert from the thirties. She tossed a sheaf of blonde hair over her shoulder and extended her hand, fingers-down, to Harry, who — either gravely misunderstanding the request, or understanding it very well — grasped it, turned it right-way up, and shook it.

Fleur's lip curled; but then she broke into a surprising little charm of a laugh. She dabbed a kiss on his cheek, and then she turned to Ron.

"You," she said, "'ave saved my life."

"What?" said Ron, concussedly.

"In ze maze. You are 'elping me. I am not forgetting." She opened her cornflower pocketbook and withdrew an envelope. The envelope was heavy, and disgorged a large amount of glitter when opened. Ron looked mournfully at his freshly bedazzled feet.

"Eet eez from Gabrielle," Fleur added, pointing at the scrawl on the card. "She eez wanting to say thank-you. And my parents, as well, for ze service you 'ave done to my family. And zis! Zis eez from Madame Maxime, who sezz you may come to Beauxbatons and have ze honor and ze favor of ze Maxime family. Zey are very well connected, you know! Your name eez 'eard often in ze 'alls of Paris." She indicated a final signature.

"Yeah," said Ron softly. He looked at the card with spellbound wonder, as if it were a far shinier, far grander thing. "It's really good, Fleur."

"Yes! I know. Anyway. You are welcome always at our house, and at ze Beauxbatons Academy," she sniffed. "Gabrielle's friend is thinking she will marry you and 'ave many children, but do not fear, mon ame: I am warning her off."

Ron snapped his head up, betrayed.

"You're what?"

“You are disappointed. Do not be,” Fleur ordered. “You are not wanting to marry ’er. She cannot perform any of ze major blood curses, and she does not ’ave ze ’ips for children. She could never make ze wife of an ’ero. I ’ave protected you.”

“Thanks,” said Ron desolately.

“You ’are welcome.” Patting him on the shoulder, she returned to Harry.

“We will see each uzzer again, I ’ope,” she said. “I am ’oping to get a job at Gringotts.”

“Doing what?” said Hermione, not so much rude as curious.

“Curse-breaking. It will be easy, but maman wants me to go easy, for a while, now I am out of school.”

“Easy, is it?” said Bill, amused.

She sniffed. “ Oui. Ze curse breaking eez simple: you identify ze curse, and you find ze countercurse. E voila. At Beauxbatons, every student can do zis.”

He snorted.

“...And what eez it you find funny?”

“Well — not to be patronizing, but it’s a little different, in the real world.”

“Oh? And where is zat?”

“The Gringotts Bureau of Cursebreakers, for one,” he said easily, slipping his thumbs through his beltloops.

She scoffed.

“No? You don’t believe me?” He was smiling a little.

She scoffed again. “I believe zey ‘ired you. I do not know if zey should ‘ave; I do not know you. I only know ze kind of man who thinks cursebreaking eez difficult eez perhaps not ze man to lecture me about anyzing.”

“It’s not lec— sorry. Should’ve been clear,” said Bill calmly, holding up a hand. “I didn’t mean any offense. It’s just that some curses take months to even identify. And the thing is, they do atrophy—”

“Oh! And now ze man with ze ponytail eez going to explain curse erosion to me.”

Ron wheezed, and lurched into Harry, whose cheeks were ballooned with repressed sound.

“Curse erosion isn’t a simple concept,” explained Bill, with warm but dwindling patience. “There’s no shame in getting it wrong.”

“Getting eet wrong? You are saying I am stupid?”

“No. Obviously, I didn’t mean that—”

“Oh, obviously!” She brandished a finger at his nose. “Do not patronize me, tall Englishman! I will not be demeaned by a man ’oo does not even know ’ow to condition ’eez hair!”

Bill’s eyebrows took a long hike north.

“Alright,” he said. “Noted. My name’s Bill, by the way, though apparently I’ll answer to ‘Tall Englishman’ if asked.”

It was not exactly levity he felt, watching Bill get his arse handed to him by a petite Frenchwoman; but it was probably the closest thing to it he’d felt in a while.

A flashbulb detonated in the corner of his eye. He snarled and drew his wand on instinct, and had great plans to make use of the few remaining minutes of lawful use of magic before Colin Creevey threw up his hands and yelped: “Wait! Wait! Not real! Hang on! I’ve got a good reason!”

Dropping his camera, he brandished a tiny lanyard that hung around his neck. The badge read: Colin Creevey — Director of Photography, The Hogwarts Enquirer.

“Isn’t it great, Hermione? McGonagall suggested it! She said I could work for the school and do photography and make people happy, but to be a proper photographer I had to get permission with a special form so please,” he stuck out a roll of parchment, “sign here if you want your picture in the paper, it’s a really good paper, we’re doing a feature on the summer holidays, also it’s a really good picture, and you guys look really, really good! Hi, Harry,” he added, gasped for breath, and then leaned over on his knees. “Oh and also by the way. I have — to — say — sorry. Hold on. Gotta breathe.”

“Oh,” said Harry uncomfortably. “You don’t have to… really, we can forget it…”

“No, it wasn’t right,” said Colin passionately. He sounded more than a little like Hermione; Draco’s mouth curved. “They were lying about you and I helped them and it was mean and wrong and Harry I’m really sorry but I didn’t know any better and now I DO know better and I won’t ever ever do it again. And I’m going to tell everyone how great you are and they’ll believe me because I,” he said, brandishing his lanyard, “am a real journalist. Not like her.”

His disdain was also strongly familiar. Perhaps S.C.R.U.M.B.Y. meetings were good for something, after all.

“What’s the difference?” ventured Harry.

“Journalistic integgity!”

“Integrity,” said Hermione quietly, smiling. “In-teg-rity.”

“Yes! That!”

Ron snickered. “Alright, sold,” he said, and signed the form. “Make sure you get my good side, alright, Colin?”

“Yeah! I will! Awesome! Thanks, Ron!!”

Harry and Draco pointedly declined the waivers, but Hermione shrugged and jotted out her own signature. “It’s good advertising for S.C.R.U.M.B.Y.,” she said, and Colin, wheezing with excitement, fumbled around in his bag.

“Oh! Also! Reminds me! Gosh, nearly forgot.” He rooted in his bag and produced an empty mason jar, which he offered to Hermione. “This came back today, too. In case you wanted it or something maybe I don’t know. Dennis said uhhh why would she want it back, but I was like gosh Dennis maybe she doesn’t have a million it’s not like jars grow on trees or something.” He snorted.

This was greatly sardonic, by Colin’s standards; perhaps his third year would mark a rebellious streak. Draco pictured it, and felt a twinge of genuine delight.

“Oh — thanks,” she said hastily, and stuffed it into her satchel. Draco watched her.

They loitered all morning on the drizzly platform. The train whistled smoke, and the porters began herding children more purposefully. Harry wrapped himself around first Ron, then Hermione, and then shook Draco’s hand while holding his shoulder, a compromise between his preference and Draco’s.

“Come visit,” he said, a little desperately. “It’s a big house. There’s plenty of room.”

“Sold,” said Ron. “Be there tomorrow.”

“Ron!”

“What? They can give my bed to Ginny, she wants a weight room.”

Hermione gave Harry a bit of parchment. “You remember my address,” she said, “and if you need anything — or if you want to see that doctor I told you about—”

“I remember.”

“And if you think you might want to then it’s best to book early, if you can, because these things fill up—”

“I’ll think about it.”

“—you don’t have to go, just make the appointment, is what I’m saying. Ask Remus, he’ll know. And you’ll want to get your health records from the Dursleys—”

“Hermione.”

She hugged him.

“You’ll be alright?” she muttered.

“Oh, yeah.” Harry smiled, a little roguish, a little bleak. “Me? Always.”

As they boarded the train, a black dog came trotting under the turnstile and came to sit by Harry’s side, its tail wagging powerfully. Through the rain-streaked glass, Draco could see it nose its head into Harry’s hand, licking him comfortingly, while Harry waved at them and pretended to have some sort of irritant in his eyes.

“He’s gonna be alright, you reckon?” mused Ron. “Without us?”

“He won’t be for long,” said Hermione firmly. “I’m going to come visit him in a week. My parents want me to apply for a provisional driver’s license, anyway, the drives will be good practice.”

“Blimey. You’re gonna get a car?”

“Next year, if I don’t wreck. Dad promised to teach me this summer.”

“There have been weaker cases made for child abuse,” said Draco.

“It’s not half as bad as a broomstick.”

They filed down the hallways of the Express, which had never seemed narrower than they did then, as if the train had shrunk since their last outing on it. Ron found a compartment near the caboose, away from where his family was sitting — “I’m seeing them all summer, they won’t miss me another few hours” — and Draco took advantage of their missing fourth to kick his feet up on the seat, taking one bench all to himself.

The train coasted through a gloomy highland. Draco watched upside-down through the window as the spires of Hogwarts receded behind the treeline, faded to pinpricks against a gray sky, and vanished.

By and by, Ron leaned forward on his knees. “I wanted to talk about something,” he said quietly. “Just us three. I just wanted to… yeah. I dunno. Touch base? Get us together on what’s going to happen next year.”

Hermione looked at Draco, a furtive thing.

“I don’t think we can do anything now,” said Ron, “that’s not what I’m saying, but — I just wanted to say — we’re in this, yeah? With this stuff, and the Ministry, and Voldemort being back, all of it — it’s only going to get harder. But we’re still in this.”

“‘In this’?”

“What do you mean?”

“Harry. We’re in it with him. Because we’re all he’s got, you know?” he said roughly. “We kept him alive this year, we did, and it’s like it’s going to get easier to do. But he needs us to. So we’ve got to decide, out front, if we’re in it. You know. Open-eyed, clear-headed, while we've still got time to maneuver. I don't want us caught without our boots on."

"No," said Draco quietly. "Inexpedient."

"Right? Okay. Good. Don't answer now, if you don't want to, just think on it. And he doesn't ever need to hear about this, because I don't think he'd like it if he did, but I just want us to all understand — that if it comes to it, and it's… you know, if it's Death Eaters again, or something worse, and I don't like talking about this but we've got to because it already happened once — I just want you lot to know," he finished, thickly, swallowing, "that if it's him or me, you've got to — it's him. Okay?"

His voice was edged in panic. Draco wasn't sure what the panic was for: himself, or Harry.

"But I — I can't promise that," said Hermione. "I couldn't possibly promise that, Ron, I—"

"No, no! Don't, like, leave me to die or anything," he exclaimed, "Merlin, Mione—"

"Well what was I supposed to think you meant, honestly, you dramatic ponce, with your 'him or me'—"

"You might get creative about it first, all I'm saying— no. No! I meant, like. You can let me get hurt," he said, parceling his words carefully, "if it's for him. Alright? I… I'm the one who takes the hit. It's me. I'll live. Or I'll try to. But I'm saying, like, you can — you're authorized to make that decision. On your end. If you think you need to. Don't worry about me."

Draco stared at him. He felt as though he'd never met him before, this solemn, unflagging Ron, with a square jaw and a fire in his eyes, burning like the cornflower blue of Hermione's flames.

"Alright?" he said earnestly.

“Ron,” said Hermione intently. She reached out and touched the side of Ron’s face; he leaned into it like he needed it sorely. “You’re aware that he won’t let you, right?”

“What, Draco?” He jerked his head at Draco, half-smiling. “Nah. If the only thing between me and a jinx is Draco Malfoy’s sentimental feelings, I can kiss myself goodbye, mate.”

That stung. “Excuse me. I wouldn’t let you perish, thank you.”

“Don’t apologize, it’s what I like about you,” said Ron, surprising him. “One thing about you, it’s that you can get it done. You’re like a rook, you know? Shoot straight, kill ’em in the endgame.”

He didn’t know what to say to that, so he settled on a mild, vaguely approving: “Hm.”

“No, I don’t mean Draco,” she said firmly. “If something hurts you, it’ll have to go through Harry.” Then, pointedly: “And me, by the way.”

Ron smiled. “Yeah,” he said, turning to face the window. Gabrielle’s card glittered in his breast pocket like a badge of silver. “I know.”

Outside, green hills braided into thick wooded glens. Hermione ordered tea and did their summer Transfiguration reading. Ulysses and Thucydides were dozing with their heads tucked under their wings, and Crookshanks curled in the space between Hermione and Ron like a ginger pincushion. Rain laved on the sides of the carriage over the chitter of the wheels.

He woke to a tapping at the door.

He swiped sleep from his eye and sat up quickly, embarrassed. It was his first dreamless sleep in weeks.

Hermione was watching him from the other corner of the carriage, her expression clouded and soft. His cheeks felt warm.

He pulled a face at her, and she rolled her eyes away.

Fred stuck his head into the compartment. “There you are, Ron,” he said. “Family meeting in Car Thirteen. Be there or get disinherited.”

“Disinherited from what?” complained Ron, “I’m not getting so much as a knut,” but he grumbled to his feet. “You lot wait for me, yeah?”

“No, in fact, I thought I’d disembark at Peterborough.”

“Prat.” He flicked a Chocolate Frog card at Draco; Draco caught it and sent four ounces of Ulick Gamp hurtling back at his face. To his surprise, Ron caught it, too, though in the process crumpled poor Ulick past the point of identification. Practice with Harry might’ve done something for him, after all.

“Chop, chop, Ronnikins, Mummy’s waiting! We’ve im-por-tant family business.” Fred’s tone was jovial, but his posture wasn’t. There was a very clear difference between the twins in a good humor and the twins in any other, mostly because the latter occurred so rarely; in the second before Ron closed the door, Draco was treated to a rare glimpse of Fred Weasley’s serious face, and he didn’t like it one bit.

“What’s that about, do you think?” said Hermione, as their footsteps faded from the hallway.

“I imagine it’s a continuation of whatever conversation Molly Weasley was having with Dumbledore.” He sat upright, smoothing some wrinkles from his shirt, and wished for a Steaming Charm. “Or she’s seen Ronald’s grades, and they’re staging an intervention.”

“More likely Fred’s,” she said absently. “No. I expect they’re going to take precautions to guard the Burrow.”

“Speaking of which. Your parents—”

“Aren’t going to let me live anywhere else,” she said shortly. “It’s bad enough, boarding school, without me leaving home entirely.”

He considered this, and acknowledged it.

“It’s not safe.”

“It’s one muggle house in a million. There’s next to no chance.”

“I don’t like what ‘next to’ is doing in that sentence.”

“I don’t, either,” she said, “but they’re not going into hiding.”

“Are you going to tell them?”

Hermione took her lip between her teeth and worried it without answering.

“You ought to.”

“If I tell them, they might not let me come back,” she said, and that was such an awful shock he wondered if it wouldn’t be easier just to kidnap her altogether.

“Let you, nothing,” he said, with bravado that even he could hear was thin. “You could argue a fault line back together.”

“I’m serious. My mum has been looking at other boarding places, muggle schools—”

“You can’t leave,” he said shortly, sitting up straight. “That’s not acceptable.”

“I know that, but—”

“If they try to keep you, you’ll write to me.”

Her brows furrowed. “And you’ll do what, exactly?”

“Come and get you.”

“...To go where?”

“Anywhere. To the Manor. Or to wherever you’d like. Put you up in a hotel, if you’d like one. Else we’d find you a flat or something. Mother’s been meaning to break into London real estate.”

She was looking at him from the corner of her eye, almost warily. “That’s a ridiculous expense.”

“What you and I take for an ‘expense’ are two different planets in two different solar systems.”

“And you wouldn’t really want me at the Manor,” she added, frowning. “Not with your mother there.”

“It’s not my mother’s house. It’s mine. I’m Lord Malfoy, and I’ll have whatever guests I like.”

And then, to temper the note of whinging, he added: “And I’m sick of shipping you books. I’m not a rental service, you ought to just come and raid the bloody library for yourself.”

Hermione was looking at him so intensely that he feared he would soon sport holes from it.

“Is that a real invitation?”

“Of course it is.” He hadn’t thought of it, actually, to start — it had been more of a hazy plan of don’t let your life get ruined, forever, again — but now he thought of it, it was an exceptional idea. Part of the bother of a summer was having to wait two to three days every time he wanted to hear from her, and if she was in a room down the hall, she’d be there to irritate him whenever he liked.

An on-demand Granger. Coming down in the mornings with the wet hair and the sleepy eyes, in bathrobes or dressing gowns, complaining about his opinions on Runes. Or wearing those muggle things, the small shirts and the trousers that suggested some sort of great muggle fabric shortage, just lounging around in the library with tea and chocolates, pink and imperious and incidentally very difficult for anyone to hex. “You could come straight from King’s Cross, if you liked.”

“Draco!”

“What?”

“Are you joking?”

“I’m not.”

She was in disbelief.

“If you’re serious,” she said, “then I’d love to come, of course. I’ll talk to my parents about it. When I could go.”

She was gauging his seriousness. He shrugged. “Go on, then. Or don’t. The warding on the Manor is excellent, they wouldn’t find you.”

“I’m not running away from home.”

“Yet.”

“At all.”

“Foreseeably.”

The wooded planes of England streaked through the window in a smear of emerald watercolor, dotted with the last flush of spring flowers. A service road passed along the train tracks, and cars scuttled alongside it, racing the train.

“How did you figure it out?” he said idly, watching one pull ahead and plow its headlights into the gloom.

“Hm?”

“About Skeeter.”

She startled. “What? I didn’t.”

“Granger.”

“I really don’t know what you’re talking about. Who?”

He inclined his head at her.

“From Colin,” she admitted. “After he went to the Hospital Wing, I cornered him, and I … I applied a bit of pressure, let’s say. About how you’d stuck your neck out for him, even after he wrote all that, and how kind that was, and how he really owed it to us — I might’ve laid it on a bit thick—”

“You? Never.”

“Anyway,” she said pointedly, “he told me he always met her near the window of the Clock Tower, so I made him ask her for a meeting. Then I took the Invisibility Cloak and snuck out, waited in the cloisters with him, and I saw her.”

“Transforming.”

“Yes. After that, it was rather simple.”

“To seize a grown witch as your prisoner.”

“I prefer,” said the madwoman, “the term ‘citizen’s arrest.’ There was another bit to the story, too, after all; it turns out that Colin took a photograph of Cassius Warrington and Flora Carrow doing — something unmentionable — in one of the dungeon enclaves, so Cassius sent Flint and Goyle after him to make a point. Well, obviously Colin was horrified, so I suggested he should talk to McGonagall about less dangerous creative outlets, and apparently he found one.”

“Lovely. He’s credentialed. I’m still hung up on the part where you kept a human being hostage in a jam jar.”

“She wouldn't have ended up in a jam jar in the first place if she hadn’t broken the law.”

“We’ve broken laws.”

“Not the good ones,” she said stiffly, and he laughed, sort of helplessly, because he couldn’t think of anything to say to that.

She was mad, properly, and madly brilliant, and simply ruthless in just the best kind of ridiculous ways, which was a problem, because thinking about any of those things made him want to kiss her. But it was hard not to think about them, when she was right there, being herself without a clue what she was even doing, because it had never occurred to her that people didn’t usually go around kidnapping journalists and leveraging solitary confinement. It was even harder not to kiss her, but he couldn’t do that, not without risking a fracture in something very delicate and valuable and necessary for his survival, so he stuck to thinking about it instead.

Another problem: he had to work through this chain of thought all over again every time the impulse struck, and it was distracting. Hermione was staring.

“Are you alright?”

“No,” he informed the carriage ceiling. “Not remotely, and with no plans to be in the foreseeable future. Yourself?”

She drew her knees up onto the seat and folded them neatly under her. “Me either,” she said quietly. “I’m worried.”

“About…”

She rolled her hand: The obvious.

He had the bizarre sensation of wanting to tell her it would be alright, although it wouldn’t.

The train chimed. A porter announced that they were approaching King's Cross. Hermione stood up, and Crookshanks, with a tiny yowl, launched onto Draco's side of the compartment, scrabbling over his legs.

"I think we should talk about it," she said. "Since we might not get the chance. About your family, and — the situation."

"Did you, now."

"I mean, it could be important. Because whatever happens—"

"'Whatever' is an expansive category."

She took a bracing breath. "I know that your father—"

"Isn't going to join the Dark Lord's forces from the grave. Even he's not quite so loyal as that."

"Yes, but your mother—"

"Won't." His voice was flat.

"If she does," Hermione said, intently, "you should know that it doesn't have to change anything. You can come stay with me—"

He could have laughed, but it would have sounded hysterical. "It wouldn't change anything?"

"No! That's my point, it wouldn't have to! She was desperate. "You're not your mother. You could be — I mean, you're different. If you needed somewhere to go—"

"You'll stick me in your basement?"

"You're not alone," she snapped. Her mouth was flat as a spearline and her face was all set and shining with the come-take-me-with-an-army sort of determination and it was awful, it was actually, acutely painful, to think of it ever being directed against a figure in a white mask, and if she had any compassion for him she would stop.

“You’re not. Not while I’m here. I wouldn’t let you be.”

He stood up, and she followed him.

“Draco—”

“You really have no idea what you’re dealing with.”

“Don’t patronize me,” she said, sharp without being unkind. “I know what they are. I saw everything you did, in that maze, and I’m just saying—”

“I’m not the one they’ll be after.”

“That doesn’t make you safe! No one’s safe, you know that! But you aren’t alone, and you don’t— you don’t need them to protect you, there are lots of people — not just me — you wouldn’t be safe, but if nobody’s safe, then you might as well be with people, who — care about you. Because they do. So — so very much, Draco.”

She stumbled on the dismount, like she couldn’t quite say it. It was very earnest; it was almost pleading.

It struck him, with a disarming blaze of pain, that she wasn’t afraid they were going to hurt him. She was afraid of something worse.

He turned around and stepped into her space. His mind was empty, and there was a white high-pitched noise somewhere between his ears, a shriek of something between panic and anger.

“Do you think they’d take me?” he asked her, and relished her glimmer of guilt, fleeting as it was. He pressed. He was being mean, and he didn’t care, not in the slightest. “Actually, don’t answer that, it doesn’t matter. You think I’d try?”

“I think you’d do anything to protect your family.”

The pain of that otherwise blindingly unanswerable remark was dulled by her adding, “It’s not a bad thing. I’m just making a point, is all. That you don’t have to do — something you can’t take back.”

“Something I can’t take back?”

“You know what I mean. I’m not trying to be cruel, I know you wouldn’t want to, but—”

“Wouldn’t want to?”

“But you might feel — if you didn’t think that you had a choice, I mean—”

“Have you been worrying about this?” The white noise was piercing. “You’ve been lying there at night, wondering whether I’m going to run off and become a terrorist?”

“Oh, stop pretending to be offended,” she snapped. “I haven’t said a thing judging you, I’ve been nothing but understanding, I haven’t asked a single question about your mother’s plans even though frankly it’d be highly relevant for my own safety to know, and I’m only trying to give you information about your options so you don’t do something irreparably stupid.”

“Truly inconceivable how anyone could take offense at that, isn’t it.”

“Don’t be dense! Look at it my way! What am I supposed to think?”

“What are you supposed to think?”

“What am I supposed to think! You’re my friend, and I love you, but I can’t stand here and lie and say I don’t think you’ve ever thought about it, and I can’t pretend it doesn’t mat—”

He stepped forward and wrapped his hand around the back of her neck, forcing her head back up, to look at him. She went all still, strings lashed, volume cut.

He was struggling not to shout. It wasn't quite working.

"You monumental idiot," he said. Which wasn't what he meant to say, but fuck it, he'd work with what he had. "They wouldn't take me, you realize, even if I tried."

There was a pause.

"Is that supposed to be comforting?" she said scornfully. "You can't be a Death Eater because you aren't up to scratch?"

"Because they'd kill me."

She flinched.

"Do you want to know what would happen? Do you know what I see, Granger, when I think about joining up? The moment I offered up my wand, the Dark Lord would put me on my knees and crack open my skull, to make sure I wasn't a deserter or double-agent, and he'd find you, and I'd be dead in seconds if he was merciful."

She was staring at him, sort of dazed and pallid.

"What about — me?" she said, stilted.

"You. Any of you. All of you. This conversation, any conversation, me touching you, me ever touching you, any of it would be enough. And I've known that. That's the really stupid thing, you know, I've known for years that you'd be — that you'd keep me from that, if I let you. And I let you. I keep letting you."

She twitched. He cast around for something to say, abruptly frightened of what would happen when he started thinking clearly again.

"And maybe I — maybe that's what I wanted. To let you. Because I'm a coward. I'm a coward, and I knew on some level that if I kept going, I'd never have to think about doing what my father did. I'd never be that, I'd never have to do what he did. I'd foreclose that future. And my life would be over — I mean actually fucking over, dead, done, gone, nothing — but I wouldn't have to do it. And I was right.

"So here I am. Until you or Potter or Dumbledore don't want me, I suppose, in which case I'll just go die or something. I don't know. It's up to you. This is your fault, really, if you think about it. You shouldn't have kept me. It would have been easier for both of us if you didn't."

She flinched at that, but he was distracted by the enormous and nauseating swell of regret at permitting himself to open his mouth. He had done it, him and his heinous stupidity, he had stood there and told her.

She ought to have been repelled by that. The nakedness of it. He was, a little.

Instead — because she was mad, he always forgot that, he should have remembered — she said, "Good."

"What?"

"Don't be stupid," she said, simply, almost irritably. "It's good. You're a good person, and I'm sorry that's made your life hard, but unfortunately, I don't really care. I like you as you are, and I — you have to know that I'm never going to turn away from you, never, right? Forget that dramatic nonsense about 'until you don't want me,' that isn't — that's stupid, utterly ridiculous. I won't. Not ever. So if you're worried about changing, just don't go." She paused, and when she spoke again, her voice was unsteady. "Just ple— just stay. I can do the rest. If you just stay."

On impulse, she grabbed his hand and held it tightly, like she was asking for something.

It was ridiculous, but he had the oddest temptation to cry.

Relief was a monstrous thing. It was a dangerous narcotic, the effervescent swell of relief, the fireworks of endorphins and adrenaline and a dizzy lightheadedness that reminded him of flying. Worse than grief, far worse than pain. Almost as bad as hope.

“Alright.”

“Yes? Alright?” She smiled wanly, teasing. “That’s it? The cause, the war, you’re sold?”

“No,” he said. “But you asked.”

She laughed wetly, and shuffled into his chest, not so much asking for a hug as insisting on one.

It had become instinctive to draw her in, one hand still braced on her head, the other wrapped around her waist, and hold her.

The problem wasn’t that he had never hugged her before. He’d suffered enough of Hermione’s embraces to write essays on the subject, and spent more of his life than he’d ever volunteer picking long brown hairs off his dress shirts, usually accompanied by full-throated threats to go after the culprit herself with a lint roller.

The problem was that she was older than she’d been for most of those times, and a lot softer in a lot of places, and her hands were fisted in his shirt in ways that dragged her nails across his skin, and there was an unfair temptation to take it personally, somehow, when an extraordinarily pretty girl pressed up against him like she was trying to perform meiosis. And breathing on his neck with short, nervous little flushes of hot air, like she didn’t think he could feel her doing that, like he could possibly fucking ignore it, when half of his spine was on fire and part of his brain was marking out portions of his dignity to auction off for a chance to feel more of it.

He commanded it, though. He wasn’t helpless. There were some things he could have, and some things he could — but shouldn’t — and the things he had were enough. There were some parts of Hermione Granger that he had, and no one else did, and those parts were enough.

What he wanted, in the privacy of his own heart, was no one's business but his own.

Brakes whistled. The train was slowing, and London's dull lights were pressing through the inkstain of smog under clouds, and the wave of momentum canted them to the side. Hermione huffed in reproach and then she lifted her head and her face was right there and— fuck.

If she didn't move, he was going to kiss her. So much for he wasn't helpless, fucking hell.

But she did move, thank Merlin: she lowered herself back down onto her heels, revealing that she had been on her toes for some of the time, for some reason, maybe to have better access to that bit of his collarbone she liked to put her head on. He didn't know. He didn't know virtually anything except relief and the horrible, despairing sensation of his body digging his heels in and wanting something, wanting with every organ, which was an incredible amount of wanting to refuse. For a man whose self-restraint had never been his strong suit, or even a suit of any kind at all.

"Happy birthday," she said. It would occur to him at some point tomorrow morning, when he gathered the last of his wits, that this was a slightly irrelevant thing to say, and had been delivered without her usual sort of cheerful conviction. He was cognitively so far from this point that he accepted it without question.

"Don't get cross," she ordered. And he was about to inquire what on earth he had to be cross about when she kissed him on the cheek.

Which was the worst of both worlds, if anything, because now he had to sort out what to do with the knowledge of what her mouth on his skin felt like for the rest of his life. It ought to have been a war crime, doing something like that. He should have been able to sue her for the sleep he was going to lose thinking about it.

“Granger,” he said, strangled.

“You’re such a prude,” she laughed, and stepped away to fetch her trunk from the rack. “I’m sorry. I didn’t mean to take liberties — Daphne did say it would fluster you, but I thought she’d exaggerated.”

Daphne Greengrass was a dead woman.

“Have a good laugh about it together, did you?” he said acidly.

“No,” she said, swinging her trunk down, “I just — actually, never mind.”

“What?”

“It isn’t important.”

Which was insulting on several levels, and obviously false on all.

The train chuffed to a halt. Doors rattled up and down the hallway. Through the steam fleeing past the window, the faces of waiting families swam into view. High-pitched cries of welcome and relief carried through the glass.

Hermione opened the door of the carriage, and turned back. “Well? Aren’t you coming?” she said, tilting her head, intractably bossy and unable to help it, and it occurred to him that it didn’t really matter that she only meant to the platform. She could stand on the edge of a cliff and say aren’t you coming? and it would be, alright, Granger, tell us the plan, because she was a fool but he was an idiot, and it was better to fall together than stand alone.

“After you,” he said. And then he followed her.

Holy shit. Well. Can't believe we're here, to be honest.

I'm going on hiatus while I finish writing book five. I don't know how long it will take — I wish I did, but unfortunately, since I'm going back to work in the fall, it might take longer than I'm planning. If I have updates on the schedule, I'll post them on my tumblr. Otherwise, thank you, thank you, thank you, and thank you again for good measure. If you're reading these words, then it's already a compliment beyond my words to express.

It's strangely fitting that this chapter marks the nearly one-year anniversary of starting this fic. In ten days, it will have been one whole year since I posted "The Last Malfoy," which is a kind of serendipity I couldn't plan if I tried. I am in such a wildly different place in my life that it's almost funny to look back over the chapters and remember what I was doing when I wrote them, all those months ago, in a different state. I'm moving to England in a month! And I'm starting school again! It's going to be so much fun! And I'm so excited for what comes next, both with this fic and in my real life. I couldn't say that a year ago. My luck is immeasurable and my gratitude is double its size.

Thank you so, so much to anyone still reading. You have my love and my best wishes, and all the luck I can send you.

Sincerely,

GT

Summer's End

Chapter 57: Summer's End

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

[img: https://i.postimg.cc/qMq98vqc/Book-5-1.png]

I can remember standing by the wall

And the guns shot above our heads

And we kissed, as though nothing could fall

—David Bowie, “Heroes”

The sun laid in patchwork on the Manor’s striped lawns, creating a chessboard of emerald and gold. The sky bubbled with champagne clouds, beyond which a spill of burgundy waited in the west. Pale peacocks came and went cooing among the trees like ghost brides, trailing their ever-fixed trains of vestal white, and in the cradle of the gardens, where a long ribbon of sand cut into the grasses by the lake, Draco practiced.

Heat had driven him out of his jacket, and the billows of pale Egyptian cotton around his elbows twisted like dove’s wings. Sweat veined white hair with lines of straw, the long coil of it descending from its coif to hang ragged in his face, and the nascent lines of fresh muscle laid faint shadows on the surface of his back. With each lash of his arm, a black garnet on his finger caught and held the fleeing sun.

He rolled his weight onto his left foot and executed a ducking feint that had taken him the better part of a month to learn — a month subsequent to the one he’d spent learning where to put his feet so a sharp duelist couldn’t knock him squalling on his back in the first movement, and where to hold his useless offhand arm so that said duelist couldn’t hack it off in the second. These and other lessons were hard-won with time: how to flatten himself on the piste and somehow run sideways, as if that was a thing human legs were suited to gracefully do; how to diffuse a curse at speed; how to take a curse, if you knew you had to, and where to land it for least harm. On the few occasions that a human opponent condescended to spar with him he was rewarded with a new list of things he had failed at, and he knew it was a good day if it was a substantially different list than the last.

Other days, when the human opponent made herself scarce, he trained by himself, with only the peacocks for company. Each night he fell asleep before he could dress the blisters on his feet or the sunburns on his face, and he woke to a tinkling bell in his ear, a tray of eggs and coffee placed unobtrusively on his futon, and the retreating steps of their housemaid.

The last week of August came swimming out of these days like a brute awakening. The heat reached a peak and broke in a stream of sweaty, sleepless nights, in which green lights danced behind his eyelids, and he came to with shouts that brought lights stirring in opposite wings of the castle. He had stopped using Dreamless Sleep in July, when he realized how difficult it was becoming to sleep without it, and besides which it unnerved him to slip into the perfect oblivion it brought: no dreams, no thoughts, just a slow descent into nothing. Taken when wide awake, it felt dizzying and eerie, like something far more permanent than sleep.

A flutter graced the lawns in his periphery. A woman came striding out of the shade, her black skirts a fantail around her waist, her heels silent on the soft earth. A black summer robe of embroidered gossamer foamed behind her like a train of smoke.

He planted the tip of the dueling wand on the ground and inclined his head, resting his weight on one foot.

“Well done, my darling,” she called. “Your name shall live in infamy among the bulrushes.”

“Good evening, Mother.”

“It must be quite pleasant to spar with an opponent made of air and bullrushes.” She reached out and kissed his sweat-filmed cheek, smiling a wide guileless smile that put stars in her eyes, like he had done the very finest thing imaginable just now. It was pleasant; he preened. “Though it must be tedious to win every bout.”

“I would do better with Briselda, but certain authorities forbade me to engage the staff.”

“The help have responsibilities more important than serving as your whipping post. Besides which, I do worry that embarking on a train of abuse would alter the edibility of our food.”

“Dueling wands don’t leave injuries.”

“Mm.” She hummed noncommittally and cast around through the bullrushes. “Where’s the other one?”

He located the second dueling wand where it was buried in the sand, flipped it up with the toe of his boot, and caught it. He offered it to her, smirking.

“Formal challenge, Mother?”

She gave the instrument a flick. It came to life, spitting sparks.

Then she smiled at him again, the same guileless beam, and gestured widely. “Why don’t you call? It’s your practice, after all.”

He took several paces back and parted his feet, sideways, aligning the tip of the wand with his eyes. He shifted the grip to the western underhand. The dueling wand was slightly longer and heavier than the real thing; it was meant for older wizards. “To the wizard’s disarm?”

“Mm. I never did know what that meant,” she said idly, whisking the dueling wand back and forth, as if feeling for the weight. “What is a ‘wizard’s disarm’? It’s getting the wand out of your hand, isn’t it? In my day, the duels were always to the blood, or to the ground, rather. It was simpler.”

“Which carries all sorts of implications for why so few duelists of that generation remained to pass on their traditions, but for immediate purposes, I’d rather not shed any of your blood today, or ever, if I can help it.”

“I certainly share your preference, if not your concern.”

He swung the wand around in a loose circle, rolling out his wrist. “Are you saying I’m going to lose?”

“I would never bet against you,” she said mildly. “It is a lucky mother who lives to see herself surpassed by her children.”

He smirked at her. The corner of her mouth echoed the expression.

“Do you feel lucky, Mother?”

“Not today,” she laughed, and twisted sideways, her hand arched in a long overhand grip.

“Clavicle to navel. Wands only. C—”

The first curse nearly caught him in the stomach. It took him several seconds to realize that his mother had moved. While he came to that painfully slow realization, she moved again. It was three awfully fast-moving seconds before he came to the important judgment, however, which was that her speed was only the third or fourth thing that he needed to worry about.

She fought like rivers moved, seamlessly, inexorably, without any sort of hesitation or pause for thought. The economy of movement was faultless. By the time he had hauled his wand into place to target her, her parry — a lateral cut that sawed down his own wand's red sparks with a blade of gold — could have eked as much applause from a ballerina as it would a soldier. Her advance was a movement so fluid that her feet seemed magnetically attached to the duelist's line.

He blocked the first curse, and in his surprise at having succeeded, forgot the second. Gold soared in a whirling braid for his face, piercing the sloppy uppercut of his dueling wand; the sparks clipped his shoulder and sent a hard pulse through his chest, like a tuning fork had whacked his spine. By training or miracle he kept hold of the dueling wand and sprang into what was an equally perfect lunge, darting a spell under the overhand guard — whose main defect, per the duelists' manuals, was the holes it opened in one's defense — and a radial sweep of her wrist snapped her point around to catch it, crackling, on the tip of her weapon. The opposite motion whipped it back at him. His riposte was the kind of thing that an auror might describe to get a laugh at a party.

Of the few opponents he'd ever raised his wand against, his mother was by far the least pleasant. Fighting Marcus Flint was at heart a question of two very simple tasks: remaining upright and not fucking up colossally. With his mother, in contrast, not fucking up colossally was a prerequisite to remaining upright at all, after which began the real task of exploiting holes in a guard that didn't have holes to begin with.

If he had his real wand, he would have thrown a Shield Charm and sprinted for the hills at the first suggestion he was fighting someone of her level. But he held a mechanical instrument designed to help train aurors to duel without Shields, so instead, he had to duck and jump and backpedal like he had some sort of palsy. At some points his mother returned to her starting position and fired jinxes at him in volley, dancing him up and down the piste for seemingly no tactical value but her pleasure.

The heat sapped energy from his limbs. He tasted metal in his throat from exertion and his hair hung in his eyes. His mother smoothed out her skirt, idly, like she was fixing an unflattering fold.

“You’re toying with me.”

“I’d say you’re allowing yourself to be toyed with,” she said archly, pinching a bit of soot from the wand tip. Then she advanced again, and he slipped back into the fugue of parry and counterstroke, giving step after step on the piste until his heel staggered back and met grass.

He was hot and achy and sick of losing, and so it wasn’t altogether sporting, what he did next.

He advanced three rapid steps up the piste, swept his wand up the line of a chest strike. Her wand shifted unerringly into place for the most textbook parry of all time.

Which was when he took a hard sidestep off the duelist’s line, snapped his arm out, and whipped a curse sideways into her uncovered flank.

The parry missed — he was thrilled — but the curse never landed. When red sparks came scissoring at her left, his mother neatly folded herself sideways, pivoting her back foot around as if the piste itself had rotated ninety degrees, and her wand came arcing around to slice up the side of his guard — the wrong side for a parry — and with a sickening jolt he realized why duelists stayed on the piste in the first place. To parry from this position would require him to either Apparate or spontaneously manifest a new joint in his elbow, neither of which he could do, and so he opted instead for a clumsy lunge out of the curse’s path, planting his other foot soundly off the piste. The momentum threw him sideways and as he fought for footing she stepped into his guard, where he was so busy keeping his wand somewhere vaguely near proper position that he missed her left offhand coming around to smack him in the head.

He stumbled back with a yowl of indignation, more from shame than hurt.

Narcissa stepped back — with nothing more telling than a slow breath to signal her exertion — and put down her wand, smiling a wide and complacent grin. It was his grin, he realized, with a start. That was his smirk, the curl of his lip. No wonder it got a rise out of people; it was properly infuriating.

“You’re slow,” she said.

“You’re fast.”

“It’s not altogether your fault. Your clothes are too heavy.” She reached out and plucked at his collar. He grumbled and swatted her hands away. “You’re not Robespierre, darling, you can’t fight in a dress shirt.”

“You’re wearing a dress. And robes.”

“Which I certainly would not, if it gave me as much trouble as it does you, dear.”

He scoffed.

Bells crooned sweetly from the house. Five o’clock.

“I should change,” he said abruptly.

“Oh, yes,” she said, and there was a subtle closing-off in her: nothing so indiscreet as a change in expression, but a retraction of energy, a subtle drift in tone, as if her mind had been called away on urgent business. “I recall. You’re hosting.”

“If you’d like to voice an objection—”

“Why would I object?” And still there was that airiness, frustrating as anything, as she floated over the subject and out of the conversation, her skirts sailing over the lawn. “On what grounds? It is your house. As you remind me.”

It had been a bad row. He wished he hadn't said it, but that didn't make it untrue, and it didn't make her position any more reasonable.

"It's only a few days."

"I know how long a week is, Draco." Her voice floated over her retreating shoulder. He caught up with her. The summer had been kind to him, and given him height enough to close the distance without difficulty.

They reached the veranda and moved through bay doors into an airy sitting-room, past an ornamental piano that sprang to life with a tinkling Chopin when they passed by, and several portraits that burst into furtive whispering at their appearance. The hearth erupted in flames and then died down again when they left the room.

A hall of marble statues craned their necks to peer curiously as they stalked past.

"I've given you ample notice—"

"You mean you've given me time to make myself scarce."

"If you want to. This situation is only a problem because you think it is."

"The problem is not what I think," she said, with the first hint of tartness, and wheeled a corner. Several autonomous dustpans scampered out of the way, and a row of curtains snapped back, pouring sunlight into the freshly lit corridor. "I did not engineer society to my whim. I did not lay out the world's many orders according to personal preference. I am not the reason Miss Granger experiences certain political inconveniences, and I increasingly resent being treated as such by you."

"Attempted murder is a bit more than an 'inconvenience,' no?" His tone was thin. "Wouldn't you say?"

“Not for some of us,” she muttered, and swept up the staircase. A carpet unfurled at her feet, hastily beating out clouds of dust.

“And that’s another thing, thank you. Why won’t you tell me—”

“Not now.”

“—where you went last week? You promised you would, and you never did. I understand you have secrets—”

“Draco.”

“—you can’t say it all, but a man has a right to know where his mother’s disappearing off to, especially when she comes back—”

“You’re retaliating.”

“—with blood on her clothes — did you expect me not to notice? Do you think I’m entirely dull?”

She turned around at the entrance to the master suite, which unfolded its oaken doors at her approach.

“Draco, when I inform you that something is unsuitable for you to know, it is not a remark on your intelligence, but a solicitation of your trust. It means there is no conceivable way in which having that information could make you safer.”

“Which might be easier to believe if you explained why it’s dangerous. Or don’t you trust me, either?”

Her lips thinned. A shutter slammed somewhere in the room behind her.

“If you would like to be trusted, then I advise you conduct yourself more— did you do that?”

“The window? Didn’t you?”

“Never mind. We can discuss this at leisure,” she said, “after you have received your guest. In the meantime, I must dress for company.”

“Oh, please—”

The doors closed over her retreating silhouette.

“Well done,” he snapped. “Now who’s retaliating?”

This was not exactly a decisive blow, and its whinging delivery failed to elevate the material. The doors, being doors, took it on the chin.

He arrived in his chambers in bad humor, and punted his shirt somewhere vaguely in the direction of the laundry bin. The wardrobe unfolded its wares in anticipation of his arrival, unveiling a balustrade of freshly laundered shirts in all shades of white from bone to beige, black sport coats embroidered with gold, tunics of leather striped with purple velvet, and a caravanserai of jewel-tone robes cut wide at the shoulders, because his father had been a broad man.

It was a decision of convenience, not sentiment. He’d grown that summer, and he hadn’t been in the mood to shop. And they were his clothes, anyway, from a legal point of view.

He stripped down another dress shirt and, with some consideration, a black waistcoat with shiny little onyx beads for buttons. It drew taut around his lower back, the fabric supple, and cut a stark V across his chest. The white shirt plumed like a sort of crest over his shoulders, a touch broad but no matter, it made for a dramatic silhouette — he hadn’t figured out the thing to do about his hair, which had grown too long for gelling and liked to loiter in the neighborhood of his eyes, vaguely disheveled, but not yet long enough to bind with ribbon or ties. Ordinarily the thing would be to cut it, but his mother’s hairwitch in Diagon Alley had lost her license under the new regulations, and the last time he’d let Dobby at it, he’d worn hats for six months.

A rake of his fingers made it flop over in a plausibly intentional sort of way. It would do.

He arrived at the gates in the fashionably late vicinity of five thirty, and found to no particular amount of surprise that there was a carriage idling in the drive, drawn by a quartet of thestrals, shaking their reptilian wings out in somber repose. And disembarking from the carriage, sweeping her eyes around the vista as if she harbored devious cartographical impulses, was a girl — a sharp, neatly dressed, lovely girl, with hair the size of Saturn, and eyes somewhere thereabouts, dark and warm and full of cleverness and gold, her tongue a pink slip held thoughtfully between her teeth. She wore a short-sleeved blouse of dusty pink linen and a pair of sensible brown boots, suitable for walking.

The wind blew her hair in her face. Hermione drew it back, a bit like a veil; and then saw him, and she smiled with her whole face, thirty-two teeth and two cheeks and a wrinkled-up nose.

He had been concerned about this.

Anxiety was an ordinary element of anticipation in seeing one's friends after some time apart. Anxiety was why the road from the Manor steps to the gates had never quite seemed so short, nor the hours of the day preceding so swift, as they did knowing what laid at the end of them. This wasn't anxiety. What happened was some rebellious and desperately fond part of his head made a violent leap for freedom, and several aurors of his better judgment had to be dispatched to cudgel it.

The distraction meant he almost missed what she said.

"You're alive," she remarked, in the same way one might say, Mild evening.

He had been prepared for a dozen opening volleys, including the dangling threads of at least four arguments left hanging in their letters. This had not been one of them.

“Pardon?”

“Oh, you suggested— I don’t suppose you remember— in your letter, your invitation, you said I ought to make good time, or you might manifest an aneurysm from boredom.” She tucked her hair around her ear. “But you haven’t.”

“Right. Sorry to disappoint.”

“I’ll recover.” She was still touching her hair, twisting it. “Your hair’s longer.”

“My hairwitch is out of service.”

“On strike?” Her mouth curved.

“Why, yes. Didn’t you hear? Yours started a union.”

The curve split into a wide, sunny crescent. She laughed, and then said, hesitantly: “I missed you.”

He inclined his head at her. He opened his hand and extended it, palm-out, and she took it hesitantly. A sharp tug brought her stumbling through the gates, and against him, where she was wrapped, yelping, in the sort of embrace one might expect from a perfectly well-adjusted friend with nothing to hide.

She wriggled around and got in control of the situation, making her arms free, and then hauled him in for a proper bone-cracker of a hug. Just so. He put his head against hers and the scent of her hair was there, the same as it always was, flowers and citrus. The world was warm and sweet and soft.

Probably a little while after he should have, he disengaged and put his hands in his pockets. She put her hand over her eyes to inspect the house behind them, which from outside the gate was invisible; it was some bespoke variation of a Notice-Me-Not, layered so thickly and for so long that he would be surprised if it hadn't warped into something else altogether.

"You live here?"

"No, there's a shed out back we kip in. Ow— yes, Granger, we live here. Welcome to Malfoy Manor."

She gave him a serious glance, snorted, and began hauling her trunk up the drive. He liberated her of it, because manners, but his pace obligated her to trot to keep up, because turnabout.

"Cozy, isn't it?"

"A nice starter home, one thinks," she deadpanned.

He didn't know what a starter home was, but context made it sound suspiciously middle-class, so he ignored it. He pointed at the facade. "My suite is right up there in the east wing. Of course, the master's is on the other side, that's for the head of house. My mother uses those rooms herself, and probably will even after I'm of age. Mine are quite comfortable enough, for the time being."

"What do you mean, your 'suite'?"

"My rooms. What? Don't look like that. There's only three or four of them, it isn't obscene."

"What on earth do you do with 'three or four' rooms?"

"I live there," he said, truly and genuinely bemused. "I've a bedroom, an office, and an en-suite. You'll see."

"You have your own office?"

"It doubles as a sitting room."

"Oh, good. Wouldn't want to waste space."

“I’m quite economical,” he agreed pleasantly, and she marched on with a dogged shake of her head.

Instead of cutting straight up to the front door, he took a course that arched sideways around the west wing, which rotated the whole face of the building into the light of the setting sun. With some eagerness he pointed to this or that element of the Neoclassical silhouette against the lavender sky, admiring the Venetian windows that glinted like diamonds in settings of bone, flush against the bloodred layers of brick, the relief where sea dragons braided their bodies in fashionable torment, the buttery scent of jasmines and the unctuous scent of pine and fern and the eternal perfect scent of roses, twined in thick locks over the walls and the gates. It was strange to reach the veranda, overlooking a small acropolis of gardens and courtyards, and not find a garden party waiting for them there, no chorus of girls in white dresses watching men in shirtsleeves play croquet, no welcoming cries but the croon of the peacocks sounding invisibly through the trees.

Inside they went through the sitting room and into the entrance hall from the back, emerging from between the curved white arms of twin staircases to the marble vault beyond. Two stories of shining granite lifted from the chequered marble floor and unfolded overhead into a wide gallery of balconies, through which the ghostly eyes of a hundred statues leered or swooned or fountained water into small basins. Somewhere a piano was trilling faintly at them, and its mate crooned back to it from another room, sweet broken chords that flowed in and out of the hallways like the echoes were waltzing.

Hermione stepped into the hall slowly, revolving on her heel.

“What do you think?” he said impatiently.

With some palpable effort, she drew her eyes down from the crystal ziggurat of the chandelier.

“It’s so… grand. It feels like a museum.”

“You like museums.”

“I don’t live in one.” She seemed apprehensive.

He set down her trunk and stepped into the entrance hall, examining it again for himself. He hadn’t thought it was so grand, really; presentable, of course, but they hadn’t even laid out the welcoming banners.

“Yes, but it’s good, isn’t it? It’s quite nice, and everything.”

“Nice — it’s absurd. People have been guillotined for less than this.”

“Don’t get ideas.”

“Don’t tempt me, then,” she suggested, with an amused look over her shoulder. She ambled around the room, peering into paintings and marble carvings of achaean men in contrapposto, their wands arched gently over their thighs.

“I’d delay judgment until you see the library.”

“Please,” she laughed, “I’m not that shallow — I’m not going to swoon just because you have books—”

“It’s three floors.”

“Three?”

“Ah, we’ll make an elitist of you, yet.”

She was prevented from answering by the click of heels somewhere in the gallery overhead.

His mother came in. He suppressed a sigh.

She wore a formal gown of sleeveless, lightless indigo, draped in layers of intricate and vocal beading that whispered against the gauze, crowned with a velvet choker and an emerald like a wide sightless eye. Her hair gathered in an intricate staircase of curls ascending to the diamond circlet that glittered atop the peak, a few white hairs feathering the rest like snowfall, and the overall effect was the sort of extraordinary artistic beauty that required at least three pairs of hands. Black gloves plunged up to her elbow, and on each hand gleamed a different ring, one black, one diamond. It was really quite old-fashioned, even for her. There was little about her silhouette that couldn't have been said of her grandmother's, in a different hallway, fifty years ago.

"Hello, darling," she said. "I see that you've found your friend."

Her voice was flat and airy and dry as desert wind. It expressed no interest but the presumptive fulfillment of the obligation to speak.

"Hello, Mother."

He fought the temptation to say: Really? and instead gave her a knowing glare as she descended, her heels marking each step. She ignored this, and tilted her head inquisitively at Hermione. Hermione offered a thin, flagging smile and cut him a sideways stare, obviously — as any reasonable person would be — at a loss for what to do with this. He felt trapped.

"Hello, Mrs. Malfoy," said Hermione quietly.

At Mrs., Narcissa's cheek twitched.

"The exceptional Miss Granger," she said.

Hermione said, uncomfortably, "Well—"

"The revolutionary Miss Granger," she continued, drawing up the sleeve of her glove. "The groundbreaking Miss Granger."

"I don't know what Draco's told you," she said, "but there's nothing revolutionary about getting good marks. And he does very well for himself." She smiled thinly.

“I didn’t mean your marks,” said Narcissa, leaning against the banister.

There was a long beat.

She arched her eyebrows and sauntered away, lingering under the great arch where the staircases clasped hands. “Dinner is served at seven o’clock,” she said. “Don’t delay on my account; I may be late.”

“Fine,” he said.

They stood there for a moment, on opposite sides of the hall, like chess pieces stationed on the starting lines of a chequered terrain. Then he spun on his heel and clipped off, “Come. Give you the tour.”

A full tour of the Manor would have taken several years and an archeological dig. He fashioned an abbreviation. The Cole Room, named for a five-panel series of vast oil paintings hung on the walls, received a brief visit to store her trunk, and then back out again, through parquet hallways and marbled music rooms, Gilded Age salons, and galleries of portraits that burst into whispering at the sight of a visitor. He walked close to her shoulder and sent them narrow looks, which silenced them, but the susurrus followed them through sunny terraces and halls filled with mirrors and westward windows that seemed to blaze with an interior sun. Doors opened at his approach and shuttered behind him, giving the impression of a train of poltergeist footmen racing ahead of him at every corner, his steps a herald of moving drapes and unfurling carpets in every room.

Downstairs, they disembarked from the curl of a wrought-iron staircase and moved through sitting rooms tanned in pastel silks, blooming roses and jasmines from vases the size of house-elves, and bathrooms with sunken baths the size of wading pools. In one smoking room a candelabra guttered sweet-smelling smoke that changed color, and a liquor cabinet unfolded itself from the wall, offering up a treasure of arcane and bejeweled bottles with glasses of Swarovski crystal. It decanted a glass of something frosted and pale green, which tasted of mint and sugar, with a bright pepper of rosemary.

From the corner of his eye, he could register how Hermione was reacting, and she seemed to have settled down. The initial burst of wonder had cooled off, and now she stepped into each room with a slightly wary anticipation, as if prepared to jump out of the way of a moving suit of armor, or duck a swinging candelabra. She tried to talk to the portraits, who were so bewildered by this effort, after years of being ignored, that some of them simply lost composure and ran away; she interrogated him about the age and pedigree of the furniture, quizzed him on the enchantments that animated the curtains and the cabinets, and had to be dragged bodily away from every bookshelf.

It was, all in all, a great time.

“I’m cross at you for lying, you know,” she said, her voice skittering down a row of antique watercolors. “You told me there wasn’t a dress code. I could’ve brought white tie.”

“No, that’s just Mother. And it’s a good thing you didn’t. If you’d come in silks, she’d have had to up the ante, and she’d have been parading around in her wedding dress by dinner.”

“She made me feel downright bohemian for wearing a skirt that showed my kneecaps.”

“The dress requirements are exactly as you like them to be. Or as I like them to be, rather, and I say that kneecaps will fly.”

A bit more than that could fly, if she felt like it; but he didn’t mention it.

“I hope it’s not going to bother your mother, my being here,” she said. It was a laden suggestion, though not in the least apologetic: the implication, made very clear, was that she did not have much sympathy for any bother caused.

He considered this, weighing his words carefully, and when he spoke he did so with measured lightness.

“My mother is an intelligent, mannered, and capable grand lady of the old school. She has a pain tolerance that would cripple hippogriffs. I have seen her flay men from the waist down with a well-placed excuse about powdering her nose. She walks away, and five minutes later, their unmentionables shrivel up like desiccated figs while bleeding copiously about the nose and ears. Things she dislikes have a habit of vanishing mysteriously. She will,” he said, “get over it.”

Hermione cleared her throat.

“Well,” she said, “for a moment there I thought she was going to eat me, so desiccated unmentionables has to be an improvement.”

“Tosh. She’d never, too pedestrian. Come here, I want to show you something.”

Having heard this a dozen times since she arrived, she followed without any particular urgency. They went out to the lake, with its punts and the summer wildflowers and the deep bullrushes where pixies and moths swam dreamily through the glowing air. Hermione yelped when one floated up and tried to yank on a strand of her hair, and he batted it away, laughing.

“It’s a fairy!”

“Pixie, Granger, come on. We haven’t been out of Magical Creatures for that long.”

“It didn’t look like a pixie!”

“That’s because it’s not Cornish, it’s Welsh.”

“What did it want with my hair?”

“For its nest, I expect.” He pinched a stray bit of dust from her hair and tossed it out, glittering, on the breeze. “We get infestations every summer. They lay their eggs in the trees, and then there’s no getting rid of them, you just have to wait for the dugbogs to come out of hibernation and eat them.”

“It’s interesting that you’d see that much genetic drift — oh!”

A group of peacocks had crept out of the fir trees, their feathers queer and silvery in the dim light. Crests foamed from their backs like the bustles of an evening gowns, and they drifted, faintly warbling, around the edge of the lake.

“They’re mutants,” said Hermione curiously, which was not exactly the sort of poetic epithet he’d have chosen. But she never did have the sense of atmosphere that Merlin gave a rock. “There’s rather a lot of them. Are they inbred?”

“My grandfather reared them, and I think the term is ‘purebred.’”

“They mean the same thing,” she said absently, and shaded her eyes to watch them.

“Do you want to touch one?”

“Oh, love to. I have too many fingers as it is.” She paused. “You’re serious?”

“A good deal less so than before you were all cheeky about it.”

“You’re not, are you? They’re wild animals. And they do bite, I’ve seen documentaries.”

“They’re bred not to attack us,” he sniffed. “Anyway, they’re used to me. Come along.”

He caught her arm and led her — ‘led’ was probably not the word she’d use, considering the amount of friction her heels were generating with the ground — around the side of the lake, to the base of a vast elm tree where the birds hid their nests. The peacocks held court on the roots, and though a few scattered at his approach, the others flicked out their tails and examined him with a cool, judicious eye, as if considering a guest who had turned up to tea uninvited.

“I don’t have to do this. We really don’t have to do this.”

“We’re Gryffindors. Have a little mettle.”

“I have plenty of mettle. I like to keep it right here, inside my body, with as few perforations as possible. Don’t—!”

He held out his hand, clucking his tongue, and one of the peacocks arched its neck at him. Another step brought his fingers into contact with the soft white feathers of its head, and it trilled warningly, but permitted him to stroke its crest with his thumb.

“See?” He flashed her a smirk. “Well-bred.”

“Clearly,” she said flatly, her hands on her hips. Concern for his safety was warring with her disapproval, and nobody was winning. Except him. He was winning, always, because the expression on her face was lovely and ridiculous and a rich temptation to laugh. “Very good. Well done! I hope you don’t get rabies. For Ulysses’s sake.”

“Come here.”

“Tempting! No,” she said brightly.

“Yes. Or aren’t you scared?”

“I’m not scared.”

“Hark at her,” he told the peacock, “she thinks you’re terrifying.”

The peacock croaked judgmentally.

“I’m not scared of the bird.”

“What, then?”

“Zoonotic diseases!”

“Tosh.”

“It’s not! There are studies!”

“Tosh, I say. I never took you for a timid witch.”

With the helpless irritation of the hopelessly predictable, she shouldered past him. “Fine. I’ll show you timid.”

“I wish you would.”

She flashed him a narrow look and edged closer to the bird. He grew tired of waiting, and caught her wrist, which immediately stiffened.

“Come along, Granger,” he said. Her pulse was an arpeggio on his fingers. Her skin was smooth and thin and he could feel the veins under it, the shape of her joints, the thin clefts between her fingers. He’d held her hand before. He knew what it felt like. He hadn’t forgotten; it had just been a while.

Hermione was staring at him like he’d gone mad. He didn’t blame her. He had no idea, whatsoever, what he was doing.

He slipped her hand into his other, and placed both palm-down on the peacock’s neck. The bird crooned and fluttered its wings. The fan of its tail sprouted and fanned lazily on the breeze. Hermione’s eyes were wide.

He was standing close to her. A shift in posture could bring his chest flush to her back, and the outer range of her hair brushed his face. Her hand was small and soft, pressed between his hand and the animal. In his chest there was a kettledrum about to split from the force of each beat. She smelled very nice.

She always had, he’d known that. It had just — been a while.

Hermione said, quietly: “It’s tame.”

“I told you,” he said, “it knows me.”

She turned her head, abortively, and seemed to realize that she had to look distinctly up in order to see him. They weren’t so very far apart in height, but being close together made it obvious. He looked down. There were her eyes, the absolute weapons, the train of summer freckles like a smile from cheek to cheek, the heart-shaped thing of her mouth. There was sweat on her face, that felt indecent. Her skin was shiny and — flushed, and — sticky. There was nothing intrinsically appealing about that, so it didn’t make sense that he wanted to — touch it.

It was a primeval sort of want, like thirst. It was a need whose name he knew without ever having learned, and wasn’t that an eerie thing, like waking up with a brand new limb.

“I missed you, too,” he said, like an idiot. And abruptly felt as though he’d given away far more than he meant to, because the skin beneath her freckles colored brilliantly, almost blotting them out.

“I meant to come earlier, but my parents wanted me to stay,” she said. “They know it’s getting bad.”

This was how they talked about it in their letters, obliquely, with phrases roomy enough for the truth and deniability. It’s getting bad. It’s getting worse. It’s been a bad week, a bad month, a bad year.

Because they both knew what bad and worse meant, and no amount of detailing would make it better. Ministry regulations. Dementor sightings in the streets of London, three in the last month. Muggle kidnappings in Surrey and North Ireland, and Harry’s letters, coming every week: P and M said I couldn’t go flying today… or tomorrow… M had to use the Cloak to go to the shops…

A door slammed on the veranda. Birds erupted from the trees, and through the coursing shadows on the lawn he turned to see his mother emerge from the house, in clear view of the lake.

Narcissa stopped at the end of the veranda. As he watched, she adjusted herself, visibly, and turned her head across the landscape, as if taking in the evening view. Then she looked at him, and lifted her chin; in her stare there was a command he couldn't parse, from a woman he barely knew.

Hermione snatched back her hand and stepped away. He glanced down at her and withdrew his own, twisting his signet ring back into place, but spared another look behind him at the veranda, where his mother stood with jaw uplifted, her silhouette foregrounded against the immense and ornate frame of the Manor, which glowed in sunset behind her like the palace of Versailles. Then she went back into the house and out of the light, leaving them together in the cooling dusk.

The last week of August swelled into hazy detail like a watercolor by Watteau. Having her there was an opportunity to inspect the house as he had rarely done before, to preen while she failed to feign unimpressment at its gaudy architectures, to relish long-winded answers to her questions about the magic and the decor and the art. They went spelunking in the dusty ghost parlors of rooms covered in white sheets and attics filmed in cobwebs like snow, climbing long ladders into airy gables long abandoned, edging around the vertiginous sides of a widow's walk to rooms that only opened from balcony doors, and wading through the forests of enchanted objects inside. Hermione simply didn't accept the premise of a locked door; if a room refused to offer up its secrets, she eked them out by wriggling through a servant's passage, hunting down the caretaker's keys, or once — memorably — cracking a window, shimmying around on a balcony, and slipping in through a shutter left ajar. In the library he lost her twice around the reference section and had to haul her out of a book on eighteenth-century conjurers with promises of a first-edition Bagshot, which she was terribly irked to find were false, though by then he had found the good sense not to let her back inside unless he wanted a few hours of quiet. She could read anywhere, and did, and he began keeping a mental list of all the amusing places he found her curled up with a volume of something rare and deathly old: window-seats and staircases, perched on banisters, balanced on the bathroom sink, and once, memorably, just standing in the middle of a hallway, lost in thought, as if she'd cracked the book on her way to some other task and stalled in her tracks. He mocked her for it. She mocked him for falling asleep on any piece of furniture that could bear his body weight, as if it wasn't his house, and he didn't deserve to nap where he damn well pleased without being harried for it by impertinent guests.

It was nicer with her there. Louder, also. Much more bothersome — he woke several times from a truly magnificent nap to a witch badgering him to get up and locate where he kept the stationery — but not intolerable, for the benefits it afforded. One of which was having someone to bother about his ideas on cauldron plating when his mother was gone on business — and to boot, the kind of person who would turn right around and have a full-throated opinion on the subject, complete with subpoints and footnotes.

Sound carried in the Manor. One could hear her echo whole rooms away. Sometimes, when he heard her from afar, it was like the house itself was murmuring.

Usually, during August's blistering worst, Draco preferred to retreat to his room with a bucket of ice and ask the nearest amendable adult to enchant a fan for his comfort, but Hermione refused to bother anyone about it — "They're called the help for a reason, it's what they're paid for," was met with a blunt and irrefutable: "Don't be a prat," — and so they went down to the lake, where the proximity to water created the impression of coolness, if perhaps not the thing itself.

Reflecting on the incident, this was his first mistake.

A silver tray of lemonade and tonic sat on a divan by the water. Hermione was folded neatly into a white lawn chair, reading under the shade of an enormous straw-brimmed hat, and wearing a long white dress shirt over what was, in his own wholly uncritical view, a set of undergarments with pretensions. He had swum for a while in the cool green waters of the lake, tearing white rifts in the scalloped surface of the water with a front crawl, and then waded out of the water to fetch a towel.

There was a small cough. Through the curtain of his fringe, he caught Hermione with her head decidedly out of her book on pagan magics, idly staring.

There was a pulse of feeling, like some stone tenet in his abdomen had melted, and the whole structure verged on collapse.

The lemonade pitcher tipped over. She hadn't touched it.

Hermione snapped her book shut and stood up. "I'll take it up."

"Don't bother. We'll take it in when we go."

"No, I can. I need more sunblock, anyway. Do you want anything from the house? A towel? A shirt, perhaps?"

"Is that a suggestion?"

"No," she said heatedly, and then: "Actually, yes. You're pale as wax, you're going to burn. And then you'll get melanoma, and you'll be sorry you didn't listen to me."

"Is that a kind of curse?" He hiked out of the water and dusted a towel indifferently over his arms. She wrinkled her face and turned away from the splatter of droplets when he shook it out.

"Yes, actually. It's a special curse for wizards with shirt allergies."

"Mm. 'And if unfit for tombs and hearse, our legend be, it will be fit for verse.'"

She glanced at him curiously, pleased. "John Donne?"

“Who’s that?” he said, and flicked up the tip of her hat, which the wind obliged to catch and whisk away. It was like the world’s least fair game of mugwump-in-the-middle: she snatched for it, missed, and with a burst of exasperated laughter, went chasing it barefoot over the sand and the rolling green lawns, her hand always a grasping inch shy of the hat’s flapping brim. The wind flattened her shirt against her body, and through the white billows he caught fleeting glimpses of a shape underneath it — the arch of a waist, the hip, a white and full bandeau — and then she leapt up and caught the hat, and turned around, laughing, as the wind shook out her hair in dark coils over the white bed of her shoulders. Laughter making her loose and free. And himself, the very opposite, standing there tense as a board and shifting uncomfortably against his briefs, sort of dizzy with the heat and the image and his mouth open and his face probably doing something he couldn’t even think about, having been outplayed by nature.

The wind was blowing cool, but it didn’t matter. He felt the heat throughout that afternoon and well into the night, while he lay in bed hot and sleepless, holding very still, trying to ignore the friction of his pants against the mattress.

He should have been asleep when the owl came.

Wasn’t his fault he wasn’t. He would’ve been asleep, for preference, instead of spread-eagle on the bed, waiting for the heat to go away. Thinking about distances. It wasn’t his fault he could hear the creak of floorboards when someone moved on the other side of the house. Wasn’t his fault he knew where her room was. Her room, and its bed, and the girl in it, whose pyjamas he’d seen on the route back from the kitchen for a glass of ice. A look for which he took no blame, in looking. He’d only wanted a glass of ice. It was hot. He wanted something cool — something to deal with the heat — not a flash of a girl in the door to her suite wearing a long boatneck shirt that was not remotely pretending to be about its business on her shoulders, really reprehensible, it was, stupid girl, stupid not- stupid girl with pretty eyes and a pretty face and soft pretty—

Wasn't his fault, being the point.

The owl alighted on his window almost silently, deposited a small parcel in the sill, and alighted again before he could even sit up.

It was wrapped in brown paper, and the envelope bore the Hogwarts crest. He padded barefoot into his sitting room and found a letter-opener to slit the crest, settling down in a pool of moonlight to read.

Dear Mr. Malfoy,

I am pleased to inform you that you have been selected to serve as Prefect for Gryffindor House. Please find enclosed your Prefect badge, which should be worn on all occasions in which your Hogwarts uniform is required, and report to the Prefect Carriage of the Hogwarts Express on September 1, 1995, for a full accounting of your responsibilities.

I am certain that you will take your new duties seriously.

Congratulations.

Sincerely,

Minerva McGonagall

Head of Gryffindor House

Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry

Draco sat back, the letter in one hand, the parcel held slack in his other.

He’d never given particular thought to making prefect. For one thing, it was hard and thankless work, which wasn’t his forte. Gryffindor prefects were also something of a joke, by and large; with few exceptions, like Percy, they were ineffectual at best and enablers at worst, with less interest in discipline than protecting group morale and making sure none of the firsties perished on accident. Which was a meatier job in Gryffindor than in other houses.

He also hadn’t thought McGonagall would choose him.

Harry was her favorite. That wasn’t a resentful suspicion, it was a fact. Nobody else received so many of her thin-lipped not-quite smiles, nor was so often the target of her reminders to tuck in his shirt and fix his tie. He had been certain that Harry would take the prefect badge and any other bauble it lay in her power to bestow. If he’d been in Slytherin, he’d have expected no less of Snape.

Then again, maybe the old goat had a bit of a taste for mischief, herself.

He slit the twine with the letter-opener and shred the paper in eagerness.

The prefect’s badge was a little crest of scarlet and gold, a banner twined around the letter ‘P.’ He rolled it over in his fingers, and watched his reflection race and disappear in the lacquer.

Gryffindor prefect. There was something the Manor hadn’t seen before. Another first.

Come to think of it, there were two firsts in the Manor, at present. He stood up and was halfway to the door before he realized that it was a quarter to four, and the owl had come soundlessly to his window — the only way she’d be up was if she’d been awake, too. But there was simply no way that a second letter wasn’t waiting on her windowsill. There was only one possible candidate for the other prefect, or they’d have to have poor McGonagall committed.

No sooner had he touched the handle than a soft tap came through the wood. He jumped, badly jarred, and took a moment to calm his racing heart — green light green light green light — mad fucking idiot, it was a knock, it wasn't a fucking spell — and then, setting his teeth, he cracked it open and peered through.

Hermione stood in the hallway, her face halved by shade and moonlight. It was flushed and her hair was high with excitement. One hand fisted a crumpled letter and the other pressed something small and golden to her breast.

"Did you—" She was breathing quickly; she'd run. "Did you— did you?"

He let her vibrate in anticipation for a moment, mostly enjoying how she bounced on her heels; then he lifted his badge between two fingers.

"I knew it!"

His door banged open. The pretense of tranquility was punted into the doorjamb. She leapt into him — into was the right word, socked right into his stomach, nearly bowled him over — and he stumbled with her into his room, laughing. "I knew it! I knew it'd be you if they went by marks, I only worried she might choose Harry for preference! No offense, obviously."

"Obviously."

"I'm so glad it's you. I mean I would've been glad if it was Harry, too — but I secretly wanted it to be you, though don't tell him that, please. You really do deserve it. And this means we'll get to work together— I hope this won't spoil anything in seventh year, though," she said, with passing pensiveness, and he looked at her inquiringly, dangling from the rear carriage of her train of thought by a finger. "They don't like to choose a Head Boy and a Head Girl from the same house, if they can avoid it. McGonagall said it looks too much like favoritism and it makes the other houses jealous. Usually. Of course, there have been cases — but I don't suppose we have to worry about that for two years."

"No, so I say we start on it next week."

"Rather," she said, glowingly.

He tired of holding her up, and sat down on his divan. She tumbled down next to him, a happy universe of bare skin and hair.

"I wonder who else made prefect," she said, fingering the badge like an Order of Merlin. "I'd guess it's Padma, from Ravenclaw, she's very clever… and Ernie, even though I don't like him much, unfortunately has the best grades in his house."

"It's not all grades."

"That's true," she said. "It's also a judgment of character."

This came with a furtive, meaningful look in his direction. He hummed noncommittally. The wind swelled the curtains like a pair of ladies' skirts, whispering softly.

"I didn't wake you up, did I?" she said suddenly, as if she'd only just noticed what time it was.

"My owl came at the same time as yours. I was awake anyway."

"No. I meant before." She was picking at her fingernail. "When… actually, never mind, it seems I didn't, so that's that."

He tilted his head. The pieces slotted together without much difficulty.

"Trouble sleeping?"

"Sometimes."

"Loud trouble?"

“Not when I’m here, so much,” she said, fidgeting with her hands.

He wished he knew what to do with that. If he had figured out anything better than ‘get on a broomstick and remain there until barely conscious,’ he would have gladly told her.

“What do your parents recommend?”

“They sent me to a sleep doctor. Who referred me immediately to a general therapist, when I told them a bit of what happened.”

“...Which was?”

“That there was a very tragic accident at my elite, unnamed boarding school,” she said carefully, “which cost a friend of mine his life.”

“Do they have something for that?”

“Well, it helps. But it doesn’t feel like I’ve gotten very far. I still scream at night, I still flinch at odd things, I still don’t…” She broke off, scowling. “One doctor said that wasn’t even the goal, ultimately, to be ‘over’ it, because it wasn’t something that would just go away, but I don’t know. I don’t like that idea at all. I mean — so what, right? I’m stuck like this?”

“That’s absurd.”

“Well, it’s not, according to them—”

“I’m sure the lawyers only make them say so for insurance purposes. ‘We make no promises of X and Y,’ et cetera, it’s a classic. Of course you’re going to get better,” he said, annoyed. “What’s the point of a healer if they can’t eliminate the problem?”

“That’s what I thought,” she said, slightly relieved.

The moonlight lay in floral shapes over her clothes, interpolated with shadow. She leaned her head back on the sofa and exhaled a long note.

“Are you afraid?”

Her voice was very quiet.

“Of what.”

“Anything. School. The Ministry. What happens when we leave your house. I have a list, if you want suggestions.”

He extended his legs, settled his head on the sofa beside hers, and inspected the ceiling. It was easier to speak this way.

Of course he was afraid. The Dark Lord was immortal, his mother was hunting pieces of his soul, and he had no idea how to save anyone. The last time he’d tried, a boy was killed. Only by raw luck did it turn out the dead one wasn’t the one he tried to save.

There was no winning the war that was coming for them. There was fighting, and there was surviving. He was a survivor. He was the last scion of a House that had lasted longer than the ruling family by being survivors, and not fighters. He wasn’t ashamed of that. The people who died for causes were noble folk, but he wasn’t one of them. There was nothing worth dying for. On the other hand, there were some things worth living for, and he had several: to (1) continue the name of Malfoy, in perpetuity, by not dying young and beautiful; (2) to keep alive all those persons whose end he considered unthinkable, the most important of whom was holding her prefect badge and talking about fear as if, by miracle, she might just be developing a sense of self-preservation. Which meant that so far, he was succeeding gorgeously.

He refused to envision the bloody crucible of the world where he was not.

“My father once said there was only one thing worth a Malfoy’s fear,” he told the ceiling, “and it was death. Nothing else should have the reach.”

Her expression was thoughtful. “Do you believe that?”

“I’m attempting to.”

“I think there’s a lot of things worse than dying.”

“You have an unusually athletic imagination.”

She smiled slightly and curled her legs up underneath her, wrapping her arms around her knees. “I keep thinking about Viktor’s mother. At the funeral, how she… And at least, for him… Harry said it was quick.”

“I never understood how that was supposed to be a comfort,” he said, counting whorls of crown molding.

“What do you mean?”

“‘It was quick.’ I should prefer the option that lets you live longer, really.”

“Well, if you know you’re going to die anyway,” she said quietly, “it’s better not to spend your last moments… suffering. I suppose.”

“For someone who’s consigned themselves to dying, maybe. Which I certainly hope I never do.”

“I mean, no one hopes they’re going to die.” She laced her fingers over her stomach and lolled her neck over the sofa-back. “They just do.”

He lifted his head and arched his eyebrows at her.

“Oh, really?”

“I— shut up.”

“‘People die.’ A pearl without price from Hermione Granger, please do tell me you’ve more—”

“I didn’t sleep! I’m exhausted!”

“Never. You’re going to tell me nargles aren’t real, next.”

“As if you’ve never had a slip of the tongue—”

“My tongue’s not quite so clumsy.”

“Yes, I’m sure it’s quite dextrous,” she muttered. His sideways look intercepted the back of her head as she crawled over to pillow her head on the arm of the sofa. “That’s why those… those…” She yawned. “French girls. Were so chatty.”

“What French girls?”

“You don’t remember?” She was mumbling now into the upholstery. “Three Broomsticks. Had a spirited conversation.”

“I have no idea what you’re talking about.” Then: “That was a year ago.”

“I’m sure they haven’t forgotten.”

“I don’t take your point,” he informed her, but she didn’t reply.

Her side rose and fell deeply. The moonlight fell on her legs, which were splayed sideways on the sofa, like some sort of Elgin nymph.

He looked at them. He warded off the guilt with spite: if she didn’t want him to witness her in states of dress inapt for polite society, she oughtn’t have fallen asleep on his furniture.

“I don’t want things to change,” she mumbled. “Whenever I think about things changing, I get… anxious.”

“What things?”

She wriggled around on the sofa. “Nothing,” she murmured. Her foot stretched out and connected with his leg— a plausible accident, until she left it there.

If she had a tenth of the guile Merlin gave a manticore, he'd suspect her of doing it on purpose — parking herself on his sofa in the middle of the night and accosting him with about a country mile of naked skin. If she hadn't passed out cold in the middle of it, she'd have the makings of a not wholly unsuccessful seduction.

Dispiritingly, however, he doubted the idea had even occurred to her. It was too subtle. Hermione Granger's efforts at seduction would probably be unmistakable, like a lace set of lingerie nailed to the front of a locomotive.

Although it was late, it was a long time before he found his way to sleep that night.

In the morning he woke up to an ache in his back like someone had stolen all his vertebrae and replaced them with sea urchins.

Light filtered cool and pale through the blinds, still too dim to be later than five or six o'clock. Birds crooned obtrusively at the window, and he fumbled blindly for his wand before remembering where he was and why he couldn't, and sat up, mildly bewildered, on the floor of his sitting-room.

Hermione was sprawled on his sofa, her face buried in the utter nest of her hair. She slept on her side, with her knees crooked, but her hand spilled off the side of one cushion, and the light caught it in a strange, interesting way, illuminating the soft planes of her palm, the narrow silhouettes of her fingers.

Her shirt had also ridden up considerably, and there was more than one rib visible. The arch of her waist was soft and steep and hidden by precisely nothing.

Some amount of time probably passed, but with a wand to his head, he could not have said how much.

She stirred, mumbling, and drew her hand underneath her face. Her lips parted and a soft little sigh escaped them.

He hauled himself upright and staggered, somewhat wildly, out of the room.

Broomstick. He needed a broomstick. He needed to be in the air. He was in his sleep clothes, and that was fine.

The Nimbus vibrated under his touch. He slung his leg over it — ignored a twinge of pain somewhere south of the waistline, that probably wasn't supposed to happen, but whatever — and kicked off from the veranda, rocketing high, banking right, cutting through a tuffet of rose-white clouds, and the cold slap of water vapor left him doused and chilled and brutally awake, soaring deep into the heart of the morning.

There were three problems, as he understood it.

Problem the first. Hermione Granger was the sort of person without whom the rest of his life, all else being equal, quite simply didn't work. He did not contemplate the ways in which it could be made to work, either, because it was quite simply not a pleasant way to spend his time.

Problem the second. If he muddled things up for no reason, then he had lost something irretrievable and necessary. And she was busy, and stressed, and grieving, and heavily preoccupied with large portions of the world wanting her dead; and even if not, he doubted someone as brilliantly, ruthlessly tough as Hermione Granger allowed nonsense like feelings or boys to break the first hundred things that she thought about on a given day. If she did, she certainly hadn't let a fellow know about it.

Problem the third. Problems the first and second tended to disappear from memory the moment she took off any of her clothes, or showed an inch of skin above the knee, or touched his back when she was passing behind him in the library, or — any number of other things, comprehensiveness being unnecessary for the point — and remembering them was harder every time.

Friendship was valuable. Friendship was also, crucially, sustainable. The alternative was not. The alternative was a steep drop with darkness waiting at the bottom, and he had no clue how long the fall was. The alternative ran the risk of discouraging her from speaking to him, or sharing his space and his confidences, and generally dampening their friendship with awkwardness and humiliation. Which was apocalyptic, naturally, because it had already been established that their friendship wasn't a sustainable loss. There was a balance to be preserved.

He could be patient. He would wait for — something. A sign, one way or another.

Or she would fall in love with someone else, and he would just kill himself or something.

By the time he came down again the sun was full and hot on his back, and his whole body was tired and too wrung-out to do anything except on explicit command, which was exactly as it ought to be.

He landed, wobbled hard on the dismount, and was contemplating his gratitude that Hermione wasn't around to see that when Briselda came hurrying out onto the terrace, visibly disheveled.

"Young master! You must receive your owls!"

"My owls? What—"

"It is not acceptable! It cannot be borne! I cannot prepare the breakfast table in such conditions! One," she said, with quivering gravitas, "has eaten the lox."

"Merlin forbid. Hang them all."

Letters of congratulations, perhaps, on making prefect? But only McGonagall and Dumbledore could have known about it, and Hermione couldn't possibly have owled someone already.

He picked up the first. It was cream-white stationery with his name fashioned in a colonnade of dramatic loops. The crest on the back was mint green wax, and bore the emblem of a stag and two G's, entwined.

Dear Draco,

If you make another joke about my not being able to find a quill if it signed my arse then I will simply not bother finding it again. NO TIME TO WRITE so forgive all this. Am well but Tori not so much. Daddy and Mummy think may need transfusion. Healers have poked me all over doing tests trying to see if yrs. truly has blood OK for T. I say yes yes yes try please but D. says run more tests and healer says "not sure." What!! Hell do we pay you for if not SURE?? Likely a fraud I fear.

Other news must wait for school for am in dreadful crunch. Have stolen owl from T. to impart news urgently. As you know I am masterful snoop of 1st caliber and I have overheard Daddy remark something big is happening at the M.O.M. involving a "Mr. Potter." Perhaps it is too much to hope it is not our own? I would not risk letter if I did not fear for him. Situation in Bulgaria makes all things very dangerous for him also.

Also PSPS did you hear Parkinson announcement?? Am horrified. P in great distress. But now I suppose this is what happens when Teddy is gone.

Please write back and tell me how you plan to solve these problems. If impossible then please solve Harry's as they seem most serious.

Love or what you will,

Daphne I. Greengrass

The other letter was addressed with a brusque "MALFOY MANOR" in handwriting that was unmistakably Ron’s. He ripped the unmarked blob of wax and withdrew what appeared to be a Sportswizard Illustrated clipping with some ink scrawled on the back. Before he could read it, however, his eyes fell on the day’s Prophet headline. Beneath an article about brewing civil unrest in Bulgaria was a single sentence bearing a familiar name:

HARRY POTTER WILL BE CHARGED IN MAGICAL MURDER OF VICTOR KRUM

In contrast, Ron’s letter was the soul of brevity.

Draco,

Harry arrested come to London NOW bring your lawyer

Ron

Merry Chrysler, everyone.

Back, and it feels so good. Thanks to everyone who read, commented, kudos'd even in my absence, for keeping the home fires burning. You're the reason this exists, naturally, if it even needs saying — and I'll say so even if it doesn't, because it still astounds me just to think about it. All the love in the world, plus half.

—GT

The Ministry of Magic

Chapter 58: The Ministry of Magic

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Once, as a boy, Draco's father had taken him to work. He hadn't a clue why; he couldn't see what use a child would be in an office, but he'd been happy enough to tag along at the time, making himself a botherance to the secretary, demanding pumpkin juice and lemon scones, and being suitably solemn whenever his father introduced him to somebody, as if any amount of scowling could hide the fact that he was six.

The Ministry had been bigger then. He had fit snugly against his father's legs in the telephone box, which sank slowly into the ground beneath the London street, the pavement rising like a black curtain over the glass. The slow, grinding descent into the earth had seemed like a passage to another world.

When he stepped into the Atrium, the deja vu turned his mind crooked, and he half-turned, expecting his father — who would now have to be eight feet tall in order for his head to be in the place Draco's mind seemed to expect — and finding only Hermione Granger. She clasped a binder stuffed to bursting with papers she'd razed from the Manor library on a crazed all-nighter. He hadn't helped — he'd been busy trying to haul Gatz out of a corporate merger in Australia — and so he didn't know what combination of information, rhetoric, and threats she'd wrangled together, but it was likely fearsome.

He wore a silver-blue suit with a white silk waistcoat and an attached ice-blue cloak, hung jauntily over one shoulder, with his wandsheath displayed in a line of rich mahogany at his hip. The fact that he couldn't use it didn't matter; it was his father's going-out suit, the suit he wore to meetings with the people he didn't sneer at. It was a suit to be taken seriously. Or so he hoped.

Hieronymous Gatz, emerging from the lift behind them, wore an electric pink suit and a tie patterned with what appeared to be human skulls. Someone recognized him at once, and hurried over to shake his hand, whereon he exchanged a smile of no less than four gold teeth.

Down the hall from the lifts and the Floo hearths there was a vast antechamber, filtering sun through a sunlight of frosted white glass. Gleaming black tile unrolled under his feet, ushering crowds of witches and wizards into the Atrium, where a gold statue of a witch, a centaur, a goblin, and a house-elf spurted water from various orifices into a wishing-basin, roughly three times life size.

Through the Atrium, past flocks of wizards in purple robes who thronged and read newspapers and hurried their briefcases with performative haste from doorway to doorway, a pair of golden gates warded off the far lifts. Queues obligingly formed at each security station, where wizards with busboy caps swept golden rods over and around each incomer's body. As Draco watched, one rod let off a shrill whistle, and the security agent ushered the wizard into a sideroom while he complained loudly.

He sidestepped the end of the queue and walked briskly up the line, ignoring the dirty stares of dozens on his back. Hermione made an aggrieved sound and followed him.

"We're cutting," she muttered.

"I prefer 'expedited ingress.'"

"I prefer not to cut."

"Well, then, you can sit there by the fountain and make wishes, and I'll go see to Potter's hearing—"

“Don’t get huffy, I’m not objecting, I just don’t like getting nasty looks.”

“Give them nastier ones,” he suggested, and demonstrated. The witch scowling at him ducked her head.

The agent turned inquiringly as they approached.

“We’ve urgent business,” he drawled. His father always spoke as if any movement of the lips was an insufferable demand on his time. “I’ve a room to be in at nine o’clock.”

“Name?”

“Draco Malfoy.”

“Right. Sorry, sir. Know you next time, sir. Step here.”

The rod passed harmlessly over his front and back, and then he passed his wand into the agent’s meekly extended fingers, where it was settled on a small brass scale. A strip of parchment rattled out of the scale’s base.

“Ten inches, hawthorn, unicorn-hair core, four years in use...”

The wizard impaled the parchment on a brass spike and waved him through, sweating. Hermione was next, and Draco said sharply: “She’s with me,” which visibly hastened the agent’s security sweep, and he nearly fumbled her wand on its way to the scale.

“Ten and three-quarter inches, vine, dragon heartstring. Four years’ use. Thank you, madam. You may keep this. Wizarding line?”

Hermione stopped. “What?” she said quietly.

“Wizarding line?” said the attendant, flashing nervous looks at Draco. “The, er… the name, ma’am. The name of the closest wizarding relative. For record-keeping purposes.”

Hermione pressed her lips together. “And am I to assume,” she said, in a very light, very dangerous voice, “that I can’t enter, if I don’t produce one? Hypothetically.”

“No, ma’am, of course you’ll be let in, but we’re to track who goes in and out. For security. It’s just policy—”

“It’s policy,” she said, even lighter. “Of course it is.”

“She’s my guest,” Draco said curtly. “Put her through. Or would you like to hear me recite my pedigree?”

“B-B-But— never mind, sir. Yes, sir.”

“Thanks,” she muttered, and snatched her wand back. Then it was Gatz, who flashed some sort of pass at the agent, and was waved through without a screen.

The queues to get into the lifts were monstrous, so he ignored them. He grasped Hermione’s hand and hauled her into the first one that arrived. Gatz manifested behind them like a shadow attached at the heel, and the golden grill ratcheted shut.

No sooner:

“That’s absolutely barbaric—”

“Steady.”

“—patently obvious pretext, my God; ‘record keeping’—”

“Settle.”

“—should go back there and burn the whole bloody stack of them,” she spat.

“It wouldn’t help,” he said.

The tension went out of her. That was even worse.

“You don’t think I know that?” she said quietly, and there was more sadness than anger in it.

The lift lurched, and the next level brought with it a fleet of paper airplanes in pastel colors, which hovered above their heads on the slow crawl to the next. Hermione gave a coo, abruptly liberated of her administrative scorn, and caught one overeager memo that zoomed into the wall, crumpling its nose.

“Memos?”

“Cleaner than owls.”

“Hm,” she said, thoughtful. “I suppose you can’t use email.”

“Who the hell is Emile?”

The lift lurched sideways. Draco, who had been expecting this, leaned gracefully on the railing; Gatz, who had too, squared his stance and folded his hands; but Hermione, who had not, went soaring into Draco and flattened him against the wall.

“Ow!”

“Ow yourself, witch, the hell—”

“It moved sideways!”

“Well spotted!”

“Why?”

“Why shouldn’t it?”

“Because you can walk!”

“I can climb stairs, too, but it’s not always convenient,” he said, nonplussed, as she furiously gathered up the scattered pages of her binder, which had burst open on impact with his kidney. Gatz cleared his throat and pointed his wand, and they went shuffling neatly into her waiting arms. He rubbed his chest where she'd collided with it and dourly reflected that it was the most she'd touched him in days, which was alarming chiefly because it revealed he'd counted.

Then the lift shuddered again, and they were plummeting, air whistling through the holes in the grate, floors rushing past in a blur of hanging lights. When it finally slowed, the doors parted over a bare black hallway with walls in the same glossy tile as the floor, and a single black door at the end of the corridor.

"Level zero. The Department of Mysteries."

He led them out of the lift, turned right, and descended a short flight of steps. The black door passed out of sight.

"What's that?"

"It told you." They cut through a narrow hall with walls of lightless gray, lit only by bars of dangling fluorescents overhead. "The Department of—"

"Yes, I heard that bit, actually. I meant: What do they do there?"

"If we knew, they'd have to name the department something else, wouldn't they?"

He turned a corner, and a passel of men in double-breasted black uniforms swept past, one of them bearing a familiar coif of oilslick hair. He paused, following the man over his shoulder, and recognized him: it was Prescott Parkinson. He was chatting with the other men, and someone must have said something funny, because they erupted in a bray of laughter.

"...ugly it'll scare him into retirement…"

"...stand her personally… ruthless bitch, but you have to admit…"

"...sweet on you, Scottie."

Did you hear Parkinson announcement? P in great distress.

He turned around, but Hermione caught his arm.

“What are you doing?”

“That’s Prescott Parkinson. Pansy’s father. Daphne said something happened to her, but didn’t say what.”

“Ah,” said Hermione. “Pansy. Well, I do hope she endures.”

“You know, she did us a favor by giving us that warning from Theodore, last year.”

“Which is to her credit,” Hermione agreed lightly. “If you look past the fact that it didn’t work, I suppose. Nor was it her idea. Nor did she know, in fact, that she was helping us—”

“Point taken.”

They rounded another corner and found a wide set of black double doors, before which gathered a large collection of people out of uniform, and one of them had a shag of black hair that would shame porcupines.

“Harry!”

He spun around at once at the sound of Hermione’s voice, then melted with relief at the sight of them. He tripped forward and hugged her.

“I can’t believe they would do this,” she hissed, her voice harsh and furious against her teeth. She was rapidly escalating to the levels of anger she’d reached when he’d told her — accidental magic crackling in her hair, fists balled, she’d shattered a teapot from the Ming dynasty at a distance of thirty feet, it would’ve been a magnificent thing to see under any other auspices — and it did not seem to comfort Harry, who was saggy and gray with woe. “It’s cruel and downright goddamn heartless to do this after what you went through, it's ludicrous, it's obscene, to say nothing of how disrespectful it is to V— to his memory. Did they even say what they thought had happened? Don't answer, it's not even worth talking about."

The Weasleys were there already. They had put Harry in his school uniform — a suit would have been more appropriate, but the uniform made him seem younger, which was probably the intention. Ron stood off to the side, also in uniform, though in his case merely because he lacked anything more suitable. He slouched upright and clapped Draco's hand, then hugged Hermione, who returned it and then immediately set about rifling through her binder, whispering in Harry's ear.

"Draco," said Arthur hoarsely. He was tired, no surprises there, and he was holding a set of Ministry summons. "Good to see you. Who's… er, who's this?" He eyed Gatz uneasily. Gatz shook his hand, politely, and then Molly's.

"This is Potter's lawyer. Don't mind him, he's furniture. Have you obtained anyone else?"

"Haven't had time," rasped Harry. "They said I could represent myself—"

Gatz snorted.

"—or they'd find someone for me."

Gatz snorted again.

"Potter, what happened? Were you in custody?"

"No — I mean, not technically, I guess. I was at — er — 'the Dursley's,'" he crooked his fingers, "and then Dumbledore showed up saying I had to report to the Ministry by tomorrow for an arraignment, or the Aurors would come and try to find me at the actual Dursley's, which would've been…"

“Problematic,” said Arthur succinctly. Draco considered that Grimmauld Place was home to one escaped convict and an unregistered werewolf, and agreed.

“But Moony and Padfoot couldn’t come, obviously, so I wrote Ron, and then Molly and Arthur came to take me.” Harry tugged at his collar. He’d grown again over the summer, still trailing Ron and Draco, but there were new stripes of skin under his cuffs and hems. “Padfoot’s going mental, I think. He threatened to break in if things went wrong.”

He could only imagine.

“Right. They won’t. Potter, listen. It’s a preliminary hearing, not a trial. This is essentially a question of paperwork—”

“Oh, good,” retorted Harry, reddening unpleasantly, “that makes me feel better, doesn’t it, knowing my future’s a question of paperwork.”

“It bloody well should, because I happen to be very good at it. Anyway, you remember Gatz.”

“I do, actually. Hello,” said Harry. “You got new teeth.”

“There will be no need for you to speak,” said Gatz.

“Oh. That’s good.”

Gatz handed Harry a roll of parchment. “I have prepared words,” he rasped, “if you feel inclined to speak anyway.”

“Ah.” Harry scanned it and frowned. “This just says ‘I invoke my lawful privilege against self-incrimination.’”

“It is useful in a variety of contexts.”

The courtroom doors creaked. An assistant poked her head out and cried: “Harry Potter! Docket number one-two-one-four-seven-three-three, Harry Potter?”

Harry turned. “That’s m—”

He broke off, wheezing; Gatz had hit him on the back.

“My client is present,” said Gatz.

The assistant eyed him up, then shook her head. “Merlin keep him,” she muttered, “but bring him in.”

Molly wrapped her arm around Harry’s shoulder, gave Gatz a frigid side-eye, and made to enter, but the assistant stopped her.

“Only family, ma’am.”

Harry, still wheezing, swatted at Gatz’s arm and made a thumbs-up.

“My client’s guests qualify for that status,” said Gatz smoothly.

“Close family, sir. I’m sorry, but we don’t allow visitors. It’s a courtroom, not a playhouse.”

“You expect to send him in alone?” demanded Molly. “With only — that for company?”

She pointed at Gatz, who seemed bothered not at all.

The assistant sighed and pinched her nose. The door creaked again.

“Mafalda, honestly, you had one job— Mum?”

The newcomer was a very harried Percy. “What are you doing here?” he demanded. “Never mind, there’s no time. You, Mr. Potter! Come quickly! You’re late for your trial! Everyone’s here, they’re waiting!”

“Hello, Perce,” said Arthur roughly.

There was a beat like a dropped plate. Ron cleared his throat. Molly made some sort of cross between a sniff and a whimper.

“Hello, Father,” said Percy, at length. “I suppose I might have expected you to drop by.”

“Why, because Harry’s been charged of murder?” said Ron rudely. “I dunno, it’s the kind of thing a family might do for a bloke.”

Percy eyed him with distaste. Draco felt strains of a previous, unwitnessed conversation running under this one, tangled and thorny.

Then Percy sniffed at Harry. “You’ve been at the Burrow, have you?”

Which meant Percy hadn’t been. Interesting.

“I invoke my lawful privilege against self-incrimination,” said Harry.

There was another beat.

“We’re here for support,” said Molly, in a much smaller voice than Draco had ever heard before. “It’s a hard day.”

“I imagine it was a much harder day for Viktor Krum,” said Percy crisply, and Hermione went stiff as glass. “Anyway. Come along, Mr. Potter. The rest of you — well, come on in,” he added, with an awkward glance at his mother, “but sit in the back. And do it quietly.”

“Gee, thanks,” said Ron sourly, but they filed inside.

Courtroom 10 was a vault of black stone, walled in benches, shaped in a hemisphere around a single stone chair and a podium beside it. Harry was ushered, with some difficulty, out of Molly’s arms and into the center of the room. When he sat in the chair, blue runes blazed to life all over the stone. Draco made out one for ‘truth,’ and ‘holding,’ though the others were too small to make out. The chains dangling from the sides, however, were perfectly unmistakable.

The Weasleys filed into a row near the back, and squeezed in. Hermione sat next to Ron and squeezed his arm, reassuringly; with her other, she reached for Draco, perhaps seeking a bit of reassurance herself. He drummed his fingers on his knee and watched Gatz stroll forward to take the podium, exchanging some words with Harry that he couldn't hear.

It was a small hearing; most of the benches were empty. A set of eleven wizards in robes of plum silk and sky-high miters sat along one row, while the presiding officer was a waxen-faced man with long brown hair and a short stump of a goatee, altogether unimpressive, and something about him gave Draco vague confidence.

"The accused being present," he said, in sepulchral tones, "let us begin. Are you ready, Mr. Weasley?"

Percy bobbed up to his side and plopped himself down to his right. " Yes, Lord Selwyn."

"Selwyn?" hissed Ron. "He's buggered, absolutely buggered."

"Don't be hasty."

"That's a Death Eater!"

"Former," said Draco, tightly, "mind you, and a member of the Wizengamot."

Selwyn cleared his throat. "The matter before the Court at this time: the case of R v. Potte r . Interrogators: Salazar Selwyn, senior member of the Wizengamot; Lemarcus Gibbon, Crown Prosecutor for the Department of Magical Law Enforcement; Dolores Jane Umbridge, Senior Undersecretary to the Minister; and, to my left, the Judiciary Committee of the Wizengamot. And my assistant, acting temporarily as Court Scribe, Percy Ignatius Weasley."

A man rose from the bench and buttoned his jacket, descending to stand opposite Gatz. He had a craggy face and a long, elaborate beard, and a pair of dark red glasses that sat jauntily on the tip of his bulbous nose.

“Lemarcus Gibbon, on behalf of the government,” he called. “Good morning, Lord Selwyn.”

“Good morning.”

Gatz placed a gnarled hand on the podium, his battery of gold rings flashing. “Good morning, Lord Selwyn. Hieronymous Gatz, on behalf of Mr. Potter.”

“Good morning,” said Selwyn mildly, peering up from his papers. “Hello, Hero. Didn’t think I’d be seeing you today.”

Gatz shrugged.

“Very well. We will begin presently. The charges against the accused are as follows: that between the hours of eight o’clock and eleven o’clock P.M. on the evening of May 24th, 1995, Harry James Potter committed manslaughter in the second degree against Viktor Iliev Krum. He stands before us today, this twenty-seventh of August, 1995, in order to hear the charges and make a response to them. Mr. Potter, how do you plead?”

Harry opened his mouth. Gatz interrupted.

“He pleads not guilty, sire.”

“Fine. It is so noted. Now we will hear from the prosecution. Mr. Gibbon?”

Gibbon stepped forward and cleared his throat.

“On the twenty-fourth of May,” he began, in a snide drawl, “Mr. Potter and Mr. Krum both vanished from the Hogwarts grounds, pursuant to the completion of the Third Task of the Triwizard Tournament. When the Task collapsed, neither were to be found. One hour later, Mr. Potter returned to the grounds by way of Portkey, holding Mr. Krum’s deceased body — which bore no traces of any accident, misfortune, or otherwise natural cause that could serve as evidence against the use of the Killing Curse. Unlike Mr. Krum," he said significantly, "Mr. Potter returned in possession of his wand."

The committee members mumbled auspiciously.

"He went on to claim," cried Gibbon, "that Mr. Krum had been killed by none other than He Who Must Not Be Named, risen again from the grave — miraculously, after fourteen long years. A likely possibility!"

"Objection, sire, speculation."

"Upheld," said Selwyn drolly. "Mr. Gibbon, please refrain from opining on the plausibility of Mr. Potter's account."

Gibbon sniffed and kept speaking. "Mr. Potter was subsequently given medical treatment for wounds sustained during the Triwizard Tournament," he said, "into which he was entered, against his will, by known criminal Ludo Bagman — a degenerate gambler who placed Mr. Potter in peril so that he might line his own pockets—"

"No mention of Nott," she muttered. "Who's currently in Azkaban, not that they care, I suppose."

"For murdering Crouch," he muttered back. "Not the second coming of the Dark Lord. No one saw what happened in the graveyard except Potter and the other Death Eaters."

"Not true. Theo knows," she said suddenly. "He could testify. He had a deal with Moody and Crouch — why isn't he here?"

"Because the truth incriminates his father on charges of conspiracy to the Dark Lord. And we're the only ones who knew his part in it, besides Moody, who—"

"Who resigned as an auror, I know, Harry wrote me, too. But t here is this thing," she muttered tautly, "called Veritaserum."

"Ruthless, Granger."

“It’s not like I’m suggesting torture,” she muttered, defensive. “Torture is unreliable. It’s cruel, and it doesn’t work. Veritaserum is painless, it’s temporary, it’s reliable, it lacks long-term side effects—”

“All true.”

“And with certain procedures in place, it could be administered in a way that’s minimally invasive.”

“You’re aware that the same could be said of the Imperius Curse.”

“That’s — different.”

“So different that you’d let the Ministry use one, but not the other?”

She opened her mouth and then closed it, frowning.

“I didn’t say I disapproved, by the way.”

“Well, you wouldn't,” she muttered, but without venom. She turned back to the trial, arms folded tightly over her chest.

“...indicating serious degrees of mental and physical trauma,” Gibbon was saying, “consistent with the typical signs of a psychotic break; mental hardship being nothing new to Mr. Potter, of course, second year, he was witness to a series of brutally violent attacks…”

“Objection, sire. The prosecution cannot possibly speak to the defendant’s mental state years before the incidents of the case,” Gatz snapped. This was a well-timed interjection; Harry was turning shades of red heretofore known only to fruits.

But as it turned out, Selwyn never had the chance to reply. A jangling bell pierced the air. Several members of the Judiciary Committee leapt to their feet, hurrying to the door. An aide hurtled into the room, his robes a ridicule made by haste.

“Lord Selwyn!” he cried. “Emergency vote on the floor — all hands —”

“We are somewhat preoccupied!”

“Yes, sir, but— but— Dumbledore’s flipped—”

“What?”

Committee members raced past the aide in a battery of bureaucrats, jostling him back and forth. “Yes, sir! Come quick, we’ve got a lift waiting—”

“What am I to do with Potter?” Selwyn bellowed. “I cannot simply leave him here, Anderson!”

“Not to worry, sir — here, Mr. Gibbon, sir — I have communications — a note—”

Gibbon snatched it up. Whatever he read curled his lip like a rind of lemon. He tossed it away.

“The government withdraws its case,” he snapped, and raced out of the room after the Judiciary Committee.

“What!” Selwyn was white and veiny with anger. His eyes bulged. “You cannot — Gibbon! If you withdraw, Potter cannot be charged! ”

“He knows that, I believe, Lord Selwyn,” said Gatz, and offered the judge the very humblest of grins.

“Fine,” spat Selwyn. He stamped something on the paper in front of him and shoved it gracelessly at Percy. “The hearing is terminated for want of grounds. In consequence of this profoundly, irresponsibly, disgracefully unorthodox abdication of prosecutorial duty, I dismiss the case.”

He stood up, slammed a book shut, and stalked out of the room. Harry leapt up and gave a thoroughly confused, half-wild little cheer; Molly whimpered, and sagged heavily onto Arthur’s shoulder. Ron and Arthur stumbled over themselves in a hurry to embrace him, but Hermione was frozen, caught between happiness, bemusement, and worry. She turned to Draco, frowning, and he intercepted her.

“Dumbledore—”

“Just did something unwise? Yes, I gathered.”

“But it’s Dumbledore. Wouldn’t he know what he’s doing?”

“I don’t know that he had any wise choices left,” he said tautly, and stood. “He bought Potter’s freedom. How much do you think it cost?”

The call bell kept clanging, even as they emerged into the hallway, harried and clustered together, while aides and legislative assistants raced back and forth in a flurry of fruitless shouting. Arrowhead formations of memoranda soared overhead. At the far end of the hubbub a man in midnight blue robes was cutting effortlessly through the flock, and there was a long current of white hair. Dumbledore hastened down the stairs from the Department of Mysteries, walking at the greatest speed possible without losing decorum, and zeroed in on Harry in an instant.

“Harry! Are you alright?”

“Yeah,” said Harry, bewildered, “sort of — they let me off! Did you do —”

“Cleared of all charges?”

“Yes, sir—”

“You were not asked to appear again? There was no suggestion of ‘reduce’ or ‘delay’?”

“He’s cleared,” said Arthur, “but even so—”

“Professor, where did you just come from?” said Hermione intently.

Dumbledore paused, looking at her with rare and almost disarmed intensity. He placed a hand on her shoulder.

“Excellent to see you, Miss Granger,” he said. “Please accept my fondest congratulations on your new post. Gryffindor is lucky to have such a worthy prefect. And you as well, Mr. Malfoy.”

Draco startled; so did Ron, whose jaw dropped.

“Prefect?” Harry demanded. “You prats! You never said anything! When were you gonna tell us?”

“Oh, Harry, I’m sorry, we weren’t trying to keep secrets, but there just never seemed a moment—”

“When, in the time between ‘trial’ and ‘now,’ would I have possibly occasioned—”

“—thought it’d be a nice way to celebrate, if you got off, and of course it wouldn’t be apropos if you didn’t—”

“—‘sorry about the prison, old chap, but did you hear I made prefect?’ Merlin’s bones. Buy an etiquette manual.”

“With my sincere regrets, I must leave you,” said Dumbledore, over the din. “I apologize for the opprobrious exit, but I am being summoned, quite insistently, and by people who have severe opinions on tardiness. Arthur, will you escort him home?”

“Yes — of course — but Albus, what the devil is going on?”

Dumbledore smiled. It was, as usual, completely opaque.

“Something that would have happened anyway,” he said. “Good day. I will see you all soon.”

In a whirl of velvet, he spun and swept up the stairs.

There was a festival air about the party as they returned to the Atrium. Harry's newfound freedom put a spring in his step, and concern about Dumbledore's potentially auctioning off the institution of democracy for his benefit failed to stop him from upending his coinpurse into the Fountain of Magical Brethren, as a gesture of goodwill. Whatever act the vote had been for, it was not announced before they left, nor did Arthur permit them to contemplate "wandering up" to the Wizengamot and checking. He steered them all sternly and directly to the exit, which for once required him to wrangle Hermione more than Harry or Ron, because she kept trying to sneak off into offices and find out what was going on. Draco, who found this both useful and endearing, assisted her by providing distractions to Arthur and Molly — "I say, Mr. Weasley, I'm just desperate to hear what you're doing on that car" — and finally they had to be separated by Molly, who stuffed Hermione's arm firmly in her own and ushered her ahead of the group, muttering about automobiles.

Next to him Harry floated with a dazed expression and sometimes laughed at nothing at all, cutting himself off when he heard it, as if his brain and his lungs were in disagreement about whether he should be happy.

When the lift creaked open over the Atrium, their paths collided with a pair of wizards in dress robes. One was a gnarled man with a bowler hat and a deep facial scar that included a shudder-inducing scratch on his right cornea. The other was a woman in dark duelist's leathers and a long black duster that flourished in her wake. A mass of black hair tumbled free from the back of her head like she had just alighted from the deck of a ship, wind-battered and salt-stiff, and when she glanced down the hallway, the lovely diamond shape of her face made a pale frame for a pair of searingly dark eyes, wild and bright as boiling tar, to match the black paint on her smirk. His mother's smirk.

It was Bellatrix Lestrange.

His wand was out and up before anyone could move. He had shoved past Arthur and Ron and Harry and with absolutely pristine footwork had advanced three long steps up the hallway, a curse on his tongue, before the woman turned, and he saw her face in full, and it was — wrong. It wasn't right. It wasn't her. The nose was wrong, or — or not the nose, but the mouth, or the position of it, or something, it was — it wasn't his aunt.

Hermione skidded up beside him, wand drawn, and gave him a quick once-over. He could have kissed her for that, for her short nod of affirmation, which seemed to buttress the newly unstable pillars of reality.

The woman blinked at him, quizzically, and then cocked her head, which was an expression so unlike his mother or anyone she'd ever shared blood with that the resemblance almost fully disappeared. And then the other woman stepped out from behind her, and his stomach gave a seizure.

It was his aunt. But it wasn't Bellatrix.

Andromeda Black pressed her small white fingers to her mouth, her small round face a wide rictus of something beyond horror, beyond fear, beyond any way that any person had ever looked at him at all. She looked at him as if she had just watched him kick open his own casket, sit up, and stroll out of the funeral parlor.

He stared back at her in just the same way.

"Davis," greeted Arthur, stepping in front of Draco. He and the auror greeted each other with cool nods. "And Nymphadora. Good to see you. What brings you to the Ministry?"

"Wotcher, Artie," said the woman in a chipper Brummie, dispelling the last hint of Bellatrix. "And just Tonks, wouldja? Job interview. Wish me luck."

Andromeda was still staring. Her head moved soundlessly from left to right. She clutched the other woman's arm.

"Mum?" The woman turned, frowning. "Eh? You alright?"

Mum?

His mouth drifted open, and he was aware that he looked affected, but his dignity was off somewhere in the waiting room with his sense.

"Er. Okay." Nymphadora raised her eyebrows at Arthur, who shrugged, and then stepped forward, sticking her hand out gamely. "Well, nice to meet you, whoever you are. And you're Harry Potter, right? Artie mentioned you were in for a hearing this week. Bad luck with that Tournament business, but, er..." She caught Davis's eye, and shrugged. "Rules are important, you know?"

Draco couldn't parse this for a knut, but he didn't have time to, because Harry objected.

"Tonks, what are you talking ab—"

He grunted. Ron had stepped on his foot.

"Sorry," he said thinly, massaging it under his robes. "Thinking of someone else."

"Must've been," she agreed blithely. She stepped away and snapped a lazy salute. "Well. Seeya never, kid."

Nymphadora was a Black name. That had to mean something, it couldn't not.

"Draco Malfoy."

Tonks lurched to a stop. Andromeda touched her parted lips.

Did his mother know about her? That she existed? Did she know that her niece had a Black name, and the Black eyes, and the face of a woman seven years gone?

There was a moment in which he swore Andromeda was going to speak, and then commotion erupted behind him. He spun: it was Ron, caught in the middle of an intense finger-pointing competition with Percy, who was squashed against the wall by Ron's looming.

"Say it! Say you think he did it, go on—"

"I never said that!" screeched Percy. "I said he wasn't proven innocent, which he wasn't, because Lord Selwyn dropped the charges—"

"Big bloody difference! You think you're so smart, don't you, with your fancy job and your Cavalier boss— hey, by the way, have you changed party yet? Better clear that up before you're up for promotion, wouldn't want anybody doubting your loyalties!"

"Unhand me! Now! Or I'll call security!"

"Yeah? Report your own brother, would you?"

"You're the one harassing your own brother," Percy shouted, "and it's not my fault that you're sore; and I'm sorry you're jealous—"

"Jealous! Jealous?"

"Yes, jealous!" Percy wrenched himself free and then immediately wasted said freedom by shoving his finger right back in Ron's face. "None of you — not you, not Mum, not Bill, Merlin knows not the twins — none of you cared what I did at work before! It didn't matter! So long as I was striving, you were perfectly content, because that's Percy! Dull, boring, silly old Percy, why, he's no fun, he might be Head Boy but Bill did it first , so who even cares! He's not some exciting bastard, like the rest of us! Let's go have an adventure without him, let's all talk about how much we hate him when we know he might hear— well, I heard! You hear me? I heard!"

“Get over yourself, would you please,” Ron snarled. It was impressive, if not faintly frightening. Draco had been the subject of Ron’s anger before, his disappointment and his disgust, but this was a new dark, boiling species of anger — betrayal. “Are you sad nobody invited you to parties? You’re upset we didn’t kiss your boots for making Head Boy? What did you want, a biscuit? Welcome to the Weasleys, tosser! Nobody puts themselves out telling me I’m special! I didn’t make the quidditch team, either, but you don’t see me stabbing my family in the back—”

“You all thought I was nothing until I had this job! And once I did, it was all no, Percy, don’t , Percy, we all care what you think, now, Percy! But you don’t! You never cared what my opinions were until they were inconvenient for you!”

“Yes we did!”

“Like hell!” The two of them were identical shades of red; it clashed identically with their hair. “Like hell you did!” shouted Percy. “You never asked about my politics — you never read my reports—”

“So you became a fascist?” roared Ron. “Because no one talked to you about bloody cauldron bottoms?”

“PERCY! RON!”

Arthur came rushing down the hallway, followed by Molly. They were trailed by a pair of men in robes similar to Arthur’s; they had drifted off to chat together, but came running at the sound of their sons’ altercation. “Stop it,” snapped Arthur. “Ron, let go.”

Ron threw up his hands and stepped back, panting visibly, but giving every gesture of good-faith surrender. Arthur seized his arm and hauled him even further away.

“Apologize to your brother!”

Ron jerked his head. “Sorry,” he muttered, in the universal tone of a child executing a parental order.

“Now you, Percy,” said Arthur.

Percy sneered at him. Ron cleared his throat.

“Percy,” said Molly, her voice broken. “Percy, please, dear. Apologize to Ron.”

He worked his mouth.

“Speak up, prat,” snapped Ron, “Mum’s talking to you,” and Percy flinched so hard it knocked his coiffure out of place.

“I’m sorry,” he said icily, in a tone Draco knew very well, and he was already bracing himself for the rest of the sentence when it landed: “I’m sorry that you can’t handle my success.”

“Percy!”

“Stop it, son.”

“But it isn’t my fault that you’re not as good as I am at this.”

Harry gave a furious hiss.

“And it isn’t my fault,” said Percy, spittle flying like acid, “that you’re angry at me for it. You, too, Father. With your judgmental looks, and your letters — I’m sick of it! I’m sick of you trying to make me feel guilty for not wanting to be weak and poor.”

Ron tore free of Arthur’s grasp.

There was a wet crunch, and then Percy bellowed, clutching his eye. Shouts erupted. Bedlam asserted itself. Arthur shouted and wrestled Ron away, but Ron went willingly, easily, letting himself be hauled across the Atrium with a stone-faced refusal to look back at his brother, who was bleeding from the rosy crest of a fresh black eye.

Wizards swarmed Percy, helping him to his feet. He was gasping as if he didn’t quite know what to do with himself; Draco thought it more than probable that he’d never been hit before. His expression wasn’t pain so much as it was juvenile shock. It was the poignant terror of a child skinning their knee for the first time— a realization that the world could hurt, very badly, and that right of the bottom of said ruthlessly hurtful world was you, stuck in a small, tender body that was abundantly vulnerable to pain.

Harry raced after Ron, and so did Hermione. The Weasleys bundled themselves out of the Atrium in varying levels of shame. But Draco paused in the Atrium before leaving, watching Percy blubber and bleed into his handkerchief. He noted how all the people around him stood awkwardly by, with empty hands and empty words, shuffling their feet in uncertainty of what to say; and how, when they touched Percy, it was a tough pat on the shoulder, a brisk slap on the arm, or an elbow to the ribs, the tentative violence of men trying to comfort each other. That was how Draco left him: sniffling and mopping his face in that big room under the ground, alone with the bruising, loveless kindness of strangers.

Oh my God. The reception for the last chapter has been incredible, astounding, jaw-dropping, I really don't know what to say except that old inadequate cry: thank you! And I hope not to disappoint. Polishing off a few notes that cropped up in the comments:

-Updates will be at the same time for this book as the previous! Every Friday.

-I want to thank several people who went through and commented on every chapter, especially, because — holy shit. I spent about three hours this morning just sitting at my computer and giggling like a hysterical clown. The stuff that dreams are made of, you are.

-Some have expressed concern that this may not be a "kissing book." I cannot promise anything except that I will do my best to make everyone happy, and I know that some people have been waiting for a very, very long time.

-Simultaneously: philosophically, it is my stance that pining should feel like someone is rattling your heart around like a maraca. When i think “pining” i think about myself being so strung-out and brain-wormed that i would start hooting like a lunatic whenever the characters so much as look at each other. i went to the Long Game school of setup and payoff. I shipped Draco and Hermione since I read Prisoner of Azkaban, friends. I can live in delusion for as long as it takes. I’ve been here for a million years. i'll be here for a million more. and all along I believed I would find you—

-ANYWAY. Profuse kisses to you each who commented, individually, with as much intimacy or passion as you desire. Or, failing that, a very solid muggle fist-bump, complete with a really cool handshake.

-Next chapter's up in a week: "The Old London Place."

The Old London Place

Chapter 59: The Old London Place

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

In a wealthy neighborhood perhaps an hour’s walk from the Ministry, there laid a row of aged brownstones, bearded with ivy. As they passed under a street sign, the little black letters rearranged themselves from ‘PAGET STREET’ to ‘GRIMMAULD PLACE.’

They stopped at the gate between Eleven and Thirteen, waiting for something, and just when Hermione’s impatient fidgeting suggested she was about to bite the bullet and order someone to explain something, a towering black door swelled out of the brick.

A wall followed it, studded with deep wide windows and ribbed ornaments of sandstone, crested with a flotilla of chimneys, and a shabby cloak of dark shingle. The door sat lofted on a porch four or five stairs over the street, hooded by a pillar and a balcony, and as Arthur hurried them up the stairs, a silver knocker shimmered into place on the door.

Arthur tapped his wand on the door, and several deadbolts shuddered out of place at once. The door creaked open a very small fraction, and Arthur had to muscle it aside, as if it weighed several tons.

“Damn thing’s sticky,” he murmured. “Sirius’s doing his best — he can force it to let me in, but he can’t force it to like me.”

“It’s alive?” said Hermione, fascinated.

“Every house is alive,” said Arthur, panting, “that’s what — people living in it will — do for you — but this one — is rather more alive — than perhaps we’d — eughr— like.”

Draco sighed.

“Excuse me,” he muttered, and steered Arthur aside. He pressed on the door, lightly, with his fingertips.

The door glided open as if it were made of air. A small welcome mat flung itself hastily at his feet.

“Well!” exclaimed Arthur, mopping sweat from his brow. “Well! That’ll do it, I suppose! Thank you, Draco!”

The interior of Grimmauld Place was like someone had taken a set of luscious Victorian architecture photographs and desaturated them. Everything was handsomely rendered and furnished, a veritable catalog of brocade wallpaper, wood paneling, silk upholstery, tasseled curtains and Turkish rugs, but age and dust had stained the portrait, leaving it a sepia echo of splendor in blacks and grays and cool browns. The chandelier above him sputtered to life, their light dappled by an infestation of moths that took up buzzing around the bulbs when they turned on.

He shrugged off his transfigured cloak and held it out; the coatrack lunged forward and lifted it obligingly from his finger.

“Blimey, it’s never done that for me,” said Harry, wriggling out of his robe, as the Weasleys piled in.

“You’re not a Black,” he said idly, adjusting his cuff.

“Oi. Neither are you.”

“The house disagrees,” he said, with a self-satisfied shrug.

There were hurried footsteps and Remus emerged from a door at the end of the hall, followed by Sirius. At the sight of Harry, he broke into a beam and shoved ahead of Remus on the stairs.

“He’s off! He’s off, look at the smirk, you know he’s off! That’s my boy!”

He seized Harry and waltzed him around, evoking many vocal sounds of teenaged embarrassment.

Remus started forward, smiling, but then he noticed Ron, who was still scowling as his mother hissed inaudibly at him. He also saw Draco and Hermione, who couldn't have been looking altogether pleased. Draco's brain was still a record struck on Nymphadora, and Hermione was fretfully nibbling her thumbnail.

"Er… mixed news, is it?"

"Percy's a rat bastard," spat Ron.

"Bad luck," said Sirius at once. "Bound to happen, in a big family. Mine had eight."

"Ron!" Molly snapped. "Language! You, too, Sirius!"

"He's not wrong, though," said a voice from above. Fred and George braced their arms on the banister overlooking the parlor. Ginny leaned on George's shoulder, grinning. "It's a medical condition. Our dear brother's got chronic rattus bastardia, and we fear it's terminal."

"Hello, you lot," Fred added, thumbing his nose. "Welcome to the hidey-hole. Mind the troll leg, you'll wake the portrait."

Hermione frowned. "Is that some kind of code?"

"Yes."

"No."

"You'll see," said Ginny.

Arthur and Sirius drifted into a debrief in the sitting-room. Remus shut the door behind them. "Will you all be staying with us for long?" he inquired. "We can have rooms made up."

"Oh, I wouldn't want to make everyone squeeze—"

“Won’t, trust us. This place is honking big, it takes up the whole row,” said Ginny. “We’ve got our own rooms. It’s aces.”

“Even Fred and I, and we didn’t even want them.”

“There’s enough to sleep the whole Order, come to that! Plus more we think nobody’s seen, because the house keeps shuffling them around. Our theory is it wants to hide them from the blood traitors—”

“So we figured we’d strap Draco to a metal detector and wheel him around a bit,” said Fred.

Draco lazily flipped him off. Fred and George fired back a double.

“The Order?” he inquired. “Is that what you’re calling your family now?”

“No, tosser, ‘of the Phoenix,’” said Ginny. She wiggled her eyebrows. “Cool, innit? We’re soldiers.”

“You’re a fourth year,” corrected Remus, and she pouted. “Of all of you, only Fred and George—”

“Are seventeen! Right you are, Remus!”

CRACK. Fred Apparated into the parlor and draped an arm on Harry’s shoulder. “But enough about us. Let’s hear from Britain’s Most Wanted. Folks, I’m here today with Harry James Potter, sexiest seeker in a century, current enemy of the state, and holding a very respectable third place for ‘most points lost by a current member of Gryffindor House,’ widely expected to inherit the title; but today, the question on everyone’s mind is, simply: ‘prison??’ Let’s hear it in his own words.” He held his fist in front of Harry’s mouth like a microphone.

Harry leaned in.

“Not prison.”

Fred punched the air. “NOT PRISON!”

“NOT PRISON!” bellowed George and Ginny.

“Everyone, quiet,” cried Molly, “you’re going to wake her!”

“Who’s ‘her’?” said Hermione, but was cut off by a bloodcurdling screech.

“Filth! Scum! Byproducts of dirt and vileness! Half-breeds, mutants, freaks…”

Remus sighed. “There’s a portrait of Sirius’s mother on the second-floor landing,” he said, “and she is as opinionated in death as she was in life.”

“Can’t you shut it up?” Hermione complained, plugging one ear.

“We usually cover it with tarp, but when there’s a lot of noise…”

“Bint wakes up,” said Ron.

“Bint wakes up,” agreed Remus. “And it’s quite something. Anyway, you’re all welcome to stay.”

“Thank you, but we’ll be heading back to the Manor,” said Draco coolly. “My mother will wonder where I am.”

“‘We’ll’ be heading back?” said Ron.

Draco would have thought better of himself if he enjoyed the ensuing awkwardness less. That being said, there was something to watching Hermione, of all people, try to scramble her words together.

“Well, yes,” she said, “I only meant — I’ve been visiting.”

“Oh,” said Ron, like he’d been clubbed. “Since…?”

Fred broke into quiet snickering. Ginny smacked him.

“His mother’s there,” broke in Hermione, hotly, folding her arms. “It’s not an empty house. And… the maids.”

“Right,” said Ron. “Must get pretty tight, I reckon, with all those maids running around.”

Draco snickered. Hermione looked at him like she wished him to die a swift death by eye lasers. Walburga Black howled herself hoarse.

“Well,” said Remus, clapping his hands, “if you’d like to stay for dinner, Molly’s cooking, and it’s no trouble at all to set another two places. Just say the word.”

“Thank you, that would be lovely,” said Hermione emphatically. Ron said nothing. Harry also said nothing, but did it less loudly.

Ginny took pity on them, flipped her leg over the banister, and slid downstairs, landing with a hop.

“C’mon,” she announced, taking Hermione’s arm. “Show you around. We’ve been cleaning for our keep, these few weeks; you’d think Mum meant to host the Queen for Christmas.”

With dismay, Draco realized that he had made the grave error of accepting the hospitality of Molly Weasley, which obligated him to at least twelve hours of hard labor. Bugger him for a fool.

They scaled the stairs in a squadron of rolled sleeves and muttered excuses. Past the veiled tapestry on the second landing, past the dank corridors that sprawled out seemingly forever under the sickly glow of dusty-clad chandeliers, up through vaulted rooms dressed in green and black, around the top of the landing, where large boxes and crates and rubbish-bags gave evidence of the considerable work invested to make the place livable again. Fred and George skived off at once to go draw mustaches on the oil portraits, which left Harry, Ron, and Ginny to give Draco and Hermione the tour: a dawdling circuit of the house that involved rather more “And here’s this place, bit of cool stuff in it,” or “this one’s got a piano,” than helpful trivia about the architecture. Many of the rooms had been cleared out and resettled as operational spaces for the Order; one had a wide, flat table engraved with a map of Britain; another, a glass case of antique melee weaponry, which Harry resentfully reported they were forbidden from touching.

One had several double-beds shoved together in rows, like barracks, which he found to be a perplexing choice in a house with so many rooms until he noticed the apothecary cart.

“Medical wing,” said Ginny quietly, and closed the door on it.

It was a military headquarters. It was hard to keep that in his head, because the rooms were so ornate and evidently lived-in; but every now and then they’d stumble on a fallen chandelier or a blast-hole in the staircase, and he’d remember that the last time anyone lived here, there had been a war on.

Ginny cleared her throat. “C’mon! There’s a room back here with a bunch of fancy old stuff, and Sirius ordered us to steal anything we like.”

They ensconced themselves in a gabled bedroom near the top of the house. Dusty furniture encircled a four-poster bed, and a bookshelf boasted some long-lost tenant’s personal library: Milton, Keats, a selection of Romantic poets, and one or two satirical novels. Not much furniture, compared to the rest of the house; there was only a bed and a desk and a wardrobe, and a single sofa, wedged aside of the window, beyond which a short and probably non-functional balcony jutted over the street below.

Ginny flung open the doors of the wardrobe and began flinging out lavish waistcoats and silk shirts in floral variety, gilded belts, silk stockings, giant shearling coats. Hermione withdrew a book from the desk’s attached shelf and cracked the spine with a small exclamation of dust. Draco migrated to the bed, and traced the lettering etched into the post: R.A.B.

It wasn’t Sirius’s room. He’d suspected, but it still felt odd to be sure.

Harry hopped onto the desk and took out a pocket snitch, fiddling with it. Ron fell gracefully onto the sofa, kicked up his legs, and caught the silk necktie Ginny tossed him, which he tied around his forehead like a sweatband.

“So,” drawled Ron, lacing his fingers behind his head. “Prefects.”

Hermione’s hand stilled while turning a page. She closed the book, which he noticed was a very old, annotation-besieged copy of Paradise Lost.

“Congratulations,” he added, gamely. “Not gonna turn into narcs, now, will you?”

“Of course not!”

“Only for you, Ronald.”

“Yeah, yeah. I’m just saying, it’s pretty good it’s not Harry or me,” he added, “because then the twins might stop inviting us to stuff. Kill our social life stone-dead, and everyone knows fifth year is the party year.”

“Alicia was a prefect, and they always invited her to everything,” Hermione said, slightly sullen. “And Roger Davies still managed to have quite the social life, if you believe Cho.”

“Oh, ’course. But I dunno if people would look at us the same way, right? Sort of makes you less approachable. That’s what Charlie said, anyway. So Draco, mate — seriously, I’m glad it’s you. Curse dodged.”

“You’re too kind,” said Draco testily, leaning against the bookshelf. “I do hope you didn’t lose sleep over it.”

Hermione sent him a Look. Harry made a tricky catch behind his back and knocked over an inkwell.

“Hey, Ron, tell them what you told me yesterday,” he announced. “About the quidditch team.”

Ron sat up, somewhat mollified. “Oh. Right,” he said, turning pink. “I’m, er… well, I thought I might try out.”

“Really!” Hermione’s cry landed between exasperation and despair. “Quidditch! All three of you!”

Draco caught her eye and lifted an eyebrow.

“Fantastic,” she said, stilted. She sat down in the desk chair and gripped her book like a bludgeon. “What a good, safe, healthy activity. I’m sure you’ll be wonderful, and that you will definitely avoid most major injuries.”

Ron was smiling at her crookedly. “It’s alright, Mione. Let her rip.”

“No, I’m happy! I am! Just because it happens to be the one club at the school that’s sent multiple people in this room to the Hospital Wing doesn’t mean that it’s not, you know, a perfectly serviceable way to make friends, or induce blunt force trauma to any part of your body that you please—”

“And I’d do it again,” announced Harry grandly.

“Fine! Go ahead! Enjoy your cognitive faculties while they last, because believe me, you are all going to have so much brain damage from having anything to do with that nightmarish invention. Each one of you will get CTE before age twenty, and I am going to say ‘I told you so,’ every. Single. Time.”

“And you’ll even pretend not to enjoy it.”

“Shut up, Draco.”

“So,” said Ginny, pointing her toes at the ceiling. “Who’s the new Defense professor, d’you think?”

“Isn’t Moody staying?” said Hermione curiously. “He’s easily the most qualified yet.”

“Can’t, he’s working full-time for the Order,” reported Harry, kicking his foot up on the desk. He had some sort of pathological aversion to sitting in chairs normally. “I voted to bring back Lupin, but he’s still wanted by the Ministry.”

“Hard to find good’uns who aren’t, these days,” added Ron.

“I’m worried about that,” Hermione said seriously. “We can’t afford a second-rate professor with the O.W.L.s are this year. Speaking of which: I was thinking about a study club—”

“No, no, and no,” said Ron, jabbing his finger at her, “and not until I set foot on the Hogwarts Express, Hermione, we have a policy for a reason.”

“Honestly—”

“Policy! Eep! Zip!”

Ginny peered at him. “What d’you care, Ronniekins? You don’t want to take most of the N.E.W.T.s, anyway.”

He groaned. “See, Hermione, and now we’re talking about it. This is what happens we don’t stick to the policy, is I have to go in and think about—”

“It’s a test, not a dementor!”

“—how hard I’ll get reamed when Mum sees my O.W.L.s. She’s counting on me to bring the family average up, after the twins. She’ll have to disinherit me to keep us over an E-median.”

“You’ll do fine in Defense, at least,” said Harry helpfully. “I think we went through most of the fifth year Defense curriculum, anyway, for the Tournament.”

Draco snorted. In point of fact, they'd gone through what Hermione Granger personally deemed the most useful parts of the fifth year Defense curriculum, because she'd known damn well Harry wouldn't read the textbook; but the claim was still fair.

An owl clattered at the window. Harry hurried to let it in. For reasons unclear, Ron broke out sniggering. Draco watched with some amusement as Harry tried to both shield his postage from view and throw the owl out at the same time, though it kept battering him for a treat.

"Harry, who's writing to you?" Hermione asked curiously.

"Nobody." His face was rosy. He stuffed the letter into his back pocket. The envelope was wondrous thick. His correspondent was apparently something of a novelist. "Friend from school."

"Friend from school?" crooned Ron. "Special friend?"

"You know what, Weasley, I reckon you're gonna get what's coming to you one of these days—"

"Bring it on, loverboy, I'm getting old!"

Hermione sighed. She turned to address Draco directly, as if her attention had a maturity threshold.

"It's Cho?"

"Obviously."

"I suppose it's nice of her to write, although, Harry, you really should be trying to limit your correspondence with people outside of the Order; you don't want to give away where you're staying, and if anyone has her owls followed, they could find you."

Harry broke off a bout of mild slap-boxing with Ron and sheepishly rubbed the back of his neck. "C'mon, it's Cho," he said defensively.

“She’s really cool, and she gets it, and everything. She doesn’t ask me to tell her anything that’s a secret. She’s not, you know, nosy.”

“Love is real, ladies and gents,” said Ginny dryly. “‘She’s not nosy.’ Potter, you casanova.”

She was oddly calm. From the quick interplay of nonverbal signals among the four that followed, it became clear that no one had expected this.

“Tell you one thing, though,” she said suddenly. “Go easy on her on the pitch, and you’re a dead man.”

Harry laughed in relief. “You’d better try out, to keep me straight.”

“Yeah? Deal.” She gave him a sunny smile, all teeth and freckles. “Better go practice, then. Don’t want anyone saying I got in off nepotism.”

She rolled to her feet and sauntered to the door, flicking a wave goodbye over her shoulder. “Catch you later, olds!”

“Bye,” Harry called, while Ron blew a raspberry at her.

Hermione discreetly put her hand to her temple, bracing her head on it, and slid her eyes to Draco. A twinge happened on his spine when she caught him staring. He flicked his gaze away, but soon returned it, because it seemed like she’d meant to tell him something, and it just felt — horrendously pedestrian, to care about looking or not looking, which meant precisely fat nothing, it was pedantry, it was soppy, it was jejune. But she was in front of the sun from the window, and it came around her like it was trying to take its time touching her, running its fingers through her hair, tracing the soft blade of skin under her jaw.

Then he caught her staring, probably because he’d started acting like he had the palsy. He scowled at her, and she recoiled. Turned back to Ron and Harry. That was great. Grand. Allowed him to rekindle his composure, that was something.

He was losing his mind. He wished she'd give it back already, it wasn't like she didn't have her own.

The dining room of Grimmauld Place was a lavish, gilded Fabergé egg of a thing. Bathed in natural light, stocked with buffet tables and candelabras and two fireplaces, tablecloths wholly spun from black Spanish lace, a table that sat forty, plus six chairs by the door for footmen, and crowning it all, over the hearth, a twelve-foot family portrait of the Blacks done by Hyacinthe Rigaud; at one time, it had been the thriving nexus of London social life, and engineered with the intention of leaving out absolutely nothing that one could want in a dining room; so naturally, the Order didn't use it.

What they did use was the servants' dining hall, a floor down and one flight of stairs closer to the kitchen, so that miscellaneous Weasleys could ferry trays of Molly's cooking out to the long shabby table between lanes of brown hutches, navigating by candlelight.

They were instructed to laden their plates in the steamy, copper-lined kitchen, where the more-than-slightly stressed Molly Weasley directed them to sample from various bubbling pots directly instead of waiting. "There isn't quite the room for it," she said apologetically, "with everyone coming, Mad-Eye's dropping in with Tonks, and your father's invited Kingsley and Bill—"

"Shacklebolt?" said Draco.

"No, dear, Bill Weasley," said Molly blithely, patting him on the shoulder, contributing to a growing suspicion that perhaps the twins hadn't gotten it from their father, after all.

A burst of voices heralded some newcomers, and then Sirius, Remus, and Mad-Eye Moody squeezed into the kitchen. Molly squeaked and hurried to hug Moody, who grumbled a plaintive:

“Constant vigilance, Molly,” but permitted her to kiss his cheek. Then he turned to Draco and demanded: “What were the names of the two Slytherins I brought with you to visit Albus Dumbledore?”

“Theodore Nott and Pansy Parkinson.”

Mad-Eye grunted and tucked away his wand. “Right you are. Good to see you alive, boy,” he said. “Still checking your corners?”

“Religiously, sir.”

The auror had recovered admirably from his bout with Sibelius Nott, with the exception of a silver eyepatch. It was unclear whether he retained the eye behind it, because he barked a greeting at the twins before they were remotely in view of the kitchen, and scared George into upsetting the soup tureen.

“Wotcher, Molly!”

And Draco went still.

But the woman who came in was so different he almost mistook her for someone else. Her cheekbones had softened, her jaw rounded out, and her hair was no longer Bellatrix’s wild snarl, but a pixie-cut shock of electric pink. When she spoke, a silver piercing flashed in the center of her tongue.

“Oh! Harry! Sorry about the confusion earlier. Couldn’t let on I’d met you, not in front of that Davis git. Had to make it seem like I drank the punch. And you lot! Glad to meet you! Here— do it properly, now —” She went around pumping everyone’s hands. “Nymphadora Tonks, pleasure! Friends call me Tonks, some call me Dora, only my mum uses the other. And you—” She turned to Draco, and hesitated. “Well, you call me what friends do. If it suits you.”

A faint challenge in it. He nodded stiffly.

“I’d heard about you,” she said. “Molly says you’re a Gryffindor, is that right?”

“Yes,” said Hermione, once his silence waxed awkward. “And you?”

“Nope! Hufflepuff,” she said, popping the -P. “But Gryffindor’s almost as good. Hey, you were almost the first Black not to make Slytherin! Save me and Lassie back here—”

“OI!”

“We’re a happy little club of trailblazers! Course, if you’d got Ravenclaw, we’d have a full set. Would’ve been dread boring, though.” She stuck her tongue out, good-naturedly.

Draco wet his lips. He kept hearing his mother’s voice flicker out of Tonks’s thick accent: a slightly heightened lift of a vowel, or a relish in the trill of a consonant.

“He speak English?” Tonks muttered to Hermione.

“Yeah, unfortunately,” said Ron. “Don’t tempt him. OW!”

“Enough!” cried Molly. “Everyone, out! Out there, there’s a perfectly good table!”

“Ah, but you’re in here, Molly,” said Arthur warmly, and came over to kiss her. Ginny bent and pretended to hurl.

“Alright! Well! Alright!” She was very red. “I’ll be out in a minute, you can all bother me then! Go!”

“Yes, ma’am. Oh, and I’ve brought Mundungus.”

“He’s very welcome, but tell him I counted the silverware before he arrived, thank you.”

The conversation moved away from them, and Tonks sucked air through her teeth, evaluating Draco with perhaps understandable concern.

“You’re Narcissa’s son, aren’t you?”

The obvious mistrust on Draco’s face must have been mistaken for an invitation to yes, please, keep talking. Tonks planted her arms akimbo and rocked on her heels in tense, restless movement. “Knew that, dunno why I asked. Mum, uh… She said she was sorry she didn’t go to the funeral.”

“Which?” he asked, frowning, because for a moment he’d forgotten. Then he twitched and went silent again.

“Your, uh...”

“My father.”

“Yup.”

“I understand.”

Her heels bounced. He tapped his foot.

“Was she really?”

“No,” Tonks admitted. “I don’t think so. Well. I think she was sorry she couldn’t see your mum, but she wasn’t sorry she wasn’t invited. I don’t think she… she never had much nice to say about Lord Malfoy.”

He couldn’t imagine what his father would have said about Andromeda Black, and still less about her half-blood daughter. Likely nothing. He wouldn’t have been caught in the same room to begin with.

“How much were you told about my family?”

“More than you were told about mine, I’ll bet,” she said. “Still not much. I didn’t know how old you were until I heard it from Molly you were in Ron’s year. It was a right shock to hear what happened with your Sorting. My mum didn’t believe it.”

“She knows about me?”

“Course she does. You’re a Malfoy, she’d know even if you weren’t her nephew. She still does read things, even if she doesn’t live with wizards anymore… And Sirius writes. I think they send letters sometimes, since he’s been out of Azkaban. Plus, earlier, at the Ministry, she, er…”

“She wasn’t pleased to see me.”

“No, but you can’t expect her to be, can you? She doesn’t know you from — anyway, she was sorry she couldn’t come tonight, but she wasn’t quite up to a party. Too many people, she said. And she doesn’t go into the Wizarding World very much anymore—”

“I imagine not.”

“—and it kind of freaked her out, seeing you. But she said if I saw you again, I should tell you—”

“Yes?”

“‘Blue isn’t your color.’”

He recoiled.

“Blue isn’t my color?”

“Yep. Washes you out.”

He stared at her in annoyed stupefaction. “Have you perhaps forgotten the part of the message including a greeting,” he said, “a courtesy, or any sort of account for the past fifteen years? A kind word, possibly? A notice of regret for a multi-decade length of absence?”

“Nope,” said Tonks. “Just to burn anything blue in your closet. Trust me, if you knew my mum, this wouldn’t be surprising.”

“But I don’t,” he said frostily. “I haven’t, you see. And being that I don’t often take counsel from people who are, in fact, strangers—”

“Yeah, but that’s not her fault. It’s not like she’s the one who wanted to leave.”

“She made a choice.”

“So did you!” Tonks said, incredulous. “The same choice, by the way —”

“Then she and I might understand each other better than you and I do,” he snapped. “Though we aren’t to know, because the idea of meeting me appears to exhaust her.”

“Mate. Cut her a break. This has stakes for her that it doesn’t for you.”

“Do not lecture me on stakes,” he said, with a tone the likes of which even his father might have admired. “My mother and I have risked everything—”

“I didn’t mean that. Not existential stakes, personal ones. There’s history here you don’t even know the beginning of.”

“What history? What happened between her and my mother? Tell me.”

Tonks shrugged.

“Tell me. It’s my birthright as much as yours.”

“Yeah?” she said, eyes glittering with mischief. “Riddle me this, brainiac: if the story’s your birthright, wouldn’t your mum have told you already?”

“Maybe she has,” he replied coolly. “Maybe I’m giving you the chance to correct the account. Maybe I’m interested in a second perspective.”

Tonks shrugged again. “Yeah, that’s fair,” she said. “Wish I could tell you, too. But you’d have to ask Mum, and from someone who’s tried it: good fucking luck.”

“You don’t know?”

“No, I don’t know what all went down between Baby Mum and her bitch sisters. You think that’s the kind of thing she loves to talk about? You couldn’t get my mum’s favorite flower out with the Cruciatus, if she’d made up her mind not to tell you. Course, you could say the same thing about me. And Sirius. You can’t get a secret out of a Black on pain of death, they’ll just keel over and die from pure spite.”

He let out a small, commiserating exhale through his teeth, because — well, there was a thought he’d had before.

“It’s not mine, either.”

“My mum doesn’t look back.”

“Neither does mine.”

Tonks’ mouth twitched. “See, I think we’re both lying,” she said. “I think your mum bluffs just like mine does, and it doesn’t fool her kid worth a damn.”

He resisted the questions that he wanted to ask, and would have asked, if he had the time and trust to pose them: What did our mothers do to each other? Do you know? Do they?

“An interesting counterfactual,” he said stiffly. “Tell Andromeda that my mother happens to like me in blue. And that I take my mother’s word in all things quite seriously.”

He moved past her into the dining room.

Cross-currents of conversation all drifted overhead, and he could rotate through them, like flipping channels on a radio:

“...interesting that you say so,” Kingsley was saying to Hermione, “because there’s been a bill for house-elf regulation stuck in committee for years, we just haven’t had the chance…”

“But can’t the Department of Magical Creatures do anything without the Wizengamot? Do you really need legislative oversight for every little thing?”

He laughed deeply. “Democracies tend to.”

“...dreadfully sorry, Bill, I’m sure it must be frustrating to be stuck with a novice on your team,” Molly said, heaping another baked potato on his plate. Bill gave an uncomfortable laugh.

“I mean, she’s not… she’s really talented, you have to give her that. It’s not her fault she drives me mental, she…”

“—so rude to you the last time we met, you should ask to transfer—”

“No… I’m sure she’ll get bored and leave by the end of the year, and then it’ll be the same again…”

Dinner was wiry coils of fusilli pasta with sautéed prawns the size of mice, roasted cherry tomatoes with their skins blackened and split like raisins, kalamata olives, and a thick, smooth, basil pomodoro sauce, potato skins fried to sunflower brown with liquid snowcaps of cheddar cheese, smoked bacon, and diced green onions, and baked potatoes crested with sour cream, fat rounds of rustic bread the color of coffee grounds, and frosted bottles of butterbeer that clinked pleasantly amongst the chattering and the laughter and the scrape of plates.

“...never a prefect myself… my Head of House said I lacked certain necessary qualities.”

“Like what?”

“Decorum,” said Tonks, “and a sense for when to keep my clothes on. Exact words.”

“Really!”

“Genetic problem,” said Sirius. “Really serious. And I would have made a wretched prefect, I spent too much time in detention with James. Lupin was our good boy.”

“Do stop. If Dumbledore hoped I would be able to control my friends, I need scarcely say that I failed dismally.”

“Thank God. Anyway, Ron, that’s all to say you shouldn’t feel down about it, and besides, I never would’ve made First Beater if I’d been prefect.”

“And I would have put years back on my life,” Remus murmured.

“You were on the team?” said Ron. “What did you fly?”

Sirius sat up, preening. “Nimbus Seven. Naught to seventy in ten seconds, snappy as hell. Problem is, the Nimbus model had this issue with countersteering, which is fine for a beater but won’t be for you, a keeper needs to be nailing his hairpins. Here’s what the Comet does better…”

Draco would have liked to know what it was the Comet did better, but as he reached for his glass, he caught a snare of Arthur’s conversation from the end of the table.

“...real shame, I’m sorry, but I think we killed it for you, Tonks.”

“Nah. He didn’t like me off the bat,” said Tonks, in low and unusually sober tones. “He could tell I wasn’t one of them… he asked a bunch of questions about my pedigree, and I couldn't answer them."

"What about Andromeda's contact?" grunted Mad-Eye.

"That's the only reason I got as far as an interview."

"So it's Plan B?"

"Later," whispered Tonks, and then tipped her head down the table. Then she turned to Draco, and winked at him.

Draco stiffened, ears warm, and swept his attention back to the other end, where Sirius and Remus were describing a mythically grand fifteenth birthday party. Before he could catch the thread of conversation, however, there came a tap on his shoulder.

It was Molly. As he turned she slid a pair of dessert plates in front of himself and Hermione.

"For you two," she whispered. "I'm sorry we didn't have a proper celebration — I thought it might make the other boys feel bad — but I didn't want either of you to think I'd forgotten."

Each plate held an enormous red velvet cupcake frosted with a dollop the size of a turnip. The letter 'P' was iced atop in swirling red buttercream and gold sprinkles.

"Congratulations, dears," she whispered.

"Thank you, Molly," said Hermione, all wobbly.

Speaking soon would be essential to avoiding unforgivable rudeness, but he simply couldn't find the words.

It occurred to him, with awful, cringing clarity, that he wasn't Molly's son. He was a random child who kept turning up on her doorstep, at her dinner table as one more hungry mouth among dozens. Not only that, but the fact he'd made prefect had taken a laurel away from her real son, who had no great richness of his own laurels to begin with — but if that had occurred to her, it was the furthest thing from her mind now, as she hurried to cut everyone rounds of lemon gateau.

“Rude,” said Hermione, elbowing him. He elbowed her back, but his mind was elsewhere.

“Pot, cauldron.”

“She was only trying to be nice. I’ll eat it, if you don’t want to.”

“No,” he said immediately, pulling his plate away. Given an inch, her sweet tooth would take continents. “It’s mine. You have your own.”

“Mine’s smaller than yours.”

“No, it isn’t!”

“It is. Yours has a hair in it, actually, I think. Let’s swap—”

Her spoon dive-bombed, and met the flat of his fork, a spar that devolved into a discreet wrestling match under the table. She ended up smudging frosting on his blue silk suit, and his cry of outrage was muffled by her yelp when he pinched her waist. She was wriggling around against his side and in the intense heat of combat he lost track of what anyone else was doing.

It seemed to be many a skirmish later that the plates were emptied, and the scrape of chairs declared the end of the meal. While wax sank from stubby candles, and the last dregs of butterbeer wine dwindled in their glasses, it was hard to miss Sirius rising from the end of the table and slipping out of the dining room, especially when he was soon followed by Arthur, Mad-Eye, Kingsley, and Tonks. Remus stayed, but as soon as he left the table to take his plate in, Ginny checked that the kitchen door was closed and then lurched over the table.

“C’mon,” she whispered. “I want to hear the news.”

“What?” said Hermione distractedly, licking a stripe of frosting from her hand. He lost the ability to hear what Ginny was saying.

“...catch them at it, but we’ve got to do it before Lupin comes back. Run!”

And then everyone was running, Ginny and Harry and Ron and Hermione, in a great quake of chairs and scrambling footsteps, for reasons unfathomable, but he wasn’t about to be sat there languishing his own idiocy while they did, so he threw back his chair and stalked after them. At the foot of the staircase Ginny mashed her finger to her lips and crept up the side on tiptoe to avoid creaking, sneaking past the veiled Walburga, and on the second floor she beckoned Harry to help her shove aside a large cabinet of expensive porcelain. Two pieces of Draco’s birthright tipped over and cracked.

Behind it hid a thin door, too narrow to fit any of them front-on, and it swung forth to reveal an equally narrow servant’s passage running between rooms. The walls were unfinished wood and snowy with what was probably asbestos. Ginny plunged in without reservation, followed by Harry, Ron, and Hermione, while Draco took a moment of silence for his father’s suit. Then he clambered in and closed the door behind him.

In the creaking, drafty darkness, it smelled thickly of sawdust and varnish. Voices wobbled through the thin walls, growing louder the farther they plunged into the passage, resolving gradually into full sentences:

“...ask Dumbledore, first.”

“That isn’t wise.” Kingsley’s voice was unmistakably deep. “We’re to minimize contact, remember? He’s under Ministry surveillance.”

“He’s also our leader.” That was Bill. “You have to admit, some help would be nice.”

“Information makes you dangerous.” It was Mad-Eye’s hushed growl. “No one can compromise everyone. That’s Dumbledore’s way, and it’s for our safety.”

“Fine. My point is, Dumbledore is on the Wizengamot, so he must have permissions—”

“Not for long.”

“What do you mean?” Sirius demanded. “What’s happening to him?”

“Polls say we’re going to lose about ten seats in the next election,” said Kingsley. “We aren’t going to put him up.”

Exclamations abounded. Hermione hitched a breath, though Draco didn’t consider this half as grim as some of the other things he’d heard today.

“Do you think it was my idea?” Kingsley was measured, but firm. “He flipped on the Umbridge bill. I’m glad he did it, if it helped Potter, and I understand that he’s never been playing for the same reasons as the rest of us, but there are a lot of people in my party he didn’t consult, and who wouldn’t have agreed to it if he did. He’s not a politician, he’s a chessmaster.”

“Make your point,” said Bill.

“Fine. Is it not obvious? He’s not a team player. My party doesn’t like him. And I’m tired of running around apologizing for him every time he sneaks off and strikes a deal without asking us.”

“Respectfully, fuck your party,” said Sirius pleasantly. “For one, the Wizengamot’s been a joke since Runcorn’s election. For two, Dumbledore represents the Order. He represents everything that stands against the Ministry. Boot him and it’s a declaration against us. Boot him and he looks weak, unsupported. Here’s an idea: why don’t you do your job, and get your party in order, instead of firing the one man who might be able to prevent another war?”

“Much as I appreciate instruction on how to run an office I’ve had for ten years from a man who spent seven of that in prison,” said Kingsley, with a glassy, pleasant baritone that conjured images of interminable committee meetings, “I would ask for some grace. Do you really imagine I’d do this if Dumbledore hadn’t already told me to?”

There was a beat.

“Well, there’s the second piece of shit news in two hours,” said Tonks, bleakly. “Because I botched the interview. So I can’t get us into the Department. Sorry.”

“Not your fault.”

“Happens to the best of us.”

“Besides, I couldn’t swing it, either.”

“Yeah, but you’re in Muggle Artifacts. It’s not your fault you don’t have platinum clearance.”

Hermione mouthed something more insistently.

“Doesn’t matter. We all knew we’d probably end up at Plan B, we said so when we started.”

“I’m still not convinced we’re out of luck on Plan A,” remarked Bill. “Seven grown wizards at a table, and none of us know someone with a badge? Mum, Dad, I can’t believe Mad-Eye’s the only auror you know.”

“They cleaned us out after the war.” Mad-Eye was gravelly. “That department’s a ghost town for Order members, lad, you don’t want to know the kind of people they’ve got in it.”

“What about admins, then? Not everyone with clearance is a cowboy or a spy.”

“Arthur,” said Sirius, “didn’t you say one of your sons was at the Ministry? What’s his name — the one who’s not around much? Peter? Perry?”

“Percy,” said Molly.

“Percy! Can we try Percy?”

“No,” said Arthur.

“...No?”

“No.”

A long beat. Draco shifted. His muscles burned from bracing himself up against the wall.

“Alright,” said Sirius. “Er — seriously, who here is friends with nerds? Does no one know a single bureaucrat?”

“That Malfoy boy probably does.”

Surprise forked up his spine at the sound of his name.

Mad-Eye croaked, “Putting it out there. If we’re talking freely.”

“Not that freely,” Arthur snapped. “We’ve had this argument. I’m sick of it, to tell you the truth.”

“They’ve already faced Death Eaters—”

“And you’ll go through me before you send them to do it again. They’re my children.”

“Not all of them.”

“Yes, all of them!” cried Arthur. “Those children came to us in the faith that they would be protected, that they would be taken care of —”

“They have fathers, Arthur! Mind your own children, they’re your lookout—”

“Their fathers can’t be here to fight for them, so you’ll deal with me!” roared Arthur. “Every child that needs me is my lookout! Every one! A father has a duty of care!”

There was a creak of furniture, a rearrangement of chairs.

“Let’s table the question of fighting,” said Sirius. “For now. I agree, fifteen is… fifteen’s quite young. But that’s not the only thing they can do. For instance, I think Harry should be let in on these meetings.” He cleared his throat. “As Harry’s godfather, I know that’s what James would have wanted.”

Molly gave a loud snort.

“I — sorry. Molly?”

“Nothing,” she said tartly. “I’m sorry, but it’s just— if you think for one moment that James would have let his son within a league of the Order, then you’ve forgotten him.”

Hermione winced. Harry was scowling.

“I’ve forgotten nothing,” said Sirius, with soft venom. “Harry brought it up with me the other day. Actually.”

“Of course he did.”

“What does that mean?”

“Nothing!”

“It’s not nothing, spit it out. You think I’m lying?”

“No! But honestly, of course he’s asking about the Order; I’m surprised it took him this long, with you carting him around everywhere like a pet—”

“I do not cart—”

“You do, you hardly let the boy alone! He’s not had a minute all summer without you filling his head with stories about the Marauders’ glory days! Half of which involve you all almost getting yourselves killed! What is he supposed to take away from that?”

“Because those were the only days his father had!” Sirius bellowed. “The glory days! That was his life, and Harry has a right to know about it! He has a right to know who his father was! And James has — had — would have had a right to tell him those stories!”

“Don’t pretend this is about James!”

“Of course it’s about James! Who the hell else would it be about?”

“Harry!”

“Both of you, pipe down. The boy is James Potter’s son,” said Mad-Eye. “If he’s got a savior complex, we all know damn well it doesn’t come from Black.”

“Thank you,” snapped Sirius.

There was a pause.

“Maybe not!” said Molly brightly. “Maybe not. But I happen to remember both James and Lily voted against recruiting children.”

“They were hardly more than children themselves. Sixteen years old, was Evans, when she signed on with me.”

“And I hope Harry can forgive you for that, Alastor, I really do.”

What ensued was like the moment before a falling glass struck the ground: that taut, quivering heartbeat before cacophony.

Hermione took a sharp breath. Draco’s stomach was trying to pulverize itself, and he was only eavesdropping. He couldn’t imagine what it must have felt like inside the room.

He couldn’t see Harry’s face. He didn’t want to.

There was a screech of chairs.

“Molly—”

“None of you have children. None,” she said. “None of you understand what you’re asking.”

A flurry of footsteps.

“Mum.”

“Molly, dear, it’s alright.”

Hermione stared at Draco in consternation. Her knuckles pressed tight to her mouth.

She whispered, “Do you—”

The door opened.

Light flooded the servants’ passage, followed by a man’s long shadow. Draco slowly stood up, blinking away blindness.

“My goodness,” said Remus. “And here I was worried I’d bored you.”

After three unconvincing denials, two suspiciously intricate excuses, and one beast of a chewing-out in tones paternal and length unbearable, they withdrew downstairs to make their goodbyes.

“So,” said Ron, “they’re up to something, for sure, then.”

“It’s something at the Ministry,” murmured Harry, leaning in and glancing over his shoulder, to check for Remus. “I’ve heard them talking about it before. Tonks was just the last part of it, they're trying to break in. Can't tell what they want or why, though."

"Might be the auror office? Doesn't make sense, though, Mad-Eye worked there for years… why break in now…"

"Or the Department of Mysteries," said Hermione, nibbling her thumb. Ron broke off.

"Well — cheers," he said, bemused. "How'd you come up with that?"

"Whatever they want requires platinum clearance," she murmured. "That's the highest level. Reserved for high-ranking aurors, political leaders, and Unspeakables. And Tonks said she was sorry she couldn't get them 'into the Department,' so it's either the Department of Mysteries, or another one that's very classified."

"That's correct," said Draco, mildly impressed. "Of course, it could be something else, you know. Information, or something from the Minister's desk. The Department of Magical Law Enforcement, for example."

"But you don't need platinum clearance to get into the Department of Magical Law Enforcement."

"Some branches."

"That still doesn't explain—"

"Found it!" Remus called, strolling back in with a gilded goblet. He found them in a state of suspicious silence and attentiveness. His eyes narrowed.

"To refresh your memory, I grew up sleeping two beds down from Sirius Black and James Potter," he said. "You must understand that I know what it sounds like when people are scheming."

"We're not scheming," said Harry, which was a promising start that he ruined with: "We're talking about— stuff."

“Yes,” said Hermione fatalistically.

“Yeah,” said Ron loyally, with heart.

Remus’s eyebrows entreated them to stop digging. He folded his arms and pressed his lips together, losing pathetically in his wrestle with a smile.

The scorch of paternal exasperation was starting to leave a char on Draco’s pride. It called for diversionary measures. There came a time in every man’s life when it became necessary to make hard calls, and do what must be done.

He pointed at Harry.

“Potter has a girlfriend.”

“Fuck OFF!” exclaimed Harry, as Remus burst into laughter that shook the whole house.

“You’re getting to that age, I s’pose — ha — I’m sorry you didn’t feel you could tell us—”

“I didn’t feel like telling ANYBODY,” said Harry, loudly, “and I still don’t! Because my life is full of GITS and RATS!”

It was, and Draco was amused that it had taken this long to notice; but it also successfully distracted Remus. He deposited the Floo pot and wandered off, chuckling to himself.

“Great,” Harry snapped, once he was gone. “Now I’ve got to go tell Sirius, because if he hears it from Remus, I’ll never live it down. Thanks a lot.”

“You’re welcome,” said Draco, quite sincerely pleased with himself. Remus’s laughter was still echoing from the foyer.

After allowing him a bit more disconsolate muttering, Hermione cleared her throat, and conscripted Harry into a bruising hug goodbye. Harry acquiesced with grace and a softened expression.

She stepped back, brushing herself off, and gave him a small smirk. “Try not to get arrested again, Harry. I know it’s just a few days, but you can do it.”

“Thanks, Hermione. And thanks, Draco, for the lawyer. And for coming.”

“See Granger,” he said. “Except for the bit about believing in you; my over-under is forty-eight hours.”

“You know, from you, that’s really sweet.”

They retreated to the Floo grate, stacking wood together to make a fire — doing it the muggle way, by necessity, and so involving several heated debates between Harry and Hermione about kindling formation — and in the middle of their work, someone hollered Harry’s name. Grumbling at Draco in particular, he left in a hurry, and Draco, Hermione, and Ron finished preparing the grate.

Ron muttered, “Are you lot… alright, you know? With… everything?”

Draco, who had been massaging his temple in anticipation of another threat to Harry’s life, was pleasantly surprised and flattered by Ron’s question. Hermione picked at her fingers, apparently unable to answer it.

“What?” she said, in a steady, if high-pitched voice. “Me? I’m fine.”

“Yeah,” he said, “but with Viktor, and the summer, and everything. That muggle doctor. He help any?”

She gave an unconvincing smile. “I’m fine,” she said. “I’ll be fine. Don’t you worry about me.”

“Fat chance of that.” Ron turned to Draco. “What about you?”

“Exhausted, thanks for asking,” he said immediately. “Besides which, my knees hurt, I’ve a stress headache, two blisters, and a splinter.”

“Don’t care, take it like a man,” said Ron. Then, lower: “But seriously.”

He contemplated what to say to this. Finally, he settled on: “I’ve been worse.”

Ron nodded and brushed himself off, adopting a tone of brittle confidence. “Great,” he announced. “None of us can lie for shit. Good to know.”

-Reports of my death have been greatly exaggerated.

-Okay. If I told you, you wouldn't believe me, so... thanks for the well-wishes. I really appreciated them. You are the sweetest, kindest people, and I can't tell you how many times over I would have lost faith if not for your support. This is a group project, seriously.

-I'm alive(!), more so than I have been, and I'm back in a place where I can post. I, uh, would like to promise that it won't happen again? But for health reasons I can't necessarily do that, so instead I'll say: I'm not dead! And I have invested simply way too much time into this story to abandon it. Can't keep a bad dog down, and all that.

-This version of the Wizengamot is a representative body that’s roughly adapted from the way proportional representation works in the U.K. Basically, the Wizengamot system is that each party runs on a single ticket, and then gets a number of seats proportionate to their vote. Because wizards are so geographically diffuse, it didn’t make sense to me for them to have single-member districts, since nowhere would be concentrated enough to really have common interests; instead, I think they’d run a full vote for the country, and just have representatives from the party choose amongst themselves who sits the Wizengamot. This also explains why someone with a lot of notoriety, like Dumbledore, could maintain a seat for a long time (the duration of the original series) while other members come and go.

-Thank you, Gatz Nation, for continuing to make me happy.

-All you fans of Kreacher out there, don’t worry: I haven’t forgotten him.

-Hey. Don’t worry about it.

-Next chapter: "Rumors on the Hogwarts Express."

Rumors on the Hogwarts Express

Chapter 60: Rumors on the Hogwarts Express

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

There were patrolmen at King’s Cross that year.

They nodded subtly to Narcissa as she swept past with Draco; Hermione had disappeared somewhere to bid her parents goodbye and pick up Crookshanks and Thucydides.

The patrolmen rankled in the same way it might to find a new lock on the door of a childhood bedroom. He touched his wand and thought with tense anticipation of the moment when he would be permitted to use it again. It wasn’t right, depriving people of magic. He wasn’t safe without it. He couldn’t conceive of how muggles ever felt safe at all.

“It was a good summer.”

She daubed her cheek. He averted his face.

“Don’t say that,” she said. “It makes it sound so final. It’s so hot out today. Doesn’t it feel like summer still?”

It was the first of September; it did not. There were students flocking to the train, and the trundle of trunks over flagstones, and the screech of owls less well-bred than Ulysses rattling their cages. That was the sound of autumn, for him. It was the start of something, not an end.

“It’s hot,” he admitted, stiffly.

“No, then. That’s alright. Did you have a good time, at least? Being home?”

“I did.”

“And you’ll remember what you learned this summer? Your form? Try to practice, while you’re there. Hogwarts has a Dueling Club, or at least it used to. Not sure if it’s worth anything, now.”

“I doubt I’ll find many opponents like what I’m used to, but I’ll do my best.”

She kissed his cheeks and scraped her tears off with her handkerchief, with ungentle dignity.

“In truth,” she said, “I hate this dismal train station. I always did.” Then: “I’m very silly today. Forgive me, it’s the smoke inhalation.”

“That’s alright.”

Who is Nymphadora Tonks? Did you know Andromeda had children? Are there others? How many people have you hidden from me? What is the nature of your problem with Hermione Granger?

He held the words heavily on his tongue. The engine screeched, and they melted away, timed out, conceived too late, held back too long. They tasted like smoke in the back of his throat.

“Goodbye, darling.”

“See you at Christmas.”

He kissed her cheek and boarded the train.

Each year it became a greater relief to board the Express, which brought with it the permission to use magic, and he drew his robes over his jumper with the satisfaction of one donning a crown. Here, as nowhere else, he was in control, and the trivialities of patrolmen and aurors and Ministry intrigues faded with the squeal of the train’s wheels, slipping into the corner of the windows, and then, gratefully, out of sight. With the rushing motion of the train he could imagine he was headed towards anything; so long as he was moving, he was safe.

He straightened the cuff of his robe and adjusted his prefect badge. It gleamed subtly on his breast pocket, several inches starboard of a perfect red Windsor, like the swell of a rosebud. His collar folded like a bit of ivory stationery, almost glowing against the layers of his black cashmere jumper and silk robe. In a rare groundswell of partisan spirit, he had indulged in a dark crimson pocket square. One had to set an example for the firsties.

He drew his wand and cast Verdimillious. Red sparks fountained. Magic ran up his arm like the waters of a warm bath.

Much settled, he replaced it at his hip, and went to find the prefect carriage.

Children raced up and down the aisles, screaming. They were much smaller than they had been last year; it was concerning that Britain's eleven-year-olds were growing so short. One of Fred and George's trademark fireworks went up in a carriage near the caboose, and screams of delight mingled with the harried bellowing of the trolley woman. Neville hurtled past, holding a bulbous plant that sneezed ink in his face when jostled, and Draco sidestepped him neatly to avoid receiving an ink relief of Neville's features on the front of his shirt. He beamed.

"Hullo, Malfoy! Congrats on making prefect, I always knew you'd get it!"

"Afternoon, Longbottom. Cheers. Watch that plant."

"Trying to!" called Neville, backpedaling down the aisle, only to promptly trip over Colin Creevey, stumble, fumble for the pot, and pitch it forthwith into the face of the poor Ravenclaw who'd opened her carriage door, mistaking the commotion for the trolley.

Further down, Seamus Finnigan was blasting music from his compartment at a volume that could only be described as antagonistic to the eardrum-wielding community, smeary guitars that rattled the windows, drums that sounded like someone broadcasting their pulse during a heart attack. Seamus himself had shaved his head and procured an earring, which gave him a daring edge, especially sitting with the bookish Dean Thomas, though he fit right in with the silver-studded and undercut-sporting Katie Bell. All of them seemed to be enjoying their acute hearing loss.

“AY! MALFOY! LOOKING FIT! WHAT’S THE CRAIC? GOOD BREAK?”

Draco opened his mouth, reconsidered, and nodded.

“LEEFS. HAVE YOU HEARD THESE GUYS, RAGE? GREAT, AREN’T THEY?”

He extended a hand, palm-down, and lowered it an inch.

“AW, PISS! SOMEONE COMPLAINED?”

He tapped his badge.

“NAW! REALLY, MATE? HAVE A HEART— ALRIGHT, ALRIGHT,” said Seamus hastily, when Draco raised an eyebrow. “WE’RE TURNING IT DOWN.”

He nodded and continued on his way, though the music resumed once he was far enough that it wasn’t worth the bother to return. Fair enough.

Lavender and Parvati shared a compartment with Romilda Vane and a few Ravenclaw girls near the front, their uniforms offering all sorts of pleasant reasons for citation. Parvati had tied her shirt under her ribs like a bandeau, Romilda sported a pair of knee-high boots instead of flats, and Lavender appeared to be experimenting with the definition of ‘skirt.’

They all stopped talking when he came into the doorway. Lavender seized Parvati's arm.

"Hello, Draco," she said. Her voice had dropped over the summer, and was slightly raspy. Perhaps she'd had a head cold.

"Brown. Patil. Vane." He inclined his head. "I presume you're going to change before we get to school."

"You don't like it? I thought it was fetching." Lavender beamed and plucked at her skirt, which was a dangerous game and he respected her nerve for it, but he still straightened up and lifted his eyes to the window.

"No comment. Regulation is knee length. You've got until we arrive, and then it's house points."

"Dra- cooooo. C'mooooooon."

"Put those vowels back where you found them. Points or a detention, all of you. It's your call."

"Oh, I wouldn't mind a detention," said Parvati. Lavender smacked her thigh, and she giggled.

"You're such a tyrant," said Romilda, flopping sideways on the seat. Her black hair spilled lazily across the tartan. "So Draco -nian. Be nice!"

"Not my forte," he told her. "You, too, with the boots. I'll be checking when we disembark."

"Promise?" she called after him. He walked away from their compartment, feeling somewhat embarrassed for no particular reason, especially when a rash of giggling broke out in his wake.

The prefect carriage was actually had no compartments at all, but was a long, cheerful, well-lit room like a dining car, paneled in rich mahogany, with frilled lace curtains, white tablecloths, and deep, plush seats, like someone had welded together several deep armchairs. A flotilla of glasses and silverware decorated each table, with tea settings and candles, and in general it was much more suitable for transport than the compartments had been; Draco would've liked to travel this way every year.

And at the head of the car, fiddling with a stack of index cards, was the svelte, tall, and ungraciously handsome Cedric Diggory, whose prefect badge was missing: it had been replaced by a shiny brass square that read 'HEAD BOY.'

"Afternoon, Malfoy," he called brightly. That he remembered Draco's name was a small marvel, since they'd interacted perhaps once, and it hadn't quite been the summit of his conversational career. "Help finding your place? I, er… took the liberty of a seating arrangement. Not mandatory, of course."

Cedric was very nervous. Anyone less familiar with the immense social weight of a seating arrangement might have failed to sympathize, but Draco, who had seen more than one party dissolve into bedlam for a failure to consider table placement, thought his fears were well-merited. He contributed his share to peace and tranquility by finding his seat at a table with Hannah Abbott — round face, dirt blond, fidgety — and two boys. One had a pouf of dust-brown curls and eyebrows thick as quills. He was opposite a dark, willowy boy with particularly striking hazel eyes, ringed with kohl, veins of glitter on his cheekbones, and a Slytherin tie.

"Blaise?"

"Draco," he said cheerfully, extending his hand, palm-down, like a queen sanctioning tribute. "I say, you have grown up."

He sat down, relief commingled with frustration. Theo was the clearer candidate for Slytherin prefect, by marks; but of course, he hadn't been seen since June, and of course, there was the matter of his participation in the events of last spring.

He didn’t even know if Theo meant to return to Hogwarts. He hadn’t been arraigned for anything, but with his father in Azkaban, what did he stand to gain from being at school? It might serve his purposes to pursue another kind of education.

“Congratulations on surprising nobody, dear chap,” drawled Blaise. “I think my own accomplishment is much more remarkable; I think Snape forgot to pick prefects, and circled the last name on the roster at random. Still! Take the money and run, as is my family motto, and so here I am. Tracey’s thrilled; she’s my counterpart from Venus. We’ve made a bet for who can sleep with Diggory before the year’s out. Buy-in’s fifteen galleons, if you’re interested.”

Hannah squeaked.

Draco, who was rather flustered by all of this, wordlessly began fixing himself a cup of tea.

“Like you’d have a chance,” laughed the other boy. He turned to Draco and stuck out his hand, which Draco shook with some reluctance, considering the volume of ink on it. “Anthony Goldstein. Ravenclaw.”

“Draco Malfoy.”

“Oh, I know that,” he said, grinning. “Ernie’s in conniptions about your Potions final, you know. How’d you even score over one hundred? Did you bribe him?”

The suggestion was issued mildly, in jest, but Draco still prickled at the faint probing underneath it.

“There are two versions of a Calming Draught. I had extra time, so I wrote it in.”

“You had extra time?” Hannah repeated faintly. “On Snape’s final? I didn’t even finish it.”

“Most people didn’t,” said Anthony. “The cutoff for an O was eighty-five percent.”

He disliked the boy’s knowing smile; Ravenclaws were such insufferably smug twits, each to each.

The door rattled. Hermione came in with Ernie Macmillan and Padma Patil, who joined her at what must have been the most concentrated swot-per-table arrangement since the Hogwarts Founding Committee.

“Now we’re all here, we can get started,” said Cedric. The girl to his right, a Ravenclaw seventh year with a chocolate brown bob, clinked her spoon against her glass. “I’ll try to be quick, I know you’ve all got lots of better things to do than listen to me go on. Er — welcome! Hello!” He spread his hands, beaming. “I’m Cedric Diggory—”

There was a hearty commotion of applause from the Hufflepuffs; Hannah Abbott applauded like it was live Puccini. Draco tapped his finger on the tablecloth.

Hermione politely applauded and then returned to her journal, annotating busily. Draco’s mouth quirked.

Cedric flicked through to another card, cleared his throat, and began again.

“Er… curfews! Yes! All of you have a curfew extension to midnight—”

One of the older Gryffindors gave a hearty whoop. Several others joined in, jeering.

“—which is — John, please,” said Cedric, helplessly smiling. “In exchange for that, you’ll be spending several nights a week helping Filch enforce the curfew. This year, Fidelia and I have decided you’ll be patrolling in pairs, both for your safety and the students’. We’ve drawn up a tentative schedule giving everyone two rounds a week; if you don’t like your partner, or don’t feel comfortable patrolling with them, please do come see me, and I’ll make arrangements for you.”

Draco didn’t listen to the following lecture from Fidelia Jones, which was dry and formalistic and interrupted by periodic rowdiness from the older students, who seemed to find the whole ordeal childishly entertaining.

There was a lunch of bresse duck in a red wine sauce, an apple pecan salad, and baked marigold tarts with fresh cherries. Afternoon shadows lengthened on the floor. Blaise and Hannah fell into a wide-ranging discussion of their families’ occupations, Hannah’s being well-respected philanthropists with considerable money in broomstick making, and Blaise’s fortune coming largely from his late father’s Italian dukedom.

Hermione was chatting with Ernie Macmillan, apparently with great vigor, and from the few snippets he overheard it was about O.W.L. study regimens. Ernie’s nods grew increasingly fervent as she kept speaking. Someone really ought to separate them, or they would forget to disembark from the train.

“...Malfoy? Malfoy. I’m a beautiful man, Malfoy, it shouldn’t be this hard for me to get anyone’s attention.”

“What?” he snapped.

“Diggory passed out the patrol schedule,” said Blaise, tossing a scroll of parchment at him. “I was going to say cheers, we’ve got Tuesdays together, but now I’m worried you’re partially deaf.”

If it was an intriguing possibility — being out of doors, after dark, with no one around to stop you from doing anything you pleased — in a castle full of archives and passageways, with a map that told you exactly where all the best and most secret ones were hidden — then he kept it to himself, and firmly cordoned off the parts of his imagination that liked to wander.

“...hope his mother’s alright, dreadful thing to happen, too…”

Draco tilted his head, inclining his ear to the conversation without raising his eyes.

“Did they catch who did it?”

“No. Three aurors in the hospital, too. That’s what you get for letting bilge have clearance.”

It was a sixth year Slytherin prefect, the girl, someone with dark braids and a stained red lip. A Rosier, possibly. She was smoking something that gave off faint puffs of blue smoke and hid it whenever Cedric came by, sending conspiratorial smirks to the sneering Hufflepuff sixth year beside her.

“Three aurors must have taken some doing,” said the Hufflepuff, taking a drag from her smoke.

“Oh, yes. There’s a whole cell of them on the inside, Mum said. It’s a proper organization.” Rosier flicked some ash into her tea, and it spun there, a gray knot dissolving in the milky brown. “The terrorists. They call themselves the Order of the Phoenix. And their leader is an utter beast. Six feet tall, black hair, tattoos—”

“He flies into battle on a hippogriff,” added the Ravenclaw. “That’s what I heard, anyway.”

“And that’s without his pet werewolf,” said the Hufflepuff eagerly, “don’t forget him — my mum says he eats people. ”

“Pet werewolf?” said Draco lightly. “You’ll forgive me if I don’t believe you.”

“I would,” agreed the Slytherin, smirking. “But he’s real, trust me. My mum says she’s seen the dossier.” She leaned in, and her grin widened. “His name’s Sirius Black.”

“Granger. I need a word.”

He took her elbow and dragged her out of conversation with Ernie Macmillan, who watched them go with an expression that was entirely too knowing for Draco’s tastes, but he would deal with that later. Smug gits, each to each.

He pulled her along and tugged her into an empty compartment, checked the hallway, and then locked the doors.

“What is it?” she demanded, as soon as the lock clicked. “Are you alright? What’s so urgent? I was finally getting to a point there.”

“We’ve a security problem,” he said flatly, turning his back on the door. “The Order has a mole.”

Her irritation fell away, slipping seamlessly into clean, businesslike intensity. “How do you know?”

“Because I was just in the prefects’ meeting, and Whatshername Rosier knows that Padfoot and Moony are Order members. She claims she saw Padfoot’s Ministry dossier. And she’s not the only one. There were three or four of them, purebloods or children of Ministry workers, all gossiping about it.”

Her brow creased. “Well, that doesn’t prove anything,” she said doubtfully, folding her arms. “That’s a rumor. They’re children.”

“Children repeating what their parents have told them, and that’s a highly specific rumor, wouldn’t you say? Which just so happens to intersect with the truth?”

“Yes, but— I don’t know how they could possibly know that.” She started to pace. “Padfoot hasn’t left Grim— ‘his house,’” she corrected, “in months. He doesn’t run missions. He doesn’t leave at all. There’s no way the Ministry could know he’s affiliated, except—”

He watched her make the same conclusion he did. It took her about four seconds less time than it had taken him; she screwed up her face and rubbed her forehead, grimacing. It was gratifying, in the distant part of his brain that wasn't occupied with worry.

"Unless there's a mole. Or it's a very, very lucky guess."

"Quite."

"But who?"

"I don't know. With the exceptions of Lupin, Black, and select Weasleys, everyone under that roof are strangers to me. That was the first time I'd even met Nymphadora Tonks."

Hermione gave him a lingering sidelong look of sympathy and strange, vicarious pain.

"Really?" she said, not quite surprised. "Because her mother was disinherited?"

"I — yes, she was. How do you know that?"

"You told me in second year. Aunt Andy, wasn't it? Or Andrea, something like that?"

"Andromeda. You remembered?"

"Of course I did, you told me," she said absently. "Anyway, I don't know where to start. We can obviously trust Ron's family, Sirius, Remus… he'd never…"

"'He'd never' is not an actual reason, it's worth saying."

"I'd be far more willing to believe it's someone like Shacklebolt, or even Tonks — I like her, but I don't know her. Ron said she's one of the only Order members who wasn't part of the old guard, and apparently, the only reason Dumbledore let her in was because Bill vouched for her."

“Do we trust Bill’s judgment?”

“I’d like to, but I don’t really know Bill, either,” she pointed out. “Ron would obviously say yes—”

“Which means nothing, considering it’s his brother.”

“It doesn’t mean nothing , it means less. And Bill’s inside-track on planning with Mad-Eye, so I’d say Ron’s well within his rights… anyway, being brothers didn’t stop him and Percy…” She snapped her fingers. “How much do you think Percy knows about what his family’s doing?”

He cocked his head, considering. “Interesting,” he said. “I don’t know. Very little, one assumes.”

“Because if he knows anything — if he’s still in contact with any of them — one conversation, you know, it wouldn’t take much—”

“A stray line in a letter.”

“Yes. Someone mentions Padfoot, and Grimmauld Place, and I’m sure he could put two and two together, Percy’s actually quite clever. Ron said he’d been out of touch since May, but he still could have been writing Molly, or Charlie, or even Bill.”

She hesitated, frowning. The rattling traincar voiced a groan at the severity of the accusation. A wooded hillside flashed past in the window, dull and shrouded in mist.

“I don’t know,” she said doubtfully. “Do you… think he would?”

He tipped his head one way, then the other, considering.

“Yes.”

“Really? You think he’s capable?”

“I think some people are capable of anything, if it serves them. If it helps them get what they want, it’s hard to care about anything else.”

“He didn’t sound like someone who stopped caring,” she said doubtfully.

“Are we recalling the same occasion? He shouted himself hoarse on the Atrium floor. And then Ronald socked him.”

“And after that, you really think they don’t love each other?” she said absently, disarming him.

“I wouldn’t know,” he said, after a moment. “I haven’t any brothers.”

“Neither do I, but come on. You can see it from a mile off when Ron loves someone, he’s subtle like a mallet is. Look at how he is with the twins, or Ginny, or Harry.”

“Or you."

“What?”

“You’re in the same cohort,” he clarified, though her eyes had gone wide and it made something sharp twinge in his chest. “You can’t possibly doubt that. After all this time.”

“I don’t… I mean, no, and yes, I understand what you meant. But it’s different, with me.”

He didn’t like this direction at all. With vague foreboding, he asked: “In what respect?”

“Oh. I mean it’s not like it is, with Harry. They’ve always been dependent on each other. Ron adopted Harry as soon as he put eyes on him, and they didn’t even like me when they met me.”

Her voice carried a flash of something real and raw and not-quite-scarred over.

“A misjudgment soon corrected, as I recall.”

She smiled wryly. “You know, I don't think Ron more than tolerated me until third year,” she said. “I thought he saw me as Harry’s friend that he happened to get along with.”

He lifted his eyebrows. “And you did his Transfiguration homework anyway?”

“Of course I did. That was the whole point. They needed me because I was clever, and to do homework and tell them when a test’s coming up, and et cetera... I know better now, obviously, but it wasn't always obvious.”

Her eyes were too bright, and her arms were folded in a brittle way she was trying to hide in her robes. He wanted to grasp her shoulders and shake her until she broke out of it and relaxed again, scratch the last five minutes from the record, backtrack downstairs and restart the conversation all over again.

“First years are intolerable as a rule,” he remarked. “It takes at least a year for wizards to become people worth knowing, and anyone who likes someone before knowing them is a fool.”

“You didn’t like me very much when we met, either,” she replied, and it was both rueful and curious.

“Well, I certainly didn’t come around to it because you did my homework. Anyway, you spent our first year yelling yourself hoarse at them every time they lost house points, I didn’t think you cared whether they liked you.”

The corner of her mouth bent at a wry, crooked angle, and she cut her eyes sideways. She leaned against the stone wall and folded her hands behind her back, ironing them flat against the base of her spine. “I did,” she said. “I still wanted to be liked. I was just scared.”

“Of what?”

“Everything! I spent most of first year thinking there’d been a mix-up, and someone was going to send me home,” she said wryly. “Normal girls don’t get to run away and live in a magical castle. We don’t get to cast spells and fly on broomsticks—”

“Right, and you still don’t do one of those things.”

“Shut up. I was eleven. I had to get three letters and an in-person visit from Professor McGonagall just to convince my parents it wasn’t a scam. And so I yelled at them, first, because sometimes they did deserve it, and second, because I was stupid and panicky and homesick and cried every other night. I was sleep-deprived all the time, no wonder I was horrid.”

“Was?”

“If we’re talking about who was horrid in first year,” she said warningly. He snorted and looked away, let the point drift, and she quirked her mouth and didn’t chase it. She knew not to chase it.

Hermione was terribly vexing, this way. Sometimes talking to her was like flying in the rain, dangerous and confusing and fraught with dangers you couldn’t see until they had hurt you; and sometimes it was the easiest thing in the world, running or blinking or breathing, a game he’d been born knowing the rules to. If it could just be like this all the time, he’d — he’d probably never want to talk to anyone else.

“You never told me that. About the crying.”

“Of course I didn’t. I wasn’t going to admit any of this to you, of all people.”

“What's that supposed mean, ‘of all people’?”

“Yes, you, with your perfect wand movements and your perfect pronunciation and your perfect pureblood family and your house-elf, and your perfect tie knots and your knowing-everything-already, all without touching a single textbook. Our Potions professor was your godfather! You had a broomstick collection! You already knew everyone's name! Sometimes I wished you'd trip over your own feet," she admitted, in tones of adorably sincere guilt, "just to see you fail at something."

Unbidden, he recalled her boggart, in third year. Professor Dumbledore and his terrible kindness and a threat that had never before crossed Draco's mind. I am afraid there has been a mistake.

"My first year was miserable, personally." He put his hands in his pockets to keep them still; he still disliked the way it felt to unburden himself thus, even though it was Hermione. "I thought I'd disgraced the family. I asked to go home."

"Which I always thought was a bit silly, because it's perfectly clear your mother would give you both kidneys if you asked for them," said Hermione wryly. "Getting sorted wasn't going to change any of that. Meanwhile, it took me a whole year to figure out that nobody was going to expel me if I missed a question in Transfiguration—"

"Though you still haven't."

"—partly because it's hard to care about detentions when you're running from three-headed dogs, I suppose. But for a long time I was scared of everything, and I was always terribly jealous of how those two never seemed to worry about what anyone thought." She sighed and brushed a ringlet of hair over her mouth, a granddaughter habit to her old tic of chewing on hair.

"They have their hands full knowing their own minds," he said. "There's no room for anyone else's, they'd start smoking out the ears."

She let out an amused breath through her nose.

"They're not stupid. Ron still beats you at chess."

“And he’s welcome to try me in gobstones any time he’d like a real wizard’s game.”

“Harry understands more than he lets on, by the way, and just because he doesn’t show off doesn’t mean he can’t put two and two together. He held his own in the Tournament last year, and you don’t get by as far as he has on luck alone.”

“Stop adulating Potter for a second, I’m talking about you. The point is, both of them would die for you. With not one modicum more hesitation than they would for each other. Doubt me if you like, but that’s the truth.”

She gave a startled smile. “Did they say so?”

“They don’t need to. Ask Theodore Nott, Ronald nearly killed him for you in second year.”

The wind whistled in the windows.

“I seem to remember you were involved in that, somewhere,” she said, after a moment.

“I was.”

“Ron said you tried to duel him.”

“Two things,” he said. “First, I resent ‘try,’ as it implies a deficit in execution. Second, it wasn’t a duel, it was a fight.”

“Difference being?”

“One has rules. The other doesn’t.”

Her head cocked at a quizzical angle. “For instance—?”

“For instance, in a duel, I would have stopped when he started bleeding.”

The expression that flit across her face was an unfamiliar child of alarm and something else. The train car hit a curve, and swayed.

“Does that bother you?” he said, curious. He never quite knew where Hermione stood in terms of comfort with violence. At times she seemed vehemently opposed, and at others she seemed almost comfortable with it, especially when employed against someone she thought deserving. Which was also an increasingly wide field, these days.

“I think it probably would have, at the time,” she said carefully. “I would’ve found it pointless.”

“And now?”

“Now… I understand it better. The reasons you might want to cause someone pain.”

“Because you’ve felt them.”

“Because I’ve felt them,” she said, in a low voice, like she was admitting a sin.

“That’s not a bad thing, Granger.”

“I don’t agree,” she said, low and firm. It sounded rehearsed. “I won’t agree to that. People should only suffer when it's necessary.”

He shrugged. He couldn't win the argument with her; he judged it was both a fundamental similarity and a difference between them, that while they both conflated self-interest and selfishness, they took diametrically opposed positions on whether it was acceptable to have either.

Voices and laughter swelled into the carriage. Trunks thundered down from luggage racks; they were approaching the school.

She straightened her skirt, which wasn’t wrinkled, and smoothed her hair, which wasn’t askew.

“We should go find Harry and Ron,” she said abruptly.

He stepped into the hallway and held the door for her. “Certainly. Let’s go find the Boy Who Lived,” he suggested. “His personality notwithstanding, I’d like to keep him living for at least a while longer.”

Thestrals pulled the carriages from the Hogsmeade station to Hogwarts. He paused for a moment when he realized it, noted what it meant, and then carefully boxed the information for later inspection.

They caught one of the last carriages up from the station. Prefects had to escort the first years to the boats, where an aptly named Professor Grubbly-Plank awaited them. Her hair contained volumes of dirt fit for plants to roost in, and it roved freely over her broad, freckled cheeks, which bunched gaily in a smile, and it was altogether a far more reassuring face than Hagrid’s had been — though it would be lying to suggest he hadn’t an instinctive preference for his own absent ferryman, all the same.

Draco found being a prefect was unexpectedly enriching. It meant people paid attention to him. The bushy-tailed seas parted expeditiously at his approach, and several of them even apologized to him.

Of course, it didn’t account entirely for the inconvenience of shepherding first years into the boats, a process which had involved several arguments, a lot of coaxing, and at least one well-placed Locomotor to avoid feeding a potential Minister of Magic to the Great Squid.

He had boarded his carriage with wet shoes and a grim apprehension of a year spent herding cats. Harry and Ron had held a car for them. Draco hopped up and helped Hermione climb up after him, and then Ron swung the door shut, prompting the carriage to set off with a rattle.

Hermione tumbled into her seat, her elbows unerringly finding the least comfortable points in Draco’s side, and he was treated to a faceful of wet hair. His warbles of complaint were ruthlessly ignored by all.

“We met the new Care of Magical Creatures professor,” she said breathlessly. “Professor Grubbly-Plank. She’s wonderful. I almost regret that we dropped it.”

“I’m telling Hagrid you said that,” muttered Harry.

“Oh, but don’t, though. I do miss him, obviously—”

“I’m still telling.”

“Harry!”

“I’m sad to hear Hagrid’s leaving. I heard he was bitten by a pygmy hippogriff,” said a high, dreamy voice, and he noticed the fifth person in their car: a small Ravenclaw with fluffy, ash-blond ringlets and a pair of carrots worn as earrings. “Their venom's said to put quadrupeds into heat. I don’t know if it has the same effect on bipeds, though,” she added modestly.

Draco made a mental note to get his ears checked.

“Hello, Luna,” said Hermione, with vague forbearance.

“Hello, Hermione,” she said. To Draco, she added: “I’m Luna Lovegood. You’re the Gryffindor chaser that Marietta likes.”

Ron guffawed. Hermione stared at her with a hawkish, incredulous expression.

“Enchenté,” Draco said warily.

“Marietta Edgecombe?” said Hermione. “Marietta who flunked Astronomy? Really.”

“Oh, you know her!”

“Not well, since she's a sixth year,” she said flatly. “And a bit old to be panting after fifteen-year-olds, isn't she?”

“She's young for her year, though. Her birthday's in June, like Draco's.”

This startled him.

“How do you know that?”

Luna blinked. “Your name? I'm sorry if I got it wrong, but I've seen you play quidditch matches, and last year you were in the papers.”

“No. My birthday.”

“Yeah, Draco, Luna, Luna, Draco,” said Ron. “We met her on the train, she’s a riot. You should ask her about wrackspurts, sometime. She did my horoscope, says I’m some kind of fish.”

“Only if you go by the western zodiac,” Luna said dreamily. “My father is working on an astrological project that will leave the twelve-sign chart behind entirely. He’s discovering new signs all the time, you know… he says there are at least eighteen, maybe up to forty-three…”

“And how is it, exactly,” said Hermione, “that one discovers new signs, Luna?”

“Oh, it’s very interesting! The first step is to open your Inner Eye—”

“You two can talk about that later,” Harry said hastily. “How was the prefects’ meeting?”

“Dull,” said Draco. “Unenlightening, protracted, and well-catered. Needless to say, Granger had the time of her life.”

“It was lovely,” she agreed, wholly unembarrassed by this. “Cedric is a wonderful Head Boy—”

Draco snorted.

“—but also, there’s something we should talk about. Privately. Just the four of us. Er — sorry, Luna.”

“Ooh. I can put my fingers in my ears, if you need,” Luna offered. “Or I can practice my throat singing.”

“Oh, please,” said Ron eagerly.

Hermione hesitated. “Well — if you really don’t mind — I could put a Deafening Charm on you. Temporarily.”

Luna shrugged. “Keep it on as long as you like,” she said. “I’ve been meaning to take up hand language. This could be a marvelous opportunity.”

“Oh. Well. Thank you. Aurisclada.”

The spell constellated around her ears and formed a glowing pair of bulbs, which Luna seemed delighted by; she examined them in the dark mirror of the window, fluffing her hair over them.

“Right,” said Hermione tersely, and laid her wand across her lap. “We’ve a problem.”

She relayed what they heard in the prefects’ carriage. Harry and Ron listened with dimming expressions, any residual gaiety from the train seeping quickly from their posture, and Ron let out a quick, unconvincing cough when she got to Percy’s name.

“You think it’s him?” said Ron gruffly.

“We don’t know,” she said quickly. “It’s a suspicion. And I don’t mean to… it’s someone who knows that Padfoot is in London, so that’s… it’s not a big group. I think it’s more likely that someone might’ve let it slip, on accident, than that someone Dumbledore trusts would betray him. I'm sorry to accuse your family—"

"Nah, he might," croaked Ron, and cleared his throat again. "Shit brother, he was. Worst of the set." His expression was bleak but stubborn. He managed: "It's funny, innit? I always figured I'd fancy it if someone fucked up enough that I wasn't the family disappointment anymore, but it's — it's not all that fun, now he's actually gone and done it."

"That's not true," said Harry. "You're not—"

"Aw, never mind, it doesn't matter. I'm not fishing, I'm just — sore, I guess. I'll write to my dad, when we get to Hogwarts," he muttered miserably, leaning on his knees. "I'll tell him to cut contact with Percy. I know Mum's been writing letters Dad doesn't know about, begging him to come back. It's kind of pathetic."

"It's not pathetic," Harry insisted.

"She doesn't have to cut him off altogether," Hermione said quickly. "Just write to Arthur, and tell him what we know. Then we'll wait to see what he says."

Ron grunted, leaning against the window. Harry watched him from the corner of his eye, unhappy. Hermione dispelled the charm on Luna, who patted her ears curiously, and then announced, with deep satisfaction: "Just as I thought! The deaf can hear nargles," and it was the last thing anyone said until they reached the castle.

Dumbledore sat in a high-backed golden chair amidst the staff table, wearing lavender robes with silvery stars and a matching hat. His head was inclined toward the woman sitting next to him, who was squat, with short, curly, mouse-brown hair and a fluffy pink cardigan. She was talking, not so much with him as at him, with occasional interjections for food or water in which Dumbledore could slide in three odd words.

A cursory look at the Slytherin table revealed a number of familiar faces, but missed several notable ones: Daphne, Theo, and Pansy were nowhere to be found.

They weren't the only group to read the news. Other tables stopped talking when they passed. Chatter died like a candle under a snuffer at his approach. A cluster of Ravenclaws sat up straight and glared at Harry, who stiffened his shoulders and walked swiftly to the Gryffindor table.

The noise resumed when his back was turned, but it was a different sound, a harsher thing, and a much more pointed one.

"Sorry, Harry," whispered Fred, as Harry found his seat by the twins. "My fault. They heard you're friends with me, and I've got an image problem."

"It's true," said George. "There was an incident with a goat and a bottle of Ogden's. But it'll blow over in a week, so don't get used to the attention, or anything."

Harry flashed a thin but grateful smile, and sat down. Several of his housemates, Neville Longbottom especially, gave him almost defiantly loud greetings, as if to compensate for the lack of warmth in the hall's reception.

McGonagall moved through the new crop of first years at a military clip. She breezed from B through D at a pace that saw Cornelius Dreck well nigh punted off the dais into Ravenclaw, ushered Theresa Fawcett over to Hufflepuff with a double-snap of her fingers, and wrenched the hat from Armando Gilbert's head before the word 'GRYFFINDOR' had passed its lips.

Then she raised her list and cried, "Greengrass, Astoria!" and the hall went curiously silent.

He craned his neck behind the rows of Gryffindors to see if Astoria was possibly struggling with her chair — someone would have to levitate her up the steps, inevitably, but with McGonagall there, it oughtn’t have been an issue — until a door slammed somewhere near the back of the room, and Daphne came sprinting in, wheeling her sister at near-sonic speeds down the aisle.

“She’s here!” she cried, while Astoria cackled gleefully and clung on to her armrests for dear life. “She’s here! She’s here! Don’t forget her! We’re sorry we’re late!”

Laughter politely tickled the walls. Daphne deposited Astoria at the bottom of the dais, kissed her on the head, and then turned — paused a moment, with a flicker of panic — before smiling delicately, the picture of loveliness, and dipping a deep curtsy; the hall gave another chorus of laughter, and some applause. Then she trotted with quick short steps over to the Gryffindor table. Ron moved over to make room.

“Hullo, chaps,” she whispered. “Sorry about the scene. Tori had an attack.”

“She did?”

“Is she all right?”

“Better than she has been,” said Daphne cryptically, and waved it off. “She’s fine. Don’t worry. Now: everyone look at my sister! It’s her moment! She’s been dreaming of this for years.” Gazing at the dais, she glanced at Ron, then glanced at him again. “Heavens, you're tall. Did you get a haircut?”

“...No?”

“Well, don’t,” she said, and turned to stare rapturously at her sister.

McGonagall had levitated Astoria, chair and all, to the top of the dais, where the stool was moved aside for her chair. The hat dropped onto her beaming, golden head and immediately sank into a crumple of contemplation.

The hat worked its mouth in consternation. Astoria folded her hands in her lap and peered over the hall, blinking fretfully; Daphne waved to her. Astoria fluttered her fingers shyly.

“SLYTHERIN!”

Astoria gasped and blazed with joy. Applause followed, mostly from Slytherin — sedate in character, but robust in volume.

McGonagall levitated her down, she wriggled in anticipation before her wheels touched the floor. Once they met, she whisked breathlessly over to her housemates, who with some clattering of plates cleared a place for her at the end of the table.

Daphne, while applauding boisterously, nevertheless gave a faint sigh.

“It’s alright, really,” said Harry. “You’re a Slytherin, and you still ended up here.”

“Circuitously,” she murmured, and adjusted the lay of her collar on her scars.

When the feast was over, Dumbledore rose, and Draco braced himself for a tedious discourse on unity, peace, compassion, or whatever virtue particularly held the headmaster’s favor that night; but Dumbledore said simply, “Be well. A very good night to you all,” and sat down. The woman in pink whipped around and stared at him, the smile falling from her face like a traveling cloak.

Belatedly, and with confusion, the mass of students rose and streamed out of the Great Hall, murmuring their suspicions. Draco cut past a curly-haired Ravenclaw muttering, “Blimey, don’t even know who’s teaching Defense this year, d’you think they’ll cancel it?” and one of her comrades moaning, “Wish they would, I’m rubbish.” To get through the crowd he had to clear his throat prodigiously and elbow a few heads before people gave him a wider berth, and from there he marched to the grand stairwell, where he climbed to the second stair, turned, and whistled. A few of the first years he had harried onto the boats gratefully identified him and flocked to his feet, and he eyed them approvingly, noting them as the most obedient and therefore most preferred members of the crop.

Hermione caught his eye and gave him a slightly exasperated look. All the same, she pointed and cried, “That’s Draco Malfoy, he’s a prefect, go stand with him!” and urged her own flock of midgets to commingle with his. He resented this, distantly.

One of his midgets raised his hand. He looked like someone had put glasses and a bowl cut on a shrimp. Draco pointed at him.

“Where do we sleep, sir?”

He liked sir quite a lot, actually.

“Gryffindor Tower,” he drawled, leaning on the banister. “It’s up fourteen flights of stairs, and no, there’s not a lift, if you’re wondering.”

Another one raised her hand. She was one of the cherub types, blonde pigtails, about six years old at a guess. He pointed again.

“Why isn’t there a lift?” she said plaintively.

“Because Godric Gryffindor didn’t have your convenience in mind when he stuck his House on top of the sodding castle. Anyone else?”

She didn’t raise her hand this time. “Hasn’t anyone tried to put in a lift?”

“It’s been on my list for years, believe me. Yes, you again.”

Shrimp lowered his hand. “Is there a reason we can’t put in a lift?” he asked, politely.

“I’m sure there is, but I’m far too important to know it. You should ask Granger, she’s the castle historian.”

“Which professor is that?”

“Is she the one with the big hat?”

“She looked serious.”

“She’s not a professor,” he said, amused. “She’s—” His brain reached for a word that did not exist, lurched into the gap, and plummeted. “She’s Hermione Granger.”

“Who’s Hermione Granger?”

“Your prefect,” he snapped. “Who’re you, anyway?”

“My name is—”

“Never mind, I don’t care. Listen, that’s her, over there, with the hair and the face and everything. If you have a question about Hogwarts, the castle, or anything else, you should go ask her and leave me out of it.”

The first years susurrated and grappled each other, suitably awed. Hermione, on the far side of the hall, caught a few of their wide-mouthed stares, and she sent him a suspicious look. He waved her off. Fear and awe were good for discipline.

A third interloper with teeth of radically different orientations raised his hand. “Why do you call her Granger?”

He understood why Snape spoke so slowly; the longer you were talking, the less time they had for questions.

“I call her that because it so happens to be her name.”

A tactical mistake. The floodgates broke.

“Why didn’t Cedric do that?”

“Aren’t you friends?”

“Do we have to call her Granger?”

“Or Miss Granger?”

“Is she ‘sir’, too?”

“What do I call you?”

“You can call her whatever she wants to be called,” he said, tautly, “but others call me Malfoy, or Draco, if and only if so invited. Let me be clear in advance: you will not be invited. And I call her that because—” And there went his brain again, plummeting. Merlin’s cock. “Because I do as I please. Mind your own business, you’ll live longer.”

Shrimp was cowed, but Cherub scoffed at him. He put a red flag on her in his mental registry.

Harry and Ron waded over, joined by Daphne and Ginny, who sprang up on the stair beside Draco and waved the kiddies a cheerful hello with both hands. “Wotcher, firsties!” she cried. “Ready to see the best house ever?”

“Ah, I dunno about that.” Cho shouldered through the crowd, wearing a friendly grin. “They’ll have trouble getting to Ravenclaw.”

She looped her arm through Harry’s and went on tiptoe to kiss his cheek. Harry turned darker than beetroots and let out a very loud, very awkward laugh, which Draco despised for no better reason than that the first years were watching, all of them deeply unimpressed.

“Hey, Cho,” said Ginny, sticking her hands in her back pockets. She smiled without teeth. “Good summer?”

“Corking.”

“Bet you’re excited to get back on the pitch this year.”

“No, yeah. Can’t wait.”

“Neither can I.”

“Oh, are you on the team?”

“I’m— trying out,” said Ginny, oddly strangled.

Students from years and houses various trailed past. He could see it when it dawned on them who Harry was, because they unanimously corrected their trajectories to give him a wide radius, and dropped their voices to the point that it was actually less subtle than if they had shouted. A blond boy next to Euan Abercrombie remarked that he’d seemed bigger in the papers. Someone murmured the Dark Lord’s name and something about hoaxes, something about free publicity. A Slytherin steered her friend away, and the word under her breath was Krum.

Ron started at them menacingly, making them squeak and hurry off to peddle idiocy in some more discreet corner.

“Maybe we should go up,” said Cho uncomfortably, cradling Harry’s arm, as if she could somehow lift him out of range of her words. Harry’s expression was blank and dull and directed at no one in particular, but when she jostled him, he turned his head.

“Maybe we should teach them a lesson,” snapped Ginny. “Oi! You! Didn’t anyone tell you it was rude to stare?” She rounded on Draco. “Aren’t you going to take points?”

“For what? Stupidity isn’t against the rules.”

“It should be,” she snapped.

“Ginevra, I’ve been saying it for years.”

The crowd thinned as more students winnowed out to their dormitories. Wind creaked on the doors, and a draft sent the chandeliers twisting faintly on their chains.

With a piping blast of chill air, the doors to the Entrance Hall swept open, and out of a rain-slick curtain of night, a pair of students — a boy and a girl — strode inside. First years erupted in a burble of interest at the sight of them, washed by elements, and also, unnervingly, flanked by three patrolmen — two of whom stood the boy's shoulders. It was hard to tell if they were guarding him or escorting him, as they walked too close for anyone's comfort, and kept a hand on their wands. One of them shoved him forward, and he turned around to snap at them with a sneer that Draco knew very well.

Theo had grown into his face, which was to say that he no longer resembled a rat with pretensions, and his hair was well-combed. The square, top-heavy frame of a beater had begun to emerge under his robes, and his chest had made a promising transition to convexity. Altogether he was much better than he had been at the beginning of summer, though much of that was accounted for with a lack of injuries. In fact, he was doing a completely passable imitation of a fifteen-year-old boy.

When he turned, his expression was a kneejerk of a glare, as if Draco had done something inconsiderate by appearing in his field of vision, and he pivoted away. At his side, Pansy reached for his elbow, but one of the patrolmen held her at bay with a polite, firm assertion of his arm. She scowled and folded her arms.

The professor in pink hurried over to greet them, waving the patrolmen off. Theo said something to her, and as he watched, she tipped her head back and gave a shrill, tinkling laugh, like someone threw a wind chime into a wood chipper.

"Greengrass."

Daphne hummed, picking at something on her sleeve.

"Did you know he was coming back?"

“No,” she murmured, from the corner of her mouth. “I haven’t heard from him in months. Have you?”

“Not a word.”

“I suppose they can’t stop him,” said Harry, frowning, “but I didn’t reckon he’d have the nerve.”

“Umbridge might’ve had something to do with it,” said Daphne.

“Who’s that?” said Ginny. “She’s not a professor, is she? Dumbledore didn’t introduce her.”

“Reckon he forgot,” whispered Cho, and Draco tilted his head, privately disagreeing.

“No, no. That’s Dolores Umbridge,” said Daphne, sotto voce. She turned her head away from the woman, so as not to stare, but kept talking. “Apparently she’s quite the character at the Ministry. She’s the Hogwarts Special Inquisitor. And the new Defense Professor.”

“What’s a Special Inquisitor?” demanded Hermione, emerging from the flock of first-years. She grasped Draco’s hand to help her up the stairs, though she quickly let go when she had assumed a point of suitable vantage over the crowd. “Why do we have one? Is she here with the Ministry? Never mind, that’s obvious. Do you know if she has disciplinary powers, or if she’s here in an administrative capacity? Don’t wander off,” she added sharply, and several of the first years stumbled back into place.

Cherub goggled at her worshipfully. She looked like she’d discovered Merlin was five foot four inches tall and freckled. One sympathized.

“It’s an audit, essentially,” murmured Daphne, still examining the far wall. “She’s here to review the curriculum and staff.”

“For what?”

Several first years jumped at Hermione's tone. One, again, sympathized.

"Competence," said Daphne simply.

"According to whom?"

Daphne gestured: See for yourself.

Hermione frowned across the hall. As Umbridge chattered on, Pansy yawned, using one hand to cover her mouth. Something bright and pale glittered on her fourth finger.

Cho gasped. So did Ginny. Daphne didn't.

"She's engaged?"

"She can't get married, she's a baby," said Ron, outraged. "An evil baby."

"Of course she can," said Daphne mildly. "Her parents threw the whole thing together in a summer. His family's very much on the rise, so it's no surprise they'd want to snap him up."

"Who?"

Daphne paused. "Why," she said, "Cassius Warrington."

A blade of pity and revulsion sank through his chest, right up to the very hilt.

Pansy saw him across the hallway then, and lifted her hand in a sort of abortive, unhappy way, as if it were levitated by a force not her own. There was a softening in the line of her mouth that could have approximated happiness on something very unused to it. But when Umbridge said something else, she averted her eyes, and turned her back, for good measure.

“I’d like to go say hello to her,” said Daphne, and then paused like she was taking a vote.

“Alright,” said Ron.

“...You don’t mind? I won't say anything to Theodore,” she added suddenly, though no one had asked. Her hands knotted themselves, a lattice of guilt. “I wouldn't... I haven't answered his letters, you know. I've been properly... I haven't said anything. I told him I didn't want — I couldn't possibly, after — after everything last year — but Pansy didn't do anything wrong, and she's always been good to me — in her way. I'll just pop over and say a teensy-tiny quick hello, and leave, if — if that's alright.”

The others looked at her with moderated pity and curiosity.

“Sure, go on, then,” said Ginny.

“Are you sure? I wouldn’t want to… if it’s letting the side down.”

Harry gave a short, unhappy laugh. “What side?” he said. “My side? Is that it?”

“Harry,” Hermione said.

“What, like it’s — like we’re enemies? It’s the first day. She’s fourteen. Just go,” he said roughly. “I’m not the boss of you. Don’t, like — ask for permission, I’m not your dad—”

Draco didn’t think this was quite fair to Daphne, who had been doing something far subtler than Harry gave her credit for; he also thought Harry might have benefited from knowledge of etiquette rules in which it was impolite to leave a conversation without a formal excuse; but Daphne flinched.

“I’m sorry, I’m sorry! I’ll be quick, I just — sorry,” she said meekly, and bobbed off into the crowd.

“Harry,” repeated Hermione, pointed.

“Hermione! I don’t want to be — you can’t keep looking at me like — never mind,” he muttered. “Sorry. Forget it. I’m sorry.”

He raked a hand through his hair, ruining the last of Mrs. Weasley’s effortful combing. “I’m just — going to bed. Alright? I’ll see you tomorrow. Sorry. Again.”

He climbed the stairs two by two, abruptly cutting them short. Cho watched him with a crestfallen expression.

“S’alright,” Ginny said to her in a low voice. “He’s been like this all summer.”

“I know, but I thought — maybe when we were at school, he might — cheer up a bit.” She sounded disappointed.

“Give him some time,” advised Ron. “He’ll get there. It’s Harry.”

“Yes,” she said, “I know. No, you’re right.” She smiled bravely. “I guess I’ll be off, too,” she said. “Goodnight, you lot. Er — Ginny, hope to see you on the pitch!”

“Yeah, cheers,” said Ginny casually. “Night.”

They started the long and winding climb to Gryffindor Tower, through dim classrooms. Draco caught glimpses of familiar portraits who giggled and waved at the passing firsties, and the cries of delight bounded up the winding staircase like a party of marauding fairies. The upper halls were deserted. Hermione herded wandering would-be explorers with a sharp call or two over her shoulder. He preferred to let them find their own way back to the flock. They’d end up where they needed to be somehow, and a bit of hazing wouldn’t kill them.

In the common room, firelight kindled, and a tray of biscuits had been left out by the house-elves for latecomers. Dobby’s handwriting graced the card next to it — he was one of the few house-elves that could spell, if ‘spell’ was defined generously — and bid all new Furst Yeers a very good night in their new Hoeme.

As the last of the midgets trundled up to their beds, gawking at everything that so much as twinkled, Hermione put her hands on her hips and let out a breath of relief.

“Draco?”

“Hm?”

She lingered in the girls’ stairwell, fidgeting with her right heel.

“Wait.”

She didn’t sound eager to leave. He shared her inclination.

Which didn’t make much sense, really. The boys’ dorm was closer to the girls’ than their rooms had been at the Manor. All the same, it felt different — knowing that if dreams of green light split his night open, there would be several sets of staircases and at least seven other people forestalling any way of knowing that she was there.

“You’re a good prefect,” she said.

He tilted his head at her.

“You’re very — authoritative. They listen to you. Everyone does.”

“Force of habit,” he said guardedly, and prepared for the colossal but waiting around the corner.

She hesitated.

“That’s all,” she said quickly. “Well done. Er — good night.”

Then she scurried up the stairs to the girls’, leaving him flushed and wondering, as always, what the hell they were ever about.

-I wrote about 1,000 words of an author's note and then my Wifi went out, AO3 force-reloaded, and the box deleted, so please go ahead and imagine a few hundred extra words of top-tier hard-hitting content here, please. Ta.

-Chapter going up early this week because I'll be offline on Friday, but I wanted to make sure that a chapter went up before next week, especially after all of you guys were so kind about the unexpected hiatus. That means the next one won't be coming up until the Friday after this one, but hopefully the double-dose will be enough to tide you over!

-The reception to the last chapter had me teary-eyed. Guys. I really don't deserve my comments section, but as long as you're here, I'll be grateful to you. I wish I could respond to every one with detail and reciprocate the kindness you've shown me. This work owes so much of its existence to you.

-In a rather sharp tonal pivot from that note: this chapter goes out to the Dune 2 soundtrack, which has powered me through about 10,000 words of draft and counting. Hans Zimmer the artist you are.

-RIP Daphne Greengrass, you would have loved "we can’t be friends" by ariana grande. also "yes, and?" but for different reasons

-I always kind of wondered what happened to the other champions in Book 5, since we don't see Fleur come back until she's engaged to Bill, and Krum straight-up goes to the Shadow Realm until his cameo at their wedding in Book 7. What's he doing? Chilling in Bulgaria and writing letters to Hermione? He's one of the most talented students at Durmstrang and he's fresh out of school, plus apparently he believes Harry (one assumes, since Hermione bothers to keeps him on the roster), so like... is he not at all interested in the war effort? Is he acting as a spy abroad? Krum MI6 plant arc??

-Also: the fact that Krum was at Bill and Fleur's wedding basically confirms that Krum and Fleur kept in touch after the Tournament, and were close enough friends for him to get invited to a reasonably limited "friends and family" ceremony at the Burrow, which is haunting to me because it implies that Fleur and Krum had an incredible epistolary bromance BTS throughout Book 5 and 6. Or they were actually hanging out all the time. And we got none of it. If anyone wants to write this, you know where to find me.

-Next chapter: "Umbridge's Lament."

Umbridge’s Lament

Chapter 61: Umbridge’s Lament

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Every year, the Defense professor did something different with their classroom.

Lupin’s had been a cozy, cluttered space, full of weathered furniture and overstuffed bookshelves; Mad-Eye had set the desks in a semicircle so no one had to sit with their backs to the door; but this year, the same desks were set in a four-by-ten matrix facing a large podium at the back of the room. Umbridge appeared to have moved it from the Great Hall.

Even more unlike Mad-Eye, she had decorated the walls: posters of famous Aurors and Ministers of Magic gazed stonily from beveled wood frames, or squinted nobly into some invisible sunset. Cornelius Fudge reclined in a lavish study, ogling a photographer who clearly had been given no incentive to flatter him; next to it was a mint-condition RUNCORN FOR ALL poster, and beside it hung a framed photograph of Runcorn and a small group of Ministry wizards, posing together under the Atrium at the Ministry of Magic. Runcorn was beaming at the camera. In the back of the photo, there was a small woman with short curly hair, an unmistakable pink cardigan, and a beatific simper.

Along the bottom of the photo, someone had scrawled: WE FEW, WE MERRY FEW. A.R.

Umbridge wore a frilled lace shawl and a pillbox hat, and her smile could have sheared metal.

“Please sit,” she said. “Please sit! Thank you. Good afternoon, everyone!”

Hermione brushed Draco's arm, aglow with excitement — she was mad, truly and passionately — and he was steered, not altogether involuntarily, to their usual post at the front of the room. He drew out her chair as she rummaged in her bag for an ancient, leather-bound journal so stuffed with spare parchment and pasted-in notes that it had to be buckled shut. He suspected, based on its advanced age, that she had enchanted it with interior page-expanding charms long ago.

In contrast, he flicked open a blank scroll of parchment, wetted his quill, and scrawled the date lazily in the corner.

The last chairs scraped into place. Harry and Ron shuffled in behind them; Ron leaned forward to tap Hermione's shoulder.

"Hey, Mione?"

"Hm?"

"Mione!"

"What is it, Ron?"

"You got a quill?"

Her quill stopped, and lifted; a bead of ink trembled at its tip, as if equivalently surprised.

"Since when do you take notes?" she whispered, half-delighted, half-disbelieving. Draco verged rather more one way than the other, and sent Ron a look that expressed both incredulous suspicion and, failing that, a profound fear for his health.

Ron offered a small grin, which was somehow cocky, defensive, and sheepish all at once. "You told me I couldn't skive off yours this year. We made a deal, remember?"

"Yes, but I didn't think you'd keep it," she said bluntly. Draco snorted. "I made that deal so you'd remember to study. I wasn't trying to suggest I'd stop helping; you're still welcome to look at my notes, if you want, if it's helpful, which frankly it probably will be, since I've had more practice at them, and it's not fair to expect — really it was more the principle of the thing, even I didn't honestly expect— not that I'm discouraging you," she exclaimed, as Harry began to snigger, and Draco fought a smirk in vain. Ron glared sequentially at both of them. "I'm very glad that you're trying now. Here, you can use some of my parchment. Do you know how to set them up? I do mine in the Cornell Method—"

"Shut up and gimme a quill," muttered Ron. "I know how to write things down. I'm not dull."

"I never said that," said Hermione pointedly, but then Umbridge cleared her throat again.

"Excuse me," said Umbridge clearly. "I would like us to be friends, boys and girls! And when a friend says 'good afternoon' to you, what do you say? Please try again."

There was a somewhat wary refrain: "Good afternoon, Professor Umbridge."

"Wonderful. That wasn't hard at all." She clapped her hands. "Well now, your teaching in this subject has been rather disrupted and fragmented, hasn't it? The constant changing of teachers, many of whom do not seem to have followed any Ministry-approved curriculum, has unfortunately resulted in your being far below the standard we would expect to see in your O.W.L. year.

"You will be pleased to know, however, that these problems are now to be rectified. We will be following a carefully structured, theory-centered, Ministry-approved course of defensive magic this year. Copy down the following, please." She rapped the blackboard. Course aims… Understanding the principles underlying defensive magic… Learning to recognize situations in which defensive magic can legally be used… Placing the use of defensive magic in a context for practical use…

“Once you have finished copying the course aims, I will ask you to read the introduction and first chapter of the book, Defensive Magical Theory, by Wilbert Slinkhard. I would like to make sure that everyone is on the ver-y same page!”

She paused and smiled widely. “I am not hearing any quills moving!”

Draco, who was considering moving his, if only to put it through his own eye, sat back and folded his hands, incredulous. Hermione, to his right, put up her hand.

Umbridge gave a tinkling laugh. “Do you require help identifying a quill?”

Hermione cleared her throat and said politely: “Professor Umbridge, you assigned us to read the introduction and the first chapter for today.”

“That is a comment, not a question, my dear,” said Umbridge indulgently. “Please save all your very bright ideas to share with your friends, after class. Now—”

“Pardon me. Professor. But may I ask the point of making us read it again?”

Umbridge paused at the interruption. Her smile waned. “May I ask your name, Miss…?”

“Granger,” she said at once. “Hermione Granger.”

“Lovely. Because while you may be familiar with the concept of ‘assigned reading,’ Miss Granger,” she said cheerfully, “the past three years of test scores from this class have made perfectly clear that you are among the ver-y few people in this room to do so!”

There was an awkward, shifty silence. Harry and Ron, against whom this was a valid but nevertheless unsportsmanlike accusation, ducked their heads.

Hermione, who made this exact remark at least once a week, scowled.

“Does that answer your question?”

“Yes,” she said shortly.

“Wonderful. Now, everyone, I think we’ll read for fifteen minutes, and then we’ll discuss. I want to see those books out and pages tur-ning! Oh, goodness,” she said, peering down at Ron’s unearthed copy of Defensive Magical Theory, whose cover was dangling by a thread. “I’m aw-fully sorry, but I believe what you have over there is Defensive Magical Theory, fourth edition. Nothing but the sixth edition will do! You, dear,” she added to Draco. “Your copy looks perfect.”

Ron turned bright red and shoved his book back in his bag, kicking it away.

There was a silence of turning pages and unsubtle muttering for ten minutes. Umbridge presided from the podium, watching and writing something on a clipboard.

Hermione put her hand up again. Her copy of Slinkhard sat untouched atop a blank page of notes.

Umbridge smiled, showing a number of faintly yellow teeth. “Why, Miss Granger, I don’t see you reading.”

“No, I’ve done that already, professor,” she replied rigidly. “I have a question.”

“Is something about the introduction confusing, dear?”

“Not particularly, no.”

“Good. In that case, we’re reading just now. If you have other questions, you can see me during office hours.”

“I’d like to talk about pedagogy,” said Hermione.

Professor Umbridge raised her eyebrows. “That’s a ver-y big word,” she trilled. “I don’t think Slinkhard uses it! My dear,” she said to Draco, who startled again at finding himself involved, “can you remind me if Slinkhard uses it in the introduction?”

Hermione scoffed.

“Not,” he said, each syllable slow and precise with disdain, “that I recall.”

“No? I thought not. Well-remembered, young man! Five points to Gryffindor. Now, can you please help Miss Granger figure out how to open her book?”

He sat back, faintly stunned.

Hermione stared at him, mouth ajar. He raised his eyebrows, silently inquiring what she wanted him to do.

She raised her hand. Umbridge sighed and opened her mouth, but Hermione interrupted her.

“I’d like to know what a Special Inquisitor is,” she said.

There was a murmur of fascination from the peanut gallery: in Hermione’s book, interrupting a professor was the kind of offense you could get hanged for. Lavender was watching the exchange like the Quidditch World Cup, apparently delighted.

“I’m sure you would,” said Umbridge. “However, whatever you may believe, your personal desires do not dictate the curriculum of this class, nor will I permit them to any further detract from the education of your p—”

“Everyone here can read,” she said impatiently, “and half of the introduction is acknowledgements. I’d like to know what your goals are, administratively—”

“Miss Granger—”

“—and whether we can expect similar curriculum changes to other classes, as well as this one,” she insisted, “and it is relevant, because our O.W.L.s are this year, so knowing whether we should expect major changes to the way we’re being taught, only nine months before the exam—”

“Ten points from Gryffindor!”

Hermione broke off, flushing. The classroom dissolved into groans and whispers.

“And it’ll be twenty,” said Umbridge softly, “if I hear another word from you before class ends, Miss Granger.”

Hermione’s mouth parted in a perfect rose of fury. Draco wondered, with irrational intensity, how a Boils Jinx would change Umbridge’s face, being that her nose was not so dissimilar from a pustule already. He drummed his fingers, which itched as if longing for a wand.

Harry’s nostrils flared. He threw up his hand.

“Yes, Mr. Potter?”

She hadn’t asked his name.

There was more whispering, now; Ron had flushed deep into the red, and Seamus’s grip would soon snap his quill in half. Neville swung his head between Umbridge and Harry, jaw agape.

“That’s not fair,” Harry said loudly. “Hermione asked you a good question.”

“It appears this class must review the definition of ‘questions’! It can be a tricky subject for young people to grasp.”

“Why can’t you just answer her?” he said, louder still. “It wasn’t even a hard question.”

“Are you a Ministry-trained educational expert, Mr. Potter?”

Harry’s expression changed. Draco identified it at once as the sure sign that Harry’s authority problem had wrestled the wheel away from the rest of his brain.

“Yeah, aced my certs last week,” he said. “I’m just here for the bants, really.”

Giggles broke out. Ron guffawed and thumped his desk. Hermione, who usually regarded unprofessional classroom conduct with extreme hostility, scoffed in quiet amusement and sat back in her chair, arms folded.

Harry’s smile was a hard, flat thing, and there was something faintly glad in it.

“Our class troublemaker, it seems,” Umbridge murmured. “It seems you have quite a mouth on you. Of course, I’m not very surprised.”

“Yeah? What’s that mean?”

“It means that a little birdie told me someone likes to blame other people for his problems,” she said indulgently, tapping her nose. “I won’t name names, but let me just say to you all: that kind of behavior is just what we want to weed out, in this classroom!” She swept her head to regard them all with great seriousness, pursing her lips. “It is high time that wizards and witches of this country began to take accountability for themselves.”

“Accountability—”

“One more word, and it’s detention, Mr. Potter.”

Harry swallowed. She smiled, and continued. “Your generation is struggling,” she said, with acid sympathy. “It is struggling because many of you — not all! But many — have been allowed to believe that their problems, their failures, are the fault of other people. They believe that because they are poor, or sad, or unable to get the jobs they want, it must be the fault of society. Because why should they try to work harder? Why should they pull themselves up, when it is so much easier to be angry at ‘ the system’?” She was more serious than she had yet been; the sheen of insincerity had slipped away, and she spoke in a hearty register, with conviction. She struck the podium with one soft fist. “But there are no systems,” she said patiently. “There are only people. Witches and wizards. Strong ones and weak ones. And when people are strong, they do great things. And when they are weak, they suffer.”

Hermione’s knuckles were white. Slowly, carefully, she put down her quill.

“I want you all to be strong,” said Umbridge earnestly. “I believe you all can be strong, if only given the right instruction. It is your duty as citizens of Great Britain, and as the next generation of witches and wizards, to become strong, and be a model to your own children. I will not give handouts. I will not hold your hand! I will not allow you to entertain delusions that you deserve special treatment simply because you are unhappy! Many people are unhappy!” She peered down at them with arch dignity. “But if you rise to the occasion… if you work hard, and take responsibility, and meet your obligations as citizens of the British Wizarding nation… then I think you will find yourselves much stronger than you have been led to believe by those adults who have coddled and failed you.”

She smiled at them. The smile was the worst part: it was wide and real and hopeful, evidence that for once, there was absolutely nothing insincere in her. She meant it. She meant it desperately. It was possibly the first thing he’d heard from her that she actually did believe.

No one raised their hand. She relaxed in evident satisfaction.

“Now,” she said, “I require a volunteer to read.”

Draco had always understood, accepted, and even appreciated that it was well within Hermione's capabilities to kill somebody; but he had never been so intrigued that it might actually happen before.

"I can't do this."

"Mm."

"I absolutely can't."

"So I gather."

"I can't take one more minute with her. I won't do it, I'll read up and take the O.WL. on my own. No, don't laugh, I'm seriously considering it."

"I'm sure you'd excel."

"What was Dumbledore thinking? She's an embarrassment!"

"Quite so."

"It's humiliating," said Hermione viciously, "to say nothing of irresponsible, for him to hire such a — an obvious incompetent; a condescending, power-hungry, conniving, obsequious—"

"'Obsequious,' good one."

"—supercilious, egotistic, pontifical—"

"'Pontifical' is lovely."

"—despotic, truculent, mean—"

"See, now you've gone too far."

"It's not funny," she snapped. He could admit, on reflection, that his tone had been too light; he was privately enjoying the glow of the sun on her face, which was furious, and radiating a flush as warm and rich as candleflame. He made a point to have no unusual thoughts, whatsoever, about her hair or her face; he didn't even notice that her socks were crooked, or what her legs looked like when she crossed them under the table. Nothing had changed.

"It isn't," he said. "Forgive me. I find it — mildly amusing — with respect for the obvious issues notwithstanding — that you're this riled."

"Are you joking? She's foul!"

"Naturally. She's a bureaucrat."

"Yes! What does that matter?"

"She's not important," he drawled, shouldering the door to the Great Hall, "or she wouldn't be here. She's more pathetic than intimidating."

"Easy for you to say, she likes you. She was all but fluttering her eyelashes — Victoria! No running in the Hall, do you even read the handbook?"

"Sorry, Miss Granger! Sorry! I'm sorry!"

"You don't have to call m— oh, there she goes, never mind. Do you suppose that was too harsh? They're so timid around me."

"Have you met yourself?"

"Very funny. I don't know why I'm asking you, I think Dennis passed out after you finished with him."

"Hopefully he'll remember that next time he fancies riding a broomstick indoors."

"You're going to get yourself a reputation," she said, with a glance out of the corner of her eye. "They'll start to talk. 'That Malfoy, the one with the big scary voice, he doesn't let anyone off.' I'm warning you, they talk to each other."

He wondered whether big scary voice was a personal assessment. "Good. It'll make my job easier."

This amused her. "What, ruling through fear?"

"If a threat's credible, you only need to make it once."

She hesitated, head cocked at a questioning angle; then she smirked, wry. "Well, that's hopelessly dramatic, don't you think? I don't mean to shock you, but not everything is a power play."

"Scratch my earlier question," he said. "Have you met me?"

Her high, bright laugh carried them to the Gryffindor table, the miseries of Defense already fading and forgotten.

It was a tight squeeze at the table's end, with Cho and Daphne swelling their usual number, so Hermione wiggled over and ended up sandwiched between him and Harry, thighs flush, knee to knee. She reached under the table and dragged her bag out of the way to make room for him, and her hand grazed his knee on accident.

He picked up a fork and spent a moment trying to remember what it was for.

Hermione was wriggling around, her thigh a hot line of soft pressure on his right side, and there was her hip, her elbow — less sexy, therefore his friend — her shoulder; as she twisted around to put her bag on the other side of the bench, her chest grazed his arm.

She twisted back around and muttered an apology, for what in God's name he could not have said. Her ankle appeared to be seeking locations under the table that didn't involve being in contact with his ankle. It was not succeeding. Her skirt had ridden up with the fussing and it wasn’t cold enough for tights, so it was down to a few millimeters of cotton between skin.

He was becoming so irritated by the constant wiggling and shifting around that he started to contemplate what she would do if he just whirled around and kissed her. He could take her by the shirt and haul her up on the table and teach her to go around touching a fellow’s kneecaps in public. As it were. Shut her up for a while.

Audience notwithstanding. He couldn’t remember them half the time anyway, when her skirt rode up over the knees.

“Draco.”

He recalled the purpose of a fork.

Ron had been offering him a plate of breadrolls for a horrifyingly unclear amount of time. “Last call,” he warned. “You want lunch or not?”

“Yes. Fine. Thank you.”

Hermione cleared her throat and folded herself into Harry’s side. This might have provoked a modicum of jealousy if Harry hadn’t immediately grumbled like Ron whenever Ginny tried to wrestle him.

“Sorry,” she announced, to no one in particular. Her face was flushing behind the curtain of her hair. She was endeavoring to put as much space between them as possible, and that stung in an unanticipated quadrant of his chest, because he didn’t think that it was altogether necessary.

A shadow fell over the table, and before anyone could look up, George clapped his hands over Ron’s eyes. Ron shouted and upset his plate, meanwhile Fred, Lee Jordan, and Katie Bell followed them up, bearing almost cartoonish grins.

“Quick! How do you block a Uruguayan flying double-barrel with two chasers in the fourth quadrant and a third on two?”

“Nah, don’t give him that, s’ an easy one,” called Katie. “Hey, Ron: how d’you block an inverse Frenchman’s Gambit from the left, with a southerly wind?”

“Please! Child’s play! Now, Ron, imagine it’s urgent: how do you deal with the Bulgarian Double-Breasted Booby? Upside down—”

“—both ways—”

“—in the snow?”

“GERROFF! Bastards!”

“Well, that’s not even a play,” said Katie mildly, and tousled his hair. “Congrats, mate. We’d haze you the normal way, but Umbridge repossessed the cattle prods. You’ll have to wait for tryouts.”

“As commentator, I cannot offer a personal opinion on any player or team,” announced Lee. He saluted Ron. “However, as a Gryffindor, I say verily unto you: welcome to Team Sexy. Tryouts pending.”

“Where’s the sexy?” demanded Ron. “All I see is these two ugly lumps and their girlfriend—”

“Oi!”

“Hey now,” said George, tweaking Ron’s ear. “Dinnae speak ill of the captain, lad.”

“Angelina’s a stone cold ten, first off, so let’s get that straight,” said Fred briskly, tweaking his other. Ron barked in frustration and shoved them off. “Second, we’re hard nines, elevens with suits on.”

“And there’s no girlfriend about it, Ronniekins. Freddie can’t be tied down.”

“I’m a wild, rugged individual.”

“Many have tried.”

“Following in Bill’s footsteps—”

“—if a castle bicycle has ‘footsteps’—”

“—as a perpetual bachelor. With Godric’s ghost as my witness, I shall never wed for love nor money.”

“Think Mum was hoping she’d have a grandchild on the spotter by now.”

“Not from him, though,” snickered Fred. “Haven’t even kissed a girl, have you, Ronaldonald?”

“Sod off!” he snapped, and shrank down in his seat. “George hasn’t, either! And Fred’s only ever snogged Angelina!”

“Have, too,” said George placidly.

“And have you seen Angelina?” drawled Fred, stealing a roll. “I nailed it in one, mate. That’s not the insult you think it is.”

Unable to rebut this, Ron rounded on George. “Who did you snog, then?”

“Anastasia Bonk, Hufflepuff chaser, Class of ’93,” he said promptly. “One wild night in the Restricted Section, and I was ruined forever for other women.”

“You’re lying.”

“Yeah. Got to second in the locker rooms and her boyfriend walked in. That did put me off the birds, for a bit, to be honest.”

“Git,” snorted Katie, but she was smiling. To Ron, she added: “Michael Corner, third year.”

“What!” said Cho, with renewed interest. “Michael Corner? With the glasses?”

“Yes’m.”

“But he’s the size of a teaspoon!”

“Most girls are smaller,” said Katie, shrugging, and Cho’s brain appeared to snuff out like a torch in the rain.

“What can you say? Boys or girls, everyone loves a quidditch player,” drawled Fred. “Ask Harry. He got it done last year, didn’t he?”

Harry said, “Oh, no, you see, I wasn’t even in this conversation,” but it was far too late.

“Cho!”

“Choooo!”

“Miss Chang!”

“Which makes you the last one, Ronnie. Our dear, innocent, virginal brother—”

“I hate you.”

“Eh. Wait till you’ve played a game,” he said. “Fred’s not wrong about the uniform. Turns it on like a faucet, I tell you.”

Hermione choked on her food and doubled over. Katie whacked her on the back.

“Lay off him. It’s not a race, and anyway, Ron’s not the last one,” said Harry, frowning. “Draco—”

He broke off, suddenly aware of how intensely several people were looking at him. Or perhaps Draco’s attempts at wandless magic were working, and he simply had an aneurysm.

“Potter,” he said. He set down his knife and fork. “I believe you misspoke. What you were about to say surely had nothing at all to do with my personal business.”

“No,” said Harry, lying.

Daphne tossed her hair in a wide spume of fluffy gold. “Really, now,” she said. “Kissing’s not so grand a thing. It’s not a proposal, is it? I thought we were all libertines, over here.”

“Have you?” said Ron to Draco, vaguely casual. “I mean, just curious.”

“Does it matter?” Hermione said stiffly.

“No, ’course it doesn’t. Just asking him about his life, you know?.”

A new, interesting, even worse silence happened then.

“He has, though,” said Fred, in tones so soft and high they were almost tender. “Right, Blondie?”

Daphne cleared her throat. “I’ve kissed loads of people,” she announced, “if anyone’s interested in that. I’ve kept a list. Pansy once composed them all into a poem. Would anyone like to hear it? There’s a bit where she rhymes ‘Richard’ with ‘Prick-Hard,’ it’s quite a scream.”

“Fourth year,” said Hermione suddenly. She cut into her lunch with swift, crisp movements of her knife. “By the pumpkin patch. See? Daphne’s right, it’s not a big deal.”

“Fourth year?” said Cho tentatively. “Did that mean — was it—”

“Yes,” she said crisply, as Draco placed his fork slowly and tenuously on the table, resenting the thorny bristle in his chest. “It’s private, if you don’t mind.”

“Oh — oh, yes, I’m sorry.”

“It’s fine,” said Hermione, with a sharp look, as if the apologies irritated her more than the question; and then she shook her head, and tucked into her lunch as if she had ended the conversation, which she almost did.

He was still contemplating how to save himself. So far, he had come up with the two options of running away and dying.

Fred slowly steepled his fingers in front of his mouth. He lowered them at Daphne.

“It was you, wasn’t it?”

“No,” she tried, but it was too late, because she was fidgeting, and there was a lot of hooting from the twins. Draco was going to immolate her, and then himself. Maybe he would do himself first, come to think of it. “No, no, but really, I mean, it wasn’t a snog—”

“You laid one on him! You dog, Greengrass!”

“You got him! Draco ‘Tightarse’ Malfoy, Mr. No Eye Contact Until Marriage himself—”

“I’m going to see McGonagall,” said George seriously, pumping her hand, “about getting you an award for Special Services to the School.”

“Oh, stop, stop — do stop — look, he’s uncomfortable—”

“Greengrass,” he snarled. The surface of his skin would soon be acquiring a nice char.

“I thought,” she whispered, hiding her face from the twins, “you have to understand — Draco, I thought — I didn’t think — you haven’t told —?”

He couldn’t bring himself to look at Hermione, or he really did expect to start a fire.

“Stop,” said Hermione.

The thing, whatever it was, stopped.

“You’re being juvenile,” she said coolly, “and beastly, and ridiculously mean to everyone. Go bother someone else, or I’ll write to Molly and tell them what you’ve been feeding the first years.”

Fred and George both reared back, startled; the invocation of Molly was enough to have them on their back feet. Harry edged away from her. Daphne had laced her fingers and appeared to be hiding behind them in misery.

Hermione gave a pointed little nod down the table, and the two of them slouched off, muttering half-hearted apologies in Ron’s direction.

Draco lapsed again into a reverie wherein he hauled her onto the table and kissed her.

There was a commotion down the hall. Umbridge had come down from the staff table and was watching, her expression thickly satisfied, as Romilda Vane clambered out of the table on shaky legs. Several of her friends had cried out in objection.

“The Hogwarts Dress Code,” said Umbridge, clasping her hands, “prescribes that skirts must fall below one’s fingertips. Miss Vane, please stand up straight and put your hands to your sides.”

Hermione sucked a breath through her teeth; Romilda had rolled her skirt up at the waistband, to make it shorter. Half the girls in the castle did.

Rigidly, Romilda lowered her head and her hands to her sides.

“Ah,” said Umbridge, “yes, Miss Vane, that is a very big gap! My goodness! Are you aware that the Hogwarts Need Fund provides financial assistance to students whose families cannot afford robes that fit?”

Romilda muttered something.

“When addressing an instructor,” said Umbridge, “you will speak clearly. Were you aware that your skirt breaks the dress code?”

“N— I have long arms.”

“No, you do not,” said Umbridge sweetly. “Ten points from Gryffindor, and you will be excused from the first class of the afternoon to go and change.”

Face burning, Romilda ran out of the hall. From the Hufflepuff table, Cedric Diggory half-rose from his seat, looking quite angry; but someone grabbed his arm and pulled him back down.

“I’m thinking poison,” muttered Ron. “Show of hands, for poison?”

Daphne made an intrigued noise and lifted hers. Draco rolled his eyes and hauled it down again.

The hour bell groaned, calling them to Transfiguration. The table quickly dispersed — Harry gladly removing himself from the dire locus of territory inside Hermione’s hitting range, and Ron shooting her fervently grateful looks, that only increased Draco’s irritation, if anything.

Hermione, for her part, cleared out before anyone could say anything else, or indeed anyone could.

She was ruthlessly efficient, but her legs were short. He caught her on the way out of the hall.

“Granger?”

“What?” she said calmly. Her strides were long and smooth. “How are you? I’m sorry about that, that was brutal.”

This was not what he had expected. There was something alarming in how dissimilar it was to what he expected.

“Fine,” he said. “It’s nothing. Greengrass has a loose mouth.”

“Apparently,” she said, and then winced. Her step flagged. “I’m sorry. That — wasn’t kind.”

“It’s fine.”

“No, it’s not. It’s not wrong for girls to kiss people. She can kiss anyone she wants. I do mean that. I’m not joking.”

“That’s true.”

“So she did?”

They reached a staircase, and she took them two at once. The others fell rapidly behind them, a cluster of murmurs and curious stares twisting out of sight on the stairwell. The winding halls above them were crowded enough to ensure privacy in the anonymity of a crowd.

“Kiss you, that is,” said Hermione, after a moment where he said nothing. “Sorry, don’t answer that if you don’t want to. I’m as bad as the twins.”

“You’re not.”

“Thanks.” She hopped a trick stair with an easy jump, wobbled, and he touched her elbow on his way up. They kept climbing.

“It was a perfunctory situation,” he said. “It wasn’t — I’m not involved.”

She laughed awkwardly.

“What.”

“Perfunctory?”

“Yes.”

“That’s the word you’d use for kissing a girl? Perfunctory.”

“It’s the word I’d use for kissing that girl, yes.”

“Gosh, you ladykiller,” she said mildly, swinging around a corner. He checked it, from instinct. Mad-Eye’s drills stuck around. “No wonder they’re all batty for you.”

“Excuse me?”

“Oh — muggle term, I forgot — it doesn’t really mean killing—”

“Don’t care. Who’s ‘they’?”

“Nice try.”

“I’m serious.” But they had found the Transfiguration classroom, drawing the inquest to a close.

“It’s really none of my business,” she said, with perfect calm, and it bothered him.

It could’ve been. It really could’ve been, if she wanted. If she’d been irritated, or pitched a row at him, then it would’ve been better. Worse, facially, because of the rowing, but better. Because if she’d announced that she’d snogged someone, he’d be irritated out of his skin.

He didn’t want to kiss anyone else, and it would have been more assuring if they were of a mind about it.

He preferred her angry to apathetic, at any rate. At least then she was paying attention to him.

But Hermione said calmly: “Anyway. Poor Daphne. I think she was about to explode. You’re a bit terrifying when you’re mad, you know.”

“Not as terrifying as I should be, apparently.” They entered the queue for the classroom, which was a slow-moving body.

“No, you are. You get this… look, to you, and you go still. I mean very still, unnaturally so. I can’t ever tell if you do it on purpose, to scare people, but either way it makes me think you’re going to curse someone. Or smite them, or something.”

“I don’t terrify you,” he said, half a question in it.

“Mm. I’ve seen you get knocked on your arse. It kills the mystique.”

“Not all of it, surely?”

“Most of it, I’m afraid.”

“You break my heart.”

And she gave a loud, annoying sort of laugh, the kind that most people found irritating and trumpetlike, and in his opinion was well worth their discomfort or indeed almost any cost. The moment ended when they were herded into Transfiguration, which obscured the question of what she found quite so funny about it.

At the dark breach of morning in mid-September, Ron roused him with a pointed whisper: “C’mon. My dad’s here.”

Draco peeled one eye open and regarded him in the forlorn hope that he might be some sort of unusual ginger sleep demon.

When seconds passed, and neither Ron nor the irksome gleam of his Lumos went away, he rubbed his face and sighed. “He’s on the Floo?”

“No, numpty, he’s hiding in the closet.”

He dressed in the dark, forgoing his jumper and tie, bothering only to render himself marginally presentable in a dress shirt and trousers. In the autumn, Gryffindor Tower nearly froze under the constant submersion of wind off the moors, and the stone held chill like an icebox, leaving fractals of frost on the window panes, and the air helped to haul him back to consciousness. He did not esteem Arthur any better for electing to call his son at the witching hour.

Which was not to say he didn't understand it. No other students abused themselves to rise at this hour, and not one measly first year dozed in an armchair by the fire. The common room was held hostage by Crookshanks, who had captured a piece of prime real estate on the sofa and hoarded it, purring jealously. Draco was so rarely awake at this time that he found himself newly acquainted with the Tower and its winding staircases, the faint gray glow that came from the sectioned windows, through which an indigo sunrise was setting up shop on the Forbidden Forest's eastern crest. He announced himself to the common room with a jaw-breaking yawn, which made Crookshanks chirp fondly in greeting, and made the cat's owner turn around where she knelt at the fire, her face half green from the flames.

Her hair was down, its contours lost in an amorphous dark shape silhouetted by flame, and one of Molly's jumpers, with a gold HG knitted over the breast pocket. Like all of Molly's jumpers, it anticipated several years of growth, but only some of those years had occurred, because she had rucked up the sleeves and the collar slipped down one shoulder, which was as close as she ever came to dishevelment.

Harry padded in blearily, still robed in oversized muggle sleep clothes; he was struggling to keep his glasses on his face, as unbeknownst to him, they were upside down.

Ron yawned. "Dad? You still there?"

"I'm here, Ron!"

Arthur's face emerged from the flames, a shimmering projection of emerald and light. He beamed when his son loped into view of the fireplace and dropped down cross-legged by the hearth. Draco and Harry followed, clambering down to huddle near the fire, which had the added benefit of providing a place to warm his hands.

"Sorry about the time!" he added, and broke into a yawn. "Couldn't get the Floo alone any other time, m'afraid. And Ron'll tell you, it's been wretched trouble trying to schedule this by owl, Mad-Eye's a goblin about post—"

"Pejorative," mumbled Hermione, and then yawned herself, nearly splitting her face open. Something soft turned around in Draco's chest and laid down.

He folded his arms and leaned against the foot of an armchair, sulking.

"—ah, yes, you're right, my girl, I'm sorry; Mad-Eye's a wanker about post," said Arthur. Harry laughed. "Won't let me hardly send anything, and he's not wrong, but I think one of these days Molly's going to catch him raiding her mail-order catalogs and bite his head off. Can't wait, too. Anyway — tell me everything! How are you? Keeping your chins up, eh, not letting them get you down? Tell me something good, why don't you, Merlin knows I could use it — say, Harry, how's Cho?"

Harry blushed deeply. "She's — er — really good."

"Really good?"

Hermione giggled, hiding her face behind her knees.

His chest did the thing again. He lifted his eyes to the ceiling.

"Dad!" said Ron, aghast.

“No, no, I’m sorry, we’ll let it rest. Harry, more importantly: is your scar alright?”

The ghost of Harry’s blush was exorcized by irritation. “Why does everyone want to know about my scar?” he said shortly. “First Sirius, now you? It’s fine!”

“Remus said that it had been hurting.”

“And I don’t see how it’s anyone’s business!”

“Your health is absolutely his business,” said Arthur, “and mine, for one thing. For another, if Dumbledore’s right, those pains are part of a connection with You-Know-Who, and you need to start learning to defend yourself — well, yesterday would be best, but ‘now’ is a close second.”

Hermione straightened. “You think that Voldemort—”

Ron and Draco both winced.

“—might have a way into Harry’s mind? Through the scar?”

Arthur grimaced. “That’s Dumbledore’s worry.”

“How did you figure that out? The connection?”

“No idea,” he said frankly. “Nobody knows where all our information comes from, ’cept Dumbledore, and he’s final say on who knows what. Alastor’s a close second, but even he doesn’t have all our agents’ names — nor does he want them. Likes to have as many baskets as he does eggs, Mad-Eye. Speaking of which.” He turned to Ron. “What’s this about a mole?”

“Someone knows Padfoot’s in the Order,” Hermione broke out, lowering her voice. “We’ve heard rumors about him and the Order, and someone mentioned there’s a Ministry dossier for him, which means—”

“Someone might know where the headquarters is,” said Draco.

Arthur winced.

“That’s not good,” he said. “No, not good at all. I — you’re sure?”

“Yeah. We think it’s Percy,” added Ron, with savage conviction.

“It’s not Percy.”

“No, but listen. We worked it out, right? Mum’s been writing him all year, we know that, and all she’d have to do was let it slip; he could’ve heard about Padfoot or the Order from anybody, her or Bill or Gin, hell, I think I probably said ‘Sirius’ around him once or twice —”

“Your mother,” said Arthur, “wouldn’t have told him.”

“Not on purpose, obviously,” Ron insisted, “but if she made a mistake —”

“Ron, take it from someone who’s known your mother a bit longer than you have,” said Arthur calmly. “Believe me: she didn’t.”

Ron scowled.

“It’s me,” said Harry, in a low, calm, rictus of dread.

All looked at him.

“Voldemort can get into my mind. Right? We were all ready to blame Percy, but the girl — the person Draco heard it from — she mentioned Buckbeak. Buckbeak’s not even at Grimmauld Place. Why would Molly tell Percy about him?” He raked his hand through his hair. “How would you even know that? Unless you’d seen my memories, from third year—”

“Harry, no, no!” Arthur was quick, almost panicky. “Dear boy, really! There’s no reason to believe that — none at all — even Dumbledore doesn’t think You-Know-Who can read your memories—”

“How would you know?” Harry snarled, scrambling to his feet. “How would anyone know that, except me? I can’t defend myself, you said it yourself—”

“Harry, sit down,” said Hermione, and her voice cut through Harry’s fug of anger; he looked down, blinking, like someone splashed cold water on him.

She inclined her head at him with exasperated affection.

“Say Voldemort is in your head,” she said, “which, for the record, you didn’t even believe five minutes ago — but say that he is. Say that he knows everything about the Order, absolutely everything. You think the first thing he’s going to do with all that information is go open a file at the Ministry?”

Ron guffawed in hoarse relief; Harry deflated somewhat.

She gave a little laugh. “I mean,” she said, “you think Grimmauld Place would still be standing if Voldemort knew everything you do? You think you would still be alive? This is why you’re not our strategist, Harry.”

“But — Buckbeak,” said Harry, with watery, reluctant relief. “And Remus.”

“Information that any mole could have easily, if they’d been to Grimmauld Place in the last four months,” she continued calmly, “Sirius tells that story fairly often, he’s quite proud of it. Which reminds me of another reason it can’t be you: some of that girl’s information was wrong. Sirius isn’t the leader of the Order of the Phoenix, and everyone important very well knows that, so whoever said that to the Ministry was either misinformed or lying, possibly to protect the real leader of the Order — which tells me that if they are inner-circle, it’s someone who likes Dumbledore, but doesn’t like Sirius. Either way, it’s not you, or it’s not just you, and if it is you it’s not your fault Dumbledore sent you to live in an Order safehouse knowing full well Voldemort might have a radio into your head. But I don't think he's stupid enough to do that, so I suspect there's something else going on. Like a mole, for instance."

Finishing, she smoothed her blanket over her legs like a queenly skirt.

Harry nodded jerkily, sat down.

"Well-put," said Arthur, after a stunned pause. "It's important information, I agree, and I'm touched that you went through all the trouble of trying to get it to us. I'll relay it to everyone, and I'm sure Mad-Eye will figure out some sort of inquisition." He chuckled. "Probably make his year, come to think."

"You're not concerned?" said Hermione skeptically.

"On the contrary, I'm very concerned."

"Yes, but — I mean, I'm sorry, but you don't seem it."

Arthur softened. "I understand. But Dumbledore would tell you to think tactically. What else can we do? Padfoot is still walled up in Grimmauld, and that place could survive an air raid without losing so much as a chimney. The rest of us still have our covers intact. It's obviously concerning that someone has eyes inside the building, but whatever information they're leaking isn't enough for the Ministry to act on, because if it was, they would have used it already."

"But wouldn't it be safer to relocate?" said Ron. "Just to be sure?"

Arthur smiled faintly. "Where do you suggest? The age of the house, and Padfoot's claim to it, gives us access to wards that even the Burrow doesn't have. And most of Mad-Eye's safehouses won't serve as a nexus for the work we're doing. We need somewhere central, it's essential to the operation."

“What operation? Are you doing spy stuff?”

“The first rule of spy stuff,” said his father seriously, “is not to discuss spy stuff on the Floo. Or so I’m told.”

“It is, then! Bang-on! Can we help?”

“You can help us by passing your O.W.L.s,” Arthur said sternly. “You can help us by keeping yourselves safe, and protecting each other. How’s the new professor, Dolores…?”

“Awful,” said Hermione shortly, “really hideous, thanks for asking.”

“Mm. Yes. I suspected so. Had a few run-ins with her, over the years — she’s got a passionate hatred for muggles, that woman, I mean a vitriolic, mean-spirited attitude, not just the usual pureblood prejudice… no offense,” he added, generously, to Draco.

“None was being taken. ”

“I’m sorry I don’t have any better advice,” said Arthur. “But try to keep your head down. The more attention she pays to you — the more she’s interested in your families, your grades, your background — the more she’ll dig, and that’s when your mother and I start entering the picture. Which is a security risk. The best thing you can do for the Order is stand back and try to keep out of trouble. That goes double for you, Harry.”

“I’m doing my best,” said Harry, plaintively, “and it’s not my fault no one seems to bloody believe me when I say that.”

“They may harbor understandable doubts,” said Draco, “about the extent of ‘best.’”

“Of course you’re not,” Arthur agreed peaceably. “But Dumbledore says—” He peered over his shoulder. “Oh! Now? I’ve got Ron here — right, yes, that is what ‘now’ means. Sorry, boys— and Hermione — got to run—”

“What for?” demanded Ron. “Is it Order stuff?”

“Can’t say. Might be a grocery run, honestly. Alright. I love you all very much. And please listen to me, about lying low; if you don’t, I’m going to tell your mother.”

“Good luck with that,” said Harry smugly, causing Ron to guffaw, and Arthur wrinkled his nose at him.

“Meaning Molly, you little stink.”

“Wait,” Harry added, as Arthur turned away. “D’you think we could call Padfoot like this? If we woke up early—?”

Arthur’s smile flickered. “Well — I’ll ask, but you know — we’re trying to keep certain persons off the Floo, just now. For security. Especially since the castle Floo network is public.”

“Maybe I could go down to Hogsmeade and Floo him from a private line, if that’s better—”

“We’ll see. In the meantime—”

“—or a, a muggle payphone, there are some close to Number Twelve, he wouldn’t have to go far—”

“I’ll ask,” said Arthur firmly, in a way that ended the debate. “And at the very latest, you’ll see everyone again at Christmas. Goodbye.”

“Right,” mumbled Harry. “Christmas.”

Arthur’s head shimmered away into flames, and green warmed to feeble yellow.

A creak issued cheerfully from the foundations. The dawn-light in the windows had clustered together in long shards of white that pierced the opposite walls. It was growing warmer in the tower, and footsteps thumped in and out of earshot upstairs, like an old heart clawing back to life.

They adjourned to bathe and dress. When he came back downstairs, the common room was busier, populated with various groups trailing down to breakfast; Fred and George were urging Euan Abercrombie to eat a suspiciously pink toffee, clipboards aloft; Colin Creevey was examining a layout for the next edition of the Hogwarts Enquirer, a Sugar Quill dangling from his mouth like a cigarette; Seamus had his cassette deck out, and he was playing a new album from a group called the Smashing Pumpkins, a nasal voice, a melancholia of guitars; Dean was crooning along with his feet in Seamus's lap while Seamus did his eyeliner in Katie's pocket mirror: Time is never time at all…

"You know, while we're on that thought, I was thinking about the twins said earlier," said Hermione. "About not learning anything from Umbridge. Because everyone's in the same boat, aren't we? We can't get anything from that book, and she's scaring people out of coming to class altogether."

"Can't get anything from a book?" said Harry. He snapped his fingers in front of her face. "Are you ill?"

"I said that book, and Defense is inescapably practical, like Potions."

"Or Herbology," said Neville, wandering down the stairs behind Ron. He scratched his head. "What're we talking about?"

"Hermione wants us to do more reading," said Ron.

"Not just 'more reading,'" she said impatiently. "It needs to be a real practice group. Like a dueling club, actually. And Harry would lead it, naturally."

Harry choked on air.

"Wot?"

Draco flicked his wand, and his airway cleared with a wheeze.

“You could show us everything you’ve learned through practice for the Tournament, and Draco and I could do research—”

“Intriguing, how I always end up conscripted in these things.”

“But you could also help with the practice part,” she assured him, as if his complaint had been not having enough work. “Since you’ve got experience with Dark magic—”

“Excuse me? What’s that supposed to mean, ‘experience’?”

“You said your house was full of Dark artifacts!”

“That doesn’t mean I’ve used them! Your parents are dental Healers, that doesn’t mean you can — I don’t know, create teeth—”

“And Ron,” she said, breezing past any kind of credit for remembering what a ‘dentist’ was, “you could help teach, if nothing else, since you’re a natural. And I could handle the lesson planning, and such,” she said, sounding like this was a prize treat, “and we could all… work together. To help each other.”

There was a pause. Harry and Ron wore twin expressions of skeptical intrigue. Draco was made uncomfortable by the suggestion, which seemed to solicit attention and punishment, but he felt more uncomfortable raising the point.

Hermione threw up her hands.

“Or we can just all go fail alone, like she wants us to! That’s fine to me, I’m sure I’ll manage so you all can do what you like—”

“No, hang on, it’s great!”

“Seriously, it’s a good idea,” said Ron, “I’m just — thinking logistics, how we’d swing it, wouldn’t be the easiest—”

“Oh,” she said, mollified. “Well, we’d have to figure that out, of course.”

“That sounds great,” said Neville wishfully. “You guys have f-f-fun.”

The four of them looked at him. He turned back to his homework with a grave, polite expression.

“Neville,” said Ron, as if he were a bit stupid, “d’you want to join?”

“Oh, no,” he said sadly. “I mean, yes, I’d love to, but I’d only slow you down.”

“Neville Longbottom,” snapped Hermione, “you’re a person, and it’s ridiculous that students at a school like this should feel embarrassed for needing to be taught. Anyway, she’s a complete toad, I can’t believe you listened to her.”

“But she was right, I can’t — it’s not your lot’s job to make me—”

“I seem to recall tutoring you in Potions for three years,” said Draco dryly.

“That’s b-b-beside the point!”

Ron interrupted them. “Do you want to help? Is that it?” he broke in. “Because I could use a hand on my Herbology. Sprout’s reaming me this year, I’m gunning for a D.”

“W— I can do that,” Neville said, as if he was shocked. “That’s easy.”

“Not for the rest of us, tosser.”

“Sorry! I didn’t m-m-mean it like— b-but that’s p-p-perfectly straight-f-f-forward,” he said. “I know how to d-d-do it, it c-c-can’t be hard.”

Daphne’s laugh tinkled, and she sat up from the sofa. “Neville,” she said, “don’t be silly. I’m in three study groups, and I haven’t the brains of a jellyfish. We must be shameless about it, us brainless chaps, if we’re to get anywhere.”

“Thank you, Daphne, you’re welcome to join,” said Hermione. “Six is a nice round number, and it makes the work easier if we can divide it up.”

“I’m not good for a stitch of it, my dear, but I can bring snacks.”

Hermione drew breath, then hesitated. “That,” she said carefully, “would also be nice.”

Daphne beamed at her, and Hermione hesitantly smiled back.

“I want it noted,” Draco said, “that I think this is unlikely to end well.”

“You never think anything will end well,” said Harry.

“And I’ve yet to be wrong.”

“I’m still alive, aren’t I?”

“As I said.”

“Prat!”

“You don’t have to help, y’know,” said Ron, buffing his fingernails, “if you’re chicken.”

“Ronald, you have in subtlety what a hippogriff has.”

“We’ll table it,” said Hermione.

“Which means you think you’ve won,” he said, mildly peeved, “and stalling will lead me to accept it.”

“Doesn’t matter. Three to one,” said Ron wisely. “You’re outvoted. Megamajority.”

“Super - majority,” said Hermione.

“Sure. Draco’s screwed, is the point.”

“Oh. Yes.”

“I’m not! This friendship isn’t a democracy!”

“You’re right. It’s a dictatorship, and Hermione’s running it,” said Harry. Hermione dimpled at him and preened.

The rill of discomfort that tripped down Draco’s spine was instinctual; it put his hairs up with the suspicion that he was undertaking more danger than he chose to acknowledge. He reminded himself that Umbridge was a professor, and that school associations were not, for the time being, against the rules; that no matter how grim the hallways turned, how bleak the silence in between classes, if there was one thing Hogwarts could not, as an institution, prohibit, it was studying the practice of magic.

But God, if it didn’t feel like danger. It frightened him that he was the only person to feel the current of danger swimming underneath them, lapping at their ankles — and worse, he felt himself being drawn after them into the water, knee-deep and freezing as the tide came in.

There were certain things that inevitably happened when you broke with power. When you stood against anything, even with people at your back, there was still something that lay ahead.

His father had learned that lesson. Too late, he’d learned it. Draco had spent a lot of long, sleepless, angry nights wondering why the lesson hadn’t stuck earlier, and it shook loose something wild and grief-stricken in him, to wonder if maybe this was the reason.

And it was such a tiny reason, really: just the feeling of watching Hermione tilt her head, smile hopefully, and silently, thoughtlessly demand of him unspeakable bravery. A silent order for the very best of himself to stand in evidence for her examination, without even any particular guarantee of approval. A call to do something bold and terrible, because she wanted it.

And so what, then. He had told her he’d follow her; he couldn’t very well renege on it now.

“Go easy.”

Confusion dimmed her smile.

“What?” she said.

She couldn’t know what he meant, of course. That wasn’t her fault. He was glad she didn’t.

A passel of laughter broke out by the fireplace, and the common room burbled with glad music. It was hardly recognizable as the same room it had been an hour ago, that cold dark chamber full of whispers and talk of spies. It wasn’t possible that the two places could exist in the same space, separated by a bare collection of minutes — nothing so insubstantial as an hour could change something that much. Because even though the hard edges of that conversation lingered in his memory, in this room, the other couldn’t exist.

-The 1995 Gryffindor prefect dynamic isn't so much "good cop/bad cop" as "bad cop/will-literally-eat-your-face cop." Which produces such exchanges as the above, paraphrased:

-Hermione: am I being too hard on them?

-Draco "regularly imagines corporal punishment" Malfoy: Of course not. Why do you ask?

-Credit where credit is due: Umbridge’s speech was strongly inspired by a famous remark by a very famous British politician.

-I like to imagine that Bill got his earring before he left Hogwarts, and that it did despicable things to the female Gryffindor population.

-I also like to imagine Colin Creevey running around in a little paperboy getup. There's no reason for this. I know he's wearing a Hogwarts uniform in every scene. But still. He gets his hands on a box of candy cigarettes and gives McGonagall a heart attack.

-Writing the Great Hall scene in chapter was a fantastic reminder of why no one should ever miss high school. Especially if your siblings went to the same school as you did.

-Thank you, thank you, thank you to everyone who commented. I had so much incredible encouragement, I wish I could have responded to them all. Know that I have read every one, and I wish you all a hot cup of tea brewed just how you like it, served in a beautiful teacup made of bone china. (Or coffee, for preference.)

-Next chapter: "The Miseducation of Hermione Granger."

The Miseducation of Hermione Granger

Chapter 62: The Miseducation of Hermione Granger

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Enveloped by the fiery vestitures of a highland autumn, the quidditch pitch sat at the base of the hill, an iron crown frilled in burgundy.

It was a fine, sunny afternoon, the second Tuesday of the term, and the vanishing few clouds that came wandering over the hills were as goosefeathers on a blue coverlet. Most of the team was already assembled on the pitch. Angelina wore her box braids in a high ponytail and stood with her broomstick cocked at her hip, directing a mass of queuing hopefuls. Fred and George warmed up by ricocheting a bludger across the field between them. Katie was doing a series of show-offy stretches with her legs.

In the stands, a collection of spectators had filed in, including Hermione — who had complained about it all the way to the pitch, but also passionately rejected any offers to skive off.

It was gratifying that she'd come to watch, even if she had buried her nose in a book the moment she sat down, and seemed unlikely to witness any fits of dazzling aerial brilliance that certain handsome persons might be inclined to do.

Which was her own loss, really.

Angelina drifted above the crowd, piping twice on her whistle. "OI, EVERYBODY!" she shouted, at earsplitting volume. Fred, with one finger in his ear, shot her a thumbs-up. "WELCOME TO QUIDDITCH TRYOUTS! WE'VE GOT ONE SPOT THIS YEAR, AND IT'S KEEPER. IF YOU CAN'T FLY KEEPER, HEAD ON OUT AND SAVE EVERYONE'S TIME."

No one moved. She shrugged.

“ALRIGHT, THEN. MOUNT YOUR BROOMS!”

Draco kicked off, and the Nimbus purred to top speed in the time it took to blink.

It was a beautiful afternoon for flying, and he cut into the sky like a dash of red paint, a blurry arc. He crested the stands and arched into a hairpin turn with his whole body, dragging the broomstick through a beautifully structured turn, like half a helix; then he bent and dipped into a long straightaway over the stands, the wind rushing up to welcome him back.

Players leapt into the air like a flock of red birds, jostling each other or grappling for control of their broomsticks. Most of them were hopelessly slow; they were too frightened of the broom, too worried of losing control at top speeds. He spun into a dive, corkscrewed out of it, and wove through the other players like an eel through a current. Some of them startled and yelped when he shouldered past, but others, like Ginny, only shouldered him back and pressed faster, cutting through the crowds, breaking out into a small formation at the front of the pack.

Harry was above them all, knitting a dizzy series of aerial stunts through the air over the pitch. His face was slack and peaceful, and it was the most relaxed Draco had seen him all summer, if not long before.

Without warning, Ginny split from the pack and rocketed past him, sending him into a clumsy spin, and they had a laughing exchange at the top of their lungs that it was good the younger students couldn’t hear.

It was soon Ginny’s turn. Draco attempted to evaluate her objectively as a player, without indulging in favoritism on the basis of someone being tolerable. She was good at tricky shots: there was a clear level of skill and imagination on display, and she had the reach to execute them, as well as the requisite fearlessness. One block saw her dangling from her knee and left arm, under her broomstick, in order to knock away a ball with fiendish underspin from Angelina. When she saw an opportunity, she tended to do something brilliant, or else missed it altogether.

One of them was Draco's. He judged that she favored her right side, as people used to playing chaser tended to, and pitched across her body, socketing it under her left arm. It whistled freely through the hoop.

Ginny swore and swiped at empty air. The quaffle shot through the hoop and he flew to catch it, a showy dive down the back of the goalposts, and hocked it back to Katie for the next shot. A group in the stands erupted into applause, and he noticed that several people besides Hermione had come to watch: Lavender, Parvati, and Padma Patil, as well as Cho and another girl from Ravenclaw, were waving streamers and drinking what appeared to be pumpkin juice from champagne flutes.

Parvati waved cheerfully and whistled at him. Padma hid her face, then picked up a book and began hitting Parvati with it.

He rolled his eyes and saluted at them. Lavender mimed a catch and pressed it to her chest.

Hermione clapped mildly. She sat apart from them with a book open on her legs and a cup of tea steaming on her right, and she arched a deeply skeptical eyebrow when the girls started cheering. At Lavender's catch, she made a show of rolling her eyes so hard her whole head moved.

He floated down within earshot. When his shadow covered her page, she glanced up, unimpressed.

"Having fun?"

"Not as much as some," she said, wryly. Her face was faintly flushed from the sunlight, and the wind sent her hair dancing free of its clasp.

“Do you mean me? Because you’re not wrong.”

“Not quite what I meant.”

“No?”

She leaned forward on her knees, smiling conspiratorially. “I don’t mean to shock you, but I think some people,” she said, “didn’t come for the quidditch.”

“So they’re like you, then.”

She was startled; her mouth parted.

“Supporting their friends,” he said. “House spirit. Et cetera.”

“You are not Parvati’s friend.”

“I might be.”

“You might be?”

“Yeah, I might be.”

“Mm. And would that sudden change in relations have anything to do with her blowing kisses at you?”

He smirked. “Wouldn’t you like to know?”

She gave a snort of disgust. “You’re ridiculous.”

“Am I.”

“And shallow.”

“Shallow, you say?”

“Meaning vain. Easily flattered. Conceited.”

“Careful, I’ve still got to fly straight.”

“Well, you can always go talk to Parvati, if you’d like a change of pace.” Her head cocked sideways, rueful. The corner of her mouth twisted.

He was aware that this was not precisely a friendly tenor of conversation. He was speaking a bit too low, and she was a bit too drawling, and there was a kind of — pleasant tension to it, like they were competing for something. It was a game of feints, like a drill or a practice, where you could say anything except the reason you were playing. You could point at the tension so long as you called it something else.

But it wasn’t illegal, a bit of flirting. Between friends. George and Angelina flirted, sometimes, and they were platonic as it came. Lavender would flirt with a skrewt. At any rate, Hermione certainly didn’t seem bothered by it — she was back to her book in a moment, anyway — and so he was safe, the whole thing was safe, it was deniable, which meant he didn’t have to stop.

It wasn't a change. Just a transposition.

“MALFOY!”

Angelina nearly bowled him over. “YOU! BLOND TOSSER! SOME OF US ARE TRYING TO PLAY QUIDDITCH IF YOU’D LIKE TO JOIN US—”

“Coming, Johnson, Merlin—”

“—IF I WANTED SOMEONE TO SIT ON A BROOMSTICK AND JABBER I COULD GET PEEVES TO FLY YOUR SLOT, HE’D BE A DAMN SIGHT FUNNIER—”

“Alright, I said, alright—”

“—KNOW BLOODY WELL IF YOU’D PULLED THIS WITH OLIVER HE’D TAKE THE SKIN OFF YOUR TAINT AND DON’T THINK I WON’T—”

She harried him back to the goalhoops, bellowing. Lavender’s clique gave a raucous burst of laughter.

Ron was finishing his keeper’s tryout. He wasn’t showy; he had great height, long reach, and a solid, dependable coverage of the keeper’s box. He’d only missed one, and it was Draco’s, which he’d changed up at the last minute to a spinning backhand — a tricky switch-up that no keeper at the school had ever comfortably got their hands on, and so no great shame to miss.

Angelina rounded out the tryouts with a chaser’s scrimmage. She divided the candidates into teams of four and had them fly five-minute scrambles, pulling out the strongest keepers from the shootout to guard the goals. Two of these being Ginny and Ron.

Ginny flew well, but she kept darting off the line to help out her chasers — couldn’t particularly blame her, given the state of them — and finally Angelina whistled her out.

“Stay in your box!”

“But I had a shot!”

“What you have are chasers! It’s their shot, not yours!”

“It would’ve been my shot if I’d made it!”

“Woulda, coulda, shoulda,” Angelina shouted, checking her watch. “Next time you’d better make it, then. Next up! Stockton, Cattell, Harris! Yates, to the box—”

A commotion was happening on the ground. A short woman in a pillbox hat marched out of the gates, her kitten heels sinking awkwardly into the soft earth of the pitch. She squinted up at them, her face pinched, and then started waving her hands and hopping up and down.

Angelina groaned.

“What’s she want?” Harry snapped, drawing up alongside Draco.

“Dunno, but bet you we will soon,” said Katie grimly. Angelina soared down and dismounted neatly in front of Umbridge, whereon they broke at once into a very fast, gesture-heavy conversation. “Hope Angie keeps her head.”

Umbridge was shorter than Angelina, and had come directly from the castle, for her full suit and frilled jabot stood sorely out of place among the uniforms and training pinnies. Grass stains on her pink suede heels proclaimed the great personal inconvenience she had undertaken to make the visit, and, as it happened, the points of her heels kept sinking into the earth, requiring her to yank them out every few seconds, a task that obviously did only good things for her disposition.

“But as your professor, I am burdened with a duty of care,” she cried. “And I am afraid it is no use! You may submit an application to use the field if and when the Gryffindor team has followed the requisite procedures!”

“I got McGonagall’s permission for this,” said Angelina, in the cool hard tone of one past her natural reserves of patience, and fast racking up debts. “It was all checked out. I got the forms.”

“But Professor McGonagall must be ignorant, then! For you have not followed the rules, Miss Johnson! I do not want to see you make mistakes that could jeopardize the children of this school!”

“What mistakes?” demanded Fred, landing hard next to Angelina. He stood by her shoulder, looming — drawing attention, incidentally, to the fifteen inches and two stone that he had on Umbridge, to say nothing of the very large bat in his hand.

“Thank you for joining us, Mr. Weasley,” said Umbridge. “Miss Johnson may explain to you—”

“She says the rules say we’ve got to register our brooms,” snapped Angelina. “Which we’ve never done before, by the way.”

“Possibly because you have never before been helped by a competent administrator!” said Umbridge helpfully. “But that has changed!”

“Madam Hooch is our ref,” said Katie.

“As I said,” said Umbridge, after a pause, “though I find it dreadfully unprofessional to name names, it is patently clear that the instruction you have received is quite lacking! But I suspected as much. In fact, as soon as I harbored that suspicion, I at once hurried to review the quidditch rulebook for you. I care deeply to ensure the safety of each and every Hogwarts student, including those who indulge in activities I personally consider very silly.”

“Thanks ever,” muttered Fred.

Umbridge smiled at him. “Yes, Mr. Weasley,” she said. “I think some thanks would do nicely, in fact. Since I have saved you all from many serious injuries!” A pause. “That will be: ‘Thank you, Professor Umbridge.’”

“Thank you,” said Angelina, “Professor Umbridge.”

“Ah, gratitude. It is music to the ears of any who work with children! Now. You are all dismissed to return to the castle, where I will generously extend the office deadline to register your broomsticks with my office to seven o’clock tonight—”

“Why’re we registering them with your office?” demanded Harry, soaring down beside Katie. He hopped off the broom midair, swung it behind his back, and dropped elegantly with a soft thud. Umbridge squeaked in surprise. “What does the Defense professor have to do with quidditch?”

“As you would know if you had been here earlier, Mr. Potter — I — what is that?”

She was staring at his broomstick.

“It’s a Nimbus One,” he said, with a touch of pride. His chest swelled. “Mint condition.”

Umbridge’s violently pruned eyebrows became tiny alpine peaks.

“A Nimbus One,” she whispered, as glee blossomed on her face. “A Nimbus One! My goodness. Why, Mr. Potter, you must know that the Ministry has prohibited competitive use of old Nimbus models for years!”

“What? No, it’s fine — it flies like brand new—”

“They have a steering defect! Banned from competitive use, without a license! You will report it to me at once for confiscation!”

“Hang on!”

“Wait a minute!”

“You can’t take his broom,” said Angelina, outraged. “That’s team equipment!”

“Not going forward!” said Umbridge delightedly. “Where did you even buy such a thing? The only remaining Nimbus Ones for purchase are on the black market. My, my — have you been naughty in your back-to-school shopping, Mr. Potter?”

Harry clutched the broomstick and took a half-step back.

“I didn’t. It was a gift,” he said feebly. “It was from — from a—”

From Professor Minerva McGonagall, who would have sooner snapped it on her knee than consign it to Dolores Umbridge's pink claws.

"It was from a family member," said Draco shortly. Harry relaxed infinitesimally.

Umbridge pursed her lips. "Whoever they are, your family should take a greater interest in your wellbeing," she sniffed. "As I have. Never mind; it doesn't matter. A Ministry customs sweep will identify —"

"You can't do that!"

The team turned, as one, and cleaved in a quick curtain-sweep of red robes: Hermione came steaming through them, her cloak snapping over the grass.

"You," she repeated hotly, "can't do that. Professor."

"Miss Granger! I was unaware that you were on the quidditch team. Or are you trying out?"

"Harry's broom is private property," she blurted. "You can't take it."

"Really, now? Mr. Potter, do you have the title? Do you know," added Umbridge conspiratorially, "what a title is?"

"It doesn't matter if he has the title," snapped Hermione, before Harry could open his mouth. "You can't ask for it unless you have reasonable suspicion it's being used to commit a crime."

"Excuse me! Excuse me! Miss Granger! Rule Ninety-Four, Section Two, Part C-Four of the Hogwarts Handbook expressly states—"

"The Hogwarts Handbook isn't law," said Hermione brusquely. (Fred clutched George's shoulder in shock.) She shouldered in front of Angelina, scowl blazing in the harsh wash of the afternoon sun. "And the rule you're citing doesn't even apply, anyway, broomstick registration only applies for students using Hogwarts funds to buy a broom. Harry didn't. It's his property. He's free to use it, or any other Nimbus, or even a — an enchanted teaspoon, if he wants."

"Excuse me! Rule Ninety-Four, Section Two, Part C-Six of the Hogwarts Handbook makes very clear—"

"That administrators retain discretion to disqualify broomsticks on safety grounds, yes, obviously, but there's a due process requirement to that, you can't just go around benching the whole team because you don't like the spit of a Comet Sixty," said Hermione crossly. At any other time, in any other context, Draco would have whirled around and demanded to know when she learned what a Comet Sixty was. "You have to issue a formal citation, which you haven't, and give them ample time for compliance, which you haven't, and provide them with alternative equipment to use during the inspection period, which you haven't, and, lastly, either you knew all of that before you came here, or you clearly never made it to Part C-Seven."

She took a deep breath and added, after a collective beat of astonishment: "Professor."

Umbridge's mouth looked like leather that had been left out in rain. Harry was practically glowing. Angelina was gazing at Hermione like she wanted to sweep her up and propose marriage.

"Quidditch," said Umbridge, silk-soft, "is an inherently unsafe activity."

"As is climbing a moving staircase," said Hermione.

"It is responsible for countless injuries every year—"

"Statistically insignificant margins, lower than muggle football."

"—encourages brutality—"

“It’s good exercise.”

“—and distracts students from their studies.”

“It builds athleticism,” said Hermione desperately. “And teamwork. It boosts morale.”

“It is useless frivolity—”

“It’s a Hogwarts tradition,” she blurted.

Umbridge stopped, and eyed her warily.

“It’s been around for — for centuries. Sicne before the Norman Conquest. It’s our legacy, as British wizards, it’s — our heritage.”

Umbridge’s pillbox hat had begun to cant backward on her head. She adjusted it delicately, considering, and then sniffed.

“A good point,” she agreed. But she continued: “Tradition is no excuse for unsafety. I will expect to see forms documenting the make and model of all broomsticks currently in use on my desk by eight o’clock on Monday, and if I find a cause for concern, I will not hesitate to confiscate the dangerous equipment in question.”

“Fine,” she said shortly. “They’ll do that. But technically, Madam Hooch should be—”

“And you’ll have detention, Miss Granger.”

Silence. Stone cold, frigid with shock. Hermione flinched like she’d been slapped, though that probably would’ve been kinder.

Hermione had never had a detention. Everyone on the team, including Draco and Harry, had been punished for infractions of varying seriousness; everyone had seen their fair share of lines. But Hermione had kept her nose clean. She had been polite and orderly in classes, almost never used magic in the hallways, and observed the dress code like scripture. Breaking rules, she could, and did; but in terms of public infractions, her record was spotless.

Nearly spotless, now.

“No,” she said, reduced to simple denial. “No, I— I can’t.”

“For insubordination and rudeness to a teacher,” said Umbridge, “as well as general uppityness! We will work on that together tomorrow evening. Report to my office at nine o’clock.”

“But—”

“Would you like another one?”

Hermione closed her mouth.

“Very good,” said Umbridge, and it sounded not unlike a word of praise for a pet.

It couldn't take that much force to shatter a broomstick on someone’s face, he thought. They weren’t known for durability, broomsticks. Or faces.

Hermione’s expression was no less painful than a faceful of wood shrapnel.

Umbridge smiled at them and trotted off the field in the same direction she’d come. Hermione turned around slowly. The team swarmed to murmur consolations, but she didn’t reply.

“It wasn’t your fault, kiddo.”

“You didn’t do anything wrong—”

“—took the heat for us, I’m sorry—”

“Can probably spring you from that detention—”

“—dungbombs under her desk—?”

“Hell, we’d do it even if you weren’t—”

“Granger.”

She winced and held up her hand. He stopped.

Hermione bit down hard on her cheek, curled her fingers into her fist, and stuck it to her side. Then, stiff-shouldered, she strode off the pitch.

It was all intimidatingly stoic; or, rather, it was, right up until she passed the goalposts, and broke into a run.

The common room bubbled that evening with anticipation of the upcoming weekend at Hogsmeade. Plans circulated for exploratory adventures through the castle’s corridors, quidditch skirmishes, picnics on the lawns and punting expeditions on the lake. Rumor had it there was going to be a party. Draco listened to none of them. After dinner, Hermione had shouldered her bag and with a stiff wordless march had removed herself to the Defense Against the Dark Arts classroom, where the hopes and sympathies of Gryffindor Tower went with her.

Others had trotted along like lost sheep back to the common room, and taken up a circle near the fireplace. Harry had brought her leftovers from a dinner she hadn’t touched, and Ron was doing his real, God-honest best to start the Transfiguration homework without her, which was something she had been asking him to do for four years without success. He had answered three questions in two hours and asked Draco for help on two, but that didn’t make it less laudable.

He had hoped she might be back before his prefect rounds with Blaise, but when ten o’clock came, the portrait door remained empty.

“I hope Hermione’s alright,” said Neville, who sat on the floor by the fireplace, his cheek pillowed in his hand. He had the Potions homework rainbowed around him in a hemisphere of woe, and had been jotting down answers in between feedings of his Mimbulus Mimbletonia. “I remember my first detention. Snape made me scrub cauldrons.”

“A bold choice to let you near them, really,” said Draco, “considering how many you’ve melted.”

“F-fourteen and counting.”

“Don’t say that like you’re proud of it.”

“Sorry.”

The door opened again, and more first years piled in, several of them wringing evidence of Peeves’s water balloons from their robes.

Harry followed Draco’s gaze, and checked over his shoulder.

“She should be back soon,” he said.

“I know that.”

“It’s almost ten. She’ll be done any minute.”

“I am, again, aware of that.”

“She’ll be fine,” he said, unconvincingly. “It’s an ego thing.”

“I dunno,” said Neville, frowning at what appeared to be a two-sentence answer to a question with ten lines of space. “Umbridge is no joke. My gran knows her— she’s a member of the Old Guard at the M-M-Ministry. The bloke before her went out in a big scandal right before she was promoted. Big Pop politician with a spotless record, everybody wants him for M-Minister one day, and then one day, he resigns. It’s odd, my gran thinks, anyway.”

“I’ve noticed your grandmother has something of an antiestablishment streak,” said Draco, turning a page.

“Oh, yeah. She marched in the Squib Riots in the s-s-sixties.”

“Augusta Longbottom? The pureblood? In the Squib Riots?”

“She set fire to a building, once,” said Neville proudly. Then, glumly: “Probably’ll do the same to me, if I don’t p-p-pass Potions.”

The hour-bell tolled ten times. Draco checked his watch, checked the door again, and jogged his knee.

“Oi. Go on,” said Ron quietly. “We’ll take care of her.”

That rankled him. Not the sentiment, which was admirable, nor even the offer, which was embarrassingly observant, and frankly made him chafe at his own apparent obviousness; but it was something about the way Ron said care, a sort of velvety helplessness that suggested more than it ought.

He rose from his seat.

“I’ll be back at midnight,” he said coolly. “Tell her where I am.”

Ron examined his work. “Think she knows, mate.”

“Would you still tell her?”

“I mean, sure, but she’s going to tell me off for acting like she doesn’t know it, like I’m the dummy—”

“Ronald. I’m asking you to tell her.”

Ron paused, and his voice was light. “Sure,” he said. “Whatever. I’ll let her know.”

“Thank you,” he said stiffly. And he swept out of the room, ignoring Harry’s polite and embarrassed cough.

At five past ten, he found Blaise lounging at the bottom of the Grand Staircase, buffing his nails with a silver file.

“Malfoy! I say! It’s five past. Do you expect me to wait an age?”

“You were half an hour late last week.”

“And I said I was very sorry for it.”

“No, you didn’t.”

“No, I didn’t,” agreed Blaise, and continued not to. “Ready to go cheat some poor girls out of a good snog?”

Draco’s foot was level with his head; it would have been very easy to kick him. He sighed and rounded the banister.

“I don’t like you.”

“I haven’t given you the chance.” He sprang to his feet and sauntered along behind Draco. “I’m a perfect delight once you get to know me. Shame you won’t; Theo says I’m not to talk to you.”

When he stopped, it gave Blaise a chance to catch up with him.

“What’s Nott’s problem?” he said flatly.

“Lord Merlin. How long do you have?”

“I meant with me.”

“Personally? Nothing. But I’m still forbidden from trying to sleep with you—”

Draco closed his eyes.

“—or inviting you to the commons, or answering any questions you might ask about him. I told him he was an awful narcissist to assume we'd be gossiping about him on prefect patrols, but then again: here we are."

"It's amusing that he thinks I would want to talk to him at all."

So Theo hadn't told the other Slytherins what he'd done. He wondered if Pansy knew. Daphne didn't, but he happened to know she wasn't talking to Theodore, and the rest of his coterie, it seemed, had been kept in the dark. There were many things about their little clade he didn't understand, and he could admit now that it was too late to really try.

There were a few levels of dungeons to scour. Torches studded fathoms of stony, dripping darkness like small solar systems, revolving in and out of sight from corridors, shielding the metallic smell of wet stone and mold with woodsmoke. The halls narrowed the deeper they plunged, as if the castle increasingly resented their intrusions the deeper they went, and tried to squeeze them out back the way they came. Staircases and doors of identical make slipped past in dizzying circles, and if Draco didn't know it, it would have been a nightmare. Blaise strolled along like each hallway was its own gala carpet, his earrings jingling cheerfully in the cold silence.

Patrol was less interesting than it sounded. They checked in empty classrooms and behind tapestries for students, knocked on bathroom doors, cast detection charms. Draco took some pleasure in throwing doors open with Bombarda, which on one go had scared a pair of sixth years so badly that they knocked over a desk. The Slytherin common room was ensconced behind its usual brick wall, and no one sequestered in the dozens of tiny cupboards and alcoves near the Potions room, including the locked door to the undercroft, which Draco insisted on checking, despite Blaise's whinging about efficiency and beauty sleep.

It was perhaps no surprise, then, that there were not many Slytherins out of bed, save one or two first years wandering back from the library. Points were docked, scoldings were given, and they scampered home.

In one vaulted stairwell, the ripped echoes of weeping wafted from the floor below. Draco peered down and saw a dark head bent into a small set of arms.

“Who’s there?”

The head snapped up. He came down the stairwell, and found himself staring down into the wet, red-ringed eyes of Pansy Parkinson. They regarded each other with shared dismay and embarrassment.

“My God,” she said thickly, “your sense of timing should be sold to weapons manufacturers. Hello, Draco.”

Blaise came strolling up behind Draco, and startled. “Merlin, Pansy,” he said, one hand at his throat. “Wear a bell.”

“No. Dock points and go away.”

“While you’re crying?” he inquired. “I would never go after a woman in such a delicate, emotional condition.”

“Go choke on a giant’s cock,” she said warmly, standing up, “and then piss off, bugger yourself, and die, in whichever order excites you least. I simply cannot handle you tonight, and I have better things to do than try.”

“Like soaking a hanky?”

“See, this is the part where you say, ‘Get back to bed,’ and I say, ‘you’re the ones leering at a young woman alone out of bed after hours, wait until my father hears about this,’ and then you run off to preserve your reputation.”

“Speak for yourself. My mum would be delighted to hear I’d been harassing a young woman for a change.”

“Cass would skin you.”

“Ah, yes,” said Blaise, stroking his ring finger unsubtly. “The future Mr. Parkinson. It seems I’m not the only one who’s forgotten him.”

Pansy wasn’t wearing her ring. She shoved her hand into her pocket and sneered.

“Well?” she snapped at Draco. “Aren’t you going to congratulate me?”

There were few people he could remember liking less than Cassius Warrington. He could imagine very few girls he considered deserving of Warrington’s affection, and that included Pansy, regardless of her many faults.

He had left Draco in an undercroft to bleed out with Gregory Goyle and a lead pipe. He had also said something to Hermione for which Draco still owed him a visceral debt, and interest had been accruing hastily since.

“Should I?” he said coolly.

“You should. I’m first in our year to get a ring. Holleen’s so jealous she could vomit.”

“Which I’m sure has made you quite courteous.”

“I’ve taken to leaving the diamond out on my nightstand, so she can see it when she goes to sleep,” said Pansy. “I hope it’ll motivate her to do something about those boils.”

“Charming.”

“Why should I be? I did it,” she said, with an edge in her voice. “I got it. I got the thing, I won. I have the best breeding, and that’s why I’ve got a ring and no one else has one, because none of them are as good as me—”

“Parkinson—”

“Why should I make them feel better about it? Boohoo, cows! I’m the best!”

Apropos of nothing, he remembered a girl with pigtail braids and a round collar like a doll’s, sitting on a tree root by a Samhain bonfire, saying awfully big things about a future she knew nothing of. He remembered a Gryffindor boy who had said them, too, and only half meant them. He hadn’t had the wisdom to wonder at the time if she only half-meant them, too.

If he could reach back and pull that boy into the future by the scruff of his collar, and hold him there to observe each other, he didn’t know that either of them could have contained their disgust.

Blaise withdrew his handkerchief and placed it on the stair beside her. She scoffed and kicked it away.

“Tell your parents you won’t do it,” said Draco flatly.

“Why in the wretched name of God would I do that?”

“Because you’re obviously miserable, and your father dotes on you. He won’t force you to marry at fourteen.”

“I’m not marrying him now, dullard. I get to graduate and everything, like a real girl; that’s what my father’s doting gets me, more time. But I can’t say no, nor would I.”

“Why not?”

“Because then he’ll go marry Maude Rosier! Obviously! Her family was after him for months, he could get them back in a heartbeat if I jilt him!”

He braced the bridge of his nose. “Refresh me. Am I meant to give a damn what happens to Maude Rosier?”

“No, but I am, because if he marries Maude, then she can’t marry Peter Selwyn.”

“And the seventh seal shall break?”

She squinted. “I understand that your abode is located under the world’s biggest, heaviest rock, but even rocks get newspapers. Maude and Peter? Me and Cassius? You already know about Crabbe and Millie.”

He hadn’t been paying attention to gossip, that summer; he’d been preoccupied trying to learn how to not die, and he was needled by the implication that he was somehow foolish for it.

“Only the official matches are public,” she said. “But I’ll tell you, because I’m very smart and I know everyone’s secrets: the Fawleys and the Goyles have been orbiting each other since July, and Gemma was seen out with Greg at two balls in August. Odin Davis is angling to nab Theo for Tracy, after all that business with the League, but — for one, good bloody luck — and for two, with Sibelius in Azkaban, Theo’s been operating as head of household, and he’s stalling.”

“No clue why,” remarked Blaise. “Tracy’s lovely. My favorite girl in our year.”

“Of course you like her, she’s a slattern.”

“You’re such a chauvinist, Pans.”

“Anyway, you see the picture. I can’t reject him, my parents will never find anybody for me.”

“There’s a fair sight more than five eligible bachelors in Britain,” he said.

“Not that qualify,” she said, frowning. “You’re practically the only free agent left, and my parents know better than to try you, after what happened with the Greengrasses.”

Draco felt a headache kick up in the overtaxed quadrant of his brain responsible for juvenilia and subterfuge. “What?”

“The offer? For Daphne? Duh? Merlin’s balls, this was literally all that happened to me in August, I can’t believe you never even heard.”

“An offer to marry her?”

“Rumor is that they offered Astoria,” said Blaise blandly, “because of Daph’s unfortunate condition, et cetera, but Lady Malfoy said a six year engagement was too long, so then they did come back with Daphne, but Lady M said they should have led with the older, because if nothing was wrong they would’ve offered her first. Which put paid to that. Silly twits, trying to pull one over on a Black — but of course, the Fawleys heard the Greengrasses had gone for it, so they threw in their older girl—”

“Didn’t even get an answer, though. Small wonder. Irena’s a lesbian.”

“Allegedly.”

“Allegedly, yes.”

“I’m not marrying an eleven-year-old,” said Draco, with rare passion. “Which was not a sentence I imagined I’d have to utter when I woke up this morning, so thank you both, sincerely, for the occasion.”

“You’re welcome,” said Blaise. He turned to Pansy. “Here’s one thing I never understood. Why not Theodore?”

“For Astoria? Not uninteresting. It’d suit, and it’d keep Daphne in the fold, but the issue the Greengrasses are having with Tori is it’ll be an age until she graduates, and with everything that’s happening, no one wants to wait—”

“For you, silly bird.”

“Lord! I don’t expect you to understand why that’s a horrible idea,” she said, “since you don’t have a brother. And neither do I. Which is a good thing, because if I had one, I'd still love Teddy more." She folded her jumper over her arm primly. "Also, just to shut you up: my father asked. Teddy said no."

"Really? I daresay he's off the girls, then. I always said, if it wasn't you or Greengrass, it wouldn't be anybody."

"Don't get excited. He's not your type."

"Scottish?"

"Real," she said coldly. She drew herself up, a motion Draco had seen Narcissa perform half a million times. "A grown-up, serious, real boy, with real duties and real problems. What would you do with a boy like that who needs you? What would you want with it? You, with your toys and your chocolates? He'd eat you up just by having you. You wouldn't survive Theo's love, you silly little man, you'd shrivel up like a fig in the sun."

The hall rang with her echo. Her shoulders heaved.

Blaise, impassive, said only: "I resent little, rather," and no more.

Fawley and Greengrass were Twenty-Eight families. So were Rosier and Selwyn. Two weddings like that in a generation would have been a spectacle. Four, five, even six — even their parents' generation hadn't been so closely tied, and theirs had seen two Blacks married to a Malfoy and a Lestrange.

"It's too early," said Draco.

"I beg your pardon?"

"For all of this. It's too early."

"Did you expect it to wait for you?" said Pansy, dripping frost. "I'm sorry you don't feel prepared. I assure you, the rest of us don't either, and some of us have much heavier crosses to bear."

She hopped down the stairs and sank into the shade of the dungeons, the torchlight slipping away from her like a diver winnowing into the deeps.

When he returned to the common room, Hermione wasn't there.

Ron and Harry remained at their posts by the fireplace, and when they saw him come in, he didn't blame them for their expressions of dismay. He expected that his own face looked the same.

"She isn't—"

"No," said Ron. "We thought you might — if you ran into her, or something—"

"No."

"Oh."

"Yes," he said. Then: "Detentions run late."

"Of course they do," Ron said hastily.

Draco requisitioned his preferred armchair from a quaking first year, and pretended to read.

The pearls of Alchemy magazine failed to distract him. Across the common room, doors seemed to creak every minute with new groups of stragglers, laughing their way up to the dorms or darting to the bathrooms, tactlessly existing and filling the common room with botherations, and distracting him from the stimulative properties of chimera hair. It was at least another half-hour before the portrait-door moved at all.

"Excuse me, Colin."

She sounded tired. He looked up.

Hermione stumbled in from the portrait hole and leaned against the wall, her hands pressed behind her back. Her expression was bleak and pensive.

He stood up. The magazine slipped to the floor, forgotten.

“Granger.”

She winced. “Hello,” she said dully. “You’re up late.”

“I had rounds.”

“Oh, yes. How was that? I had mine with Ernie yesterday, it was a bit boring. He’s quite interested in inheritance law, though, you might talk to him about… about that, sometime, I told him you…”

She trailed off and bit on her cheek, eyes slipping into the distance. He felt oddly on-edge.

“What is it?”

“What’s what?”

“You know what—”

Ron craned his neck. “Hey, there she comes!” he called cheerfully. “Welcome to the club, bigmouth! Detention Crew! How’s it feel to earn the stripes?”

Hermione jerked her head and made a shuddering, furious sound, like tearing parchment. Ron broke off, shooting an alarmed look at Draco. Draco sidestepped him, crossing around the sofa to approach her.

“Granger—”

“Don’t— sorry. Please don’t. Just give me— I need a moment—”

“What happened? I thought it was a detention.”

“It was,” she said thickly, “certainly a detention. That is — that much is beyond question.”

“Granger, if you don’t explain yourself, I’m going to start making assumptions.”

He tried not to sound affected. It was probably not successful, because she tipped her head back to look at him, and a wave of hollow tiredness washed the distress out of her face. She flicked back her right sleeve.

“Assume away,” she said dully, and lifted her fist.

A thick row of cabled scarring split the skin of her hand, still shiny and brittle and fresh. Blood clotted in black lumps on the corners of each jagged carving. It looked like someone had taken a paper cutter to her skin, and used it to carve the words: I WILL NOT TELL LIES.

A hundred years passed. From far away he heard someone talking to him. It seemed to be increasing in volume.

The start of the hundred and first found him halfway out the portrait-hole, being hauled back by Harry’s steadfast grip on his robes.

“Unhand me.”

“Nope,” said Harry grimly.

“Unhand me now.”

“It’s ‘please,’ actually, but that’s still a nope.”

His wand was in his hand; he didn’t remember that.

“Release me, or you will be made to.”

“Very scary. Are you done?”

He wrenched his arm free and stood in the portrait-door, breathing deeply and carefully. When he recovered his ability to see, he found Harry glowering at him.

“Are you?” he snapped. “Because if you are, then get down here. We’ve a situation.”

Hermione was cradling her hand to her chest, watching him quietly. Her eyes were dark and unreadable. Ron looked sick. The common room had become a silent theater of horrified witnesses.

He stepped down. Harry exhaled in relief and hauled the portrait door shut.

“Give it here.”

Hermione twitched. “What?”

“Give it here,” Draco said calmly, and held out his hand. She extended it slowly, visibly wincing when she caught sight of the scars.

He took her wrist and settled the tip of his wand against her skin. “Episkey.”

“It won’t—”

The skin knit together, the scar shrinking into a line of glistening pink. A heartbeat later, the scars reemerged, splitting open the frail skin as if drawn by an invisible blade. She winced.

“It’s enchanted,” she said. “It won’t heal. I did try.”

“It’s… permanent.”

“I don’t think so. It’s better than it was an hour ago. My theory — one of them — is that it’s resistant to magical healing, so the student… remembers.”

Her professor had ripped open the back of her hand, and she had theories . Plural.

“The Hospital Wing—”

“Is closed,” said Hermione, “and I’m not going to wake up Madam Pomfrey for this. I don’t — I didn’t want anyone to see it, you see.”

“I don’t give a damn if she sees it or not.”

“Well, I do! And it’s my hand!”

“I can get some aloe,” Neville ventured meekly. “Lavender has some. I can borrow it.”

“Aloe’s for burns. Good thought, though. She needs muggle stitches,” said Harry. He radiated the calm, grave focus that came from seeing an awful thing he was used to. “D’you have rubbing alcohol?”

“I do,” croaked Lavender, rising from her armchair on trembling legs. “We — we use it to take off nail polish.”

“That’ll do. Katie, can I borrow one of your piercing needles? And sterilize it.”

“Yeah. Sec.”

“Get Hermione’s sewing kit, while you’re at it. Just need some of the thread. Not as good as sutures, but it’ll keep for a bit.”

“You can do stitches?” said Hermione, with understandable wariness.

“Sure I can,” said Harry. “The Dursleys have me do the mending. Nev?”

They hurried off to the dorms. Their footsteps crested and faded at the top of the stairs.

“Thanks,” said Hermione crisply, and made to take her hand back. Draco didn’t give it to her.

“Did she do it herself?”

“I’d rather not talk about it,” she croaked. Her eyes were faintly red, her nose flush, the rest pallored with exhaustion. No tears, though; she’d have cried alone, if she could.

There was nothing good enough that he could do. That was the problem. He wasn’t capable of anything as evil as she deserved, and he wasn’t good enough not to want to be. So he was useless. And she was bleeding. Which put a prong of fear deeper than he had expected, because it was a failure of an order he hadn’t expected.

He couldn’t fight. He didn’t want to fight. But he couldn’t save her, either, which meant he was good for nothing, of use to no one; he was hardly even a Malfoy, if he had no protection to offer her when she was bleeding. If he couldn’t stop it. He had walked into this castle with two goals for that year, and they were to stay alive and keep her out of danger, and he’d failed on the second before the first week was out. But then, he couldn’t save Harry in the Third Task, and so he had no idea what laughable mockery of confidence had made him imagine he could save her.

“I’m sorry.”

“It’s not your fault,” she said sharply. “It’s… it’s quite obviously only one person’s fault, and it’s not… oh, hell.”

She ground her free hand into her eyes and gave a little laugh. “That,” she said, “will teach me to get detention.”

They were funny words, delivered with a touch of humor, but she was angry. She was angrier than he’d ever seen her, and he’d seen her as angry as he thought it was possible for a human being to be.

“We’ll tell Dumbledore,” said Ron hoarsely. “We’ll get him involved. He’ll do something.”

“No, he won’t.” Hermione was calm again. “He doesn’t have the power. That’s what the vote at the Ministry meant, by the way. I looked it up. The Hogwarts Special Inquisitor isn’t a faculty position, it’s a Ministry appointment. She’s a professor by courtesy, but even if he fired her, she’d still have a position at the school. That’s how he got them to drop the charges against Harry.” Her tone was wretchedly clinical.

Umbridge was a Ministry operative. Irremovable. Permanent. The Ministry’s will made manifest, sitting there on her hand, staining her fingers red.

“So — so we’ll talk to the Ministry, we’ll squeal—”

“Nobody at the Ministry cares if some muggle-born has a bit of odd scarring,” she said harshly. “Even if they did, I can’t prove she did anything. Who’s going to believe me? I don’t count.”

One day, it’ll be me. She’d said that, once.

He still had his wand. He pressed his thumb flat on the grip and it coursed gently up his fingers, the magic, pleading to be used, helpless to a problem that he knew very well it couldn’t solve.

“Then— then— I mean, we’ll do something, I’ll write my parents—”

“It doesn’t matter,” he said. Hermione’s wrist was a warm weight on his palm and he closed his fingers around it, drawing a flush to the skin. “They couldn’t change anything.”

“We can’t do nothing!”

“I didn’t say that.”

“Here,” said Harry, hurrying down with Neville, whose arms were full of bandages and tiny pots. He sprawled them out on the table and sat down. “First thing, you want to get it clean, so you don’t catch anything — I know you know that,” he added, “but Madam Pomfrey always talks while she’s doing things — says it calms people down. I dunno if it works on you—”

“Respectfully, I can’t think of much that would calm me down right now, Harry.”

“Got it. This is going to hurt, by the way,” said Harry evenly, and then, with the firm, unapologetic force of someone who knew it was crueler to be slow, he swept the cotton pad over her scars.

“Ow! Ow, ow, ow, ow!”

“There you go,” he said, handing off the pad to Neville. “Good job.”

“Don’t patronize me!”

“I’m not. Katie?”

He threaded the needle with a neat flick of a seeker’s hand, then carefully pinched the skin of her hand together. “Pomfrey gives us a sticker, sometimes,” he remarked, “but I don’t reckon that’s in the cards.”

Hermione made a scathing sound.

“Sorry. It’s a thing. For me. Injuries, humor. Moony says it’s inherited.”

“I thought,” she said, and she was blinking like she had an irritant in her eyes, “I thought — you know, it was pretty stupid, but I had this thought: ‘She can’t really hurt you. She’s a teacher, and you’re a student. She’s here to protect you.’ Isn’t that — ow — isn’t that stupid?” She winced as Harry tightened the knot. “You’d think I’d learn, wouldn’t you? Honestly. How stupid could I possibly be?”

“It’s not your fault,” said Ron.

“I know that.”

“I know. I was just saying,” he said. “In case it was there.”

Draco didn’t know muggle first aid. He hadn’t bothered to learn. Someone else would have. They would have known how to help her. Possibly there were several people who she should have preferred to stand at her side during this particular trial.

Unfortunately, he wasn’t one of them. But was the one holding her hand, so she was going to get the few promises he could make, for whatever they were worth.

“She’s going to regret it,” he said.

The danger was lapping at his knees, and he found — refreshingly enough — that he didn’t care. It didn’t seem real, in that particular moment, or if it did, it wasn’t half as real as the tears on her face, the blood on her hand. It was nothing, the danger, compared to that.

Her mouth twitched. She cleared her throat and swiped something glittering from her cheek. “Somehow, I suspect she’s never regretted anything in her life,” she said. “Much less hurting someone like me. If you know what I mean.”

“I don’t care.”

“Draco—”

“And the underground thing, too. The defense group. I’ll do it. I’ll help you. Whatever you want.”

Her head lifted sharply, like a startled bird. “Don’t do it because you feel sorry for me. I don’t want it to be out of pity.”

“That’s not why.”

“Fine, but if you don’t believe it’s a good idea, be honest.”

It probably wasn’t, but that didn’t matter. What mattered was a line of swollen scars running under her knuckles and the prim little smile on Umbridge’s face, like she could taste her tears, and the fact that he would have set the Defense classroom on fire with its professor locked inside it if he thought it stood a chance of undoing either one.

He knew how to keep a secret. He’d more practice in the trade of secrets than any of them. And he had watched them all walk into danger without him before — Hermione, half-drowned from the bottom of a frozen lake; Harry, vanished in a burning clearing with Viktor Krum; Ron, standing in front of a Death Eater’s curse — and he had watched the threshold of his tolerance for it sink. Fear had carved it away, inch by inch, until now it was nearly as low as the rest of them.

“It’s a good idea,” he said.

Her smile was a fleeting thing, a flash of a knife in the dark, hidden in the quick dip of her head.

When she put her free hand on his wrist and squeezed it, it was the first time she’d touched him unprompted, on purpose, since the Hogwarts Express. And held on tightly, too, trustingly, without horror or wariness. She held him like she needed him there. The relief was poignant.

He slid his hand back along her wrist until he held hers, lightly, palm to palm. If they were doing this the traditional way, he’d kiss her hand, and she’d kiss his, and it would seal a gentlemen’s agreement. If they were true adherents of the old school, they would slit their hands and shake with them, fixing the writ in blood.

She was anything but traditional, however, and he didn’t like audiences.

So he smoothed some blood from her knuckle with his thumb. If she noticed, she didn’t say anything.

The fire snapped. There were murmurs in the common room, murmurs from the stairs, and the walls of the castle, their ancient bones of wood and marble, groaned as if in horror at the things being done inside their arms. Outside, the wind howled, and howled, and howled.

-Bit later than usual! Sorry, all. Ran around all day and just when I got home, Wi-Fi went out. Technically, it's still Friday in America, so I'm electing to count this as on-time.

-"But if the Squib Riots took place in the 60’s wouldn’t Frank be like five when his mom—" Yes? And? Give him a helmet and one of those toddler leashes, he’ll be fine.

-The reception to the last chapter, as usual, has blown my socks off, boarded them on a space shuttle, and rocketed them into a neighboring solar system. I am de-socked. I am sockless. I am rendered unsocked by you, and your generosity, and your unfailing kindness. I would answer every one if I could. Instead I will offer to you a pair of the warmest, thickest, nicest socks, like Albus Dumbledore sees in the Mirror of Erised.

-Pansy is incredulous that Draco isn't subscribed to whatever the pureblood version of deuxmoi is. Blaise, meanwhile, lives for it.

-I've often felt the need to include this disclaimer, but especially so this chapter, considering some of the language that's getting slung around the dungeons, so here it is, once and for all: THE VIEWS EXPRESSED BY PANSY PARKINSON ARE HER OWN AND DO NOT REPRESENT THE OPINIONS OF THE AUTHOR, GREENTEACUP, THEIR PARENT COMPANIES OR RESPECTIVE AFFILIATES.

-Also known as: 1995, though better than most that came before it, was still not the nicest year to be a teenage girl, no matter what House you were in.

-Next chapter: "The Hogwarts Resistance." Featuring: a Hogsmeade trip, a fancy piece of jewelry, and a cameo by Marietta Edgecombe.

The Hogwarts Resistance

Chapter 63: The Hogwarts Resistance

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

It was a bright cold day in Hogsmeade, and there were patrolmen at the gates.

Sometimes they would call one of the students aside and ask for a permission slip, or to see their wand; other times they would stand there with dull beefeater stares, eyes lidded under the flat brim of a patrolmen's hat, as if they could walk through over you without turning their head.

Their presence quelled the natural chatter of students approaching their first Hogsmeade visit. Even the third years dropped their voices to a whisper, and through the gates, the streets were thinner than usual, students electing not to do their usual noisy loitering where someone of the law might apprehend them. It looked as though someone had taken an eraser and blotted out odd parts of a normal Hogsmeade visit: not all of it, and nothing in particular, but perhaps a group of girls chatting here; a trace of laughter, there; a stray firework erupting from Zonko's, in violation of ordinance, or some cheerful purple-haired ruffian marking up the walls behind Madam Puddifoot's. It was an unfinished scene.

A clock tower tolled. He turned up the collar of his cloak to keep the wind from biting him, but it whipped and snapped at his ankles in recrimination. Spinning skirts of brown leaves and airbound dust rose from the cobblestone and bobbed beside them like a detritus ballet.

"How awful for Pansy," said Hermione. Her hair was twisted up in a businesslike knot that had a half-life of perhaps twenty minutes, since parts of it were already escaping in furtive strands around her temples and neck, which fluttered in a very engaging way whenever the wind blew at her.

A length of gauze trailed from one of her woolen gloves.

She had her journal in one arm and her schoolbag in the other, and had subjected both unhappily to search by patrolmen at the gate. Harry and Ron strolled behind them at a distance, for covertness; Hermione said it was something they did in “spy movies,” and he didn’t mind the privacy, personally.

His jumper was navy blue, and his fur mantle swept the pavement behind him with an auspicious whisper, and made people sidestep out of his way. He took her arm to escort her up a tall shelf of pavement, and then he kept it, idly, on the pretense of keeping cover. The patrolmen didn’t tend to stare when they were walking together.

The patrolman on the corner even nodded at him as they passed, and he felt idly irritable. He increased their pace and drew her down an alley onto a thinner street, pressing her close enough that she was almost hidden behind his shoulder.

He was aware, however reluctantly, that he was crowding her, but she seemed too distracted to notice. She was back to touching him, now, and he was finding all sorts of ways to take advantage of it; when she leaned on his shoulder to adjust her shoe, he touched her waist, casually, not indecently, but in a way as to provide a chaste support for a dear friend as she removed a pebble from her sole. He touched her shoulder to keep her from opening a door — though that was chivalry, naturally, as was a hand offered to help up a set of steps, or assistance in removing a stray leaf from her hair.

If she noticed, then she allowed it, and did them both the courtesy of not remarking on it. She had been subdued since her detention, and no one could blame her, but if it made her less inclined to mind the limits of friendly conduct, he wouldn’t be the one to bring it up.

“Granger, I didn’t know you cared for her.”

“I don’t. I still don’t want her to marry Cassius Warrington,” she said briskly. “No woman deserves that. I’m also frankly horrified that Daphne’s parents tried to arrange your engagement without asking you first. What a nightmare. Thank God your mother said no.”

“I, also, would have said no,” he said, a mite tetchy. “To marrying Astoria Greengrass. Let's establish that.”

She paused. Her tone was light. “Could she make you?”

“My mother? No. She has the power to contract a betrothal, since I'm underage, but she wouldn't.”

“Are you sure?”

“Reasonably. Apart from any considerations of my happiness — which mothers have been known, on occasion, to harbor for their sons — she can't force me to marry someone, and if I refuse a match, it's embarrassing for everyone concerned. The bride's humiliated, her family's slighted, my mother looks weak, and I look rakish. There's no reason to put us in that position.”

“Does she know that?”

“Know what?”

“That you'd refuse,” she said, frowning.

As they passed Zonko’s, something from inside gave a maniacal cackle, and a firework popped. He recalled his mother's face when Hermione had stepped through the Manor door; her slow, costumed entrance from the grand stair.

“I think she suspects,” he said vaguely. “Anyway. Can you imagine it? The Greengrass-Malfoys of Wiltshire?”

She glowered.

“A joke, dear.”

“That’s revolting. You’re both far too young. And you’d be a terrible husband for her.”

“Would I?”

“Yes. You’d irritate her.”

“I don’t think Daphne finds me irritating.”

“And that’s just one more reason it wouldn’t work. At least one partner should be able to see past their own nose.”

“Maybe I ought to have you draw up a candidate list. Happen to know any nice girls, Granger?”

Points of color appeared in her cheeks. “None that deserve what you're suggesting. Are we close, by the way?” she said briskly, lifting her head. “We’re late.”

“No, you’re late. I’m arriving precisely when I said I would, which is when I feel like it.”

“Pithy,” she said. “Cute. Some of us, however, said we would be there at one o’clock.”

“Then you’re fine. Daphne will assume that means one-thirty, and Neville’s probably still trying to find his socks.”

He turned into a side street that shambled up to a battered inn. Under a facade of soiled moss and splintering wood, pockmarked with the holes in the plaster where something had taken a bite out of it, there crouched a dingy wooden building with windows black from grime. It was crowned with a rusty hanging sign of a hog’s head. A skinny billygoat wandered about the tundra of a yard, bleating.

“This was where you wanted to meet?”

“You said you wanted discretion.”

“Ah,” she said. “Yes. Well, it has that.”

The billygoat screamed. Hermione’s mouth did something suspicious.

“I was following instructions—”

“No, no, it’s very good! It’s definitely good.”

“I don’t lark around places like this in my free time! I have a mansion! I don’t slum it for kicks—”

“I mean, does it smell? Yes, it does. I feel that we have reached a point, as friends, where we can be honest with each other that some buildings do, in fact, have smells. We can accept that.”

“‘—get an island for your pet kneazle’ rich, you understand, not just tea at the Ritz and a flashy watch—”

“Though I’m hesitant to mention it, if you really haven’t noticed. I have to assume you weren’t aware.”

“—could clear the dining room at the Salazar Club and tell the waiters to have a ballet choreographed before I get there — I don’t know if you actually understand how rich I am, is my point, because otherwise you wouldn’t be implying that it’s my fault we’re here. Would you like me to do something impressive? Is that what you’d like?”

“Oh, no! I’m very impressed.”

“Really.”

“Mmhm.”

He glared at her. She was officially losing the battle against a smile. A humiliating defeat for both of them.

“I’m getting you a house for Christmas.”

He stalked up the path.

She laughed, and then stopped laughing.

“Wait. What?”

The door shrieked when he swept it open, and she hurried after him.

“Don’t, though. Don’t? Don’t do that. Draco. You’re joking, aren’t you? You are joking.”

“In France,” he added, and she made the loveliest sound.

It was the same it had been last year; no one had so much as swept it since. The bar was filmed in grime, and the candle-stubs on each sticky tabletop drooled wax into grimy saucers. A certain spongy texture of the floor leant the impression of packed straw, and the stairs leading up to the second floor were rickety wood.

“Aberforth,” said Draco to the bartender, and the man peered out from behind a sheaf of white hair. His eye was electric blue, and the only bright color in the room. “We’re going up.”

“There’s more of you?”

“Only a few.”

The barman grunted. “Password?”

“Trois Glorieuses.”

Harry came in behind them, hastily stuffing the Invisibility Cloak back into his bag. Ron whistled quietly at the state of the place.

“They’re with us,” Hermione added.

“On you go, then,” grunted Aberforth, jerking his head at the stairs. “You paid for it. Don’t need my invitation.”

He had. That was the worst part, too.

“No trouble getting into Hogsmeade, was there?” Hermione murmured to Harry. They climbed the staircase and crested onto a tiny landing with a single door. Draco checked that the hallway was clear. “Did you use the Notice-Me-Not, like I told you? And Muffliato? And the Cloak?”

“Yeah, yeah, we were careful.”

“We’re not doing anything illegal,” muttered Ron. “It’s a study club, not a guerrilla group.”

“I’d rather not find out where Umbridge thinks the line is.”

Draco opened the door and nearly jumped out of his skin.

“HEY! IT’S MALFOY!”

The room had twice more people than chairs, and twice as many chairs as it could fit. Neville and Daphne were there, in pride of place at the weathered old longtable, but so was the rest of the bloody castle: Ginny, Dean, Seamus, Lavender, Parvati and Padma, Fred and George and Lee Jordan, Cho and Anthony Goldstein and some Ravenclaws he didn’t even know, Katie, Angelina, Colin Creevey, Ernie Macmillan, Justin Finch-Fletchley, Hannah Abbott, Susan Bones, and some more Hufflepuffs from the quidditch team, including — wonder of wonders — Cedric Diggory, one of the few seventh years present, who stood at the back of the room with his arms folded, like a presiding king. He smiled and winked.

Half of them chorused variations on hello. The other half stared like they expected him to turn into a bat.

He turned to Hermione and lifted a finger. She raised an eyebrow.

He corrected himself, and then turned to Harry.

“Potter.”

“Okay, right, okay,” gasped Harry, squeezing through the door, “so, I have a good reason for this. Really.”

“How many people did you bloody tell?”

“And where’d you find the time?” marveled Ron.

“Oh, it isn’t his fault, really,” sighed Luna Lovegood. Perched in the window, she wore a large headpiece in the shape of an egret, which occasionally rustled its wings. “Harry was stung by a wrackspurt at the end of last year, and it makes you incredibly popular. People are drawn to it subconsciously.”

Ron hooted with glee.

“Thank you, Luna,” Hermione said, in tones of: for nothing . “Harry, do I even need to say…?”

“I only technically told Cho,” said Harry defensively. Cho had hurried over to kiss his cheek, but was now somewhat hiding behind his shoulder, not unreasonably, considering how Hermione was glaring at both of them.

“And I only told Marietta,” she said hastily, “but I guess she must’ve told Luna, too.”

“And I told Padma,” agreed Luna, “who told Parvati, who told Lavender, and she told Seamus, who told Dean and Ginny—”

“Who told Colin,” said Dean, wincing, “who told Justin—”

“Who told Susan, who told Leanne, who told Hannah, who told Ernie—”

“Who told Cedric,” added Cedric, grinning mischievously. Ernie blushed and muttered something about duress.

“—and Terry, and Sheila, and Mandy, and Michael—”

“Seriously, Abbott?”

“I thought it was a study group,” wailed Hannah. “She said Hermione Granger was giving a tutorial! I assumed we’d be doing homework!”

“—who told Zacharias,” said Luna, and heaved a great breath, “but I don’t know the Gryffindors, I suppose you’re all here on invitation.”

“Blimey,” remarked Ginny. “Good memory.”

“Yes, rather,” she agreed. “I can remember my mother’s womb.”

“No, you can’t,” Hermione said crossly.

“Oi!” Ron clapped his hands. “We’re all here now, and we can’t take it back to the store, so we might as well try it on, right?”

“This was supposed to be a discreet group,” Hermione whispered.

“You invited Neville,” muttered Draco. “How much discretion did you expect?”

“Let me introduce everybody,” said Cho quickly. “This is Marietta Edgecombe, my best friend, she’s really wonderful; and that’s Luna Lovegood, and this is Anthony, Terry, Michael— everyone, this is Harry, my boyfriend. Say hello.”

“Hello, Harry-my-boyfriend,” said Michael.

“Hiiiiiii, Harry,” crooned Terry. Harry seemed to be searching for a rock to crawl under and die with.

Colin wrestled to the front of the crowd, holding his camera. A press badge around his neck read OFFICIAL PHOTOGRAPHER, HOGWARTS ENQUIRER. He appeared to have made it himself.

“Picture, Harry?” he chirped.

“No, thanks, Colin.”

He saluted, replaced his lens cap, and turned to address the second year next to him. It was Dennis — who must have snuck out of the castle, since second years weren't allowed in Hogsmeade. "No pictures," he said sternly, and Dennis dutifully tucked a disposable camera back into his robes.

"Seamus," said Ron. The many-piercéd boy was leaning against the back wall with Dean. He jerked his chin.

"Sup, Weasley."

"Thought you didn't believe Harry, mate," said Ron coolly.

"A'might," said Seamus, indifferently. "Or a'might not. What's it to you? But if you're gonna tell the English government to go fuck itself, you're pure mad if you think I'm not with you."

Harry blinked.

"Tell it to… what?"

"That's what this is, isn't it?" said Katie. "We're here to fight Umbridge. It's the Hogwarts resistance."

There was a lull while Harry gathered himself. The eyes of the crowd accused him expectantly.

"No," he said weakly. "It's just a club. We're trying to learn how to defend ourselves. Against the Dark Arts."

"She is the Dark Arts, mate," cried Lee Jordan. "She's the institution! She's the man!"

A lot of the sixth and seventh years seemed to find this tremendously rousing, and gave a sort of disorganized cheer.

"No — well, I guess, but — we're not here to pick fights. I don't know how we'd even — the point is, we're just practicing."

“For what?” said Marietta nervously. “If not her, though? What’s worse than she is?”

“What’s worse than her?” He raised his hands, slightly agitated. “I dunno — if Voldemort comes knocking—”

“OI!”

“Don’t say it—”

The room was filled with loud objections. Draco shifted his weight onto one foot and gave Harry a hard look.

Hermione waved her arms, trying to reel in the crowd.

“Excuse me! Excuse me! Order, please! I’ll go ahead and speak for Harry, since it was, er, my idea — I’m Hermione Granger, I’m a Gryffindor — I’m a Gryffindor prefect—”

The chatter, if anything, grew louder.

“We can answer your questions,” she cried, “sorry — if you could just be quiet—”

Her voice vanished under the din.

Draco was drawing his wand for Silencio when Ron hauled Colin’s chair out from under him, jumped up on it, and banged his fist on the ceiling.

“SHUT UP!” he roared.

It was swiftly done. Someone at the back of the room sniffled.

Ron gestured at Hermione, and hopped down.

Hermione cleared her throat.

“Thank you, Ron,” she said. “So — yes. We’re here to learn Defense Against the Dark Arts, on the understanding that we will need to use them at some point. I’ll let Harry explain the story behind that, but if you’re here then you probably already know it, and if you believe him and you still want to join, then you can sign this piece of paper.” She held up a scroll of blank parchment. “If you don’t, then you can leave, and none of us will say we saw you here today. But if you sign, you can’t say a word about it to anyone who wasn’t in this room. That’s important. Think of this like a — a magical non-disclosure agreement.”

One of Cho’s friends raised her hand. Hermione pointed at her.

“What happens if we do?” she said. “Tell?”

“Good question,” said Hermione pleasantly. “Anyone else?”

The mild ripple of impression and old-fashioned fear was, alas, incredibly attractive. He started to think about her smirk and the various things one could do with it, and had to stop it.

“Hannah, yes.”

“D’you think he’s back, then?” she said in a small voice. “V— You-Know-Who?”

Hermione hesitated.

“Yes. He killed Viktor.”

Susurration of doubt and fear, wrestling for conviction of the room. Hermione lifted her voice.

“He’s a man,” she said calmly. “He’s only a man. He was killed once, and they’ll kill him again. In the meantime, we ought to all try and do our part.”

He hated to hear her talk that way, as if she was joining an army.

It was one thing to fight Dolores Umbridge, up-jumped bureaucrat, and the Hogwarts administration. But they weren't joining the Order. They weren't putting themselves in the Dark Lord's path. Neither Hermione nor anyone in the room — with the possible exception of Harry — could know what that would bring, and a gorge rose in his throat at the idea of them finding out.

He lacked the means to show them that to live meant you had to run. Let the people stronger and older and wiser raise their wands in defense of the good fight. Let them stand in the line of fire, their faces to the foe, and have poems read at their funerals. He'd take his friends alive.

He needed Hermione, in particular, alive. And she was standing there with her feet apart, fists at her sides, aglow with terrible purpose, as if she intended to make him fight tooth and nail for it.

"Yes, Ernie."

"What's wrong with your hand?" he said brusquely.

Her face shuttered. She glanced at Draco, who shook his head — what right has he to know? — but she replied, with steely candor: "Umbridge."

"She hurt you?" cried Cho.

"Yes, she—"

"But she's a teacher!"

"What did she do?"

"Did she cut you herself?"

"Did you tell McGonagall?"

"Did you tell Dumbledore?"

“Is it because you’re—”

The din crested, teetering on the knife-edge of panic.

“Would you all shut up,” snapped Hermione.

The room did. Ron, who had been opening his mouth for a reprise, peered down in impressment. Draco’s mouth curved.

“Yes,” she said thinly, “she hurt me. Yes, it was bad. I did tell McGonagall, and she was angry, and... said she would speak to Dumbledore about it, but... she's not optimistic. She said Umbridge isn't properly a school employee, you see, and even if they fired her, she would still be around — only angrier, and with less to do, and — there's politics involved. Anyway, I’m not going to talk about it, except to say that I would try to avoid detentions.”

Colin swallowed and sat up straighter.

“I don’t know what she’ll do if she catches us at this, so I’m not going to find out. This club is going to be a place for us to help each other learn, and figure things out, and not… have to worry about being punished. Because we’re classmates. We’ve been here for five years — longer, some of us — and we’ve got to count on that. Each other. If anything.”

She paused, and seemed somewhat surprised that everyone was still listening to her. Her face turned the golden pink of tea roses. “So,” she said, “yes. Well. Thank you for that, and, er. Sorry for snapping.”

Ginny whooped and applauded. Several of the others broke into confused applause, as well, including Ernie Macmillan, who stood up and started whipping his hands together like she’d announced a run for Minister.

Hermione reddened at once from rose to tomato and gestured, flailing, at Harry. “Now-Harry-tell-them-about-You-Know-Who!” she blurted, and sat down next to Ginny. Ron hunkered down beside her, thumping her shoulder, and Ginny leaned over to elbow her gleefully. She received celebration with bemused embarrassment.

Nervously, with occasional glances at Hermione for support, Harry had started to talk. The tale of the Third Task cast a hushed pall over the room, and the cheer of Hermione's exhortation dwindled away, replaced by grave fascination. Even Luna Lovegood had cast off her dreamy stupor, and was staring at Harry intensely, a faint line growing between her eyebrows.

Daphne leaned over to Draco. "How rousing," she whispered. "I feel inspired to go burn a brassiere or something. Hoorah."

"You've gone native."

"Ecstatically. I love a good zeitgeist."

"There's a saying, you know, about your friends jumping off bridges."

She clutched her chest. "Why? You haven't jumped off any bridges without me, have you?"

He rolled his eyes. She chortled to herself and patted his arm.

Ron was leaning over to say something to Hermione, speaking close in her ear. She tilted her head at him, frowned, and nodded, turning to speak back into his. They were rather cozy.

He tapped his foot. She had functional hearing. He didn't need to tongue her ear.

Ron said something that made her break into a giggle, touching the back of her hand to her mouth.

Draco tapped his foot faster.

Hermione rolled her shoulders out of her peacoat, wriggling, and Ron reached over to help tug her out of it, his hands brushing her shoulders, her back, helping tug a bit of her hair out of the buttons. There was no reason for him to be touching her hair. There was no reason for anyone, ever, at all, to be touching her hair, as if they had any right to it.

Draco felt cold and hot at once, uncomfortably caught between extremes, skin prickling. At the bottom of his stomach there was an oily pool of dislike and it was growing in temperature. He had an idea of going over and sitting down next to her, and making her look at him. And he could lean in and put his mouth to her ear, and help her with her jacket, and sit with his hand somewhere on her chair, and if anyone looked over at her or her hair or the clever curl of her mouth, they would understand that those things weren't for them. They weren't for anyone. But if they were going to be for anyone, it wouldn't be them.

Hermione turned to say something to Ron again, touching his arm to get his attention, and Ron leaned his head in without taking his eyes from Harry. They were chatting in the quiet shorthand of people who knew each other too well to bother with full sentences, a half-language of grunts and nods and glances at the front of the room, as if they were old partners going in on a venture, and the venture was Harry.

Ron fancied her. This had struck him over and over again, and yet he was surprised each time. As if it was any particular surprise that Ron would fancy her, spending as much time with her as he did; as if he could help it, seeing her stumble down the girls' stairs every morning with her useless hairties and her horribly abused bookbag, the big wild breathless smiles, the way she arched her neck back over the chairs when she stretched, the perfect tie knots, the tiny ridge of scars from biting her bottom lip— it wasn't to be helped. Not when Hermione was sitting there with her legs crossed, giving quiet little laughs that tugged at him like she held a cord that ran right into his stomach.

Her laugh could make a very smart man want to do stupid things, like walk over and tip back her chair and ruin a friendship.

His mouth tasted bitter and metallic, and he held his tongue between his teeth to keep it still.

No one would be surprised if she fancied Ron, either. They were a matched set: Harry's girl and Harry's boy, brains and brawn, bookworm and man-about-castle. It fit. They'd match.

And she'd get the Burrow, too. That was a part of it. The Weasleys were a large, cheerful, friendly family already half in love with her by headcount, and she could slot right into it, as she'd already done once, and never worry if Molly Weasley approved of her, or if an errant grandparent would denigrate her from behind a tapestry. It would be a magical home, just what she'd wanted. It would enfold her seamlessly and love her passionately, and she would deserve it.

He was acutely, painfully unhappy, so much that it startled him to realize that he could feel this bad when he'd been fine only a moment ago. Nothing had happened except that he'd looked over and thought about her being in love with Ron, and then his heart had started to cannibalize itself.

Harry finished his story, fidgeted in silence for a moment — wincing, as if preparing for a hit — and then was almost bowled over by a tide of applause.

"What," said Harry weakly, "so you all — believe me, and everything? Because I know the Prophet hasn't, it hasn't said the most — flattering things—"

Cedric stood up.

"I believe you," he said. He held the attention of the room effortlessly, and when he spoke, even the sallow Hufflepuff pricked up his ears. "I wasn't there," he continued, "but I know you're not a liar. You're a good bloke, and Dumbledore trusts you. If you tell me that Voldemort's back, why wouldn't I think it's true?"

"Yeah, but I — Cedric, hang on — aren't you Head Boy?"

Fred and George gave a hiss.

“Sure. Supposed to set an example for the younger students, aren’t I?” Cedric smiled the smile that had stolen, somewhat uselessly, a hundred girls’ hearts. “So here I am.”

Fred and George stopped hissing, though they remained wary.

“Right,” said Hermione, relieved. “On to scheduling! I drew up a chart of the week, and I’d like everyone to fill in where they’re busy and where they’re free, so we can optimize for when the most people are open— there’s at least one, two, three quidditch practices we’ll have to negotiate, so please only mark yourself busy if it’s an unavoidable commitment, as opposed to something you’d prefer to do! Mealtimes are on the table, so be advised that you may have to skip lunch—”

She unfurled the chart on the table and handed out quills, gesturing with the inspired fervor of an artist at her many beautiful color-coded charts. She was having the time of her life.

She was lovely. Ridiculous, also. The parts of his brain responsible for compartmentalization were all on fire.

“Our first meeting will be sometime in late October. If your name’s on the list, we’ll make sure you hear about it — and don’t write, we’ll come and find you. The Ministry watches owl post, you never know what they’ll pick up.”

The crowd congregated to add the last signatures. Hermione folded up the list of names and the schedule and placed both into the back of her journal, which she tucked under her arm.

“Thank you all,” she said quietly. “I think this is going to be really, really good. I honestly do.”

Ginny hooted and clapped. The group followed her example, with varying enthusiasm. Lavender rolled her eyes, but she’d signed her name, too.

“Oh,” Hermione exclaimed. “Well. Thanks, I guess. For that. Er, you can leave now. Please. Thanks.”

With titters, everyone clambered to their feet and filed out. “Bang-on, Madam Chairwoman,” said Ginny, clapping her on the shoulder.

They marched out into the cold pale sunshine, and the stream of students spilled out in many winnowing groups across the cobble. Owls rustled overhead, and the day was late, but there was a pleasure in the sort of hush over the street now — a sense of something contained, a captured secret, a silence taken by choice, not held by force.

Cho lingered behind. She laced her arm through Harry’s, who startled, and held his elbow out awkwardly, as if he had never seen anyone walk with a lady before. Draco despaired of him.

“That was really well done, Harry! You’re a great storyteller.”

“Er, thanks.”

“I mean, the part where you fought the spiders in the Maze? That spell was really brilliant, can you show me how to do that?”

“It wasn’t… I mean, Hermione taught me how to do most of the magic in the Triwizard Tournament,” he said, with a silent appeal for help, but Hermione folded her arms, amused. “She’s the brilliant one. I just do what she tells me.”

“And you drilled for it with the bloody wall, did you?”

“And Draco throws chairs at me, sometimes,” he amended.

Disclaimers notwithstanding, Cho whipped up an excited torrent of praise on their way down the hillside; apparently Harry's speech had done a number. Harry himself continued his transformation into a turtle. Draco would have considered it wildly outside of his business to say so, but he didn’t think that Harry was much enjoying it, and he wondered frankly whether it was giving Cho any joy to say so, either — it read as a little nervous, as if she was being graded on her ability to recite Harry's accomplishments in chronological order.

At one point, Cho remarked on the number of girls who had showed up to the meeting, and Hermione gave a derisive snort.

"Most of them were younger than me," said Harry, strangled. "And I have a girlfriend."

"I don't see what difference that makes," Hermione said. "You play quidditch and you spent last year all over the papers. You do have a reputation."

"Half the school thinks I'm a lying murderer!"

"Reckon that does it, for some of them," said Ron, slinging an arm around his shoulder, though he appeared not to notice Cho's look of distress. "It's the James Dean thing. Look at you, with the hair and the inscrutable sadness. Beat 'em off with a stick."

"I'm not James Dean!" Then, passionately: "I am not inscrutably sad!"

"Quite the inscrutable thing to say," murmured Daphne. "If you ask me."

"Oh, yeah. Can't scrute a knut out of this guy."

"One might even consider us… scruteless."

"Unscruted as hell," said Ron. She gave an ugly shriek of laughter, clapping a hand over her mouth. The two of them were far too pleased with their mediocre joke, and continued to snigger to themselves; Draco atoned, not for the first time, for introducing Daphne to the Weasley brand of humor.

"Scrute my ass, perhaps," said Harry entreatingly.

They were passing the Three Broomsticks, with its glimmering lights that flushed the sidewalk gold, and couples crowded together over tankards of froth in the windows. It was less full than usual, but even so, the warmth and sweet smells spilling out of its doorway were like a window into a different Hogsmeade, from last year, or the year before.

“Harry, d’you want to have a butterbeer?” Cho said.

“Oh — actually, I reckoned I might have a chat with these three—”

“They can come, too,” she said eagerly, with a glance at Marietta, who was hi “ ding behind her shoulder. Hermione snorted with unusual emphasis.

Great!” said Harry, with uncomplicated delight at how things had worked out for him. “Ginny?”

Ginny, who had been uncharacteristically quiet for the journey down the hill, glanced over her shoulder and gave a small smile. “Nah,” she said. “Got a date.”

There was a rousing show of solidarity from the female contingent. Cho gave the whistling firework-screech that girls sometimes used to greet good news or perhaps a very small dog. Luna gasped: “Oh, that’s why your aura’s all yellow.”

“Who is it?” demanded Ron — not angry so much as bemused, like someone had announced the nuptials of their pet gerbil.

“Michael Corner.”

“Michael?” Cho cried. “Oh, he’s lovely! I hope you like him.”

“I, er… hope so too.”

“Handsome,” offered Marietta.

“It’s true,” agreed Daphne. “If a bit short. But then, Ginny’s ripping tall, it can’t be helped.”

It was true; like all of her clan, Ginny had popped up over the summer, and was coming into her final form as a lamppost. She was already the same height as Harry, who said, with a bit of lingering surprise: “Oh, well — have fun, then, Gin.”

“You, too, loverboy.”

There was a beat where they stared at each other with different flavors of apprehension: Ginny, apparently waiting for someone to say something, though from her expression perhaps not even she knew what it was; and Harry, regretting not knowing.

With a short nod to Cho, she took off trotting across the street, her red hair flickering like a trail of coppertips in the wind.

“She’s really cool,” announced Cho, when she was out of earshot. “I like her.”

“Yeah, she’s a mate,” said Harry. “Anyway. Drinks?”

Inside the warm pub bustled and clattered, full of glasses and light. Tables suited to their party’s size were hard to come by, and though Draco was content to evict some of the third years, Harry forged on to the back of the barroom, where one group had taken off and left the detritus of their meal to stave away vultures.

The crowds obscured, until it was too late to avoid them, the Slytherins tucked in a booth across the aisle: Tracy Davis and Millicent Bulstrode, along with Goyle, Pansy, Theo, and a short, yellow-haired girl in a chair. Theo was leaning against the window, his forehead balanced on the glass, watching Millie and Goyle laugh about something with weary fondness. Pansy had her ring back on, and she was smiling with the first sincere glint of happiness he’d seen her wear all year. She reached for some of Theo’s butterbeer and he swatted her away. Astoria giggled, wearing a white curl of froth on her lip, and Tracy dabbed it off with a handkerchief.

He felt himself on the outside of something warm and closed-off, and consulted his feelings for any tightness or misery — but it wasn't there. A residual pang, perhaps, the echo of something, but mostly there was a great weariness, as if bracing for the ordeal that might happen if they noticed him. Then again, perhaps they wouldn't. They were preoccupied with their own conversation, and he was being ushered into the booth alongside Hermione and Daphne, while Harry bobbed off with Cho to get drinks.

That possibility vanished, however, when Daphne saw them.

"Tori?" said Daphne brightly. She waded over to their table, and Draco hissed in irritation, but he stood up to follow her. "Tori! What are you doing here? First years aren't allowed in Hogsmeade!"

The question was cheerful, but there was a beat between here and first, and it was coupled with a lingering look at Millie and Tracy.

"Daph," said Theo, sitting up. "Hello. Hi. How a—"

He saw Draco appear over her shoulder, and broke off. The color washed from him like a bit of linen in rain.

Green light, and the sound of a body when it hit the floor. Always the same sound, the one-two, shoulder, then skull. Crouch had gone down fast; he'd dislocated his shoulder, not that it mattered, since he'd already been dead when he was falling.

He closed his eyes. A hard shudder started, and he suppressed it, grounding himself with a hand on his wandgrip. Panic buckled his knees. Not here. Not in front of everybody, not in front of Gryffindor and Slytherin and the people who needed him and the people that he did not like but still, nevertheless, could not afford to have think him weak. There were people who needed him not to be weak.

Hermione was behind him, he could feel her watching. Bright-eyed and upright and perfectly alive, and he was standing with his hand on his wand between her and the door. It was fine. He had it handled.

When she caught his eye she touched her wand, questioning, and he shook his head. But his heart rate was slowing. His brain became reacquainted with the present, and not a moment too soon.

“We showed her the tunnel by the Jenkins statue,” said Pansy. She flicked back her hair and tried for a smile, holding out her hand. “Did you see my ring, Daph? It’s horrible, isn’t it?”

“What? Oh, dreadful, just,” said Daphne, with an indifferent glance. “Makes me sick. Tori, did you get my invitation? Lavender has tea and music on Fridays, and we talk about everything, truly everything. You must come.”

Astoria shifted. “Sorry. Couldn’t make it. I’ll try next week.”

“Lovely,” said Daphne, after a beat.

“Wonderful,” said Astoria. “Grand.”

Another beat.

“Tori,” she said curiously, “have you… made friends?” She cocked her head at Millicent.

Millie curled her lip. “What’s it to you?”

“Well,” she said, “I’d just be surprised — seeing as you didn’t think much of my family, before.”

Astoria was begging with every line and feature on her face for her sister to stop.

“Your family is fine,” said Millie. “Your family is perfectly respectable. Your family isn’t the reason you ditched us.”

Daphne shrilled in fine, high, terrible laughter. “I ran away because you killed my cat, you perfect bitch.”

“I’m the bitch? Me? You hit Tracy’s father because you couldn’t take a joke, you loon—”

“Daffy,” hissed Astoria, “Daffy, please, I’m sorry, I’ll come next week, could you just—”

“Could I just what?” said Daphne shrilly, staring at her. “Leave? You want me to leave?”

“No! It’s just — we’re out of seats—”

“There’s not a seat?” Daphne’s next laugh was even worse than her first. “You think I came over so I could sit with them? Millie ‘Mono’ Bulstrode and the castle broomstick?”

“OI!”

“Daph,” said Pansy, startled.

“Go sit on a skrewt. Everyone knows you’re shagging someone in Gryffindor anyway,” said Tracy, and her eyes did a mean little swivel at Draco. “That’s why you’re always staying nights.”

“I sleep in the girls’,” Daphne interrupted, breathless with anger. “And that’s — that’s some implication, for someone who’d open her legs for a house-elf if it played quidditch!”

Theo was still watching him miserably, his mouth a seam of unhappiness.

“Hey,” said Hermione coolly, appearing at Draco’s shoulder. “What’s going on? Why’s everyone shouting?”

“Oh, look,” said Tracy shrilly, waving at her, “what a surprise, rabble to the rescue! Tori, take a look — it’s the Gryffindor special, half-breeds, mudbloods, and blood tra—”

“Langlock!”

Daphne’s wand had somehow found its way into her hand. Tracy’s jaw sealed shut and stayed there, despite her shrieking and fumbling.

“I’m a Slytherin,” said Daphne, in the lull of heavy breathing that followed. “I am a Slytherin.”

Millie turned slowly from Daphne to Astoria, who was curled up in her chair as if she wanted to be anywhere else in the world.

“As you can probably tell,” said Millie, “there’s more than one kind.”

“Millie,” said Theo, “heel.”

Millie spat, but she shrunk down in her seat, silent.

Astoria sniffed. Daphne stared at her, then gave a incoherent cry of anger, and stormed out.

Hermione stepped out of her way. “Ten points from Slytherin,” she said, after the door jingled shut.

“What!” Astoria sat up, indignant. “We didn’t do anything! And Daphne’s a Slytherin, too!”

“You may not know this,” she said coolly, “but using inappropriate language for other students is against the Hogwarts handbook. Not to mention a bad idea, in general, if you want to make friends. And you should be kinder to your sister. She’s the only one at this table trying to help you.”

Tracy said something sharp and probably unfavorable, but her jaw was still welded together.

Astoria trembled. “I don’t even know you! Why don’t you just stick your nose out?” she said furiously. “Nobody asked you!”

Hermione looked down at her and said nothing. Something in her gaze cut through Astoria, who quaked, lifted her shoulders, and after a few, searing moments, dropped her eyes to the floor, a blotchy flush consuming her cheeks.

“Right,” said Hermione. “Okay. Well, I could take points for mouthing off to a prefect, but I have a sneaking suspicion you don’t really mean that, and I’m sorry to say that I can’t help you more.” She paused, and turned to Pansy. “Congratulations, by the way.”

Pansy’s face did an unpleasant thing.

Hermione raised an eyebrow. “On your engagement?” she said, fluttering her left hand. “Congratulations. He’s very wealthy, and I know that was important to you.”

Pansy took a long breath, which seemed almost certain to precede something nasty, but all she said was a hollow: “Thanks, Granger.”

Hermione nodded, and turned away from the table. Draco cast Theo a cold sneer and went with her.

She was talking under her breath before they were even out of earshot. “I think she was headed for the gates,” she murmured, striding quickly to the door. “I’m not sure where, Harry always has the Map, if she’s gone back to the castle—”

“Greengrass?”

“Yes! Daphne, obviously! Keep up,” she said absently, pushing out the door. “I didn’t see where she went — do you want to split up, check the side streets? If she’s gone into a shop, we can still find her —”

He was slightly surprised.

“You’re being kind to her,” he said, as the wind started to rip and pluck at their clothes again, out on the open pavement. The bell clattered behind them as the door to the Three Broomsticks swung shut.

“Hardly. I’m being decent. And I do care — I mean, she’s a bit condescending, but I’d be a hypocrite if that bothered me, I suppose — do you think she went up this way? She can’t be far. It’s a small village, and Daphne isn’t the type to cry in the woods.”

Draco caught her arm. She stopped, gazing curiously at him, another string of orders caught half-formed on her lips.

“Granger—”

In the cold, her cheeks and her mouth turned the same shade of floral pink, like the beads of red at the heart of a tiger lily. Her breath steamed a cloud around her face, stained golden in the late afternoon.

“I happen to like Daphne,” she said, almost stubbornly, as if rebutting a point no one had made. “She’s a nice girl. Well — not really, all the time, but I’m not, either, and — I feel bad for her. She should find better friends.”

“She has a few.”

“Yes, but she still wants her old ones. You know how that feels.”

“I recovered.”

“It’s different. You were so young. How would you feel now, if you were tossed out of Gryffindor?” she said absently. “You’d miss me—”

Like air.

“—and Harry, and Ron—”

He replied, dryly: “I’d hope I could still talk to you. Unless you select Potions partners by House.”

“Oh, obviously. I mean, you’re not getting rid of me, I’d hunt you down if you transferred to Durmstrang— I’m not doing Potions without you, I can’t stand butchering.”

“The moving dedication one feels for a prehensile carving knife.”

“A very nice prehensile carving knife. And you know what I mean. If I moved into Ravenclaw, it’s not like we’d stop being friends.”

“If you move into Ravenclaw, you’ll take me with you, and that’s final. You’re not leaving me with these people.”

“I’m not exposing you to Marietta,” she said darkly.

“Do I detect a concern for my virtue?”

“Wh— no,” she said, flustered, “I don’t care if you — and if you did want to, I’d — but I’d be shocked if — you never seemed to want to do anything, with—”

“Do what?”

“Anything non-perfunctory!” she announced, addressing a passing cloud. “Unless you did. And you haven’t said as much. Which, obviously, you don’t have to say to me, we don’t talk about that kind of thing, which is fine. You’re at liberty to — with anyone. But I can’t imagine you would find very much that’s edifying about Marietta Edgecombe. My two cents.”

“Naturally.” Then: “There hasn’t really been anything to talk about. You know.”

“Right,” she said quickly. “I know. Not that — not that I know, or assumed, I didn’t — but none of the Gryffindor girls said anything, and someone would’ve mentioned if you did. And people would notice if it was another House. Not that they’re snooping — which they are — but also, it’s just — noticeable. Parvati was seeing a Hufflepuff for three months last year. She was always suggesting trips to the kitchens."

"Right."

He went silent in the rustle of the falling leaves. Suddenly, he turned.

"Do you all talk about me?"

The door to the Three Broomsticks jingled. Ron hurried out, wrestling his jumper back on; it was hard going, since it was on backwards, and he had his head halfway through a sleeve.

"Oi! You lot! Where we going? What happened? Where's Daphne? What's the problem?"

He popped his head back out the right way and blinked at Draco, who was still holding Hermione's arm, and standing close enough that their breath was the same mist.

He let go of her arm. She straightened her coat — his coat — with a little tug.

"Gone," said Hermione briskly. "The other girls were awful. We should just go looking and tell Harry later, I don't want to interrupt him and Cho."

Ron grinned. "Harry won't mind an evacuation," he said. "Marietta keeps asking what a dementor smells like."

"You go on, then, and let's meet at the Hogsmeade gate, ten minutes to curfew. Good?"

"Yes'm," he said, grinning, and snapped off a salute. Hermione laughed and tossed off a little salute, herself, and it was harmless.

Draco turned on his heel.

"Ten to curfew," he called.

“Yes! At the gates, remember!”

“Seeya!” chirped Ron, which was an embarrassing reminder that he hadn’t the slightest idea what was going on in Draco’s head.

The wind washed his face, ruffling his hair, and the last warmth from the Three Broomsticks whiffed out. He chose a corner at random, turned it, and then stepped with his back to the wall, taking a moment to wrestle himself back to composure.

It took three. Then he swept down the alley, Vanishing a host of rubbish that stood in his path. It reappeared about twenty feet behind him, but then, his concentration was off.

At the far street, emerging on a somewhat dingier road populated mostly by residential cottages, someone called his name. He stopped walking, but didn’t turn around. He threw a glance over his shoulder.

Theo stood on the other end of the alley, a small black silhouette inside a crevice of light. His hands were in his pockets. He was flat of mouth and dead of eye, as if he were half asleep, despite having just called his name.

Draco turned back around and kept walking.

“Draco!”

He turned right and headed in the opposite direction he’d seen Daphne go. No need to lead the wolves to her doorstep.

“Listen to me — just give it a go, would you?” Footsteps sounded on the cobble behind him, hastening when he failed to respond. “You can still hate me afterward, you prat, I promise.”

He was on the verge of responding to that when he caught himself, and sealed his mouth.

“There’s a certain element of irony to this, you realize,” Theo called, scrambling up the hill after him. They were trailing out of the commercial center, through a road of sparse houses and sparser cobble, near the place where pavement became dirt. Burnished leaves fluttered through the air like a shower of copper coins, glinting in the sun, a fortune of the cheapest order. “Me? Chasing you? Desperate for a word? I mean, how the tables turn, don’t they?”

“I was never desperate.”

The footsteps stopped. He turned around, and found that Theo looked amused.

“Thought that might get you,” he said softly. “Predictable.”

He said nothing. Theo inhaled, halting, and looked down at his feet.

“Why is it,” he said, “we always have our uncomfortable conversations in Hogsmeade? Is it the climate? It’s a cheery place, I don’t know why we do these things here.”

“Because if you were ever honest in front of your friends, you wouldn’t have any.”

He waited for something caustic to come bouncing back at him, but none did. The barb slipped cleanly through the air between them, landed, and stayed there.

“I’m not so sure about that,” said Theo, at length. “They’re worse people than you give them credit for.”

“Daphne isn’t.”

“Does she still count me as a friend? That’s actually a relief, thank you.”

“I wouldn’t hold out for Pansy.”

Levity vanished. “Don’t talk to me about Pansy.”

“I was surprised you let it happen with Warrington, frankly.”

“We’re going to get her out of it.”

“Will you? Happy hunting.”

“Your insincerity is noted and rejected. Have you seen this thing?” He flipped up his sleeve and showed Draco a seamless band of braided silver, like a cross between a manacle and a wristwatch. “It’s custom. Won’t find this at Moribund’s. Sends up an alarm and pings every patrolman in a five-mile radius if I breach the castle grounds. Plus I’m banned from Floo and owl post — they’re worried I might contact my father, or go through a middle-man. Thicknesse takes security seriously, I’ll give him that.”

“Right.”

The sky was turning gray. Not cloud-gray, but the dull gray of a winter’s evening, when the sun had been so bright and cold that it seemed to scour the blue out of it, leaving the whole landscape a shade of tinsel. Alternating shadows coursed over the ground in reeling waves.

“You killed someone.”

“Fuck off,” said Theo immediately, panicked. “No, I didn’t.”

“Barty Crouch—”

“Died at the hands of my father, who’s in Azkaban for it, thank you, justice done.”

“Your father shot a Killing Curse at an unarmed man.”

“And where you get the gall to judge, I certainly don’t know. Do you think your father made Death Eater with his hands clean? What would Lucius Malfoy have thought about what happened that night?” Theo flung wide his arms. “He would have — he would’ve shaken my hand!”

“No, he wouldn’t.”

This was a blind lie, in fact. Theo was probably right.

But Draco would rather die than let him believe it, because he didn’t know what Lucius Malfoy would have done, and he never would. And it was vile to invoke his father’s memory against him, as if Theo had any idea what it was like to be the last of his line, any inkling of the waters he was drawing from.

He was the last Malfoy. That legacy belonged to him. No one had the right to invoke it. Draco decided what Malfoys did and didn’t do.

“I didn’t kill Crouch,” Theo snapped. He was talking almost unintelligibly fast, getting in three words for Draco’s every one. “Listen to me. I didn’t kill him. Can you get that through your head? Stop looking at me like that. I didn’t.”

“Your father—”

“Acted on the orders of the Dark Lord, and what did you want from him? Was he supposed to die? Was I supposed to die? Is that what you wanted? You wanted me to die on an altar I don’t believe in so you wouldn’t have to feel bad when you looked at me?”

“—killed an unarmed man—”

“Who would’ve done the same, and I respected Crouch, I did, but men don’t just stop being your enemy because you respect them!”

“Why was he unarmed, Theo?”

Leaves on the breeze cracked and broke into a shatter of brown dust over their heads.

“Why was he unarmed?”

Theo wet his lips. He dropped his head, and the surrender was totally, humiliatingly complete. It was a white flag planted on a dead body. It was very nearly pitiable.

Green light. The sound of a body. He wondered if Theo could hear it, too.

Nearly pitiable. Only nearly.

“Because you disarmed him,” he finished, when it became clear Theo wouldn't. “Can you possibly believe that Crouch would have died if he had been able to defend himself?”

“As if you wouldn’t have done the same thing,” spat Theo. “For Narcissa.”

His wand whispered out of its sheath.

I ts point was at Theo’s neck before he could flinch.

“Keep her name out of your mouth.”

“Say you wouldn’t. Say you’d let her be killed, I’ll call you liar. I’ll call you fucking hypocrite. I’ll do that anyway, come to think.”

“He wasn’t going to kill your father.”

“As if you’d know!”

“The Dark Lord was mostly dead himself before your fool of a father started meddling, and Pettigrew is a shred of a man—”

“Are you sure?” he demanded, stepping forward, until the point of Draco’s wand nearly brushed his forehead. “How sure were you? If it was Narcissa, how sure would you need to be? Before you ran the risk?”

“If I thought you gave a single damn about your father, that argument might have an ounce of weight. But you hate him. It's not equivalent.”

“Of course I hate him,” said Theo slowly, as if Draco were speaking Greek. “But he’s my dad.”

“He hit you.”

“That’s speculation.”

“In third year. Do you remember? He hit you, and it nearly got your neck broken on the quidditch pitch. George Weasley saved you. Do you remember any of that?”

“He’s my dad.”

“He made you learn to Apparate at fourteen. Merlin knows how many times you splinched yourself, but I bet it wasn’t just the once with me and Pansy. That was your blood on his hands. He didn’t care.”

“Correct,” said Theo. “He’s also my dad.”

“Fine. Put the violence aside. He’s put you in an impossible position. You see that, don’t you? He made you a pariah. He made you a criminal. He put your life in mortal danger—”

“He’s my dad. He’s my dad. He’s my dad—”

“He won’t protect you. He doesn’t care for you. He’s not there. Nothing you do is going to change the fact that he doesn’t love you —”

“Shut up!”

“Listen to me.” He was shaking with a rage that he barely understood. “He doesn’t love you, you — you idiot, you prize fucking fool. How much proof do you need? You’re throwing your life away for nothing, for a man who barely knows you and wouldn’t want to if he could—”

“He’s my dad, he’s my dad, he’s my fucking dad, are you listening to me?” He shoved Draco’s wand away and stepped close. “He’s my father. Now till ever. I'm his son, I've always been his son, I'll always be his son, I can't just decide — it's not like — I don't have any choice. I don't have any choice!"

"Tell that to Viktor Krum's parents."

It was a clean hit to the jugular, wide spray, horrible mess. It took Theo apart on an atomic level, leaving him wild-eyed and distant.

"Remember him? There were two people who died that night," he said. "Not to mention Potter, who, by the way, almost died himself, not to mention the Dark Lord has returned. Which means that you and I both might also die, and that's no matter what we do, because the thing about wars, Nott, is that people don't fight them with Stunners. So I regret to say we are well past the point at which I could give a fuck about your lack of choices."

"It's not my fault."

"If you really find that convincing, I'd be surprised, but suit yourself," he said coldly. "Just don't suppose that I do. Because I don't. And if I end up dead in what's coming, I don't want you to imagine for one moment that I'd have forgiven you. I wouldn't. I won't."

"You're fucking cruel, Draco, you know that? You have everything in your corner, everything—"

"Everything? Everything? The phrase 'blood traitor' is about to become a death sentence, and you think I'm cruel?"

"I had no choice! Are you joking? You're Lord Malfoy! A real boy, with real parents, a real life! Saint Draco of Gryffindor Tower, always sneering, always lording over the high ground! First man in history to get Snape and McGonagall wrapped around his fucking pinky, with your perfect marks and your prefect's badge and your do-gooder pals — you've had a good life all but shoved down your throat, and you still think you have the right to talk about hard choices? Sorry to trouble you, sir, but I'm Theodore fucking Nott, and I broke the world. And you're free. So don't talk to me about death sentences."

A flock of crows leapt from the trees, shrieking, roused by the bellow of voices from the street below. The flutter of their wings dappled shadows on the street.

You're free. You're free. You're free.

He stared at Theo for a long time. It would be lying to say the thought hadn't occurred to him, but he had never in a hundred years thought he would hear it coming from someone else's mouth.

At least not someone wearing a green tie.

"You had a choice," he said finally, "not to disarm Barty Crouch."

"You're not listening," said Theo tiredly. "You don't care. Of course you don't. Who would? Running question of my life."

"You had an out." He spoke clinically. "Crouch gave you a plea deal. Witness protection."

"You're hilarious."

"The two greatest living aurors swore to protect you. You went back on it. Don't ever tell me you didn't have choices."

"It didn't feel like a choice."

"It was."

"Right. Like a choice between drinking piss or hemlock. Or between hemlock and a noose."

"Those are still choices."

If Theo was surprised to hear that, it was nothing compared to how surprised he was at himself.

“I don’t understand why you’re so angry at me,” Theo rasped. “I didn’t hurt you. I was careful not to. I even — I even saved Potter for you.”

Draco was sincerely and completely astounded. He had to give it to Theo for that, he really did. It was the one thing he couldn’t have possibly expected to hear, because it was patently untrue.

“I told you about the Cup,” he added. “I told you. I tried to tell you, anyway.”

A beat passed. He stood like a child holding a broken toy, nervously awaiting reprimand.

Draco took a breath, fully prepared to argue it to the last — and stopped.

The sun was low, and the bells were tolling. Curfew. He’d missed their rendezvous at the gate. He’d have to catch up with them at the castle, explain where he’d been. One more exhausting conversation.

And what did he want? Nothing. What did he ever get from Theo, except more exhaustion, more frustration, more knives in his back. Perhaps it hadn’t been his hand on the wand; perhaps he hadn’t wanted to; but it wasn’t a question of wanting, of intention. They were past the point where it mattered whether they liked the choices they were making.

“You’re right,” he said quietly, and wondered what his face must have looked like, for Theo to turn so pale. “Thanks.”

He stepped around Theo and started walking.

“Draco?”

His voice was high and thin. “Draco, what are you doing? Come back.”

“For what?”

“We’re not finished!”

“Yes, we are.”

It hung in the air like a withered leaf, trembling on the breeze. He walked away before Theo could disagree with him, and if he tried, it was too late for Draco to hear.

He didn’t return to the Tower immediately. He went instead to a room tucked in the lofty floors near Ravenclaw, and when he had made certain that he could still find his way there, he crossed the long breadth of the castle back to Gryffindor, which had the added benefit of giving him time to burn out the residual anger on the grueling enterprise of approximately ten million stairs.

When he reached the Pink Lady, the torches gave more light than the windows. He’d missed dinner. Almost missed curfew, too. Students milled here and there on their way back from the Great Hall or the library, but their steps were quick, and they moved without leisure, all in more or less the same direction, murmuring quiet prayers for the stairs to cooperate and keep them out of Filch’s reach.

“Mimbulus Mimbletonia.”

“Cheer up, dearie,” she whispered, winking at him. “Hot toddies inside. Don’t let the bastards get you down.”

He could have laughed. He really could.

Climbing through the channel brought with it a blinding tide of firelight, and when it cleared, he was in the warm smoky common room, just the same as it had ever been, with the same coterie of students doing homework, reading, giggling over games of jacks and gobstones. Some of them waved to him. One of them — known first as Shrimp, since introduced as Alfie Chrissenpoffer — popped up his head and eagerly invited Draco to watch as he successfully demonstrated his first mastered spell, a Levitation Charm. It was perfectly acceptable, and Draco informed him of as much, which made the poor hopeless swot-in-training beam all out of proportion with his face.

At the fire, a pair of armchairs were drawn close together, and he recognized the shadows. He crossed the common room, gliding almost noiselessly through the murmuring commons, and the pair of faces rotated into view, washed yellow and warm from the light. It was Hermione and Ron. Their heads were bent together, and they were speaking in low serious voices about something, the subject inaudible, but its severity writ in the firm line between Hermione's eyes, the gentle slack of her mouth, as if she were absorbed entirely in it.

Her bandaged hand was extended on the arm of the chair, and Ron was holding it.

His breath encountered something jagged and thick in his throat. He revised his opinion, after a moment of nauseated staring: he wasn't holding her hand. He was cleaning her cuts, although for some reason his body didn't seem to think that was much better; her hand was still splayed on his, and Ron was daubing at the cuts with a little cotton bulb, making her twitch and wince now and then. When this happened, Ron would grimace and squeeze her hand, as if to say, Hang on, and she would nod bravely and carry on talking in that soft low voice that meant she didn't want to be overheard.

Draco was outside himself and inside himself at once, hot and cold all over again. He opened his mouth to say something, and felt it coming up fast and hot from somewhere in his chest. He knew what to say to make them jump apart. It was something oily and subtle and it would burn them both in the right places at once, like thumbing a button. He could carve a swath of distance between them, and it wouldn't hurt anymore. It was so easy. It was one of the few things he'd always been good at.

What he did instead was not that. He took his tongue between his teeth, carefully, and then bit down until the taste of blood washed the acid out.

Once upon a time, he'd said a word that ripped apart the conversation under it, and then he'd nearly done it again, and he wouldn't . He wouldn't. He wasn't Theodore Nott. He wasn't shackled to anything, not even cruelty, not even himself.

He breathed in and out, and to give his mind something to do, he counted; but the counting didn't help, so he did sums, arithmancy problems, integrals and multivariable derivatives, the numbers spinning until his head was full of the clean clockwork of numbers against numbers and not feeling, not oil, not heat, nothing that could burn anyone but him. And to a mild, pleasant surprise, the acid receded, and the feeling went down. And he was still himself. And he had said nothing that anyone would have to forgive.

He considered his own hand, latched unconsciously on his wand. He pried the fingers off and flexed them, ignoring the twinge of pain in the tendons, from too much clenching. Pain was easy. Pain was a mantle he'd been wearing since he was eight years old. This was — this was nothing. A girl he fancied was leaning into someone else's hand, smiling at someone else's jokes, liking him or loving him, and it didn't matter if he felt slightly like dying, or what one might suppose dying to feel like, if one had never felt death, or this, any time previous.

It didn't matter if it was Hermione Granger, the only creature of her like the universe had ever made, or would; it didn't matter if she had a string tied to something at the center of his chest and could pull him around with it, tug on it, reel him as she liked, with the laughter and the eyes and the raw-bitten lips. She could still pull him anywhere. What she wanted — whatever she wanted — if it wasn't him, in that way, it wasn't his business. She still had the string. He was still hers. She'd still promised — she'd still promised to keep him, if it came to that.

Hermione didn’t break promises.

He was acting like a fucking fool. He laughed a little at himself, rubbing his thumb and forefinger into his eyes, and Hermione heard it.

“Draco? Is that you?”

“Oi, mate, there you are,” said Ron, standing up.

Hermione stood up, almost tripping over herself in haste. “Finally! We were going to go out with the Cloak, in a bit, if you still weren’t back. Well — Ron and I were, Harry’s over in Ravenclaw with Cho — it’s a shame you weren’t here, everyone made fun of him, you would’ve loved it — but you're alright, aren’t you?” She stumbled around the chair and gave him an unsubtle sweep with her eyes, as if expecting to see him down a limb.

“Perfectly. Sorry to trouble you.” There was some pleasure in the irony, at least. “Ran into Theodore Nott. Had a nice chat.”

“Him? What did he want?”

“Merlin knows.”

Hermione frowned. “I hope he’s not up to anything,” she said, slipping the bandages back over her hand. Draco averted his eyes. “I don’t suppose he do much with his father in prison, but still.”

“Wouldn’t put it past him,” Ron said. “Slimy bugger. What’d he say?”

Their silhouettes were twinned against the fire, two figures of a painter’s study in shadow and light. He wondered what he looked like, in the shadows.

“Nothing important,” he said curtly. “Daphne?”

“Sleeping. Seemed pretty wrung out when we found her. Didn’t say much.”

“Alright.” There was a good deal left to sort there, but he was too tired to care. “I’m going to bed.”

“It’s half nine.”

“And we have quidditch practice at six, so you’d be well-advised to follow my example.”

It was too sharp. He touched his tongue to his incisor, hard, and then corrected himself: “But stay if you like. Potter doesn’t sleep but after midnight, and he’s the star player, so clearly it can’t be all that important. Enjoy yourselves.”

Hermione said his name, but he pretended not to hear it.

It was selfish, but he didn’t want to see her try to explain it, or hear what she might say, especially if, God forbid, she tried to be honest with him. He was at his upper limit of honesty for the day. He could bear no more of it. If she looked him in the eye and tried to tell him, with her stubborn magnetic insistence of a voice, exactly what she and Ron were talking about in such tender, private tones, he might very well lose his mind.

So he ignored her. It was selfish, but he could indulge in a trifle of selfishness, privately, where it wouldn’t hurt anyone. He was a selfish person. She knew that perfectly well.

He climbed the stairs and went into the dorm, where he shut the door behind him, leaned on it, and slid down to a slow rest at the base, his head tipped back to the cold wood, letting the cold leech all feeling from his limbs.

-An author I admire greatly once said that the key to writing strong side characters was to remember that everyone experiences life as the protagonist of their story, but sometimes their story is taking place in a different genre than yours. Anyway, in my outline document there’s a little footnote by Astoria’s name, and it reads:

“while everyone else worries about incipient fascism, Astoria is living out a fucked-up wizard version of Mean Girls.”

-This one goes out to another absolute banger from the soundtrack, Dumbledore's Army. Thank you to my lord and savior, Nicholas "Daddy" Hooper, conjurer of jams that kill writer's block stone dead.

-Shoutout also to Michael “Short King” Corner, who has now, I realize belatedly, canonically pulled not one, but two of the coolest girls in Gryffindor. I can't say that was on purpose, but I've written it in and I'm keeping it. Frankly inequitable rizz.

-A lot of chapters in this act of Book 5 got renamed and reshuffled during a huuuuge restructuring that happened in the second draft. I spent more editing, rewriting, and cutting together the six-chapter span of writing between September 1995 and December 1995 than I did writing Books 1 and 2 put together, and let me tell you, it was an Experience.

-For everyone who commented saying something kind — especially the people who write Those Comments, and you know who you are — you are the reason I have sat at my desk with my head in my hands, giggling and making strange, horrible noises far too late into the night for my neighbors' consideration. I hope that your trains run on time and your bus pulls up to the stop precisely as you get there; or, failing that, that the seats in your car are already warm when you get in.

-Next chapter: "The Room of Requirement." It will feature: Narcissa Malfoy's unexpected contribution to her son's advancing career in juvenile delinquency; a lot of nerd shit about duels; and a salient piece of architectural trivia.

The Room of Requirement

Chapter 64: The Room of Requirement

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

There was a problem. Several problems. A set of infinitely divisible problems, stacked in a fractal formation, and also on fire.

He had been given to understand from a young age that his mother and father had drifted together in a celestial confluence of pleasure and destiny, joined their fortunes, and never thenceforth been parted. He had never contemplated the particulars of their meeting, or courtship. That wasn't important. It seemed obvious that when two people were well-suited, the inevitable would happen, and some cosmic chorus of witnesses would politely applaud from their box seats.

Aside from them, the evidence was depressing. Fred and Angelina had some sort of situation configured, but it was horribly particular, and seemed to involve a lot of yelling and brotherly tussling. Katie smuggled girls up the staircase sometimes and hung a sock on the door, but they were all ushered out by morning. Seamus and Lavender had been on dates, but Lavender flirted indiscriminately, so whatever Seamus brought to the table couldn't be all that appealing.

And Hermione was complicated.

Sometimes, in the library, he would find her staring into the middle distance with her lip caught between her teeth, and he would have to get up and pretend to fetch another reference text to stop himself from thinking about it, or better yet, doing something about it.

Which made it almost fucking impossible to concentrate on potionmaking, among other inconveniences. It also made it difficult to get to sleep. Sheets could generate unexpected degrees of friction.

Other times, while they were reading in the common room, she would tip over and put her head on his shoulder, usually because she was too tired to notice what she was doing; and the longer he allowed that to go on without moving, the more guilt he felt, as if it was something he were stealing from her.

This guilt failed to stop him from imagining anything vis-a-vis: the library. Or the sheets.

“I don’t think she likes Ron,” declared Daphne.

They were in the common room. Rain drizzled softly on the glass. He had his boots up on the table and Moste Potente Potions in his lap, making lazy annotations between lines of his godfather’s dark scrawl.

Daphne was painting her fingernails with a bit of muggle varnish, and every so often she would waggle her fingers at him to ask for a Drying Charm or an opinion, only one of which dignity permitted him to give.

“I don’t recall soliciting your opinion.”

“Then sulk more quietly.”

“I was being silent.”

“Only on the outside!”

“That’s where the sounds tend to be.”

“I have reasons. Don’t you want to hear my reasons?”

“No.”

She sulked, lacquering varnish. “There’s no need to be huffy,” she said huffily. “I know you think you're terribly opaque, with your standoffish Victorian situation, but if you want other people to remain in — well, can't say ignorance, I'm certain Harry's noticed something and repressed it like a good little boy, but let's try plausible doubt — then you can't keep staring at Ronald like you're going to kill him. It's bad manners. Throw down your glove and duel him for her like a gentleman, or pack up your frowns, Obliviate yourself, and leave them to each other. I have no other advice.”

The tips of his ears heated. “This isn't the nineteenth century. Gentlemen don't duel over witches. For one thing, the witches tend to object.”

“Phooey! I wouldn't!” she exclaimed. “I'd love to have some strapping gents clobber each other over me. I'd dine out on it for years! And frankly, I’d give anything just to have a crush. Better something fun and hopeless than nothing.”

“‘Fun and hopeless’ is meant to be encouraging, in this context?”

“I rather think I’d like a quidditch player, actually. Who would you advise? I wish that Oliver Wood were still here, he was gorgeous.”

“There are at least a dozen reasons we are absolutely not having this conversation.”

She twined a curl around her finger and smiled. “Indulge me,” she said, “or I’m going to start flirting with Harry.”

“Lord Merlin. Do you always open your negotiations with death threats?”

“No comment! He’s fit, and you’re not helping.”

“Fine. I’ve heard George Weasley is unentangled, you harpy. Your union will revolt me, but at least I won’t have to kill myself.”

“I don’t like the twins,” she said, frowning. “They’re not kind.”

“What, to Ronald? They’re his brothers.”

“I’m not like that with Tori.”

“You’re also not her brother.”

She fell silent. He lowered his quill, and braced himself.

“Would you care to discuss it?”

“No,” she said sharply, and shoved the varnish bottle to the side.

The wind whistled furiously in the eaves.

“You’re asking too much of her, you know.”

She worked her jaw, rolling her fingers to and fro in the light.

He dropped his eyes to the book, inferring her answer from silence. At the top of the page there was note in different ink, crosshatched over other instructions, as if Snape had scrawled it for want of anything else to write on: Vermicarnis.

It was underlined. Twice. It had no description except: For B.

Which was, of course, terribly intriguing. Though not much in the way of a spell description.

Presumably Snape would know, but he was never in his office to be asked; Draco had twice visited since the start of the year, and both times found him gone. Apparently he wasn’t spending his free hours in the castle.

The reasons for which didn’t bear thinking about. Knowing that his godfather was a spy was different from knowing that somewhere, at that moment, he was among Death Eaters, his life staked on a cover that an increasing number of people could break.

Draco, now, being one of them.

“Astoria annoys me,” remarked Daphne, drawing him out of reverie. “I adore her, but she can’t stand not to have her own way.”

He held his tongue, with difficulty.

“I mean, she’s a sweet girl. Truly. I love her to distraction. But when we were younger, she’d follow me around everywhere. Wouldn’t leave alone! I’d have friends over, Pansy, Te—Blaise, and the cousins, and so forth, and we’d want to go off on our own. But the minute we tried to leave, Tori would pitch a screaming tantrum — I mean ripping her hair out, beating herself against the wall — until Mummy ordered us to take her, just so it would stop. She was a horrible brat. We both were, but she was monstrous. And of course, she’d pretend to everyone else that she was a perfect angel. Because she so desperately wanted them to like her, you know? No one ever came to visit her, because she was so young, and she couldn’t go out to parties, like me; her disease was a bit more advanced, that’s why the chair… anyway, I played a mean trick on her once.” She blew on her fingers. “Pansy and I — and Teddy, of course — we wanted to go riding Daddy’s thestrals. Of course we couldn’t see them, but that’s part of the fun of it, if you’re tied in the saddle, it feels like you’re flying. Only Tori threw the biggest, loudest, nastiest fit, because it wouldn’t be fair; she couldn’t ride. So Pansy and I, we — oh, God, we were really such bitches — we told her we were going to go swimming, and we pushed her out all the way to the big wading fountain in the farthest part of the garden, where you could barely see the house, let alone hear it. And then we took some ropes and tied her chair to a tree, and left her there, and went riding.”

Daphne scraped off a smudge of varnish with her thumbnail. “Anyway,” she said casually, “it was so lovely and fun we rode until it got dark, and I hate to say we forgot about her. We were children, you know, we weren’t — we didn’t think. And when Mummy asked where she was, I — I was so scared of getting in trouble that I lied, and said I didn’t know.” She paused. “It was Teddy who finally went out and got her. But he didn’t tell Mummy what Pansy and I did; he just said that he'd heard her talking about swimming earlier, and had a hunch. And somehow — to this day, I've absolutely no idea how — he convinced Tori to back him up. She claimed she'd lost track of time. Never mentioned the fiasco again."

He waited, but whatever point she had in mind, she believed it made; she tucked the varnish bottle into her bag.

"Teddy was always like that, though," she said absently. "He made our problems go away. He'd smile all pretty, and snap his fingers, and everyone did what he wanted, especially Tori… That's what worries me about her being alone with them. She just wants to feel liked, and she's willing to be awful for it."

He holstered his quill in the pot. "Well, you're right, or you're wrong," he said briskly, dropping the book on the desk and lowering his feet. "Either Slytherin suits her or it doesn't. Neither outcome rests in your hands. As with both you and I, a capricious piece of senile headgear has elected to create years of difficulty for her, and far be it for me to suggest that our lives should ever be easy. Speaking of which. It's time for our routine endeavor in courting expulsion."

She brightened. "You say that like you don't love it."

"I don't."

"You do," she averred, springing up. "And do you know, I suspect I'm starting to love it, too? It's dreadful, but the whole enterprise has grown on me. Such excitement. And everyone's so jolly all the time! Perhaps I'm more of a lion than I thought."

"As watching Diggory trot around in his shirtsleeves has nothing to do with it, of course."

"I said a 'lion,' Draco, not a nun."

The seventh floor of Hogwarts glowed pale blue. The windows were soaked in the low-hanging sunshine of an October afternoon, like they were walking through a bridge into the sky. At the end of the hallway sat an undecorated stone wall.

Draco drew his wand and checked his corner. There was no one. The Marauder's Map found Filch safely in his office, and Umbridge in hers. They were four stories of castle and half a thousand stairs away, and that was how he liked them.

"Clear?" hissed Hermione, ducking her head around the corner. He pushed it back, and she made a noise of irritation.

"If I'm checking a corner, do wait for me to check before you stick your head in it, please, Granger dear."

"'Do wait for me to check,'" she imitated, under her breath, and sidestepped him. "Someone thinks he's Mad-Eye Moody."

"Bothered, Minerva?"

She scoffed, which more or less proved his point.

The group milled around in the sunny space outside the wall, waiting for someone to do something impressive about it. Marietta started whispering to Cho.

He crossed twice before the wall. The request of I need a place to practice magic was slightly bled in with Make Ronald stop smirking, but he expected the Room could multitask.

Wrought-iron curlicues sprouted from the brick in oily black lacework. Hermione laughed, pleasantly surprised, as if she'd honestly expected him to take them to a big corridor in the middle of nowhere.

He raised his voice. "Everyone get inside, and step lively, as I will shut the door on you. Be advised that if your nose gets caved in, I am unlikely to notice and less likely to care."

“He doesn’t mean that,” added said.

“In fact I do, and you can decide for yourself whose bluff you’d like to call.”

The doors parted at his touch.

It was a cathedral.

No, it wasn’t; only the light made it seem so, pouring through the triptych of red-and-gold stained glass at the far end of a massive hall, with a scalloped ceiling embroidered here and there with dangling grape-bunches of gas-lamps. Suits of armor stood in file under a barrage of sconces, and bookshelves enough for a lifetime of reading, or, for Hermione, a week. Embellishment of serpents coiled around the crown and foot of the Corinthian columns, and the flagstones were polished to reflection.

“Nice,” said Ron wisely. “Understated. Intimate.”

“D’you think the ceiling’s high enough?” said Harry, craning his neck. “Don’t want to bump my head.”

“It’s beautiful,” murmured Hermione, staring up at the stained glass.

Draco smirked at all of them, individually, and then at the group, broadly, which streamed in with appreciative murmurs. Even Fred gave a low whistle when he peered into one of the cabinets.

Harry climbed onto the center dais, glanced at the podium, and then shuffled in front of it, rather than behind.

“Thanks, everybody, for coming! Anyone not here? Anyone — no? That’s great. I was thinking the first thing we should do is Disarmers Charm. So, er — partner up, and have at.”

The crowd fell into disarray. Hermione cleared her throat. Harry stepped down to confer with her.

“Harry,” she whispered, “you need to show them how to do it.”

“What? It’s Expelliarmus. It’s simple.”

“Yes! For you! There are first years here!”

“Oh. Oh, right! Sorry, everyone! Let me just run through it, quickly, and I’ll show you… it’s Expelliarmus, right, and then there’s a jabby bit, like this…”

Fumbling, Harry vaulted back up to the dais and hurried through a demonstration of a Disarming Charm that made up for in enthusiasm what it lacked in any sort of academic use.

Hermione came over to stand beside him. He folded his arms and watched Colin Creevey enthusiastically hurtle a Disarming Charm clear over his partner’s head.

“Well,” she said, as the crowd began to mimic Harry, with results varying, “it’s… at least they’re practicing.”

“‘Practicing’ is astonishingly generous.”

“They’re trying!”

“Also generous.”

Harry hovered, but his suggestions trended vague and therefore unhelpful: “Decent grip, maybe hold it a little bit sideways,” or “think you’re aiming high, maybe work on that, I reckon.” They were kind but overly gentle, unwilling to admit of failure, and not much helpful to anybody, since it did not prevent them from failing the next time.

Ron was not much more useful, though he was better technically as an instructor; he could usually get a student to do what he wanted them to, and knew how to make them understand it, using words they could grasp; the sole problem being that he himself rarely knew what they should be doing, and so this skill was not fruitfully employed.

Hermione, after an observational period of increasing distress, bounded in to try and help, but her instructions were not much better: exactingly specific and long-winded, she gave Lavender almost two full minutes on everything she was doing wrong, which left her more angered than competent, and in any case forced Ron to intercede and take Lavender aside to fix her grip.

Draco leaned against one of the columns and supervised, tapping his wand against his thigh. As far as he was concerned, he had done his part in bringing them to the venue. He hadn't the patience for pedagogy; he grew irritable when someone took too long answering a question in class. All the same, he didn't find it particularly hard to identify when someone was doing something wrong; examining a guard for weaknesses was a hobby and a pastime, and exploiting them, a skill.

Dean, for instance, didn't keep his feet still when he was casting. He stepped into the swing, likely a holdover from some kind of muggle sport in his past; it would take drilling to fix. Katie whipped her wand sideways instead of extending the point, which sent her spells arcing like quidditch passes. Fred and George were technically competent, but lacked discipline, and it showed in their sloppy wand movements. Seamus, meanwhile, could not produce a Disarming Charm to save his life; every spell he cast resulted in some kind of explosion. This was not as concerning as Hermione, who was trying to coach him, seemed to think; in Draco's opinion, it was a gift with any number of uses.

The broader problem was this: they were children who had been locked in a castle under rigid discipline and threat of corporal punishment, without access to usual entertainment or indeed free communication with the outside world, for almost a month. And there were only so many ways you could possibly expect a human being to act.

Decorum died slowly. Fred and George's drill turned into an all-out skirmish, and spilled over into Katie's bout with Lee, who gave a gleeful cry and tackled Fred at the first provocation. Hermione ducked a stray cartwheeling charm from Dean and snapped at him, only to almost get bowled over by George.

Ron caught Hermione's elbow to stop her from tipping over and shouted, "OI! SIMMER DOWN!" but it was no use. He turned to her, and said something that was inaudible through the burst of voices, but she nodded. His hand lingered on her arm long after she was standing on her own two feet. She had to look up a great deal to talk to him, and did, though he bent to listen to whatever it was she said. Abruptly, she broke into a tired laugh, gesturing at the Room behind her. Ron winked.

They could have been in a room by themselves, for all that the din bothered them.

Draco rolled off the pillar and slipped into the shadows of the room, tasting bitterness.

It constricted his throat. It nauseated him, more to the point, the very idea of it. Sat at the center of his head like a gravity well, drawing everything else into the dizzying orbit. Her smiling and touching Ron's arm. Her hair splayed on his shoulder. Going up on tiptoe to—he wasn't that masochistic.

He leaned against the back of the pillar and considered his wand, the long black point, the thousand wicked things it could do.

"Draco?"

It was Neville. He held his wand awkwardly in one fist, no grip that Hogwarts ever taught, and Draco cataloged three areas for improvement before he caught himself being helpful.

"What is it," he said thinly.

"I was wondering if you had any a-a-advice, on the charm," said Neville. "I just tried it with Daphne, and you're good at Charms, s-s-so."

It was worth pointing out that he had never volunteered to instruct anyone, but Neville was a considerable danger when left unattended at a cauldron, and this seemed similarly dire. At any rate, he at least knew Neville to be teachable, which was apparently more than one could say for Dennis Creevey, who had trouble telling his lefts from rights.

Draco sighed and crooked his fingers.

“...Is that a y-y-yes?”

“Let’s see it.”

Neville blanched. “What? On y-y-you?”

“No, I want you to try disarming the bloody wall.”

“W-w-what if I…?”

“Hurt me? I would truly and sincerely be impressed.”

Neville swallowed, found his courage, and stabbed it to its sticking place.

“Exp-elliarmus!”

It wasn’t actually terrible. Draco didn’t bother to deflect, out of interest as to whether it would succeed if it landed. It didn’t; it veered wide and shattered on the column.

“Try it again.”

Neville obeyed, jabbing his wand out like it was autonomous and malignant. His spell splashed, inert, into the flagstones.

“You’ve one problem.”

“Just one?” said Neville, much cheered.

“It’s significant.”

“Oh. W-w-what… is it the st-t-tutter? Gran says—”

“No. Your incantations are decent. Not great, mind you, but serviceable. Your problem is that you wince, and it makes you close your eyes.”

Neville blinked. “I do?”

“Unerringly. I’ll hand it to you: if your good habits were as reliable as your bad ones, you’d be a wizard to rival Merlin.”

“Okay, and — well, thanks, b-b-but — why? And what do I d-d-do about it?”

“No idea. Try to open them? Pretend you’re me or something. I don’t know.” He clapped Neville on the shoulder. “Good luck.”

“Thanks,” said Neville, with unnerving sincerity.

Worrisome failure. He hadn’t meant to be helpful; he’d meant to crack a joke. People might come to suspect that he was some sort of associate teaching fellow in this ramshackle college of St. Potter’s.

He regrouped with Harry at the foot of the dais, where the leader was evaluating his pupils with a bit of despondency. The meeting had become mostly social; conversation had broken out in place of sparring, and few people were still bothering to practice spells. Ron hoisted Colin Creevey out of his way by the nape of his neck and stepped up on the dais, expression grim.

“If this is what we’re meant to fight You-Know-Who with,” he said, “we’re buggered.”

“Chin up,” said Harry vainly. “They’re doing… some things.”

A few spells flashed past, but they were accompanied by giggles and the teasing of students play-fighting.

“This is piss,” announced Ginny. Her hair was mussed and ashy from some sort of encounter with Seamus. “You lot need to pull it together.”

“We’re doing our best,” snapped Hermione.

“I know. It’s not bad, but it could be a lot better.” Ginny surveyed the room with a deeply critical eye. “I reckon they don’t respect you.”

“Oi!”

“Excuse you!”

“Speak for yourself, Ginevra,” said Draco mildly, not disagreeing.

“C’mon! You know how on the first day of Transfiguration, McGonagall always shows off the cat thing? And it gets a shout out of the first years, and it’s adorable? I mean, there’s a point to that, innit? She’s saying: ‘Hey, I’m good at this. I know more than you.’ This lot’s all used to watching you faff about with a pocket snitch in the common room. Reckon you got to do the same.” She used her wand to scratch her head. “For the young ones, at least. Dunno what to do about Fred and George.”

“I think McGonagall’s still working on that one,” said Hermione flatly, watching Fred make fish-faces inside his Bubble-Head Charm.

“A good point, well-made,” said Draco. “Alright, Potter. Go on and turn into a cat.”

Harry flipped him the bird while Ron sniggered. “Why don’t you do something, tosser?”

“Have you ever heard the phrase ‘not my phooka, not my forest’?”

“No, because I’m normal,” said Harry. “Anyway, idiot, here’s your chance to show off. You’re always bragging about how Mummy taught you to duel.”

“Hey, there’s an idea,” said Ginny suddenly. “Harry, duel Draco.”

The expression on Harry’s face made Draco snicker.

“Seriously? I get why it’s him, on account of the dueling experience and everything, but why me? Why not Hermione? She’s best in Charms—”

“Because it’s not her they have trouble listening to,” said Draco dryly. “Granger and I happen to have a certain reservoir of authority here. If you hadn’t noticed, when she says jump, the first years are already four feet in the air.”

“Because she’s a prefect,” Harry muttered.

“Because she runs the Tower like a brigadier-general. Where have you been?”

“Come off it,” said Ron lightly, and when Draco flashed him a look, he added: “I mean, yes, but it’s easy for you to say when you’ve got the other badge, innit?”

“What’s that supposed to mean?”

“Nothing, just… c’mon. It’s always been a bit harder for the rest of us to get people to listen when we talk.”

“I don’t see how that has anything to do with who’s prefect.” He was increasingly irritated. “Did you want to be a prefect?”

“No,” said Ron pointedly, “but it wasn’t like I ever had a shot at it, so I didn’t waste time hoping—”

“You had the same shot as everyone else.”

“Not under Umbridge, I didn’t!”

“McGonagall chooses the prefects,” said Hermione. “She wrote both letters. I’ve seen them.”

Ron paused. “Right,” he said, and the lightness was even more forced. “Sorry. I didn’t know that. Since I didn’t… yeah. I didn’t know.”

“It’s fine.”

“I mean, you would’ve gotten it fair and square, anyway. Any other year. With your marks, and your — everything. So. No offense.”

“Offense retroactively un-taken,” said Draco coolly.

There was another pause. Ginny was politely examining the middle distance. Harry looked like he longed to join her in it, but couldn’t tear his eyes away from the train collapse happening before them.

Ron frowned. “How’d you see his— oh.” His expression cleared, and it was even worse than a scowl, his little slouch. “I forgot. You got them when you were staying at the castle.”

“Manor,” said Draco, which would have been alright to start with; but Hermione said at the same time, “It’s a manor, actually,” and their unison plunged the whole conversation into a humiliated well of silence from which four unspeaking faces consulted each other helplessly for rescue.

Harry was looking at Ron, who was looking at Hermione, who was looking at no one, and rather avidly, too. Ginny and the middle distance had become so intimate that they might announce the wedding any minute.

Draco tapped his fingers on his wandgrip.

“Fine,” he said briskly. He shrugged out of his robe and tossed it over a bench. His wand glided out of its sheath with a quiet snick and he spun it around two fingers, marching down from the dais. “Get everyone out of the way. Potter, we start at ten paces.”

Ginny raised her fists. “Thank Merlin. EVERYONE CLEAR OFF! DEMONSTRATION!”

Clamor filled the hall. The crowd drew back and settled itself on the stairs of the dais, whispering iniquitously, grouped in a huddle of eager and mildly bloodthirsty faces. Everyone liked a good scrap. They were mostly Gryffindors, after all.

A red carpet unfurled from one of the flagstones, the Room's eager contribution to their task. It spanned the length and width of a proper duelist's piste, its color rich as aging roses against the dull stone, and its outline glowed with faint Boundary Charms. Harry stood in front of the dais, all of the Defense Club sitting in rapt eagerness at his back. Draco crossed the piste and stood to face him, with naught but the door behind him.

His was actually the better position — no chance of catching a shot from the back if a spectator got antsy; Goyle taught him that — but the optics were not unaffecting. The difference between staring down one face and forty.

There was an awkward silence as it became clear that while everyone was jolly excited about a duel, nobody knew how to start one.

Draco repressed the urge to sigh.

"Ginevra," he called, "since you've instigated, you might as well do us a favor and call."

"Wot?" Ginny scrambled up from her seat. "Can do. How's that?"

He lifted the hand that held his wand and massaged his temple with his knuckles. "Traditionally, it's the challenger's second who calls. There are two parameters, means and limitations, which take the standard form—"

"How long is a challenger's second?"

"Hilarious. For those of you with brain cells, that's the wizard who steps in if the challenger is made incompetent. Ginevra, in this case, for me, I suppose. Almost certainly Ronald, for Potter, though ‘made incompetent’ is a rather foregone conclusion in his case.”

“Oi! Put your money where your mouth is!”

“Trying to, Potter, keep up. Ginevra, repeat: ‘To the wizard’s disarm, clavicle to coccyx. Wands only. Call.’”

“To the wizard’s disarm,” she announced, planting her hands on her hips. “Clavicle to… sorry, what?”

“Coccyx,” he sighed, fighting the urge to rub his eyes. “It’s a small bone at the base of — never mind. For our purposes, it means nothing under the belt.”

“Just say that then, posho. Anyway! Clavicle to coccyx. Wands only. Call.”

“Thank you. Now, Potter, we say our names. You first.”

Harry blinked at him as if this was an order of baffling complexity. “Harry.”

“Not — I — never mind. Draco Malfoy.”

He slid one foot back into a duelist’s stance. Harry mimicked it. Behind him, Ginny plopped down with Hermione and Ron. Hermione had her book on her lap, a pretense of disinterest, but she was watching them anyway.

He caught her gaze. She rolled her eyes at him, as in: I wash my hands of this tedious and jejune peacocking, please get it over with so we may return to discussing subjects that might interest me, Hermione Granger, a very intelligent and pretty sixteen-year-old girl.

In retrospect, he could pinpoint that as the moment he decided to win.

Draco crossed the piste in three strides and opened with a sideways lash across the throat, sending Flipendo glittering through the air like the lateral slice of a knife. Harry blocked it with a shield, startled, and then dispelled, stepped back, and ventured a skittering Expelliarmus into the afterglow. It whistled its way past Draco's ear as he twisted his shoulder to dodge it, and kept walking.

Duels were slower than they sounded. In reality, it wasn't a steady, breathless back-and-forth, but several short bursts of magic, followed by prowling and waiting for the other person to do something. Harry jabbed out his wand, guarding against a potential volley, and Draco pressed his weight onto his back foot, searching for an opening.

It was less interesting to watch than it was to do, and Ginny must have agreed, because she cupped her hands around her mouth and shouted: "Somebody do something!"

"At your service, Ginevra," said Draco tautly, and amongst the titters of the crowd, he sprang into the next movement.

Harry staggered back from the crackling Trip Jinx, spat back a few indecisive flickers of Disarmers, then tossed out a whirling Jelly-Legs that nearly caught him with sidespin. Draco caught it with a flick of his wrist and sent it soaring at the ceiling, where it burst into a firework against the chandelier. There was laughter and applause from the crowd, like it was a carnival. As sparks fell, he snapped his wand into his riposte, a Blasting Curse that hit Harry's shield so hard it nearly split open.

The duel grew from a short volley of spells into a more tangled, complex thing, as they gained a feel for each other's rhythms. He noticed that Harry erred on the side of defensive magic, leaning on his back foot, slipping easily into Shields and Refractor Curses, even at the cost of an opening. He risked as little as possible. He fought like someone with a healthy wariness of being hurt, which was more common for muggle-borns — or people without ready access to magical healing, at any rate — but also meant that he spent less time on the offensive, and Draco, who liked to live on the offensive, had a lovely time beating him there. He snapped three curses around his neck and finished with a fourth that spun sideways near his abdomen, volleyed two Trip Jinxes at his feet, countered a Disarming Jinx to the face and activated a Shield Charm that bounced it back. Then he dispelled with a flick of his wrist and spun his wand in a crescent that loosed a searing chain of a Blinding Curse, which whirled after Harry in a helix. It exploded against Harry's Banishment Charm, but his Petrificus Totalus went shrieking through the shower of sparks, and Harry dodged it with a fumbling sidestep off the mat, at which the Room gave a soft warning chime.

Draco lowered his wand, smirking at him.

"Technically, that's the point conceded," he said, pointing at Harry's offending foot, "but if you'd like to continue, I'm willing to indulge you."

"Oh, piss off," said Harry pointedly, and threw a Stunner at him.

He did an elegant double-backstep and dropped down, bent at the knee, marveling as it glimmered over his head. Stupefy was more bite than he'd thought Harry was willing to risk, in a practice duel.

"As if," said Harry, raising his voice over the crowd's excited babbling and applause, "it bloody matters — where I put my foot, honestly—"

"One, it's unsporting to complain about the rules after you've lost the point, as Oliver Wood ought to have taught you. Two, I don't see you objecting to there being rules in quidditch."

"Quidditch is a game. In a real fight, I'm not going to faff about with footwork."

"In a real fight, I would've put you down on your arse while you were complaining," said Draco, and there was a cool susurrus of amusement from the dais. Fred whistled at him. Ginny cackled.

“Yeah, right,” said Harry. “That’s the reason I’m still standing here, isn’t it, because you’re so good at it?”

Draco scoffed and slid his foot into position.

The next sixty seconds passed like hours. To his credit, Harry had been in enough fights to know where his weaknesses were, not to overextend or take steps longer than he could quickly recover from — knew, in essence, how to make as few mistakes as possible. He was faster than Draco, smaller, and more agile, which allowed him to get closer without the same concern of being caught. He never broke Draco’s guard, but he could put pressure on it, and that wasn’t nothing.

Harry was decently good at dueling, and he was good without Draco’s advantage of practice, which was impressive.

Unfortunately, Draco did have the advantage of practice. He knew how to stay on the balls of his feet and move lightly, with an awareness of where his weight and momentum; how to dance in and out of a jinx, how to engage and disengage from a movement, how to shift from defense to offense and when the time came to do both. He could see, like invisible prints in the air, the trajectories that different spells would take, and which line to choose based on where the opponent’s wand was moving — things that were not so much instinct, as some duelists described them, but rules, practiced so long and for so often that their execution felt like an original idea. He let his thoughts drift to more cerebral questions of strategy while his body did what it wanted, and found, pleasantly, that what his body wanted was to do it right. It was a waltz performed at ten paces. Dancing, with occasional violence.

He sliced a cut up the side of Harry’s guard, forcing him sideways, and in the space that cleared he could suddenly see Hermione again. She was staring, book abandoned, focused intently on the flurry of spells. Ron sat beside her, his hand resting somewhere behind her on the dais — and his arm wasn’t quite around her, but it was in her personal space, and he was saying something to her while watching Harry. She nodded, frowning, and then turned to whisper into his ear.

Harry swayed back into place, blocking them off, and Draco, hardly thinking, watched his hand move of its own accord.

“Relashio.”

Harry saw it coming from a mile, and promptly sidestepped. It whistled past him and into the crowd.

Ron toppled backward with a shout and spilled into the laps of the people behind him; namely, Lavender and Parvati. Hermione threw herself to one side and shot a furious look at Draco, who smiled guilelessly, twirling his wand through his fingers.

“Draco!”

“Hm?”

“Honestly!”

“My apologies,” he said. “That was careless of me.”

“That’s it,” shouted Ron, fumbling upright. “Enough — playing nice — Harry, budge over—”

“What are you doing?” Harry called, warily.

Ron came striding up to the piste. “I’m your second, yeah? Great. My turn. Impedimenta!”

Draco caught the spell on his wand-tip, smirking at him. Hermione was tugging her jumper straight, slightly disheveled, and looking properly indignant.

“This is a demonstration duel, remember?” she said, with faint concern. “It’s one against one. There’s no point to this if you’re going to break the rules.”

“Ah, he can take it,” Ron said chipperly. “Look at him. Proper mama’s boy, all coached up.”

“No need to be jealous, I’m sure you’ll do fine,” called Draco, flipping his wand in the air. Ron flashed an irritated look at him.

“It doesn’t matter,” she said sharply, closing her book. “It’s not fair. You two don’t get to beat up on him just because you want Harry to win—”

“Oi! We’re not gonna ‘beat up’ anybody—”

“They’re not going to beat up on me, thank you.”

“—and as a practical exercise, it’s not helpful for anyone to watch you three bicker like little boys!”

The matter had very little to do with Ron wanting Harry to win, and one almost suspected she knew it, considering the high flush in her face, and the quick, anxious way her eyes darted between them.

“We’re not bickering,” tried Ron. “We’re demonstrating a — a dynamic conflict encounter.”

“Just so. Dynamic. Right you are.”

She half-rose from her seat, a storm gathering in her face. “This is ridiculous. Ron, get down from there — or better yet, Harry, you step out—”

“The thing is,” said Harry, apologetically, “Hermione, the thing is — I just really want to see him get knocked on his arse.”

“Harry Potter!”

But Ginny cheered, and Hermione threw up her hands, as if to wash the whole affair from them. She started muttering mutinously to Daphne — who had very little sympathy to give her, being transfixed in delight.

Draco smirked, slightly.

The fight took two minutes. It was the longest hour of his life.

Harry and Ron were good fighters, separately. Together they were nearly a great one. No showy pieces of magic, nothing spectacular, but it was their synchrony that made them difficult. Harry and Ron knew each other's movements down to the very twitch of a tendon; each had a preternatural sense of where the other boy was and would be, and what part of his guard would need watching when he was. It was a triumph to score a hit on them — when Ron yelped after a Stinging Jinx to the arm, or Harry froze in a short-lived Petrificus that Ron snapped out with Finite a moment later. The pair of them moved like they were boats on a tide, the step and the counterstep, spells leaping from their wands like luminous eels.

He thought briefly of Mad-Eye Moody and Barty Crouch, dueling Sibelius Nott in the headmaster's office. It gave him an idea.

He Summoned a bench from the side of the room — it came flying, skittering loudly against the stone, and students gasped — and threw it at them.

It screeched down the piste and nearly bowled them over. Harry knocked it away with a Banishment Charm, stopping it before it could flatten anyone on the dais, but Ron just vaulted it and lunged. Draco ducked and darted under his arm, backhanding him a curse that Ron dodged. Remembered the way he'd leaned down to speak in Hermione's ear, at the Hog's Head, his arm getting personally acquainted with Hermione's space, his mouth almost intimate with her ear, and there was something sharp and hot in his stomach — and the next curse was a nasty corkscrew of yellow, exploding against the stones.

Ron grunted in surprise and threw an elbow that caught Draco in the side. He tripped and caught himself, his jaw clamping, accidentally snapping his incisors together around his tongue.

Pain welled, and a moment later, so did blood. He wiped his mouth delicately on his sleeve, leaving a rose-bright smear of blood. He checked it and grimaced. Someone whimpered.

“That’s enough,” said Hermione sharply, making to stand, but Ginny hauled her down. “Back off! Now! That’s enough! He’s bleeding—”

“I’m fine,” he snapped, wrenching up his sleeve. A fine sheen of sweat lay on his neck; his collar felt tight. Uniforms were not proper duelist’s wear. Absently, he wrenched out his tie knot and ripped it off, tossing the scrap of red silk aside. Cool air grazed his throat when he opened his collar. He probably looked ridiculous, but he was too preoccupied being in a snit to care.

There were a few giggles, most of them in a decidedly high register. Katie gave a piercing whistle. Since he knew for a fact that Katie saw most of them shirtless at quidditch practices, this meant it was a calculated move to embarrass him. He sent her a glower and turned back around.

“Well?” he said irritably. “Are you going to make me wait?”

Ron’s forehand jinx nearly caught him on the shoulder, and drove him all but headfirst into Expelliarmus. He went down to a knee and lashed a Trip Jinx for his heels, rolled back upright and whipped a curse over his shoulder. A shout from Ron told him he’d bought himself a second and he used it to lunge, snapping two jinxes to keep Harry preoccupied while he whirled back to catch Ron’s next on a Shield, and gradually he caught sight of it — or feel of it, rather, the rhythm of the duel, which had grown faster but was still the same. There was such a thing as a dance for three, after all.

And there was blood on his teeth and sweat on his neck and hair in his eyes, but for a moment he had them both at bay, nipping at him fruitlessly, unable to touch him, unable to get close enough to land a hit, sprinting here and there just to try and get a taste of him, and it felt good. It felt good, to be good at it. It was good to be powerful.

Applause met the occasional explosion of colliding magic, gasps for the neat dodge, a scream whenever someone did something daring — and Harry was more daring with Ron there, more confident, more eager to lunge and open his sides and try trickier spells. He feinted and caught Draco with an underhand he wasn't expecting, and Ron went running in for the finish on his back, and he could block one but his wand couldn't point in two directions at once, so he cut sideways and swung wide in a lash of a Stunner that hit neither, but gave him time to arrange his limbs for what was coming — the Disarming Charm that clipped his wrist, tossing his wand high and free, and then the Trip Jinx that snared his left ankle, sending him down on his side, hard, to the floor.

"DISARMED!" Ginny hollered. "Done! Called! Geroff him, gits!"

Ron leaned over with a rueful grin and extended his hand. Draco grabbed it and hauled himself to his feet, grimacing.

He rolled to his feet. Blood welled at his lip and he scrubbed it off again, irritated by the mess more than anything, because the adrenaline washed out the pain. He made to leave the piste, but his way was blocked: people were swarming down from the dais, wildly applauding Harry.

Seamus snatched up Draco's hand and hoisted it over his head.

"TWO AT ONCE!" he howled. "THE MADMAN!"

And he realized they were cheering, not just for Harry — who had, in fact, won — but for all of them. He blinked and shook off Seamus, unsettled, as the roar rose to dwarf everything, even the residual shudder of his heartbeat in his ears. It was nice, though, the cheering. The starry-eyed stares, which seemed to greet him from every corner of the room, as if he'd done something remarkable, instead of merely keeled over and lost a duel. No one seemed dismayed by the fact that he'd failed. It was, if anything, a warmer welcome than he could have expected if he'd won.

He nodded, jerky and awkward, and stepped away. Some of them followed him, babbling about this-or-that maneuver, which was flattering but frankly disinteresting; he wanted his tie back.

It had fallen near the dais, with his bag, near Hermione. She was still seated. She'd failed to rise, applaud, or indeed acknowledge that the bout was over. Not particularly surprising, since she obviously didn't approve. He bent to pick up his bag and caught her looking at him.

Heat seared him. A pink luster shone on her face, like she'd come from a steam bath, and her eyes were distant, lidded, vaguely fogged. Her mouth was parted and it made it look intensely, painfully lovely, and she didn't stir even when he looked at her. Instead she continued to regard him with a sort of shameless and glassy appraisal, the way one considered a painting or a sculpture, which made his whole body feel warm and vaguely objectified.

There was a pulse of want. He forgot where he was and what he was doing, and he almost stumbled. There was a tightness all over his body, like his skin was too small.

And what else was he possibly supposed to feel, when she was looking like that. She looked like she wanted to— she looked like he didn't even know the names for everything she wanted to do.

He stepped forward and picked up his bag. Slung it over his shoulder, straightened up, and looked down at her with his hands in his pockets. At the risk of stating the obvious, it was not a friendly type of expression.

Wasn't that an idea.

A thin and sparkling avenue of possibility opened up in the back of his head.

He jerked his head at the door. "Meeting's over," he said.

“I know,” she said at once, irritated. She shouldered her bag and shoved past him. “Right. Good job.”

“Ta,” he said mildly, and he wasn’t even put out at her tone; there was a sort of giddy pinwheel happening somewhere in his chest, and he wasn’t inclined to let much of anything spoil it. She pushed through the crowd, ignoring several procedural questions from members who wanted her advice, which was so unlike her that it made him laugh.

That was — that was wonderful. That was excellent. That was a development of incredible, unsurpassed quality, and it was to be celebrated. It would be celebrated. Someone should get fireworks. He deserved them. He was going to shake Harry’s hand. He was going to shake Ron’s hand, too, they were opponents, it was procedure. He could shake everyone’s hand in the room, at that, why not, they’d worked hard, he was proud of them. He was a munificent being of unearthly beauty and talent, and he was in a wonderful fucking mood.

He didn’t notice how the meeting ended, only at once, it had. Daphne was chattering about some flaw she’d hammered out in her Disarming Charm, and Colin bobbing around hollering about how sodding cool it had all been. Neville and Luna were having a pleasant conversation about a species of plant that assuredly did not exist, and the twins had gone off to hide dungbombs in a broom closet for Filch. Hermione’s spine was as straight as an iron bar — which Harry and Ron took for disapproval, and Ron twice apologized to her, though she pretended not to hear him.

The sunlight was fading from the windows, the sky a dusty blue, a cool draft starting to whisper through the atrium. Footsteps clicked distantly on the stone, and the portraits murmured and waved hello as evening settled in. The Ravenclaws drifted off to their own common room, Cho with a firm parting kiss to Harry’s flame-bright cheek; the Hufflepuffs, led by a cheerful Cedric, pattered off down the stairs.

As he was waving off the last of them, Harry gasped and dropped to his knees. The remaining Gryffindors lurched to catch him.

“Potter?”

“Harry!”

“Get him up, help him, go on—”

Leaning on a combination of Ginny, Ron, and Daphne, they wrestled him back to his feet, though he still leaned heavily on Ron’s shoulder. His hand was glued to his forehead, his face folded in pain.

“What is it? Talk to us, mate.”

“Scar,” he gritted out. “It’s bad.”

“Does this happen often?” said Ginny helplessly. “Like, d’you have a potion that helps, or…?”

“No,” said Harry weakly, “usually goes away on — on its own — oh, shit.”

He buckled again, breathing fast through his teeth, and then shook his head violently.

“It feels — wrong,” he gasped. “It feels… like… angry. There’s this… image? I can see a— a house— I know how it sounds, but— it’s real. It feels real. It’s a house, it’s got three towers, and it’s — it’s ruined, though, it’s falling apart— someone’s emptied it out— it hurts—”

“Should we go to the Hospital Wing?” murmured Daphne, ducking down to check his temperature. “You’re very warm.”

“It’ll wear off.”

“I’m more concerned about what happens before it does, my dear.”

“I don’t want the Hospital Wing.”

The group shifted back, clearing a small ring of space. Then Harry yelped and keeled over again, and Ron corrected: “Yep, nope, Hospital Wing, here we go,” and with one of Harry’s arms slung over his shoulder, he began to drag him out of the Room of Requirement. Harry made sounds of protest, but being incapable of higher motor function, the decision was made for him by the man he was using as a makeshift spine. Daphne hurried up to balance him out on the other arm.

“Someone get his things,” she called, “he dropped his wand—”

“We’ll get them!” said Hermione briskly. “Take him ahead! We’ll meet you there.”

She fell back behind the group, which were shepherding Harry up to the Hospital Wing in a potential too-many-cooks situation. Harry, for his part, seemed indignant but also in need of helping, and was grumbling with the irritated note of a man who believed his health to be much less dire than it was. Draco decided to let those with better bedside manners deal with a patient in such a state, let the door slide shut behind them.

Hermione slowly bent to lift Harry’s bag, and tucked his wand safely inside it. She went about packing his things with an absent, thoughtless care, smoothing out the pages of his books, wrapping his parchment scrolls tightly, and folding his seeker’s gloves into thirds before sliding them into their own compartment. It was with a fond, filial smile that she lifted his pocket snitch, and cocked it to the light, before tucking it into the bottom of the satchel and fastening its snap.

Draco leaned against the door, watching her.

“Sickle for your thoughts.”

Hermione blinked, and shook herself.

“A house with three towers… That’s very specific.”

“It could be a fever dream.”

“Or Dumbledore could be right. And that could have been — a vision of something else.”

“You think the Dark Lord was inspecting real estate?”

She exhaled in mild amusement, and glanced at him, her eyes soft and almost yellow in the sheer evening light. It drew something in his chest tight together, like lacing the strings of a corset, a pleasant pressure.

“Alright there?” he said evenly, and she twitched. Dropped her hand from her mouth.

“Fine. I’m fine. Frankly, I should be the one asking you. After that production.”

“Worried, Granger?”

“Terrified. If you’d won, I’d never hear the end of it.”

She shouldered Harry’s bag and approached the door, where he leaned casually.

“That fight was far more involved than it needed to be.”

“I thought you wanted me to be impressive.”

“That wasn’t license to be reckless.”

“Were you impressed?”

“By recklessness? No. It takes rather more than that to impress me, thanks.”

A bald lie. “Such as?”

“Such as good judgment!”

“Good judgment stirs the blood, does it?”

“Yes. And prudence,” she said, voice stilted. “Wisdom. Common sense.”

“That’s what you like?”

“Maybe it is,” she said, finally. She folded her arms and lifted her chin, cocking her head up with an undeniable edge of haughtiness. She was astonishingly, vexingly pretty. “So what? They’re excellent qualities in a person.”

“Inarguably. But one feels rather sorry for him.”

“Who?”

“The fellow you’d like.”

“I don’t… follow.”

He reached out and straightened her prefect’s badge. She let out a sharp breath.

“Well, he wouldn’t get to do that,” he said, “for example.”

When she replied, it was stilted and much-belated.

“Harry is in the Hospital Wing,” she said. “This isn't any kind of time — to be doing this.”

“What's 'this'?”

She shouldered past him, clutching Harry's bag.

“Granger,” he repeated, raising his voice, “what's 'this'?”

But Hermione had already left. He watched the door swing behind her, and the corner of his mouth twisted into a small, slow smirk.

-A very merry Taylor Swiftmas to all who celebrate.

-This chapter went through a lot of alternate titles before settling. Candidates included “St. Potter's College for Juvenile Delinquency,” “SOC101: Introduction to Peacocking,” and “Mating Rituals of the Common Pureblood”, although alas, I did decide ultimately that I should Try To Be Serious. (As Draco might say: not my forte.)

-Draco's understanding of his parents' courtship is what you get when your parents were an era-defining power couple that you, as a practicing Victorian, have carefully declined to think about as people with romantic feelings, or indeed passions of any kind not pertaining to French wines and rare broomsticks.

-Branching off a conversation in this chapter, it's a point of interest to me why (canon) Harry assumed he'd make prefect in fifth year. Specifically, he says he "didn't think about it" beforehand, but if he had, then he would have assumed it would be him (which — dude, literally no one has broken more rules than you, but okay.) His reasons for it are pretty contrived, too; he references fighting the basilisk by himself, without Ron, for instance, which is obviously impressive, but also has zero to do with being a prefect.

-And TBC, it's a totally natural thing for a 15 y/o boy to see his friend get a Shiny and think "why not me tho :/", so this isn't trying to be like a CinemaSins ding! moment, I just find it interesting. Harry's competitive streak always surprises me for some reason. Still James's son, as it were.

-So many incredible, jaw-dropping comments on the last chapter: I want to present each of you with a draught of Felix Felicis and a very, very good cup of coffee for breakfast. Or tea, or champagne, or whatever you like your mornings to start with. Maybe all three!

-Next chapter goes up on Friday! Title: "Occlumency." Or, alternately: Draco Malfoy and the Year of A Million God Damn Extracurricular Activities.

Occlumency

Chapter 65: Occlumency

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

The strangest thing about starting a secret association was how little it seemed to matter. It made no difference to most of the student body, who still steered clear of Harry and by extension anyone seen with them; it certainly made no difference to Umbridge, whose presence infected the hallways with a tinge of anxious gloom even when it was only a possibility; but sometimes, someone passed in the hallway, and they would offer a tiny grin — and there would be a sting of relief and pleasure, knowing what secret that grin carried. A secret was something Umbridge could not touch.

The memory of a sun-filled Room of Requirement became somewhere to send his mind when the coldness of the world threatened to disappoint him.

Their lives fell into a slow promenade, as daylight grew scarce, and drafts chilled the hallways. Winter rains mowed seas of mud into the castle lawns, which had grown shaggy and wild in Hagrid's absence.

Defense Club met twice more that October, and once in early November, each meeting longer and more successful than the last. Harry had found his stride as a teacher: it laid in doing as little actual instruction as possible, and instead offering exhortations of encouragement while dispatching others to issue critique. When someone needed a full deconstruction or a primer in spell theory, as Daphne and Neville often did, he would tap Hermione; for problems of confidence or aggression, he ushered them towards Ron; and to Draco's disgruntlement, he found questions about technique and execution directed towards him, which obligated him to spend the better part of an afternoon trying to understand why Seamus's Reparo blew up everything it touched.

“Neville said you were a good tutor,” said Seamus, blithely unapologetic.

“And if he’s lucky, I might someday forgive him for it,” said Draco, rolling up his sleeve to hide the singe marks.

Hermione oscillated between misery and fervent, overworked relish. Preparing lessons for several other years’ Defense curriculums compressed her preexisting homework routine so closely it should achieve fusion. Often she would stay in the library well after curfew, forcing Draco, as the other prefect with a curfew-exemption, to go fetch her.

“Draco,” she said, before he rounded the corner to her table.

He paused, and then stepped into view. She was alone in the lamplight, surrounded by rows of leatherbound Transfiguration textbooks. Her head remained bent over her notes, which she was color-coding with muggle highlighters.

The way she said his name was particular. It wasn’t a quick, clipped lilt from consonant to consonant, like Harry, or Ron’s drawl, which always carried a faint hint of aspersion in it, like he couldn’t quite believe it was a real name; she said his name with elegance and clarity, with the exacting pronunciation she used for incantations, like a mellifluous charm.

The last exhalation drew her lips into a soft moue, which lingered sometimes, as if she was holding it on her tongue.

“Did you cast a Detection Charm?” He lifted one of her scrolls to the light. Her handwriting degenerated in the places where she had become passionate about the material; she started to press down harder, and the quill blotted. His lip quirked.

She shook her head. “I recognized your footsteps,” she said, boxing a line in yellow.

“Do I have unusual footsteps?”

“No, but your legs are longer than Harry’s and shorter than Ron’s, and you walk quickly, like Harry, but he walks softly and you don’t. Ron shifts his weight more from side to side, which makes his steps heavier than yours. Also, it’s after curfew, and you’re the only one allowed to be here.” She glanced up at him, as if verifying her deduction, and returned to work.

He smiled. “Look who’s clever.”

“I spend most waking moments with you lot,” she said, mildly embarrassed. “We all know far too much about each other.”

“I wouldn’t say so.”

She capped her highlighter and reached for a quill. “Really? Of all people, I thought you’d be most jealous of your privacy.”

“I don’t have any to be jealous of. We live on top of each other. I haven’t had time alone with anyone in weeks.”

“We’re alone now,” she pointed out. A beat of silence followed.

She looked up in alarm, as if realizing for the first time that he was actually there, and she was having a real conversation with him. Possibly she had mistaken him for a stress-induced hallucination.

He braced his arms on the back of a chair, examining the spread on the table.

“I’ve been dispatched to pry you out of the library.”

“You’ll never take me alive,” she said, with a quirk of her lip.

“So this is to be a waiting game?”

“Exactly. We’re both waiting until you give up.”

“Or,” he suggested, “I could petrify you and carry you back to Gryffindor.”

“Go ahead,” she said, offensively unintimidated. “Yesterday I found a jinx that kills all the hair follicles on someone’s body. Do you think Parvati would still fancy you if you were bald?”

She placed her chin in her hands, smiling.

Horrible lovely girl. It would be more dignified if threatening him made her less attractive.

“Love alters not when it alteration finds.”

She snorted emphatically. An upraised finger leveled an objection. “One, it’s ‘love is not love which alters, et cetera,” she said, “and two, you are so ludicrously pretentious—”

“Says the girl who corrected me.”

“—as if, three, Shakespeare’s ‘ever-fixéd mark’ that ‘bears out to the edge of doom’ substitutes for ‘thinks the male chaser’s quite fit, actually,’ two things identical in import and fervor—”

“Well, she’s not wrong.”

“—and four — oh, get over yourself, would you please—”

“Not my forte.”

“—and, four: where did you read Sonnet 116?”

“We’ve a copy at home. Shakespeare was a wizard.” He drew his wand and twirled it through his fingers, idly wheeling its point through the air.

“He was not.”

“Edward de Vere was a wizard,” he amended.

She straightened. “Don’t even think about it.”

“There’s plenty of evidence.”

“You cannot be an Oxfordian. I’ll skin you.”

“Don’t be such an ideologue, Granger. The magic in Midsummer Night’s is entirely consistent with wizardry, down to the correct application of distilled wild pansy to brew what is, clearly, amortentia —”

“You’re mad. That’s completely coincidental, runs against a mountain of counterevidence, and they don’t even drink it, they dribble it in her eyes—”

“Artistic license.”

“That doesn’t make any sense!”

She leaned forward on the table, slack-jawed with disbelief and indignation. Notes forgotten, ink smearing the underside of her wrists. A smudge of ink on her cheek, evidencing a forgetful swipe of her hand. Her hair was twisted up into a knot on her head, and held in place with her wand. He imagined her wrestling it up out of frustration and impaling it on the nearest object.

There was ink on her cheek. Also, on her fingers. She had small hands, pretty ones. There were writing calluses on her knuckles and round short nails that she bit when she was anxious, or sometimes just held to her mouth, pressing a divot in her bottom lip. Pretty hands, and a pretty mouth.

She hadn’t pursued the argument. Her attention seemed preoccupied with the wand in his hand. She wasn’t even scowling anymore.

He stilled it, and her eyes moved.

She took a sharp breath. “You’re provoking me on purpose,” she decided. “You know you’re wrong about this. You just want to distract me.”

“Am I any good at it?”

She narrowed her eyes at him. He smiled guilelessly. Or with the intention of approximating guilelessness, anyway. He could not vouch for the total absence of guile.

“I’m warning you right now, if I don’t finish this because of you, you’re going to long for the days you had eyebrows.”

“Tant pis.” He rounded the table and leaned over her shoulder to peer at what she was writing. She stiffened and shifted away slightly.

“Is that French for ‘allow me to breathe down your neck’?”

“It’s French for ‘get over it,’” he said into her ear. “What are we doing?”

“What are we— we are invading personal space! Apparently!”

“In the essay, Granger. Did you decide if transfigured gold counts as legal tender?”

“Would y— no, but it’s ultimately more a question of law than of magic. For one, galleons aren’t solid gold, they’re a nickel-brass alloy with a gold coating, and the composition is a government secret, so all you could do is approximate volume and density. You could make something that looked like a galleon, but a simple charm would reveal it as a counterfeit.”

“How do you deal with the Duplication objection?”

“Oh, that’s simple! Duplication Charms can produce more of something, but they can’t replicate a magical signature, because those are unique to the object. And as to the question of whether you can transfigure a galleon into something else and still use it as tender — well, of course you can, but good luck convincing someone to take a tin cup instead of a gold coin."

"That's very good."

"Thank you," she said happily.

Her eyes were soft from surprise at the compliment, and she'd almost certainly come back to herself in a minute, but until then, it was a pleasure to hold the full radius of her attention, and drink in warmth.

What do you want? I'll do it for you. Fight a dragon or run through a sewer or break the law.

There was nothing to be done about it. The feeling got worse every day, like tendrils of a trawling vine reaching deeper and deeper, twining around each vein and artery, a lattice of greed.

"What?" she said. "Is there something?"

The smudge on her cheek moved when she spoke.

She jumped when he touched her. His thumb glided across the ridge of her cheekbone, lifting the coloration from it, leaving her clear-faced and gaping.

"What are you doing?"

"There was a mark."

She had short, delicate brown eyelashes. He could count them. "I see," she said. "Is it — is it gone?"

"What?"

"The mark," she said steadily. "Is it gone?"

It was.

“No,” he said. “Here.”

This time he drew the back of his knuckles across her cheek, and then touched the spot with the pad of his thumb, leaving a sort of brilliant tingling in his fingers. Her freckles sank into the heat of a blush like stars washing out in a sunrise.

“There is,” she said, “such a thing as a Scouring Charm.”

“There is.” He felt distant and outside of himself, and at the same time, intently, intensely present in his body, every nerve ending firing off some signal of pay attention. “You’re always telling me we needn’t use magic for everything.”

Her eyes skirted over the table, flitting from object to object without seeing them. “You’re not usually the touchy type.”

“I touch you.”

She started.

He had seen her in every kind of frustration known to man or Granger; her endeared irritation when friends begged for homework answers, her snarling vexation at students caught in reckless behavior, and most poignant of all, her hot, piercing, powerless frustration when she smashed herself up against something no amount of good or right could fix. But he had never seen her frustrated like this. It verged on pleasure, like satisfaction chafing on a collar.

“Yes, well. You’re used to me,” she said, a hopeless vye at flippancy. “I’ve worn you down. Most people lack the patience it takes to domesticate—”

“I assure you, it’s quite conscious.”

Her sentence crumbled off on a long exhale.

Her hand moved to her mouth and made a fist before it got there, catching herself.

“If you mean the thing on staircases, and the doors, then yes. Fine. You’re a gentleman. You get points.”

“Have you ever read the rules of etiquette?” he said. His voice was calm. “If you had, you might know that touching between boys and girls is actually rather discouraged, in general. Point of fact.”

She cleared her throat. She still was looking down at the table, her eyelashes brushing her cheeks. Her tongue darted faintly at her bottom lip. “And you’re telling me this: why?”

He shrugged. “What I said. It’s a choice.”

Her eyes slotted closed.

“Fine,” she said, in a clear, flat voice. “I’ll finish it in the morning. You can lay off the charm.”

She moved her chair back and stood up, and he shifted out of her way, watching as she vigorously corralled her notes.

Uncertainty shoved its awkward elbow in. “Granger,” he said, “are you… cross?”

“I’m not cross,” she said, still flat. “I need sleep. That’s all. And that was — crossing a line, by the way. It’s fine, just — so you know.”

“What line?”

“If you want me to do something, don’t ‘turn it on’ like that. I’m not Parvati, or Marietta, and I don’t want to be treated that way. And it’s fine, I’m not mad, and I know it’s probably fun, but I don’t want you to do it again. I’m telling you now because I’m trying to be respectful and clear.”

“I wasn’t ‘turning it on,’ it wasn’t manipulative—”

“Maybe it wasn’t meant that way,” she said brightly, clutching her textbooks to her chest, “but I wish you wouldn’t. Alright? That’s all. It isn’t a big deal. We can forget it.”

Absolutely he wouldn’t. For one thing, the promise not to flirt with her was one he had absolutely no intention of making nor keeping. For another, he hadn’t the first idea what she was so unhappy about; he’d never flirted with Parvati nor Marietta in his life, and the supposition was as baffling as her newfound standoffishness.

He knew she liked him. At least a little. She could say whatever she wanted, but she couldn’t take away the way she looked at him.

Still, he did know her. Knew her well enough to ease off when the cracks started showing, and to take an olive branch on the rare occasions she offered them.

“Granger.”

She turned around, eyes wide, face fixedly pleasant.

“It really was a very good argument,” he said, this time in a voice he’d use for class.

Her smile eased into something broader and sunnier, commingling pride and relief.

“Thank you,” she said, and perhaps as a show of goodwill, she talked about the Gringotts economy for the whole walk back to Gryffindor.

In retrospect, he didn't know why he'd ever expected her to make it easy on him.

The next morning, Angelina sidled over at breakfast. “Alright, boys,” she announced, planting her elbow on Fred’s shoulder. “Results just went up, but I’ll save you the trip: Weasley, you’re keeper.”

Ron vented pumpkin juice through his nose.

“Ah, no,” said Fred gravely, “Johnson, I appreciate it, but it’s bad optics. Can’t have people thinking I slept my way to the top.”

“She was talking to me, dolt,” said George. “No one’s gonna look at you and think you’re sleeping your way anywhere.”

“Could too!”

“Could not.”

Angelina held up a finger to Ron. She appropriated Draco’s copy of the Prophet , folded it in half, and whacked each twin in the head.

“Ow!”

“Oi!”

“Ron, practices are six to eight, weekdays,” she announced. “See Hooch if you need a broom. Any of you seen Ginny, by the way? I’m putting her on reserve; she’s got a good arm, but she’s overeager.”

“She’s at the Ravenclaw table,” crooned George.

Fred leered. “With Miiiiiiiiiiichael.”

“Mickey Cee!”

“Brother Mike!”

“Michael Corndog.”

“McCornster.”

“The stallion.”

“The stud of Gryffindor Tower. Minerva McGonagall, lock up your girls—”

“Jesus Christ,” sighed Angelina.

“—because the ‘C’ stands for co—”

Fred yelped: this time, she’d hit him on the arse.

“Thanks for nothing,” she announced. “Ta.”

“I’m still your favorite player, yeah, Anj?” Fred shouted.

“You’re not even my favorite beater.”

He blew her a kiss.

Harry seized Ron and shook him, which he didn’t seem to register. “Ron, mate! Cracking! Keeper! Bang-on! Congratulations!”

“I’m done for,” he whispered hollowly.

“Good j— what?”

He seized Harry’s collar, eliciting a squawk. “I can’t play, Harry! I’ve never done it! I’ve only ever flown with my idiot brothers—”

“Thanks, Ronniekins!”

“—and I don’t even have a broom! I’ve buggered us! Oh my God. I’ve buggered us.”

Draco yawned and flicked his wand. Ron gagged, palpating his throat.

“Keep your prognostications to yourself, thank you. Despair all you like, but do it privately; I have enough of my own neuroses, and yours are comparatively boring.”

He dispelled the charm with another lazy flick.

“Twat!” said Ron clearly, with more composure.

“See? Much better.”

The morning post descended in a flurry of parchment and feathers, scattering parcels all along the table. Hedwig landed in front of Harry with an unmarked brown envelope. While he opened it, Draco caught one copy of the Prophet and tossed the other to Ron, who was still gaping at nothing in particular. It smacked him in the face. He didn’t move.

“It’s Padfoot,” said Harry. “I told him about Umbridge, and he says the Map has secret ways out of the castle, if it gets so bad we need to hide out. He thinks there’s still some food left in the Shack — ha! Guess he thinks we should sneak out and set up an underground camp or something—”

Hermione threw down her fork, staring at him. He startled.

“...What?”

“Well, that was stupid!” she snapped.

“It wasn’t stupid,” he said jaggedly, “it was — I was careful, I didn’t put anything important in it, I’m not an idiot—”

“Did you not listen to Mad-Eye? Scratch that. Did you not listen to Arthur? Do you not listen to me?”

“It’s a letter! It’s not a threat!”

“Taken by owl! A large, white, rare owl, which is registered to you!”

“Ron writes to Arthur!”

“I don’t have to explain why it’s different for Ron.”

“Sure. It’s different. Everyone gets to write their parents but me.”

“You could write to Arthur at the Burrow any time you liked,” she said crisply. “Any time. I’m sure the Weasleys would welcome it. Wouldn’t they, Ron?”

“Keep me out of this,” Ron said clearly.

“I sent the letter before we talked to Arthur, by the way,” said Harry, “and I wouldn’t have done, if I’d known. Not that anyone asked. I don’t want to get anyone arrested, actually. But just for the record, I reckon it’s pretty cruel what Mad-Eye’s doing to him, locking him in there. Even Moony gets to leave.”

“Moony’s face isn’t plastered over half Britain, for one, and for two—”

“For two, Moony has the liberties that come with being inessential,” said Draco. He turned a page of the Prophet . “For a place as old as Twelve, there are all sorts of household wards that don’t activate unless a member of the master’s household is physically present.”

“...Do you mean the wards break if Padfoot leaves?”

“Not all of them. But it’d be noticeable. My mother compared it to the difference between a castle moat and a fully armed battleship.”

“Does that extend to the Manor wards?” said Hermione curiously. “Since it's technically yours?”

“It's held by my mother until I come of age. My father's will was carefully constructed so as to prevent an eight-year-old having sole legal ownership of a mansion. Anyway, the greatest threat to our borders at present are wandering sheep.”

“Change the subject,” muttered Ron. “Toad’s coming.”

Umbridge had sidled down from the faculty table and was swanning along the aisle, peering down at various children’s breakfasts, looking for all the world like she might snatch up a morsel at random and stuff it in her mouth.

A hand descended on his shoulder. Its grip was patentable.

“Hello, professor.”

“Draco.”

Snape loomed. It was one of his hobbies.

“I don’t suppose this is a social visit.”

“You are required in the headmaster’s office. As are you, Potter.”

Harry said warily, “Are we in trouble?” but this was dignified with no answer.

“As you were,” Snape informed the rest of the table coldly. Hermione half-rose to object, and Draco waved her off resignedly.

Harry hurried after them, using his sleeve to scrub gravy off his chin.

Snape wasted no time in steering them up the stairs. They were moving ruthlessly quick, particularly up flights of steps where a bit of caution might have saved Draco a near-hairy encounter with a trap stair. As per usual, Snape moved in silence, without a word of explanation or consideration for his godson’s comfort, but this was no great offense. Draco had resigned himself to a long life of being dragged around and ordered by people who never considered it necessary to explain where or why they were dragging him. It had started sometime around when he’d met Hermione.

He gradually recognized their route. It terminated in a golden griffin statue guarding an old oak door.

Panic kindled: a dumb hindbrain instinct. There was green light flickering in his periphery — it vanished when he turned his head, making his heart trip over itself, like it was always lurking behind him — but he gripped the feeling, throttled it, and shoved it down.

He was alive. And Hermione was downstairs. Probably in the same room where he’d last seen her, a big bright room full of students and teachers.

This was handled. He was handling it.

“Does Dumbledore want to see us?” Harry said.

“Refer to a standing policy on insipid questions,” said Snape, and forced them both through the door.

The headmaster’s office glittered with its celestial assortment of instruments, tinkling gently, while the smell of leather and sweet varnished wood commingled with smoke guttering pleasantly from a stick of incense at the far corner. The Sorting Hat, from its perch atop the far shelf, lifted its head and turned to peer at them as they came in. Snape shut the door behind them.

The headmaster’s desk was empty. Dumbledore was nowhere to be found in his office; the coterie of silver instruments twinkled, and wax dripped from low-guttering candles that floated among the rafters, casting yellow palls over the oil faces of ancient headmasters.

There was a woman sat across from him, and when she turned her head, Draco realized with a start that it was Narcissa.

He hadn’t heard from his mother since September. They were running out of things to talk about that weren’t under a gag order by one or both of them. She was intransigent on any political issue, and therefore a poor recipient for news of his life; she was unwilling to discuss her business with Dumbledore, and therefore incapable of making the reassurances he would have liked.

She was his mother, and he loved her, but he couldn’t talk to her. At one point in his life, that would have seemed like a contradiction in terms.

But no matter what the cadence of their last conversation had been — no matter how great the growing distance between them, no matter the friction between himself and a woman whose ideas about his friends, and possibly life, were disdainful at best — no matter how much he was certain, on some level or other, he disappointed her — something in him unknotted, a release of unexpected relief.

The last time he had been in this office, there had been a man ready to kill him, and she had electrocuted him unconscious. Relief was a psychosomatic response. It wasn't sentimental. His heartbeat had returned to normal as a rational response to stimuli, and in any case couldn't be helped.

"Mother?"

"Draco," she murmured, rising from her chair. She opened her arms, and he stepped into them with a bewildered warmth. "Dreadfully sorry for the shock, darling, I didn't mean to sneak. Sit. Drink something. Lord, you're so thin. What have they fed you? Water and biscuits?"

"I'm fine—"

"And why aren't your cuffs buttoned? Roll down your sleeves, dear, you're not a paperboy."

"Mother."

"Hello," said Harry. "This is nice. Why am I here?"

"I second that question," said Draco forcefully. Narcissa hadn't glanced at Harry except for a cursory once-over when he came in; her eyes were only for him, but they were tired and worried, and lacked the sort of twinkle that ought to greet a family reunion.

"Potter needs Occlumency lessons," said Snape.

There was a pause.

"Gesundheit," said Harry.

"A thousand pardons," said Draco. "What he means to say is: 'Thank you, professor, for answering my question; would it trouble you awfully to elaborate on the substance of your response?'"

"Occlumency is a form of mind magic," Narcissa murmured. "It's a defense against Legilimency."

"Legilly… is that something to do with writing?"

"Laws, I'd think," muttered Draco. No one laughed at his spectacular jest. Hermione would have, but she wasn't here. His life was a series of unremitting miseries.

"A trained Legilimens," she said, "wields the power to invade a mind, and can access the thoughts of an unprepared subject."

"They can read minds?" said Harry. But Draco had a more specific concern.

He rounded on his mother. "Can you do it?"

She flicked her fingers dismissively. "A little."

"Have you?"

A wry smile crossed her mouth. "Darling, if someone had been rooting around in your head, you would have noticed."

He jerked his chin at Snape.

"I do not," said Snape calmly.

"One cannot perform Legilimency without opening one's mind to attack. Only a wizard of exceptional skill can maintain mental defenses while executing an assault."

Draco drummed his fingers on the armrest. "Such as the Dark Lord. For example."

"Quite."

The world pressed in on the walls of the headmaster’s office, heavy and small.

“Alright,” said Harry, with unexpected calm. “So what now?”

“Dumbledore,” Snape said, with a taut, complicated inflection, “believes your scar has created a mental link between the Dark Lord and yourself. The episodes in which your scar causes pain tend to overlap with periods in which we believe he, the Dark Lord, feels something passionately. In the past year, I have… personally… seen cause to believe the bond is real.”

“You’ve been with the Dark Lord?” Draco said sharply. “Spying?”

Snape made a noncommittal gesture.

“Why in God’s name does he trust you?”

Snape twitched irritably. “I have submitted to onerous tests of my fidelity,” he said, touching his forearm. “And I offer him pieces of information that Dumbledore does not fear to lose.”

“Such as?”

Narcissa made a small quelling noise. Snape didn't answer.

Draco rounded on her. “Fine. What about you?”

“No,” she said. “I have been spared that duty.”

“The Dark Lord requires only the strongest and bravest,” Snape said silkily. “A crumbling, infirm widow, mind rent asunder from the blow of her husband’s death, would merely disgrace his ranks.”

Narcissa gave a low laugh.

“And Dumbledore couldn’t tell me any of that himself?” said Harry pointedly. “Where is he, anyway? Can’t he teach me the Occlu-whatsit?”

“Entertaining your Defense Against the Dark Arts professor,” Snape sneered. “Or pretending to, in order to spare himself from the trials of dealing with thick-skulled cretins.”

Harry’s eyes glittered. Doom impended.

“But Professor Dumbledore always speaks so highly of you, sir.”

Snape moved sharply, and Draco instinctively stepped toward Harry. But he needn’t have bothered. Narcissa sighed and rose to her feet, and Snape drew back, his hands closing and unclosing restlessly near his wandsheath.

“We begin tonight,” she said. “I am not often free, and so we will work from my schedule. Severus will extract you from any activities may overlap with our lessons. It is paramount that few people know I am here.”

This might have been the most startling revelation yet.

“Mother, you’re not serious.”

“Dear heart, we’ve spoken about contradicting me in public. Besides which, Dumbledore has requested specifically that I offer my services, and it is a service easily rendered indeed, since the alternative is mucking around in the low country — have you any idea how many buggering caves there are in Cornwall, Severus?”

“What the hell are you doing in Cornwall?”

“Language, Draco.”

“You just said—”

“Hang on,” said Harry. “Both of us?”

“Yes. Draco will learn with you.”

Draco was surprised to learn this as the next person, that being a boy who was admittedly quite easy to surprise.

“And in what kind of situation, Mother, do you expect your son to need Occlumency?”

“None that I would permit,” she said. “But I should not allow anyone at this school to have an education superior to yours, my darling.”

Draco stared at her. The idea of his mother poking around in his mind raised a host of terrors.

“Why not Snape?”

“I assure you most confidently,” said Snape, “that neither of you desire prolonged exposure to my mind.”

“I don’t want prolonged exposure to anyone’s mind,” said Harry. “I’d rather not do this. If you’re asking me, which no one has.”

He was ignored. Draco was preoccupied, and the adults simply didn’t care.

“You have until curfew,” Snape told Narcissa, unfolding himself from the wall. “Good luck.”

Then he was gone.

Narcissa pointed her wand at the door. A deadbolt clicked.

She sheathed her wand up her sleeve and circled the desk. “Follow me.”

At the back of the room there was a vast oaken cabinet with a display of enormous colorful perfume bottles in hues as varied as a dandy’s pocket square collection. At the back of the cabinet there was a mirror, though it was smeared with brassy clouds of age, and dark shapes drifted sinisterly behind the warped outline of their reflections.

She unlocked the cabinet and unfolded the bottom drawers, which revealed a stone basin engraved with runes. It was shaped like a fountain, but the liquid inside wasn't water; instead, it was an opaque silver fluid crowned with puffs of mist.

"This is a Pensieve," she said.

"I know that. There's one at the Manor," he said impatiently; it sat in his father's office, along with his grandfather's collection of pixie wings and a portrait of a noisome great aunt.

"I'm sure you do, darling, but Mr. Potter was raised in squalor."

"It wasn't squalor," said Harry. "We had a television."

Narcissa glanced at him like a dog interrupting a conversation on Proust.

"A mind is a complicated object," she continued. "It is not a library of memories; it is an interaction of impressions, perceptions, and recollections constantly changing in time. The chief instrument of the Occlumens is focus." She drew her wand away, and a luminescent strand of silver came with it, emerging from the temple like she had unspooled part of her brain. When she flicked her wand, it sank into the Pensieve like a falling feather. "In a manner of speaking, this is the only thing an Occlumens must do."

"That's all?" said Harry. "I just try to not think about things?"

"Excellent, he'll be a natural," said Draco. Narcissa pinched his ear, and he whined, batting her away.

"You sound like you imagine it will be easy," she warned Harry.

"Well, I dunno. Compared to Potions?"

She slotted the Pensieve into its berth, then turned and pointed her wand at him. "Do you have a lover?"

Harry’s jaw dropped. Then he socked Draco on the arm.

“You sneak—”

“Me? I didn’t tell her anything! I didn’t even want to know about it myself!”

“Good. You do,” said Narcissa evenly. “What’s the color of her hair?”

“What does that m—?”

“Legilimens.”

Harry gasped.

He staggered back, his hands flying up in front of his face, as if trying to shield himself from a searing light.

“Cut it. Stop that — cut it out—”

“Mother?”

“I’m n— no.” His voice was shrill, not with pain, but anxiety. “Stop. Don’t touch that. Please. C’mon.”

“Focus,” she suggested, and the corner of her mouth gave a calm, mean little twitch. “You said it was easy.”

“You’re making me think about it!”

“I’m not.”

“Stop!” Harry squirmed as if trying to wriggle out of his own skin. “That’s — that was private!”

“I’m sure it used to be.”

His mother let Harry wriggle for a while longer, making indecent sounds of embarrassment and rage, before her face slackened.

Harry’s eyes snapped open on a gasp.

“Black,” she said coldly, and turned back to the Pensieve. “Her hair is black. And if she had been a double agent, you would have broken her cover.”

A chill skated down the back of his neck, peeling up the hairs there with cold fingers. Harry sagged to his knees, panting.

“So in a sense,” said Narcissa, her mouth curving unkindly, “I suppose one might consider it… almost as difficult as Potions.”

“That was Legilimency?” Harry rasped.

“An utterly mild form. I summoned a thought by association — I invoked it out loud — and then skimmed the surface of your thoughts. You could have resisted it by clearing your mind at any point.”

“It can get harder?” he croaked.

“It only gets harder. I gave you a beginner’s grace.”

“Why can’t I just throw you out?” he demanded. “Isn’t there anything I can do to just — close the door? Without having to do the mind-clearing stuff?”

Narcissa cocked her head. Draco recognized her expression as the masked patience of one condescending to the despairingly stupid.

It was one of his favorites, too.

“At the risk of unimaginable insult to five years of education at the finest wizarding institute in the world,” she said, “you have a wand.”

Draco laughed; Narcissa flashed him a thin smile.

“To wit,” she said, “you will have noticed that Legilimency begins with a spell. Severus tells me you have an uninspiring but serviceable Shield Charm. I trust you can limp through the rest of that idea on your own."

"I can dodge the jinx?" Harry was much cheered. "That's great — I'll hardly need Occlumency at all, then—"

"If you find yourself in a situation where your opponent is easily disposed of, by all means, dispose away. But Albus has asked me to prepare you to face the Dark Lord."

His glee snuffed out.

"Which I cannot do," she added. "As I have told him, and though he is foolishly disinclined to believe it. Even Severus could not forge an Occlumens of the necessary skill from your mind as it is currently, in part because Severus himself cannot fully resist the Dark Lord."

"But Professor Snape—"

"Maintains his cover through a combination of extraordinary Occlumenic skill and a decade-spanning history of unhesitating service," she said curtly. "The first defense against Legilimency is not to inspire the need for it. The second is not to overburden yourself with valuable information. Severus knows precisely as much as is necessary. No more."

"According to who?"

"The person to whom he answers," she said, "is Albus Dumbledore. Take that as you will. Enough delay. Try once more; you may know in advance that I am going to seek the name of your owl. Be advised that this is a generosity the Dark Lord will not offer you."

"Hang on," said Harry desperately. "What if I can't do it? Say if I'm stuck, and I can't clear my mind, and I already know I know all the stuff that he's looking for, and I can't throw a jinx. Is there some trick? Like a shortcut? Can't I Obliviate myself or something?"

Narcissa delicately braced her knuckles against her mouth. At length:

“Obliviated memories are inaccessible. Even to Legilimency.”

“So you’re saying if I—”

“However. Self-Obliviation is categorically discouraged by medical professionals. It tends to… take… much more than is intended.” Another pause. “And the memories, of course, become irretrievable. In nearly all cases.”

“But—”

“Of those who survive.”

Harry went still.

“That unsettles you? Good. I don’t want Albus to come whinging that I gave his pupil some funny ideas about lopping off pieces of his own mind.” She lifted her wand. “Prepare yourself. Legilimens.”

Harry’s writhing was more subdued the second go around, but inside a minute he still ended up hunched on the floor. Narcissa broke off with a sigh and massaged the bridge of her nose as if she had a headache. Draco folded his arms and shifted his weight, dreading his turn.

“Hedwig,” she said, slightly strained. “Peculiar. Do you have German blood?”

“No idea,” said Harry, pointedly, from the floor. “Funny thing happened to my parents, you mightn’t have heard.”

Draco gave a small snigger. Narcissa ignored it, blinking away some irritant; abruptly, she whirled on Harry with disbelief. “Why were you at Castle Lestrange?”

“I wasn’t. Where’s that?”

“Don’t lie. I saw it, remember. Did you grow up in Cumbria? In the hills, perhaps?”

“Close,” Harry said. “Surrey.”

“Your muggles took you on holiday, then. To Windermere. To Carlisle.”

“Vernon wouldn’t take me to the supermarket,” said Harry placidly. “He worried people might think I was his son, you see. Or maybe he was worried they wouldn’t. I’ve got Petunia’s nose, according to Marge, though she was trollied when she said it, so I’d honestly be surprised—”

“Never mind. I must’ve… it was my memory, I suppose, not yours. Draco, you’re next.”

Admittedly, in terms of plausible places to find Harry Potter, the seat of House Lestrange ranked somewhere between the Slytherin commons and the surface of the moon. Added to which, it had been empty ever since his aunt had been arrested, and with her died the family line. Both of the Lestrange brothers were in Azkaban, and the house would default to some cousin upon their death.

“I am going to seek the password to the Gryffindor common room,” she said. “Prepare yourself.”

He slid his left foot back, reflexively. She smiled.

“Legilimens.”

He didn’t feel his mother enter his mind. It wasn’t a physical sensation: it was as though someone had touched the face of his consciousness and moved it, gently redirecting the lens of his mind’s eye.

He concentrated instead on Slytherin. He thought of the dungeon wall, a door swelling out of the brick, a green vault peppered with reedy light from the lake.

The scene rippled, and changed: they were moving slowly up the stairs of the dungeons, sliding through narrow corridors rendered in the watercolor concept of memory. He caught them on the grand staircase and turned firmly away, directing his thoughts toward the Great Hall; he could feel the tension as the other presence in his mind tried to split off and peel upward, but he focused intently on remaining in the Entrance Hall, the double-doors, the movement of golden light on the flagstones.

The doors opened, and Hermione stepped into them, followed by a blurry pack of first years. It was the Opening Feast.

And she was crossing the hall, talking animatedly, but when she looked up and smiled, reflexively and warmly — there was a jolt of anxiety, and then he was flying up the stairs, soaring away from the scene.

He caught himself on the third floor and wrestled himself away from the route to Gryffindor. He could feel his mother's pushing, now, and it presented not as pain but as temptation: fleeting thoughts of a familiar staircase, a soft featherbed after a long day's work, a cat curled in the armchair.

Then they veered away, and there was a snippet of sound: a girl's crying; they were outside the Hospital Wing, and the sunrise was brimming behind the windows.

No. That was private.

Firelight on stone walls. Hot chocolate and roasting chestnuts by the grate. Rain washing the old windows. Hermione's prefect badge—

He scrambled for a distraction. Something significant, something his mother wouldn't be able to sweep past.

It came to him by accident, a thought he didn’t even necessarily recognize as his own: his father’s face, gazing gravely from his portrait at the Manor. Steel gray eyes that moved sightlessly over the hallway before him, hair the dull white of fresh snow.

They stopped moving. Hogwarts vanished, shattering into a whirl of fragmented sensations around the still locus of his father’s face — and then there was a warm breeze, a stirring on his cheek, and he was looking at a young man with his father’s face in miniature, tall and dressed in Hogwarts uniform.

For a shocking heartbeat, he thought it was himself, but his tie was green and silver.

The other boy was taller, older, with short hair coiffed in an older style. Lucius.

Memory sketched the rest of the scene only in blurs of gold and green: they were outdoors, and everything smelled of freshly cut grass, and there was something sweet and lemony on his tongue. Lucius was saying something — his voice was familiar and unsettling, like hearing an echo in a silent room — but he was talking to someone beyond the boundary of the memory, his expression politely closed-off.

Somewhere, a woman laughed. It wasn’t his mother.

A low contralto spoke in a murmur: “Hello, Princess.”

There was a clatter of metal. He opened his eyes.

One of the headmaster’s instruments lay in pieces on the floor. Narcissa leaned on the wall beside it. Harry tried to help her up, but she waved him off.

He recovered his senses, and then started forward in alarm. “Mother — I’m sorry—”

“No,” she snapped. “That was — acceptable. Well done, Draco.”

“Don’t.” She lifted a hand. “That was… an acceptable strategy. I did not… find the password.”

“What happened?” murmured Harry, looking equally impressed and unnerved. “What did you do?”

“Draco,” said Narcissa thickly, “launched a counteroffensive.”

“I did Legilimency?”

“It was not a proper attack. You had the advantage of knowing in advance what memory would be likely to distract your assaulter. Such will not be the case often. Nevertheless, you made use of the tools available,” she said stiffly. “The parameters of your task were capacious. You took advantage. Well done.”

“I didn’t hurt you, did I?”

She ignored it, drawing herself upright, and smoothed her hair. Her expression was all manicured neutrality. “Potter, you may leave us,” she said abruptly. “Come back in two weeks. I don’t suppose I need to tell you that a lack of practice will be apparent.”

““Right,” Harry mumbled. He shouldered his bag and hurried toward the office door. He glanced back at Draco, faintly curious, and then left.

Draco lingered while his mother set about repairing the instrument she’d displaced.

“That was Father,” he ventured, at length. “When he was at Hogwarts.”

She revealed nothing. Her spine was as straight as an obelisk.

“He was talking to someone. And there was a woman’s voice. Near the end.”

“Memory is a strange thing. Association is difficult to predict and almost impossible to control.” She lifted one shoulder indifferently. “What you are describing could have been anything. I don’t know what you heard.”

He was being told to turn back, and he obeyed her, not because he for one moment believed her, but because he loved her enough that the truth mattered less than her comfort.

“Does Castle Lestrange have three towers?”

She stopped short.

“How do you know that?”

“Because Potter saw it in a vision.”

His mother did something she had never done before.

She put her hand on her head, then moved it to her mouth, then turned around. “Damn it. Alright.”

“Mother? What does it mean?”

“It means the Dark Lord is securing the whereabouts of his horcruxes.” She crossed to the pensieve and shoved her wand to her temple, sieving out a memory. “If Potter saw it, and he was never there… unless he lied… but he knew nothing of the place, how could he, not even the name…”

Understanding slipped into place like a socket, and a searingly unpleasant bulb flared to life.

“That was the Dark Lord’s memory.”

She nodded. “Castle Lestrange was the seat of two Knights of Walpurgis,” she said. “Three, by marriage. He would presume, as the diary was stored at the Manor, that they would keep their treasure in their ancestral seat. The warding would make it nigh-impregnable.”

“But no one’s there. It was abandoned after the war.”

“Worse,” she said grimly. “Inland revenue.”

“Pardon?”

“Asset seizure, darling, keep up. After the war, Death Eater assets reverted to the state. The Lestranges held quite a few items of value in their keeping, along with the gold. Most of it was cursed,” she added, flicking the bottle’s contents even with a fingernail, “but still.”

“So the Ministry took it?”

“Welcome to the common grave robbery known as the estate tax.”

He ignored his mother’s admittedly hilarious joke. “But if there was a horcrux in the vault,” he said, “that means there’s a horcrux in Ministry custody.”

“Yes.”

“Assuming they haven’t sold it,” she added, working strand after strand of silver from her temple. She pooled them in a bottle that was quickly filling up. “If they did, then Merlin knows where it is. These were valuable artifacts, significant ones. Regulus, apparently, received one of great historic import. Any collector would willingly part with an organ for them.”

“But if it wasn’t — if the Ministry still had it — I imagine it’d be hidden somewhere. Somewhere reasonably secure.”

“I know what you’re thinking. It wouldn’t be in Gringotts. No one really trusts the goblins — I mean the bank’s alright for cash, and jewelry, so long as it isn’t goblin-make, but an artifact of real power? In their greedy little fingers? No wizard in their right mind—”

“What about the Department of Mysteries?”

She hummed. “It’s possible. It would, at least, be secure.”

She turned back to the Pensieve.

“The Lestranges weren’t caught until years after the war ended,” he said, changing the subject. “How did the Ministry lay hands on their estate?”

“They fled abroad. To Romania, I believe, although by that point… I wouldn’t have known.”

Her tone was a closed door.

“It also happens to be the former residence of Quirinius Quirrell,” she said absently. “He was State Alchemist there before he transferred to Hogwarts. Which means the Dark Lord’s revenant was in Bucharest at some point in 1990.”

“And you thought he might have retreated there to find a horcrux.”

“So we thought. It turns out that he ended up there by coincidence; Quirrell was an amateur spiritualist, and he had a fascination with Dark magic. He wanted the prestige of being the one to locate the Dark Lord’s body. There wasn’t one, at the Potters’ home, you see… It was a running challenge among magical academics to locate it, or else explain what happened to it. I believe Quirrell’s approach was to summon the Dark Lord’s spirit and ask it, the arrogant fool... it’s a shame he never lived to publish.” She sighed. “The danger of the Dark Arts, Draco, is that they always give you precisely what you wish for.”

She spoke with familiar strain.

“It doesn’t seem safe. Concentrating so many valuable assets in one family.”

“On the contrary. You must understand the way the Dark Lord thought — thinks. A family as close as ours became each other's collateral. We secured each other’s loyalties. For a time, anyway.”

It reminded him of something.

“Slytherin House is getting married.”

“Congratulations,” she said, descending from the dais. “To Ravenclaw, or Hufflepuff?”

“I’m serious.”

“You know, sometimes I fear you inherited your father’s sense of humor.”

“The whole cohort is engaged. Parkinson and Warrington. Bulstrode and Crabbe. Rosier and Selwyn, apparently, among others. Don’t you think that’s significant?”

“Probably, yes.”

“...Doesn’t it concern you?”

She snorted. “No. For one thing, I have bigger games to play. For another, even if I didn't, it would demean me to care. None of those children hold a candle to what our family was, and breeding mediocrity with mediocrity cannot produce greatness.”

This relieved him, somewhat. His mother had forgotten more about Society intrigue than he had ever known; if she wasn't concerned, he didn't see any reason to be.

“Pansy’s fiancé is a cretin.”

“What a shame,” she said, with a cool and unsurprised sorrow. “Status?”

“Respectable.”

“Wealthy?”

“Very.”

“Then it could be worse.” She brushed off her hands. “My heart goes out to her, all the same. She’s a darling girl. She should have a wedding present from us. Maybe the house in Austria.”

He did not think darling girl was how many would describe Pansy.

“Why didn’t you tell me the Greengrasses made an offer?” he asked abruptly.

She arched an eyebrow, an expression dreadfully reminiscent of the mirror. “Would you have wanted it?”

“No!”

“That’s what I thought.”

“Is that why you turned them down?”

“Darling, you don’t even ask my permission to invite someone to my house. Where I’d find the confidence to betrothe you, I certainly don’t know.”

She was good at this kind of insult, the honeyed acid, the thorn sheltered by a blameless rose.

“Anyway,” she added, “I suspect I’d set her up for a jilting and a runaway groomsman, and we’ve problems aplenty without looking more foolish.”

It was a joke, but her tone carried a thread of weight.

“You didn’t answer my question. Why didn’t you tell me?”

“Because there wasn’t anything to say.”

“Are you sure? We don’t talk so much that one feels the need to cull potential subjects.”

He regretted it at once when she stiffened.

“I — apologize.”

“Quite alright.” But she didn’t apologize, either. “I understand that you must be frustrated with how little I will tell you. I hope you understand that most secrets I keep are not by choice, and the few secrets I do choose, I do not keep because they bring me pleasure.”

He paused. Her mood was gentle. Her guard was low. He wasn’t likely to get a better opportunity.

“Which kind is Andromeda?”

“No.”

It was a flat, hard word.

“Mother—”

“Never,” she said, quietly. “You are the dearest creature in the world, and for your sake I would prostrate on burning ordure. The answer to that question is ‘never.’”

“She’s my aunt. I’ve a right to know her. And here’s another thing, I don’t think it’s for you to decide which members of our house deserve acknowledgement—”

“I never decided.” Her voice was low. “I did not write our customs. I did not write our traditions. Understand that I would deny you nothing. I deny them the privilege of knowing you, of being known by you. That is what they have to suffer for their wrongs.”

“What was Andromeda’s wrong? What did her marriage have to do with you?”

“Draco!”

“And what about Sirius? What did he ever do that I haven’t?”

“Don’t say the names—”

“I will if I want to, I’m Lord Malfoy, and I’ll use their names if it pleases me. Andromeda Black. Alphard Black. Sirius Black: Sorted in Gryffindor, check — associating with muggle-borns and blood traitors, check — consorting with enemies of the House of Black, check — smoked cigarettes, check, sorry, Mother—”

“Have pity.”

“Name the difference. Name the difference, besides the fact that you love me.”

“I loved them all.”

He stopped. Silver instruments clinked sadly in the ceiling.

She leaned on the mantle.

“I loved them all,” she repeated, with a thin and acrid dignity. “Every one. And they left me. Do not ask me to say their names.”

“Alright, Mother.”

She screwed her eyes shut.

“You know, I hate it when you speak to me that way,” she snapped. “As if I require handling. I never cared for handling, not when I was well, and not now. I was — I am one of the finest witches of my generation.”

“I know, Mother.”

“They used to call me brilliant,” she whispered. “Did you know that? Do you know how good — do you ever imagine what I was, before I was this?”

There was nothing to say to that. He hadn’t.

“You don’t. That’s my punishment. You’ll remember me as mad. Even if I live to a hundred, you’ll remember me as your poor mad mother, and you'll say — 'she did her best, dear thing,' but never…" She opened her eyes, distant. "Do you have any idea how a five-year-old child looks at you?"

"I can't help not being five years old anymore."

"You don't know what I mean. But that's alright," she said, oddly calm. "It always happens this way. My mother said so, and I didn't understand it, but now I do. I made my peace with it. She never could."

"You're not making sense."

She didn't seem to care. "The mistake was always being too afraid… You get your cowardice from me. It was never your father's flaw."

"I'm not a coward."

"You are. I'm sorry. But I love you anyway. I love you beyond cowardice. Remember that, when we're apart," she said, and her premise froze the words on his lips. "Remember the love you carry with you, when you go."

"I'm right here," he said. "I'm not going anywhere."

"Oh, darling," she said. Her smile was a terrible rictus of love. "They're such pretty words, aren't they? It's a pleasure to hear them again."

-[slides in across the finish line like I'm making a home run] IT'S STILL FRIDAY!

-Fun fact: the end of this chapter approximately marks the halfway point of this fic, since I have an equal number of chapters planned before and after it. Of course, the later books have much longer chapters than the earlier ones, so it's probably not an even split, but in terms of chapters, welcome to: THE MIDDLE PART!

-Please remember what I have said about pining and brain-rattling like a maraca. This is a fic written specifically to indulge my unique flavor of brain worms, and we will proceed as the brain worms direct us. Hold on. I know. Come here. Take my hand. We can do this. You and me. Together.

-For everyone who left a comment: My beloveds. Every week I think "people in the comments aren't going to outdo themselves spectacularly." And then everyone in the comments outdoes themselves spectacularly, and I am played for an absolute fool.

-This week's gift: a really, really fresh bowl of strawberries, with vanilla ice cream and warm shortbread. The kind that's come out of the oven thirty seconds ago. And champagne. The champagne's assumed.

-Next week's chapter goes up on you already know. It's called "Gryffindor vs. Slytherin." And it involves an impromptu choral performance.

Gryffindor vs. Slytherin

Chapter 66: Gryffindor vs. Slytherin

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

November ended with a dry rustle of black leaves on frost-blue lawns, and through swirling drifts of fog, they went down to the quidditch pitch for the first match against Slytherin.

The Prophet had run another spate of articles about conditions at Hogwarts, and Harry had been identified as a “lasting problem” in the student body.

The news did not so much change student attitudes towards Harry as redirect attention to festering ideas already planted. Not many people said hello to him when he came into breakfast, except for a few members of the Defense Club, a friend or two, and the Weasley twins, who tried to make up for the lack of enthusiasm by toppling over themselves with elaborate bows and hello’s; but then Umbridge came in for breakfast, cast her beady-eyed gaze over the hallway, and they quickly made themselves scarce. (They had set off dungbombs in the staff lounge earlier that week, and though Filch had twice tried to accuse them, there was an undeniable elegance in the difficulty of tracing a literal piece of dung.)

Cho came over and sat with him during breakfast, and she held Harry’s hand so tightly that he had to fumble through eating his eggs left-handed; when she left, wearing his Gryffindor jumper, she smiled bravely at him and ignored the sweep of whispering that followed her.

Daphne had painted her lips in rouge the color of the Gryffindor kit. She held an umbrella and hopped along cheerfully through the mud, though she leaned now and then on the nearest arm, and her steps wobbled slightly. She passed a group of Slytherins who broke into whispers, and she produced a rigid smile that could light up a stadium.

Ron grunted and marched on, trailing his borrowed Cleansweep behind him in the mud.

“In any case, I envy the both of you for your Occlumency lessons,” Hermione announced. “I don’t fancy anyone rummaging around in my head.”

“Who has the time?” muttered Harry.

There was a cool lull while the wind rattled sadly through the stands.

“Fine,” said Hermione. “Good luck. Be safe. Don’t fall off your brooms.”

She glanced at each of them, lingering last on Draco; and as she brushed past to the stairs, her arm pressed briefly against his.

She whisked it away with the haste of an accident, and hurried up the stairs.

“Thanks,” Ron called after her hopefully. Draco suppressed a twinge of irritation at quite literally nothing in particular.

The stands shuddered under a groan of wind. The locker rooms were warm and candlelit, and it had never been harder to leave them than when standing on the takeoff spot, brooms braced against the gale, as one by one they lifted into the winnowing snap of fog. Angelina led the group in a tight V- formation around the stands, cleaving through curtains of stinging mist. Harry zipped up to hover in the highest quadrant of the field, cutting a lazy loop.

Red scarves fluttered in between green stalks of wool and foam. The stray exhortation of sparks erupted when the players came onto the field, and there were cheers. The quidditch pitch looked like a kind of war arena in this weather, crowned in coronets of fog, the silver gusts peeled back by the windspeed of the play.

Roars met each player that erupted from the locker room. Applause swelled in long loops around the stadium. In the faculty box, McGonagall perched between Professor Umbridge and Professor Dumbledore, and when the Gryffindor team came out, she tapped out spirited applause on her palm. Umbridge, who was bundled in a puffball hat and a mink coat, glowered like a wet cat.

Theo sat next to Pansy and Astoria, wearing a thick double-breasted overcoat and a green scarf. Astoria had been given a front-row slot for her chair, and she was terribly excited about it.

“Good morning,” said someone who was not Lee Jordan.

It was the sixth year Slytherin prefect, Maude Rosier, who had her chin braced in her palm. “And a dreadful one it is. Can’t hope we’ll see anything impressive in this weather. Johnson has the quaffle… now Montague has it. Whoops, not anymore… there he goes up the pitch, and that’s a bludger from Weasley, don’t ask me which, Gryffindor’s got about twelve of them...”

Draco arced around to Angelina’s right, twisting a corkscrew over the stands, and drew a wave of screams from those who lost their hats in his slipstream. He changed his course when Angelina broke off, drifting into a wider formation that set him whirling under a bludger, only to duck again when Fred cracked it back over his head. There was Goyle’s habit of canting left, his way of always grunting before he hit the ball, giving a faint forewarning when a missile was en route. He caught a pass and volleyed it back to Angelina, slipped under Katie to change guards, and dodged another bludger.

The Slytherins were chanting. This wasn’t odd; the Gryffindor stands had been chanting errantly for Harry and Angelina, on and off, but it was unusual for how many of them were chanting the same thing.

“The crowd’s very spirited,” murmured Rosier. “Lots of energy. That’s Malfoy to Johnson, I mean Bell, sorry. Hard to tell them apart.”

The wind and the crowd battled to deafen him. The reedy strains of a chorus rose through the din.

What shall we do with a pureblood traitor?

What shall we do with a pureblood traitor?

“—and it’s Johnson back to Bell, Bell to shoot — whoops, missed,” said Rosier mildly, as if she couldn’t hear it. McGonagall half rose from her seat, her face a stone rictus, but Umbridge put her hand on her arm.

At the other end of the field, Ron was pale, clutching the front of his broomstick as if it might soon snap off.

Snap his wand and send him walking;

Snap his wand and send him walking—

Harry stopped moving. Draco willed him to discover some untapped reserves of self-restraint — perhaps ones rich from five years of neglect.

Wishful thinking. On the third repetition, Harry shot back down towards Ron, cutting back toward the goalhoops.

“POTTER!” Angelina shouted. She caught a pass and punted it hastily back to Katie, who fumbled it in haste, as Angelina shot off to try and recollect her seeker. “FOCUS!”

“Mm, Bell’s not in a very good position for it,” said Rosier, toying with her necklace. “She’s gotta beat Bletchely. Good luck. Shoots… oh, no…”

Umbridge and McGonagall had raised their voices. Umbridge lifted from her seat, her face dimming with displeasure. A flush colored in the sagging folds of her cheeks. Madam Hooch soared over to the Slytherin stands and began shouting at them, wholly without effect.

What shall we do with a halfblood bastard?

What shall we do with a halfblood bastard?

The Gryffindor stands started to object. Hermione was standing up and shouting, pink in the face; Daphne was tugging fretfully at her robes, trying to get her back down; Ginny was hanging out of the box, her wand out, snarling something that it was a mercy the wind had hidden from teachers' ears. Boos and hisses broke out. The attention was shifting away from the game.

There was a surge of movement: people had come out of their seats, and they were moving toward the Slytherin stands, led by a furious Seamus and Ginny.

Put 'em in his place with a horsewhip, won't we;

Put 'em in his place with a horsewhip, won't we—

"Quaffle's in Slytherin possession."

As if anyone cared. Hermione had grown distracted by trying to keep the others in their seats, and she had two first years by the back of the robes, shouting at them fruitlessly. Daphne was tugging their friends away from the entrance to the box. A flutter of flashbulbs testified to the presence of Colin and Dennis Creevey, who were snapping pictures in between shouts. In the Hufflepuff box, Cedric was trying to maintain decorum, but there was a cacophony breaking out, and he hadn't a chance. The Ravenclaws were stirring in disease, commingled boos and whistles and a bevy, above all else, of uncomfortable looks.

Then Daphne drew up short, staring at the Slytherin stands. Astoria was chanting the words between claps, as if she hadn't the slightest idea what they meant; or, worse, didn't care. Pansy was mouthing the words, but somewhat listlessly, her eyes wandering; Theo's mouth was sealed shut, and he was massaging his eyes.

The quaffle sailed past him, forgotten. Angelina swore and caught it, but he was cutting away, crossing the field, because the Slytherins were warming up for another verse.

What shall we do with a thieving mudblood?

What shall we do with a thieving mudblood?

McGonagall broke away from Umbridge and snatched the microphone from Rosier.

"ENOUGH! ENOUGH — DESIST PLAY —"

He looked for Hermione, found her easily — in the middle of a field of red and gold, her hair thrashing darkly in the wind. She had stopped shouting, and she was watching the Slytherin stands, her mouth parted, rigid not with fear but fury.

Abruptly, Daphne surged away from the stands, wrestling her way through the crowd. She cut effortlessly into a pack of squirming, shouting Gryffindors, hustled along the front row of seats, and vaulted the railing between boxes, at one point lifting Dennis Creevey bodily out of her way by the scruff of his neck. People yelped at her careless show of strength, but single-minded and furious, she ignored them.

She was shouting something; he couldn't hear her over the wind and the singing, but he knew the shape her lips were making. It was Tori.

Strap him to an anchor and then drop it,

Strap him to an anchor and then drop it—

“SILENCIO!”

It was Professor McGonagall.

The crowd cut out, and in the ringing peal of silence that ensued, the other shouts swelled to fill its new absence. Gryffindors surged over the barrier, and Slytherins leapt from their seats, shouting, almost chest to chest, red robes and green ones clashing and knitting in the thrashing currents of the mist, like waves of color meeting each other on a field of battle.

Daphne reached Astoria and seized her by the front of her shirt. She gave her a hard rattle, shouting something, and Astoria let out a shrill cry. The two broke into tussling. Ginny and Seamus were locked in a shouting match with Vincent Crabbe, and it wasn’t clear who touched who first, but one of them surged at the other, and Ginny stumbled onto her back foot; tripped — fell — and there was a flicker of shadow, and Harry shot over from the goalhoops, followed closely by Ron, who was bellowing at Crabbe long before he could hear him.

The Gryffindor team was constellating around the Slytherin box, and so was the Slytherin team. Faculty members were wrestling their way through the thick crowd of Hufflepuffs, but it was slow going.

Daphne gave Astoria another rattle and Astoria burst into tears, shoving her away. They were shouting at each other so fiercely that the nearest seats all peeled back, and stray magic rattled the seats beneath them, lifting the banners in gusts of cross-current wind. Theo stood up and tried to say something to Daphne, and she shoved him. He stumbled away; Pansy sprang up, snapping something at her, and Daphne snapped right back; they were arguing as he had never seen them argue, claws out, with a brute earnesty in their faces that seemed almost ill-fitting on features so acclimated to a sneer.

Astoria shoved Daphne’s chest and spat something. Daphne staggered back, stricken.

Then she slapped Astoria across the face.

The girl screamed. Crabbe rose from behind Astoria’s seat like six feet of towering marble.

He grabbed a fistful of Daphne’s hair and wrenched her back, and her shriek of pain pierced through the din.

At which point Ron leapt from his broomstick, hurtled into the crowd, and tackled him.

It erupted. The crowd, as one organism, had a seizure. Colors bled into each other. There were screams; spells glittered like stray veins of electricity over the crowd. Draco fumbled for his wand and cut a long arc around the fight, but there were spells flying, and he couldn’t see well enough to land anything, and his heart was in his stomach. Harry plummeted into the crowd with no such reservation, and the fight swelled to enfold the Gryffindor stands, which surged at Harry’s intervention like a cavalry charge.

Hermione was hurrying along the stairs, trying to get to the Slytherin box, and he set his jaw, following her carefully with his eyes. As if it would kill her to stay still. As if it would actually kill her, for once, not to run away from the danger instead of into it.

A spell veered wide from the crowd and nearly struck him. He slid into a dive into the stands, almost skimming a seat, and clipped the end of his broomstick on a railing. It tore out of his hands and he tumbled down, landing hard on his back, the breath driven from his lungs in one brute punch.

Steps thundered. He rolled aside to avoid being crushed underfoot. Then he shoved himself upright, gripping his wand, and cast a Shield Charm in time to block some careening Knockback Jinx — Colin Creevey bobbed under his arm, shouted “Expelliarmus!” and with an unfortunately flawless form, ended up ripping a wand from some Slytherin seventh year's hand; Draco was mildly impressed with the quarter of his brain that wasn't furious — Hermione was nowhere to be found, nor Harry nor Ron, buried as they were in the fighting.

"Enough!"

A roll of petrification swept over the crowd. Bodies stilled like they had been cast in stone; limbs knit together in abortive wrestling matches were laid still, like the casts of ancient Pompeii, a whole landscape of childish brutality turned to a kind of grotesque oil painting.

Umbridge lowered her wand while it was still glowing. She lowered her mouth to the microphone.

"The match is canceled. Both teams are suspended until further notice. The Gryffindor team will report to my office this evening for detention. The Slytherin team will report tomorrow. You may all leave."

The spell broke. The crowd dropped, and students went tumbling to the ground as their momentum resumed itself. An outcry went up to complain of the decision — but now patrolmen came hurrying down from the doors, and students dissipated in haste, squawking here and there where a patrolman's arm wrenched them apart.

"You may all leave!" cried Umbridge. "Some of you will be retained for discipline at the discretion of the patrolmen. The rest of you will be escorted back to your dorms, where you will remain for the rest of the day! Thank you for your cooperation! Good day!"

They filed out, marched in quick-moving streams up the aisles. The patrolmen stood watch by the doors, their wands out and glowing.

He was full of a nauseous, oily outrage, one made unendurable by the mere fact that he hadn't deserved it. He had kept his distance. And yet his back still ached with a depth that he knew would bring black bruises up his shoulders tomorrow, no less bruised for his restraint, and its ache suffused him with a directionless anger — because if he was going to be punished anyway, he at least should have gotten a few curses in for it. He could have jinxed Crabbe on his back, or treated him to a second version of the Boiling Curse he'd given Warrington; if it didn't make any bloody difference, then he might as well indulge the pit of white anger at the bottom of his stomach, because it was going to eat him one way or another.

The Gryffindor team was hurried off the pitch by patrolmen. Efforts at conversation received sharp censure, so they walked in silence. In the Entrance Hall, the castle was dim and silent, marked only by the echo of their footsteps. Fred came over and silently slung his arm around Ron's shoulders. George slapped his back. Katie leaned her head on Angelina's shoulder.

They climbed the stairs to the Pink Lady with a somber dignity, like returning soldiers, only the war had been fruitless, and they hadn't even won.

"Boys? Draco? Harry?"

Footsteps echoed on the stairs. Hermione came flying around the banister. When she saw them, she buckled in relief. "Oh," she cried, "Harry — Ron, thank God— I couldn't, I thought — where's — Draco!"

Alarmed at the urgency of his name on her lips, he turned, and just in time: she raced up the last flight of stairs and leapt on him.

He caught her, and let out a strangled noise as she wrapped herself tightly around his chest. He had to hold her up to prevent both of them falling down a flight of stairs.

She put her head between his collarbones and breathed, deeply, as if she was filling her lungs for the first time in years. He took the chance to give her a once-over: she seemed unscathed, save the mud on her cheeks and the wind in her hair.

“Hello, there,” he said, and his voice was low. “Did something happen to me that I should know about?”

“I saw you fall into the stands—”

“‘Fall,’ nothing. It was a calibrated midair dismount. Look it up.”

She gave a strangled laugh. “Don’t even try. I didn’t know what happened — you could’ve broken your neck and been trampled, or shattered your ribs and punctured a lung, or something else, I don’t know, everything was a mess. I just couldn’t see you. Sorry. It all sounds silly now.”

“Not to discourage you from the fawning, and the affection, and the whatnot,” he said, “because it’s obviously quite appropriate, and I deserve it; but it’s been my personal experience that I’m extremely hard to kill.”

She gave a huffy laugh, and her breath was hot and shivery on his neck.

“You deserve something,” she muttered, and before he had time to wrestle his thoughts back from the gutter they’d gleefully vaulted into, she had unlatched from him, and was wrestling Harry and Ron into a squirming three-way affair. “Don’t get me started on you two. Ron, what were you thinking, jumping off your broomstick, it’s good luck you didn’t break your back. Daphne screamed herself hoarse, and I expect when she sees you she’s going to do it again, look forward to that — Snape took her to his office — I saw Umbridge talking to him on the way in — and you, Harry, you’re lucky McGonagall covered for you; she said she saw you get hit before you jumped into the stands, which is, I’m pretty sure, a lie— oh, my God. All of you are mad. I hate quidditch.”

She breathed raggedly.

Draco touched her back to steady her. When she didn’t pull away, he kept his hand there, lingering.

“Alright, there.”

Her hair brushed the tips of his fingers. The contact was a tether to the world of the safe and the real. It drew down his pulse to a comfortable rhythm. Calm sank through his body like it flowed from his fingertips.

He spread his fingers along the small of her back. She gave a little twitch, something less than a shudder, more than a sigh. Her shoulders sank.

“It’s alright,” she said, and her voice was oddly calm. “It’ll be alright. It will. You’ll see.”

“Yeah?” said Harry tiredly. “Hope you’re right, then.”

She held out her hand, and he took it. Ron put his arm around Harry’s shoulder and ruffled his hair, almost violently. There was a moment — a not terrible moment — where it was the four of them in an unbroken chain on the staircase, and if they could have ten good minutes of it, then the rest of the day would be very nearly endurable.

Then there were voices in the hallway, and more students came around the banister. One of them was Pansy.

“What are you doing here?” Angelina called guardedly. “Students were sent back to their dorms.”

“Is the Tower so crowded you’re down to sleeping on the stairs? Don’t bother retorting, I don’t care. I’m meant to cart you all to Umbridge’s office.”

“They already know they have detention,” snapped Hermione. “Give them a minute to change out of their uniforms, at least.”

Pansy smiled with teeth, a thorny expression. “If she wanted you to have a minute, I think she would’ve said so,” she said sweetly. “And I don’t remember you being on the team, Granger.”

“I’m—”

“Astonishingly, I still don’t care. Johnson, gather your people. Umbridge made it clear that she’ll hold captains personally responsible for tardiness.”

“Understood,” gritted out Angelina.

A hand appeared on Pansy’s shoulder, and another student emerged from the stairwell. It was Theo.

“She’d like to see us,” he murmured to Pansy, with a brief, cold glance at Draco. “Five minutes.”

“What? Now? It can’t wait?”

“It could, but it shouldn’t.”

“Lost me at could, Teddy.”

“It’s about the thing.”

“The thing? Or the Thing?”

“The other thing.”

They shared a brief flurry of gestures and frowns.

“God!” Pansy burst out. “Have it your way. Five minutes, but tell her I need to piss first.”

“That’s a funny joke.”

“So is the bladder infection I’m going to name after you.”

Theo’s lip twitched. He squeezed Pansy’s shoulder — darted a wholly uncharacteristic kiss on the back of her head — and slipped away without a word to anyone else.

“Rat-faced bastard,” muttered Fred. “Should’ve let him fall and snap his neck in fifth year.”

“Woulda, coulda, shoulda,” said Angelina darkly. “C’mon.”

As they moved down the stairs, Hermione’s hand darted out and caught Draco’s sleeve. He turned, and found her face drawn, her knuckles tight on his cuff.

“Be careful,” she said, too quietly for anyone else to hear, and spoke quickly. “If she gives you lines, write with your offhand, so it doesn’t hurt your right; and don’t press hard, it draws more blood; and if Harry gets angry then do something to shut him up, you know how he gets; same with Ron; and say as little as possible, if she asks you anything; and—”

“Granger, I know.”

“—and come straight back to me, when you’re finished,” she said, still gripping his sleeve. She was so pale that light might very well pass through her. “I have aloe, and Dittany, and Blood-Replenishing Potion. And plasters. And I’ll ask the house-elves to bring some food up. But come right back. I’ll wait in the common room.”

“We’ll be late.”

“I don’t care. I’ll wait for you.”

It was too much; if she kept talking in that high, tight voice, as if she were going to winnow away the moment they all left, he wouldn’t go at all.

He drew a gentle pressure on his cuff, and she released it, leaving her hand curled fretfully in midair. When he took a step back, she half-stepped forward, and snatched his wrist back. Her wand whispered out of its sheath and she tapped his right hand, quickly. A rush of cold tingles flowed up the skin of his hand, and he flexed his fingers, suppressing a wince.

“What—?”

“Numbing Charm,” she murmured.

His throat tightened; she avoided his searching look.

She gripped his hand with a tight, bruising press, and then let it go, tucking her wand away. She stepped back and took a short breath, lifting her eyes; they were dark and intense, and her mouth was set in a fierce line.

“Well, go on,” she said imperiously. “It’s only a detention. You’ve had them before.”

It was like her voice still echoed in the shadowy atrium of the stairwell: Come back. The tone lingered. It had been high-pitched and unlike her usual orders, which never showed so much uncertainty, or so much fear.

“Don’t worry,” he said, senselessly, because it sounded like she needed it. She made a little sound of disbelief. “I’m sure we’ll manage without you for an hour, somehow.”

“Hope springs eternal,” she whispered, and when he turned away, the ghostly, fretful smile was still plastered on her face.

The sun was near to setting when they reached the Defense classroom. A harsh lamp was suspended over each desk, like a soldier’s formation of miniature suns.

The corporal of this ghastly light assembly was Umbridge, stationed at the front of the room in a pink jumper and shimmery lilac cloak.

One of the patrolmen stood behind her. In her face there was nothing, not even the usual simper or smile of malice that she offered when given the opportunity to introduce discipline. For once, she made no effort to smile at the sight of them.

“You are late. Fifty points from Gryffindor.”

Angelina choked. “We aren’t—”

“You are.”

“You said you wanted us here at four, and here we are, it’s three fifty-seven—”

“You are contradicting a teacher. Another fifty points.”

Angelina’s jaw dropped. The team’s loud protests cut off, replaced by a reverie of shock and silent loathing.

“You will find,” said Umbridge, “that in this room, you are late if I say you are late. It is four o’clock when I say it is four o’clock. And when I tell you something, you will do as I say.”

Her voice rattled the windows. Katie trembled.

“Sit down,” she said.

Angelina took a deep breath. She led the team down the aisles and took her seat at the front of the room.

“No,” said Umbridge suddenly. She pointed at another desk. “That one.”

Angelina stopped, halfway into her seat, and looked up at her incredulously. “Is there something wrong with this one?”

“You will not speak unless I tell you to speak. You will sit there.” She pointed, again, at the desk.

Slowly, Angelina moved. She had no sooner settled down in the other desk when Umbridge spoke up again.

“No. Sit at that one.” She pointed at another desk on the other end of the row.

Angelina exhaled shortly. “You just told me to sit here.”

“You are refusing a teacher’s order. Fifty points from Gryffindor.”

Fred opened his mouth, and George slapped his hand over it, expression grim. Umbridge watched the movement, her eyes flickering with chill amusement.

“Professor,” said Katie hoarsely, “please — what’s the point—”

“You will not speak unless I tell you to speak.” She pointed. “Miss Johnson. Move.”

Angelina closed her eyes. Three long seconds passed. Then she got up and walked over to the indicated desk.

“Good,” said Umbridge softly. “You see? Is it so very hard, Miss Johnson, to do what I ask of you? In silence?”

Angelina shook her head at the desk. Harry was shaking. Ron put his hand on his shoulder.

“You may say ‘No, Professor Umbridge.’”

“No, Professor Umbridge.”

“Good girl,” said Umbridge. She gestured to the rest of them. “You may take your seats. You will not need to speak. You will find all of this very easy,” she added, gently, “if you can simply learn the lesson that it has taken Miss Johnson so… very… long… to commit to mind.”

They filed in. Umbridge strolled down the row, examining each of them in turn. As she passed, she placed a quill on each desk. Each quill was the size and shape of an eagle feather, but studded with a long, serrated black nib. It reminded him of a steak knife.

On her way past, she reached out and pinched Katie's lip piercing, twisting it until Katie gasped. "You will remove this," she said softly, and kept walking.

When she reached Ron, she paused.

"What time is it, Mr. Weasley?"

Ron slouched.

"Bout four."

"What was that? Speak up."

"I said it's about four."

"No," said Umbridge calmly. "An understandable mistake, Mr. Weasley. But no. It is seven o'clock in the morning."

Ron wrinkled his nose. "The clock's just there," he said. "You can check—"

"I say it is seven in the morning."

"I… alright."

"Now I will ask you again," she said. "What time is it?"

"I mean, I dunno what you want me to say," said Ron, aggravated, "because obviously you think it's seven, but it's four, the clock's right th—"

"You are lying. Fifty points from Gryffindor."

“But it’s not, you’re mad, it’s r—”

She hit him.

Ron’s cheek snapped to the side, with a wheeze of shock. Fred leapt to his feet, and it took Katie and George combined to wrestle him back down, both of them hissing frantically.

“You are a liar,” she said sadly. “It is not a hard lesson I am trying to teach you, Mr. Weasley, and it makes me sad that you cannot understand it. I am afraid that even the best educations are wasted on those who do not want to learn. Isn’t that right, Mr. Potter?”

Ron gaped. She walked past him, to Harry’s desk, and then leaned down on her knees, staring into his eyes.

“Mr. Potter,” she whispered, “can you tell me what time it is?”

Harry stared at her, stone-faced, and said nothing.

“I would like you to tell me what time it is.”

Harry said nothing. Draco’s chest constricted.

Umbridge slowly placed one of the red quills on his desk. She patted it, almost tenderly, and slid it towards him.

“Pick it up,” she whispered.

“It’s seven o’clock,” said Draco quietly.

Umbridge straightened up, gazing at him. A beatific smile stretched her cheeks open.

“Isn’t it?” he added, ignoring the way Harry had turned his head to stare.

“Thank you, Mr. Malfoy,” she said quietly. “Yes, it is.”

And she retreated from his desk without setting down a quill.

“Lines,” she called. “I want you to write ‘It is seven o’clock in the morning,’ at least one hundred times each; and Mr. Potter will write it two hundred times, since he seems confused.”

She moved over to her office door and opened it. His teammates raised their quills grimly to the parchment before them, and with a chorus of winces and gasps, eked out the first painful scratches of their lines. Draco watched with a stomach in revolt as blood bubbled and welled from Harry’s right hand, spilling down Ron’s wrist, laced the knuckles of Fred’s left fist. Katie let out a grunt of badly muffled pain.

And he knew what the difference was. He knew, because he had lived with them for five years, what they had in common. He knew that Katie’s father owned a department store in muggle London, and Angelina’s parents were solicitors, and he knew why. And because he had lived with them for five years, he also knew why it felt like a knife slowly performing an open biopsy on his gut, to sit there and be the only man on the line free of scars.

There wasn’t dignity in it. He was no glutton for pain, but there was something disgusting about being the only man to walk out with a clean hand. He was tough as any of them. He could take his goddamn stripes.

He looked down at his own empty desk. Then back down the row of bloody hands.

“Professor.”

“Yes, Mr. Malfoy?”

Harry paused, eyeing him from his periphery.

“Draco,” Ron muttered. “It’s fine. Don’t—”

He closed his eyes, and prepared himself for regret.

“You haven’t given me a quill,” he said.

Umbridge paused, and then dimpled at him from the door.

“Oh, Mr. Malfoy,” she said kindly. “You are sweet to remind me. But I only have six quills to supply. You will have to use your own! I should think you can afford them.”

Fred let out a snort of laughter.

“...I see.”

She inclined her head. “Of course, if you don’t happen to have one, you may come into my office, and we’ll see if I can’t find a spare.”

“That won’t—”

“Come,” she called, and slipped behind the door. Draco slowly pushed back his chair and stood up.

“Oi. Draco.”

It was Ron. He had paused in his scratching, and the blood had slicked his knuckles red, giving his solemn stare a decidedly unnerving air.

“If something happens,” he muttered, nodding at the door, “just shout.”

Draco nodded shortly, and went into the office.

If one assembled a decorating committee of several artistically committed six-year-olds and a grandmother, they might have come up with something slightly less elaborate than Umbridge’s office. Doilies and handspun tea cozies abounded in frankly tasteless abundance, while taffy-pink drapes and a fluffy magenta carpet leant the whole room a kind of maddeningly monochromatic aesthetic that gave an impression of a funhouse. Extravagantly expensive sets of china and satin pillowcases flourished on bejeweled sideboards and, most appallingly, a zebra-print chesterfield. It would have given Narcissa seizures.

“Why, sit down,” she said, easing herself into a plush purple armchair. “I’ve been on my feet all day. These heels!” She laughed. “The things women put up with!”

He gave her an odd look. She blinked inquiringly at him.

“You seem confused, Mr. Malfoy.”

“I thought we were finding a quill.”

“Oh.” She grimaced and leaned down to wriggle out of her heel. “No. I do apologize for the to-do, but you understand; I must have discipline, and if a child doesn’t have it drilled in early, it has to be whipped in later by force. It’s not their fault, the poor dears, they simply can’t be asked to understand. Hence—” She gestured, imitating a quill. “The lesson.”

“To understand what?”

She giggled. “Such a wit! Just like your mother. I was a few years ahead of Lady Malfoy — I watched her Sorting. I’m sorry I couldn’t make it to the wedding, you know, but my friends who went said all the best things.” She smiled, and Summoned a tea set from the cupboard. “Libation, Mr. Malfoy? It’s herbal.”

“No. Thank you.”

“Have some anyway.”

He leaned back in his chair, twisting his signet ring. Her gaze snagged on it, and lingered while she poured.

She settled back in her chair, cradling her cup.

“So,” she said. “We’ve been bad, haven’t we?”

He did not answer that, and refused to.

“Your association with Mr. Potter,” she clarified, pleasantly. “It’s regrettable.”

He still hadn’t heard a question, so he said nothing.

“I must say, I was surprised to hear that someone of your breeding had fallen in with him,” she added. “Rita Skeeter seemed convinced that you were terribly cozy. Not that I blame you. It must have been incredibly lonely, being in Gryffindor by yourself for all those years. Often the most dangerous people are terribly charismatic.”

Harry was charismatic. Specifically, Harry had the charisma of a large dog that believed it was a Bichon; i.e., endearing, indeliberate, and patently un-manipulative.

“Potter and I have a history,” he said, guarded.

“Indeed. And I do not begrudge you the friendships of your past. But you must understand that Mr. Potter is leading you down a dangerous path,” she said, with sincere concern tightening her face. “Ask yourself: how often have you found yourself in harm’s way for him? How much have you suffered? And do you expect, honestly, that it will stop?”

“I don’t take your meaning.”

She leaned on the desk. “I mean that Harry Potter is a dangerous boy,” she said. It was the most serious he had ever seen her; there was no dimpling, no simpering, no tiny coughs. “He is positioning himself against the Wizarding government. He and Albus Dumbledore are in open defiance of the Minister. If you stand at his side for much longer, you will make yourself a suspect character in the eyes of your government, and you — with deepest respect, Mr.

Malfoy — have not cultivated the allies you would require to endure that status comfortably."

"I'm not a political figure. I'm a student."

"That's not something you really get to choose," she said indulgently. "Power changes what you are. Lord Malfoy is not Draco Malfoy, if you can understand what I mean… even though you may be both at once. Harry Potter is not the Chosen One, but we must treat with both persons in the same individual… Potter understands this, I think. It's why he's attempted to collect you."

Suggesting that Harry Potter had dedicated any thought to the nature and origin of power was easily the funniest possible way of revealing that she knew nothing about him.

"To collect me?"

"Yes. You lend him legitimacy; it bespeaks his worth to have the scion of a noble family at his side. Two noble families, no less! I myself doubted that Skeeter's critical bent was well-founded, on the grounds that she had named you as his associate! Your name tells people who do not know him what his name means."

"My name hasn't been terribly useful for my purposes," he said curtly. "And it's not done much for his, either."

"Of course not, my dear." She rested her chin in her hand, smiling. "Because you haven't laid claim to its greatest tools! The power of a title — and I thought I would be the last person to explain this to you — lies not in what you own, but whom you own."

"The people I own?"

"A figure of speech. Your 'people.' Your connections. Your friends. As it were."

"As it were," he repeated.

“Mm. Your name will hold certain doors open to you for as long as you live. But they are not ones that Potter can follow you through.”

She added, slyly: “Would you like me to show you where they are?”

He tapped his fingers on the desk. He wondered how many lines the others had done yet.

He wondered how she got the bloodstains out of the wood.

He thought about Hermione’s fluttering bandage — about her sitting in that classroom, by herself, under the cruel lamplight — and his unease crystallized into something hard and cold. His fingers stilled.

“Why Hogwarts?” he said. “Of all positions. Do you have a passion for teaching?”

His tone seemed to indicate what he thought of that answer, because her eyes narrowed slightly.

“Education is a means to an end,” she said simply. “I do all I do knowing that it is for the betterment of young people. My own happiness… I am quite used to putting second for the needs of others.”

“So you don’t like it, then.”

“Who would?” she said mildly. “You see what I deal with in that classroom. If you seek gratification from your career, I urge you, do not work with children.”

“But you took a post that required you to do it.”

She sighed. “To have influence is to have enemies,” she said. “I was assigned to the Bureau of Education. Between you and me, there are some at the Ministry who sought to keep me away from London.”

“Shacklebolt?”

Her lip curled. “I bear no love for Kingsley,” she said, “but the members of the Wizengamot are ultimately quite irrelevant to the real work of the Ministry. Elections come, elections go; but the civil service endures. No. My appointment might best be understood as punishment for Lord Nott’s embarrassment and scandal last year… Lord Selwyn and Archibald Rosier have tried to strip Albert of his staunchest allies, and populate his cabinet with feckless, aging fools. If it weren’t for Rufus — auror friend of mine, well-liked in the Wizengamot, my own choice for head of Law Enforcement if something can be done about Thicknesse — I would have been posted somewhere even further beneath my qualifications. At least here, I can keep an eye on Dumbledore.”

“You make it all sound quite turbulent.”

“Oh, transitions tend to be. I don’t bother about it too terribly much; heel-dragging is the mark of the small-minded. It's a sad thing, but so many people are so very small, Mr. Malfoy. And they need to be ruled.” She drew a picture frame from a drawer and placed it in front of him. “But you know that already.”

It was a pair of very young people, no more than eighteen or nineteen: one, a young man, his beard shorter, his cheeks pimpled, but for all that, no less recognizable as Albert Runcorn. The other had a mousy brown bowl of hair and an awkward, eager grin, sparkling with a guileless excitement that he had never seen once in the face of the woman she’d become.

They were pressed cheek to cheek. They held up a pair of Ministry passes: Umbridge, a student intern for the DMLE, and Runcorn, a legislative aide in the Wizengamot.

The wind piped through the windows, rattling them, and a dull splatter of afternoon rain glazed the pane. Across the grounds, trees knelt under the arm of the wind, crowned by the downpour, which left the eaves gurgling deeply like a quartet of bullfrogs. A lark fluttered to the window and alighted on the sill, warbling sadly in the rain.

“Do you have another one of those quills?” he said abruptly. “I’d like to take a look at one.”

“Perhaps a career in entrepreneurship, instead of politics,” she said indulgently, but she went to a drawer by the bureau. Inside, he glimpsed a wide bed of dark red feathers.

She removed one and held it out. He took it carefully and rotated it in the light.

“They’re lovely,” he said, and it wasn’t a lie. The tip fused seamlessly into the dark red spine of the quill, which sprouted a feather like a red plume, light at the edges, dark at the heart. Its tip was crooked, and when he drew his thumb across it, one of the edges caught and dragged the skin, leaving a faint white line.

“They’re horrid,” said Umbridge tonelessly. She shut the drawer and locked it with a tiny key. “Brutal things. But necessary. If a lesson cannot be learned easily, it will be taught hard.”

He flipped the quill over, testing the heft.

It was a brutish enchantment, more cruel than cunning. It took after its creator, in that sense. In fact, the charm oughtn’t even require any pain; it was a riff on the Everfull Inkwell charm, routed from the nearest vein, but clunkier, opening up the scars in the shape of the words being written — he could already think of ways to do it better, cleaner, and that was without having the blueprint in front of him.

He wondered what he could make them do, given enough time. He wondered what he could make them do to her.

He could see Hermione’s hand split open, a weeping mess of blood and skin, and thought of a hundred things that weren’t half ugly enough.

“That’s quite enough lecturing for one night,” she announced. “You may return to write your lines. Try… ‘I will conduct myself according to my station.' Let's say… fifty times. I have to give you something, after all. How's that? Seem fair?"

He froze. He lifted the Sanguine Quill, questioning.

"No! No, gracious dear, just the normal ones," she said, laughing. "To think what your blood is worth — I daresay it's cheaper to write in gold."

She leaned over the table and extended her hand. "Yes, let's say fifty," she said, "and that the next time we speak to each other, you will have thought carefully about whether someone who loves you would ask you to endure what Mr. Potter does."

"You're letting me off easily."

"They really have treated you abhorrently, Mr. Malfoy, if it surprises you," she said mildly. "Friends should make each other's lives easier. You may not believe it, because of the person I suppose you think I am — who I must be, because of my station — Dolores is not always Professor Umbridge, you see. But I am, and have always tried to be, a very good friend."

He lowered the Sanguine Quill to the table.

"Say you understand," she repeated.

"I do."

With a nauseated reluctance, he grazed her hand. As they parted, her fingers slipped along his, lingering on his ring.

On his way out, he wiped his hand discreetly on his shirtfront.

-Don't have many notes today because The Fuckening is afoot in my life at the mo and it's all I have in me to get this up on time. But I love you, and I hope you're well. My heart is in your hands, and you take such great care of it. I hope that you set your playlist on random shuffle and you get all the songs you need for the vibe you're at, in exactly the right order.

-Next chapter will be up in a week if the demons don't get me, wish me luck; title: "The Night Patrol."

-In which our favorite prefects will do what prefects do, and patrol. At night. Together.

The Night Patrol

Chapter 67: The Night Patrol

Educational Decree Number Thirty-Six. All quidditch teams are disbanded, pending approval from the Hogwarts Special Inquisitor.

Angelina almost resigned her post from rage, but kept it when Fred swore that he would seize the captaincy and force everyone to play nude if she abdicated. Slytherin, Ravenclaw, and Hufflepuff were reinstated immediately; the Gryffindor application was “pending” every time Angelina went to ask.

Educational Decree Number Forty-Two. Students found in violation of school rules will be sent directly to the Hogwarts Special Inquisitor for appropriate disciplinary procedures.

Lee Jordan was almost expelled for dangling Slytherin second-years in the rafters; Goyle was sent to the Hospital Wing for quadruple stomach ulcers after eating something Fred gave him; Ron had to get four stitches in his eyebrow after picking a fistfight with Graham Montague, which Draco had to break up, nonplussed, with a Relashio, a Shield Charm, and a handful of red hair.

Educational Decree Number Fifty-One. Students failing to comply with appropriate norms of dress for their age and sex will be disciplined at the discretion of their Head of House and the Hogwarts Special Inquisitor.

Katie lost forty points from Umbridge each day she refused to take off her piercings, and far from being cowed, she and Seamus made a point of giving themselves new ones every night. Draco saw them conspiring in the common room before breakfast, boiling safety pins with the grim solemnity of soldiers preparing war paint.

Hermione, who usually prosecuted any violations of dress code with vigor, feigned blindness to this, and slipped a Sanitizing Charm behind her back at them.

Educational Decree Number Fifty-Five. Students will not linger in the hallways between classrooms unless accompanied by a prefect.

Cedric spent his passing periods leading groups of students to and fro from the library, his shoulders square, a brittle set to his jaw. His Head Boy badge gleamed on his chest, bright and clean and never more useless than when Filch confiscated Padma's pet weasel, which was carried off, squeaking helplessly, to wherever non-regulation pets went, while Padma sobbed into Ernie Macmillan's shirt.

Educational Decree Number Fifty-Six. Students will not use magic in the hallways under any circumstances.

Graham Montague kicked Justin Finch-Fletchley down a flight of stairs, and Colin Creevey was given a week of detentions for Stunning him in retaliation. Draco and Ron had to wrestle Harry away from Umbridge as he shouted himself hoarse, racking up a two-hundred point demerit and a month's detentions of his own— but only they knew that Harry had taught Colin that spell.

The next day, both Justin and Susan Bones approached Draco, privately and separately, to ask about dark curses. When he inquired as to where they came by the impression that he knew any, they seemed suitably embarrassed, muttering something about names and reputations and how fire was fought, on occasion, with flames.

From pity and amusement both, he taught Susan the jinx for boils he'd used on Cassius Warrington. She picked it up inside an hour, which was far quicker than he'd have expected from anyone under the auspices of Helga Hufflepuff. When she made the test rat erupt in tiny black bubbles, and he experienced a difficult flicker of emotion.

“How’s your aunt these days?” he said.

Susan lowered her wand, grinning. “Oh,” she said, “she’s fucking furious.”

Educational Decree Number Fifty-Eight. Students will not raise their voices in the hallways above an appropriate level.

Crowded hallways were silent but for the shuffle of footsteps and the furtive susurrus of whispers. George Weasley came back one night with hands so caked in blood it soaked his sleeves, his face drawn. Ginny screamed and ran to him, while Hermione swore and dove for her muggle sewing kit.

“You have to close your mind,” Narcissa sighed, later that night. “Stop imagining what I say. Do you understand? See nothing. Think of nothing. Feel nothing.”

“You don’t think I’d like to?” Harry spat, hauling himself off the floor. “You think it’s fun, do you, being in my head?”

“Draco has managed to progress admirably since our last session.”

“Yeah, well, maybe he can be the Chosen One for a while, and give me time to catch up!”

Draco folded his arms and lowered his head.

Harry swiped at his forehead with the back of his hand and barked: “Fine. Let’s go again.”

Narcissa eyed him up and down. “If you require a moment to compose yourself—”

“Death Eaters wouldn’t give me a moment, right?” His tone was edged. He shook out his arms and squared his shoulders, like he was about to duel her. “Again. Hit me. Hard as you can.”

She pursed her lips. “Potter, this is not supposed to be easy.”

“Story of my life. Cast the stupid spell, would you? I’ve still got a detention after this.”

She had him on the floor in two minutes, but as he lay groaning, she offered: “Better.”

Educational Decree Number Fifty-Nine. Students will not purchase or possess non-regulation periodicals, papers, publications, or written content that is untruthful or inappropriate for children.

The Daily Prophet printed page after page about unrest in the north. The circles under Harry’s eyes darkened to the shade of a midwinter sky. At night Draco heard him tossing restlessly in bed.

The only time anyone saw him smile was in the Room of Requirement.

Educational Decree Number Sixty. Student groups of four or more persons will not assemble outside of common spaces without the permission of the Hogwarts Special Enquirer.

And still— and still.

In the third stall of the first-story boys’ bathroom, dropping a sickle on the floor would cause the disembodied hand of Seamus Finnigan or Dean Thomas to appear with a small firecracker.

Fred and George passed out small kits of emetic candies that, if gulped down in an emergency, could reliably get you out of class. In the back of the library, Romilda Vane and Parvati Patil pulled crumpled-up editions of The Quibbler and the Daily Looking-Glass out of their shirtfronts and pressed them between the pages of romance novels. Ernie Macmillan had a habit of leaving his answers to the week’s Defense Against the Dark Arts homework lying out on the Ravenclaw table while he went to the loo, a fact that he announced, loudly and with gusto, so that aspiring plagiarists might be “well warned” not to “trifle with anyone’s academic integrity” while he wasn’t looking. Shouting the name Weasley in a scuffle brought the nearest one hurtling over, and if it was Ginny, you'd probably win. Sometimes just shouting Weasley was enough to make the other bloke run away.

Draco spent Defense Against the Dark Arts making notes for improvements on a Blood-Replenishing Potion, and when he swept out of the classroom, he felt the eyes of a hallway settle on the back of his head. He shook it off, kept moving. Hermione put her hand on his wrist, and he let her keep it there. Threw a sneer at anyone who tried to stare.

It was Lavender Brown, of all people, who had the idea of offering topical glamours to make it look like the back of one's hand was scarred. The fashion caught on quickly in the Tower, spread through the Defense Club to Ravenclaw and Hufflepuff, and the flash of a wounded hand in the hallway became a sort of allegiant gesture, a symbol of esteem and fury.

"I actually thought it was tacky," said Hermione, when Padma Patil subtly twitched up her sleeve at them on the way to Transfiguration. "But if everyone's got them, it doesn't feel shameful. And you can see how many people…" She trailed off as Michael Goldstein passed by, flexing his hand. "I think Lavender's done something really clever."

"Does she get to know that?"

"Of course not."

He held the door for her, and touched the small of her back as she moved through. She brushed a piece of dust from his shoulder. Neither of them looked at each other.

It was homeostasis, of a sort. Tiny incidents of contact offered costless comfort, of the sort that was in none too great supply, and at no greater cost than a willingness to ignore what was special about it; he was allowed to touch her in stairwells and doorways, and she was allowed to fix his prefect's badge and straighten his tie, and if no one said what it meant, then it didn't have to mean anything at all.

Of course, Harry and Ron didn't take her elbow while checking a corner; certainly no one else was at liberty to reach out and straighten his badge, at least if they wanted to keep the hand that did it. But in the Gryffindor common room, while Harry brooded in the corner, and Ron sat in a four-headed huddle over Arthur's latest letter, there was no one to notice or find it unusual if Hermione inhaled sharply, as if remembering something — twitched — and put her hand on his knee. He turned a page of his book and silently allowed her to keep it there.

From trial and error, contact with Hermione was prolonged if he allowed her to believe he hadn't noticed.

On a Saturday morning in early December, fires burned in towering grates around the Room of Requirement, shedding warm coats of gold on lacquered floors. Diamond chandeliers cast buttery light on a promenade of children firing Knockback Jinxes and Snare Hexes at each other, while a few older students experimented with variations on Incarcerous. Harry had summoned the Room, this time, which meant it resembled less a cathedral than a classroom — the Transfiguration classroom, in fact, though the resemblance was too faint to be intentional.

Draco flicked up Colin Creevey's wand grip, shoved Dean's arm onto the proper line, and strolled up the aisle, ignoring the chorus of greetings sent in his direction.

Hermione and Daphne circled each other on a piste. Hermione hesitated, lurching on her front foot, and then leapt forward and lashed a glittering Expelliarmus from her wand, which Daphne skittered back and let splash harmlessly on the floor. She replied with a soft, weak Trip Jinx that Hermione effortlessly deflected from a Shield. Hermione bit her lip, eyes skittering over Daphne's guard, and then quickly dropped her Shield, fired a white dart over its edge, and reactivated the Shield before Daphne could deflect. Her sleeves were rucked up, and her hair was twisted high in a red resin clasp, spilling in a corona around her flushed temples.

“You’re hesitating.”

Hermione jumped.

“How long have you been lurking around?”

“Long enough to know you’re hesitating.” He shed his robe with a casual roll of his shoulders. “You’ve got an excellent Shield Charm and you know it, but sooner or later, you’ve got to try to land a hit.”

“I made attempts.”

“And barely gave them a chance. You’ve hardly cast a spell before the shield’s back up. You’re not pressing the attack, because you’re already thinking about how you’re going to get back behind your defense.”

“I don’t want to hurt her.”

“With a Trip Jinx?” he said, amused. “Even Greengrass isn’t quite so feeble as that. Nearly, but not quite.”

“I resent that!”

“I can only hope that’ll lead you to do something about it,” he called. To Hermione: “Come here.”

Warily, she did — crossing the piste with short, delicate steps to stand in front of him. He eyed her up and down, taking in her guard — lingering, harmlessly, on the place where her tie had slipped loose, and the top button of her shirt hung in a single concession to exertion, revealing a soft triangle of skin at her throat — he cast the image into a familiar and increasingly crowded quadrant of his brain — and he stepped forward, then thought of something.

“Greengrass. Go bother Abbott. She needs a sparring partner.”

“Certainly,” Daphne murmured.

He gave her a flat look, and Hermione twisted around to glare over her shoulder, but Daphne smiled guilelessly and sashayed off, her wand dangling idly from her fingertips.

“Daphne,” called Hermione, flushed. “It isn’t — oh, what did you do that for?”

“What? Did you want her to watch?”

“Watch what? Did you have something in mind she oughtn’t see?”

“No, but you don’t like to be corrected, and I didn’t think you’d enjoy a spectator when I did.”

She opened her mouth, paused, and then closed it. Her eyes softened in a dark, shiny way, but she blinked it was gone. “That’s — true,” she said, with halting gratitude. “I wouldn’t. Only she seems to have the wrong impression.”

“Well, let her have it, then.” He ignored the little intake of breath she gave when he stepped closer. “It won’t be the only thing she’s wrong about.”

There wasn’t a meaning in it, nor in the way she startled when he lifted his hand. The corner of his mouth lifted.

“Steady on.” He took her shoulder and pressed his foot against hers, driving it back, until she slipped almost involuntarily into the duelist’s stance. “That’s better. Start there.”

She complied. “I won’t have time to fix my footwork if someone’s shooting curses at me.”

“And you won’t land a curse back if you don’t. Move your offhand— here.” He caught her wrist and twisted it around to rest behind her left hip, fingers lightly curled. Her chin sprang up, and he found himself caught in a frozen stare, her mouth parted and inexplicably wordless.

She cleared her throat. He withdrew his hand.

“Point your front foot forward. Wand-arm out front.”

Her lips closed, and she pressed them together. Slowly, she extended her arm and held it with the tip high, arm arrowed unnaturally straight. Her eyes flickered at the point and back to his face.

He cocked his head, calculating.

“Slacken your wrist.”

With an obliging little nod, she pronated it.

“No. Like this.”

He caught her wrist with his hand and twisted it, bringing her palm upwards. Her wand rotated into a grip she already knew perfectly well.

“Crook your elbow.” He took hers in hand and brought it lower, then drew it towards himself. “Extend it. Lean forward.”

“I am,” she said, though she wasn’t.

“Lean more.”

“I don’t know what you mean,” she said, after a moment.

He gave her a long, intense glance, which she returned evenly, her shoulders straight.

“Fine,” he said. He gave her elbow a sharp tug, and she jerked forward, almost stumbling against his chest, until she caught herself on his shoulder. When she dropped back onto her heels, he was standing inside her guard, her wand-arm held firmly in his hand — if they were dueling, her position would be horrendously dangerous, he could more or less do anything he wanted — but she had twisted her face up towards him, and her expression was a guarded, smug little thing, a veiled glint of satisfaction that glowed through an innocent stare like light through a screen.

A flare of heat broke down his neck.

“How does that feel?” he said quietly.

“This?”

“Mm-hm.”

Her tongue probed the inside of her cheek. The light in her eyes was capricious.

“Better.”

“You sense the difference?”

“If you say so,” she said, “Frankly, I still don’t see why it matters.”

He made an irritated tch. “It matters because it’s proper. And useful.”

“Oh, I suppose so.”

“I’m serious. If your guard isn’t set correctly, you’ll be caught wide open by the first duelist who knows his lines. Besides which, the stance keeps you balanced when you’re throwing jinxes, and it means you’re pointing your wand straight instead of whipping it around from the side, which improves accuracy and form. What are you looking at?”

“Hm?”

“Hello? Are you listening, or shall I save my breath?”

“That’s a good answer,” she said, without answering him. “I still think it’s silly. People in battle don’t stand ahead of you and wait their turn. And to your question, I was thinking about our waltzing lessons.”

“And is there a reason you found that more interesting than the man standing in front of you?”

“It reminded me. Dancing and dueling. They’re both a sort of game, aren’t they?”

“It would put me significantly at ease if you offered a pretense of taking this seriously.”

“Mm. Counteroffer: suppose you pretend I’m taking it seriously, and I pretend it’s serious.”

“Granger—”

“Malfoy.”

“I — don’t do that.”

“Sorry. Wide open.”

She smiled, and it was hopelessly sweet. Her mouth was a small round flourish of satisfaction. When she laughed, it was knowing, and shy, and he had a great difficulty not taking her by the collar and kissing her.

Whatever his expression did, her smile flagged, replaced by something more tentative, almost fearful. But she didn’t move.

He pivoted away from her sharply, because if he didn’t, he was going to do something incredibly stupid in a room full of people who were entirely too invested in his business. Already he noticed Parvati and Hannah Abbott hurrying to resume their practice match, badly disguising their previous postures of interest. Daphne, perched three deep in a bench with Lavender and Romilda Vane, flashed him a backwards glance of some freight.

“OI! Draco! Need advice.”

Ginny came trotting through the crowd, ducking stray spells here and there, her ruddy ponytail swinging jovially. Hermione stepped off the piste, slipping her wand into her sheath, and turned away to re-do her hair clasp. Draco rubbed his eyes, resenting the existence of most persons in the room, and possibly all.

“Question about the Blood-Boiling Curse,” she announced. “Can’t get it right for the life of me. I’ve been testing them out with Nev in the greenhouses, going after slugs and aphids, but they haven’t got a lot of blood to boil, so— sorry, are you two in a match?”

“No.”

“Not presently,” said Hermione, with a slight edge. “Is there a reason you’re interested in the Blood-Boiling Curse? It’s extraordinarily painful.”

“Yeah, and I’m not boiling a bloke’s blood because it’s fun, am I?”

“I mean that there are easier ways to debilitate people, and less painful ones.”

“Setting them on fire, for instance.”

“Shut up, Draco. Ginny, I’d recommend a Binding Spell.”

“Take it under advisement,” said Ginny easily. “What’re you two scheming about, then?”

“We do not ‘scheme.’”

Ginny ignored this, as she should. “Because the twins and I were thinking. We ought to do something to Slytherin. Something nasty. To get them back for what they said at the game.”

“We’re not retaliating,” Hermione said. “Slytherin House isn’t your enemy.”

“Yea? Count the Slytherins in this room.”

“One,” said Hermione fiercely. Ginny scoffed. “One, and don’t roll your eyes, she counts.”

“Yeah, she’s fine, but hasn’t got a lot of company.”

“There could be a hundred girls like Daphne in Slytherin.”

“I don’t think there are a hundred girls in Slytherin.”

“And certainly not like me,” said Daphne, ambling over on Neville’s arm. She used a handkerchief to daub beads of sweat from the line of her brow. “I’m a prize. What are we talking about?”

“Ginny wants to start a war,” Hermione said.

“Ginny wants to win one,” muttered Ginny, scuffing her shoe on a flagstone.

“Against Slytherin? Gracious. Not likely,” she said mildly. “I mean, down with the ship, of course. Rah, rah. But you’re not going to beat Teddy Nott with Expelliarmus and Knockback Jinxes, I’ll tell you that.”

“By which you mean what, exactly?” muttered Draco. The memory of Theo did nothing for his mood.

“Only that he learned how to duel from a Death Eater. Namely, his father. There’s a reason everyone in the dungeons respects him, it’s not just because of his Ministry connections,” she said plainly. “And Draco’s seen Pansy Parkinson use blood runes with his own eyes.”

Wind whistled in the eaves behind the frosted glass, and the light in the room seemed to change. She shifted her weight in the ensuing silence.

“What?” she said. “You knew all that already.”

“Thank you, Daphne,” said Ginny pleasantly.

Hermione rubbed her face. “I don’t know why you’re asking me,” she said tiredly. “It sounds like your mind’s made up, so why do you care?”

Ginny traded an uncertain glance with Neville.

“Reckoned we ought to check,” he offered. “You’re in charge, aren’t you? It was your idea.”

“That’s — partly true, but I’m not — I don’t give orders. I — we suggest things, we teach, but — I’m hardly a commanding officer.”

“That’s debatable,” said Daphne mildly. “Call it what you like. You do know there’s not a person in this room who wouldn’t do anything you asked of them.”

Her remark carried his attention to the room at large, instinctually: the high sweep of its vaulted stone ceilings, the light scintillating from the small diamonds of the windows, and the mad, frenetic medley of students trading spells under the auspices of both: Dean and Seamus having a spectacularly pyrotechnic exchange that was more fireworks than jinxes, cackling each; Padma Patil and Ernie Macmillan were crouched together, drawing a runic circle around a suit of armor; Fred and George sparred two-on-two with Lee Jordan and Cedric Diggory, of all people; Justin Finch-Fletchley was dangling Dennis Creevey from a table by his ankle, while Colin giggled and took pictures; Lavender and Parvati were crouched together over a cauldron of Blood-Replenishing Potion and a wizarding magazine, whispering noisily; and among it all there was a roar of conversation and laughter, a sound that bled together and fused into a great wavering note, as if despite including scores of very different voices, it was drawn up and down by a single current of breath.

Harry stood at the fore of the room, his arms folded, watching. Ron leaned with his arm on his shoulder; he shouted something to Fred and George, and their response made him laugh. A soft smile drew the tired folds of Harry's face, and he lifted his chin to shout back at them.

"I — doubt that — very much," said Hermione haltingly. "Everyone's here for Harry. And each other. I'm not any kind of reason, and I wouldn't expect anyone to follow me."

Daphne smiled.

"Wrong on at least one count, I think," she said. He narrowed his eyes at her, and she continued, guileless: "Harry's dreadfully dear, but if I thought we were counting on his brains to make it through, you wouldn't catch my dust trail out of here. If you ever consider resigning, let me know well in advance, so I can go beg for my room back in Slytherin."

The snows came down in a probing gray veil, and then all at once, overnight, in a blinding sweep of white. It was the time of year when Hagrid usually could be found dragging a giant Christmas tree out of the forest, or guiding the hippogriffs back into their paddock. But because Hagrid was gone, the trees in the hall were conjured by Flitwick — silver with red tinsel, strangely cold, despite their festivity — and it was Grubbly-Plank who conjured a wooden lean-to for the hippogriffs, brandishing a wand whose like Hagrid could never use, and then trotted back to the castle.

From the library window, Draco watched it come down. It was dark, and the snow dimmed the further it floated from the window — black grains bleeding into darkness at a distance, but bone-white when it piled against the glass.

Hermione had found a table by the corner. The Runes textbook floated over her journal and a scheduling chart. Two quills hovered at her elbows, waiting to be of use; as he watched, she grabbed one out of midair, stabbed it through a troublesome twist of hair, and then used the other to scrawl something on her journal, which lifted obligingly to meet her quill, even as her eyes never left the page.

Ron was paging through an O.W.L. prep book with a pencil, chewing pensively on the eraser, one hand buried fretfully in his thick red hair; Harry slouched back in his chair, fidgeting with a pocket snitch, all work forgotten. A lamp guttered in the center of the table, wax puddling.

“Anyone know the counter-charm for hiccoughs?” announced Ron, ruffling his hair. “I’m stuck.”

“Those quizzes are meant to teach you how much you know, Ron. Giving you the answer won’t help.”

“Yeah, but I know what I know already, don’t I? And I know I don’t know this.”

“You know the counter-charm for hiccoughs, you taught it to Lavender last week.”

“After Draco taught me that morning. And I don’t memorize that stuff, there’s no point.”

“The test is the point.”

“That’s the problem,” he groaned, slouching. “I don’t care about the test, Mione, and I know saying that makes you twitchy, but it’s all so much… rubbish. It’s not like I’m ever gonna be out there mowing down Death Eaters and suddenly need the counter-charm for hiccoughs.”

She snorted. “‘Mowing down’ Death Eaters? You’re fifteen.”

“Fred and George aren’t much older, and they’re going straight into the Order. They’ve already talked to Moody.”

“Fifteen to seventeen is a world of difference. And Molly would skin you.”

Ron grunted.

“You’re all assuming we have a choice,” said Harry. He flipped up the snitch and caught it. “We might not.”

“I don’t know what you mean,” said Hermione after a moment.

“I mean it’s not like we’ll be safe at Hogwarts. Viktor wasn’t.”

Hermione flinched. Draco lifted his eyes from his page, cutting a look at Harry.

“Viktor was seventeen, too,” she said tautly. “And he still made a choice, in the Maze. He could have run.”

“Run where? The cup was still cursed. If he hadn’t come with me, nothing would have changed. Except he’d be alive.”

“Mate,” muttered Ron. “Do we need to talk about this?”

Harry pitched the snitch fiercely into the air. “As opposed to what? Pretending it didn’t happen? I reckon enough people are doing that, don’t you?”

Hermione set her quill down. “That isn’t true,” she said calmly. “You don’t know how that fight would’ve turned out, if he wasn’t there. Possibly we’d all be dead.”

“Granger—”

“What? It’s true enough. And Viktor liked you, Harry. He made a choice to follow you, just like everyone else. Don’t deny him that.”

“He didn’t follow me,” said Harry, with surprising force. Draco slowly closed his book. “Nobody ordered him around. I got kidnapped, and he got roped in. It was stupid and pointless.”

“It wasn’t pointless,” said Hermione frigidly. “I don’t know how you can say that about someone’s death.”

“Because it was!” he exclaimed. “Saying it or not saying it doesn’t change anything, I’m sick of people acting like it does, and — and it makes my skin crawl, y’know, when people go around praising it like it was some noble thing to do—”

“He was noble.” Hermione’s mouth was a white line. “He wasn’t some lamb to the slaughter. He did care for you. He was intelligent and selfless, and he wouldn’t have done any of it if he didn’t believe you were worth it.”

Her tone chastised him, but he only slunk low in his seat, chin dipping in a surlish pout.

“I don’t want to be worth it,” he muttered.

“Bully for you,” she said crisply, and bent her head to her work again.

Draco raised an eyebrow, and Ron shook his head; then he shifted his hair back and scratched the center of his forehead. He shot a meaningful glance at Harry.

Scar.

“It’s ten to curfew,” Draco remarked, dropping his quill into the inkpot. “An appropriate time as any to retire.”

“Great idea,” said Ron at once, shutting his book. “I was sick of this an hour ago. Fancy a stop by the kitchens, Harry? Could get the house-elves to make some chips.”

“Can’t. Gotta practice Occlumency,” he said dully. “Then I’ve got the Potions homework. And I promised Dean I’d take a look at his Combustion Charm.”

“And how’s that coming?” Hermione said coolly, underlining something. “Occlumency?”

“Ask Draco. He’s the one who can actually do it.”

“Mother believes there’s been great strides made this term.”

“Yeah,” said Harry. “By you.”

This was true. Tactfully, however, he replied: “You’re leagues ahead of where you started.”

“Funny, because she still acts the same.”

“If she thinks you’re doing well, she won’t mention it. That’s how you know you’re doing well.”

“And what if she tells you you’re doing godawful? What’s that mean in Malfoy?”

“That she likes you, probably,” said Ron.

“She would never use the term ‘godawful.’ It’s pedestrian.”

A pair of giggling students darted through the stacks, stumbling over each other. At a distance, it was hard to make them out, but there was a whirl of dark curls, and the green of a Slytherin tie, and a boy with sandy hair. A door creaked, and their whispers winnowed out into silence.

Harry grunted and threw back his chair. He plucked the pocket snitch without looking from where it hovered behind his head, and shoved it in his pocket.

“I’m going to go see Cho.”

“Now?” Hermione checked her watch. “It’s ten to nine.”

“Yeah, so?”

“It’s five to ten,” she said, with a glance at Draco, “and if prefects don’t catch you, Filch will.”

“Yeah, but it’s you two on patrol tonight. It’ll be fine.”

“I — I resent that implication, frankly! The fact that Draco and I are prefects is not license to flout the rules!”

“Are you joking? You broke half a dozen school rules just this afternoon!”

“Which is more than enough risk for one day, and for a better reason than sneaking out to visit Cho Chang,” she said pointedly.

Harry glanced at Draco and muttered something. Draco narrowed his eyes and unfolded his legs.

“What was that?”

“Nothing! Honestly! Like it makes a difference! I’ll take the Cloak. Keep the Map, if you’re worried.”

Hermione made her lips thin. “I am,” she said, “since I happen to know what happens if you get caught.”

She twisted her right hand up pointedly, and the gauze slipped free of her sleeve, dangling.

“Yeah,” said Harry, agitated. “And I’ve got one to match. Two, actually.” He jerked his thumb at his forehead. “All anyone seems to want me for is this one, so maybe now they’ll care twice as much.”

“Harry!”

“That’s not true and you know it,” said Ron. “We’re right here—”

“I mean other people! Anyone from the Order, for instance, funny how no one wrote me once I started learning Occlumency—”

“That’s a coincidence,” Hermione said. “It’s not like they haven’t been busy, and you started Occlumency lessons around the same time Umbridge closed the Floo. Arthur called you, didn’t he?”

“Yeah, and hasn’t since! ‘Bye, Harry, don’t write, see you at Christmas’!”

“He’s been busy!” Ron exclaimed.

“Pretty busy, is it, in the Muggle Artifacts office?”

Anger propelled Ron upright. “You know what Dad’s been busy with, git! And they’re worried about Umbridge monitoring the Floo!”

“Really! That’s why they won’t let me write to Sirius, right? They’re worried about the Floo?”

“I don’t know what you even think you’re saying,” said Hermione, dumbfounded. “No one’s conspiring to keep you from your godfather —”

“Sure. Sure, yeah. Okay.”

“What are you implying?” said Ron, with more irritation. He rose to his feet, too, which put him several inches over Harry; the height seemed to level out the playing field of the conversation. “D’you really think my dad didn’t come as soon as he could? Seriously? He’d run here on foot if he had to, you know, if you called—”

“I didn’t ask for that!”

“You don’t HAVE to ask for it,” said Ron loudly, “that’s the POINT, you ingrate—”

“Sorry, then! Yeah! I guess I am ungrateful, but I don’t want a bunch of people lining up to die for me,” said Harry savagely. Hermione flinched. Draco shifted to his feet, his expression cold. “Had enough of those! Sorry! Not taking applications, tell everyone I said thanks —”

“Harry, what the fuck?”

“I don’t want an army!” he shouted. “I want people I can bloody talk to! I’m sorry if that puts your noses out of joint, but it’s what I want. Not that anybody particularly seems to care!”

Ron was wide-eyed and slack-jawed with some unnamable kind of anger; his hands were fists. Draco took a half-step between him and Potter, fingering his wand, contemplating the easiest way to disengage without hurting either of them if someone swung.

“Harry,” said Hermione quietly, “is your scar hurting?”

Harry’s head snapped to her. His chest heaved as a visible swell of anger moved through it. “None of your business!”

He strode past them, shouldering his bag, and swung into the aisle.

“Don’t wait up for me,” he snapped, and was gone.

In the guttering candlelight, Ron gave a sudden bark and kicked Harry’s chair. It tipped slowly over on its side, a tragedy of anticlimax.

“Wanker! That bloody wanker! Self-absorbed — mean-spirited — impossible sodding arsehole—”

Hermione gave a hollow laugh. Ron looked at her wildly, interrupted in his mutterings.

“What?”

“Oh, not — you’re more than entitled to say it, but it’s just — that’s really not true, is it?”

Ron ground his hands into his eyes. The tension in his shoulders seeped away.

“No,” he muttered. “It’s not.”

He tossed himself down in the chair, his spine a glum slouch. Draco pointed his wand discreetly at Harry’s chair, and righted it.

“He acts like he’s the only one making sacrifices,” Ron muttered.

“I know.” Hermione was fidgeting with the gauze on her wrist, twisting a tourniquet, then letting it go. Apropos of nothing, she said: “I wonder if I shouldn’t have pushed so hard about starting the Defense Club.”

“Why not?” said Draco.

“Hm. I — well. I think I assumed,” she said slowly, “that the pressure would be… fun for him. Like it is for—” She glanced up and gestured between them: You and me. He nodded. “You know, I was so frustrated that we didn’t have anything to do, that Umbridge was here and the Order was out there and we weren’t even being taught to fight, only to stand still and watch as everything got worse, I wanted to feel like I was doing something. You know — I can’t fight, and I’m not rich or pureblooded or powerful, and I can’t save anyone, but we can still do something. You can always do something.”

The candlelight made her glow, softly, with a light that seemed almost to emanate from within. She spoke with her hands, and they cast birdlike shadows on the far walls, waltzing to the rhythm of her low, passionate voice. He watched her and marveled that anyone had ever found it easy to ignore her.

“But the pressure was part of it. It makes it feel like we’re doing something serious. Even if it isn’t, really.” She shrugged, faintly embarrassed. “Harry’s not like that. It’s not pleasant for him, that sort of intensity, I think it reminds him too much of… well, his life, I suppose. I always forget that difference. He’s… not like us.”

“Not like you, maybe,” admitted Ron. “All that spy stuff with the Order scares the hell out of me. It’s one thing for Harry, you know, with Remus and Sirius, they’ve always been these big action hero types, but… I dunno mate. My dad’s a bureaucrat.” He scrubbed his nose, his expression bleak. “Bill’s cool, but he’s not a soldier, he’s… he’s a cursebreaker, he does puzzles that blow up if he’s wrong, and I just — when Harry said that, about them dying, it hit home to me, like — he's not wrong. They could."

There was a creak of floorboards somewhere in the library. The castle sighed and shifted on its foundations, rattling like giants playing timbrels in the walls. Draco flicked another Muffliato at the aisle, for good measure.

Hermione folded her arms. "There's not any real fighting yet," she said. "It's all politics and spycraft. It's a whisper war."

"What's that mean?"

"It means nobody's going to die," she said, and cut herself off, with a telltale disjoint, before she could reach the word he knew she'd wanted: Yet.

But even for that, the bodies of Viktor Krum and Barty Crouch were too long cold for her to sound convincing. Their presence emanated silently through the library's floating dust.

"And your parents were soldiers, actually," she said suddenly. "In the first war. Remember? You could give your father a little credit. And your mother, for that matter. You know, Mad-Eye once told me there were only three people who ever beat him in a duel—"

"Don't — please don't talk about it," said Ron, hoarsely. "I'm sorry. I know I brought it up, but this — this is worse."

Draco inclined his head silently toward the flames, and the warmth of the fire suffused on his face, while the chill of the shade cooled his back.

"My mother is working with Dumbledore," he said. He didn't know why he said it, but when it was there, he turned it over in his head, and found that there was a hollow where his regret was supposed to be.

He was used to that hollow by now. It was his familiar. He gave it a suspicious poke sometimes, when Harry or Hermione said something especially redolent of muggle, or Ron made a crass joke, or anything happened that ought to have made his mother curl her lip. But it remained empty. The emptiness unnerved him. He didn't like the idea that he was walking around with a cavity inside him; a man was supposed to have beliefs. Convictions. His father had. That was what a family motto was for. Vincit semper.

But he didn't have any. What he had were a single-digit number of people around him who were simply not allowed to die, and he didn't really think that counted. He'd flushed all the other beliefs because they kept getting in the way of that single-digit number, and he wasn't ashamed of it, but it gave him pause, because it made him feel — incomplete, somehow. A half-man, cleaved at the limb, a philosophical amputee.

He'd cut himself out of something awful, and it was good, it was — it was necessary — but sometimes he worried that the cut had taken too much. For if he'd been wrong — meaning Lucius had been wrong, meaning fifteen generations of his forefathers had been wrong, if the things they'd gone to war and died for were so much chaff in the wind of history — then how could anything be true? How could you trust the same heart that had almost ruined you?

Hermione's voice tugged him out of reverie.

"Is she?" she said curiously. "What's she doing?"

He debated his liberty to speak. His exact words to his mother had been I swear to share confidence in this with none but Albus Dumbledore and Severus Snape, which didn't actually specify the extent of the vow. Certainly it extended to the secret of the Dark Lord's immortality, but she hadn't clarified whether her involvement was included.

"I don't know." That was true; she never shared her whereabouts. "Her connections with the Death Eater movement give her…

valuable knowledge."

"Blimey! Your mum's a double agent?" Ron seemed to highly approve.

"She wasn't an agent in the first place, thank you. She wasn't a Death Eater. She still isn't. She wouldn't — make a good spy." She's mad, he didn't say, and was therefore perhaps among the few people in the world that Dumbledore could never, under any circumstance, ask to keep a cover. Her mind was a vouchsafe of her freedom. Wasn't that a delicious irony.

"I thought you said you didn't know what she was doing," said Hermione.

"I don't. But she wouldn't take the Mark."

"You're… confident about that," she said, carefully, but the challenge settled there, however delicately, all the same.

He grappled for the means to make her understand. "It's not something done lightly," he gritted out, finally. "It's permanent. Irrevocable. You'll die with the scar of it on you, I—"

I've seen it, he might have said.

He began again:"My father would never let her."

"Let her?"

"No — it wasn't — he protected her. One of them had to take it, so he did."

"You make it sound like it wasn't his choice."

"It wasn't."

"I thought he was a believer."

“He was. But you can’t refuse the Mark, when it’s offered to you, and — I don’t know how to explain this in a way that makes sense to you,” he said, and tried to sound patient. “The Death Eaters are not a group it is possible to walk away from. It isn’t the Order. You’re there because there is no life outside of it. No one has ever betrayed the Dark Lord and lived.”

The candlewax whined and cracked like the shuffle of fingerbones.

“That’s not true,” said Ron suddenly, and they both startled.

“I assure you that it is,” said Draco, with a touch of acid. He lifted his hand and cocked his signet ring. “Or I wouldn’t have this.”

“Yeah,” said Ron steadily, “no, didn’t work out for your dad, and that sucks — being evil is a raw deal, no question — but you’re still forgetting someone.”

“Who?”

He paused, and said emphatically: “Snape.”

“That’s right! He did, didn’t he?” said Hermione, relieved. “He betrayed Voldemort, and he lived.”

Draco drew his hand back into his lap, tracing the shape of his crest on the gemstone. His finger knew the grooves like they were etched into his skin. He could draw them sleeping, backwards, deaf and blind. “Snape survived, and continues to survive, as the thrall of Albus Dumbledore,” he said tonelessly, not quite disagreeing. “Technically, he’s never left the Dark Lord’s ranks, and the moment he tried, he’d be as doomed as anyone else. If his cover breaks, he’s dead. He’s still not free.”

“That’s still not the same as being a Death Eater,” argued Ron. “Dumbledore’s not making him kill muggles.”

“Morally, yes. I suppose you could argue his soul’s better off for it,” said Draco, and struggled to keep the scorn from his voice. “But in terms of free will, hardly. Whatever reasons he had for betraying the Dark Lord, the luxury of choice wasn’t one of them.”

“We know his reasons,” said Hermione suddenly. “He was in love.”

This was so unlike her, as a retort, that his fingers stilled on the ring. He raised his eyes, slightly incredulous.

She tinged pink and said, crisply: “With Lily Potter. That’s what Sirius said, remember? In the Shrieking Shack? He turned coat because her life was in danger. Lily Potter.”

The concept was too bizarre; Draco sidelined it, settling it in an uncomfortable mental corner with everything else he didn’t know about his godfather.

“Who hated him,” said Ron mildly, “so we’re clear. I mean, ups to him and everything for doing it, whatever his reason was, but it’s not exactly this big damn love story, mind you — she was married by that point, actually, to another bloke.”

“As was Guinevere,” said Draco.

“Yeah, and that one caused a few problems, too, I think,” Ron said promptly. Draco flashed him a cool glance. Hermione huffed in amusement.

“It doesn’t matter,” she said. “My point is just that it is possible. Whatever his reasons are, whether they matter or not, he did, and so people do have a choice. Can we agree on that?”

“Fine,” he said, curtly. “But my father didn’t, and sometimes people don’t. So long as that’s clear, too.”

She tilted her head sideways at him, spilling dark hair down one side, baring her neck to the firelight.

“Maybe,” she said.

“‘Maybe’?”

“Maybe, yes.” She smirked, obstinate and smug and unfairly lovely.

“Meaning ‘no.’”

“Meaning maybe,” she retorted. “I’ll think about it. If you can come up with a better argument in the meantime, let me know. We’d better get going if we want to finish the patrol before midnight.”

Harry had been right: they were slated to sweep the third floor. Draco rose and offered her a hand, and she took it, wheeling herself to her feet with a sharp tug. When she came to her feet, she remained there for a moment, her hand balancing lightly in his; then she removed it quickly and drew her wand, using a Collection Charm to sweep their arrayed notes into her journal.

“Right. Guess that’s you two off, then,” said Ron. He stretched, lacing his hands behind his neck. “Suppose I’ll wait up for you, then? In the common room?”

Hermione paused in gathering her books. “Are you sure? We won’t be back until eleven.”

“I’ll be awake, anyway. Hey, you two hungry? Want something from the kitchens when you get back?”

“No, thank you, and I’ll thank you twice not to do what I’ve just got done yelling at Harry for,” said Hermione, with mild amusement, shouldering her bag. “Which is to give Umbridge another chance to catch you breaking the rules. Go get some rest. We’ll see you tomorrow.”

“If you say so. Here, let me take those back,” said Ron suddenly, and reached for her bag. “What’s that, two stone? You don’t want to be hauling all that around on patrol. I'll drop them off with Lavender, she'll take them up."

"You don't have to… but I suppose… that's very nice," said Hermione, blinking in surprise. She yielded up her bag, and Ron shouldered it, grinning good-naturedly. "Thank you, that's — very kind."

"No worries."

"I mean it, you don't have to. And I'm sorry for what Harry said, earlier,

Draco nudged in his chair with one foot and stepped into the aisle, pointedly ignoring both of them. It wasn't for him to be irritated that Ron was doing her a kindness. That was one of the privileges that friendship did not afford, even a particularly unique friendship of parameters undefined. That was something one needed a sort of claim to do.

Out of everyone committed to the understandable masochism of caring for Hermione Granger, Ron was probably the most irritating. He was an earnest, well-meaning, natural-born pureblood of whom Hermione probably knew very few: pure of heart, mind, and intention. When he claimed loyalty to something he sank his teeth into it like a trapjaw and let go never, the same as the rest of his fervent, scrappy clan. It was only out of some grim perversity that he continued to watch as Ron plucked the quill from Hermione's hair, making her giggle and grab for it back: an unfathomable taste for ideation about the ease with which Ron touched her hair, and admired her work, and said in loud clear terms how impressive he found her, even though there was nothing particularly remarkable about being impressed by Hermione. It was woefully easy to be loved by Ron.

Even Hermione, who always seemed to take his attention as half a joke, seemed flustered by the intensity of his praise, or his affection, or his generosity. Ron gave as if there was no end to giving.

Draco took as if there was no end to taking. So he took his leave, and went to stand by the front desk.

Hermione caught up with him belatedly, wearing the ghost of a flush and rearranging her hair.

“Ready?” she said brightly. “We’re rostered for the third floor. I could kiss Cedric for that; Padma has the dungeons, and she says it’s frigid down there at night.”

He made a noncommittal noise and opened the door.

“Now what’s the matter with you?” she said, with exasperation that made clear she would tolerate only good answers.

“Envy,” he said coolly. Hermione tripped and caught herself on the doorframe, and he turned back to offer her a hand down the step. “I feel rather snubbed. Ronald’s made no offer to carry my books, and I fear his intentions with me are unchivalrous.”

Her face quickened into relief, and she took his hand. Imagination furnished it with a quick squeeze as she stepped down, and she stood close to him in the hallway while he shut the door.

“It’s true,” she said seriously. “I’m afraid he’ll never marry you.”

“And I was so ready to be a Weasley.”

“Don’t lose hope. George is a bachelor.”

“Granger dear, I’m titled, handsome, and fathomlessly rich. I think I can do a bit better than George, thank you.”

“Mm. What about Fred?”

“Oh, in a heartbeat.”

She burst into laughter. Her hand flew to muffle the sound, but it tripped out between her fingers. Predictably, hopelessly, helplessly, he smiled for her; and whatever bitterness he felt was lifted up and carried away, if momentarily, on the rising current of their wings.

“I don’t think Harry meant what he said. About Viktor.”

The inner hall of the third floor had rich wood paneling that skirted the wall, lacquered to a liquid sheen under the glaze of torchlight. Suits of armor bent to salute them as they passed, their steel plates rattling; tapestries swayed gently in a subtle draft. It was dim, and quiet, and the only people awake were the ghosts that moved now and then through the walls, their pale silhouettes flickering at the end of corridors.

Hogwarts was haunted. It didn’t do to forget.

Hermione took a girding breath. Her wand dropped a thin beam of Lumos into the embroidery at her feet, sweeping their way.

“Do you think?”

Draco didn’t reply.

“Because if he did, then he didn’t know Viktor at all. Which he might not have, I suppose. A lot of people didn’t know him. He wasn’t easy to talk to.”

“He seemed,” said Draco, “nice enough.”

“He was.” They turned a corner and passed the grand staircase, sweeping down the next row of classrooms. “He was — extremely nice. But he wasn’t very good at making friends. I wish Harry had known him better, they would have got on. And I think he would’ve adored Ginny, actually.”

“Why so?”

“Oh, just a feeling. Quidditch, flying, sports. And she’s high-spirited, which he would have admired. He said he liked passionate people.”

He shot her a look that made her twitch.

“Other people, I mean. In general. Not just — it wasn’t like that, with him and me. We went to the Ball together, and that was the only time — well, and we kissed once, but that didn’t count.”

He made some sort of sound, which she interpreted as leave to keep going.

“I don’t count it, anyway,” she said. “It was a few days before the Third Task. We were both too busy to see each other, me with Harry, and him with his preparations, but I came to see him a few times on the Durmstrang ship, and he would walk me back to the castle; and the last time, I thought it would be nice, since we’d spent all this time together, to — I mean, that’s what people do, when they’re seeing each other, isn’t it? It would be — a perfectly ordinary thing to do. And even if not, as a gesture of friendship—”

“A friendly kiss.”

“It was! Listen, just because you and your date had some sort of physical imbroglio—”

“It wasn’t anything physical. Greengrass is a friend. Before that, she was a stranger. Never anything else.”

They turned another corner, and ventured down a narrow hallway.

“You can say that if you like, but you did kiss her.”

“I kissed her, the once,” he said tartly, “for pedagogy.”

“For pedagogy!” It was delighted and teasing.

“We were fourteen years old, and I was her date to a ball. It was an avenue of intellectual exploration. It was,” he said, mimicking her,

“‘what people do.’ As I’m told.”

“And what were your findings from kissing the great Daphne Greengrass?”

“I’m under the impression it’s impolite to tell.” He checked a corner, ignoring the heat of her eyes on his back.

“She told first, so it cancels out.”

“Is that how it works?”

“No,” she admitted, a bit embarrassed. “I’m just being nosy, I suppose.”

He snorted and stepped ahead of her, which was doubly successful, because besides hiding his face, it meant he didn’t have to see whatever hers was doing. “It was brief. Happy?”

“That hardly tells me anything.”

“Merlin. How much detail do you want?”

“Well,” she said defensively, “did you — you know, enjoy it?”

“As much as I’ve ever enjoyed a kiss, yes.”

“Oh.” She walked in measured silence for a while, her wand steady. “Is that a high bar, then?”

“Are you asking me if I’ve kissed someone and enjoyed it?”

She cleared her throat. “Suppose I am,” she said. “Of pedagogy.”

He’d been in a traincar, in the thick, terrible heat of June, and he’d been holding a girl in his arms, and she’d leaned up and kissed him on the cheek.

Nearly on the mouth, but not quite; just close enough for him to think about it for a summer.

“Not in the sense you're thinking,” he said.

“Really? You haven't?”

Hermione sounded surprised. Momentarily, she added, stiffly: “I don’t know why I reacted that way, I — I thought otherwise.”

“What? Why?”

She wet her lips. “Because you — obviously you grew up a bit, and the other girls are — I mean, Parvati asked if you wanted—”

“She did what?”

“But I told her you wouldn’t be interested.”

“Patil? Really.”

“Yes. Are you upset? I can tell her you are, if you are, I mean I assumed because you’d never actually had a conversation longer than three sentences, or mentioned her ever, at all, you probably wouldn’t like to sit across from her in some stuffy tea shop in Hogsmeade and listen to her rave about muggle novels—”

“I like muggle novels.”

“Not enough to get through lunch with Parvati,” said Hermione, with vague conviction. “And I’m sorry, but she’d never survive your mother. She starts blubbering when I scold her for leaving hair in the shower; Narcissa would have her on the floor in ninety seconds.”

This seemed admittedly probable.

“I’ll thank you not to terrorize my admirers, Granger, there’s little enough good taste to go around as it is.”

“I didn’t terrorize her,” she said indignantly. “I saved her time.” She paused. “I did not terrorize her,” she amended, “much.”

He did not smile; it was difficult, however.

“I don't encourage her,” he said. “I don't flirt. There's a difference between having attention and courting it. As I'm sure you're aware.”

“You... don't.”

“No.” He turned around, under the pretense of checking over his shoulder, and found a view of her full, alert, studious face, focused on him like he was a particularly fascinating kind of Arithmancy problem. “Not usually.”

“So you... but— oh.”

He raised his eyebrow at her. She had stopped walking and was staring at him.

“Yes?”

“When you flirt with... people,” she said slowly, “what do you mean?”

His heart continued to assert an increasing weight on his ribs.

“What I say,” he said, succinctly. “Don't you?”

She wet her lips. “Yes,” she said, haltingly. “I — mean it.”

The heavy object blossomed in his chest, its weight dissipated into heat and smoke.

“You do.”

She'd said it. She'd said it, out loud, irrevocably. She did mean it. He hadn't been wrong.

“But I'm not — I don't — I'm not used to— those of us who aren’t tall quidditch players don’t— I'm not used to people — fancying me, you understand. I don't — there's so much of friendship that's like fancying someone anyway, and I don't know — I don't get the rules to this, I just sort of assumed — and anyway, it's not like you're the most obvious person in the world—”

Sometimes he wondered how she didn’t walk into walls.

“Respectfully, Granger, I beg to differ.”

“But I still think you're — possibly unaware of the extent of the circumstances,” she said tightly.

“Which are?”

“I don't — I don't know, I'm not good at — I don't have a lot of history with fancying people, I — as I said, I kissed Viktor,” she added, “but I don’t think I did it right.”

He almost did walk into a wall, then. Twice. First at fancying people, and then did it right, which snared him in the crosshairs of two different kinds of confusion.

“I mean it was fine and everything, but I suspect I messed it up a bit. It wasn’t...” She hesitated. “I suppose eventually, if I’d had more time… anyway. It doesn’t matter now.”

He ground out the flicker of resilient bitterness at the bottom of his chest. “...I doubt you did it wrong, Granger.”

She made a noncommittal sound.

“I suspect he would have agreed with me.”

“It wasn’t a thing,” she said, after a moment, in a tone that was some distance away. “A real thing, I mean. We were both too busy — I was always with you and the boys, and he was a champion, and he was going to graduate anyway, so… But I think I would’ve gone to Bulgaria, when he invited me. And I would've brought my parents. He could've met them. I think he would've liked them. And I don't know what would have… you can never know how things would have went, but it could've been something. Or maybe it wouldn't have been, but at least I would've known."

He didn't mention that Krum had invited him to Bulgaria, too. He doubted that was the summer she was imagining.

"But then I wouldn't have been able to come to visit you," she said abruptly. She held her head straight ahead and did not look at him. Her wand rolled endlessly between her fingers. "And I wouldn't have seen the Manor. So you see, many things would have been different, if Viktor hadn't died."

"You still would have seen it."

"Eventually," she said. "After I went to Bulgaria. Do you think that would have made a difference?"

"...In what?"

"I don't know. Just that I might be a different person. If Viktor had lived."

"You could have been a thousand different people, in other lives, if other things had happened to you." His voice was low, effortfully smooth. It rippled in thin echoes in the corridor. "You're here. They're not. You have the right to make decisions they can't."

"But—"

"You also have the duty."

Hermione exhaled slowly.

"Speaking from experience?" she murmured.

He inclined his head. His heart hung heavy in his chest, an insistent pressure on his ribs.

“A great many things would have been different, if Lucius Malfoy had lived,” he said. “Possibly it was a better world than this one. But I don’t live there.”

She stopped walking, and he turned to face her with a graceful movement of the heel.

“If my father could see me, he would loathe me,” he said coolly, and it was remarkable how little it stung; the words passed through him cleanly, with only a pinch of pain, like a wound that cauterized itself. “But that stopped being my problem when they put him in the ground.”

Hermione’s mouth was a soft line of doubt.

“You don’t mean that.”

“I do.”

“You don’t.”

“I care for you more than I care for his memory. I mean that.”

His echo hung on the vaulted ribs of the ceiling, sending ripples of his casual apostasy out into the fathomless night.

She made a noise like the breath had gone out of her, half-laughter, half-pain, and her eyes closed.

“You can’t,” she said, “you don’t understand—”

Something shrieked.

A sound like shearing metal rent the air. Running water erupted in the distance. The portraits shuddered from the impact. The castle groaned.

Hermione started, but Draco was faster. He darted to the staircase and scaled it, footsteps beating a groan out of old wood. Hermione flicked a Detection Charm off her wand and it went skittering into the darkness, landed on something, and gave a high caterwaul. He veered right and took three steps before his foot splashed in something, and he saw a black mirror of water filming the hardwood.

Something was moving in the darkness: splashing at the end of the hallway, a figure under the low bars of torchlight.

“Who’s that?” she called. “Stop there!”

Draco threw a Petrificus down the hallway, but there was no one for it to hit. A tapestry of Dedlig the Gilded fluttered in the draft from the window.

“Damn,” Hermione snapped. “Check the bathroom.”

A pair of Siphoning Charms stemmed the flow of water from the doorway, and he toed open the door. In the dark bathroom, light glimmered from a bevy of floating candles above the floor, and the torches glittered dully from the high stone walls. Water babbled thickly on the floor, ankle-deep, and the sound of drowning drains rose in croaking echoes, like a chorus of frogs.

“It’s one of the taps,” said Hermione. Watery acoustics turned the echoes of her voice to vibrato. She dropped to her knees near one of the sinks, which had been shattered in half, and water sprayed ecstatically from a shorn pipe, like blood from a jugular. It splattered her face and her shirt, and she winced.

“I suppose this is someone’s idea of a prank.”

“Some prank,” he said, picking his way disdainfully through the flood. “A bit of a mess, and no audience. The twins have higher standards.”

She picked up a bit of shorn ceramic, hefted it, and then tossed it back into the soup. “Hm. It’s all shattered here, the faucet isn’t cleanly snapped… You can take off a faucet without breaking the whole sink like this. It might have been a misfired spell. Or accidental magic."

"In the bathroom? On a weekend?"

"Why not? It's private and reasonably ventilated. And — ergh — it's got a built-in drainage system," she said, gritting her teeth, and layering another Sealing Charm over the broken pipe. The water slowed to a weak splutter, but the pressure increased from the thinner outlet, and it struck her cheek, splattering her hair. "So they can rinse any evidence — which might be what they were trying to do—"

"Mmhm."

"Not that they did a very good job of it," she added, twisting her wet hair out of her face, and wrestling it into a quick knot atop her head. "It's a hack job. But that person didn't look young, did they? I couldn't make them out."

"No."

She nosed a bit of broken porcelain with her toe. "It's just a strange thing to do," she said. "Flooding a bathroom. I can't think how you'd do it by accident, and I can't think why you'd do it on purpose."

"Granger."

The water was coursing over her shirt, slicking it to her shoulders. The imprint of her underthings pressed through the fabric, clear white under an increasingly translucent sheen of pearl-gray, and clung to her waist. Her hair was dark and stringy where it floated in front of her face, and beads of water darted here and there, like shining clear gems studding her fringe, her eyelashes, the ridge of her cheek.

He was warm. He wanted to touch his mouth to the place where the rivulets fell on her neck.

He wondered, not for the first time, if fancying someone wasn't just a culturally venerated way of going mad.

"Your shirt," he said, with difficulty.

"Hm? Oh — oh." She fumbled her robe to cover it. "I… sorry."

"Not your fault."

"I can't really help it."

"No."

"Yours is the same. You're — a bit soaked through." The pipe was still guttering.

He stepped past her, reached over her with his wand, and cast a charm. A skein of spongy black webbing knitted itself over the pipe's mouth, and the water shut off.

They were standing very close together.

"What's that charm?" she said. Her voice seemed loud. "I don't recognize it."

" Sfongari. It conjures a spongiform leech. Absorbs moisture."

"Oh, that's marvelously useful. Is that sixth year curriculum, or seventh?"

"Neither." The spell had come from Snape's notes. It was also intended to be cast on someone's skin. "Found it in a book at the Manor."

"Can you teach me?"

“If you like.”

“I would.”

Her eyes were still somewhere low. Then she said, in a normal voice: “You're looming.”

“I know that.”

“Why?”

“What?”

“Why are you looming?”

“Guess,” he said. The heat in his chest had reached the skin, which was numb, tingling.

She bit her lip, staring at him.

“We can’t do this,” she said. “We really can’t do this.”

“Do what? Have a conversation?”

“You know what. I — don’t make me explain to you why we don’t stand this close to each other.”

“Why not?”

She took a sharp breath, and said something that would be running through his head up until the minute of his death, probably, and then for whatever he got beyond.

“I think about this all the time,” she said, and gave no sign of having casually ruined him. “I — about you. And me. Because it would change — it would change a lot, if not — everything. And I wonder, sometimes, if you have any idea how much I need you. Sometimes I think you don’t. Know, that is.”

“I beg your — I — what?”

It had been his formal opinion, though not one that he liked thinking about, that Hermione Granger rarely needed anyone at all. The idea that he made the list was both pleasant and startling in equal measure, a forked tongue of lightning down the spine.

“Well, I do. Need you. I feel — when you’re there, it’s—”

“It’s what?”

She tore her hands through her hair in aggressive frustration. “Never mind, it sounds ridiculous.”

“I sincerely doubt that.”

“Being around you makes everything possible,” she said softly, and then glared at him, which was a study in dissonance if he’d ever had one. “So please, don’t — I know you like to flirt, and I haven’t really stopped you, but — we can’t do something that would make it impossible to — listen. We have something. It’s a good thing. We know what it is.”

A lie in at least two senses; once again, he had no idea, whatsoever, what they were about.

The one consolation being that she seemed not to know either.

A headache was mounting behind his eyes.

“If it went away,” she said, parceling out her words slowly, “something — bad would happen to me. I think.”

“It doesn’t have to go away. It won’t. I won’t.”

“The thing about that,” she said, “is you can’t know that. Actually. And I’m this — would you believe me if I said it was a compliment to you that I refuse to take chances?” She closed her eyes and gave a sort of half-wince. “I’m — being careful. I’m not very good at it, I’ve never tried to do it before. I've been reliably informed that I'm not very good at being careful with people, actually."

"If you are, I'm worse."

"You're very careful with me," she said.

"I'm your friend." The word rang hollow; she gave another pithy, halting smile. "Comes with the job. I'm reliably informed."

"Yes," she said, a touch melancholy. "The best I ever had, or ever will."

"...I don't like the way that sounds."

"It's true. I never had a friend like you before I came to Hogwarts, and don't think I'll ever meet one again. I don't think I'd want more than one, if it feels like this."

"Feels like what?" he said, feverish.

She hesitated. Then, with the quick, daring movement of someone breaking a rule, she stepped forward and — he nearly had a heart attack — and fastened the button of his shirt where it had come undone during the duel. Her neat, deft little fingers slipped it through the buttonhole. When it lay flat, she smoothed his collar with her hand, and his throat alit with warmth wherever her hand moved.

"There," she said, with a timid, proprietary satisfaction. "That was bothering me for hours."

She glanced up at him from under her eyelashes, and it probably wasn't intentional, but if she didn't want him to kiss her, she needed to stop looking like that quite soon.

"I want to do that," she said, with slight frustration. "But for everything."

Very soon. Extremely, extremely soon, she needed to stop.

“A compulsion to fix my clothes?” It was rough.

“A compulsion,” she said, with a clear, high, but clearly waning bravery, “to keep you.”

“Keep me what?”

She paused. Her eyes dropped from his.

“Nothing,” she said. “Just… keep, I guess.” She paused. “I don’t know if that’s how other people feel about their — good friends. I haven’t, but I gave up on being ordinary a long time ago.”

“It isn’t.”

“No? I hope it isn’t unnerving. I’m not crazy, the feelings are just — complicated.”

“It has always been apparent to me, if not to most people,” he said slowly, “that we have a very complicated friendship, and we operate on parameters that are entirely our own.”

“Yes. It’s not the same friendship we have with other people.”

“It’s not one most people have with other people.”

“But so you’re not worried about… I mean, it doesn’t unnerve you?” she said hopelessly. “What I said about keeping. Because it is normal, really. Or it can be. It doesn’t make you uncomfortable? Because I could stop, if it was too much. Or something.”

If she knew the fucking half of it.

“It isn’t.”

“Oh. I’m glad,” she said, awkwardly pleased. She fidgeted with her hands, glowing.

“No one else?”

“What?”

“You don’t feel that way about anyone else, you said.”

“No,” she said automatically. “I mean, I care for other people, but it isn’t the same as… it isn’t the same feeling. There’s something very discomfiting about it, actually. It isn’t something I think I’d choose to feel. Is that insulting? I hope it’s not insulting, but it’s the truth.”

“It’s never the same with anyone else,” he repeated, fierce with satisfaction. “That’s what you said. You wouldn’t do that, with the collar, for anyone else.”

Her mouth twisted in a sly way. “You’re vain,” she said. “You’re terribly vain. I wish that irritated me more, you know, it would be easier if it did.”

“What would be easier?”

She gave him a half-cocked, knowing look, and he returned it with an even, unabashed challenge. The lightning in his spine continued to flicker.

She straightened her skirt and adjusted her prefect’s badge. She ran a Drying Charm over her shirt, and then pointed her wand at him. “Do you want one?” she said. “Here. We’ll have to report this to Umbridge — actually, you do that, since you’re her new favorite, and tell her I just ran away or something, like the scared little muggle-born I am. I don’t want to deal with her idea of a follow-up investigation.” She flinched. “God, I don’t want to know what she’ll do when she finds out about this. Do you suppose we could just lie?”

“Not successfully.”

“No. She’ll want to blame someone in Gryffindor. I’ll tell them to start preparing alibis. Fred and George will be targets, obviously… Katie, too, she’s been dress coded four times this week… you know, I could have sworn girls were allowed to wear pants — and Seamus,

God, even I'm not sure it wasn't Seamus — maybe we can all just hide until the train comes, wouldn't that be nice?"

Her smile was wry and weary.

"We could," he said. "You'd miss Transfiguration."

"A bad blow," she said seriously, "but I might just survive it."

"McGonagall wouldn't. She'd assume her favorite died, and lose the will to live."

"Harry's her favorite."

"Difference in kind. She looks at him like a stray kitten she's taken to feeding. She smiles at you."

Hermione beamed at the ceiling, muttered something about flattery, and threw a Drying Charm at him.

"Meet you in the common room?" she said.

"You will."

"To debrief?"

"As per."

"Lovely," she said. "Thank you. I — thank you."

She smiled at him: timid, grateful, apologetic. Then, after a moment, she spun around, and darted across the bathroom.

He didn't see it coming: it landed without warning, a furious, hot press of her mouth on the corner of his, landing just ajar to his cheek. Warmth all over, her skin everywhere, softness where moments ago there had been empty air. For a second, he was simultaneously numb and on fire.

She sprang back.

“Thanks,” she said, insensibly, her voice light and giddy and taut. Hermione backed off, flushed and slightly mad-looking, the madwoman he was unfortunately, hopelessly attracted to.

“That's not fair,” he said, roughly, after a moment.

The corner of her mouth twitched. “No,” she said, and for a second, her grin was very much like his. “Sorry. I — I'm reliably informed that it isn't.”

And with a soft, high flutter of laughter, she swung out of the bathroom, her hair a dark cowl of soaked curls.

And when the door swung closed, it felt like he was walking around with something strung up in his chest, a cat's cradle of tendon and string. He threaded his hands through his hair, and finally, he couldn't resist the urge to laugh.

The feeling was spreading off his skin, catching, crackling; it felt like the moment he opened his eyes, he'd find the whole castle on fire.

Policy of Truth

Chapter 68: Policy of Truth

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

The decree went up on the last day of classes before the winter vacation.

All students remaining in the castle will report immediately to the Hogwarts Special Inquisitor or a member of the Hogwarts Inquisitorial Squad for their end-of-term Performance Review. Students with special permissions may instead report to their Head of House.

“Hogwarts Inquisitorial Squad?” said Ron. “Filch got a promotion?”

“Hope it doesn’t mean Ministry people,” said Ginny grimly. She shouldered between Ron and Harry to peer at the sign. “She’d love an excuse to haul in more patrolmen. By the way, if you need the twins, they said to tell you they’ll be on the lam — they’re hiding out in the Room until the train leaves.”

“Hey, that’s not a bad idea,” Ron exclaimed. “Think they’d mind if we popped up, too—?”

“They said you’d say that. They also said, ‘Tell him to piss off and find his own hidey-hole.’”

“Bugger them! I helped them set up the bloody thing, least they could do is help— anyway, it’s not their hidey-hole, if anything it’s Draco’s.”

“We have a policy about invoking my name in intra-Weasley disputes.”

“I have a policy about you being a pill,” said Ron.

“It’s not Ministry people,” said Hermione. She wasn’t listening to them, wisely. “It’s other students.”

Ginny, who was somewhat less accustomed than the others to Hermione manifesting knowledge spontaneously from thin air, gave her a curious stare. “How’d you figure that, eh?”

“Because Theodore Nott,” she said, “has a different tie on.”

“Wha—?”

Wordlessly, Hermione touched Ginny’s shoulder and turned her to face the stairwell.

At the foot of the staircase, Theo leaned with his hands in his pockets. His tie was not the usual green and silver, but a sharp black tie with a gold tie pin in the shape of an IS, with a spear of ivy crosshatched. A queue of first years and second years flocked around him, waving permission slips.

“Anyone have a special permission?” said Hermione at last. “I don’t.”

Draco raised the small pink scroll that had been delivered at breakfast. He was the only one.

“Right. That’s… to be expected, I suppose.”

“Always wondered what getting flayed would feel like,” said Ron. “Oh, hullo, Harry.”

The other boy had come trotting down the stairs, silent. There were dark circles under his eyes, and he walked with a slouch. He read the announcement in silence, scowled, and turned his back on the notice board.

“Harry?” said Ron in alarm. “Harry — hang on, wait up a minute—”

“Blimey,” muttered Ginny. “Did a skrewt crawl up his arse?”

“We had a bit of a row,” said Hermione stiffly. “ Draco — don’t forget, we’ve got another patrol tonight. Prefects sweep the castle before the last train.”

“I remember.”

“Lovely. See you then. Say hello to Professor McGonagall for me.”

She touched his arm, absently, and then shouldered into the crowd and made quick work getting away. Ron offered Draco a curious, somewhat wary stare, and loped after, his long legs easily catching up.

Draco watched her retreating back, distracted and restless, and deeply unhappy about the orbital pattern of Ron’s hand hovering around her elbow. Then he snapped at a passing Ravenclaw first year for forgetting his tie, docked him five points, and stalked off for the Transfiguration classroom.

There were no classes in the afternoon. Students were straggling through the Great Hall under the weight of vast leather-buckled trunks and stiff lacquered hatboxes down to the main atrium. Throngs of students in heights of agitation and impatience thronged between these mountains of luggage. Draco struggled his way through and found Ron and Hermione tucked in at the end of the Gryffindor table, along with Harry, Ginny, Daphne, and a number of people from Defense Club. He thought of griping at them about the ill-advisedness of sitting together, but thought better of it. Umbridge and Filch were still conducting interviews in their offices, and the club had enough of Gryffindor in it that it was difficult not for them to sit together.

“There he is. How’d it go with McGonagall?” called Ron.

“Entirely dull. We had tea.”

“Lucky you. We stood in line for three hours. I’ve got blisters.”

“Lucky you,” said Hermione curtly. “They’re going alphabetically. At this rate, I doubt she’ll make it to ‘Weasley’ before the train leaves.”

“Has anyone we know been interviewed yet?” said Ginny, through a mouthful of beans on toast. Draco eyed her and mimed shutting his jaw with one hand; she grinned at him and took a larger bite before continuing. “Do we know what she’s doing? She can’t have everyone on the quills, right?”

“No idea.”

“Seamus might know. He would’ve gone in not much before Hermione.”

“Think I saw him go in with Filch.”

“Anyone seen him since?”

“I could go ask Michael, he’d know—”

A flurry stirred the students at the door. Cho pushed her way through the crowd, throwing elbows like it was a quidditch final, and with a shrill cry she threw herself down at the Ravenclaw table, nearly bowling Ernie Macmillan off the bench. Her face was mottled with tears.

There was a collective pause. Harry was the first to rise, shoving back his seat, and then Hermione leapt up to follow him a heartbeat behind. Draco rose and made three.

At the Ravenclaw table, they were greeted with mixed warmth. Ernie, Terry Boot, and Michael Corner received them with friendly nods, but Marietta scowled and drew her arm closer around Cho, who was shuddering into her shoulder.

“Cho,” said Harry, as if at a loss, and she flinched.

“Oh, hullo, Harry… I… Hermione… Draco.”

He slipped out of the crowd with a nod and came to stand behind Hermione, his hands in his pockets.

“S-s-sorry,” she said. “I just got out of the interview—”

“We gathered,” said Hermione impatiently. “What happened?”

“No, she — she didn’t touch me. Or h-h-hurt me. B-b-but she sat me down and asked me a q-q-question, and I d-d-don’t know what happened, I couldn’t s-s-stop talking—”

“What do you mean, you ‘couldn’t stop’? What did you say?”

“I mean she started asking — where I w-w-was last night, and I told her — I told her I was at quidditch practice, which was t-t-true — and then she started asking about H-H-Harry, and if I liked him, and I started telling her everything— I mean literally, actually everything, like, stuff I wouldn’t even tell my M-M-Mum—”

“She wanted to know about your love life?”

“No,” said Harry. It was the first thing he’d said since that morning. “She wanted to know about me. Isn’t that right?”

Cho swallowed and nodded.

A pit of ice opened in his stomach. Cho knew everything. She’d been to every Defense Club meeting since the beginning of the year.

Draco leaned over the table. Ravenclaws shifted and cringed out of his looming shadow.

“What exactly did you tell her?”

Cho’s eyes grew moonlike and dark with apprehension. She wet her lips and sent a panicked look at Hermione, then Harry.

Hermione touched his arm. “She didn’t say anything about the club,” she said quietly.

He caught her eye. “No?”

“No. I’d know.”

He wanted her to say more about that, but Cho interrupted. “I didn’t rat,” she cried, hoarse and somewhat indignant. “Especially not about the you-know-what. I said I answered her questions, not that I started blabbering anything secret that came to mind — I’m not dull.”

“Neither I nor Veritaserum cares if you’re dull or not,” he snapped. “What I do care about is whether you’ve said something that could get us expelled. Or imprisoned.”

“You think it’s Veritaserum?” Hermione whispered.

“What else?”

“She’s seeing hundreds of students. She’d need liters of the stuff. Not even Snape would keep that much on short notice.”

“Perhaps she’s not giving it to everyone.”

“...She knows Cho is seeing Harry.”

“And took the opportunity to see what he was doing.”

Cho sat up rigidly, cheeks flaming. “I didn’t say anything that could hurt Harry.”

“What did she ask about, then?” said Draco coolly. “Which broom closets you like to snog in?”

“She asked me about my mother, you arse.”

Hermione frowned. “Why does she care about your mother? She’s got nothing to do with anything.”

Cho gave a humorless cry of laughter.

“Because her mum’s on the editorial board for the Prophet,” said Marietta, raising her voice. “Cho’s only brought it up a dozen times. But I guess maybe other people’s families don’t matter as much as meeting logistics, to some people.”

“What do my parents do for a living, Marietta?” Hermione said coolly. The other girl balked and fell silent.

Hermione raised her eyebrows at her, and then turned back to Cho. Draco’s mouth curled in an amused sneer.

“What did she want to know about your mother?”

“I dunno. What she was writing, I guess. I mean, you know Prophet’s been rough lately, the editorial board’s really s-s-stepping on them, and you know what they’ve been p-p-publishing—”

“Drivel,” supplied Draco, shortly.

“Yeah, but that’s not her fault. She’s pretty fair, compared to everyone else. She knows Harry’s my boyfriend — I mean, everyone does, it’s humiliating—”

“Is it, now?” said Hermione crisply. “Is it terribly humiliating to be seen with him? I find it perfectly easy.”

“Hermione,” Harry muttered.

“I didn’t mean it like that! I’m not embarrassed of Harry! Obviously! But that doesn’t mean I like my name being in the papers!”

“No one likes it, Cho,” said Hermione, bridling, “but it’s not like they’re writing anything nasty about you. I’m sure having a parent on the editorial board makes certain of that.”

“It’s still not been easy for me, you know! I get hate mail! Someone sent me an envelope full of bubotuber pus the other day! And people stare at me funny in the hallways,” she ran on, “and Umbridge hates me, and I get detentions for every little thing, and I never asked for any of it!"

"None of us did," Hermione said tartly. "I'm sorry about the bubotuber pus. I had someone send me a little rag-doll with pins in it, and I agree, it's dreadful. But all of us had a pretty bad run in the papers last year—"

"Wow! Good for you!" Cho snapped. "It must be nice to be as brave and tough as you are, Hermione—"

"For God's sake, what do you want us to do? Wave our wands and make it go away?"

"I wish you'd be nice!" she cried. "I wish people would be nice to me, and don't act like that's such a stupid, silly thing to want! I want you to admit that it's not easy to stand up in front of all your friends and know they think you're dating a murderer!"

Hermione went still. She stepped forward, abortively, and stopped when Draco caught her shoulder.

"Murderer?"

"No — I didn't mean that. I mean, I know the truth, and that it wasn't — that he died because — I mean, not Harry, but — oh, Hermione, I'm really sorry, I didn't mean to bring up Viktor."

"It's fine."

"No, it isn't. I know you probably think I'm really selfish and stupid, sitting here whinging about popularity when someone died. And you're right. It's stupid. I'm being stupid and silly."

Hermione was expressionless. "It's fine."

"It isn't."

The bell groaned, and benches screeched with the force of hundreds rising to their feet. It mercifully smothered the silent dregs of the conversation.

“Cho—”

“Drop it,” snapped Harry. He worked his jaw like he meant to say something, but then thought better of it, and shook his head. “Would you just… drop it? Please? Listen. Draco, do me a favor. Go tell Ron and Ginny that they’ve got to find a place to hide until the train leaves tonight, and don’t drink anything Umbridge gives them.”

“I’m not an owl.”

“Did I say to deliver it personally, dolt?” said Harry. He spoke in a different register, a lower one, more businesslike and far less interested in dispute. “Get some of those first years in your fan club to do it, if you want—”

“I do not have a ‘fan club.’”

Hermione snorted.

“Not my problem. Now, where can we hide people until the trains leave?”

“I don’t know, I left my pocket dimension in my other trousers. There’s thirty of us, I don’t know what kind of palatial broom closets you hide in—”

“You wouldn’t need one,” said Hermione suddenly. She was drumming her fingers on her arm in the particular rhythm that meant her mind was running a few hundred miles an hour. “There are at least seven secret passages out of the castle. One’s caved in, of course, and another one’s by the Defense Against the Dark Arts classroom, so it’s likely buried under the swamp, but there’s one on the first floor, by Gregory the Smarmy, and another by the West Well, and one on the Hieroglyphic Hall— it's the one everyone uses for snogging—"

"Granger," said Ernie, scandalized. "I didn't take you for the type."

"I liked you better when you raised your hand," said Draco, and Ernie nearly swallowed his tongue. "What are you doing here, anyway? This is the Ravenclaw table."

"I'm — sharing notes — with Padma," said Ernie, strangled. Padma, unhappy to be invoked thusly, sipped her pumpkin juice with a powerful air of minding her own business.

"The point is," Hermione said, "there's at least four we could use. We could go in groups, ferry everyone out, and then hide out in Hogsmeade."

"For hours?" said Marietta. "Until the train? What do you expect us to do?"

"Bring crayons," said Hermione in annoyance. "I don't know. The plan itself is simple; the real difficulty is a coordination exercise. We can't all use one passage at once, they're not big enough, and we'd be bound to attract attention. We need rotating shifts — and someone who knows the passages has to lead them, me or Fred or George… ought to do it alphabetically, too, so that the students first called by Umbridge will be first out."

In clipped tones, Harry said, "I'll tell them."

He turned to leave. Hermione caught his arm. Then she turned to the Ravenclaws, and said haltingly: "Sorry, could you—"

"The bell rang five minutes ago," Draco interrupted. "Make yourself scarce. Or useful. Preferably both, but I have realistic expectations."

With a shriek of benches, the Ravenclaw table emptied. Marietta shot Hermione a final glower as she went, but she still hurried out of the hall.

“Harry, I’m—”

“Cho was right, you know.”

“What?”

“About being nice.” He set his jaw, and spoke with difficulty. “You were right. You’re always right, so it doesn’t — cost you — anything — to just let someone have it.”

“Harry—”

“It’s fine. Yeah? Yes, you’re smarter than I am. You’re better at this than I am. You’re the brains, and I’m the great useless idiot with the scar on his head who keeps mucking his way into danger and forcing other people to jump in front of curses for him. I know. I do know, actually.”

“That’s not what I think!”

“Whatever. I can’t win arguments with you,” he said tiredly. “I never have. Just… you didn’t need to go after Cho, and you didn’t need to snap at Marietta, and you really didn’t need to throw that thing about Padfoot in my face. You can admit that, right? Everything’s miserable enough without you biting our heads off.”

Hermione tightly folded her arms around her chest, holding herself like a small and delicate explosive.

“I’m sorry I said those things,” she said. “I shouldn’t have done. But my life hasn’t been completely un-miserable either, if you’d noticed, and I’m not the only one who’s been nastier than usual.”

Harry sighed and rubbed his eyes.

“I know,” he said. “Yeah. Sorry.”

The Great Hall had nearly emptied out, and the distant susurrus of footsteps on the grand staircase filled the atrium with echoes.

Hermione made a noncommittal noise. In fairness, Draco couldn't think of anything to say to this, either. What could one possibly answer? Yes, it was hard? Yes, he lived a life in which people his age could and did die, and there was not a night he went to sleep without green light flaring behind his eyelids? That those were the lucky nights when he slept at all?

"It'll be better when you're home," she said. "With family."

Harry made a funny expression: not quite a smile, not quite a grimace. Maybe it unsettled him, too, because he abruptly rubbed his mouth like he was trying to get it off.

"What?"

"Nothing, I… You know, I used to have that thought, when I was with the Dursleys," he said. "'It'll be better when you're home.' All the time. Only I was always talking about Hogwarts."

It was a slow, wretched afternoon. Queues that babbled distantly from the hallways outside Umbridge's and Filch's offices, and the chilly atria threw eerie echoes at the slightest footstep or groaning stair. Through the frost-embroidered windows the grounds were monochromatic and silent, lit in the dull blues of an overcast afternoon. The lawn was like a sheet of marble before the sculptor's first stroke, unbroken, unformed.

At one o'clock, Hermione had led a group of first years from the Defense Club down the passageway behind Gregory the Smarmy, most of whom could barely speak for the excitement of getting a prefect to sneak them out of the castle. Fred and George led a cohort of older students down the West Well, a long and winnowing passage that had to be rappelled at several points, while another group with Harry and Ron in it departed from the Well an hour later.

Draco, being one of the few at liberty to move freely about the castle, was stuck with the job of lookout, which he loathed completely. It involved a great deal of nothing important, only wandering around the empty hallways and flicking Trip Jinxes at members of the Inquisitorial Squad whenever they had the misfortune not to see him around the corner.

At five, he levitated his trunk down to the Entrance Hall and left it there for the house-elves to ferry onto the train. Then he walked to the library, fingering the Marauder's Map in his pocket. Now and then he ducked into an alcove to check the Map, following the peppery trail of dots drifting through the secret passages. HERMIONE GRANGER floated in and out of the edge of the map near Hogsmeade, along with dots marked POTTER and a whole confusion of WEASLEYs. She and Ron were meant to come back and meet him by the statue of Gregory at five-thirty in order to lead the final group, which included Luna, Padma, and Zacharias Smith.

Luna and Padma were dutifully waiting at the statue on time, their robes drawn up and wands out, but Smith was nowhere to be found. This would have been substantially more irritating if Hermione and Ron hadn't been equally late, and Draco checked the map increasingly as the minutes ticked past, eyeing the dark jots of their names at the end of the tunnel.

"Gosh, I hope they're alright," mused Luna. "There were all sorts of wrackspurts wandering around in the air earlier, I don't wonder that it's slow-going."

"What's a wrackspurt?" said Padma, who was knitting idly while they waited.

"It's a malign spirit. They hover around people in emotional distress and cause bad decisions. We've been swarmed with them all year. Look at Draco, for example."

"Piss off."

“You see?”

“Oh, dear,” said Padma. “Do I have them?”

“A few, but that’s because you’re visiting your grandmother for the holiday, and it makes you anxious. What’s the moon phase, again?”

“Waxing gibbous.”

“ Definitely anxious, then. But you needn’t worry, it’s going to go well.”

“Oh, good,” said Padma happily. She turned to Draco. “Luna’s top student in Divination, you know. She’s better at reading astrological charts than Trelawney.”

Hermione would have regarded this kind of statement as a dueling-caliber insult, but he kept that to himself.

The hall was drenched in shadow, alive with the echoes of settling floorboards and skittering footsteps through the distance, torchlight, ghosts, and cool whistling air.

The hardwood under their feet vanished into an inky pool of darkness at the far end of the hall. Oil portraits murmured softly from the walls above them, and their wands poured dim Lumos- light in shallow puddles around their legs, casting the underside of Luna’s face in silver, her eyes in dramatic sweeps of shadow.

When the statue moved, the shriek made them all twitch.

Hermione emerged from the passageway, her face daubed here and there with soot, her hair crowned with a tawny cap of sawdust. She wriggled out, face bright from exertion, and stepped out of the way from Ron, who grimaced and massaged his neck as soon as he emerged into a hallway that could accommodate his height.

“Sorry we’re late. There were patrolmen at the other end of the passage, and we had to wait for them to leave, it was completely awful on the nerves, I think Harry almost jumped out and jinxed them —”

“Where’s Zacharias?” said Ron, peering around.

“Lying at the bottom of a stairwell with a broken neck,” said Draco curtly, “or worse, if he knows what’s good for him.”

“Don’t say that. He could’ve run into the Inquisitorial Squad.” Hermione grabbed the Map. “Did you check the Hufflepuff dorms?”

“I say, what an idea.”

“Fine, silly question. Filch’s office? Umbridge’s?”

“Have you tried checking the grounds?” called Luna. “Zacharias likes an evening walk.”

“In pitch darkness?” muttered Hermione, rifling through the Map. “With the train leaving in thirty minutes?”

“No, she’s right,” exclaimed Ron, pointing at a blotch of ink moving swiftly over the Great Lawn. “Look. He’s just here, by the carriage depot — lazy bugger, bet he wanted to catch a carriage instead of walking.”

“Then he’s an idiot, because carriages are long gone,” snapped Hermione, checking her watch. “They would’ve left at four. He’s going to be out there, all alone, in the dark, and they’ll have locked the Hogsmeade gates at sunset. What a nitwit! Ron, show Luna and Padma back to the train station, we’ll meet you there with Zacharias.”

“Don’t love the splitting-up part of this plan,” said Ron in alarm. “Least favorite part of this plan. Right after the bit where you’re stranded in an empty castle with Umbridge and Filch. If she catches you—”

“So we’ll take the Map. It’ll be fine.”

“I still don’t like it.”

Draco felt distinctly peeved on at least two different fronts. Then Ron stepped past him and touched Hermione’s elbow, and a whole new front of irritation opened up at once.

Hermione didn’t appear to notice, being preoccupied tying up her hair.

“I’m a prefect,” she announced, as if that explained the whole matter. “Don’t worry about me. And anyway, I’ll have Draco with me, I’ll be fine.”

At first, she didn’t seem to realize what she’d said. Draco, whose whole chest had flooded with a buoyant, incandescent wave of pleasure, schooled his expression in order to avoid smirking.

Evidently he hadn’t succeeded, because she glanced at him and then scoffed. “Not that I couldn’t handle myself, I might add!”

“Never doubted it in the least.”

“I mean it! I could do it perfectly well on my own, I know the castle better than you do — oh, would you stop smirking, I didn’t say you were bloody Lancelot, you’re just handy with a wand—”

“A bit more than handy, thank you.”

“Handy,” she repeated firmly. “Useful. Not wholly inept. That’s all. Which is more than I can say for you lot, who ought to get going, or we’ll all be buggered!”

With a warning mutter of discontent, Ron clambered back into the passageway and led the girls down the narrow, ashen chute. Hermione watched them go, and then closed it with a brandish of her wand, slotting the statue back into place.

“Well,” she said, turning to Draco. She wiped her hands on her skirt, apprehensive, and there was a beat in which they regarded each other with the twin expectant stares.

Dirt from the passage smudged the rise of her cheek, covering one of his favorite freckles, and it bothered him. He wanted to remove it. One touch was all it would take.

She blinked first, and gestured to the corridor. “Let’s hurry up. I’d like to get out of here.”

The grounds were deathly still, shadows pooled under the white antlers of jagged and naked branches, shrouded in the smell of rich wet soil and the cool, fresh wind off the moors. The trees arched to and fro in the arms of the wind like skeletal creatures nodding to a silent symphony. The dark windows of Hagrid’s cabin reflected the icy pinpricks of Lumos-light, sparkling in the darkness like landlocked stars.

Their wands cast narrow fans of light that reflected almost blindingly from the snow, turning the path ahead of them into a dull sheet of black-and-white film. Snow fell slowly in a trickle of salt grains, coalescing on their shoulders and hair. Their boots crunched on loose snow and frozen pebbles. Hermione held the Map in one hand and her wand in the other.

“Does Veritaserum have an antidote, by chance?” she said. Her voice fell like velvet on the snow.

“Not one that’s nearby. It’d take three weeks over a cauldron, not to mention a small fortune at an apothecary.”

“Which means I’m going to spend my afternoon hiding in a broom closet somewhere. We got off on pure luck with Cho, by the way — if she’s dosed everyone in the Defense Club, we’re absolutely scuppered, I like Seamus alright but he’s not exactly the soul of discretion—”

“She can’t dose everyone.”

“Why not?”

“Because she’d need more of the stuff than exists on the planet at a given time. Veritaserum is diabolically complex. Snape’s one of maybe a hundred people alive who could render a passable batch, and that only yields a few doses.”

“Hm. I suppose.” She stepped away and ventured a few steps down the hillside, and then turned back at him, and with a sort of quick, darting glance, touched his arm. “It’s slippery here. Watch out.”

Her hand stayed there as they picked their way down the slope. Her small fingers were cold and tight on his arm.

He could have pointed out, in the interests of fairness, that there were charms to make the surface dryer, or more even, or to lift their steps. But he didn’t, and she didn’t use them. When she slid her arm through his at the bottom, he kept silent on the subject, as if the silence was giving them both permission to do something that couldn’t happen outside of it.

At the depot where the carriages usually waited, Zacharias was nowhere to be found. Hermione put away the Map and swept her wand over the surrounding trees, her light darting over a ribbed vista of white wood and coal-black bark.

“Zacharias?”

“Don’t go yowling for him, someone could hear.”

“There’s no one out here. It’s pitch black and snowing, everyone sane is indoors.”

“I quite agree. Ow.”

“You deserved that. The Map ends just here, I think, but he’s gone… He must’ve tried to walk to Hogsmeade to catch the train. Here, this way.”

The shadows melded and coupled behind them in sinewy ropes. Light from the castle sent a pale spill over the hillside, glinting here and there on a frosted leaf, a jeweled twig, a glittering snowbank. Wind moaned through the branches, and then went abruptly silent, as if it had been drawn into a void.

Something tightened in his inner ear. It was hard to describe, but magic — even benign magic — had an energy, a tension. If one cast a spell often enough, one gained a sense for what it felt like. Muffliato, for instance.

He pivoted on his heel. Four silhouettes darkened the hillside under the castle, framed by the black brackets of trees. Their overcoats stirred silently in the wind. For a heartbeat, he thought they were teachers, but their frames were too small.

Hermione lifted her wand. Light paved the faces of Theo, Pansy, Blaise, and a tall girl with black curls who could have been Blaise's twin. It was Tracy Davis, one of the girls that Daphne had rowed with in the Three Broomsticks.

"I have to admit, I enjoy this angle," called Theo. The gold pin glinted on his tie. "I didn't give you half enough credit. I'm beginning to understand your obsession with the high ground."

Draco found his voice carried quite easily up the hill. "Some of us prefer not to make our home in the dungeon."

"Some of us weren't invited to."

Blaise yawned. "Lord help us, they're doing subtext," he murmured to Tracy. "Let's go get a drink, perhaps they'll be ready to get on with it when we get back."

Pansy drew her wand. Though she was the shortest of anyone present, the angle of the hillside drew her shadow into a forty-foot creature.

Hermione twitched her wrist. Her Lumos faded.

“Granger was supposed to report to Professor Umbridge’s office this morning,” said Pansy.

“The train’s leaving soon,” said Hermione.

“You’ll be put on a carriage to London next morning.”

“Actually, I rather think I’ll be taking my train,” she said.

Pansy pursed her lips. Then she turned to Draco. “Tell her why she needs to come with us,” she ordered. “She isn’t going to get flayed or anything.”

“Parkinson, I don’t know who you think you’re taking that tone with, but it’s certainly not me.”

Pansy’s face crumpled with childlike frustration: a girl who hadn’t got the doll she wanted. She ground her heel into the earth. “Come on!” she whined. She whirled on Theo, and addressed her next to him: “Do something! It’s cold! I should be in front of a fireplace getting my feet rubbed, not slogging after delinquents in the woods!”

“Hear, hear,” said Tracy. “You heard the woman, Theodorus. I’m bored of this.”

“Shut up, Trace,” said Pansy at once. “Nobody asked you to come.”

“I wanted to be involved.”

“With whom?” said Blaise innocently. Tracy threw him a breezy smile and a brutal elbow. He keeled to one side with a grunt, and Pansy sprang clear, grabbing Theo for balance.

Draco blinked. Memory flared like a camera’s flashbulb, and he was staring at a brilliant vista in southern France, while a dark-haired girl watched a dark-haired boy do giddy loops on his broomstick in a sun-flushed azure sky.

It vanished, and it was a snowy evening in Scotland, and the light was pale and thin.

Theo drew his wand. So did Blaise, massaging his abdomen, and Tracy.

Draco rolled his wand across his fingers and stepped into a duelist's position. Hermione gave an irritated huff, and her fingers closed around his offhand in a cold band.

"Draco."

"What?"

"There's four of them. And two of us."

"Which will make what I'm about to do much more impressive."

"Draco!"

"This is the part where you start running."

"Oh, like hell."

"Granger," he said, verging on a snarl — Theo was starting to climb down the hillside, now — "they're coming after you, not me. Run."

"Yes! Let's!"

"I'll catch up."

"No, you won't! You're going to pick a fight," she snapped, "because Theo's up there and you're pissed at him, and you've been spoiling for a fight with him since June!"

"That's not why."

"Yes, it is! You want him to hurt, and so do I, but one of us has to think clearly—"

He wrenched his arm out of her grasp, and she made an outraged sound when he broke free of her.

“Hermione, run.”

She gave a shriek of exasperation, wheeled away from him, and lashed her wand into the air.

“Confringo!”

Blue flames blossomed into the air like a tide of dragonbreath, radiating waves of rippling heat. They seared back layers of snow at a touch, sending clouds of billowing steam up from the hillside. Blaise and Tracy sprang back with high, panicked yelps as boiling steam surged from the ground at their feat. Fog and steam and smoke fused into a thick white bloom that erupted between them and the Slytherins, blotting out their silhouettes and the lights from the castle, plunging the whole world into darkness save for the flickering blue of her firelights.

He couldn’t see; visibility was next to nothing, and the world tasted of smoke. He coughed into his arm, ducking back from the row of guttering flames; and something closed around his hand, and wrenched. He was hauled back into the forest by the arm, and fumbled into a run, towed along behind a madwoman’s headlong deadsprint into the shadows.

“What the devil are you doing?”

“Solving a problem! You might try it!”

“You set the lawn on fire! You little maniac—”

“And your solution was shoving me behind your back and trying to fight everything that moved!”

“What can I say,” he snarled, “I learned from the best,” and he overtook her, racing through the stinging cold.

A jinx slit the air behind them, red-white and sizzling. Hermione cried out and slipped, tearing her hand free, and when he turned back there was another jinx that made him leap aside. It was pitch-dark without Lumos to light the way, and he could barely see in front of his feet on the ice-slick ground, let alone the branches that seemed to come soaring down from the darkness and swing for his face. He lashed up his wand and cast a Shield, catching a jinx in an explosion of sparks. Hermione scrambled to her feet and took off again. He threw two Stunners back into the trees and then followed her.

The total darkness made his nerves smolder with fear. Hermione bobbed in and out of view between the trees, her hair a dark blur against the gray sheet of snow. Flying spells collided with underbrush and trees and detonated small explosions of wood behind them. Muffled voices echoed harshly through the trees, like the shrieks of hunting birds.

The path swung down through a gorge and up a hill on the other side. A Stunning Spell cut between them and soared overhead, its red gleam illuminating the sharp bend in the earth.

It happened inside the space of a heartbeat, in the time it took him to check over his shoulder for someone following: there was a yelp, a loud skitter of falling rocks, and when he turned, Hermione had vanished.

“Hermione? Hermione!”

He threw himself to a halt. His lungs screamed from the strain and a sudden inability to draw enough air.

Lights flickered off in the distance, drawing away. Footsteps drifted out of earshot. He waited, but no answer came.

“Herm—”

“Flipendo!”

A bolt of force collided with his legs. It threw him backward and dropped him on his back. He threw up his wand and thrust it into the darkness, heart hammering.

“Stu—”

“Expelliarmus!”

His wand leapt out of his hand and soared into the awaiting fist of Pansy, who stepped out of the trees and caught it neatly, her small, haughty lips peeled in a sneer. She tugged down her sleeve, under which a crust of blood winked, tellingly.

Pansy was no great hand at charms, but she had her tricks.

A gold tie pin slitted her coal-black tie, the same color as her short, choppy hair. Without the trappings of Slytherin House, Pansy seemed older. Her cloak was tattered along the undersides with mud, slightly singed. He couldn’t recall when he’d seen her in such disarray.

They regarded each other in dull shock for a moment.

“You idiot,” she said bitterly, breaking the silence. “You could have just come with us.”

“There is no world,” he said, his voice uneven from exertion and anger mixed, “where I take her to Umbridge. None. That you would think otherwise for a moment speaks to how very little you understand about me, or indeed anything.”

“Merlin’s sake! Umbridge? This is about Umbridge?” She threw up her hands, which each gripped a wand, hers and his. “Are you serious? She’s a nothing, a sycophant, a middle-class bureaucrat, she’d wash my boots with her tongue if I told her to!”

“Maybe word of this hasn’t reached the dungeons yet, but your school’s under martial law.”

“Because your quidditch team was suspended? Because you have detention? I wake up praying for days like that! Some of us have real problems!”

“Like planning a wedding? Dress fittings? Choosing napkins?”

“Oh, go fuck yourself, Draco.”

“You first.” This was not a slice to the jugular as much as a fumbling paper-cut to the thumb. “I can name people who wake up praying for your problems, too.”

Twigs shattered behind them. Pansy whirled, and Tracy’s broad silhouette came trotting out of trees.

“You got him! Good shot, Pan-Pan!”

“Gag yourself, please,” said Pansy at once, politely. “Call me that again and I’ll show you what your tongue looks like when it’s not connected to the rest of you. Did you get Granger?”

“No, Theo went after her. Blaise thinks he sprained his ankle in the fire, so he went back.”

“God, he’s such a pantywaist.”

“I was proud he even came.”

“Quit gloating, you’re still one too. Now run and get Teddy, make yourself useful.”

“What, now?”

“No, actually, how’s your Tuesday — yes, now, moron!”

Tracy scowled at her and sauntered out of the clearing. “I’m telling him you were mean to me.”

“Good! It’ll cheer him up.”

“I hate you desperately, Parkinson.”

Pansy lifted her wand. Draco braced himself, but the point drifted away from him, and settled on Tracy’s retreating back.

“Bully for you,” called Pansy. “Someday, I might even care. Stupefy.”

There was a muffled cry, and a thud.

Pansy pointed at Draco. “Stay,” she ordered, and then darted into the woods in the direction Tracy had gone. Moments later, she returned, picking her way through the underbrush with the awkward distaste of someone more used to parquet and marble.

“Got her,” she declared. “My Stunner’s quite bad, unfortunately, so we’ve only got a minute. If she asks, I’m going to tell her that was you, so be a good fellow and don’t rat.”

“Because I’m flush with reasons to do you favors.”

“Yes, because I’m about to do a mammoth one for you,” she snapped. “I’m going to let you go. Alright? Look at me, I’m a humanitarian. But first I’m going to ask you for something, and you’re going to nod your head and say yes like a good little boy, or I’ll park you here while Teddy and I drag your mudblood back to the castle by the ends of her bloody big hair — don’t you try and hit me, either, you shit, I told you I’m being nice. Here.” She dropped to a crouch, placed his wand carefully out of reach, and withdrew from her breast pocket before a boxy envelope sealed in emerald wax. It was unaddressed.

“You’re going to give this to Daphne,” she said flatly, holding it out. He gave it an unimpressed sneer, and then gave her another. “You’re — no, yes, you are. You’re not going to open it, either — don’t be offended, I’d be nosy, too — but the sealant wax is jinxed to slice your fingers open. I thought of everything, you see. Don’t let her do anything dramatic like pitch it out the window, and you know she’ll probably try to, the silly goose. And once you’ve made her read it, you'll tell her to burn it, and you're going to watch her burn it, because I adore her, but she is a lying, simpering little viper who could find a way to cheat in a coin toss."

"And you're that plus presumptuous," he said. "You don't seem to get how this works. I'll be doing you a favor if I don't jinx you into a pile of ashes."

"One thing I like about you, Draco, is I can count on you for a laugh."

She stuffed the letter into his robe pocket and then scrambled back, putting a clearing's worth of distance between them.

"When I give you your wand back," she warned, "promise you won't try jinxing me or anything."

"Absolutely not."

"Fine. But when you Stun me, try not to pitch me into a tree or something; please recall that I hit you with very easy jinxes to undo, and there's an Eyeball-Melting Jinx I've been dying to try for ages."

"You're a saint."

"I keep saying it, but no one believes me. Catch."

She pitched his wand at him. Unfortunately, she had a terrible arm, and it flailed awkwardly into the dirt some distance from his hand. He leaned over and snatched it up, then dispelled the jinxes on his legs and ankles with two sharp flicks. He stood, brushing dirt and snow from his robes.

"Answer me something," he said. "You want to get a message to Daphne? You have an owl. You also have legs and a passable mastery of English. Explain yourself."

She gave him a flat look. "The post's being watched," she said. "And even if Daphne were talking to me these days, which she isn't, the castle’s not safe for that. The walls have ears. The ears in the walls have ears. There’s no such thing as a secret at Hogwarts.”

He considered this explanation, and accepted it. He nodded.

He stood up — straightened his shoulders — and then whipped a curse past her ear, glittering in barbed red.

She shrieked and balked, throwing her arms over her head.

“That’s for threatening me.”

“Was that supposed to hit me? That was a proper curse! A real one! Stun me, I said!”

“I heard you.”

The Stinging Jinx snapped her head around. She shrieked, clutching the swelling ridge of her bottom lip.

He crossed the clearing briskly and plucked the wand out of her hand, pitching it into the forest.

“That was for ‘mudblood,’” he said. “The next one will be worse.”

Her stare was one part anger to many parts shock. “Tha’ hurt, you twat,” she garbled out.

“Stupefy.”

Pansy folded into the dirt.

He turned on his heel and swept out of the clearing, his cloak stirring a billow of snow in his wake.

The path winnowed wearily up towards Hogsmeade under a glacial ribbon of frost. He slit open long flanks of forest underbrush with Diffindo and stepped through them, moving quickly and making little noise. He couldn’t hear Hermione or Theo and he didn’t know if that was better or worse than the alternative. His pulse beat hard and fast, like someone had a hand around his throat, and it tightened with every heartbeat.

Slick slabs of thick mud ran up to Hogsmeade. Somewhere, the train crooned. He ran up the path and then swung around the corner, breaking onto the last straight-away to the Hogsmeade gates and the train station. The path was empty: a muddy track up to a distant bead of yellow lamp-light, dappled in woods.

He lit his wand and swept it around. Seconds raced by with cruel haste, like the cold wind snaking across his neck.

“Hermione?” he said. He loathed how his voice sounded, flat and small, crushed into almost nothing by the vastness of the forest. He hated the desperation in it, the need. It was constricting, consuming. It was hellish.

The sky was so dark that he couldn’t tell where it ended, and the trees began. The trees creaked, murmuring to each other in low conspiracy.

Suddenly there was a sound, an echo of a voice, rippling from between the trees. He cut a path through the brambles with a Withering Charm that ripped back vines like burning paper.

A watery silver light hovered at the base of an oak tree the size of Gryffindor Tower. Images of will-o-wisps, fairy creatures, the things that lured lone travelers away from safety, and into the dark — but on approach, it resolved into the plain, cold beam of Lumos.

“Draco?”

“Hermione.”

She was braced against one of the vast roots, her arm cupped in the cradle of her lap, knees bent and crushed against her chest, as if to make herself as small as possible. Her cloak pooled around her, shockingly dark on the snow, like a radius of oil. Her wand was gripped tightly in the wrong hand, and in the thin light it took a moment to notice the dark red stain — the weak light turned it nearly black — soaking through the white of her shirtsleeve.

“Hermione—”

“Fine! I’m fine,” she exclaimed, eyes widening, and scrambled up — he didn’t know what his face looked like to make her move up like that, but she was halfway to her feet when he caught her and all but shoved her back down again. “I’m fine! It looks worse than it is—”

He stripped back her both and sleeve with a carelessly forceful movement, ripping both. “What,” he said tautly, “and where?”

“Just the wrist. The arm. It’s a superficial wound, more blood than you’d think, honestly, I’ve already healed some of it myself.” She was talking too much to be convincing.

“Nott did this?”

“No. Well, not exactly. He threw some sort of jinx, and I blocked most of it but I lost my footing and fell, and I must’ve cut myself on a rock or some broken ice or something. Of course, then I was in the bush and my light had gone out, so he didn’t see anything.”

He drew her arm into his lap and glided his wand across it. The blood coursed off her skin in dark ribbons. Underneath it lay a long, deep, but relatively thin cut across her forearm.

“I lost him, though,” she said, thick with triumph. “It didn’t take ten minutes, altogether, after we were separated. And I’m pretty sure I got him with a Horn-Tongue Hex, which probably wasn’t as useful as some other spells, but it was the heat of the moment and I chose the nastiest thing I could think of. To be honest, I doubt he was trying that hard to catch me, though that’s not terribly surprising, they’re none of them known for their love of hard work—”

“You’re rambling.”

“Yes,” she said, “well. It hurts.”

His hand flexed on her wrist, but he set his teeth and made it still. “Brace yourself.”

“For wh– OW! Ow ow ow ow stop it.”

Episkey wasn’t enough for a deep cut. He had to pull the skin back together, which required a different kind of spell, and then put in a row of stitches; not good ones, but ones that would hold until they could find someone qualified to do better ones.

Hermione was squirming unhappily, and almost kicked him in the legs. Briskly, he caught her knee and flattened it, then knelt across her, pinning her down.

“That stings,” she said breathlessly.

“I know. You’re alright.” In want of a better bandage, he flipped her hand over, tugged his handkerchief out, and folded it across the shiny raw scars. “You’re going to be alright. It’s fine.”

She set her jaw. “Did you — ah — did you run into the others?”

“Parkinson and Davis. I dealt with them.”

“What does that mean? Where are they?”

He carefully pulled her arm away from her body, inspecting her for other cuts or injuries. She seemed well, not to mention a bit unnerved at the inspection; she withdrew and folded her arms over her chest, eyeing him.

“They’ll be fine.” He would revisit the idea at length later. “Can you stand?”

“Yes, because I’m fine,” she said pointedly, rolling to her feet. He slipped an arm around her waist to guide her up, partly because it was an excuse to do so, and because he was skeptical of her claims to being unaffected; she swayed when she stood up, and he ran a mental calculation on the amount of blood that she could have lost before he came. Not as much as she would have if he’d been faster, at any rate. He was slow, a slow idiot, to let Pansy prattle at him for God knew how long.

“You’re such a fusser,” she muttered, though that didn’t stop her from sneaking an arm around his shoulders to lean on him. “You’d think I lost a limb. You’ve come back from quidditch matches in worse shape than this.”

“That is a bar one clears by crawling.”

She stood up gingerly, using him as a sort of brace. He caught her other arm. She was warm, radiantly warm, although he’d been in the cold so long that his hands likely would have taken pleasure in anything that wasn’t freezing. Their breath was white silk in the air.

His heart still ran at an unusual pace, but at least it didn’t feel like he was about to give himself a stroke anymore.

She started to pull away, then stopped, turned back into him, and put her head against his chest. He caught the back of her head with his hand and held her there, assuming, for an alarmed moment, that she was about to collapse.

“What? What’s the matter?”

“Nothing’s the matter. Why do you assume every time someone touches you, it means they’re in peril?”

“Because they’re touching me. Ergo, they are in peril.”

“I touch you,” she retorted.

She was irresistibly contrary.

“You live in a state of peril,” he said. “You can afford the risk.”

She broke into a giggle.

The train interrupted them with an urgent groan. Hermione froze. He lifted his head.

“Fuck.”

“Fuck,” she agreed, spinning around.

She broke into a run. The snow burst up in white artilleries at their feet. Branches snapped on his arms and face, thin stinging whips on his skin. The train gave another shout, and smoke burst from its pipes like the trilling mouth of a volcano. With a groan of machinery, it thrust itself into motion.

He tore out of the woods and broke onto the clean pavement of the station, desolate and empty. The train rolled away, gathering speed. Hermione gave a cry.

The end of the train glided past them. The platform was running out in front of them. He jumped and caught hold of the rail at the viewing deck, and the jolt almost tore his arm from his socket. Hermione shouted and jumped after him — he caught her by the waist, pulling — and then she was scrambling over the railing, tumbling to the ground, letting out a thin high sound that he recognized as relief. He hurled himself over the side and then dropped to one knee on the safe side of the railing, breathing quickly, as the station shot away behind them, and the train soared off into the Scottish highlands with both of them onboard.

The lights of the station receded. The gas lamps became a smear of oily yellow in the darkness. The air was a grainy blur of snow, washed white in the light from the train. He stilled for a moment, breathing in and out, while the carriage rattled with each bend and sway in the track.

By and by, Hermione gave a shuddering gasp and then sat upright, reaching for his arm. The train hit a bend and jolted them both, sending her scrabbling for purchase on the rail.

“Oh, God — Christ, thought — make — were… alright?”

“What?” He could barely hear her over the shriek of the wind outside the train.

“Are you alright?”

“Fine.”

“Good! God — can’t — believe!” Every third word was stolen by the shriek of the train. That was why he didn’t immediately realize she was laughing. Her face shone ruddy from exertion and adrenaline, her hair stirred to complete wilderness by the wind. There was a feral kind of joy in it, along with the fear and the relief, and he pitied the fool who forgot that she was a Gryffindor, and had always been. When the train hit another bump she caught the front of his robes for balance. He caught her wrist. Her gaze flickered, caught, and held him.

“You—alright—” she repeated. He didn’t hear her, but he could see her mouth the shape of the words.

The train dove into a tunnel, and the light plummeted. The wind died, and suddenly he could hear her again. She was saying: “—to take a car from Aberdeen, and I would’ve had to drive, would’ve killed us both if you didn’t try to do it first—”

“What the hell are you talking about?”

“Who cares!” she exclaimed, flinging out her arms. “We made it! It’s Christmas, we won, and we’re going home!”

He returned her smile, thinly. “Steady on. You’re going to set something on fire.”

“I already did!”

“Well, that’s Granger for you, can’t go five minutes without immolating something.”

She shrieked in laughter and hugged him.

Nothing felt real; there was an unreality to the light and the cold and the rattling train, dreamlike, an impressionist’s tundra. One moment he was speaking, and she was watching him in exhilaration, her shoulders rising and falling as she struggled to draw breath. Her beam was electrically bright and glassy.

Athena glaukopis. Lady of the shining eyes.

“Admit it was clever,” she said. “It was good. Wasn’t it? I didn’t — I didn’t freeze up. I was good. Tell me it was good.”

“Needy little thing, aren’t you? Like to hear the obvious?”

“Yes. Yes! So what? I want to hear you say it.”

“As you like,” he said, helplessly compelled. “Here’s the obvious: that went improbably well; it’s fucking freezing out here; the Channel is wet; and you, Hermione Granger, are a very clever girl.”

With a high, happy chirp of laughter, she jumped up and kissed him.

There was a long blank second where there was nothing in the world.

Her mouth was warm and slightly parted and she made a gentle noise of surprise, which was a shot of pure energy into the white clear center of his drifting brain. He floated.

The train sailed out of the tunnel in a sudden douse of wind and moonlight.

Before she had time to find her head, he took her waist and pulled her into him and kissed her back. Her hands on his neck were cold and insistent and pulling him down as he pulled her up, like a mermaid drawing him down into dark, warm waters. The snow-capped crag of the moors vanished. Annihilated by disinterest. He bent her back over his arm and kissed her the way he'd wanted to yesterday and last week and all year and possibly forever, nudging open her mouth and locking it into his, moving together like they'd been doing it for years. She was shaking and had one hand in his hair, gripping it and the front of his shirt like she was backed over a cliff and for some reason that made sense, it all made sense, for once there was nothing in his body that didn't make perfect, spectacular, brilliant sense.

It was almost more urgent than it was pleasant. It was good, but it was serious, it was important, it was vital that he continue it for the rest of his life. He turned his head and kissed Hermione Granger again, and the second time was better than the first. The third made them both look childish.

She broke off and jumped apart, breathing hard.

"Sorry," she gasped, while he stared at her with not one single thought in his entire fucking head. She raked her hair back from her face. Her shirt had wrinkles where he'd touched it, like it remembered him. He looked forward to having thoughts about that, sometime, when he resumed having thoughts.

She smoothed her hands down her neck and exhaled, blinking. Abruptly, she shook her head.

And then Hermione — daring, clever, sensible, and meticulous Hermione — threw open the door to the carriage and ran away.

Hey, guys. Sorry about the wait. I... yeah, I don't have more than that right now.

Taking any hopes, prayers, or survival tips.

Miss ya. Love ya. See ya soon as I can.

In the Black Midwinter

Chapter 69: In the Black Midwinter

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

“No, we haven’t seen Hermione,” said Harry, lifting his head in surprise. “Why?”

“She’s not with you?” said Ron sharply. Ginny lowered her hand of Exploding Snap. “Didn’t you get on the train together? We thought you followed us.”

“We did,” said Draco, who would have lacked patience for Ron’s tone even in much better moods. “She’s on the train. I merely lost sight of her.”

“How’d you manage that? It’s one bloody aisle with carriages on, and they’ve windows in ’em—”

“Not ones you seem to have made use of, seeing as she’d have passed this compartment, and you didn’t notice — nor did you exhaust yourself looking for us, I’d add—”

“Oi! We did two rounds of the train! Worried sick, weren’t we, but we couldn’t find you, and we couldn’t get in the prefects’, so excuse us for having a sit—”

“Pardon me if I won’t, seeing as I just polished off a deadsprint from the castle onto a moving train—”

“You wot?”

“Pipe down,” said Ginny, to evil-eyed compliance from both interlocutors. “She’s a witch. Reckon if she wants a moment to herself, she can manage one.”

The truth of this was accepted in silence by three ill-comforted wizards; then, by way of an olive branch, Ron cleared his throat. “Onto a moving train, you said?”

“Long story.”

“We’ve got until London,” suggested Ginny, drawing her legs off the bench to clear space.

Draco casted a glance down the hall. The train rattled, raising a small thunder in the luggage racks. The ghostly print of small hands lingered on his skin.

“She’ll probably turn up in a minute,” said Harry, somewhat pointedly.

The weight of growing awkwardness tipped the scales. Draco closed the door behind him.

But she did not turn up in a minute, nor an hour, nor by the end of the ride, whereon the four of them disembarked to Platform Nine and Three-Quarters to a close-knit crowd that made finding anyone particular, not least a small witch of considerable talent, next to impossible. Mad-Eye and Arthur had come to collect those going to Number Twelve, and Eventually the Weasleys and Harry turned on him with mutual grimaces of sympathy and concern.

“Suppose we stop by the Grangers’ on the way home,” Ron said, “just to see if she made it — or pop over to a telly-phone and call.”

“Call whom? The answering machine?” said Draco coolly. The fact that Ron supposed himself to be on ‘stopping-by’ terms with the Grangers rankled him. “They’ll have driven here to get her.”

“Bully. Let’s find them, why don’t we, then?”

“Because we’ll miss our portkeys,” growled Mad-Eye, who wore a lavish black wig for a disguise. “An’ I’m not walking you lot through the streets of London so long as I fancy my freedom. I'd do better to make Runcorn my Secret-Keeper."

"Fine," interrupted Harry, who despite being under the Invisibility Cloak communicated a scowl quite well. "You can take Ginny and the twins, and Ron and I will use the Cloak—"

"Nice try, Potter."

"How about Draco?" said Arthur helpfully. "You could stay, couldn't you, lad? You'll be here anyway, to make your connection to Wiltshire. Why don't you go find the Grangers?"

"He doesn't know what they look like," Ron said, apparently without thinking, and then stopped. Ginny turned sharply to stare at Ron, flickering a glance at Draco.

Belatedly, Ron froze and glanced at Draco, too. There was a pause with teeth.

Draco slipped his hands in his pockets and held Ron's gaze as neutrally as he felt capable, which was not very.

"No," he said, "but I know what she does."

Ron's cheek twitched. He averted his eyes.

"I've only met them twice," said Harry, apparently in response to nothing in particular. "For the record."

"We can all recount our fond acquaintance with the Grangers later," snapped Mad-Eye. "She's a clever lass. She'll turn up. Malfoy, good day. Weasleys, with your father. Potter, with me."

His hand shot out and grabbed a handful of thin air — the air gave a high yelp — and he cut off through the crowd at top speed. The Weasleys followed him with varying reluctance, Ron lingering until Ginny stuck her head back through the platform wall and hauled him out by the sleeve.

Draco, whose train would not come for another hour, waited on the platform until the train was all but empty; but since no muggles remained on the platform by that time, the Grangers, if they had ever been there, seemed to have left; and so he boarded his connection, however unwillingly, with a dull weight in the pit of his stomach.

The entrance to Malfoy Manor was empty. Calls to his mother received no answer. The windows gazed back at him like a long line of gray eyes, fogged with frost.

He dropped his luggage in the foyer, went straight through to the gallery, and snapped the lock on his father’s broomstick collection.

The most expensive was a vintage Firebolt Imperator, which Lucius had anecdotally procured by calling in a favor with the Grand Duke of Luxembourg. It was worth three hundred thousand galleons by itself, and five with the factory seal on.

Draco stripped off the seal and hauled open a window.

Why would you kiss someone and then run away?

Possibility the first: she had undergone a spontaneous realization of having made a colossal mistake. She had, in remorse for this act, fled the scene of the act, hurled herself from the train, and died.

Possibility the second, adopting the same premise: having fled, she had discreetly exited the train in the usual way, and was now tucked away somewhere in muggle London, drafting an eloquent resignation from their friendship, Gryffindor House, and Hogwarts itself, never to be seen again.

Possibility the third: She was mad, and there was no point trying to understand her at all, because she was a cruel and lovely sprite sent from the aether as a personal envoy of misery and torment. This last seemed to be the strongest theoretical explanation.

When the Imperator accelerated, the jetstream felt like razing off a layer of skin.

Narcissa didn’t return for the first few days of the vacation. This was a mixed blessing. On the one hand, it relieved him of the need to come up with an excuse for his foul mood. On the other hand, the reasons she could have for being absent did nothing to improve said mood, either.

He ordered Briselda to keep the Floo grates open and set the table for two at meals. He practiced with the dueling wands in the gallery, dismembering mannequins with an efficiency that bordered cruelty. He flew for hours through snowstorms that doused the grounds in white ice. He tried not to think about Hermione. That would have been easier if he couldn’t remember the feeling of her mouth like it was the only thing that had ever happened to him.

Why would you kiss someone and then run away? If you thought you’d made a mistake. If you didn’t want to have kissed them in the first place. If you’d detonated five years of friendship because you were careless, because you’d acted without thinking, and wanted to take it back as soon as you did. Because you knew the boy you’d kissed would want too much, because he bled things dry; because your heart was worthy of people like Viktor Krum, who could give themselves freely and selflessly, and who stepped willingly onto the sacrificial pyre, because the metal of their souls was cut from the same spiritual ore, and it was a finer alloy than his own.

Because the boy had known this, and kissed you anyway. For he had always drunk in all the attention as you could give him and still demanded more, because he was selfish, and not the kind of person you would want to be attached to, if you were a brilliant girl with a heart like an open door. Because he never met someone Because he loved like a sinkhole, which was to say, badly.

You ran away if everything was over, but you couldn’t say that, so you left them standing on the back of a train with the wind and the cold and the ghost of a kiss still warm on their lips.

After the first three starts of a letter to Hermione failed to yield anything tolerable, he began a different letter entirely.

Dear Dr. & Dr. Granger,

I apologize for the necessary impropriety of addressing you in print without a personal introduction to precede it. Please trust that under no circumstance but urgency would I consider it appropriate to take this liberty with persons of such esteem and of such close relation to someone I consider a dear friend.

I therefore take the liberty of introducing myself as Draco Lucius Malfoy, Lord Apparent of House Malfoy, Master Apparent of Malfoy Manor, and an inveterate companion of your daughter, Ms. Hermione Granger.

While one regrets deeply to demand favors on the heels of introductions, one would nevertheless appreciate confirmation that said daughter has safe passage to her dwelling, and resides with you in a reasonable state of health. While one does not consider oneself fretful, her departure from the castle occurred under such circumstances as to make such inquiries appropriate for those with an interest in her wellbeing.

One also would like to inquire as to the state of her arm, and attaches with this missive a small poultice of dittany, in the event that the answer is not favorable.

I wish you good tidings, and hope that you will be unhesitating in your solicitations of assistance from me, should it ever lie within my power to render it.

Yours sincerely,

Draco L. Malfoy

He attached both letter and package to Ulysses's leg, and released him into a silver sky, feeling a foreboding commingled with irritation.

Ulysses came back by the end of the next day, carrying a letter that was written on fresh white paper instead of parchment.

Draco,

I don't know what unearthly idiocy compelled you to write to my parents (!) instead of me, but thank you ever so much (!!) for doing so because now in addition to explaining why an owl flew into their window at half six I got a nice full day of trying to convince them my friend isn't a real member of the British peerage, even though you go around calling yourself 'lord'(!!!) and generally otherwise write like someone picked you up out of Middlemarch. And thanks also for leading them both to freak out and COMPLETELY overreact to an injury that I previously had made the executive personal (!!!!) decision not to tell them about, because (1) it is my business and (2) explaining the relative frequency and normalcy of injury in the Wizarding World to a pair of dentists was not a source of anticipation for my winter holiday!(!!!!!) Really, I can't possibly thank you enough!

I have been instructed to inform you that I am safe, and to apologize for any distress. They also thank you profusely for the poultice, which they have insisted that I make use of, and so you may add the waste of a perfectly good bottle of dittany as another offspring of your letter.

If you felt like checking up, you might have at least tried writing me first, instead of doing what you did, which made my parents think I'd been ignoring your letters (which didn't exist). If you don't want me to to write to me that's fine, and I certainly won't demand that you should, but if you're not going to write to me then you shouldn't expect to hear anything about how I am. For your information I would have been perfectly happy to answer a letter from you under different circumstances and in fact would have welcomed one. At any rate we've been corresponding for years so I don't have any idea why you've decided to stop now.

Sincerely,

Hermione Granger

Granger,

Three points.

Matters relating to your health are indeed primarily 'your business,' but it does not follow that they are not mine. That wound did need dittany, and while I rarely risk saying so, our Potions marks testify that I am, in fact, a better judge of that than you. Because neither I nor Potter nor Weasley(s) had any idea what became of you on the train, you will pardon me for writing directly to persons I could reasonably expect to answer, out of urgency. Any show of life from you would have been more than sufficient to forestall my inquiry. I would also have welcomed any letter from you, as I am sure you could have inferred. I did not 'stop corresponding' with you, nor will I, until fortune sees fit to remove my hands at the wrists.

In sum, you have behaved erratically, uncharacteristically, and illogically, and we were all much concerned about it. That I may have had special reasons for concern, concerning the circumstances of our departure, should be perfectly clear.

I have attached another volume of dittany. I request that you return the empty vial with your reply as proof of use.

Yours sincerely,

Draco

P.S. I am a member of the British peerage, just not the one they're familiar with. And knowing your opinion of 'Middlemarch,' I should think the comparison a compliment.

Draco,

Eight points.

Whether or not my health is your business, my decision to share information about it with my parents is mine exclusively. My parents, as you may or may not be aware, are muggles, and are not very keen on their daughter continuing to attend a school where muggle-borns are looked on unfavorably, so keeping the details of my life at Hogwarts to a minimum will be essential if either of us want me to come back next term. You are beating me in Potions by exactly two points, both of which were scored as extra credit on an exam in which it was not clear extra credit would be available, which makes them suspect in my view since I could have written the same thing you did and earned the same points if I wasn't trying to follow the rules. And even if we took your mark to be reflective of any technical superiority (which would be suspect in the first) it does not follow whatsoever that you are better at medical diagnostics, which is a distinct skill that has nothing to do with potioneering, and if anything has much more to do with anatomy than it does any sort of magic. Don't be ridiculous. Also, you saw the injury for a minute at most, in a dark wood during heavy snow. Also, it is my arm. For your information, I spent the train ride with Cedric and Angelina, who were asking to be put in touch with Mad-Eye over the vacation. They wanted information about joining the Order. I was not behaving 'erratically,' 'uncharacteristically,' or 'illogically,' I was simply preoccupied. I am sorry that I worried you. I did not mean to do that. Nothing about you or your feelings is 'perfectly clear.' What do you mean by the ‘circumstances of our departure’? If you’re talking about the kiss, you might as well say so.

Anyway. Here’s the bottle you asked for. I did use it, though for the record, I think I would’ve done alright with aloe vera. You really are the fussiest person I know.

Write back soon, and preferably at a more appropriate time of day. My house is not large, and when Ulysses starts shrieking at my window, everyone can hear it.

Sincerely,

HJG

P.S. Re: kiss. I have a lot of thoughts about it, obviously, but the first thing to get out of the way is that I realize what a hypocrite you must think I am going on and on about being friends and then kissing you. You’re right, I am a hypocrite, and I’m sorry. I don’t have a good explanation except that I was caught up in things and wasn’t thinking properly. I suppose I just wanted to kiss you, so I did. I am happy to talk about it further at length when we see each other next.

P.P.S. Everything I said in the bathroom is still true and I do care for you very much, but my feelings about the subject haven’t changed and I am sorry if I gave the impression they had.

P.P.P.S. I don’t know what your Christmas plans are, but my parents are going skiing with my cousins in Switzerland, and I am staying with Harry and the Weasleys for the last week of the vac. Obviously you are welcome but I understand you may have plans with your mother. I would obviously like to see you if it suits you, but don’t feel under any obligation.

Granger,

I don't know how many points this is going to be, so make yourself comfortable.

You are on record as having threatened to take me to a muggle hospital with or without my mother's consent, if the necessity revealed itself, so you will permit my skepticism on your commitment to this principle. You have a charming way of framing your loss to me in Potions as if it somehow reflects a virtue of yours. It was a noble effort, but the fact remains: two points is two points. Apologies are accepted. You might also extend some to Ronald and Potter, whose concern was not less poignant for being less informed. I am not 'fussy,' and if I was, then one could still forgive the cauldron for taking offense when the pot calls it black. I had not received any such invitation to intrude on the Weasleys' Christmas plans, but if you would like me to come, I will. Re: re. You say your feelings on the subject have not changed, but it seems from my vantage that they have at least changed enough to permit very different behavior than was previously established. You will forgive me for mistaking them, then, since I do not believe you ever expressed fully what it was you felt, or wanted, from me — a fact that I resent, since giving you what you want of me has become an increasing obsession. Any clarity would be an act of mercy. Relatedly, I believe my feelings are a great deal clearer than you permit, especially to you.

Nevertheless, you may have it in writing: My feelings on the subject also have not changed. They are what you must have surmised on our prefects patrol. If you wanted them to, you ought not to have kissed me. It was a terrible thing to do to a man you expect to be friends with, and I strictly recommend you not to do it to anyone else.

I think of you to the point of distraction, likely to ruin, and clearly to the point of bad behavior. I have thought of you in this way for longer than you can imagine, and if you object to me expressing it now, I apologize, but your hesitation in the matter makes me think you perhaps do not understand who you are talking to.

There are the facts of it; do with them what you will. If you are committed to sharing a platonic friendship, I will attempt one, though I would note that we have both thus far been unsuccessful in maintaining it.

I remain—

Yours sincerely,

DM

Draco,

Sorry for the delay in replying. It took me a while to sort out how I ought to begin and I still don't really know how. So. If this is disorderly, you might imagine why.

I'm not as good with words as you are, so if this doesn't make sense, then I promise you're not the only one who's frustrated with me about it.

I wish what I wanted was simple. I feel like everything's crept up on me without giving me any time to think, and I wake up feeling like I'm drowning under all the problems I have to solve to make it through the day. I hardly know what to say to you half the time because I can't look at you without my brain getting tied up in all the things I want, most of which don't fit together. I've been doing my best, which hasn't been very good so far, as you pointed out, but I really have been trying. I shouldn't have kissed you. It was a bad idea, and I think about it a lot. I think about you, too. I think about things like your hair, and how your face bunches up when you're cross, and your handwriting. You have very nice handwriting.

In my heart of hearts I think we both know I don't want to be your friend. That's the truth. It has been for a while, and I've never really known what to do about it.

But I still don't. It's all so messy. And I'm so scared of everything now. How do you manage it? The fear? Sometimes I worry I've forgotten what it felt like not to be afraid.

I'll have more to say about everything when we see each other next. I don't know if I'll have a good answer for you by then, but I'm going to try to put my thoughts together.

I hate writing letters like this, really. I wish I could talk to you in person. It's easier to think when I'm talking to you.

Hopefully I'll see you at Christmas. Miss you terribly.

Yours,

HJG

P.S. You were right about the dittany. However, all other points re: potions remain unchanged.

Draco leaned back in his chair. He missed her, suddenly, like realizing a great hunger all at once; he wanted to be in the same room with her, listening to her fidget with the pages of a book she was reading, watching her bite her cheek in thought. He missed the way she smelled and the way she wrinkled her nose at him when she was exasperated with him, which was often, and the way that rooms felt when she was in them— safe and whole.

His finger drifted over the line in the letter where she'd written: I don't want to be your friend, and then down to the line that was simply: Yours.

It tightened the same part of his chest that envy lived in, but in a warm, rich way — a strange sort of sting that soothed.

Later that day, a letter came from the Weasleys' owl, a grossly overworked creature whose genealogy somewhere concerned a pigeon. It contained a scrawl of numbers and letters indistinct from someone beating their fist indiscriminately on a typewriter. At the bottom was the missive's only legible line:

P.S. Key is 1991 bathroom dweller visually identical to d. malfoy.

He threw down the envelope and stormed off to fetch a quill.

It was a simple transposition cipher. The product was a short letter from Ron, peppered with what were either misspellings or errors in encryption.

Draco,

Good job with the code. Moody's making us encrypt everything in/out of No. 12, so use code to write back. Don't go nuts . Hermione's last took 2 hrs & had to ask Bill for help. Bloody mad she is.

Anyway. Know you've probably got big holiday plans to eat caviar and throw rocks at peasants and all, but Mum wants me to invite you for Xmas. Told her you'd want to spend it w/ your mum but Sirius butted in and said to invite you anyway, which was freaky because Mum and Sirius agree on piss all. So there, you're invited.

Come whenever. Plenty of room. I'm bored of kicking Harry's arse at chess and yours is due a good walloping.

Hope you're enjoying your castle.

Cheers,

Ron

He considered it.

He thought with uncomfortable reluctance, about Molly Weasley, who was already cooking to feed a house of twenty at least, and insisted nevertheless on an invitation for a boy she knew perfectly well wouldn't go hungry. Molly who had six sons, seven counting Harry, which she obviously did. Molly who had made him a sweater, and baked him a cake when he made Prefect, and put him up in Ron's bedroom for weeks while his own mother was off God knows where, doing God knows what.

Which wasn't Narcissa's fault. She was a soldier, no less than Alastor Moody. And she had a different part than Molly did to play.

The thought made him itch with a vague and childish guilt, but it didn't stop him from writing back to accept.

He woke at half three in panic for no reason at all.

It was like hearing the whine of an alarm fastened to the underside of his skull. The hairs on his nape stood rigid, and the house resettled riotously on its foundations, and the queer, impalpable certainty that he was not alone. Someone else was in the house. He was certain of it. He had no idea where the certainty came from, but it was unimpeachable.

He lay in bed for a minute, trying to rationalize the feeling; meanwhile, the feeling itched on like insects climbing up his arms.

Finally, he rose, and took his wand with him when he left his bedroom.

Stepping outside, the sconces whiffed to life, licking the dark wood paneling with warm light. A door creaked at the end of the hall, inviting him towards the main stairwell. He followed it.

The main entrance remained locked and bolted, as were the doors to the veranda, and the viewing balconies. None of the secret passages appeared to have been used recently. Not a mote was out of place in the dining-room, the gallery, or anywhere else that a burglar might find interesting; snow coursed silently and dimly in the dark frames of the windows.

When he reached the library wing, he noticed the door to the study was cracked, and light fanned from the crevice in a yellow triangle on the hardwood. Footsteps echoed from within.

He lifted his wand, but then thought better of it. He reached for the door, and it moved without being touched, gliding silently and dreamily out of his way.

“What the devil is wrong with you?”

“I’m going to pretend I didn’t hear that,” Narcissa said tiredly. “What happened to ‘good evening, Mother?’ Do the young people not greet each other nowadays?”

She wore traveling leathers, black from toe to fingertip, and the dark under-half of her hair spilled from its knot over her mantle. Snow christened her shoulders and the alpine roots of her hair.

“It’s not evening, it’s morning. And you tripped the wards at four o’clock to sneak around in the study. I woke up thinking we’d been robbed.”

“I’m delighted that you’re learning to read the wards, it’s a prodigious advancement. Have you been practicing your household magic?”

“Don’t change the subject.”

“Am I not allowed to indulge in my son’s success?”

“Don’t stall, either.”

“You’re no fun anymore, darling.”

“You could’ve come to wake me.”

She arrested him with a cryptic stare, and did not answer. Then she took off her mantle and draped it over the back of a chair.

“Would you like some tea?”

“No.”

“Well, I’m having some.”

In the kitchen, lamplight lapped in uneven tides over the Edwardian cabinetry. The wide wooden slab of the table was polished and bare. Narcissa lit the stove with a flick of her wand and Summoned a kettle from the copper rack in the ceiling. She took down a pair of teacups from the cabinet and settled them down, along with a box of loose-leaf darjeeling, first flush.

By the time the kettle came to boil, the room had warmed from the steam. He sat at the table and she settled the teapot in front of him, so that he could pour. She took hers with one lemon wedge, no cream, no sugar. He couldn’t remember a time he hadn’t known that.

He finished and dried the spoon with two taps. “Did you have to travel long?”

“Not as far as you did. That train ride from Scotland is beastly. Did you sleep?”

“This is insulting to both of us.”

“How’s that?” Her face revealed nothing.

“‘Do you know how many caves there are in Cornwall, Severus’?” he repeated.

“Must we?” she said. “It’s so late, my darling.”

“If you won’t tell me the truth, then we’ve nothing to say to each other.”

Her mouth twisted archly at some secret joke. “Adolescence is such a strange time,” she said. “All the zealous fire of a child’s yearning thrust clumsily at an adult’s desires.”

“Tell me what you are doing,” he said, “for Albus Dumbledore.”

Her fingers were long and thin, terminating in shiny white points. One tapped the shell of her teacup.

“There was a locket that once belonged to your Cousin Regulus,” she said, in a lower, clearer register. “After his disappearance, it went missing.”

The Dark Lord has split his soul among several vessels. A necklace, for Regulus.

He lowered his saucer to the table.

“Either he took it with him, or something… someone… took it from him. But Albus believes it was hidden. He says that before his death, Regulus was trying to find a certain cave in Cornwall.”

“...A cave?”

“Yes.”

“Is he serious?”

“That was my reaction. His theory, if you must know, is that Regulus never did wear the horcrux he was given, only a fake copy; he hid the real thing somewhere near Witherfell. And before he vanished, for some reason, he was trying to recover the original. Albus thinks — hopes, rather — that he might have succeeded.” She sipped her tea. “But of course he hasn’t any idea where Regulus might have stuck the dashed thing, so I’ve been appointed as a spelunker. It isn’t very exciting, but it also isn’t too dangerous, and I’ve learned my lesson about whinging to Severus, for my God, if you think you've ever seen a withering look—"

"What happened to him? Regulus?"

"He disappeared," she said evenly. "If that answer disappoints you, be assured that you are in good company."

"But—"

"There is no 'story.'" Her nails drilled a quadrille on the side of her teacup. "It was not the kind of action to which explanations can be applied. It was not a tale with a beginning, middle, and end. It was a vanishing act."

"Might he have run away?"

"No."

Draco straightened with renewed interest. "I understand it would be out of character," he said, "but if no one ever found a body—"

"No," she said flatly. "I would believe it of anyone before Regulus. He was an odd little thing, and I confess I never understood him, but if he had one trait, it was duty. It wasn't in his nature to seek pleasure. Nor to experience it, really; he was his mother's son, and a droll boy to begin with, but all the joy went out of him, after… childhood."

"How do you know he didn't change?"

"Because he didn't change," said Narcissa, with a tired note of amusement. "None of us did. Blacks don't, generally. We have strong natures; it is not our way to be reformed. Toujours pur, pour ainsi dire."

"What about your sister?"

The rain slapped the windowpane. Reflected candlelight danced in Narcissa's sunless eyes.

“Bellatrix,” she said, after a moment, “remains, I assure you, the same she ever was. Nothing has ever tamed her, and in my own judgment, she will go to her grave as the same girl she was at eleven.”

He cut short a reply that would have corrected her.

“Perhaps it wasn’t true of Regulus. You admitted he was unhappy.”

“He would be the last one to act on his unhappiness, if he felt it,” she interrupted. “Fealty was his virtue. To the family, to the name, and to the Dark Lord, in that order. Why not? He was heir to the greatest house that ever was, Master of Witherfell, the richest wizard in Britain, worshiped by his peers… and one bright morning in September, he walked out the door of Grimmauld Place, and he never came back.”

Her gaze slipped from his face into the middle distance.

“Your great aunt was undone by it,” she remarked. “He was her only son, by then, her only child… And after all that had been visited on her family, a decade of disgrace… not even a body to bury… It swallowed her. She died, too, soon thereafter.”

A faint, absentminded ‘by then’ was the only acknowledgement of Sirius’s existence.

“Was Bellatrix the heir thereafter?”

She nodded. He twirled his teaspoon restlessly.

“What was she like?” he said. “Bellatrix. Before.”

He didn’t know if he meant before she killed Father or before she was the heir or something else altogether — a nebulous before, invoked by Narcissa’s remark about the girl Bellatrix had been, a reference to a child he could not imagine coexisting with the woman he recognized now.

“Ask me a different question,” she said roughly, “please.”

Her tone sent him scrambling for a change of subject.

“There was a spell you used in Professor Dumbledore’s office, last year.”

Her haunting expression faded, and she cocked her head curiously.

“Do you remember? You performed it on Sibelius Nott. It made a bunch of lightning. An Electrocution Curse, or something like that.”

“You mean Electrosempra.”

“Yes. Did you invent it? Because Flitwick doesn’t know it.”

“I’m not surprised. It’s a quite cruel spell, and it’s not the kind of thing they’d teach you at Hogwarts.”

“It’s dark?”

“Not everything cruel is dark magic,” she said, cryptically enough. “And not all dark magic is cruel.”

He cocked his head in interest. Narcissa sighed, rubbing her temple.

“I will say this once,” she said. “I don’t much like the idea of you using it, and I doubt you will find it often useful. Heaven knows I try not to.”

“Fine, good, whatever. How do you do it?”

“Electrosempra is the incantation. It’s a conjuring spell. It draws the energy out of the air, it uses friction — don’t ask me details, I don’t remember. When it strikes a target, it moves like lightning. It travels downward.”

“Through conduits until it reaches ground.”

“Whatever they teach these days,” she said, waving lazily, and he recalled with discomfort that those were muggle words. “Naturally, you have to direct it where you want, which is the difficult part. Raw power doesn’t want to go where you tell it. The key is to be deliberate. You have to maintain perfect clarity of purpose. You must know what the spell is for.”

“Cruelty,” he supplied.

“Cruelty isn’t an end, it’s a means. Only a brute takes cruelty as an end unto itself. And you are not a brute, Draco.”

He scowled at her instructive tone. “I know that.”

“You think you do.” She drank the remainder of her tea with an elegant movement. In her dark robes, sitting straight with her legs crossed at the ankle, she could have been a portrait by Sargent.

He suddenly recognized her as she had been when he was young, as others must see her still: cold, beautiful, wealthy, above everyone’s notice. It was an impression so strong it felt like a glimpse of another life.

“We ought to go to bed,” she said. “Would you like some Dreamless Sleep?”

“I’d rather stay awake.”

“Suit yourself. You know where it is, if you change your mind.”

Her heels made a stately carillon on the floor. He remembered something and called after her.

“I’ve been invited to Christmas dinner with the Weasleys.”

The carillon stopped.

“That was… optimistic of them.”

“I said I would.”

A beat.

“I see.”

“I didn’t know when you were coming back.”

“It’s perfectly alright.”

“I would have stayed if I’d known you’d be here.”

“You mistake me for someone who is trying to stop you,” she said. “Enjoy yourself. Do you know how to get there? I’d Apparate you, but I’ve no idea where their flat is.”

“I’ll take the Floo.”

“Oh, they do have a Floo grate. Good for them.”

“Mother.”

“That was a joke. Will your friend be there?”

“Several of them.”

“I believe you know what I mean.”

He stood up, annoyed.

“You know her name.”

“So she will,” said Narcissa. She sounded both satisfied and yet unhappy, somehow.

“Perhaps. Is that a problem?”

“Certainly not, so long as she stays there.”

“I beg your pardon.”

“Another little joke, darling. Laugh. It’s funny.”

She moved toward the door. It slammed in front of her. Its echo shuddered into a taut silence.

“I’m going to assume that was the draft,” she said.

“I don’t understand why you’re being like this.”

She didn’t answer.

“I’ve made my position clear on several occasions, despite which you’ve somehow failed to grasp it. Your beliefs are your business—”

“They’re not beliefs. They’re rules. It’s unlike you to forget the difference.”

“Whose rules? We’re the only ones here.”

The manor creaked on its foundations.

Narcissa straightened. Her silence was worse than a scream.

It occurred to him that he had never, not once, heard his mother make a sound of pain. At his father’s funeral, she had stood with head high and delivered a eulogy like a medical record.

Here lies my husband, Lucius Abraxas. He is survived by myself, Narcissa Alocasia, and our son, Draco Lucius. He was thirty-four years old.

“You have to accept her,” he found himself saying. “You must understand that this is not an argument that you can win.”

“I must? Oh, well, if I must,” she said mockingly. For a moment he hated her, with a searing stripe of hatred that left his hands tingling; then it was gone, replaced by a dull, burning resentment, and shame.

“She is — something upon which I will not compromise. What I feel for her is immutable.”

“Draco, there are fathomlessly few things in this world that are immutable. Your feelings at fifteen years old are not one of them.”

He realized abruptly: it didn’t matter. He had nothing left to hide.

You’re butchering your own happiness over the opinions of a corpse.

She deserved to have someone tell her.

“I am your only son.”

“Draco.”

He spoke over her. He had to. He knew how it went.

“I am your only heir,” he repeated, louder. “I am the last family you have.”

She whirled around, wild. “Have I wronged you?” she said wondrously. “Have I been cruel? Have I possibly earned this?”

“It’s the truth. The House of Black doesn’t exist anymore. The House of Malfoy barely does. You don’t have anyone left to obey or impress. What you have is me, and that’s all. So how can it possibly matter—”

“‘What can it matter?’ You say that to me, now, in this house?”

“—what your ancestors would think of me? They’re not here. I’m here. I’m alive.”

“As am I,” she cried, and he quailed at her tone, high and cold, shattering on the ceiling like broken crystal. “As am I! Black was my name first, it is my name still, and it is not yours! It will never be yours! Not to honor nor to desecrate — it is mine, and you have no right to invoke it against me."

"Mother—"

"And I am alive," she snarled. "I survived. I lived. I lived for them, I lived despite them, and now I live without them. But I did not die. And my name is Narcissa Black."

Her chest rolled with the force of a great, ragged breath. Her echoes filled the hall with whispering applause.

"So do not," she rasped, "tell me my house is dead."

Watching her tremble, he reached for his courage, and found his scorn instead.

"I'm still your son," he said.

"Always."

"You said you would stand by me."

"I did. I do."

"But you won't. Not on this. Because I'm not a Black, am I? You don't respect me," he said, raising his voice over her cry of complaint, "enough to bother with what I think — because that's not as important to you as what they would have thought—"

"How many times must I tell you? None of this is about what I believe! The fact that you think it is, somehow, is — it is a luxury that has been bought for you in blood!"

"You're wrong."

"No one has ever cared what I believe," she said incredulously. "It has never mattered. If I bent to you now, what do you think would happen? If I broke faith with my house, do you think anything would change? Do you think the filth and grit of the world would cast off at the slightest gesture of my hand? That muggles and their progeny would rise to the ranks of our equals once I lifted my heel? I am not the author of your suffering, Draco, nor anyone else's."

"I'm not demanding you to fix the world. You know perfectly well what I want from you, and it isn't that."

"I do not! I do not know, in fact. I live for you. I endure for you. I risk my life for you. What more do you ask of me?"

He was disgusted by her helplessness, and his.

"To be brave," he said. "To be braver than this."

She spun around, turning her back on him in a jerky movement.

"No," she said feebly. "I cannot. I cannot bear it. I tried my best, but it will kill me, that promise — and you promised me—"

"Stop! Don't mumble at the corner, don't pretend you can't hear me, I'm right here! Turn around and look at me!"

She did not turn around. What she did was say, calmly:

"Do you love her?"

The candles guttered. Wax melted in thick folds on the sconces. He recoiled in fury.

"What do you— what does that have to do with any of this?"

She lifted her chin, though it was trembling.

"Because I could bear the rest. I could bear all — I could bear anything, for you. But you made me a promise."

"What? What promise?"

“You promised you would protect your father’s name. Our name. You swore to me—”

“That promise? A promise you took from an eight-year-old at his father’s funeral?”

“Yes! And I would have let you have her,” she cried, turning to him. He recoiled at the wildness of her stare: it was not the familiar wildness of an oncoming episode, but an intense, searing, terrifying lucidity. “Take her, keep her, have her as you liked, I never stopped you! You think you’re the first boy who ever tried to bend the rules? Do you think I was never young, do you think we were never — do you know how I have watched trespass upon trespass, and found it in myself to tolerate it? Do you know what riches of forgiveness I have offered you from the shadows, thanklessly, endlessly, while you — you, with your sneering, and your recklessness, and your ideology — you find the gall to call me heartless?”

“I never said—”

“Do you even know what my mother would have — I have held my tongue while you humiliated yourself!”

“Don’t you dare speak of her.” He was numb with fury. “You lack the right. You — you lack the fucking honor.”

“I have allowed you anything!” It was shrill, with a note of the child’s complaint. “I would forgive anything, and I would have forgiven it all, but — but you brought her here—”

“As was my choice to make.”

“It was an embarrassment, Draco!”

“To you,” he said coldly. “Not to me. And this is my house, not yours.”

She sagged to one side, and caught herself on the desk, as if he had ripped away one of the struts holding her up.

“To your father’s house, then,” she croaked. “To a place you inherited on the sole condition that you would maintain it as your forebears willed it. You brought her into it. And still, I could forgive that, if you tell me now — promise me — that you understand the limits of your position. That you will never — go somewhere I cannot follow.”

She wore it badly, begging. It was the only thing even she couldn’t make graceful.

“I really am sorry, you know,” he repeated, as confusion stirred her face. “You likely don’t believe it, but I am.”

She drew herself up to a height. He was still taller. That fact caused unexpected sadness.

“Let me be clear: I am asking you this for my sake. I am asking you, outright, as your mother and the woman who raised you, alone, in this very large house, for fifteen years: go no farther. Do not leave me here.”

“You don’t have to stay.”

“You would take yourself away from me, and it would — you will unmake me. If you do that. So promise me you will not go,” she breathed. “Or lie. Lie! If you have to. Lie to me. It won’t kill me. But the other will.”

He was silent. The room, like him, was silent. They became two silent people, in a silent house, in a silent, snow-covered world.

“Lie to me,” she said. “Please.”

He turned his head away. Her shoulders wilted.

“Get out,” she said.”

“Mother—”

“Go.”

The doors parted. He hadn’t touched them, and neither had she.

Finally, he did what she asked of him.

Everything was sepia and silent in the dawn: dusty curtains, snow-packed windows, parquet floors filmed in the bleak light of a midwinter morning. When he reached his rooms, the doors slammed behind him with a snap like a great pair of jaws.

His breath rasped loud in the preternatural stillness of his chambers. Ulysses bleated unhappily by the king-sized bed, with its foam of tangled sheets.

Draco stood in the window, his reflection gray against the dark snowfall. He thought of his dorm at Hogwarts, miles away, and of the leagues of silent, frozen ground between one barren home and another.

Hello, everyone. I don't know how to begin. I suppose I'll start by saying that I'm sorry this isn't a Friday, but I wanted to put it out as soon as I had finished editing rather than making you wait, since I'd done so much of that already.

And thank you so, so much for that waiting. I've said it before, and I'm sorry to say I'll likely say it again, but your comments are the reason this fic continues to exist. The amount of grace and kindness you show me makes me strive to deserve it. Even when I wasn't active, I would come read and re-read comments that you left on this fic as a source of comfort on rough days, and it would bring me back to life a little bit. You've brought me through, and I don't take a single bit of it for granted. You're the heart of this story. It owes everything to you.

Anyway. Enough of the soppy stuff. The next chapter will be called "The Ghosts of Grimmauld Place," and it will go up... possibly soon? I will try to set up an update schedule as soon as I'm reasonably settled and no longer on the move. As soon as I'm able to make promises to you, I will. I care for you terribly much. I hope that a stranger on the street today smiles at you. I wish I could.

—GT

The Ghosts of Grimmauld Place

Chapter 70: The Ghosts of Grimmauld Place

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Christmas morning found a stack of presents at the foot of his bed. From Dobby, who had wrapped it in sandwich paper and glitter, came a tin of olive-and-pepperwort ice cream with a small wooden spoon that appeared to have been carved by Dobby himself, as it gave him four splinters. The rest were from his mother. He left them where they lay.

He dressed for the Weasleys. Black tie was custom for a Christmas luncheon, but from a desire to not be pilloried on sight, he chose a gray dress shirt with French cuffs. His signet slid comfortably onto his little finger, and he stole a dark blue formal cloak from his father's wardrobe, made of silk so fine and thin that it shimmered like liquid where it sloped gracefully down his shoulders. The mirror offered up a smaller, slenderer impression of a man seen often gazing out of a portrait in the gallery.

He exchanged the lounge jacket for a green jumper with a white lion on it, which was pilly and mothball-scented and only slightly less oversized now than in 1993. The result was not mistakeable for any image of Lucius Malfoy that existed.

Standing on the parlor hearth, he took a lingering look at the drawing-room: the twelve-foot Christmas tree, the grand piano, the silver garlands laid thick as icing over bay windows. The chandelier chimed in the draft. He got the queer feeling he was waiting for something.

Something in him was waiting for Narcissa to come striding out of the hallway, yawning in her dressing-gown, and tell him Dobby had made cocoa.

Which was absurd, because Dobby hadn’t lived there in three years, and his mother hadn't spoken to him since their fight. When they encountered each other, she glided past with a deep nod and eyes that seemed to float over him, lifted high and distant, fixed on some point that neither of them could see. He lacked the reason or tolerance to apologize and the endurance to risk another fight, so he moved past in identical silence, with an identical stare.

He threw some Floo powder on the coals, snapped: “Number Twelve, Grimmauld Place,” and the drawing-room vanished in a green wash of heat.

Stepping out of the fireplace, the first thing that registered the noise.

Grimmauld Place sounded like someone had trapped an angry cat in a bag with several other angry cats, sewed it shut, and lobbed the bag into the House of Commons. A whole percussive section of slamming pots and pans, thundering footsteps, and tinkling glasses swelled behind the strains of a vocal clamor so great it seemed fit to wake the whole of London, and over it all, the conductor’s voice cut clear and shrill as a banshee’s wail:

“OUT! OUT! IF YOU’RE A MAN NAMED WEASLEY, OUT OF THE KITCHEN! GINNY, GET YOUR BOOTS OFF THE TABLE! WHERE’S SIRIUS? TONKS, GET HIM — AND I KNOW THAT’S YOU, YOU’VE GOT BILL’S NOSE WRONG — AND RON, PUT A SHIRT ON, YOU’RE NOT A BARBARIAN— ” BANG!

“FRED!”

“I’m George!”

“YOU’RE FRED IF I SAY YOU ARE! PICK UP THIS MESS—”

“Kid’s innocent, Molly, that was one of mine.”

“—CARE IF YOU’RE OF AGE, YOU’RE UNDER MY ROOF — oh, Chrissakes — I SAID NO TRAPS IN THE KITCHEN, ALASTOR!”

“Then stop opening the damn window!”

“I CAN’T! BECAUSE THERE’S NO! VENTILATION! IN! THIS! HOUSE!”

“Mum, I can’t find my Holyhead jersey! You didn’t wash it, did you?”

“It’s an undefended point of ingress—”

“SIIIII-RIUUUS,” bellowed Tonks. A fist pounded a door. “REEEEEEE-MUUUS!”

“It’s a bright green jersey and I left it right on my bed and I told you not to touch it because it’s hand-wash only —”

“Oi! Mum! Can Harry and I go on a chippy run?”

“IT’S CHRIIIIIIIIIIIIST-MAAAAAAAS—”

“—the point of even having wards if you keep the bleeding window open, it’s a glaring invitation—”

“I DON’T CARE IF IT’S OPEN! YOU THINK YOU-KNOW-WHO’S GOING TO CRAWL IN AND HIDE IN THE MASH?”

Draco chuckled softly, brushing ash from his jumper.

The parlor of Grimmauld Place was decorated for Christmas, though in such a way it would’ve likely given his grandmother conniptions: the tree was scrappy and plump, stuffed with ornaments like someone upended a box of sweets on it, while popcorn garlands and ropes of holly the size of an arm dangled from the tarnished chandeliers. Live fairies drifted around the lures hanging from the eaves, jingling faintly and winking their little lights. The radio in the kitchen was playing muggle rock music, and warmth and smoke piped from the kitchen, while outside, the snow rose ever higher on a dark London street.

A footstep stirred the doorway, and he turned to find a small, elfin woman with silvery blonde-hair and a slightly crooked nose. She was carrying a tall stack of presents.

“Delacour?” he said, surprised.

“Oh,” Fleur exclaimed, dropping her cargo unceremoniously. “You! Ça fait longtemps, dis donc! Ça roule, mon chou?”

“Ça rampe. What are you doing here? I thought your family was in France.”

“Ah, yes, but I — well. I am working in London, these days,” she said. Her accent had faded; her were consonants crisper. “And the Ministry is not making it easy for us with the work visa, you know, to come and go, and — anyway, Bill worries it would be hard for me to come back if I leave. And I am not knowing many people in England, so the Weasleys are being very kind, and inviting me here for Christmas.”

“...I was under the impression that you and Bill didn’t get along.”

She shifted her weight and glanced over her shoulder. It was needless; the din from the kitchen made it impossible that they were overheard.

“Bill is being very gracious,” she said delicately. “Especially when it is possible I am not always giving him — oh, what is it? — bonne foi.”

He tilted his head, smirking. “Rien de tel qu’une petite fraternisation sur le lieu de travail pour s’ouvrir l’esprit.”

Fleur gasped. “Chut!” she said. “You are a ’orrible brat.”

“Mais oui.”

Doors slammed. “WE’RE UP,” Sirius howled, “WE’RE UP, BLAST YOU! STOP KICKING MY DOOR!”

“—IIIIIIISTMAAA— oi, Sirius! Happy Christmas! Oh! Hi, Remus!”

“Good morning, Tonks. Happy Christmas.”

“CAN’T A MAN GET A MOMENT’S REST IN HIS OWN HOME WITHOUT SOME DEGENERATE COUSIN DRAGGING HIM UP AT THE CRACK-O-DAWN—”

“It’s eleven-thirty!”

“It is eleven-thirty, Padfoot.”

“THAT’S IRRELEVANT,” said Sirius. “TONKS, STOP GAWKING. HARRY, DON’T RUN ON THE STAIRS—”

THUMP.

“Shit!”

“TRAITORS! HALF-BREEDS! MUDBLOODS! SCUM!”

“Portrait’s off again,” shouted Ron.

“Where’s my jersey?” wailed Ginny.

“SPLENDID!” roared Sirius. “GREAT TEAM EFFORT. MERRY CHRISTMAS, MUMMY!”

“FILTHY, FILTHY CREATURES, STINKING UP MY HOUSE! OUT! OUT! BURN THEM OUT!”

“WILL SOMEONE SHUT THAT BINT UP?” Molly bellowed, storming out of the kitchen. Her hair formed a fiery lion’s mane around her flushed face. “PAINT A GAG ON HER, IF YOU HAVE TO — Merlin’s bones, Draco! How long have you been here? Don’t tell me, I don’t want to know. Come here.”

He by now could tell the difference between volitional and mandatory Weasley embraces, and this was of the mandatory sort. He complied forthwith and bent down to be throttled.

Her fiery hair smelled of bacon, and she was hot as a coal stove. It was not awful.

“I’m so glad you’re alright,” she murmured, while her arms did their level best to cave in his ribs. “Months under that awful woman… We’re all so very glad you’ve come. Happy Christmas, dear.”

It was hard to look her in the eye. Perhaps it was too much, after the Manor’s long silences, to have so much attention all at once — like dropping frostbitten fingers into scalding water.

“Happy Christmas, Mrs. Weasley. I apologize for arriving early.”

“Do shut up, dear. And it’s Molly, you know that. Fleur! You’re awake! Would you fetch Bill for me? You know where his room is, don’t you?”

“Yes,” she said nervously, “but per’aps better for one of his brothers —”

“Thank you, sweetie. Draco, you sit there and don’t touch a thing, we’ll be having breakfast in a minute — really it’s more of a lunch — and presents. It’s just the family, of course, and Sirius and Remus; and Fleur, who Bill invited — which I’m not allowed to comment on, apparently — and Alastor and Tonks, who practically live here anyway, couldn’t have it without them.”

“Indeed.”

The doorbell chimed.

“GOT IT,” Ron shouted. He slid down the bannister and jumped into the foyer, and Harry hopped down behind him. They were both still in pyjamas. Harry was more relaxed than Draco had seen him in months: hair rumpled, grin wide, shoulders straight.

“Draco! Happy Christmas.”

“Happy Christmas, Potter.”

Ron hauled open the door. “Oi, it’s you!” he said delightedly. “Everyone, it’s Hermione! Come in.”

Draco twitched, and then tried to sort out whatever his pulse was doing.

Hermione whisked into the foyer carrying a train of snowflakes, brushing frost crystals from her sleeves. She thrust a pair of voluminous bags into Ron’s arms and then wrenched the scarf from her face, panting.

“Hold those,” she announced — the classic Granger greeting of a command — and began the industrious business of shucking her outer layer of clothing. “They’re presents. Don’t peek.” She wriggled out of her overcoat, revealing a red jumper, muggle jeans, and pink socks. The red clashed with the pink. Her scarf was orange. These and other sartorial choices suggested her stylist was a color-blind street urchin.

He lifted his eyes, and tried helplessly to find it anything but endearing. His heartbeat was a dry rasp in his chest.

She really was lovely, hopelessly lovely, in a terrible outfit and dreadful muggle trousers and hair seven different kinds of wild, and so there was nothing for it but to stare.

“Sorry I’m late, it was absolutely stupid out there. I saw Mum and Dad off, and then I had to get here myself from St. Pancras, but I forgot the Tube doesn’t run on Christmas, so I had to take a cab. But I couldn’t come straight here because I didn’t want the driver to know where I was going, so I had them drive me on to Charing Cross and then walked, but I forgot it was snowing so it took twice as long and I couldn't see anything and I had to stop every five minutes to check the map—"

She breezed on like a locomotive while she peeled off her gloves.

As if they had nothing better to do than listen to her enact a stream-of-consciousness relitigation of her day. It was an irritating habit. He tried to be irritated, and found a horrifying lack of will.

Ron, fortunately, obliged him.

"By the way, Draco's here," he said, gesturing. Hermione's head snapped up. Her cheeks, already flush with cold, turned darker.

They regarded each other across the foyer. The noise of the house dimmed.

Hermione cleared her throat, like he was supposed to say something.

"Happy Christmas," she said.

He nodded to her, politely. "Happy Christmas, Hermione."

She winced.

He hadn't meant to sound petulant. It had been as much grace as he'd been capable of offering with half the nerves in his body on edge.

A pause of miserable longevity. Harry and Ron looked like they were watching two wild hyenas circle each other.

"I like your jumper," she said bravely.

"Thank you. It's custom Weasley, 1993."

She gave a surprised little laugh. The sound offered some hope that everything good in the world was not soiled past recognition.

Or, at the very least, that no one had to say so just yet, on Christmas morning.

Molly rescued them all by barrelling out of the kitchen in a maelstrom of needless urgency. He could have kissed her feet in thanks.

“SIRIUS! REMUS! TONKS! IN HERE, NOW! EVERYONE TO THE DRAWING ROOM, WE’RE DOING PRESENTS! Ginny, would you check on Bill and Fleur? Lord, it’s Frank and Alice all over again — and Ron, remember to — HERMIONE! Why does no one in this house ever announce themselves!”

Once the whole house had been herded into the drawing-room like vociferous cattle, Molly served a lunch of corned beef sandwiches. The table setting was being preserved for dinner, so they ate from plates in their laps. Arthur and Remus took prize seats on either side of the couch, and acquiesced with grace to Sirius’s insistence on wearing paper crowns. Fred and George perched on the arms of Ginny’s chair, sniggering together; Charlie sat on the sideboard, heels swaying. Bill and Fleur came down ten minutes later than everyone else and stood on opposite sides of the room.

Mad-Eye presided from a deep armchair, nursing a cup of tar-black coffee. When Draco sat down by the hearth, the old Auror sent him a sidelong eye and lifted his mug, and Draco decided that if it all weren’t too frivolous for Mad-Eye, it needn’t be too frivolous for him.

Sirius paraded a stereo into the room over his head, and he was met by mixed cheers and dismayed cries.

“Bang on! Oi, Sirius, let us pick a song—”

“No, let me! Pick me! I’m your cousin!”

“A very weak argument, historically,” said Sirius. “All of you shut up! You’re missing the music!”

“Jesus wept,” Remus murmured into his tea. Then he grinned when Sirius kicked him.

“She studied sculpture at Saint Martin’s college…”

“Can’t we have some nice Christmas music?” sighed Arthur. “Why is it always the rock and roll?”

“Dad, please,” said Ginny. “Try not to be uncool. It’s Christmas.”

“Good haul this year,” announced Ron, flopping down on the hearth beside Draco. “Nice call with the whistle for Harry, but you’ll regret it when he’s getting us up for six o’clock quidditch practices. That from Remus? Bet you anything it’s a book. Sirius and Remus got them together.”

“Which means Remus bought books, and Sirius signed his name on the card.”

“Eh. Mum and Dad do that all the time. Anyway, he can’t very well pop out to the shops.”

Draco eyed his cousin, who was dancing with Harry and Ginny as if he had ants trapped under his unmercifully tight trousers. He seemed to be in high spirits: he laughed loudest and longest of anyone in the room, and there was a slightly manic affect to his glee.

“Rent a flat above a shop! Cut your hair and get a job! Smoke some fags and play some pool… Pretend you never went to school…”

“Hermione got us homework planners,” Ron continued, and he made a valiant effort to sound happy about it. “Yells at me every time I open it. At least it reminds me of her, eh? Anyway, there you are. Merry Christmas.”

He dumped a package in Draco's lap. It was wrapped in torn clippings from Quidditch Weekly.

Draco stripped them off. Inside there was a long, thin knife of burnished silver, marbled with tarnish, with an opal on the crossguard and the Black crest engraved on the pommel.

He was shocked into silence. The weight was solid, heavy, fine. It was likely more expensive than anything Ron owned. Or everything he owned, put together.

"I didn't buy it," Ron said, perhaps guessing his thoughts. "If that wasn't obvious. We were mucking out one of the upstairs bedrooms and I found that stuffed in a closet. It's a dueling sidearm, isn't it? That's what Sirius said. I guess he might've been having me on, come to think—"

"It is." He ran his thumb over the dark, soft leather of the grip. "You hold it in your offhand. If you lose your wand, in theory, you'd… but nowadays, they're mostly ceremonial."

"Reckon that's perfect for you, innit? Old, poncy, dangerous," said Ron cheerfully, and clapped him on the shoulder. "Right, that's that settled. I won Christmas! Nice try, good run, see you next year. What'd you get me, some socks?"

"That one's for you."

"Sure. Hey, what did Hermione get you? Bet it wasn't a homework diary. She always gets you muggle stuff, right? What's the de— HOLY SHIT!"

"Ronald Weasley!" Molly cried. "Language!"

"HOLY SHIT! HOLY SHIT! IT'S A BROOMSTICK! A FIREBOLT! THE NEW ONE!" He sprang to his feet. "THANK YOU! BLIMEY! THANK YOU, MUM, THANK YOU— I — Mum?"

Molly and Arthur had frozen with awkward, terrible smiles plastered on both their faces. Ron turned, lowering the broomstick, as an embarrassed flush pooled in his cheeks. He hid it with a quick, stubborn grin, the well-worn expression of someone so used to the chip on his shoulder that his very spine had adjusted to the weight.

“Blimey,” he said weakly. “That’s… really generous.”

He felt, with a prickle of heat, the room’s attention glide unerringly toward himself. It was rather less pleasant than he thought it would be. Molly was picking at a thread on her skirt, and Remus was carefully stirring his tea. Hermione’s eyes were boring holes in the side of his skull. Ron was holding the Firebolt like it might at any moment transform into a venomous snake.

Draco cleared his throat.

“You’re welcome,” he said to Arthur. “I told you he’d like it.”

Arthur’s mouth parted. Draco rolled his eyes. “What is it with old people and Comets?” he said to Ron.

“Hey,” said Arthur weakly. He regarded Draco with a heart-rending alchemy of relief and grave, soft respect. Draco avoided his eyes, skin crawling. “Back in my day, the Comet was sexy.”

“See? See what age does to their brains, Ronald? He wanted to get you a Commodore model, which is wrong for a keeper, because—”

“Because Commodores are endurance brooms, and Firebolts are sprinters,” said Ron automatically. He stared at him intently, with the sharp blue eyes that had accused Draco over a hundred losing games of chess. It was clear to him, as to anyone who knew him, that Ronald Weasley was nobody’s fool. “Thanks. You’re a real mate.”

“Bet that I won’t be, if I see you letting any quaffles through on that.”

“Yeah, yeah,” said Ron roughly. “Blame the keeper because you can’t hold the quaffle. Classic chaser bullshit.”

Harry laughed. The burble of the room picked up again, and everyone else found something else to look at, which in Draco’s opinion they ought to have done in the first place. They were, each to each, a pack of dull nosy busybodies who were far too used to living completely in each other’s pockets.

Draco stuck his head into his gift from Sirius and Remus, The Subsistence Potioneer, and pointedly ignored them all.

By and by, Hermione picked her way through the battlefield of wrapping-paper and sat next to him. She didn’t speak. He didn’t, either.

He could feel the space between them like a physical object.

When she drew breath, it was a relief for all of a second, until she started speaking.

“Hello,” she said. “Happy Christmas.”

“Hello,” he said, wondering if the word could possibly contain any more feeling than she had fit in it.

Hermione hesitated again.

“This,” she said, lifting a small vial of silver fluid, “is extremely expensive.”

He returned to his book. It was easier to look at. “Is it?” he said.

“I tried to buy some earlier this year.”

“Quite practical of you.”

“This is at least a thousand galleons.”

“I hadn’t looked at the invoice.”

“I know that’s a lie,” she said, and her familiarity made him strangely warm. “And it’s too much.”

“I’ve spent a thousand galleons on Potter’s legal fees alone. You didn’t mind that, I remember.”

“To keep him out of prison. For his safety. This is—”

“For yours. Do you imagine it’s worth one galleon less?”

“No, and when the Ministry arrests me, you’re welcome to spend a king’s ransom on my lawyers. But phoenix tears? Real phoenix tears? What am I supposed to do with these?”

“Well, you don’t bloody well drink them. Best results come from topical application—”

“On what? Have I got a mortal wound I don’t know about?”

“On your hand, simpleton,” he said impatiently. She twitched her right hand, which someone had wrapped in proper bandages to replace his handkerchief. “Unless you’d prefer to keep the scars. I personally would rather be rid of them; I assure you, they don’t suit you at all.”

Her indignation was cratered by surprise. “Bbut that’s a monumental waste.”

He glared at her, welcomely reminded of what it felt like to be irritated by her. Good to know he hadn’t lost the knack.

“Do they bother you?” she said quietly. “The scars?”

He inclined his head.

“Would you like me to cover them up?”

“The look of it isn’t the problem.”

She bit her cheek in thought. He watched her, tracking the process of her deliberation by the depth of the wrinkle in her brow.

When it was all but smooth, she said: “It’s not fair that I should get rid of my scars when everyone else has to keep them.”

Hang ‘fair,’ he wanted to say, but that wasn’t an argument she would hear.

“It’s not fair that some people have castles and Firebolts,” he said. “And if you think Brown keep your scars for the sake of fairness, you’ve badly underrated her.”

The abuse of her cheek continued. At length, she said, “No, I don’t think she would.” She dropped a package in his lap by way of changing the subject. “Here’s yours. I’ll just tell you, because I don’t want you to have any nice expectations — it’s a new music player. It’s called a discman. The one you have is a bit old, frankly. And there’s a few CDs in there, too. Those are from my parents — to thank you for checking in on me. ‘Violator,’ that’s from my dad, and the Pink Floyd. I picked out the rest.”

“Thank you,” he said, watching her.

She fidgeted. “Yes. Well. You’re welcome. I know how much you like to have — the nicest of everything.”

“I do.”

Music tinkled from the stereo. Ginny squawked as Fred spilled a mince pie in her lap.

Hermione nibbled at her lip. Abruptly, her hand darted out to find his, all but buried in the spilled wrapping-paper. Her fingers folded through his tightly.

“I missed you,” she said, her eyes low.

Her hand was warm and firm in his. He let her slide her fingers between his own, knitted so tightly he doubted he could pull himself free even if he wanted to. The feeling was like a homecoming.

“Granger—”

There was a commotion by the sofa. Molly had opened an unremarkable package in brown paper wrapping, and promptly broken into tears. They could have been joyous until he saw the expression worn by Bill, who stood at her shoulder.

“What a shithead,” he said coolly. He picked up the package and carried it away, though Molly continued to cry into a handkerchief. Arthur tucked his arm around her.

Ron opened his mouth. Fred clapped a hand over it.

“Percy sent back his Christmas jumper. Don’t say anything.”

“Why’d she even make one?”

“Search me. Told her he’s a fat load of rat droppings.”

“You’d be surprised how attached you can get to a fat load of rat droppings, when you changed its nappies,” said Sirius. He slapped Ron on the shoulder. “Scram, will you? Go make some trouble and let the grownups clean up your mess.”

Ron got up, rolling his eyes, and gestured for Harry and Draco. “That means they want to talk Order stuff.”

“George and I are grownups,” Fred piped up.

“Yeah? Great stuff. You’re on dish duty.”

“On second thought,” said Fred.

The seven of them — Draco, Harry, Hermione, and the four youngest Weasleys — were unsubtly shepherded upstairs and the doors to the sitting-room swung closed on Sirius's grinning face.

"There's not a way to eavesdrop on the sitting-room, is there?" said Hermione.

"Nah. They boarded up our secret passage, the bastards," said Ginny. "Sirius fought for us, though, said he'd have done the same thing… he's on the side of the righteous. What's that you've got, Harry?"

He'd lagged behind the group on the stairs. He held a present, half-unwrapped, evidently just opened.

"Mad-Eye's Christmas present," he said tightly. "It's… a photograph."

"Come and show us, then," said Ron, and they huddled around to inspect it.

The film was grainy with age. A crowd assembled in the drawing-room of Grimmauld Place as if for an unusually large family portrait. A caption jotted in the corner read: THE ORDER OF THE PHOENIX, 25.12.1979.

Harry brushed his fingers over a redheaded woman and a dark-haired man near the center of the frame. They waved at him.

"There's rather a lot of them," Draco remarked, for want of anything better to break the awkward with.

"Yeah, there were," said Ginny. "Gosh, the gang's all here. That's Mad-Eye, there; see his nose isn't broken yet? And that's Dumbledore, he's always the same, innee… the Longbottoms, know them anywhere, Neville's the spit of them… Emmeline Vance, she's my godmother… Dorcas Meadowes, she was Bill's, but she's gone now. Lot of them are, since… yeah."

Hermione inhaled. "Because they all…?"

“Not all of them,” said Ginny hesitantly. “Sturgis Podmore… well, he didn’t die in the war, anyway… think I met John Dawlish once at a party… oh, and there’s Hagrid! Mad to see him without a beard. Plus Amy Bones — bet you’ll meet her, she’s been around a few times — and that’s Uncle Gideon and Uncle Fabian, right next to her. Both, um… but Mum’s right, they really did look like the twins.” She stepped back and spoke gruffly. “You know the rest, I think.”

He didn’t, actually — there were two faces she’d rather pointedly left out — but he could wager a guess. James and Lily shared the middle of the sofa; at James’s right sat Peter Pettigrew, pulling a silly face at the camera. Sirius stood behind them, younger, short-haired, radiantly handsome, and every ounce a Black. He’d slung his arm around Remus, who save for a few wrinkles was largely the same: brown curls, scars, a crooked smile. The four of them made a tight little square at the heart of the photograph.

The group smiled and waved, a checkerboard of the ghosts of the living and the ghosts of the dead.

He drove his nails into his palms. Turned to inspect an oil portrait of his Uncle Cygnus, which nodded somberly back at him. He breathed through his mouth and out through his nose.

“I’m in this photo,” said Harry suddenly.

Ron squinted. “Well,” he said, trying to be tactful, “I do reckon you take after your dad, I guess.”

“No, this is Christmas, 1979,” he said. “Mum’s pregnant with me. I’m right there.”

He pointed at the redhead’s stomach. She wasn’t showing; she was so early on even she mightn’t have known.

“Family portrait,” said Harry.

Ron put his hand on his shoulder. Harry cringed, though, as if that made it worse, which Draco could imagine it might. It certainly would, for him.

Ginny said, “Last time you ever looked good in a photograph.”

He grinned at her, and she grinned back, her tongue between her teeth. Then she slapped his arm and mounted the stairs.

The group fractured. Ginny spirited Hermione off to her bedroom, where Hermione hurried gladly, without a backward glance; Draco was admittedly relieved when she left, although the party was smaller and less interesting without her. Harry disappeared into his room with the photograph; and Ron, Fred, and George went to test the new Firebolt in the gallery. They invited Draco, but he declined. He was itchy and restless, and he had a curiosity to satisfy.

The day was late, and the light was already thin in the windows when he found the small, gabled bedroom near the top of the house. The door parted at his touch, and he stepped into Regulus’s bedroom.

It was no different than it had been in August, down to the wrinkle on the coverlet where Ginny had sprawled. He realized only now that the last person to touch it before her had been Regulus.

The desk contained a datebook and an address book, both of a nice-but-unused character that suggested an ill-chosen Christmas gift. The bedside drawer offered nothing but owl treats and a pair of thick browline glasses, one lens cracked. Underneath the sofa cushions there were several sickles and a galleon, and a receipt for school textbooks from Flourish & Blott’s in 1973, so frail it crumbled at his touch. Nothing hid in the bottom of the dead boy’s wardrobe, his old coat pockets, or under the rug; nor in a hidden compartment under one of the floorboards, whose only secrets were a pack of cigarettes and a lighter.

He sat at the desk, warm from exertion, and wondered how many people had ransacked the room before him. He wondered how long Walburga had searched the place for some secret symbol or clue her son had left behind. How long Narcissa had searched, if she had searched at all. Had they used magic? Had they rifled through with their hands, like he did, not because they had to, but because it was the only way to be sure? Or simply because it was something to do with their hands, because it was a chance to touch the things that he had touched?

The bookshelf was the same combination of uninspiring titles, but he pulled each one out anyway, and flipped through the pages. Not so much as a scribble in any of them.

He scanned the room again, settling on the bookshelf. Textbook, textbook, Evelyn Waugh, another textbook, Shakespeare, Paradise Lost. Collected poetry. Quite a lot of poetry, in fact. He hadn't thought Regulus would be the type.

Draco pulled out one of the slimmer volumes. It was bookmarked in the middle.

Bright star, would I were stedfast as thou art—

Not in lone splendour hung aloft the night

And watching, with eternal lids apart,

Like nature's patient, sleepless Eremite

Draco had never much been one for poetry, to tell the truth. It was all a bit circumspect.

The bookmark was interesting, however. It was an envelope addressed to:

Mr. Regulus Arcturus Black IV

The Bedroom At The Top Of The Stairs

No. 12 Grimmauld Place

London, England

The handwriting was almost too elaborate to read. The crest, before it was broken, had been a stylized A in red wax.

He slipped out the letter. The edges were thin and translucent from wear, but the ink was still dark enough to read.

---

22 December 1970

Hogwarts Castle

Scotland

My dear and beloved Egg,

I'm already better today, my temperature hovers between 36.7-37, as I write this I'm lying in bed and eating chocolates. That sweet Cassie Greengrass brought them (please marry her so I may be near her always). Feeling mediocre; I think tomorrow I'll be dead. But last night was sublime. I read "Cut" and "Elm" for the poetry society (small group, only 30 or 40) and it was glorious triumph. Then Evan spoke for half an hour quite thrillingly but said nothing at all I fear. Poor dear has got it in his head to impress me or bore everyone trying.

On Sirius — forget it. He never hangs out in Slytherin anyway so it really isn't anything to do with you. If he hasn't written back by Christmas, tell me. I'll bend him over and spank him in front of all the other naughty 3rd years (as prefect I am entitled to do this any time I please). On the subject, I strongly recommend becoming prefect, you get all the gossip before it happens. Yesterday I caught Robbie Carrow with his hand up Persephone's skirt. I wanted to wait & see how far she let him go (all the way?) but I was patrolling with Edward (Ravenclaw mudblood cf. previous whinging) who is a stone cold grump. I must kill him and stash his body in the laundry I think. Will ask his girlfriend for help as I assume he has her in some sort of hostage arrangement (not a looker).

By the way: I've chucked that last poem so please burn your copy. Have spent the whole day rewriting it and just now finished at half four, that death-black December teatime which always tastes lonely no matter where or how you are — but suddenly someone downstairs put on the Nutcracker and like magic I am home for Christmas and Bella is dancing for us like always and you and I are eating popcorn under the table (which is where it tastes best of course of course.) Why hasn't Bella answered my letter? Go nag her about it. Cissy hasn't either but that's because she's a slut. I miss you. I can't wait for you and Cissy to come back. In the spring we will have a tea party on the lake and drink sparkling wine until our insides turn to butterflies and float up through the blue forever.

Temperature: 36.8. Remember me when I have perished of this ague — be my Horatio, my Orpheus, my Antigone — and most importantly, burn that poem. I will not be immortalized by amateur work.

Love love love love you Eggy, you charming weevil, you sad hedgehog, you silly little absolute cheese, you. Merry Christmas.

Your (almost) sister,

&E

The letter was dated two years before Andromeda had been disinherited.

How long had it hidden there? Since it was opened? Had Regulus stuffed it there after finishing it, closed his book, and simply never touched it again? Or had he returned to it, when she left, and made the conscious decision to keep it? That was even more interesting, and more strange.

He wondered if Andromeda knew Regulus had kept her letter. If she ever thought about him.

He supposed he could always ask Tonks if he could speak to her.

But the idea of talking to Andromeda spent a spider of dread crawling down his neck. It still carried a specter of taboo: it was anathema to imagine calling on his aunt casually, as any ordinary loving nephew might, to speak freely and casually about a past he had been forbidden to know.

Draco pocketed the letter and left the room. He shut the door behind him.

He descended no farther than the second floor before there was a splinter and a shriek and Tonks staggered onto the landing, holding one end of a brass portrait-frame. Draco flattened himself to the wall, being taught by five years of cohabitation with the twins to Get Out The Bloody Way first and ask questions later. Tonks dropped the frame with a THUNK that rattled the floorboards and wiped her forehead, grinning maniacally. The portrait was wailing bloody murder (and a good bit worse).

“Wotcher, Malfoy!”

“...Tonks. Is that who I think it is?”

Sirius’s head appeared at the bottom of the stairs. “The Queen Mother?” he suggested happily. “Lilith the She-Demon? The Wicked Bitch of the West?”

“My great aunt, you mean?” said Draco, dry.

“Bingo.”

“How on earth did you get her down?”

“Oh, she held out, but she came in the end,” he said. “Took a piece of the house with her, though.”

The edges of the portrait-frame were charred. Tonks had singe marks in her hair.

“You blew a hole in the wall?”

“A small hole,” said Tonks. “Improves the whole room, really. Great feng shui down there.”

“You’re lucky you didn’t bring the roof down!”

“Wouldn’t have done,” said Sirius briskly. “I’ve brought down a building before, and it’s harder than you’d think.”

The letter in Draco’s pocket seemed to heat against his skin. He tried to imagine what he would think of his mother if she disowned him, but it was impossible to do, it was inconceivable; she simply wouldn’t, and that was that. Even in the distant, foggy fields of the hypothetical, he couldn’t imagine speaking with a fraction of Sirius’s vitriol about her. Disinherited, distanced, or dead, she would be his mother. He had clenched her hand on his first trip to Diagon Alley and fallen asleep in her lap at a hundred boring parties. Anyone who kicked her portrait would be volunteering themselves for acquaintance with the vicious end of his wand.

“What did she do?” he asked, abstractly, before he thought better of it. Tonks sucked through her teeth.

Sirius shrugged.

“Didn’t win any parenting awards, did she,” he said. “Yelled a lot. Made me eat lentils. One time she kicked me down the stairs—”

“On purpose?” Draco said sharply, with a glance at the portrait. Beady dark eyes squinted back at him with uncomprehending scorn. “Why?”

“Can’t remember. Think I brought home a muggle. Might’ve been a boy. Probably did it to piss her off, in fairness.”

“You can’t remember?”

“Mum told me everyone was afraid of her,” volunteered Tonks. “Like living in a dragon’s cave, she said. You had to whisper all the time, or it’d wake up and burn everything.”

“Kind of,” admitted Sirius. “Only sometimes the dragon woke up anyway. Nothing you could do about it. S’the way dragons are. So you and the other guy in the cave, you teamed up, and worked out how to get it back to sleep, and you got pretty good at it, after a while. And so now the dragon’s sleeping a lot, but it’s still a fucking dragon, you know? And then you finally get out of the cave, and your brother’s all, ‘how could you do this to me, I thought we were cave buddies,’ and you’re like, ‘kid, we can still talk, just come out of the cave,’ but he doesn’t want to, because he wants to spend the rest of his life putting it to sleep — thinking like, maybe if he just holds out, one day he’s gonna wake up and it’s not gonna be a dragon anymore — like that, only there’s a war on. Oh shit, sorry, Mum.”

It was muttered without thinking: he’d stubbed his toe on the side of the frame, and Walburga had given a frightened little yelp. He patted the frame in absentminded reassurance.

Draco stared at him.

“You’re a real piece of work, Black.”

“Best piece of work this place ever did,” Sirius agreed, massaging his foot.

“Second best,” said Tonks, not unapologetically, “on account of Mum.”

“Your mum was a snoot.”

“Andromeda,” said Draco suddenly, turning to Tonks. “Was she close to Regulus?”

Tonks shrugged and looked to Sirius. “Never mentioned him,” she said. “But she didn’t mention most of you. No offense.”

“Offense unheedfully taken,” said Sirius, “and the more your loss. Tyke, Andy was close with everybody.”

“Not Bellatrix, surely.”

“Especially Bellatrix,” said Sirius absently, eyeing the staircase in a calculating manner. “That was the mad part. Against all odds, growing up in our house, Andy was actually halfway decent — not all there up top, maybe, but decent—”

“Oi! That’s my mum!”

“—and still managed to like that demented hag of a woman more than just about anyone living. Until she didn’t, I s’pose.”

Draco frowned. “What changed her mind?”

It was Sirius’s turn to shrug and look at Tonks.

“Never said exactly,” said Tonks. “Just that she didn’t fancy being told what to do.”

“That’s it?”

“Made enough sense to me,” said Sirius. “Where is Andy, anyway? Thought she might be around.”

“Spending the hols with Dad’s family in Leeds,” said Tonks, a bit guiltily. “They’re both cross I’m not there. Molly invited them both here, but Mum turned it down.”

“S’ the house, I expect,” said Sirius, with a quick glance at Draco. “I don’t blame her one mite there. I’d rather spend a decade in Leeds than a weekend in this place, and that’s for certain.”

But whether Sirius meant it or not, the implication still seemed clear to Draco: It isn’t about you. Which, of course, meant that it was.

“I’d like to speak to her,” said Draco suddenly. Hearing himself, he pushed back a wave of apprehension, which, he told himself, was unreasonable. She was only a witch, and having a conversation with her wouldn’t break any rules. None that applied to him, anyway.

Tonks blinked. “Sure, yeah,” she said. “If I can get her down. I mean — she’s not avoiding you, mate, you just—”

“We haven’t customarily been in correspondence,” said Dracl, with a thin cordiality. “I understand. I’m attempting a change in custom.”

“She don’t go into wizarding society often,” corrected Tonks. “She keeps to muggle life, mostly, Mum does. Hardly even uses magic around the house. Only went to the Ministry with me because she didn’t trust me to handle Davis on my own. And fair enough, I’m no diplomat, but she’s not much of one, either.”

“Andy’s idea of diplomacy was pitching a fit until someone did what she wanted,” said Sirius, with great fondness. “Won every argument she ever had. Bless.”

“Save one,” said Tonks.

“Yeah. Well. Save one.”

The shadow of the past loomed and then receded like the coming of tide. The moment passed. Tonks inhaled and clapped the dust from her hands.

“Speaking of which, we’ve still got to lug this thing up to the attic. Hey, Malfoy! You’re not busy, are you? How’d you feel about getting elbow grease on your blouse?”

Like she honestly thought after five years in the company of Weasleys he’d never had to use his hands before. As if he was going to keel over and faint at the idea of disturbing an heirloom.

“I didn’t realize you were starting the party early,” he drawled, and tugged off his jumper. “Allow me to show the noble delegates from the House of Black how a Malfoy handles his business.”

Later that night, on the far end of a three-way intergenerational wrestling match with a slab of wood, when Walburga had been slotted in the attic between a fanged victrola and an old set of bagpipes — when the scent of Molly’s cooking wafted in thick, smoky strains through the house, and the table had been mounted with every piece of crockery in Sirius’s name, when Arthur, Bill, and the twins were singing “Blue Christmas” — their pitch altered by a generous serving of cognac — and when the dining room gleamed from the light of a hundred candles mounted here and there and floating around the chandelier like a choir of stars around a full golden moon, Grimmauld Place hosted its first Christmas party in at least thirteen years.

They ate steaming roast pork until each guest was porcine by weight, and passed bowls of supple roasted chestnuts spiced with cinnamon and brown sugar. There was a Christmas cake the size of a beehive, drenched in enough brandy to float a barge of pirates, and mulled wine and butterbeer and bourbon and crackers, paper hats on every head, and then a recess to regroup, and then ice cream and gingerbread and more cake and wine, and everyone drifted around nibbling for hours after the meal formally ended. Everyone was overfed, over-drunk, and overdressed: Draco had come down in a hot flush of triumph from his bout with the portrait, tie lost to the fray, and so fit more naturally between Charlie’s leather duster, Bill’s frayed suede jacket, and Ginny’s outsized Holyhead Harpies jersey. Every so often he looked up from his plate and found Hermione looking at him, her gaze drifting over from where she sat between Ginny and Molly, like a warm cloak settled on his shoulders; when he caught her, she would flit her eyes away, a silent admission which, if anything, only sharpened the warmth.

Ron spilled the soup. Fred put the empty tureen on his head like a silver knight’s helmet. George and Bill arm-wrestled for the uneaten half of Harry’s pudding, and Tonks did an imitation of Moody that made Arthur roar with laughter. They were all useless rascals stacked shoulder to shoulder at a table too small despite three Engorgement Charms, jeering and pounding their goblets like the many Knaves of the Round Table. It was a good party.

After dinner, a caravan of dishes trundled into the kitchen. In what her children called an outstanding show of favoritism, Molly unexpectedly exculpated Draco from dish duty when he gave a put-upon sigh. He was surprised as anyone, being unused to put-upon sighs getting him anywhere in the domain of Weasley.

“So as you don’t dirty your nice shirt, dear,” she said assuringly, patting his shoulder. “We don’t need all those people in there, anyway. Why don’t you put out the candles and put away the silver?”

Ron, laden with plates, rolled his eyes. “Misses Percy,” he muttered to Harry, but not subtly enough to prevent Draco hearing; nor, perhaps, Molly — though she said nothing, and swept into the kitchen.

Disarmed, Draco moved about the newly empty dining-room, pinching out the candles, reducing the room into a smoky dusk, while the kitchen bustled from next-door with light.

Hermione came in as he was finishing, and stood hesitantly in the doorway. He was aware of her almost without looking, by the shift of her step on the hardwood, and the way she drew breath when she had something to say. So he waited until he had finished the last candle to turn and look at her.

She had rolled up her own sleeves for the dishes, and her hair was pinned up with her wand. She watched him put out the candles on the bureau. A veil of smoke hung thin over her face.

“Did you have a good time?” she said. The quiet seemed strange after the loudness of the dinner-table, and the kitchen’s noise all but swallowed it.

He nodded.

“Sirius said that you helped them move Walburga’s portrait,” she said. “That was nice of you.”

“It was a bother to everyone in that stairwell.”

“I can’t imagine what it must have been like, growing up with her,” she said. She walked around the table, drawing her fingers idly over the tablecloth. “My parents hardly ever shouted.”

“Portraits take liberties,” he said. “They exaggerate the qualities of interest to the painter.”

“And that painter was interested in her prejudice?”

“Or her house pride. It was commissioned after her death. By her husband, likely, or a relative.”

“How do you know that?”

“She’s in mourning clothes. It’s her funerary portrait. I’d wager her husband’s is at Witherfell. It’s odd; usually they’d be hung together.”

“Witherfell?”

“The Black seat. Large estate in Cornwall. Abandoned since Regulus’s death, for obvious reasons.”

“They aren’t obvious to me,” she said thoughtfully. She peeled off a bit of wax from the bottom of a candelabra. “Why wouldn’t your mother take it?”

“It’s enough trouble maintaining the Manor. Anyway, supposedly it’s cursed.”

“Cursed?”

“That’s the story,” he said, flicking his hand carelessly, to indicate his lack of credence in the idea. “The curse of the Blacks. Five heirs — one imprisoned, two disinherited, one dead. And four parents dead in a decade: accident, heartbreak, sickness, grief.”

“I’m sorry.”

“I didn’t know any of them. I met my grandmother, once or twice. Druella Rosier. But she died when I was young.”

“Of what?”

“‘Grief.’ Which I have always understood to be a euphemism for an overgenerous dose of Dreamless Sleep.” He paused. “My mother blamed the Rosiers’ house-elf.”

“...For murdering her?”

“Manslaughter by inattentiveness, I suspect, if you pressed her. Druella more or less stopped eating after her husband died of dragonpox. She lost almost two stone in a year, and dosing Dreamless Sleep is difficult even for a trained wizard. Placing such a task in the hands of a house-elf was not the act of a witch with a powerful desire to live.”

“There are worse cases to be made for a family being cursed,” she said after a moment.

She had come to stand at his side. They watched the wax move in slow braids down the silver sconce. He felt her nearness so keenly it was almost its own kind of touch.

“If the Blacks are cursed, it isn’t because of magic,” he said.

She turned to him curiously. “Do you think you’re cursed?” she murmured.

He chose not to answer the question. Instead, he shifted to lean on the wall, regarding her upturned face through the smoke-silver dim.

“I’m a Malfoy,” he said. “Malfoys aren’t cursed, merely dead.”

She stepped forward, bringing them so close he could have touched her by shifting his weight. “Except for you.”

“Except for me,” he agreed.

She pressed her lips together. When she spoke, her words took him by surprise.

“Is it lonely?”

He took his time finding an answer to that.

“It used to be,” he said.

Her smile was a halting flash of hope. Her eyes found his, and then lowered.

“I just meant that it’s a big house to be alone in,” she said. “I’m — glad you’re here.”

“Yes.”

She was very close.

“Oi, Hermione?”

Ron’s silhouette blacked the kitchen doorway, bracing the door ajar with his arm. Hermione moved away quickly.

“Mum says we need another hand to move the table,” he said. “Not interrupting anything, am I?”

“No,” she said brusquely. “Of course. We’re happy to help. Draco, will you—”

“Oh, he’s alright,” said Ron. “We only need the one pair of hands.”

With a fleeting backward glance at Draco, she followed Ron into the kitchen. Ron met Draco’s eyes over her shoulder, and with an unreadable expression, he shut the door.

The candles were all extinguished. Draco slipped his hands into his pockets and retreated to the drawing-room, quelling a strong twinge of bitterness.

There were voices in the drawing-room, low and heated. He slowed on his way past the door, and a murmur escaped with the sliver of lamplight through the crevice.

“—best fighter you’ve got, don’t deny—”

“—wards on the house! All of us—”

“—in and out, three hours, they’ll never notice—”

A shadow dimmed his view. He shifted out of the light.

“It’s my decision.” That was Sirius.

“Not as long as we’re under this roof.” And that was Molly.

“Half of you won’t be! That’s the point!”

“Fine. Not as long as my children are under this roof.”

“Alastor’s here, they’ll be fine — and anyway, between you and me, this ‘master of the wards’ business from Dumbledore always sounded funny.”

“He’s got a point.” Tonks. “You can’t make him stay here.”

“No, but I can.” Remus was not apologetic at all. “Padfoot, listen to me. You’re not leaving this house. The risk is greater than we can accept. The conversation is over.”

“It’s a holiday! The Ministry will be closed! It’s never been safer!”

“Emergency staff still comes in on New Year’s, and you said yourself we’ve no idea if the Unspeakables take holidays—”

“Which hasn’t stopped the rest of you!”

“The rest of us can afford to be arrested.”

“Really? Not worried about Azkaban, are you? Well, why would you be, you’ve never been!”

“I didn’t say that. I said we could afford it.”

“Yeah? What happens when they book you and don’t find your name on a certain registry?”

There was a beat. “I’ve never been formally charged for that,” said Remus, his tone flinty, “and in any case, being an unregistered lycanthrope isn’t a capital offense. I’d go to Azkaban, but at least I’d be alive.”

“I’d rather the other.”

“Don’t talk like that.”

“I would,” said Sirius, raising his voice. “I’d rather the other than go back there, or see you in it. Or live in this fetid, godforsaken temple to barbarism for the rest of my days. I didn't break out of one prison for another—"

"A prison! A prison, really? That's what this is, for you?"

"Yes!"

"Food on the table and a roof over your head? Friends at every meal?"

"Yes, it is!"

"Waking up somewhere you're loved, that's prison? Why, I should've liked some years in prison, too! To think," snarled Remus, "how much suffering I could have avoided—"

"You wake up here because you choose to! I don't!"

"Because I'm flush for options?"

"Yes! You could leave, if you wanted to!"

"To do what? Go where? I'm not free either — you put me in the same position when you came to Hogwarts—"

"I did? I did? Jolly good, Moony, this is just like old times! Something's wrong, let's blame Sirius!"

"I was complicit from the moment I set eyes on you, and you needed me, and you know perfectly well I was never going to walk away!"

"Yes! Yes! All my fault, isn't it! Poor little Padfoot needed minding, so Mummy had to step in! And now you're stuck with me. That's you and me, isn't it, you puttering around after my fuckups with a mop, and getting pissy when I didn't kiss your feet after—"

"And it just killed you, didn't it, to need it? You never complained of a mop when it was necessary, you just assumed that it'd show up, like it always does, and whinged when it wasn't sufficiently expeditious or grateful for the chance to be of service to the great Lord Black—"

"And thank God for you, Saint Remus," said Sirius savagely. "How would we poor lepers do without? Read my lips: I never asked you to stay. I never told you to lock yourself in here with me. And if you ever wanted out, I would be the last person to try and stop you."

A chair screamed, its feet ripping across hardwood.

"Fine."

Several people tried to speak at once. Another shriek of wood.

"Don't touch me, Sirius."

Quick footsteps. Draco threw himself out of the way, backpedaling back up the hallway. His back collided with something hard and short, and someone yelped.

"OI! Where d'you think you're going?"

It was Harry. He caught Draco before they both toppled to the floor in a rictus of stupid.

"You alright?" he said, bewildered. "What's wrong? Look like you saw a dementor—"

"Quiet! They'll hear you. This way, come on."

The door to the drawing-room banged open, and Remus stalked out. For a jumpy heartbeat Draco thought he would turn and see them huddled at the end of the hall, but instead he wheeled in the opposite direction and stomped up the staircase.

"Merlin," said Harry angrily. "What's up everybody's arse? It's Christmas."

Draco raked a hand through his hair, nerves still jangling with the proximity to being caught. “Get the other two,” he said shortly. “Meet me somewhere private. The Order—”

“Can wait. Hey, you have a second? Great.”

Harry seized his sleeve and hauled him into the nearest door — notwithstanding an exclamation of complaint — which happened to be a pantry. The light snapped on at the yank of a cord, and they were blinking at each other in a cramped wooden closet full of jars, smelling of sawdust.

Harry shut the door and pivoted, guarding it with a stern expression. Draco brushed himself off indignantly.

“Listen. I’ll make this quick. I don’t know what’s been going on with you and Hermione—”

“And I’m astounded you feel any entitlement to,” said Draco, outraged and unsettled in equal measure. He had no positive inclinations about where this sort of conversation with Harry might be going.

“—but you’re not subtle, alright? Neither of you. For months now you’ve been at each other’s throats or in each other’s pockets, and I know you’re going to say that’s the way it normally is, but it’s different. And I know you, tosser, I notice these things.”

Draco offered a withering stare for an answer.

“And based on how you are, and everything,” he said awkwardly, “I reckon there might be — stuff going on. Maybe. Between you two. I notice her being all — touchy with you—”

“Granger touches her friends.”

“Not the same way she touches you,” said Harry. Then he muttered: “Thank God.”

The satisfaction was sharp enough to burn.

“Perhaps. What of it?”

“Because if it is — you know, like that— and mate, it’s none of my business—”

“Wholeheartedly agree.”

“—you have to let us in on what’s going on, alright? You have to sort it out. Because if it’s not, and the two of you are just — I dunno, having a weird phase or something — you’re going to hurt Ron. You already are. Hurting him. Not that he’d ever tell you that, because he’s a mate, but I will, because I’m sick of everybody being stupid and walking on eggshells around each other. The three of you need to sort out who fancies who and who doesn’t, or I’m going to lock you all in a broom cupboard together.”

Draco stiffened.

“Hurt Ronald,” he repeated.

“Yeah,” said Harry, pointedly. “Ronald. Who’s fancied her for ages. And if you’re not like that, and you’re really just mates, and don’t fancy each other— you should, y’know, back off a bit.”

Something in his face must have registered surprise, because Harry rolled his eyes and said, “C’mon, you’ve absolutely noticed.”

“Obviously I’ve noticed,” he said coldly. “But it isn’t requited.”

“Give him a chance to see about that, would you?” said Harry. “Reckon she might like him more than you think.”

“I rather doubt it.”

“Well, if you don’t fancy her, it doesn't matter, does it?” he shot back. “All the same to you, right?”

“Of course it matters. They’re not suited.”

“Says you!”

“Says Granger.”

“Not to Ron,” said Harry firmly. “And she should say it to Ron, then, because he really cares about her, and it’s prattish for you to put him off if you’re not actually interested.”

Satisfied that he had said his piece, Harry turned to open the door. Draco, who was loathe to prolong the conversation, ground out anyway:

“Suppose that I was. Interested.”

He had been girded for the worst — dismay, disappointment, cringing repulsion. It did not come. Harry instead carded both hands through his hair, with an expression of aggravation, but not surprise.

“Fine. Just… don’t make it weird, okay? Whatever happens, you still have to play quidditch together.”

“Excuse me?”

“You can’t quit. I won’t let you. And I won’t let him quit, either.” He paused. “So I don’t care what you do with her — well I do care, don’t mess her around or anything, obviously. She’s my best friend — not that you’re not, or that I don’t, but I’ve got to kick someone’s arse, so — but the real thing is, you — someone has to think about Ron.”

This last was, it seemed, the only thing in the speech that he was certain of, and he believed it fervently.

“So don’t make it weird,” he ordered. “Be nice to him. Be nice to her, too. Be nice to all of us! We all bloody need it. And… I dunno. Good luck with all that, or whatever.” His shoulders drooped. “I hope… you get what you want. Whatever that is.”

He lifted his hands as if dropping an invisible object of some weight, stepped back from it, and began walking away. Ginny followed him.

“Shouldn’t you hope Ronald does?”

Harry paused.

“Get what he wants,” he clarified. His stomach twisted at the thought.

“I have this really irrational thing,” said Harry dully, “where I hope everyone will be happy at once. I get that the universe isn’t really on board with this idea; it seems to get pissed whenever someone asks. But I don’t hope for things because they’re rational. So yeah, I hope you get what you want.” He took a deep breath. “Alright. What was it you wanted to tell me about the Order?”

Harry’s bedroom was a dark paneled room on the second floor. A chicken-scratch sign on the door read PROPERTY OF S.B.!! NO TRESPASSING!!!, along with several others, all lavishly festooned with exclamation points.

Draco threw himself into an armchair and brooded while Harry vanished downstairs. A few minutes later, he reappeared with Ron and Hermione, who crowded in and shut the door behind them. Harry locked it.

“Tell them what you told me,” he ordered. Ron sank onto the bed warily. Hermione folded her arms and stood stock-straight in the middle of the room like a pillar.

“They’re going to break into the Ministry.”

“We knew that already,” said Hermione at once.

“They’re going to break into the Ministry imminently. And it’s almost certainly the Department of Mysteries.”

He related what he'd overheard. Harry and Ron were unsettled, and Hermione started pacing in thought.

"We knew all that, too," she said. "We've known they wanted the Department of Mysteries ever since your Occlumency lesson. They're trying to get the 'special artifact' you told us about. What I don't understand is why Sirius is kicking up such a fuss about going — it's going to be heinously dangerous, and if he's caught, he'll get the Kiss, if not worse — and why?" She lifted her hands, acidly. "Because he wants a bit of fun? Then he's a selfish arsehole, and Remus has every right to be angry with him."

"No, because he's been cooped up here for six bloody months," said Ron. "Because all the other grownups are swanning off to do a heist on the government, and he's supposed to sit on his arse at the kiddie table. Six months of that and I'd flip my nut, too."

"Personally, I'd love to have it that easy," Hermione said thinly, "since the rest of us don't get to say we're helping the war effort by breathing. And all of us have it worse than he does, living under Umbridge, but no one asks us if we're sick of being cooped up in Hogwarts."

Harry's shoulders crept up by his ears.

"S'different," said Ron. "C'mon."

"How!"

"It's not like we couldn't leave Hogwarts."

"Not this again." She massaged her nose.

"What?" said Draco.

"Ron, you just want to get out of taking your O.W.L.s."

"I told you, that's a bonus!"

Draco sat up straighter. “No one’s leaving Hogwarts.”

“No, but hang on, give it a think.”

“Fine. My thought is: no one is leaving Hogwarts.”

Ignoring him, Ron counted points off on his fingers. “Grimmauld is safer than Hogwarts these days. We’d be protected by the whole Order. We could spend all our time training — I mean, seriously, Hermione, do you want me spending my time on Divination homework?”

“You don’t do your Divination homework anyway!”

“There you go! No great loss! And anyway, I’ve been working on bringing Mum around, all she needs is a hard press — she’s already thinking about letting the twins skip their N.E.W.T.s if things get any worse. And Harry’s legal guardian is Vernon Dursley, who couldn’t give a fuck if it hit him in the nose.”

“You’re serious,” said Draco, aghast. “You’ve thought it through.”

“You call this ‘thinking it through’?” Hermione muttered.

“What about you?” he shot at her. “Have you considered it?”

“Of course not! I’m sure there’s nothing Umbridge would like more than my vanishing off the face of the earth, but she won’t get the satisfaction,” she said indignantly. “I’m getting my O.W.L.s, and I don’t care if I have to break down the door of the exam room.”

He relaxed slightly, his hackles lowering. “Good.”

“Easy for you to say,” muttered Ron. “You still get to walk around like you own the place.”

Draco stood up. Ron stepped back, startled.

“And do you imagine that I enjoy that privilege?” he said coldly.

“Draco,” said Hermione.

“Is that what you think? My life is a draught of Felix Felicis? When my knee still hurts from where Goyle shattered it last year? When my godfather lives under the thumb of the Dark Lord? When my mother is out there doing God knows what at Dumbledore’s beck and call, and barely talks to me even when she isn’t? When I spent most of this holiday alone in an empty house? Would anyone,” he said, “like to switch with me?”

“Done,” said Harry.

There was a long, oily smear of silence.

“Yeah,” he added. “Thought that’d shut you all up. Are you three done yelling at each other, or should I pop down and put the kettle on?”

The smear widened.

“There’s no point in arguing over who’s got it worse,” said Hermione carefully. “No one gets a prize for having suffered most.”

Harry moved his head equivocally, but a hard look from her cured him.

Ron nodded shortly. “Sorry,” he told Draco. “Didn’t mean that. I know it’s rough for you, with your mum, and everything. I do… get it, you know.”

“It’s fine.”

“And don’t think I’m going after you for being cosseted, either. I mean, you are, but I saw you ask Umbridge for the quill, I haven’t forgotten—”

“It’s not necessary to pursue this further.”

“I’m attempting a manful show of respect over here.”

“Try a manful show of shutting up, next.”

Ron barked a laugh. Draco’s mouth twitched and he eased himself back into his chair, aching unreasonably in muscles he hadn’t even used.

“Did you ever tell them about the mole?” Hermione asked Harry, who blinked at her. She sighed. “The one who’s leaking information about Sirius and Remus?”

“What? Oh, yeah. Moody said he wagered it was Mundungus,” said Ron eagerly. “Apparently, Dung disappeared on a scouting mission around November, hasn’t been seen since. Sirius revoked all his ward permissions, so he won’t be able to get back into the house.”

“Why was he allowed into Twelve in the first place?” said Hermione crossly. “He’s a petty criminal with a record. hardly a freedom fighter.”

“You don’t win wars with saints,” Draco remarked, crossing his legs.

“You don’t win them with pickpockets, either,” she retorted.

“He had good information,” said Ron. “Connections everywhere, lots of intel. Plus, you need someone who can report on the criminal underground, since Lupin won’t go undercover—”

“What?” Harry said sharply. “How did you hear that?”

“Overheard Mum and Bill talking about it. Apparently, Moody wanted him to go back in with the werewolves, but Lupin wouldn’t—”

“Of course he wouldn’t,” snarled Harry, “what a foul fucking thing to ask—”

“—and Sirius threatened to revoke Moody’s ward permissions if he pushed the point, so he didn’t mention it again. But you still need an ear to the ground on what’s happening down Knockturn Alley, so to speak — so they got Dung. Suppose Lupin feels a bit guilty about it now, too — if he'd been willing to work as a double agent again, we'd never have needed to bring in someone else, and there wouldn't have been a mole in the first place."

"And risk his life," said Harry loudly, "yeah, that's a totally reasonable thing to ask—"

"Everyone's risking their lives, Harry," said Hermione impatiently. "For goodness's sake. It's not like Moody asked Lupin for anything he wouldn't do himself, if he could; and moreover, it's not like he forced him to do it."

Harry's outrage was hardly quelled by this acrid infusion of reason. "Are you joking? Remus's life blew up and he spent thirteen years living alone, and just when he's got Sirius back, Moody wants him to turn around and go back to the werewolves — to be out there on his own, no one looking out for him, to be like Snape—"

"Yes, and you don't seem to have a problem with it when it's someone else's godfather, do you?" said Draco coolly. Harry bit his cheek, his expression brittle.

"It's still wrong," he said, "and Snape did that of his own free will."

"Well, so would Lupin!" Hermione said, exasperated. "If he chose to, which he didn't! Honestly, Harry, you can't be sore with Mad-Eye for voicing the option! It would help to have a trustworthy spy in the Death Eater camp, and I don't think he's wrong for pointing out the obvious candidate."

"Snape is trustworthy."

"Well — yes, I don't deny it, but I mean a spy who's loyal to the Order itself, not just to Dumbledore."

"I can be sore with whoever I like," snapped Harry. "For whatever reasons I like. It was a rotten thing to ask of him."

“Worse than asking him to die?” retorted Draco. “Because that’s the whole point of the Order, you realize. They’re recruiting soldiers. What is it you think soldiers do, exactly?”

“There are things worse than dying,” said Harry shortly, and said no more.

The house sighed on its foundations like it was trying to soothe itself. Voices murmured dully from downstairs, comforting in their proximity and their indistinctness — a reminder that the adults, while out of earshot, were no more than a flight of stairs away.

“I want a break,” announced Harry.

Hermione cleared her throat. “Sorry,” she muttered. “We’ll give you some space.”

“Not from you. From the rest of it. D’you lot remember the last time we talked about something that wasn’t the Order? Or Defense Club? Or Umbridge?”

Hermione massaged her own shoulder, restlessly avoiding his eyes. “That’s a lot of things.”

“Yeah? But I miss you,” he said.

Her face crumpled, and the fight went out of her like a departing spirit.

“Just because we’ve talked doesn’t mean it feels like it. I miss talking to you. I miss you going off about how rubbish my Transfiguration essay is, and you and Ron fighting about Crookshanks. I miss talking about rubbish because it’s rubbish, and it doesn’t matter. I want to hang out with my friends, because it’s Christmas, and do — literally anything but think about this stuff, for a bit. I get that it’s stupid and childish, I do, but I’m still asking, because — I need it. I really need you. I’m sorry. I just do.” He swallowed. “Also I think I’ll go mad pretty soon, if you don’t.”

It was light, with a trifle of fear.

Hermione made a wounded sound, and hugged him.

Of course she did. For her, from him, the words I need you were a Summoning Charm.

Harry buried his head in her shoulder. Their closeness fused their silhouette into a single creature, one head, one shuddering chest. Two dark-haired children with parents nowhere near, grappling each other like it was possible to wring the wide universe of all they didn't have from the little they did.

Ron cleared his throat. Draco averted his eyes from Harry and Hermione, who were still wrapped tightly in each other.

"Exploding Snap?" said Ron.

"Five galleon buy-in," said Draco

"Of course you want to play for money."

"I thought you'd leap at a chance to lighten my pockets."

"Oh, I will, don't you worry," said Ron, flopping down on the carpet. He began to shuffle. "Might even let you keep your shirt as a Christmas present."

"Whereas you couldn't pay me to take yours."

"Laugh it up, git, it'll be twice as funny when you're naked."

The night sank into a slow, warm ending. Draco was the best hand at Snap by some margin, but Ron was better at cheating, and Harry and Hermione were both redundantly awful, so the game devolved. They ended up sprawled over the carpet, laughing at the charred bit of Ron's fringe and picking ashes out of their clothes.

The cards drifted away, and the candles died in their brass berths, but the fire crackled on, and the grandfather clock was tolling, but nobody could say how many times. The boys pitched the pocket snitch around in a three-way game of catch until it knocked over a vase, which spilled a filmy and suspicious ash; Ron said, “Damn, there goes Draco’s great-auntie,” which everyone found unreasonably funny. Hermione tried — through vigorous, bemused heckling — to explain what a ski trip was, though when she began describing a ‘ski lift,’ she was shouted down for having them on.

She was leaning against the foot of the armchair with Harry’s head in her lap. Her fingers glided every now and then through his hair like she was petting Crookshanks. The conversation dwindled, turned a few times around the same subject, and finally laid down into a close, companionable silence. Harry’s snores joined the crackling of the grate as the only noise in the room. Ron held up longer, but surrendered at last, his cheek sandwiching the last of the Snap cards to the rug.

Hermione’s yawns grew in frequency until Draco turned to ask her something and found her eyes closed.

She lapsed toward him in her sleep, her head tilted back against the chair behind them. Her shoulder pressed against his arm, a weight that made him intently aware of every inch of the skin beneath it. Her hair brushed soft and fragrant on his cheek.

It was warm in the firelight. The room smelled of woodsmoke, varnish, incense, citrus. In his limbs was a thick warmth that moved slowly and viscously down his veins. The other boys were both asleep. He could count her freckles, locate them in their usual stations, and draw the usual constellations he liked to imagine between them, studying her face with a naked and unrepentant greed, free of the fear that someone — not least of all herself — would catch him looking.

Her mouth was parted slightly. Her breath feathered from a crease between bowed lips. It was so close that a slight movement of his head would brush it with his own; and when the thought occurred to him, her eyes fluttered open, as if she'd heard it too.

They were the only part of her that moved. From beneath her thick eyelashes, she studied him. Then her eyes dropped down his face, and rested on his mouth.

He felt pinned to the spot by an enormous weight, bearing down on every nerve at once. It pressed hard on the center of his chest, forcing his heart to beat.

With a slight movement of her chin, she lifted her face. He bent down the slightest distance, and their mouths touched. And then, as if by accident, they were kissing.

It wasn't urgent as the train had been urgent. It was slow, and shallow, and he almost felt outside himself, watching his own body do something it had never been taught. He mirrored the cant of her head, bending to kiss her better, and each movement glided smoothly into the next. She tasted like cinnamon and the trifle they'd had for dessert; that was the second time she'd tasted sweet when he kissed her, and there was a giddiness in the thought that he could tell the difference.

And of course she tasted sweet. It wasn't surprising at all. Nothing about kissing her was surprising. She did it the same way she did everything, which was to say, thoroughly, passionately, and extremely well.

The fire snapped, and Harry made a noise in his sleep.

Hermione drew back with a twitch. Draco tensed.

She didn't run, this time, however. She gave him a small smile that was half-shy and half-pleased, searching his face for a sign of something.

She must have found it, because her smile widened. Then she folded her head against his shoulder, took a deep breath, and settled, her shoulders slackening into a posture of utter rest.

He tipped his head back on the chair, stared at the ceiling, and tried to breathe evenly. From the rate of her breathing, Hermione had fallen asleep, and a dawning weight on his eyelids suggested that the same would soon be true of him.

It had been so long since anything had been as easy as this. It had been ages since he hadn’t fallen asleep to a list of the several hundred things he had to worry about. He couldn’t remember worrying about anything, really, with her head on his shoulder, and her breathing slow.

-September! Happy Hogwarts season!

-We're trying to do a semi-regular update schedule, but I'm not quite back at weekly-post levels of productivity yet — sorry about that! I'm doing better now, so that is progress in one direction.

-God, I love Black family drama. There's nothing I love more than an old bitchy aristocratic house that's tearing itself apart.

-Slow burn continues to slow-burn post-kiss, but in a positive direction. I've always maintained we weren't fucking around with it.

-The previous chapter's title was a riff on "In the Bleak Midwinter," which is one of my favorite Christmas songs and belongs to the robust canon of “festive holiday tunes that happen to sound like a funeral march.” My bonus piece of paratext is that I imagine it being Draco’s favorite carol. That or "A Coventry Carol."

-This is the halfway point of Book 5! Thanks for sticking with me.

-The chapter, "Auld Lang Syne," will be up hopefully before too long (though not too soon).

Auld Lang Syne

Chapter 71: Auld Lang Syne

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

When he woke, his heart was racing, and the room was dark. Vestiges of a dream frittered away in his periphery: a train car, a dead sprint, a wall of white masks, and a thatch of brown curls receding into the mist before him.

It was cold now that the fire had gone out. Hermione had curled up in a ball to sleep, and someone had draped a blanket over her shoulders. Harry was a dark lump on his bed, and Ron slouched in the armchair, head buried in the crook of his elbow.

Draco blearily lifted his arm, and found it buried under another blanket.

He shrugged it off and stood up. The clock was tolling two.

A jolt of panic sent him stumbling to the door. His mother would have expected him back.

Then he remembered he wasn't on speaking terms with his mother, and he lurched against the doorframe, grinding the heel of his palm into his eye. He felt tired and miserable in the way one could only be at two in the morning, when one was far from one's bed.

The stairs creaked on the way down.

It was a relief not to creep past the first landing, now that Walburga's portrait had been replaced with a wide, splintering maw in the wall; all the same, the hole was somewhat unsettling. He trotted past it and into the drawing-room, picking his way through the papery detritus of Christmas morning.

A moonless night pressed flush to the windows; frills of frost around the eaves. An owl crooned.

He fumbled through the darkness for the Floo powder, lamenting his want of a Summoning Spell, or even a miserly Lumos. When his fingers located the jar, they also brushed a fold of paper.

Moony,

Don’t be angry. Back in a jiff. Keep the Floo open.

—Your Padfoot

He stared at it for a second. It was very strange, how time moved then: he could feel each beat of his heart as if minutes elapsed between them, horrible pauses crawling past between each detonation in his chest. His mouth parted; he fumbled for a name, and in a white blear of panic, it seemed to take him years.

“REMUS!”

The door slammed against the wall. He tore through it and up the stairs.

“REMUS! ARTHUR! MOLLY!”

Lights blazed.

“What?”

“Who’s that?”

“What is it?”

He took the last three steps in a single jump and whipped around the banister. He almost slammed into Arthur, who stepped into his way and seized him by the arms, wrenching him still with surprising strength. Arthur wore a dressing-gown, and behind him, Molly was hurrying out of their bedroom, fumbling the tie on her robe.

“Who’s that?” she cried. “Is that Ron?”

“No, it’s Draco — what the devil’s the matter, son?”

He didn’t have the time. He shoved the paper into Arthur’s hands, tore himself away, and raced up the stairs.

“REMUS!”

Fleur swept down the stairs and nearly speared him in the eye with her wand. “Est-ce que quelqu'un essaie de nous tuer?”

“Oui, il s'appelle Sirius Black, alors dégage de mon fucking chemin, s’il te plaît, where the fuck is REMUS?”

“I’m going after him,” cried Arthur, voice winnowing down the stairs, “I’ll take Tonks, Bill, and Fleur, Molly, go get them—”

“Yes, and Alastor, take Alastor!”

“No! Best people stay with the children! You and Alastor stay with the children!”

“God damn it!” She didn’t argue, but hurtled up the stairs, brushing past Fleur. “Fleur! Code seven! TONKS!”

Remus staggered out to the landing, gaunt and horrified, his nightshirt flapping open around his ribs. “What’s happening? Is there an attack?”

“Sirius is gone.”

“Where?”

“No idea,” shouted Tonks, “he might've gone to the Ministry—”

“Godric's Hollow,” rasped Remus, interrupting the answer to his own question. Then he raised his voice: “I know where he is. He’s gone to Godric's Hollow.”

“Godric's Hollow,” Bill shouted, sprinting past on the stairs. “Great! We'll use Bagshot's Floo — Fleur, n’y pense même pas, you’re staying here!”

“Je t’emmerde, Rouquin, my left thumb is twice the duelist you are!”

“Telling, not asking, kid, and this isn’t a dueling tournament!”

“Ne m'appelle pas ‘kid,’ petit con, I am le grand prix in spellcasting at Beauxbatons, five years, and you are barely getting — what is the name, fucking stupid English tests—”

“Maybe you can write a paper at them!”

“She’s right, and shut up about it,” roared Tonks, erupting from her room. Her hair was black again, choppy around the shoulders, and her nose was a large, lopsided, very un-Black ridge of knobs. She flipped over the railing and soared down to collide with a house-shuddering rattle on the ground floor. “Delacour eats your charmwork for breakfast, she’s coming. Arthur!”

“Gone!”

“Damn! Alright, I’m after him!”

The sound of slamming doors and footsteps thundered through the house. The twins Apparated onto the landing with a one-two crack-crack. Charlie gave a shout and came pounding down the stairs with his wand in one hand and a nail-studded beater’s bat in the other.

The Floo howled. Remus sagged against the wall, ashen and limp like a used sheet. Draco took a wary, nervous step back.

“Why?” Remus mumbled.

“If it ever mattered, it doesn’t now. Come, you’ve got to help Moody ward—”

“Isn’t he going to,” he said, blinking glassily, and he gripped the wall as if seeking a hold on the surface of reality. “He’s— they’ll kill him, won’t they. Sirius.”

“Lupin.” He gripped his wand, ten useless inches of hawthorn wood, dead to rights, while the man who could use his appeared to be visibly dissolving. “Professor Lupin. Take hold of yourself.”

Remus’s gasp trembled on the thin verge of a laugh and a cry. “The Dementors. If they find him. He hasn’t been able to do a Patronus in six months. The others don’t know. It’s the Kiss on sight, if they find him, and he can’t do a Patronus.”

“Listen to me. You need to help Moody ward the house.”

“Oi.”

It was Ginny. She stood in the mouth of the hallway, wand drawn, hair a riot of disturbed sleep. She elbowed him away from Remus and took her old professor by the sleeve. “He’s having a panic attack.”

“You say that like I failed to notice!”

“Bugger off and do something useful,” she ordered, eerily calm. “Go find Harry, make sure he doesn’t run off.”

“He’s not a dog,” said Draco uneasily, but he swept away from the shivering man, and the last he saw of them was Ginny kneeling to help Remus sit down.

Harry, Ron, and Hermione leaned over the second landing, a triptych of terrified bewilderment. When Hermione saw him, she let out a small sound, and then clapped her hand over her mouth, sagging against the railing. She clung to it, wild-eyed.

Draco looked up at them, at a loss for words, and drew a deep breath. As his mouth parted, the scream cut open the air.

It came trembling out of the bottom of the house. Ron reacted first, probably because he was the first to recognize it as Molly.

He and Harry shot down to the ground floor. Draco followed them into the drawing-room.

The pulsing strains of the scream made the room unreal, uncanny, like a dream or a vision; he almost floated in, with a calm, vivid clarity that he was about to witness something awful and inevitable.

In the drawing-room, Molly sank in front of the hearth, her hands clutching her chest, as if the scream were something coming out of it involuntarily, an angry creature pouring out of her body and swelling to suffocate the room. Bill and Fleur knelt with their arms wrapped around her shoulders, bracing Molly upright; through thick tears, Fleur was babbling in an inaudible slur of French.

In the hearth, Sirius and Tonks braced up the body of Arthur Weasley, whose chest shone red from the gash in his throat.

A pale blue sunrise was swelling over the London skyline before any of the Weasleys returned from St. Mungo’s.

There were hours of waiting, in the awful, eerie darkness of morning. Moody had closed the Floo, for safety’s sake, and warded the doors. Tonks made coffee, cleaned up the wrapping paper, checked the wards, went for a walk — twice — and then paced around the room juggling her wand until Moody snapped at her. Fleur sat in silence, her hands folded over her pendant.

Draco sat with his back to the cold glass of the window, letting the icy line against his neck keep him awake.

Hermione came down over and sat next to him, staring dully into the middle distance. He looked at her, and then at her hand, which had fallen on the seat between them.

She moved it closer to his, and then — still without looking at him — shifted along the bench until she leaned against him. Her head tipped against his shoulder.

He considered her hand, which had burrowed its way into his. Her fingers were so small, and her skin was so cold. Her nails were bitten short and uneven.

It was an awful endless morning, and the modicum of comfort was her weight against his shoulder, a stark contrast to the cold glass.

He flipped her hand over, raised it to his mouth, and pressed his lips to it. She gave a hard shudder.

There was a knock at the door. Sirius scrambled to get it.

When Bill stumbled through the door, the room rose to its feet.

“Dad’s alive,” he rasped.

The knot in Draco’s chest slackened. Hermione gave a quiet, powerful: “Oh,” and sank back down into the couch, clutching her head in her hands.

The twins slouched in behind Bill and wordlessly climbed the stairs. Charlie came in behind them and shut the door.

“How bad is it?” Moody asked gruffly.

“No idea. Bad,” said Bill. He rubbed his eyes. “Mum’s got a cot, and they’re letting the kids stick around… we’ve told them Harry’s a cousin, so he’s ‘Lancel Prewett,’ if anyone asks. Ron’s idea, and thank Merlin he was quick… Mum was so out of it she almost put him down in the guestbook as Harry Potter.”

“Disguises?”

“Glamoured birthmark on the scar, Hair-Lengthening Charm, and he took off his glasses.”

“What’d you tell the healers?”

“He tried to break up a street duel on Knockturn.”

“Any aurors come looking? Unspeakables?”

“Fleur Obliviated the ones who saw us.”

“Good thinking,” Mad-Eye muttered. He shook Bill’s hand. “Well done, boy.”

“Thanks,” said Bill, without joy.

“Thank God for you, and your luck,” whispered Sirius. He made to take Bill’s hand, too, but Bill didn’t acknowledge him.

“I’m exhausted. I’m going to sleep,” he muttered. “Wake me up if the house is burning.”

And he left Sirius empty-handed in the foyer.

Time stretched and ribboned out in strange ways over the course of the next few days. It seemed like he had been at Grimmauld Place for weeks, picked at a dozen breakfasts of burned toast and watery porridge, while Charlie and Tonks clucked over the coffee pot; as if he had stumbled a dozen times into a spare bedroom, collapsed on the coverlet, and slept without removing his shoes; and a dozen times arisen, bleary, when the sun had nearly set again, for a small, somber tea with Moody, Fleur, and Sirius in the drawing-room.

Harry and Ron returned from St. Mungo’s the next day, followed by Ginny and Molly the next, and all of them prowled around the house in a state of tense, fretful shell shock. The twins said little and laughed less, and their faces became almost unrecognizable without their usual smirks. Fleur prayed, often, with her hands clasped around the pendant of her necklace.

None of Arthur's children would speak to Sirius. Molly would, if needed, address him in clipped tones about some odd job around the house that wanted doing, but usually communicated using Harry as an envoy. Fred and George refused to sit at the same table as him; Bill and Charlie would leave any room he entered; Ron never crossed paths without sending him a nasty look. Of all of them, Ginny was the most forgiving; though she had dutifully adopted her siblings' vow of silence, she seemed conflicted about it.

Draco preferred even this dour, eerie Number Twelve to the Manor as he'd left it. For Twelve was never silent, not even under the shroud of Arthur's injury, and there was always something to do to take one's mind off the obvious: namely, cleaning. The mansion contained an inexhaustible hoard of cupboards to be emptied, windows to be wiped, cobwebs to be cleared, silver to be polished (though he pointed out, somewhat waspishly, that there was piquant irony in being ordered by Molly to polish his own family silver).

He wrote to his mother, telling her he would stay a few days more with the Weasleys, but did not write why. No answer came, so he adopted her silence as consent, and if it put him in a foul mood to hear nothing from her, then he was in plenty of company.

The work was good for all of them; it gave them something to do, especially Ron, who took to it with a focus he usually reserved for chess games and quidditch, and not labor of any sort. The boy who loped around Gryffindor Tower with a crook in his grin and a joke for everyone was sealed now behind a hard line of a mouth and a dull, muttered answer to every question. Harry stuck close to him, as did Hermione and his brothers, but the more people tried to comfort him, the more he pulled away — offended by their comfort because it reminded him of what he had to be comforted for, and in so doing dragged him headfirst back into consideration of what he had to be afraid of. Resentment at this curdled any gratitude for their comfort — one tending to resent, rather than savor, the need to thank someone who had rendered an unhelpful service — and so he became snappish and withdrawn. It seemed to Draco that the best thing to do was to afford him the privacy he needed to pretend that nothing was happening, for as long as he needed to, until he could face it head-on — self-deceit in the face of tragedy being, in his experience, not cowardice, but a chance to marshal one's strength.

He found Ron once curled on the window-seat in his bedroom, head bent against the glass in obvious contemplation, and though Draco had been sent to bring him down for dinner, Ron's posture made it obvious he had no interest in food nor disturbances. Draco made at once to retreat, but Ron noticed the movement of the door, and called out to him.

"That you, Draco?"

Draco reluctantly revealed himself. Ron sat with his shoulders hunched over his drawn-up knees, and he seemed withered and shrunken, his great height reduced to a boyish size.

"Can I ask you something?" he said apprehensively.

"You can ask. I may even answer."

"Right. Okay."

His jaw worked with the effort of formulating the question. Draco shut the door behind him.

"When your dad died," Ron said, "would you have wanted to know as soon as it happened? Or would you have wanted them to hold off on telling you as long as you could, so it'd be like — he was alive a bit longer, you reckon?"

Draco did not reply at once. The snow on the window left a pale glow on the carpet, reflected light from a thin London sun.

“My father was murdered by my aunt,” he said. “Our situations differ somewhat.”

“Yeah, but hypothetically — and I’m sorry for bringing the shit up, but I don’t know anyone else whose dad’s died.”

Draco raised his eyebrow.

“I can’t ask Harry,” Ron said quietly. “He doesn’t remember his dad. S’different.”

Draco acknowledged it, and set his brow in consideration.

“When I was eight,” he said, “freshly eight — perhaps a month or two after my birthday — my mother took me into the study and told me what happened to my father. I don’t remember what she said precisely, or when. It wouldn’t have mattered. In the long run, it’s only the beginning.”

“But—”

“It takes months for the idea of it to settle in,” he said. “And years before you stop forgetting.”

“When’d you manage it?” said Ron. “When’d you stop forgetting that he was — you know?”

He shrugged. “Fathers are long in the dying,” he said.

Ron swallowed. “I see,” he said, and turned back to the window.

Draco felt that he had failed to render a vague but important service.

For a few weeks after his father’s funeral, Draco had been given to bouts of crying, and so he’d locked himself in one of the little house-elf cubby-holes under the kitchen, which were too small for grown wizards to enter. It had felt a great shame to cry, after his mother had asked him to be strong about it, so he’d tried to stop by pinching himself, and made Dobby promise not to tell.

He recoiled from the prospect of telling this to Ron; it would help nothing to suggest that Ron was the object of his pity or compassion, both of which he already received from others, and by all appearances resented. He also recoiled from the words that would have expressed what they both knew, which was that Ron faced the prospect of a shared tragedy, and Draco was the only person in the house who could lend credence to the lie Ron wanted to hear: that things would be alright, somehow, eventually, if Arthur died.

“Look, Ronald.”

Ron raised his eyes in a start: his posture, his shabby shirt, his raw-bitten nails, and the red lines trawling around his eyes, all begged for a better answer than the one Draco had given.

“For one thing, he may not die,” he said. “It doesn’t do to mourn before you have to. And when he does, it’ll be a question of courage. Between the two of us, you’ve more courage at fifteen than I did at eight.”

“I don’t have courage for that,” said Ron hoarsely. “I’m not you. I couldn’t — do whatever you do. To live with it. To just — lock it up, and push on, like nothing happened. That’s not the way I am.”

Unexpectedly, it stung. Draco crooked his little finger, pressing the band of his signet deeper into the skin. He thought of empty rooms, and empty doors, and a cold, rainy day where a man had gone into the earth forever. He thought of his anger walking into those rooms, and vanishing behind the wide black doors, or being swallowed by the dead wet earth, and suddenly it was easy to speak without emotion.

“Why do you think it’s the way I am?” he said quietly.

Ron paused. When he spoke again, it was thin and wavering.

“I don’t want to be like that,” he said. Like you, he didn’t say.

Draco dipped his head. His acknowledgement of Ron's point was silent, and Ron's plea to be disagreed with was silent, too.

"I would bet a monumental sum of money," he said at length, "that so long as we live or endure in living memory, no one will ever remark that Ronald Weasley reminded them of me."

There was a beat. Then Ron threw back his head and laughed.

"You're bloody right," he said. "Oh, you're bloody well right about that, at least. You tosser."

"Ingrate," said Draco, which made Ron snort and laugh harder.

But it was a laugh of relief, not humor, and it did not last long.

Meanwhile, Remus had sequestered himself in one of the guest rooms, and would speak to no one. That included Sirius, who had after several excruciating days ceased trying to get Remus to talk to him, and now communicated through forlorn stares and deliberate, hopeful remarks addressed to no one, but pointed in Remus's general direction. Otherwise, he floated around the house, haggard and cringing, when he wasn't sleeping on the sofa in the drawing-room.

Harry took it, predictably, not well.

"Give it time," said Hermione.

"But they don't even talk to each other."

"So?" said Ron brusquely, dealing out another hand of cribbage. Hermione was forcing them to learn muggle card games because she was sick of losing at Snap. "Serves him right. Fucker."

Harry cringed. Hermione rubbed his shoulder comfortingly.

"He just wanted a bit of fresh air," he muttered. "A bit of freedom. On Christmas."

“Bet my father wants some fresh air,” said Ron, in light, clipped tones. “In St. Mungo's.”

The conversation keeled over from the force of this blow, and did not recover.

“My parents fight, too,” Hermione said quietly to Harry. “Once fought for three months, actually.”

He folded his hand over hers, smiling weakly.

Draco couldn’t remember if his parents had ever fought. Surely they had tiffs; his mother aggressed obliquely over the soup course, and his father made a discerning implication over dessert; but fights, when they happened, had taken place behind closed doors.

He wondered what his father’s anger had looked like. If it looked like his own. If it had felt like his own.

He wondered how it would feel to know for certain that you had your father’s rage. Then he wondered if it weren’t better not to know.

“Bet it wasn’t over something like this, though,” said Harry.

“No. It was over sending me to Hogwarts.”

Silence descended.

“My mother said no. My father said yes. She was unhappy, but she came around to his way of thinking.” She shrugged. “In her defense, my life would've been less eventful if I’d gone to Cheltenham.”

“And mine would be a lot shorter,” said Ron. “Tell your dad thanks for me.”

She laughed. Ron practically glowed, and tried to hide his pleasure by dealing out the next hand with such vigor that a card ended up on the other side of the room.

“So,” said Ron, “you like your Christmas present? The perfume?”

“It’s nice,” she said hesitantly. “I’ve never had any before.”

“Well, good. You like the smell, though? I made Ginny pick it out, but she isn’t much of a girl.”

“She wouldn’t like you saying that,” said Harry.

“Yeah, which is why you won’t be telling her, Harry.”

“It’s a very nice smell,” said Hermione primly. “The perfume. It’s clean. Like soap. Thank you.”

She tapped her cards even on the floor and began organizing them. She avoided eye contact, including Draco’s, whose stomach twisted in a bitter, irrational way.

He despised this part of fancying her: the meagerness, the pettiness. Knowing that the feelings were reciprocated should have banished this sort of feeling — an aggression that verged on nervousness, as if Ron even looking at her in that worshipful way was a threat that needed to be dealt with. He hated the idea of her going around smelling like something Ron had given her, and hated doubly the fact that the idea of it so colonized the forefront of his brain, ineradicable, a permanent installation of discomfort. He hated most of all the way Ron sat there satisfied with himself, as if he’d won some sort of prize.

They played another hand, and Draco excused himself. Hermione looked up as he went, and he felt the weight of her uneasy stare follow him out the door.

If they had any time alone together, it might have been easier. But in Grimmauld Place, one was never more than fifteen minutes from their next encounter with a Weasley, and the four of them were spending so much time together that pulling her away for a private conversation felt like a public declaration of intent.

The closest they'd come to communication was a fleeting encounter when she was coming out of the room she shared with Ginny, near the bottom of Regulus's staircase, and he met her on the landing; she had touched his forearm as he passed, her fingers grazing the curve of his elbow, and he stopped short, as if some invisible cord in his navel had wrenched him back.

"Are you alright?" she said in a low voice.

He found his heart in his throat for some reason. "Fine," he said. "Better than most, I should think."

"It's a good thing you were awake to raise the alarm. I don't know what would have happened to Sirius, otherwise."

"I don't know that we would have ever found out."

She shivered. "It's awful," she said in a hard voice. "I can't imagine what it would've done to Lupin. Or worse, to Harry."

"Inconsiderate, to be sure, but paltry in comparison to what he'd have done to the rest of us."

"What do you mean?"

"Suppose he'd led someone back to Grimmauld Place. He's master of the house. If he brings someone through the wards, they could have brought the whole Ministry in after them. Not to mention he made us sitting ducks when he left the house — there are certain wards that only activate when the master's at home. Black could have murdered us."

"See, but I don't understand why he has to be the master. He hates this place. Why can't he just give it to someone else? To Mad-Eye, or Remus, even—"

"The laws don't work that way."

“You can't sell property in wizarding Britain? How classically medieval. ”

“You can,” he said, mouth twitching, “but not a family seat. They're magically entailed. It's his until he dies, and then it passes to his lawful heir, or whomever he names in his will.”

“Who's the lawful heir?”

He raised his eyebrows and smirked at her.

“You're joking,” she exclaimed.

“Through my mother, but yes.”

“Is there anything your family doesn't own?”

“We're working on it.”

“There should be laws against that,” she said, aggrieved.

“What? Against me?”

“Yes, exactly. Against Draco Malfoy. An exile decree for gross accumulation of wealth.”

“Tsk. You'd be miserable.”

“I would get so much work done,” she said, with a distant gleam of longing.

He laughed. Her mouth twitched up, and she watched him with an exasperated sort of pleasure. She lifted her eyes, and drawn close in the dim torchlight of the landing, her proximity flickered through his awareness like a warm wave.

Footsteps battered the stairs below them. “Hey, Hermione?” called Ron. “Come help with something, would you? There’s some old runes on the silver we found in the basement…”

She closed her eyes in a fleeting, minute gesture of exasperation. Draco jerked his head in invitation, and she drew away, calling out: “You know, if you’d taken Runes, like I told you to two years ago, you could translate them yourself!”

“But I’m no good at them!”

“How would you know?” Her voice faded down the stairwell. “You never tried!”

That had been several days ago. Now, the same landing was quite empty, and Draco swept through it with the memory of their last private moment, fleeting as it was, itching in his head.

Rounding the corner, he nearly tripped over Sirius, who was taking a chisel and hammer to one of the mounted elf heads on the wall.

He was whaling at it ferociously. Sawdust clouds sprang up wherever the hammer landed, which was not always proximate to the chisel.

Draco stood back and watched him, slipping his hands into his pockets.

“Putting holes in my house, Black?”

“Not your anything. This is my dusty — old — stinking — shithole. Get your own.”

“Only until you’re dead. Based on recent events, I won’t have to wait long.”

Sirius missed the chisel, struck his finger, and swore loudly.

“Mad-Eye’s right. I really should see someone about a will.”

“You don’t want to do your dear cousin a good turn?” said Draco, mockingly. Sirius flashed him a look of warning.

“You’re set to inherit two haunted houses already, kiddie. It’s a kindness to spare you another.”

Draco leaned against the wall. “How did they find you?” he said coldly. “When you left. Where did you go?”

“Godric's Hollow.” Sirius gave the hammer another swing. “Had some friends I wanted to visit.”

“Friends more important than our lives?”

The hammer paused. Sirius rolled his shoulder, face hidden under the long shag of his hair.

“You never knew them,” he said. “If you'd met them, you'd understand.”

“I doubt that very much.” He paused, and frowned. “Knew?”

Sirius smiled a terrible, bitter smile. “They're dead, you see. My friends,” he said. “And there's only one place to visit them.”

He swung the chisel. Wood snapped.

“But the Ministry's got it under surveillance,” he added briskly. “Heat detectors. Caterwauling Charms. Two patrolmen on watch. Makes sense, I guess. First place I'd look for me, too.”

“A very foolish man once told me that dead men can't be proud of you.”

Sirius barked a laugh.

“The difference between you and him is you've got a life ahead of you, lad,” he said. “And respectfully, your dead man wasn't worth half what mine was.”

“Perhaps, but they're equally dead,” said Draco coolly, and felt very little remorse when Sirius flinched. “And you're thirty-six. You have a life ahead, too."

"I had a life before," said Sirius. "And it was very nearly perfect, for a while there."

He hefted the hammer. A ribbon of tattoos stretched and pulled on the weathered skin of his arm. Then he swung the chisel again.

The elf-head broke off the wall in a firework of sawdust.

"There we are. One down, only nineteen… twenty… only twenty-two."

"You're surely not doing all of them."

"All of them. Plus the severed hands in the master bedroom."

"The what?"

"The master bedroom, I said. Then I'm taking down all the crests. And that tapestry of the muggle-born hunt upstairs."

"Do you intend to refurbish your way into Lupin's good graces?"

"I intend to make this house half livable. If I happen to blow parts of it up in the process, that's a bonus." He lined up the chisel on the next elf-head. "And don't you worry about Moony. He and I have come back from worse than this."

The stairs creaked. Harry, Ron, and Hermione appeared on the landing.

"Draco. There you are," Ron clipped out. He gave no sign of acknowledgement to Sirius. "Dad woke up. Tonks is taking us to see him. You're coming. C'mon."

"I thought they only permitted family visitation," said Draco.

“Yeah, and the Order’s got this really clever workaround for that,” agreed Ron. “It’s called lying.”

“You can be Pisscock Prewett the Third,” said Harry. “Hey, Sirius.”

“'Lo, kid,” said Sirius, smiling unsteadily. “How are you, now?”

“I'm fine. Why are you covered in sawdust?”

“Renovating, boy-o. Gonna build you a bedroom that doesn't smell like old dog.”

“Aw, but it just won't feel like home.”

“Never mind. You can sleep in the house-elf cubbies.”

Ron cleared his throat. Sirius straightened up.

“How is he?” said Sirius. “Arthur.”

Any levity evaporated like fog in sunlight. Wordlessly, Ron turned around and went down the stairs. Hermione called out his name, sighed, and then followed with a lingering glance at Sirius.

“He’s okay,” said Harry, once he was gone. But it wasn’t clear whom he meant.

The Floo at St. Mungo’s was emergencies-only, so they made their way on foot through London — a fact that Draco wished someone had done him the generosity of mentioning before he agreed to the visit.

The rest of them were wearing muggle costume, concessions to Mad-Eye’s preference for subterfuge; somehow, only Hermione managed to make this seem remotely presentable. Draco had vocally rejected an offer to borrow Bill’s muggle jeans, and so his costume consisted of a coat borrowed from Sirius, a sweeping double-breasted leather thing that somehow felt both more and less pretentious than a cloak. It smelled of patchouli oil and cheap cologne.

He complained of the situation, in his opinion, a normal amount.

“It’s just the Tube,” muttered Hermione. “You’re not being made to crawl through the snow.”

“Nothing I have ever known about muggle transportation leads me to imagine I will enjoy one more than the other.”

“Stop being fussy. It’s an English institution.”

“As is the practice of hanging,” he said, and she laughed a little.

That laugh was some consolation, anyway. It was the first good one she’d given in a while, loud and un-self-consciously grating. It was snowing, and when she tipped back her head the snowflakes beaded in tiny crystals on her eyelashes.

The group ventured down a narrow, dirty stairwell that appeared to serve a double purpose as a public toilet, and into a wide underground cave with silver turnstiles. A train came screaming out of oblivion with a sound that Draco would have assumed meant the station was collapsing were it not for the other passengers’ indifference, and Tonks herded them all into one carriage. Draco ended up wedged against one of the poles, a stranger flush to his back, Hermione pressed into the space under his arm.

The whole thing was a real gallimaufry of sensations.

“Hold on to something,” said Hermione, elbowing him.

“I don’t need coddling, thank you.”

“Fine. Suit yourself.”

This light tone, from Hermione, was a sure sign that you were about to screw yourself over with power and efficiency; but he didn’t have time to follow up.

With a howl, the train lurched forward, and he nearly flew.

He would have, anyway, if there had been any room in the carriage to fly. As it was, he was vaulted almost horizontal to the floor, caught himself on the pole, and headbutted someone in the shoulder. They gave him a look he would personally have reserved for someone engaging in vigorous public sodomy.

Hermione was visibly wrestling with herself.

“Don’t say it.”

“I’m not.”

“Good.”

“I’m not!”

“And that’s good.”

“But if I were to say it—”

“Here we go.”

“I mean if someone, hypothetically, were to have told you so—”

“You get one more warning.”

“—then that someone would be me. Telling you so. Because, as it happens, just a few seconds ago—”

“Before you speak, remember that at some point in the future, you may find yourself a passenger on a broomstick I’m operating,” he said, “and I advise you to choose your words with the level of grace you expect to receive.”

“You wouldn’t dare,” she said gaily, and brushed past him on the way out of the carriage with a smirk.

He followed her, strongly resentful of the fact that the universe let her win so many arguments, which was terrible for her ego, and even worse for his own.

They emerged from a station by Tottenham, and made their way up through the glut of shoppers and tourist crowds, winding a long, mostly ginger caravan through the bustling pavements of London. Billboards twinkled and automobiles whisked past in a blur of glittering lights and hammering, industrial sounds, the same old unnerving roar of life. Mist and falling snow bled the streets into astigmatic streaks of scarlet and yellow.

Hermione cut briskly through the crowd. There was a seeming logic to pedestrian city-travel that she and Harry understood, and so they drifted naturally to the front of the group, while the others trailed behind, buffered by the strange and seemingly unpatterned flow of harried shoppers charging up and down the streets.

Outside a shabby brick department store called Purge and Dowse, Tonks stepped up to the glass and began muttering something. Brown paper walled up most of the windows, and the sign on the doors read CLOSED FOR REFURBISHMENT.

As they waited for Tonks to finish whatever she was doing, a well-dressed muggle on the pavement ran headfirst into Mad-Eye, nearly toppled over, and then stalked off without apologizing, wearing a dazed expression.

“Real nice, tosser,” shouted Ginny, and was shush- ed by four people.

“Not his fault. Notice-Me-Nots,” growled Mad-Eye. “Not to mention muggle repellent charms. Can’t hardly see in front of his nose around this place.”

The glass panel of the windowfront gave a shudder and slid back, emptying a bath of warm air and yellow light onto the street. Whistling cheerfully, Tonks led them into the waiting room of St. Mungo's.

Inside, past a dismal foyer populated by wailing miserables, fluorescent lights paved rows of checkered tile floors. Arthur's bed was in the short-term ward, a marble chamber with frosted windows and a dozen beds separated by red curtains. Some of the other beds had curtains drawn, and from inside came the occasional rasp, wheeze, or moan that indicated the condition of its occupant. Arthur's, in contrast, was silent. He laid back on a bed of shock-white sheets, his skin a ghastly, unrealistic shade of pale, with a thick collar of bandages around his throat.

Molly sat in a chair by her husband's shoulder, holding his hand in a grip that could have resisted hurricanes. Her children filed in with uncharacteristic gravitas and stood in an awkward semicircle around the sickbed, exhibiting the range of expressions from stoicism to full-throated distress.

Ron made an involuntary noise. Harry put a hand on his shoulder.

Arthur stirred when they all came parading in, and his eyes slitted open.

"Hi, Dad," croaked Ginny. She clambered onto the foot of his bed and sat on her knees, ignoring her mother's hiss of discouragement. "How — how are you?"

Arthur smiled. With effort, he made a fist, thumb jutting upright.

"Yeah? Nice gig, eh? Having a good lie-in?"

He nodded.

"Nurses got you sorted? Are they all terrified of Mum yet? Blink once if she's cussed them out."

Arthur blinked twice, waggling his eyebrows, and then fumbled for some object on the side table. Fred hurried forward and passed it into his hands: a yellow legal pad.

Arthur carefully extricated his right hand from Molly's grip. His fingers were shaking.

"What's wrong with him?" Ron demanded. "Can't he talk?"

"Ron!" said Molly.

"What? I don't know! No one's told me fuck—"

"Language!"

"The curse severed his vocal cords," said Mad-Eye brusquely.

Ron choked.

At length, he said: "Well — are they — are they gonna grow back?"

No one answered him.

"We'll see," Bill said finally. "They've done some reparative spells, but we won't know until it's fully healed. He's meant to wait two weeks before trying to talk again, to give it time to rest."

"Oh." Ron cleared his throat. "And — how do they like those chances? The healers?"

This time, not even Bill spoke up.

"Doctors tend to err on the side of caution," said Hermione hesitantly. She qualmed when the attention of the Weasleys fell intensely on her. "In the muggle world. It's far worse to be disappointed than pleasantly surprised."

"Children," said Molly, "why don't you go—"

There was a loud collision of words and limbs by the door. Someone was trying to force their way into the ward, and the assistant healers were being rewarded for their diligence by getting verbally trampled by a bureaucrat.

“—know who I am? Senior assistant to the chief secretary of Lord Rookwood, that’s chief secretary, remember—”

“Oh, God,” said Molly faintly. “Percy.”

“Percy,” Bill said grimly. “Stay here. I’ll get him to leave.”

“Don’t! Let him in!”

“Let him in?” Ginny said. “Are you joking?”

But Bill stepped aside. Percy swept inside with great purpose, and yet stumbled to a halt before the crowd at his father’s bed.

George, of all people, was the one to break the silence.

“Afternoon, Comrade Weasley,” he chirped. “Shoot any good dissidents lately?”

Percy’s lip curled. “Do you have any idea who you’re talking to?” he said.

“No,” said George. “Not anymore, I don’t think.”

Everyone had been expecting a joke; the lack of one dropped like a stone and punctured the conversation, opening a black well of silence.

“George,” said Percy, affronted. “Merlin’s sakes. I— you — you would do well to mind your tongue.”

“Is that a threat?” Ginny snapped, scrambling to her feet, and Harry barely grabbed her in time to stop her from vaulting Arthur’s bed.

Percy sneered. “Molly, please inform your daughter that when she addresses a Ministry official, she should do so in tones of respect.”

“Don’t call her ‘Molly,’ you twat,” said Bill.

For a second, Percy’s sneer flickered, broken up by the cringing shame of a younger brother being castigated by the older.

And still, there was something unserious in the way Bill spoke: as if he couldn’t quite muster the same disgust or frustration that the others could. The way he spoke suggested he found nothing threatening or surprising about Percy at all — the third son, second even among middle children; the first to be no one’s favorite, too late to impress, and too early to be a darling.

Fred’s mouth twisted into a crooked, lightless smile. “Bless him, he thinks he’s important,” he said coolly. “You know, that always was your problem, Perce. You never could figure out how to make people care.”

Critical hit. Percy opened his mouth and nothing came out but a faint choking noise.

“Enough!” Molly cried. “Out! In fact, all of you, out! Percy wants to talk to his father!”

“Must have said that awfully quick, because I didn’t catch it,” said George. He hip-checked Percy on his way to the door. “Speak up next time.”

“Or don’t,” said Fred, jostling his other side.

Ron said nothing, but stalked past Percy with his hands in his pockets.

“Mum,” Ginny began.

“Harry, take Ginny and go, please,” Molly said brusquely.

Ginny rounded on Harry with an expression that told him very clearly what a bad idea this would be, and his expression assured her that he believed her.

“Now, young lady! Out!”

“No!” Ginny shouted. “He’s a pig!”

Percy flinched.

“Ginevra! Percy, don’t listen to her—”

“Don’t apologize to him! He’s a traitor! He works for the people who killed Viktor Krum! He might as well have cast the curse himself — and you would’ve, wouldn’t you, Percy? If your beloved Minister asked you to? Viktor Krum or any other little boy—”

“Ginny,” Bill said. “Don’t.”

She faltered for only an instant. “Fine! Here’s what he did do: he sent back his jumper! One week ago, he did that! No note, nothing! No? Not enough? How about this: he called Harry a murderer!”

“Don’t,” said Harry. “This isn’t about me, don’t — not for me.”

She whirled on him. “Yes, for you,” she said furiously, “always, deal with it, I don’t care what you want or what you think — nobody gets to — no one — and anyway, he hates us! Does no one else care? Why is he still here? Somebody listen to me!”

Molly was the color of her husband’s hospital bed. “Ginny Weasley,” she said, “if you don’t lower your voice, so help me Merlin, you will be headed straight home, and you will stay there until you go back to Hogwarts.”

“You’re kicking me out? Me? Me! Not him!”

“Your brother isn’t the one causing a scene!”

Hermione caught his arm, and they began to slip out of the room.

“He hasn’t even apologized, and you’re letting him slither back in like he’s brought the sodding cavalry! You want him to like you so much you don’t even care that he hates us, all of us, because we’re not the rich, prissy family he wanted! Because you’re not the rich, prissy mum he wanted! You get that, don’t you? He doesn’t like you! Letting him treat the rest of us like rubbish he can pick up whenever he wants won’t make him love you, it’s just — it’s fucking pathetic!”

Arthur slammed his fist into the bedframe. It rattled.

Percy made a noise like he’d been slapped. This was nothing compared to Molly’s silence, however.

Ginny broke off, her whole body heaving. Very slowly, Arthur set his jaw, and shook his head at his daughter.

“Never mind,” Ginny said bleakly. “I’m leaving.”

She ran out. Bill reached for her as she went, but she brushed him off.

It was something of a scramble to catch up with Ginny, who was moving like someone on a footrace out of hell. Harry was the fastest, and caught her arm as she slammed open the door to the stairs. They vanished, and the door had nearly closed before Draco caught up with them.

In the high, echoey chamber of the stairwell, he caught Harry’s and Ginny’s voices trailing up from the staircase below.

“—won’t do any good, seriously—”

“—do a lot of good, actually, to pop him one—”

“Ginny, c’mon. It’s Percy.”

Draco paused with his foot on the first stair. Hermione came skidding into the stairwell, and he held out his arm, freezing her.

That was the last he heard, and he was glad of it. The door to the stairwell clicked behind him, louder than he would have liked, and he had only just teed up a suitably apropos change-of-subject when the door to Arthur's ward opened — opened was an inaccurately pacific word, but 'exploded' implied some kind of dynamic force — and unleashed a hurricane of bureaucrat into the hallway. There were voices, far too many to pick out, but in the same shrill frustrated overlay of people running verbal trains right past each other, and listening not at all.

"—can tell your Lord Selwyn to kiss a dementor, while he's at it—"

"I shouldn't have wasted my time!" Percy slammed the door behind him — but, thinking better of it, he spun back around, ripped the door open, and emptied his lungs into it. "Do you think I came because I didn't have anything better to do? Do you think I rescheduled four meetings, two lunches, and tea with the Undersecretary of Law Enforcement so that I could have the pleasure of enduring your lectures?"

"Sir, you're disturbing the other patients."

"Hang the other patients! You shouldn't have put my father in a ward with them anyway! Do you know who I am?"

A triage of shouting rendered itself indistinct.

The lift whispered open, and Hermione tugged Draco inside. She jabbed two buttons at random, and the doors closed on the sight of Percy shouting at a pair of nurses, his face nearly purple.

Hermione took a hesitant breath, and glanced at him. Her expression revealed a great depth of thought, but no great eagerness to speak. He nodded in agreement. The affairs of the Weasley family, though inescapable in such close quarters, remained a matter in his view best handled by Weasleys, and he lacked both tools and appetite to dissect them. They turned forward again in stony silence.

He had thought to visit the ground floor — upon leaving, he had vaguely identified a destination of ‘anywhere the fuck else’ — but the lift deposited them in a large, airy space filled with the pale light that poured from a clouded skylight. It bathed an interior of thick greenery, feathered with ferns and trawling vines, clambering up and over the buttressing walls of planters each grand enough to fit Hagrid’s garden entire, with runnels of palm and dogwood latticing over the centerpiece of a wide, sculpted marble fountain. An alabaster wizard poured water from each of his outstretched palms, and a pair of stone house-elves crouched at his feet, weeping four more streams that traced the contours of their sculpted rags. A brass plaque by the doorway identified it as the Parkinson Family Reflection Garden.

In the shadow of the fountain, a girl sat in a chair. She was small and slight, with yellow ringlets that hung in a thick dandelion fluff around her ears. She was wearing a blue hospital gown, and her tiny white ankles protruded from the gown’s hem like a pair of bony bird feet.

Hermione’s footsteps dappled the stone behind him.

“Draco, this isn’t — oh.”

Astoria sat up at the sound of voices. She executed the classic face-scrub of someone banishing tears.

“What are you doing here?” she demanded. “Are you ill, Draco?”

Hermione, whom Astoria could see perfectly well, made an exasperated noise in her throat.

“He’s fine,” she said. “We’re both visiting.”

“Oh,” she said. “Who?”

“An acquaintance. What are you doing here?”

Astoria held out her arm and revealed a long, clear tube spiraling up a vein in her wrist. “I got a new bloodbag today,” she announced. “They’re testing to see if it’s a match.”

“...Bloodbag?”

“My house-elf,” she said. “They breed them so they can give me transfusions.”

Hermione went very still.

“It’s not easy to breed a house-elf,” she said.

“No kidding!” Astoria said passionately. “They’ve taken so much of my blood I bet that thing’s part Greengrass! Mum didn’t even want to do it, she keeps saying how they’re full of diseases, but the healers said they keep the elves really clean.”

Hermione’s nails bit her palms and kept digging until the skin turned white.

“I meant that it requires a great deal of labor and capital,” he said. “Which is unusual, since you already have a genetic match.”

“Oh! But they won’t let me take Daffy’s anymore,” she exclaimed. “She didn’t send you to spy on me, did she?”

Hermione made a high, thin sound that might have been a laugh, but her jaw was clenched.

“And why can’t you get a transfusion from Daphne?”

Astoria frowned. “Because she’s not doing good.”

“Is that how your parents put it?”

“No, but—”

“And what did they say?”

“That Daffy’s sick,” recited Astoria dutifully. “Very sick, and if she touches me I’ll get sicker.” Rubbing her cheek, she muttered: “And she only hit me because she got moonsick from the halfbreed.”

“That’s not true,” Hermione snapped. Astoria jumped. “She’s perfectly safe to touch! And I should know, since I’ve shared a bathroom with her all year — which, just so you know, I would’ve done even if she did have lycanthropy, because I happen to have actually read about this disease your parents are so terrified of, and it’s transmitted through the bloodstream, not skin contact. Which, by the way, your parents almost certainly know, Astoria, because if I was them and my daughter came back with a werewolf bite, I’d have a lycanthropy specialist on my doorstep in an hour. And that’s another thing—”

“Stop yelling at me!”

“She hasn’t presented a single one of the five textbook lycanthropy symptoms besides heightened reflexes, which could very well be from the maladict going into remission, and chronic pain, which she had already—”

“I don’t know what that means!” wailed Astoria. “I don’t know what any of that means! Stop yelling!”

“—and in any case you have no idea how lycanthropy would interact with the blood condition because it’s a horrifically underfunded research area and there are! No! Studies! About cases like Daphne’s! And I should know! Because if your parents had any scientific basis for doing this to her, I would have read about it! Also —” She inhaled sharply. “Also: besides all that, Daphne is a very brave girl who’s been through a hell of a year, and she’s got it hard enough without her own family going around spreading lies behind her back.”

“It’s not my fault! She’s the one who doesn’t like us anymore!”

“Is that what Pansy Parkinson told you?”

“No! She didn’t need to! I know she hates us, everyone does!”

“She obviously loves you,” said Hermione impatiently. “She cried her eyes out after your fight in the Three Broomsticks.”

“Shut up! You’re lying! You just want me to forgive her.”

“For what?”

“For leaving!”

“For goodness’s sake,” Hermione snapped. “Leaving where? She’s still in Slytherin, she can’t very well leave it; she still takes all her classes with them, and I suppose she doesn’t sleep there, but you wouldn’t see her much anyway—”

“For leaving me!” Astoria shouted. “For getting sick of me! I always knew she hated me, I knew she hated coming back to our horrid empty house with her stupid baby sister, I knew she wanted to leave, she always did — I was the reason she couldn’t go to stupid France with stupid Draco, because I got hurt and she had to come back and give blood and she hated me for it, I know she did, I could tell from how she looked at me—”

“Astoria?”

“She wanted to run away and live with her pretty friends and forget all about me! I bet she wanted me to die just so she could finally go do what she wanted! She wanted me to shut up and lay down and die, she wanted me dead, she wanted to kill me—”

Astoria had shouted so hard she began to choke on her own spittle, and her tiny body trembled so hard it rocked the chair. But she slapped away Hermione’s efforts to help her with furious, violent strokes.

“Don’t touch me! Mudblood! Mudblood! Mudblood!”

Draco stepped between them and touched his wand.

“It doesn’t matter,” said Hermione quickly. “She doesn’t mean it. We should go.”

“Granger.”

“We’re upsetting her, and she won’t listen to me anyway. We should just go.”

She nearly dragged him back into the lift and jabbed a button. Astoria did not try to follow, but skulked back into the shade of the ferns, sneering at them as they left.

“She called you ‘mudblood,’” Draco said, by and by.

Hermione said reluctantly: “Yes, I heard her.”

“She shouldn’t have done that.”

His hand was still near his wand; she noticed it, and sighed.

“Well, jinxing her certainly wouldn’t have helped,” she said. “Though the thought is appreciated.”

“Jinxing her would have given her something to remember.”

“And it would confirm for her what she already suspects, which is that we hate her. Punishment only works if someone understands what they’ve done wrong.”

“Eleven is old enough to know what it means.”

“Eleven is also young enough to be forgiven for it.” Her look conveyed a stinging reminder. He narrowed his eyes.

“I was twelve, and you slapped me, if I recall.”

“Well, I shouldn’t have.”

“You should have done worse. Even I got off generously, but compared to Astoria Greengrass, the difference is stark—”

“I was thirteen, and I adored you,” she said tiredly. “Of course it was different. I cared what you thought of me more than anyone alive, and I couldn’t care less about what Astoria thinks of anything. I—”

The doors slivered open; he hit the button to stop them. The lift shuddered to a halt. Hermione frowned at him.

“What are you d—”

“Adored?” he demanded.

“Yes,” she said, faintly reddening. “Well, I told you that before— in the prefects’ bathroom, last year, you were my first friend, and I—”

“You said we were friends,” he said, blindsided. The world seemed to lilt on its axis. “You didn’t say that.”

“Oh. Well,” she said brusquely, “of course I had a bit of a crush. When your best friend is a boy, and he’s clever and top of the class, and a quidditch player, and he writes you lots of pretty letters, you can’t very well help — but it was a kid thing, you know, I was barely even a teenager yet, and I thought—”

“It would pass.”

“Yes.”

His heart slowed. “Did it?”

Hermione folded her arms as if bracing herself against a harsh wind.

“For a while,” she said.

“...And then?”

Her arms pressed tighter. She set her feet apart like a dueling stance.

“And then you came back in fourth year,” she said, “six inches taller and a bit less priggish. Shall we talk about something else?”

“Fine,” he said, and then they didn’t.

Hermione seemed about to compress herself into a single particle and blink out of existence. Her face was scrunched in the intensity of concentration that usually accompanied spellcasting.

“Would you consider,” she said, “perhaps, pressing the button—”

“You came back shorter and louder,” he said, “in fourth year.”

“I was not—”

“I kept thinking about your hair,” he said, apparently for dire lack of anything that wasn’t completely fucking insane.

Her shoulders slackened a fraction.

“My … hair?”

“Yes.”

“That doesn’t sound like a terribly… appealing… thing to think about.”

“Shows what you know,” he said, with feeling.

“Right. Okay. I — okay.” Her chest rose and fell deeply. “But that was a while ago.”

“Several decades, by my count.”

“Alright, that’s not — you’re being dramatic, but that’s still—”

“It’s a desperately long time to want to kiss someone, by any margin,” he said. “We should get some sort of award.”

She gave a twitch so powerful it was more of a jerk.

“For what?” she muttered, though she was still fidgeting with an anxious, awkward sort of pleasure. “Mucking it up so thoroughly?”

“Personally, I think I ought to have one for every day I didn’t kiss you,” he said, “and two for every day I haven’t, after the first time.”

That shut her up good and well. She stared at him, her mouth ajar, her eyes shining with a beautiful dark softness.

“Draco,” she said, with a gentleness in his name that made it neither wholly a reprimand nor a question. She had such a nice way with his name: a stress on the first syllable that edged slightly into a drawl, as if she were lowering a great weight slowly and surely into place, and then a consonant cut crisply at the back of the throat, her mouth closed around the O in the shape of a kiss.

“There isn’t time,” she said, almost whinging. “We’re in a lift in a — in a hospital, and everyone’s here, and we can’t—”

“I know all that. You think I don’t know that? There’s never time for anything.”

“There’ll be time when we get back to Hogwarts. Once everything’s calmed down a little, and everyone’s not so much on top of each other all the time. Then we can talk about — the relationship.”

He stiffened. “Objection,” he said tautly. “Remark is leadingly amorous.”

“Seriously? After you just said you wanted to kiss me—”

“On the grounds that your standing order was to be friends,” he said, with a look that made her flush.

“Friendship is a kind of relationship,” she said stubbornly, “and regardless, we are going to just — have a very complicated one. For now.”

“For now?”

She cleared her throat. “For now,” she said briskly, and punched the button to open the doors.

He almost forfeited his awards for the day then and there, but the lift’s doors shuddered open, and they were back in the hospital, and reality reasserted itself.

Arthur’s cot was laden heavily with gingers. Ginny had curled under her father’s arm, her head pressed against his collarbone, folded up like a girl much younger than she was; Molly grasped his hand tightly, and with her other she clasped Bill to her side. Ron and Harry stood at the foot of the bed, shoulder to shoulder with a dark-haired boy that Draco did not immediately recognize as Neville. The boy wore neither muggle clothes nor a Hogwarts uniform, but a set of starched-collar robes typical of a pureblood, which must have been his usual daywear. It aged him considerably.

“Hey, look who it is,” said Ron. His raised eyebrows asked a silent question that Draco, with a short shake of the head, declined to answer. “Get lost, you two?”

“Afraid so,” said Hermione lightly. She moved over to the far side of the bed and planted herself between Neville and Bill. “Had a bit of trouble with the lift.”

“Get stuck?” said Neville sympathetically. “Happened to m-m-me, too. The st-t-taff said it was on the fritz.”

“To say the least. We ended up running into Astoria Greengrass in the Reflection Garden. The more I learn about that family, the better I think of Daphne’s luck. Also: hello, Neville. You’re not ill, are you?”

If tact were counted in galleons, Hermione would be in a debtor's prison.

"Visiting my p-p-parents in the long-term ward," said Neville.

"Oh," she said awkwardly.

Ron glowered and elbowed her.

"Oh! I mean — are they — well, how are they?"

"Pretty g-g-good, thanks," said Neville gamely. "Mum recognized me, so. Good d-d-day."

"That's… that's great, Neville. I'm sorry for… I mean, I'm sorry that…"

"It's okay," he blurted. "It's fine. Hermione. Thanks? But um, uh… it's f-f-fine. Like, it's not fine, but it's fine? You know?"

"Yes. I — understand. Thanks. Sorry."

"Nothing to b-b-be sorry for," Neville said wistfully. "I just wish you'd got to meet them. It's naptime now, but if you'd come by earlier, you could've said hello. They love v-v-visitors, I think they get bored with j-just Gran around… she comes every day, but she's the only one — not that I'm glad you're here, obviously." He glanced at Arthur.

The fact of having one's parents on a nap schedule, in the hospital where they lived, was difficult to reconcile with the blitheness Neville displayed in talking about it. It was also difficult to reconcile with the rest of his personality, which Draco had heretofore taken for granted as dispositionally peaceable and affectionate, and which by a single stroke of comprehension — by recognizing at last and in full what Neville's childhood must have been like; how he had gone about every minute of every day of every year in Gryffindor Tower carrying the knowledge, for certainty, that his parents would never know or share in his victories, no matter how good he was, no matter how great; to weather mockery by his peers for a stutter and a slouch he couldn't help, to accept blistering criticism for want of magical skill that his parents had never been able to teach him, and that his sole guardian had resented him for lacking; as if it was not Herculean endurance for him to plant his feet on the floor every morning and rise, let alone present the world with his earnest level best — when he gave everything he had to anything that was asked of him, and it was almost never enough — in short, recognizing the vast, complicated, existential fetters of grief that Neville had worn since birth — transformed the boy's friendliness into a tremendous, stubborn, deafening assertion of inner strength.

Unless he had known it for a fact, he would have doubted it was even possible to endure growing up as Neville Longbottom had. Much less to grow up as Neville Longbottom and still be gentle. To still be kind.

Draco decided that Neville was going to pass his Potions O.W.L.

"We met them," Ron piped up. "Prettiest bastards in the ward. Plus Granny Longbottom, who's a riot, by the way. You should've heard her talk about Neville. You'd think she had a kid with Merlin. And then he had a kid with Merlin."

Snow was falling outside the window, a silent, constant downfall of white flecks like the silver grains that trailed a Patronus. Draco followed it with his eye and shook the memory away. The room was turned pale and cool by the window's light. Someone had set up a wireless radio by Arthur's bedside, and the tinselly strains of Christmas carols commingled with the murmuring of visitors at other beds, and jingle of medical instruments, a busy hospital feeding a muffled drumbeat through the walls.

Without preamble, Arthur closed his eyes, and began to hum to the radio.

"Arthur! Arthur, stop that," Molly hissed. "Don't strain your voice. Arthur! The Healers told you not to!"

Next year, all our troubles will be miles away…

“Let him, Mum,” said Bill. “One song won’t make a difference.”

Until then…

When it finished, Arthur smiled at her, and pressed a kiss to her wrist. She sighed, wetly.

“...that was ‘Have Yourself a Merry Little Christmas,’ by Frank Sinatra, and boy, it sure was. Looking like it’ll be a white New Year, too, speaking of which: the Minister of Magic will be coming on to deliver his New Year’s Address at five, that’s five o’clock, set your watches, you won’t want to miss it. In the meantime, here’s one more holiday hit, getting it in just under the radar, seven hours early — check on your champagne bottles, fire up the fireworks, and get ready to ring in 1996 with me, your friend, your host, Juvenal Jordan — right here! Right now! On BBC Radio 'M.' Hit it, Guy.”

A syrupy coalition of horns wept through the speaker.

Hermione lifted her head. “It’s New Year’s Eve,” she murmured. “I don’t know why that surprised me. I suppose I’d forgotten.”

“Reckon I did too, but that’s me,” said Ron. He nudged her. “You know me, I’d forget anything. I’d forget my own last name. When you start forgetting things, that’s when we’re in trouble.”

She tried for a smile and failed. He faltered.

“Joking! Only joking. Easy mistake.” Then: “And I didn’t actually forget, anyway.” Another pause. “Well, I did, but I remembered. That is, I remembered I’d forgotten. And then I remembered what I forgot.”

“That’s nice, Ron.”

There was a small susurrus of obliging, grateful laughter. Ron gave a crooked smile, and Bill ruffled his hair. Harry put an arm around his shoulder, and they leaned together, like three of a set.

Arthur was humming again, and his echoes trilled harmonies against the ceiling of the ward.

Through the window, against the blue-black square of the last December sunset, the year 1995 was ending in a thousand tiny white shards.

For auld lang syne, my dear, for auld lang syne; we'll take a cup of kindness yet, for auld lang syne.

- Happy (belated) birthday to Hermione Granger! My beloved 44-year-old teenager.

- One of my favorite bits of all time is when two characters are like:

- character A: "you know, the [INSANE THING] in the [COMPLETELY MUNDANE THING]?"

- character B: "The What Now"

- character A: "you know, the [MUNDANE THING.] anyway,"

- I don't know what it is, but I will crack up every single time.

- Slight edit, for those of you with a keen eye: as of recent changes, Book 5 will now be 84 chapters instead of 81. The Table of Contents has been updated to reflect this fact. In other news, I blow through wordcounts like a municipally funded construction project blows through its budget, son.

- Settling cautiously into this biweekly update-schedule sort of thing; I'm still not confident enough in the editing process to commit to anything, but this feels good for now, at least until I've finished enough to go back to weekly updates. Thank you for being flexible and waiting with such good grace while I sort out what the hell it is I'm doing.

- If you've commented in the last few weeks, I hope that you get exactly as much sleep as you need tonight. If you're coming back to school this autumn, I hope you find all of your textbooks on a discount.

- See you in the next chapter! "The Deputy Special Inquisitor."

The Deputy Special Inquisitor

Chapter 72: The Deputy Special Inquisitor

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Two days before they left for Hogwarts, Remus left Grimmauld Place. He claimed he had a meeting with Dumbledore, but he told them not to wait up for him, and on the way out the door he said goodbye to Harry with a long, tight hug, as if he would not be seeing him again for some time. To Sirius, he gave a brisk handshake and a resounding silence. Sirius said nothing, but his restraint seemed visibly painful, and when the door shut behind him he spent some time staring at the thing as if he wished to destroy it.

Ron said, “Hope he’s alright out there,” his voice crystal cold. Sirius flinched. Harry shoved his hands deep in his pockets and said nothing.

Later that evening, Draco was coming downstairs when he heard a blur of voices coming from the drawing-room door. He stopped and retreated into the shadows of the corridor.

“ …honest with me. I’m your family, remember?” It was Tonks; her tone was weary, a bit softened by alcohol, not without understanding, and not without a grudge. “I’m just asking. Won’t judge. Why did you do it?”

“I told you already.” Sirius, noticeably thicker, slurring around the edges. “It was stupid. I fucked up. I fucked up because I’m a fuckup. That’s what I do, I fuck things up. You want to hear that? You want me to say it again?”

“I’m not asking you to confess your sins, mate. Just tell me the truth. Where’d you go?”

“I told you. The graves.”

“Yeah, but why?” Her voice had a tangible bite of frustration. “You loved them. I get it. But you also love Harry, right?”

“More than anything. More than myself.”

“You do. Okay. What do you think happens to him if you die, Sirius?”

“I trust Molly.” It was gruff. “She can be a right bint, but she's a better mother than I ever was a godfather. Arthur, too. They’ll care for him when I go.”

“Sure. What’s left of him, maybe.”

A chair screeched. Glasses clinked. “Besides the point,” said Tonks. “You knew the site was being surveilled. The graves, Godric’s Hollow, Privet Drive — they’re all red zones. Hotspots. 'Likely points of assembly.' Moody was clear.”

“You said you weren’t here to chastise me.”

“I’m not. I told you. I want to know why you did it.”

“Why do you care? Feeling sorry for your sad old cousin?”

“No.”

“Sore at me, then, now Moony’s gone? Or jealous? Were you mooning over him, too? He doesn’t go for birds, I’m sorry to say.”

“Stop embarrassing yourself,” said Tonks calmly. Suddenly the softness of the alcohol disappeared, and she spoke with a clear, low voice. “If you really want to know, Moody put me up to this. He wants to know if you’re a security risk. I’m looking for reasons to tell him you’re not.”

There was a pause.

“Somehow I’d forgotten,” said Sirius icily, “that my dear cousin works in espionage.”

“That was a mistake.”

Another pause.

“Well, fine. Let’s play that out. What happens if I am a security risk? You all find another hidey-hole? Pack up and clear out? Maybe Obliviate me for good measure?”

Tonks said nothing.

“Very funny,” said Sirius.

The nothingness stretched on, interminable.

“Nymphadora.”

“I answer to Alastair Moody,” she said. “I love you. You’re family. But I am loyal—”

“To Moody? I get it.”

“To the cause, Sirius.”

“They are the cause.” His voice was thick and hard.

Tonks set down her glass. Her voice shifted into a lower pitch. “Okay,” she said. “That tells me what I need to know, I think.”

“Wait. Nymphadora.”

“It’s fine. Don’t worry. Moody hasn’t made a decision yet.”

“You want to know? I went because I thought I could do it. Listen to me. You weren’t alive for the first war. You didn’t know me then. I used to be — Tonks, I used to be bloody incredible. I was the best melée fighter in the Order. Second best duelist, after Moody. I taught James and Remus both how to duel. I trained with Merrythought and Tartover, advanced lessons. I trained with fucking Bellatrix, back when we were kids, if you can imagine that. I was the real thing.” He grew hoarse. “Do they ever talk about me? What I did? I know the world thinks I’m a traitor, but — they have to remember, right? I killed Johannes Rosier in wand-to-wand combat. I brought down an aerial unit of hags with only Pettigrew for backup. I dueled Lucius Malfoy and Rodolphus Lestrange at the Battle of Stirling. Ripped his face open. Would have killed him, too, if we hadn’t retreated at the wrong damn time.”

His hairs stood at the mention of his father’s name.

“That was thirteen years ago.” Tonks’s tone was gentle with pity.

“I know. I know I’m not what I was. The point is: thirteen years ago, I could have taken a graveyard full of aurors. I could have taken a graveyard full of anything.”

A footstep creaked a board close to the door. Draco moved back, slipping further into the darkness.

“That’s why I went. Because I’m that good. And even if I’m not that good, I’m still better than you can afford to lose. You can put that in your little fucking spy assessment for Moody.”

“My little fucking spy assessment,” she repeated tonelessly, “currently finds that the ward master of the Order headquarters is a suicide risk.”

Footsteps thumped upstairs: two people, at least three. The two inside the drawing room went hushed as they passed. Draco pressed his back to the wall, pulse tripping.

The footsteps faded, and the silence of the old, dusty house resumed — a house so old that even its silences seemed to whisper, as if the shadows themselves teemed with the watching eyes of a forgotten past. The ominous echoes of anonymous movements overhead leant to the impression of a place where there were things happening out of sight, and perhaps even outside the realm of the real, the echolalia of the past teeming through the walls and beneath the floorboards. Grimmauld Place had more ghosts than any building he’d ever known.

“Yeah?” said Sirius roughly. “Then you can tell him it’s a short-term problem.”

In the lavender gloom of a four o’clock sunset, the halls of the Hogwarts Express were quiet. Students moved about in slow, careful motions, fidgeting with their collars, wandering restlessly through the aisles. There seemed to be fewer people than there had been on the train away from Hogwarts, earlier that year.

Near the front of the train, most compartments were empty, save one. Hermione sat by herself in the prefects' compartment, perched on a seat by the window. Her journal was open in her lap, and she was fidgeting with her quill. The low winter light paved her face in a sheer, ghostly shade of purple, as if she was half-translucent.

He leaned against the window beside her. She glanced up, and her face slackened infinitesimally in relief. She kept watching the highlands slip past in a white blur.

“I can’t stop thinking about it,” she said. He knew what she meant, but he didn't answer. He could hear another thought swelling on her tongue.

“Arthur, I mean. In the hospital.”

“It was fairly gruesome.”

“Yes. No, though. Not that part. The blood, the injury, I don't mind all that.” Her nail bit deep into her cuticle, drawing blood. “I wish I'd used the phoenix tears. I wish I'd thought of it, before—”

“Wouldn't have worked.”

“No?”

“The tears aren't a panacea. They can heal lacerations and they're a potent antivenom. But Arthur's wound was cursed to regenerate. You'd have used them and it would have opened up again five minutes later.”

She swallowed. She seemed to be struggling against the temptation to feel relief. “I didn't know that then. For all I knew, it would have saved him. But I just froze up. I didn't think. Like always. I can never think of things like that when it's important, only afterwards. And what if he died? What if Arthur died, Draco?”

Hermione stared at him with a wide, wild stare that was deeply unused to not having all the answers.

“Then we would be having the same conversation. Because it still would not be your fault.”

It took a moment; but she nodded hesitantly, and turned back to the window.

“I feel sorry for Sirius, too.”

Draco set his jaw and tilted his head towards the window. His feelings about Sirius were complicated by many factors, one of which was the imposition of grave risk to his own life, Hermione's life, and almost every other life he generally worried about.

Another factor was the increasing suspicion that Sirius was not so very different from the person Narcissa thought he was, and the similarities between his and Draco's situations seemed much less comforting in light of that fact.

“I think he feels sorry enough for himself. He doesn't need our help.”

“You're right. And I'm not saying he's the victim here. Obviously, Arthur... and the Weasleys, Ron... Molly... but Sirius almost got someone killed. I can’t imagine how that would feel. If I had done it —" Her breath hitched. "If I'd said something, even by accident, that put Harry in danger—"

He frowned. "You wouldn't make that kind of mistake."

"You sound so sure," she said tightly. "But you don't know that. I could make mistakes. I do make mistakes."

"Not that mistake."

"Not yet, but someday."

"You're not going to betray him." He pushed off the window and sat across from her, leaning forward on his knees. Her eyes flickered at him and fixed stubbornly on the hills. "What are you actually afraid of?"

"I'm afraid," she said, quietly, "of what Ron said. Last year. On — this train. Do you remember?"

"About protecting Potter?"

"Yes, but more than that, it was — Ron said this one thing," she said, knuckling her temples, "and I haven't been able to get it out of my head since. He said, 'if it's him or me, it's him.'" She screwed her eyes shut, her mouth a moue of unhappiness. "And over the summer, I thought: what if it was him or Ron? What if it really, actually was? Because Ron's absolutely right, he's totally, perfectly dead on, it's completely possible and even probable that at some point, in the next year or years or whatever it will be, there will be a situation where it's him or Ron. And I don't know what to do."

"I believe Ronald told you," he said, carefully, when no answer seemed forthcoming.

"But that's the thing! Isn't it? How can I look at Ron and think: 'I love you, and I'll protect you, and I'd take a curse for you, but you're second on my list.' Isn't — isn't that a betrayal? That's what our fight last year was all about, wasn't it, the fact that we shouldn't think of each other that way? Because we're equals?"

"I doubt he'd have asked if he saw it that way."

"And — and besides that," she said frantically, "isn't it psychopathic? To be able to do that? I'm worried that if I can — if it comes to that, and I can do it, it means I wasn't… that I never really loved Ron, after all. To love someone, and still sacrifice them, it's — that's not love. At all. It's a contradiction in terms."

"No, it's not."

"How?" she demanded.

"Because they offered," he said.

The line between her brows deepened.

"I don't accept that," she said. "I don't care if it's given freely. I shouldn't ever get to — to do that, it's not fair, I shouldn't have that power — even if it's Harry or Ron, I — I mean, why not me? If it's my choice, if anything, I should be the one—"

"No."

She broke off, startled. The echo clung faintly to the walls.

"Why not?"

"Because I don't accept that."

"That's hypocritical," she said. "I mean — you can't tell me I need to make hard choices and then say I can't—"

"I don't care."

He was very cold.

She shrank into herself, pressing her knees together.

“You’re upset,” she said.

“Well spotted.”

“I’m sorry.”

“Thank you.”

“We can stop talking about it,” she said, stilted. “But I’ve — and I’m sorry, we’ll stop talking about it after this, but — you get my point, don’t you? If you’re upset just thinking about it happening, imagine how I’d feel, having done it — or if it was me or Harry, one way or another, it’s not like it would be easy for you—”

“Yes, it would.”

She twitched, a full-body thing, as if something deep in her recoiled at the idea. She stared at him in shock. His heart seemed to graze his ribs each time it beat, a little rasp of pain.

“Don’t say that,” she said, and it wasn’t just anger in her voice, but a thin pall of fear. “I don’t — like that. I don’t want to know that. That’s an awful thing to say.”

“It’s the truth.” The train slipped through a copse of trees, and the windows turned black. “I’m sorry if you don’t like it. But I also don’t really care.”

Her stare hardened.

“it’s not just about Harry, you realize,” she said sharply, by and by. “He's my best friend, and if I lost him I’d probably lose my mind. But there’s another level here, which is that he’s the Boy Who Lived, and if that business with the twin cores and the blood protection means anything, then there’s a good chance he’s the only person who can kill Voldemort. Making him quite literally the only hope for the future.”

“You’re right, of course,” he said. “I’m aware of all that. But I don’t know why you think it matters.”

She sucked a breath through her teeth and glared at him, as if she could intimidate him into changing his mind with her eyebrows. Adorable.

Don’t say that. I don’t want to know that.

He knew what her disappointment felt like, and he wasn’t afraid of it. It felt like having his own ribs pried open with a crowbar. It felt like knowing that there were things about him that frightened her, and that if he wasn’t careful with them, she would get burned. And she was right to be wary of them. It wasn’t like they didn’t frighten him, too.

But her disappointment was nothing, not one microscopic atom of pain, compared to the world without her.

“You’re angry at me.”

“No,” she said shortly. She bit her lip, and he followed the movement without really intending to. “I just don’t understand you. And it’s irritating, because that’s usually not a problem.”

“I don’t know why. It’s a very simple thing that I’m telling you.”

“That you’re delusional, and I’m an accessory to it?”

“That I’m selfish, and you’re essential.”

“Don’t be dramatic. Not everyone you care for is essential.”

He put his hand under her chin and tipped it up, emboldened with the easy confidence of someone with little to lose. She was already cross with him, and he was already feeling somewhat reckless; one more liberty taken wouldn’t make a difference. Her skin was warm and her breath was short on his hand.

“Not everyone. No.”

Her eyes slipped closed. She inhaled deeply, as if gathering patience, and then touched his wrist, pulling his hand away from her chin.

“You shouldn’t say things like that to me,” she said, stilted.

“Why not?”

“Because it makes me want things I shouldn't want.” Her voice was almost inaudibly low. She flipped his hand over and placed it flat between hers. “Because it makes me feel like a foolish person who thinks foolish things. Because I shouldn't like hearing you say things like that. About being essential.”

“Who's to say,” he said quietly, “what you should like?”

Her eyes slipped closed.

“Do you want to talk about it?” she said.

“About what?”

“What we said in the hospital.”

He was more interested in kissing her, or failing that, finding a way to close the distance between them in the carriage. He said merely: “About 'relationships,' you mean.”

“Yes.”

“Do you want to talk about it?”

Her lips pressed together, and the corner turned. “No. Frankly. I want to stop the train,” she said, “and run back to Grimmauld Place, and hole up in the library for another century while nothing ever changes. With you. And a cup of tea, and a sleeve of chocolate biscuits, and Crookshanks. That's what I want to do.”

“You can still have most of those things.”

“Except the one that matters,” she said wryly, opening her eyes. “Which is the nothing-ever-changing part.”

“See, I thought you were referring to me.”

She laughed, and her eyes dropped to his lips. He knew with his whole body what was about to happen; it felt strange, the certainty, as if the nerves in his body had decided before he did.

He leaned forward, tilted his head against hers, and kissed her. With a soft melancholy sound, she tilted her head too, and kissed him back. Her lips caught and tugged gently at his, slow, gentle, not particularly passionate; but that was alright, because it wasn't that kind of kiss. He'd never kissed someone this way before, as if the point weren't kissing itself but the communication of something that only touch could say.

By and by, in no particular hurry, she drew back and placed a hand on his chest. She tipped her forehead against his, and he stayed there, anchored by the places where she touched him.

“Thank you,” she said.

Then Hermione climbed carefully to her feet. “We should find the other Defense Club people before we arrive,” she said. “Harry, Ron, and Daphne, at least. And soon. We're coming up to the castle. I think it's best if we go up together.”

The last time he had seen Daphne, she had been holed up in Gryffindor Tower with a stack of novels and what she claimed was a head-cold. She had looked like refuse warmed over.

In the gloom of the Express, however, she looked like refuse served cold. The face perched atop her mink-fur mantle was wan and sunken, with bruises of exhaustion bracketing the nose. Her hair was flat and greasy, and she sported a fresh crop of spots, which drew attention to the ropey ribbing of her facial scars.

She stared out the window, her breath rattling miserably through her sinuses.

“You’d better not be contagious, because when Brown’s sick, the whole Tower is,” he said. He shut the door behind him. “In which case I’ll see you in hell.”

“Draco! Darling! How are you? How was your vacation?”

“Dreadful, to both, thanks for asking. You’re leaking.”

She fumbled for a handkerchief. “I can’t wait to see Pomfrey,” she said thickly. “I’ve been locked up in my room since December, and none of the Healers have helped. I’ve been glugging Pepper-Up Potions until I nearly threw them all back up again—”

“I saw your sister at St. Mungo’s.”

“What were you doing at St. Mungo’s? You’re not sick, are you?”

“Arthur Weasley had a bad Christmas. Don’t ask.”

“Oh, God! How awful,” she whispered. “Poor Ron. On top of everything else…”

“He’s enduring.”

“I daresay. Oh, we should do something nice for him, won’t we? When’s his birthday? March?”

“Do I seem like any sort of person who would know?”

“But you seem like the sort of person who’d know everything,” she said, fluttering her eyelashes.

“You look like a nearsighted drunk.”

“I look comely and winsome.”

“You’re winsome as a bog body.”

“And you’re half as friendly. No offense.”

“Offense bitterly taken, hateful wretch,” he said. “I’ve something for you.”

“Ooh! A Christmas present?”

“Of sorts.” He produced Pansy’s envelope. She slit the crest and scanned it with the expression of a child discovering a workbook in their Christmas stocking.

“It’s from Parkinson. She wants you to burn it, by the way.” He watched her scan it three times, squinting more and more with each go. “I wouldn’t mind knowing what it says.”

“Well, since you asked, it’s an illustrated record of an amorous encounter with Gregory Goyle. Vividly drawn, too. Gosh, how does he fit all that—”

“It was a mistake to introduce you to Lavender Brown.”

“Maybe for you. And don’t be nosy.” She passed it over. It read:

In the event of the worst

Gringotts Vault 1103

Password – Iphigenia

In this way each creature flies from its enemy: love is the cause of my following thee.

“Either I’m missing something, or Parkinson has gone mad at last. What does it mean?”

She shrugged and hummed a singsong: I don't know. "Possibly she thinks I'm smarter than I am. 'Iphigenia' is my middle name, but it could also be a reference to anything. Pans and Teddy are notorious riddlers. Used to force everyone to do them at parties. Yawn."

"You don't recognize that vault?"

"No. My family's assets live in a heritage account. Named, not numbered." Daphne lit it on fire with a flick of her wand. "Anyway, who knows?" she chirped. "I wouldn't take it too seriously. It's all very ominous, but coming from Pans, 'in event of the worst' could mean her parents want to throw a soirée. Anyway, we're about to arrive; let's find the others. I don't want to ride up alone."

"Alone? What am I, Godric's ghost?"

"You're like furniture to me. Said with love."

As they descended from the carriage, a river of black robes splashed out over the platform and winnowed down the rock path towards the herd of bone-white thestrals that waited on a small crest of rock and snow, drawn into pale prominence against a black mass of colorless, sprawling forest. The last time he had been there, he had been racing across that platform in the evening gloom.

Draco drew his wand, responding to a threat that existed only in memory, and then muttered Lumos to disguise the action. He pushed forward without looking at Hermione, climbing down from the train behind him, to avoid dredging up the memory of their last escape from the castle. He would have welcomed for once the insipid chatter of students returning from their holidays — lists of presents, boasts of overeating, moans about the volume of homework — but for once, the student march back to the castle was quiet, almost bone-silent. They moved into the mists of the forest with their faces cast down.

The castle peered over the treetops like a cluster of knives, its sharp turrets carving out triangles of starlight into void. They moved into its shadow and boarded carriages drawn by creatures that should have been invisible to them.

He climbed up into a carriage and offered a hand to Hermione, who took it to pull herself aboard; she clutched it, briefly, as she moved into the carriage. Her face was an expressionless slate. Harry was wearing the same bitter expression he had when they left Grimmauld Place that morning; Ron was merely vigilant, and grim. He shot a dark glower at a pair of Slytherin prefects standing by the next carriage up, fingering his wand.

“Don’t start anything,” Hermione warned him. She tugged him in by the back of his robe, and he sat down with a humph.

“They were watching us.”

“Of course they are,” she said. “I’m extremely famous.”

It was a wooden joke, stifled by a quiver of anxiety; but Harry’s lip quirked up. He reached for her hand and squeezed it. She patted his shoulder briskly, as if he were merely feeling a bit under the weather, and they rode up to the castle in silence.

Daphne thrust herself through the crowd. “Draco! What’s he doing here? Do you know anything? Tell me now!”

“Specificity,” said Draco, “and fewer pronouns, please.”

“Waste of time! Just come!”

Daphne urged them into the Great Hall. Perched over a crowd of milling despairants below, Umbridge sat next to Dumbledore, engaging him in unsmiling conversation over brussels sprouts.

“Slytherin table!” she gasped. “Ten o’clock!”

“I know where the Slytherin table is, actually,” Hermione said. “I do pay atten— what's he doing here?”

Cassius Warrington sat in pride of place among the Slytherins, surrounded by a coterie of variably convincing sycophants, absorbed in the act of either lecturing, telling a joke, or both. His curls were coiffed and oiled to shining, and he wore a Ministry uniform of lush purple.

Theo, at right, was cradling his chin in his hands and evaluating his fork as a weapon of suicide; Pansy, at left, was holding her goblet with closed eyes as if her own evaluation had concluded, and she was now fortifying herself for an attempt.

“She seems miserable,” said Daphne, miserably. “I wish we could help her.”

Ron looked at her, not unkindly, as if she’d suggested helping a blast-ended skrewt.

“Last I checked, you had to agree to marry somebody in this country,” he said. “Unless Umbridge changed that, too, over the vac.”

Umbridge gave a high, shrill laugh that stilled the hall like a shattered glass. With her fiancé’s attention diverted, Pansy ventured a furtive, worried glance down the table at Theo, who didn’t seem to hear any of it, floating in his own dull myopia. The food on his plate hadn’t been touched. Draco took note of the fact that the hollows under his cheeks had darkened, and then carefully un-took note of it.

He wanted no share in their miseries, and he had long since revoked any claim to share in their joys. So rather than continue to watch the small, bitter vignette unspool, he left the Great Hall, his feet pointed to the one part of the castle that still felt like home.

At the foot of the staircase, a pair of Gryffindor first years were huddled together. He recognized Alfie Chrissenpoffer and Victoria Frobisher, whom he’d corralled at the Opening Feast.

“No loitering in the halls.”

They sprang apart. “It’s Malfoy,” said Alfie, relieved. “Hullo, sir. Could we have a Mending Charm?”

“I’m not a tailor.” He drew his wand anyway, wearily. “What is it you’ve broken? If it’s a tapestry, you’re getting detention with McGonagall and not one ounce of sympathy. Granger told you not to climb them.”

Victoria hid something behind her back. Alfie elbowed her. She reluctantly withdrew a white scrap of fabric. It had an insignia embroidered in red and gold: the forked tendrils of a lightning-bolt. Draco’s stomach sank.

“Frobisher, that had better be your handkerchief.”

“It’s for Potter’s Army,” said Alfie. “They’re to wear after detentions with Umbridge. Lavender said—”

“She did? Wonderful. How long have you been wearing these?”

“Since I got detention,” said Victoria, “and I needed one. It says we’re for Harry. Which we are. He’s our House, and that means we have to study up like you and Granger, so we can kill Slytherins.”

“Who told you to kill Slytherins?”

“Nobody, but the Slytherins want to kill us,” said Alfie, matter-of-factly. “That’s what Seamus says, and Dean, and Katie. That’s why we’re not to talk to them or tell them anything about what Gryffindors are doing.”

“Seamus,” said Draco tightly. “Dean. Katie. Right. So, on the counsel of idiots—”

“Malfoy.”

The hairs on his neck rose.

Cassius smiled at him politely from the doors to the Great Hall, hands folded behind his back. Pansy stood at his elbow with a guarded, blank expression.

“Back to the common room,” Draco snapped. “Both of you.”

Alfie and Victoria scrambled up the steps. Victoria paused at the banister to blow a raspberry at Pansy.

Draco slid his wand back into its sheath.

“Warrington,” he said, by way of greeting. “Retaking your N.E.W.T.s?”

“Play nice,” warned Pansy, laying a hand on Cassius’s arm. “Cassy is training as the new Undersecretary of Education.”

“Lovely. Is he aware that he’s missed his office by several hundred miles?”

“Mr. Parkinson did me the generous favor of arranging—”

“Or does he require instruction as to what education looks like?”

“If you must know, he’s here to shadow Professor Umbridge.”

“Such internships are quite common at the Ministry,” drawled Cassius. “I’m surprised you haven’t had one yet. Not surprised, that is — but you catch the idea.” Draco ignored him.

Rufus Warrington was a member of the pureblood nouveau riche: a wizarding line pure enough to respect, but not old enough to buy the kind of things Cassius wanted. Real power needed time to ferment, and it aged on the scale of generations. The Parkinsons had been pure since at least the Napoleonic Wars, but they’d lost much of their wealth in the First Wizarding War. Money wanted pedigrees, and pedigrees needed money. And the marriage was a political masterstroke: a Minister-in-Training and a princess of the Old Guard, one of the last intact lines of the Sacred Twenty-Eight. They’d live at Parkinson Court, and Warrington money would fund her dinner parties with other politicians' wives; Cassius would have every door in the Cavalier Party opened to him at the flourish of her father's seal. Their children might even take her name. It was probably all laid out in the marriage contract.

But what was he doing here? Cassius was the Triwizard Champion, with all the glamor and notoriety that title could buy. Umbridge obviously stood to benefit from harboring a connection with him, both publicly and privately — she could find in him what she had hoped to find in Draco. But what did Cassius need from her? Not Ministry influence. His father was the primary shipping contractor for the Ministry. Neither Warrington needed anything from Umbridge, who — even given a generous estimation of her influence with Runcorn — didn't have half the sway in the Ministry that Cassius's father did.

So perhaps Cassius wasn't doing it for himself.

He turned the pieces over in his mind: Umbridge needed Cassius. Cassius needed Pansy. What did Pansy need?

"What did she give you?" he said sharply.

"Who?" drawled Pansy.

"Umbridge."

"Nothing," she said. Her voice was flat and her expression blank, a rare thing for such a spiteful creature. "She didn't do anything for me."

The doors to the Great Hall parted, and Theo slipped silently into the shaded, guttering torchlight of the Entrance Hall. He drew the door closed, and as he did, Draco stared at the bare span of his wrist — free of the silver cuff it had sported in October.

Theo brusquely tugged down his sleeve.

Daphne had told him something about Cassius's father, once.

Warrington owes Lord Nott enough money to mortgage Gringotts, twice.

Pansy kept her fingers balanced delicately on Cassius's outstretched arm. It was a facsimile of a gesture; there was no possibility of drawing support from her limp grasp.

"Not half a choice," Draco repeated quietly.

She did not blink. "I beg your pardon?"

"It was elegantly done. Heinous," he said brusquely, "and it'll make life worse for everyone, not least of all him; but elegant."

"'Heinous' is melodramatic, even for you."

"Whose idea was it?" he said, raising his voice. "Yours? Or hers? I don't suppose Nott asked you to pawn your fiancé for his freedom?"

"I don't know what you're talking about."

"Yes, you do. Is Warrington here to oversee his parole? That was the deal, wasn't it? Warrington's the watchdog, and you're the leverage. Carrot and stick."

"Pure drivel," said Cassius, "and incomprehensible babbling. Are you well?"

He ignored Cassius and turned to Pansy. "There are certain people who will expect things of him, you know. Now that he's lost that bit of jewelry."

"Expect what of me?" said Carrius irritably. All three of the others ignored him.

"Don't lecture her," said Theo, raising his voice for the first time. It rasped. "And spare me the firewyrm tears for my safety. We both know you don’t fucking care.”

Draco twitched, but wrestled past the flare of emotion and found the cold will to ignore him, too. “The only thing that still confuses me, frankly, is what your fiancée stands to gain. One does wonder what he thinks he’s getting out of this, since it’s obviously not the sweetness of your affection.”

“You’re rambling, Draco,” said pansy.

“Really, dear boy,” said Cassius. “A man might think you were envious.”

Draco snapped, “If that’s your read here, I marvel that you even remember to breathe.”

“Zing,” said Theo tonelessly. “Boy, you got him. Well done. Now go upstairs and take a nap.”

There was no point in pressing further. With a parting sneer, Draco made to leave.

“Did you happen to call on the Greengrasses, over vacation?” Pansy called in a lofty tone.

He nearly laughed at her. Pansy Parkinson — stupid, selfish, petulant Pansy Parkinson — poor, foolish Pansy Parkinson, who might very well have doomed them all — still fancied herself a spymaster.

“Pout-etre,” he said. “Did you happen to visit Gringotts?”

Her flinch was enough to confirm his suspicions. What inflamed them still further was the twitch that ran across Theo’s: recognition, quickly suppressed, almost too fast to be noticed.

He climbed the stairs to Gryffindor with the weight of their eyes pressed firmly into his back.

“Well,” said Hermione. “I suppose that means Theodore Nott is off the leash.”

There was a pause. Then Daphne said hesitantly: “Is that — such a terrible thing?”

The lake glittered in the dull gray glare of an overcast winter afternoon, faceted with chop, with doilies of frost encasing the stones on its banks. Under the spindly vault of a naked oak, Draco, Hermione, and Daphne reclined in the roots. Down by the water, Harry and Ron were making a slow circuit of the beach, pausing to skip stones across its slate face.

The landscape was the desaturated, ruddy, almost reddish brown of foliage in winter, the sky a foamy swell of rolling clouds. Rain swept down in a gauzy curtain on the hills, not yet approaching the castle, but scented in the wet, cold air.

“He’s the plaything of his father,” said Draco flatly. “A Death Eater. And now he’s able to leave the castle whenever he pleases. I don’t know, Greengrass, do you think that’s a ‘terrible thing’?”

She scowled. “He might not be a good person, but he’s nobody’s ‘plaything.’ Especially not his father’s.”

“Want to bet?”

“I might! I’ve known him since birth, Draco, and you’ve only known him for three years — the worst three of his life, I’ll add—”

“I’ve known others much less, and trusted them more.”

“You’re not being fair. I’m not saying you should trust him, but one mistake shouldn’t condemn—”

“One mistake?”

“It doesn’t matter,” Hermione interrupted. “Theo’s not interested in redemption. He’s made that very clear. So it doesn’t matter whether we think he deserves it.”

Crookshanks prowled around the roots at her feet, hopping here and there to chase the scuttling beetles and doxies that inhabited the marshes by the shore. Occasionally he crept back and rubbed his nose against Daphne’s legs, which earned him a coo and a treat, no matter how many times Hermione chided; the little beast was faithless as well as violent.

January had dawned cold and grueling. New rules furnished the notice board in the hall, which had overgrown the actual board, and spilled onto the stone walls above and beside it in a thin, flaking film of tiny-lettered paper. The thin and flaking face of authority spread wider as the term went on: the Inquisitorial Squad ran concurrent patrols with prefects, so that often after hours, Draco would find one of them wandering around the castle without any particular purpose. In the hallways, the hush of chastened students became a vulnerability for anyone trying to trade information, illicit or not, such as Defense Club meetings. He became aware of how easy it would be for someone to overhear a murmured word of encouragement on the stairwell, or to notice a Potter's Army band flashed beneath a sleeve. The young students rarely went to any prefects outside of their own house. The first years kept mixing up the Inquisitors with the prefects, which usually meant speaking to neither.

Draco took to carrying his wand around the halls. He rarely used it, but the presence of a weapon made the mounting and nameless tension feel more manageable.

Being in the same calendar year as their O.W.L.s. inflicted a subtle psychological change on the fifth years, and an unsubtle change in their professors. In Potions, Snape humbled them all with an eighty-question pre-test that only half of the cohort managed to pass. McGonagall raked them all over the coals for failure to complete the vacation homework, then raked them back the other direction for being unprepared for trans-animal transfiguration. In this, as in most classes, Hermione was a flurry of activity, her desk flush with a stack of color-coded notes to her right and the annotated textbook open at her left. In Defense Against the Dark Arts, however, she had changed so profoundly that it caused some to wonder if something had happened to her.

For one thing, she had stopped bringing her books to class. When Umbridge asked her a question on the reading, she shrugged.

“Do you intend to pass this class, Miss Granger?”

“Yes, professor.”

“In fact I think you do not,” she said sweetly. “Because you are not taking notes, you see! And only very stupid girls think they are smart enough to pass classes without taking notes. Are you a stupid girl, Miss Granger?”

Hermione gazed into the middle distance, stone-faced. Draco’s fingers itched for his wand. He slipped them in his pockets.

Umbridge snapped her fingers in front of Hermione’s face. “Answer me.”

“What was the question, professor?”

“Are you stupid?”

“I—”

Lavender Brown raised her hand and gave a noisy cough. Umbridge sighed.

“What, Miss Brown?”

“Ummmmm. I thought the question was… like… the counter-curse for tickling? Which is… like…. Anti-titullara?” Her voice was a parody of itself. Lavender hadn’t sounded that vapid in years, if ever. “Erm. I think. Like, titullara, but not?" She fiddled with her hair. "Is that right, professor?"

Umbridge didn't reply. Coldly, she said: "You would do well to learn from Miss Brown, Miss Granger."

But she moved on. Lavender glanced at Hermione and tugged the bandages on her hand, then hid the movement by fussing at her bracelets.

Now, almost a week later, Hermione was frowning at the frosted vista, and tugging the same bandages on her right hand.

"I wonder to what extent he's working with Warrington," she mused.

"Doubt it," muttered Daphne. "He thinks he's an idiot. I doubt he'd work with him on anything."

"He's not an idiot," said Hermione, whose tone indicated this was the best she could say about him. "He pulled off some advanced magic in the Triwizard Tournament. And he's maneuvered himself into a marriage with Pansy, which is politically intelligent, if not particularly enviable."

Draco sniggered. She gave a private, self-contained smile.

"I think the real danger here is Cassius," she said abruptly. "We've been focusing on Theo — and I share your worries about him, believe me — but at the end of the day, he's an underage student, and his father's in prison. Cassius is an adult. He's rich, he's well-connected, and he doesn't have the Trace. He also happens to have acquired tremendous influence over Theo and Pansy both in the span of a year. I have to wonder who's really the mind behind their arrangement."

The idea of Cassius as the person pulling the strings was a startling reorientation of perspective; in Hermione's framing, the fourteen-year-old Pansy seemed much less like a mastermind than she had on the steps of the Great Hall.

“Theo doesn’t like him,” Daphne said doggedly. “He wouldn’t work with him. He doesn’t trust him.”

“He doesn’t trust anyone that isn’t Parkinson or Greengrass,” retorted Draco, prodding her with his foot. She scowled.

“Or you,” said Hermione.

He made a dismissive sound.

“He did like you,” she said matter-of-factly. “You were the only person outside Slytherin he ever made an effort with. And he tried to recruit you.”

“He tried to recruit me because I’m incredibly valuable,” said Draco. Daphne giggled, and he kicked her again. “Besides which — a valuable bloodline, Greengrass, and piss off, you know what I meant — besides which, I’m not bad in a duel, and I’ve rather a lot of money. Be offended if he didn’t, I daresay.”

“Several things can be true at once,” said Hermione, cryptically. Strands of hair still pricked up and danced in the draft off the lake.

He shrugged, somewhat irritated by the suggestions of both women that he had some rare degree of closeness with a boy in several respects responsible for the end of the world.

“It’s been a very long time since he’s liked me,” he said, with a finalistic tone deeming the subject closed. “And a longer time since the feeling’s been remotely mutual.”

Hermione hummed noncommittally.

“Say you’re right,” she suggested. “If Theo cares for Pansy — as you say — her husband would be important to him, wouldn’t he?”

“Fiancé. Not ‘husband.’”

“Does the difference matter?”

“It would to him.”

She blew into her cupped hands and rubbed them for warmth. “Alright. Why?”

“Because there’s a difference between marriage and anything else.”

She rolled her finger in a go-on gesture.

“It’s hard to explain. Wait— hang on—”

“If I had a shilling for every time someone said that—”

“Not what I meant, listen—”

“—of a patently explicable fact in the magical world, as if it were too astonishingly complex—”

“I meant I had to think about it—”

“—only to come up with a trumped-up fancy version of something perfectly comparable to what muggles do—”

“Granger,” he said patiently, and she stopped. Her breath billowed into the air as steam. “I know.”

“Do you?”

“I do. When I say it’s hard for me to explain, I don’t mean that it would be difficult for you to understand.”

She blew out a breath. After a moment, she grimaced and flashed him a look that was not quite an apology, and he touched her knee, which was not quite an apology, either.

“There’s an old-fashioned way to do it and a modern way to do it,” he said, after a moment. “The old-fashioned way is practiced usually by —”

“No, I’ll guess.”

“Right. Not without reason, anyway. The ceremony is complicated. It involves a lot of binding spells, and oaths, and vows of devotion, and such. The truly, arcanely old-school back their oaths with curses— ‘if thou striketh thy bond, thou shalt suffer twice her sufferings,’ or ‘whither thou diest, there shall I die,’ or ‘may the fruits of your flesh wither and die if thou goest afield’—”

“Can you divorce?”

“Well, I’m not married.” He settled back on his elbows.

“Obviously by ‘you,’ I meant—”

“Purebloods, naturally. Just because I’m a pureblood doesn’t mean I know everything about them. Maybe I don’t speak for all of us. We don’t all know each other, you know.”

She wrinkled her nose at him, her mouth taut from its battle with a growing smile. Her eyes were practically glowing with fondness. The weather suddenly felt almost temperate. “Fine,” she said. “I’m dreadfully sorry for assuming. I’ll ask Daphne — Daphne—?”

“Divorce exists, but it isn’t common,” he interrupted, resting his head back on the roots. “And it’s quite difficult. You’d have to undo all the household enchantments, which is a right mare if you’re from an old family. For some places it’d take a team of curse-breakers years to get through them all.”

“There are enchantments involved in your marriages?”

“Naturally. The Laws of Blood bind spouses into each other’s families. So my mother, for instance, has a ward key to the Manor, even though she isn’t properly its mistress. She can Apparate on and off its grounds. And she can use Malfoy heirlooms, a certain amount of household magic, that sort of thing. You’d have to remove that, in the divorce. And socially, of course, it’s a terrible scandal. Usually it's just easier to kill your husband.”

“Loads,” agreed Daphne.

“I should think the husbands would prefer to be divorced than murdered,” said Hermione, “personally.”

“But it’s not embarrassing to be murdered,” said Daphne, puzzled. “Dying is perfectly respectable. Happens to everybody.”

“I … suppose I hadn’t considered that.”

“If you think of marriage as a strategic alliance between families,” said Draco, “for political or financial gain, you’d like the alliances to be permanent. It’s the same with contracts. You make them binding so people can trust them, and if they trust their contracts, they’ll make more of them. There’s more trade and more investment in enterprise.”

“A wife is not an ‘investment in enterprise’!”

“Certainly not once you’ve divorced her.”

She hit him. It was well-earned and failed utterly to keep him from laughing. She hit him twice more, for good measure, and sat back with a fire in her eyes. He tipped his head back and grinned at her.

“You know what? Thank you. You’ve affirmed my belief that muggle marriages are categorically better, happier, and more humane.”

“You haven’t seen a wizarding ceremony,” said Draco. Hermione’s hair swam in and out of his field of vision like a pattern of lace on the clouds. “It might change your mind. It’s a singular thing.”

“Doubtful,” she muttered, but she was bluffing. Hermione had a soft spot for magic. It was the same spot that made her pause on patrols to take in the view of the grand staircase, and stare in muted delight while she was coming into the Room of Requirement.

She liked splendor. She couldn’t help it. Magic, for her, was a perennially exotic thing, and living with it had gilded her life in a varnish of wonder that had yet to lose its luster after five years.

He was smiling. He sorted it out quickly.

A bandage still fluttered around her wrist. She caught him looking, and tucked it back into her glove.

“Give me a practice question,” she said. “Herbology. Written section.”

“Describe the properties of hellebore.”

“Six sections, twenty-two species. Four are caulescent, the rest have basal leaves. Common ingredient in several poisons. Give me a hard one.”

“That was — alright, have it your way. List four metabolites of the genus Thalictrum.”

“That’s horrid,” she said happily. “Magnoflorine, hernandezine… berberine… Hint?”

“Alkaloid.”

“Oh, I’m an idiot. Thalicarpin.”

“There’s a girl.”

She grinned and settled back against the tree. Her leg bounced.

He reached out and picked a leaf from her hair. She went still all over, with the charming effect of a startled deer.

The unspoken Thing they had together had grown courageous since the vacation; in the gloom of an empty Grimmauld Place, and in the subsequent gloom of a quiet winter term at Hogwarts, it had started manifesting habits. It had developed a tendency of touching her, at odd times, when she was passing through a doorway or up a staircase; it had, on her side, begun to reach instinctively for his arm or his hand whenever they were alone, and no one was looking; it had, at least twice, driven her to reach across the silence of an empty common room, with the fire crackling low and a splay of forgotten textbooks at their feet, to lean across the sofa and press a kiss to his shocked, waiting mouth; and then to retreat, silently, saying nothing, while fear of frightening off her newfound recklessness held his tongue. He had kissed her back only once, when they were on patrol, under a secluded eave where the portraits couldn't see, and when her he drew back the pink flush rising under her freckles haunted the back of his mind for a few nights after.

He was certain now that he was losing his mind, but pleasantly, in a sort of complacent surrender to the process, which altogether had more rewards than costs.

Gravel crackled. The boys came loping up from the lake, their cloaks snapping like dark standards in the cool wind.

“Better go in,” called Ron. “Rain’s blowing this way. You look cozy.”

Hermione blinked in shock. Daphne glanced up from petting Crookshanks.

“I — I don’t — excuse me?”

“All three of you,” he said awkwardly. “Sat together like that. S’like a painting or something.”

“Oh. Yes. I guess so.”

“What did you think I meant?”

“No idea. I was being stupid.” She laughed nervously and stood up. Draco rolled to his feet, stretching his shoulder, and Ron followed him with his eyes.

“So,” he said, “Hermione, Harry and I were thinking we ought to teach the Defense Club to cast Patronuses tomorrow. What do you think?”

“Fine idea,” she said crisply, brushing off her robes. “It’ll have to wait for February, though. Draco and I are teaching runic traps tomorrow.”

“Can’t we just switch them? Patronuses tomorrow, traps in February?”

“But we prepared a lesson already. And we haven’t talked about how to teach the Patronus at all.”

“We don’t need to talk about it. It’s not that hard to teach.”

“Runic traps are, though,” she said, with a faint edge, “and we’ve already prepared those, so I hope you’ll understand why we don’t want to switch—”

“But you’ve already done the work, so why does it matter?”

“I could say the same of you! You’ll get to do it anyway, why should it matter which lesson goes first?”

Ron exhaled. “Because you and Draco are the only ones who know how to do runic traps,” he ground out. “Alright? And it makes me and Harry look like dolts when we have to just sit there and watch you two go off on your swot expeditions together. It doesn’t feel like we’re a team.”

“We are a team,” she said, stung, “but — Ron, you don’t know how to do runic traps. I don’t see how those two things have anything to do with each other.”

“So? Maybe Harry and I want in on it, yeah?”

“Leave me out,” Harry muttered. Daphne made a noncommittal noise.

“In on what?”

Ron looked pointedly at Draco.

“In on what?” Draco repeated.

“You know.”

“I don’t,” said Hermione frostily, “and I’m sure we’re all very curious.”

Ron deflated. “Never mind,” he muttered.

“No, really,” she snapped, “don't back off now. It's perfectly obvious you've got something to say, so don't let it stick between your teeth.”

“It's nothing.”

“It's not nothing!”

Ron mulishly put his hands in his pockets and stared at the ground.

She shot to her feet, brushing dirt from her skirt with force bordering violence. “Fine. Go have a sulk about it instead. In fact, wait — you don’t have to go anywhere. I’ll go back to the castle. Daphne, would you care to join me?”

“Very much,” Daphne murmured, and gathering Crookshanks with a graceful movement, she disembarked with Hermione from the oak tree.

Draco followed them with his eyes as they scaled the lawns. Ron gave him a hard and searching glance, then followed them.

Harry cleared his throat and turned to the lake, folding his arms. He made no move to go with them, and neither did Draco.

The two of them stood on the banks of the lake, cold and increasingly rained-on, for an interval of time sufficient for a murder of ravens to migrate from one tree to another.

“Potter, it’s raining.”

“Wow,” said Harry. “Is that what those little droplets are?”

“I mean that you’re getting soaked.”

“Boy, you don’t get those O’s for nothing.”

He folded his arms and shifted his weight, feeling brittle.

“Flitwick taught us a water-repelling charm.”

“Yeah? What do I keep you around for, then?”

Draco snorted, and conjured one over their heads.

They turned to the lake, whose surface shattered into a million facets under the downpour.

“I thought you’d follow Ronald.”

“Ronald can use some time to himself, sometimes,” said Harry placidly. “I’m enjoying the lake.”

“Did you know what he was going to say?”

“Not my business,” said Harry. “Besides, I was enjoying the lake.”

“Did he say anything to you about it?”

“No, because that’s not my business. Do you mind? I’m really trying to enjoy this lake.”

It was a gray, dreary, afternoon, and there was not, in his opinion, much enjoyment to be had. Rain sieved off the edges of the charm and formed an iridescent curtain of beads.

Draco let out a breath that seemed to have been in his chest for some time.

“How’s Professor Malfoy?” said Harry casually.

“I beg your pardon.”

“Your mum,” he clarified. “Narcissa. Occlumency teacher. Likes to knock things around in my brain and then yell at me for it. How’s she?”

“Fine. I imagine.”

Harry raised an eyebrow. Draco shot him a curt look that instructed him to drop the subject. Harry’s look replied quite firmly that he would not.

“Not a sure thing, is it?”

“It’s complicated.”

“Wow,” said Harry. “I wonder what that must be like.”

Draco snorted; a nameless relief came over him as the weight of explaining himself lifted. He cleared his throat and ventured, albeit reluctantly: “We fought over the vacation. Haven’t spoken since.”

“About…?”

“Granger.”

“Ah, shit,” said Harry. “The blood thing?”

“No. Because she wore corduroys at the dinner table. What do you think?”

Harry paused before answering.

“I think your mum's pretty old for her age,” he said. “And it's hard for adults to get their heads around the idea — or to admit, even if they can — their kids know something they don't.”

“That seems to be the way of things.”

A great heron settled into the shallows a stone's throw from them and dipped its beak into the water.

“Bet she still loves you, though,” Harry said hesitantly, as if he wasn't actually sure. “Your mum.”

“She does.”

“Yeah.” It was relieved. “I mean, of course she does.”

“It's a very strange thing,” said Draco slowly, “but one comes to a point where that fact doesn't... actually matter.”

Harry looked like he wanted to say a number of things all at once. But he voiced only one of them. “I’m sorry.”

“You don’t have to apologize for her,” he said, with a sudden coolness in his voice that even he did not understand. Then, tautly, with more awkwardness than cold: “She’d loathe you for trying, you know.”

Harry covered his mouth with his hand. Draco stiffened, wary that he had trod on a raw nerve; but unexpectedly, Harry started to laugh.

“I apologize for that, Potter. It was ungenerous of me to mention.”

“No — that’s fine — it’s just,” he said thickly, “everybody — everyone already loathes me, mate. The whole world. And compared to them, she’s not even good at it. She’s one of, like, ten adults on the planet who are actually trying to help me stay alive, and one of — what, fifteen? Twenty? — who don’t actively want me dead. In the tiers of people who hate me, she’s League Two. She hasn’t even tried to kill me yet. I — I’m sorry, but at this point, I expect a better game.”

“I appreciate,” said Draco, “the optimism expressed in the word ‘yet.’”

For some reason, Harry found this hilarious.

After a minute, Harry gave a long sigh and cast his eyes around the grounds contentedly. “Hey, look who it is,” he said.

The downpour had flushed out two more people from the lakeside path: Dolores Umbridge and Cassius Warrington were rapidly climbing the path to the castle on the other side of the lake, their heads shielded by the glimmering sheen of Water-Repellent Charms.

“What do you suppose they’re talking about?” he said.

“How to kill me,” Harry suggested, polishing his glasses on his robe.

“I was being serious.”

“I am serious,” he said casually. He pointed at them with the corner of his glasses. “Trust me, I know when someone wants me dead.”

-I LIVE!

-HAPPY NEW YEAR!

-If you've been here for a while, you know that this kind of hiatus happens sometimes — deeply sorry — came as soon as I could, even if it's been far too long. But I couldn't let actual New Years' pass without finally letting Draco out of St. Mungo's. Terrible place for a celebration, really.

-This chapter is dedicated to the Succession soundtrack, which has a brilliant way of making the words go, and which powered me through the past two days of editing.

-It's also dedicated to the absolute real ones who stay in the comments section even when it's been months since the latest update. Without you this would not exist, and it would not exist many times over. You're the petrol in the engine of this story. The comment-essayists are the diesel.

-Next chapter soon. Stay tuned. All my love and wishes for 2025 — it's gonna be great, y'all.

The Patronus

Chapter 73: The Patronus

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

“The Patronus Charm,” said Harry, “is a simple spell.”

“He says that about every spell,” Hermione said under her breath.

“Usually he’s right,” said Draco.

“This one isn’t.”

“Well, he assumes it’s simple because he can do it. You have to respect the logic.”

She covered her face in her hands, partly to hide her smile.

Harry had summoned the Room of Requirement that day. The Defense Club gathered in a suspicious and hesitant semicircle around his plinth. Gryffindor tapestries hung from the walls and a healthy fire crackled in the grate; silver instruments tinkled overhead, evoking the Transfiguration classroom.

“We’re starting off easy, with exercises, and we’ll try it with a boggart next month,” said Harry. “Course, patronuses aren’t for boggarts, they’re for dementors, but my boggart is a dementor, and the main thing is test whether you can cast it scared. That a hand, Seamus?”

“Yeah, thanks. Where you getting the boggart?”

“Fair question. The Room can’t make things that are alive, so Ron and I are gonna have to try and nab the one in the staff closet. Accepting volunteers to help with that, by the way. Ginny...? Oh, volunteering. Thanks.”

“Fred, put your hand down,” said Ron.

Harry pointed. “Yeah, Padma?”

“George, put your hand down,” said Ron.

Padma leaned forward. “What does the patronus do, exactly? Obviously it wards off dementors, but dementors can’t be killed except through a ritual enchantment, so what’s the patronus for? Is it incorporeal, or does it have mass? Are you summoning it or conjuring it? Or is it an illusion?”

“Lots of questions,” said Harry, nervously. “Good questions. Wow. Hermione—?”

“They’re great questions,” said Hermione brightly. She stepped up beside Harry, who yielded the floor with gratitude. “It’s an incorporeal familiar. It can also take messages and execute simple tasks. The base of the Patronus Charm is a powerful anti-Dark countercurse, but it’s conjured into a moving ward, which is given shape by a reflection of the user’s magical signature; hence, the memory—”

“Not that this isn’t important,” said Ron, “but why don’t we give it a go, and do the theory later?”

“But the theory is indispensable.”

“Gotta be kinda dispensable, though, if I can manage it,” he said. “Expecto Patronum.”

A terrier with high, pointy ears leapt into the air and did a prancing circuit of the room, evoking delighted giggles from the younger children. Victoria Frobisher leapt up and cried out covetously, clearly wanting ten of them. Ron led it around by wandpoint, grinning broadly, and cast a look over his shoulder at Hermione. “See?”

“Yes, everyone can see it,” she said curtly. Ron’s smile faded. He ended the spell.

Hermione's inability did not stem from reluctance. By all appearances, she was trying as hard as she could. She had asked Harry to explain it perhaps a dozen times, and practiced the spellwork often enough to become a master. She could have taught the Patronus to any wizard on the face of the planet. But she could not, to save her life, conjure one herself.

Which meant that, as the lesson went on, she sank into a morass of frustration that drew her away from the group, while Harry and Ron centered a growing flock of silver animals, crowing at each victory.

It didn't help that Luna did hers effortlessly on the first try. With an eerie trill of "Expecto Patrrrrrronum," her wand blossomed silver, and a bird nearly as large as the girl herself swept into the air over the room, did a wide circuit, and landed in the rafters. It had a beak like the point of a rapier, and its eye was nacreous as an oil spill.

"It's an egret!" she said delightedly, rocking up and down excitedly on her heels. It was a very young gesture, and it brought home her fourteen-year-old self, which tended to vanish sometimes in the mysticism and the extravagant hats. "Egrets have loads of magical symbolism. They've got lovely connections to power and foresight — oh, I'd hoped it'd be this! But this means I was right!"

"The form of your patronus isn't symbolic," said Hermione. "It almost always takes the form of an animal that's significant to you. There are studies on it. If you like egrets, that's probably why it's an egret. It doesn't mean you're like an egret, and it certainly doesn't mean you've got special egret-y abilities—"

"Let her have it, go on," murmured Ginny, leaning on Hermione's shoulder. "Look at how happy she is."

"But it isn't correct."

"Your mum's not correct. Hey, Luna, what's my patronus?"

“A horse, I should think,” Luna said dreamily. “I saw it once in Divination. A great beautiful lady-horse, with a mane like a flag. And Hermione, yours is a bird, though I don’t know what species — I only saw it a little, because it was flying so high — am I right? What is it?”

“No idea,” Hermione said shortly. “Nor have you. You’ve never seen my patronus, because nobody has. For your information, I suspect it’s an otter. Why don’t you and Ginny try practicing with the boggart?”

Luna, who seemed immune to offense and tact alike, drifted peaceably away.

Draco twirled his wand. He’d not tried to make a patronus in some time, and he didn’t fancy making the effort in front of the whole group. So he kicked Neville’s footwork into better position and shoved Lee Jordan’s wand in the direction of the window, a policy adopted for collective safety, traded a nod with Cedric — whose pine marten was draped cheerfully across its master’s shoulders — and then allowed himself to be wrangled into a few pester-and-answer sessions with the Creeveys.

Daphne took several tries to make a corporeal, which finally spooled out of her wand in a glabrous smear, landed on the floor, and rubbed itself haughtily against her legs. It was a Persian longhair, astonishingly corpulent, with a crumpled face like McGonagall in distress.

She had come back from the Hospital Wing with several vials of Pepper-Up Potion and a prescription for something else, which she had refused to show; when Draco made a polite inquiry about the possible resurgence of a blood condition, she sniffed and made an oblique remark that it was ungentlemanly to be over-curious about a lady’s health. That implication well-scalded him off the subject, and he had stalked off in some haste, with a parting snarl at Lavender for giggling.

But she seemed as strong as ever; she continued to power up and down stairs at the same double-step as Fred or George, and to hoist up corners of the Gryffindor couch in search of Parvati's lost bracelet; but she wearied quickly, and increasingly could be found napping around the common room in the middle of the day, shrouded in wool blankets, despite the proximity of a roaring fire.

Lavender suggested that "a girl's time" manifested in different ways. Hermione had, for her part, inquired about the medical linkage between menstruation and fever; Lavender said something dismissive about modern medicine; Hermione had, predictably, vaulted prodigiously off the handle, and the resulting row shook the Tower tapestries.

"Absolute darling," Daphne exclaimed now, and attempted to scoop her patronus up. The patronus, being incorporeal, could not be cuddled. Both creatures regarded this as a tragedy. "Look at the blessed thing! I can't order her at a dementor, she's too precious!"

"That must be the most toffee-nosed patronus I've ever seen," said Draco.

"Pooh! What's yours, a cockroach?"

"Psht. Mine would eat yours for breakfast."

"You'd never!" she said. "I bet it's a hedgehog. A prickly, shy little lump— oh!"

Ginny's patronus, a mare, cantered over and nosed at Daphne's neck. She laughed and ran her hand along its back, her fingers showering stardust from its incorporeal skin. Ginny came running over after it, and in a flare of light from a passing cloud, the red hair flying behind her head flashed the same white as her patronus, her laughter a halting bray. One of George's jackals came nipping at her heels, teasing her, and she jumped up on a chair to avoid it — ducked a dive-bomb from Luna's bird — and whipped her wand around to cast another silver mare, which collided with Seamus's wolverine in a small fission of white.

Laughter dappled in the vaulted roof as a scuffle broke out; Ginny was tackled to the ground by a wronged Katie, whose dart frog she had stomped into nonexistence; Michael Corner leapt to defend her honor and was tripped by a mischievous Dean; silver animals collapsed in a great sigh of white steam, and the pileup grew into a merry scuffle of limbs and good-natured shouting.

"Ow owowow ow you're pulling my hair!"

"Cut it out or I'll tell Hermione!"

"Not if I tell Hermione first!"

"You cut it out or I'll tell Malfoy."

"You wouldn't dare!"

"Would!"

"Don't be a narc, Dean!"

"Malfoy, Ginny's got my wand and won't give it back!"

"If you're fool enough to let her have your wand, you deserve whatever she does with it," called Draco. Hermione shot him an exasperated glance. "Get it back from her, if you can. Don't start fights and call prefects to end them."

"HA! Eat my shorts, tosser—"

"Easy, Ginevra."

"Sorry. Eat my shorts, respectfully."

She pitched Dean's wand across the room. She had a great arm; it bounced off the window and beaned Neville on the head.

Hannah Abbott, who had been trying to help him, sent Ginny an exasperated glower and snatched up Dean's wand to return to him; Ginny replied with a guilty grin. Draco took the chance to draw Neville aside, a move with which Neville complied, somewhat anxiously, rubbing his head.

"Am I doing it wrong?" he said at once. "That last one looked kind of like a toad, if you squinted—"

It hadn't. "This isn't about your patronus. Here."

Neville almost doubled over from the weight of the book tossed at him.

"Oof. Er — okay? I… uh, I already have a Potions textbook? Thanks, though?"

"Get rid of it."

"Why?" complained Neville, rubbing his abdomen a bit churlishly. "It's the same book."

"Not by half. That's my textbook. I expect it returned perfectly intact."

Neville immediately held the book at arm's length, like it might detonate. It was much nicer than his copy; Draco bought his books new, and Neville, though he did the same, abused his enough with spillage and combustion to disguise it.

"This is yours?"

"Yes. I don't need it anymore, I'm well into the sixth-year curriculum. There are exercises in the back of the book. You'll report to me at the next meeting with how many you've brewed correctly. Where there are corrections, follow the handwriting, not the print. And you're going to register to sit the O.W.L. in Potions."

"I'm not going to pass Potions!"

“Incorrect. You need at least a N.E.W.T. in Potions to become a board-certified Herbologist. Isn’t that so?”

“Correct, but—”

“So you must pass it. Ergo, you will. Simpliciter.”

Neville was aglow in hopeful bemusement. He held the book to his chest. “This — it’s really g-g-good of you, Draco, b-b-but — did Snape say s-s-something ag-g-gain?”

Draco flicked a bit of lint from his sleeve.

“If you drop Potions, it’ll be a waste of years of my teaching,” he said. “It’s a shame to let good work go to waste. Don’t embarrass me.”

“I won’t. I swear. I’ll really t-t-try—”

“Merlin’s sake, don’t get soft. I know you will,” said Draco irritably. Neville continued to radiate forty volts of intense, watery gratitude. “I’ll have you scrubbing cauldrons if you don’t. And stop jerking your wand up on ‘Patronum,’ you’re dashing the spellwork.”

“Oh. Sorry.”

“So you should be.”

Across the room, with her back to the door, Cho was working hard to little avail. She kept blowing gusts of silver fog from her wand, and her frustrated expression deepened further and further into the kind of scowl behind which few happy memories could flourish. Marietta extended a tender hand to help her and was swatted away with a word as quiet as it was unkind. The floating carnival of silver animals left a sheen on the beaded flush of her face, and eventually, Harry stepped in to help her. Then she lowered her wand and spoke to him in a quiet, low voice, something that was inaudible, and she slumped as though her strings had been cut. Harry touched her hand, and she leaned her head against his chest, shoulders low.

He found Hermione at the back of the room. She was perched on one of the sofas, ankles folded neatly beneath her, with a spread of papers levitated in the air before her as a makeshift desk.

“An otter?” he suggested, by way of greeting, and leaned his hip against the sofa’s arm. She glanced up at him, and her gaze did a gratifying flicker up-and-down. “Didn’t know you liked them.”

“They were my favorite animal when I was seven,” she said, dropping her quill in a floating inkwell, “and my father bought me a stuffed one as a pet. I slept with it for six years.”

He counted on his fingers.

“Shut up. Yes, it came to Hogwarts, no, it isn’t here anymore, and no, you will never, ever see it.”

“Did it have a name?” he said delightedly. “Never mind — you’re you, of course it did. Something long and mockable, naturally. What was it? Xenophon? Machiavelli? Desiderius Erasmus Roterodamus?”

“Like you have a toe to stand on. ‘Ulysses.’”

“What sort of obscure muggle figures was the infant Granger obsessed with? Famous dentists? Warrior queens?”

“Peter,” she said, clearly and begrudgingly.

“I beg your pardon?”

“Oh, go on.”

“Peter?” He was gleeful. “Thucydides, Crookshanks, and ‘Peter’?”

She dotted an i that punctured the parchment. “You know, I think Romilda’s form is off. Why don’t you go help her?”

“Good effort. Who’s ‘Peter’?”

“And that boy Alfie’s been trying to impress you for an hour. You should stop him before he hurts himself.”

“Some snot you fancied in primary school?”

“I didn’t fancy anyone in primary school,” she said, in rising tones, “and I miss it more every day.”

His heart beat powerfully and pleasantly in his chest. He laughed and stole one of her quills from midair.

“Draco Malfoy, give that back! And quit being such a pill!”

“I’m not. I’m trying to — don’t kick me, witch — learn about your muggle childhood. I’m expressing an — ow! — healthy interest in multiculturalism—”

“Multiculturalism! Oh, you’re such a—”

“ —spurning my effort to understand the muggle world, rather hypocritical of you, after you’ve go on and on about respect for your culture—”

“‘Respect,’ don’t make me laugh—”

“I do respect it, in fact.”

“Expect points for that, do you?”

“Doesn’t one usually?” He leaned on the armrest of her sofa. The light of the windows was to his back, and she shaded her eyes judiciously at him.

“Expect points? For harassing me about childhood toys? You must be often disappointed.”

“No,” he said. “For resisting temptation.”

She leaned forward, her bright little face a wry beam of smugness. Her hands crossed the book in her lap, forgotten. “Not really your specialty, is it?”

“On the contrary. I’m very, very good at it.”

Hermione opened her mouth, still smiling — a little helplessly — and covered her eyes with her hands. “You’re still being a pill.”

“I think I’m being perfectly tactful.”

“I think you’re being perfectly something.”

“Drop the last word, you’d be right.”

“Mm. And humble.”

“Humble? What for? Have you seen me?”

“‘Beauty to make a stranger’s eye distraught,’” she quoted, “‘being made beautiful overmuch, may consider beauty a sufficient end.’”

“God, Yeats was such a dull old codger,” he said dispiritedly.

Faintly gloating, she murmured: “‘Helen, being chosen, made life flat and dull…’”

“I’d hardly say her life was ‘dull,’ no matter what else it was. And if you’ll suffer another excerpt, dear: ‘An intellectual hatred is the worst, so let her think opinions are accursed.’”

She sniffed. “Well, he couldn’t be right about everything,” she said, and reopened her book, declaring victory.

He smirked at her, which backslid disastrously into a real smile, with teeth and everything, while she wasn’t noticing; when she continued to pretend not to pay attention to him, he prodded her leg with his boot. She kicked him with real force, and his knee buckled.

“Sorry! I’m sorry, I’m so sorry — actually, I’m not sorry. This is your fault!”

It took her six words to pivot from high-pitched apologia to accusatory venom. He cracked his eyes at the ceiling and wondered what crimes in a past life now condemned him to like her so much.

Her skirt had ridden up when she kicked him; he revised his opinion on prior crimes.

“It takes two,” he said.

She smoothed her skirt down. He looked at her legs, on principle. “I’m not sure I should dignify that.”

“The question of dignity here seems moot.”

“You’re always dignified,” she said resentfully.

“No comment.”

He straightened, and made eye contact across the room with Ron.

Ron didn’t pretend not to look. He saw and unabashedly kept seeing, with an expression that Draco had seen sometimes as they walked past the quidditch shops, in the impoverished light of a reflected glow.

Harry floated up from the murky subterraneans of something you could, supposably, call a conscience: He fancies her!

And so he did. What of it? And it wasn’t his fault that Ron had the common sense to do it. It wasn’t his responsibility to manage Ron’s feelings, any more than it was Hermione’s responsibility to requite them. Draco couldn’t be obliged to indulge them; and it wasn’t as if Ron had some special entitlement to have his feelings protected, either.

Still, it wasn’t as though he didn’t know how it felt. Standing on the other side of the room.

Draco slipped his robe back over his shoulders and smoothed the lapels. His heartbeat jarred the front of his ribs in an abhorrent rhythm. The feeling of her hands on his shoulders lingered like a tight brace over his collarbones.

The wintry sun, sliding through the windows in long silver blades, gave everything a frosted and finely carved look, as if the scene were cast in marble. Shadows puddled under the furniture. The heat of attention seemed to still prickle on the back of his neck, and he found himself restless for the lesson to end; it seemed likely, if not inevitable, that the students were watching him, and drawing insipid conclusions behind the masks of their patently un-reassuring smiles. He leaned against the wall by the door, Transfigured an inkwell into a white mouse, and spent the rest of the lesson practicing Incarcerous, with increasing efficacy and diminishing vindictiveness, until the clock tolled six.

By Hermione’s edict, the members of Defense Club left in small clumps, so as to avoid the suspicion of traveling together in a large pack. Draco was among the last to leave, usually being delayed by questions about dueling from the more bellicose students. When he finished, he found he was almost alone save for Ron and Hermione, who were chatting in low tones by the door.

When he approached, they broke off. Draco raised his eyebrow and gestured to the exit. Ron set his teeth and rocked back on his heels, bouncing.

Abruptly, he jerked his head at Draco.

“Word, mate?”

“What?”

“Can I,” he said, over-enunciating, “have. A word.”

“About what?” Hermione said shrilly. “What do you want with him?”

“Easy. Merlin. I’m not gonna eat him. Just want to chat, s’all.”

“About what?”

“If I wanted you to know, I’d have said it to you, Mione.”

Hermione stiffened. “There’s no need to be rude,” she said, gathering herself. “I can make myself scarce. I’ll see you two in the common room.”

Ron indicated the room. With a sigh, Draco dropped his bag and stepped back, allowing him to close the door.

They stood under the circling silver instruments while the torches guttered lower and lower in their sconces. Ron was pacing. Draco shifted his weight against a table and folded his arms while Ron worked whatever was in his mouth out of it.

“So what’s the deal with you?” Ron asked cordially, addressing the ceiling.

“Thank you for asking. I’m ankle-deep in an esoteric conversation, and the water’s rising. Yourself?”

“Yeah. Okay. You know what I mean, though.”

“I’ve found that whenever someone feels the need to say that to me, it usually means the opposite.”

“Mate, if you need me to spell it out for you, I will,” he said, “but I don’t reckon either of us would like it.”

Draco folded his fingers over his wand-hilt and was drumming them restlessly. He bit out: “You want to discuss Granger?”

“Sure. You know what, that’s a start. Why d’you call Hermione ‘Granger’? It’s been five years. You even stopped calling me ‘Weasley,’ eventually.”

He was irritated by the mere sound of her name in Ron’s mouth, and the fact that he felt perfectly idiotic for it failed to help.

“I call Potter by his surname,” said Draco, evasively.

“And Daphne, yeah, I noticed. But you call Nott ‘Theodore,’ and ‘Parkinson’ was ‘Pansy’ for a while,” said Ron, unblinking, “and Ginny got promoted to ‘Ginevra’ this year, so can you decrypt this a bit, man? I’m trying to understand if I should be pissed at ‘Ronald’ or not.”

“You shouldn’t be.” He flexed his knuckles on the hilt of his wand. “I can call you Weasley, if you prefer. I warn you, it’ll be miserably confusing in the Tower.”

“Draco—”

“I call her ‘Granger’ because that’s what I call her.”

“That’s a joke, right?”

“Because that’s what I call her,” he said, “and no one else.”

Ron broke off, frowning, and turned back to the lake.

“I see,” he said. “So it’s like. A pet name.”

“Something like that.”

She was Hermione to her fellow students, and Miss Granger to her teachers. Granger, in Gryffindor Tower, meant he was calling her name. And when he paid attention, he could see her posture change when it was him calling: a spine straightened, a habitual glance in the direction of his call.

“So when you guys are like, alone together, in the common room,” Ron said, apropos of nothing, “when we all come back from dinner, and you're holed up at one of those desks in the window, or whispering over something in the library — or like, when you two come back from patrol, and you're snickering together about something — what are you two talking about?" He swallowed. "Is it prefect stuff?"

"Sometimes."

"But not always?"

"We do have recreational conversations. For practice."

"About what?"

"Quoting an esteemed intellect: that's a joke, isn't it?"

"I mean in general. Like, whenever there's a plan, it always seems like you two have sorted it out yourselves beforehand," said Ron, aggrieved, "and got on the same page about it, and then you both come in on the same side of the argument, and then you win. So I have to assume you're talking about all that when you're off by yourselves, right? Like, are you working on Defense Club stuff, or homework…?"

"We talk about a number of things. She and I spend quite a bit of time together."

"Yeah," said Ron, "see, I'd noticed that."

Two drops peeled from one of the candles and splattered on the flagstone, forming a quivering lemniscate.

"Are you together, then?" Ron said bracingly.

"No."

It was a truth only by technicality, and it must have sounded like it, for Ron's mouth flattened.

“But you want to be, don’t you?”

“That’s none of your business.”

“For fuck’s sake, Draco. Just answer the question.”

“What’s between her and me—”

“Is as confusing as it is bloody obvious. So why don’t you do us a favor and be straight about it, because if you’re messing her around —”

“Messing her around?”

“—I’ll box your ears for you. I’m serious! What are you playing at?”

“You’re far out of line—”

“—turning it on and off with her all the time, like you only fancy her when people aren’t looking—”

“If you were anyone else, I would hex you blind for the insult of saying that.” He wanted to; he could scarcely hear over his heartbeat in his ears. “If you were anyone else, I would have terminated this conversation long, long ago. I’ve endured it, because you have a claim on far more of my patience than most, but even that claim has limits.”

“Why, thank you, sire, for the great gift of your patience! I didn’t realize it was so trying for you to just bloody say you liked her!”

“I warn you again that you are wildly out of line.”

“You can’t. You actually can’t, can you? That’s hysterical. You’ve been welded to her side for years, and you can’t even stand on two feet and say you fancy her. I can’t fucking understand it. Are you trying to have it both ways? Is that it? Do you actually fancy her, or are you just faffing around with her while you sort out what you want?”

He surged forward, carried on the blind wave of an urge to grip Ron by his collar and shake him. Ron stepped back from instinct, but steeled and held his ground.

“Shut up. You haven’t any idea what you’re talking about.”

“No? Because I know what it looks like. It looks like you’re all over her until someone asks you what you’re actually doing, and then it’s mum’s the word, and frankly, mate, she deserves more—”

“I refuse to let you instruct me on what she deserves.” His hand coiled around his wand, tight to the point of pain.

“Why not? It’s not hard! She deserves someone who’s proud to be with her, same as anybody—”

His wand snickered out of its sheath and angled at the ground between them. Ron stared at it.

The part of his mind responsible for eloquence had departed to join the part that was shrieking giddily for violence.

“Shut the fuck up,” he said, less evenly than he would have liked. “My regard for Hermione Granger, if you’d like to know — pride doesn’t — it hardly touches the surface of it.”

“Yeah? Great! You’re mad for her. What’s your problem, then?”

“Presently,” he said, sneering, “it’s that you think you’re entitled to know what’s between us. And that you’ve interpreted your confusion as a right to berate me for not making it simple enough for you to understand it.”

Ron wheeled on him. “Right! There it is!” he shouted. “Because I don’t get it, do I? That’s me! Ron doesn’t get it, he’s too slow and common to reach the glorious heights of you and her—”

“Spare me the tears of Saint Ronald the Martyr. Do you ever tire of playing the victim?”

“Maybe I am! You ever think of that? Or of me, at all? After five years of living my sodding life two steps behind you, have you, Draco Malfoy, even once stopped and thought: ‘Wow, I wonder how Ron feels’?”

“Why wonder, when you so readily make it everyone else’s problem?”

“Because you two are so preoccupied with each other you wouldn’t notice if my head exploded!”

“Like fuck. You love feeling sorry for yourself; that’s what this is, and now you’re being an arse over nothing—”

“That’s a lie!” shouted Ron. His eyes blazed like blue fire. “But that’s a lie, and you know it is, you know it’s not ‘nothing’—”

“And what if it’s not?” he spat. He took a savage pleasure in the way Ron recoiled. “Whose business would that be but hers and mine?”

“Because you’re not the only one here with feelings!”

Draco opened his mouth for a denial, but it was stifled by a swell of anger that rose, unbidden, from a deep well inside himself he hadn’t even known. “If you’re talking about yourself,” he said, with strained evenness, “then yes, it’s obvious that you fancy her. What isn’t obvious is why you think that has anything to do with me.”

“Come off it.”

“Do you imagine that if it weren’t for me, she’d be fawning over you? That I’m standing in your way? As if I’ve somehow — what, absorbed the feelings that ought to have been for you? By existing? I do hate to tell you, but if all that stopped her from requiting your feelings was the existence of another person in her orbit, it seems even your wildest fantasies can’t imagine her feeling much for you.”

“Fuck off!”

“Alternatively,” he said, with a mounting edge, “you might think that I’ve spoiled your chances. Did I prevent you from making a go of it? Have I stopped you from laying it on thick whenever she gives you a morsel of attention? Do you think it's somehow my fault it hasn't worked?”

Ron ducked like he’d been clocked on the jaw.

“If Hermione Granger wanted you,” said Draco, through the vise of anger in his chest, “then she’d have you. And either you're just as much a coward as I am, or you already asked her, and she said no.”

Ron took a sharp breath and turned his back on him. The wind kicked up high and cold across the field. The trees moaned.

“So she did reject you, then.”

More wind whistled in the leaves.

“Is that why you're angry at me?” he said, faintly mocking. “Oh, that's very good. You know you're not entitled to be pissed at her for rejecting you, so you're going after the next acceptable target.”

“Shut up, Draco.”

“I'm right, aren't I?”

“That's not what this is about.”

“Don't bother. I've been your scapegoat for years. I know what it feels like.”

Ron nodded, eerily calm.

“You're a fat hypocrite,” he said, voice brittle. “You know that? You get up on your soapbox and tell me off like I’m this prize arsehole because I’m jealous over a girl I fancy. But you’re just as furious at me as I am at you. And you don’t even have a reason to be jealous, because you know she likes you back.”

“I never had any problem with you. You started the row.”

“You can’t stand the idea of me being competition for you.”

“You're not competition for me. It isn't a game.”

“Because it’s not enough for her to like you. It has to be bloody impossible for her to like anyone else. That’s how jealous you are. So you go off at me like I’m an idiot for thinking I could even be her second choice. Which I am, by the way.” His voice took on an edge. “You don’t know the half of what’s there, between Hermione and me.”

“I know most of it has to do with your ego.” Draco’s tone dropped to its chillest register. He ignored a wave of fascinated repugnance at everything that’s there. “The only reason you care about being ‘second’ is because it makes you feel superior. If it were a difference between having her and not having her, ‘second choice’ wouldn’t be any comfort.”

Ron jerked away from him. “Yeah,” he said bleakly. “Well. When you’re never first choice for anything, you have to take what you can get.”

Before Draco could formulate a reply, Ron had stormed out of the Room in a snap of robes.

February brought light snows, fierce winds, and a rainfall of articles in the Prophet about skirmishes in the North.

The terrorist organization calling itself ‘Order of the Phoenix’ continued to protest the Runcorn administration with attacks on muggles in Liverpool and Manchester; Thorfinn Rowle, Director of the DMLE, arrested no less than seven different wizards for connections with the group. A Special Commission for the Suppression of Domestic Unrest was formed, at Runcorn’s orders, under the command of Odin Davies, whose daughter Tracey enjoyed a few days of acute celebrity in the castle as a consequence. She was twice invited to the staff table to dine with Umbridge and Cassius.

Hermione read the papers and set them on fire in quick succession — somewhat dismaying the third year to whom they belonged. But to her visible frustration, she could not consign the whole school's stock of newspapers to the kindling pile.

Nor, in Draco's opinion, should she. "You won't stop anyone by ordering them not to read it," he murmured, watching her shred Daphne's copy of the Prophet vigorously and in full view of some ogling first years. (Daphne whimpered, and Hermione begrudgingly surrendered to her the Style section.) "You'll only make Potter seem afraid of the truth."

"He's not afraid of the truth. I'm afraid of liars."

"Too bad he isn't. I'll tell you what: if you want to help him, make him stop defending the Order in public. He could stand not to sound like Robespierre every time the subject comes up."

"Didn't he basically bite your head off for suggesting it?"

"Oh, yes. I just hope he's smarter than to try biting off yours."

It would have been easier for Harry, Draco thought, if he would denounce the Order, or at least shut up about it. Instead, he said loudly and to anyone that would listen what he believed — that is, the truth — that the Prophet had used the Order for what were in fact Death Eater activities, and that none of the seven arrests were guilty of what the Prophet alleged. Because he could not provide any evidence for this without revealing Order secrets, he failed to be particularly convincing even to those few students that listened to him inquisitively and in good faith; and, failing to convince them, he began to appear in public increasingly like the devoted lunatic that the Ministry supposed him to be.

Which might not have bothered them, if it had not diminished attendance at Defense Club. The loyal members came every week, through rain, shine, or detention; but some of the younger students from Hufflepuff and Ravenclaw had peeled off, deterred either by Harry's own apparent fidelity to a terrorist organization or by Umbridge's persistent targeting of anyone associated with him.

"You might," Hermione said, hesitantly, "consider pretending — only for the others' benefit—"

"But it wouldn't be 'for their benefit,' would it?" said Harry. He did not lift his eyes from his reading. "It'd be for mine."

"Well, yes. It might also make things easier for you. Is that really so bad?"

"I will not tell lies," said Harry. He turned a page of his book.

It was nature: he was pathologically incapable of turning his back on anything that he loved. In return, the place he loved turned its back on him.

Crowds shifted away from him when he moved down the hallways. Conversations dwindled at his approach, or sank into whispers. No one sat with him, or even near him, except for those who belonged to the Defense Club — though because of the danger of being seen together, they would often pass him by. A small contingent of first years continued to wear Potter's Army armbands until a new Educational Decree amended the uniform code to ban political symbolism. It was, the Decree concluded, a 'distraction.'

One morning, an owl swept down over Harry's breakfast and dropped a dead sparrow on the table. Its throat had been cut.

Cho screamed.

"What is that?" Hermione said sharply. She leapt to her feet and drew her wand. "Who sent it? Harry, don't touch it, it could be jinxed."

“There’s a note,” said Harry dully. He prodded a scrap of parchment tied to its leg with his knife. In jagged, almost illegible font, it read:

VIKTOR KRUM

Draco whipped out his wand and with a brisk motion set the bird on fire. The flames crumpled it quickly beyond recognition, but even as the creature withered to a heap of ash, the image burned healthy and well in his mind’s eye.

Cho was still shrieking, although it had broken into a sort of muffled sob into her hands. Harry stared at it, expressionless.

“Everyone’s scared,” said Ron.

“That doesn’t help. Ow.” Harry clapped a hand to his forehead.

“Harry? What’s wrong?”

“It’s fine,” he spat. “I’ll do more Occlumency. It’s fine.”

Cho said nothing for the rest of breakfast. But she came to the next Defense meeting, and the next, and the next. She focused on charmwork, which she was good at, and complex defensive enchantments, runic circles and so forth, the likes of which Hermione took great pride in. But her dueling skills remained weak. Even the broadest openings in an opponent’s guard failed to lure her on the offensive. In matches against Draco, she retreated by the tenth second, and surrendered by the thirtieth.

Like Harry, hers was a problem of nature: she was a seeker, nimble and fleet-footed, but not particularly aggressive. She wasn’t a beater, who played the whole game with an eye to causing harm; nor a chaser, who had to scramble and fight for control of the ball; nor a keeper, trained to stand her ground against enemies soaring at her at the speed of pain. She was trained to wait for the opportune moment, but if the moment didn’t come, she would hover forever.

When Harry asked after her mother, she bit her lip.

“She wants to pull me out,” she admitted. “Reckons it’s not safe here. In England, I mean, not just at Hogwarts. She wants me to finish out at Beauxbatons.”

“You’re leaving?”

“No. I told her I wouldn't go,” said Cho stoutly. “Not even if she told me to. I — I’m not Zachariah.” The boy had stopped coming to Defense Club meetings after January’s spate of Educational Decrees.

“You shouldn’t stay just for me,” Harry protested. “If you’re not safe — if you’ve got anywhere else to go, Cho — you probably should.”

“You want me to leave?”

“No, I’d be miserable, but I don’t want you to row with your mum over me, and if she’s right—”

“So you and the Weasleys are the only ones who get to make sacrifices? I don’t see you telling anyone else to get lost!”

“I’d rather no one make sacrifices, actually!” said Harry angrily. “It’s not a contest to see who can hurt themselves the most!”

“Do you think I haven’t? Because this year hasn’t been a cakewalk, Harry!”

“Yeah! I noticed that! Believe it or not, I’m aware that being around me is a pretty raw deal! And if you were sick of it, I’d understand!”

“I told you, I want to stay, but I don’t want to stay if you don’t want me to!”

“Maybe I don’t want you to!”

“Fine!”

She snatched up her bag and stormed out of the Room of Requirement. Hermione sighed, and got up to close the door behind her.

Evening Potions meant the day’s last hours of sunlight were sacrificed to the subterranean darkness of the dungeons. They had a double block with the Ravenclaws, but Cho was noticeably absent, meaning that her usual Potions partner, Marietta, moved over to sit with Neville — usually by himself — instead. Neville was so glad to have a partner he seemed not to mind one who spent the block shooting glares at Harry.

Hermione cracked open the book and slid it over to her side of the desk without waiting for his say-so. He unsheathed the cleaver and sharpened it with a few whisks of the whetstone, giving its blade a hair-fine gleam.

“Powdered moonstone?” said Hermione, poking her wand at the burner. A neat jet of blue flames leapt the gap and took up a cheerful residence under the cauldron.

“Measured. Do you have the stirring wand?”

“Mm.”

He passed the silver cradle of moonstone over and placed it on her side of the desk, avoiding her outstretched hand. Hermione looked at him.

“What?”

“Nothing,” she said, after a moment. She slipped an elastic from her wrist and began tying her hair up. The scent of her shampoo fell out of the dark rolls of hair, infecting the steam from their cauldron. He turned his head away and considered the far wall, where Harry and Ron's cauldron had already begun to gush smoke like an industrial chimney. The smell failed to dissipate.

Their cauldron hissed and bloomed purple smoke, and she leapt up, swearing loudly, while Snape peered over from where he was siphoning Neville's cauldron, and scorched the back of Draco's neck with his stare.

The class concluded without incident, and Snape gave inspections for the few students who had completed their potions. Draco's and Hermione's received not one word of comment, which was incredible praise. Neville's was the wrong purple, and issuing far too much smoke, but remarkably not, in fact, dangerous to ingest; Seamus's had been Vanished to preserve the structural integrity of the classroom.

Last, Snape peered into the dubious contents of Harry and Ron's effort.

"Tell me, Potter," said Snape, "can you read?"

"So I thought, sir," said Harry.

"Read the third line of the instructions."

With exaggerated lethargy, Harry hauled open his book. He held it open in front of his face.

"Out loud," snarled Snape, through a chorus of tittering. Draco massaged his temple, contemplating the difficulties of scheduling Defense Club if a quarter of its staff were dead.

"'Add powdered moonstone, stir three times counterclockwise, let simmer for seven minutes, then add two drops of hellebore syrup.'"

"Did you do everything on the third line, Potter?"

"...No."

“What was that?”

“No,” said Harry loudly. “But you know what, sir—”

Before he could finish this loud cry for punishment, the door creaked, and Umbridge stepped into the classroom.

Snape straightened.

“Dolores.”

“Severus.”

Hermione twisted around. “What’s she doing?” she hissed.

“Did I interrupt your class?” said Umbridge sweetly. “I had so hoped I wouldn’t.”

“Evidently not enough to consult a schedule,” said Snape.

Harry appeared to be wrestling with the moral dilemma of his lifetime.

“Goodness. How busy. Well,” said Umbridge, “I hate to say this in front of the class, but I am afraid that the Ministry regulations do not permit Potions to be taught in unventilated classrooms. We will be relocating you to the fourth fl—”

“Class is dismissed,” said Snape.

The screech of chairs and chitter of books swallowed whatever she was going to say. Umbridge glowered at him, which Snape returned with a dead-eyed stare.

Harry and Ron were lingering by the door, which clicked shut behind Draco and Hermione.

“What are you waiting f—”

Harry pressed a finger to his lips, and lifted one of the twins' Extendable Ears.

"...inform him that you are deliberately preventing a Ministry employee from conducting Ministry business! Which is, as I am sure you know — given your previous acquaintance with the criminal justice system, Severus — is a misdemeanor!"

"You are asking for information that I do not have." Snape's voice was droll, slow, and condescended so severely it could have been addressed to an infant. "And if I did have it, I wonder that you mistake me for your informant."

"You were more than happy to tell me before—"

"An anonymous article pertaining to the whereabouts of a dangerous man. Locating your headmaster, however, who keeps an office in this castle—"

Ron stifled a cough. Hermione whacked him on the arm, wide-eyed, her ear flush to the door.

"You deny, then, any knowledge of a connection between them?"

"I deny any knowledge of what you're talking about," said Snape dryly, with the intrigue of someone counting lint pieces. "I 'deny' any part in this conversation. I was inducted into it by your delusions, and they remain my sole connection."

"You are lying! I know you are lying! Where is Albus Dumbledore? What is he doing when he leaves the school?"

"Savoring his limited time away from the faculty, presumably."

"Don't talk back to me, you— you—"

"Careful. I am not one of your students."

Umbridge heaved for breath. “You are under my jurisdiction as Special Inquisitor. And in fact you will find it most convenient to do what I want, in any case, because otherwise,” she said, so eager she stammered, “otherwise—”

“Otherwise, you will relieve me of the post of Potions Master,” said Snape silkily. “Every night, I say a little prayer.”

“You doubt my nerve?”

“Worse. Your judgment. You know my students’ scores, Dolores.” It was matter-of-fact, indifferent. “You may find a replacement caretaker. Wilhelmina will undoubtedly surpass the mongrel’s efforts in Care of Magical Creatures. You might even succeed in replacing Sibyl, if you triumph over Minerva’s appeal to the Board; but these are soft subjects. Remove your Potions Master three months from the exam, and you may have the privilege of explaining to the Board why a full cohort has failed their N.E.W.T. in Potions.”

“You academics always think you are irreplaceable,” she trilled furiously. “You are cheap, overpaid, under-managed recreants who think the fact that you read lots of big books makes you special. But you are not special! And you are not important! Not you, not Minerva, not Filius, and not your little ringleader, Dumbledore—”

“The colloquial term is ‘employer.’”

“I’m not talking about your job.”

A pause.

“Are you… attempting… to accuse me of something?”

“Only that you spend more time with Albus Dumbledore than anyone alive. Anything a jury would believe of him,” she said, with relish, “and anything they believed of Sirius Black, they would happily believe of you.”

“I rather doubt it,” said Snape blithely. “Sirius Black is a murderer and terrorist. Besides, to convict him, you would have to lay hands on him. Which, in candor, is not something I am convinced your administration can do.”

“No thanks to you!”

“I have twice offered you information on his whereabouts. It is not my fault you cannot seem to make use of it.”

Harry made a noise. Hermione clapped her hand over his mouth.

“Those leads were cold,” she snapped. “As I begin to suspect you knew! Fletcher knew nothing. His mind was gone.”

“I did warn you about the dangers of overusing Veritaserum.”

“He never had any! His memory had been tampered with! By whom, I do not wonder!”

“Then you should have been subtler in approaching him,” said Snape sharply. “The Order is not a group of fools. They are as capable of memory charms as anyone else.”

“So are most spies,” spat Umbridge. “And I suppose you would have the most reason to use them. After all, who knows what Fletcher might have revealed about you, Severus?”

Snape did not reply at first.

At length, he said: “Would you permit a question, Dolores?”

“I would.”

“If you believe me to be the traitor you suggest,” said Snape softly, “may I ask why you consider it a good idea to threaten me?”

Hermione shivered and tightened her grip on Harry.

The click of heels was their only warning. They scrambled back around the corner as Umbridge burst from the Potions classroom, her shoes making a swift staccato of rage up the steps.

The echoes had scarcely faded when Harry gave a strangled cry, and Ron seized him by the elbow. “Private,” he blurted, “we’ve got to get somewhere private—”

“NO! Gerroff me, I’m going to the Owlery—”

“Bloody well not, you idiot, they’re watching the post—”

“Then the Floo! Or I’ll go to Hogsmeade—”

“They shut the Floo, and don’t be a moron — Hermione, we need to get him a room—”

“The undercroft,” she said. “Here.”

In the torchlit vault, Harry was hustled in and shoved down on a makeshift chair of a barrel covered in a dusty sheet. Hermione hauled the door close and swept a route of protective enchantments over them, her Muffliato simultaneous with Harry’s shout.

“He told her! Slimy, filthy fucking snivelling snake, he told her about Sirius—”

“We don’t know that, Potter.”

“He said so! Do you want it in writing?”

“He only said he gave her information,” Hermione cut in urgently, “which could mean anything. It could be lies—”

“She said his name! ‘Sirius Black,’ you all heard her—”

“She could have been making a point!” she cried. “She could have been — extemporizing!”

“No, I reckon she’s right,” said Ron, his voice even despite the considerable effort it was taking to pin Harry down. “It tracks. Snape fed her information about him — because, no shit, he fucking hates him — and she suspects Dumbledore’s working with Black, so now she’s plumbing him for stuff on Dumbledore.”

“Yes! Exactly! Thank you, Ron, now get the hell off—”

“But you still need to have a sit and think, mate.”

“Fuck sitting here! I’m going to warn him he’s been betrayed — betrayed again—”

“He might not be. You don’t know what he told her. Snape’s a double-agent,” Draco said, his voice breaking loud and harsh over the din. Harry glared at him, chest heaving. “Spreading false information is his job. I’ll bet you my last galleon he was instructed to feed Umbridge false information to throw her off Dumbledore’s scent.”

“Yes, and Harry, think about it,” Hermione added eagerly. “What about Mundungus? Remember? Mundungus Fletcher, who disappeared? Moody himself said he was probably the mole! The only thing we really know is that Umbridge suspects Sirius and Dumbledore both of being involved with the Order, which Dung easily could have told her.”

“Dumbledore trusts Snape,” said Draco.

“I’m not Dumbledore!” Harry roared. “I don’t know why he does things, or what he wants — never explains himself to anyone, definitely not to me—”

“Because you’re fifteen,” Hermione cried, her worry overwhelmed now by exasperation. “God! I love you, Harry, but why would he explain to you? You’re a fifteen-year-old! A student!”

“Don’t pretend any of this is normal, Hermione!” he shouted back. “I’m not ‘some fifteen-year-old’! Dumbledore stuck me in a safehouse because he didn’t trust the Dursleys to protect me from people he knew wanted me dead, but he won’t explain why he keeps one of them in his fucking pocket—”

“But you know why! Be sensible! He keeps Snape around because he’s a double-agent, and even if he wanted to get rid of him, it’d be far too dangerous, considering how much he knows about the Order! Which Dumbledore must have assumed you would understand without being told, seeing as you’ve been living with spies for months now, and in the off chance you didn’t Not to mention there’s a perfectly decent chance that Voldemort can quite literally read your mind!”

“Don’t say it,” said Draco and Ron, sharply, at once. They glared at each other. Hermione rolled her eyes.

“Fine. ‘The Dark Lord’ might be able to read your mind. Making you, frankly, the last person anybody should tell their war secrets. And if you try to contact Sirius now, the Ministry will follow you straight to the Order.”

“Snape wants him dead,” Harry said doggedly, ignoring her. “Sirius. You know he does. He’s tried to kill him before. Am I the only one who cares about that?”

Ron made a noncommittal sound and shifted his weight, looking at the floor. Harry set his jaw.

“Were you under the impression that everyone in an army had to like each other?” Draco said curtly. “Severus Snape has been a faithful and useful servant of your cause for sixteen years. Would that Sirius Black could say as much.”

“Sirius is my godfather.”

“Snape’s mine. Which by any accounting ought to privilege my opinion about this over thirty seconds of eavesdropping.”

Hermione crouched in front of Harry and took his hands. He gazed down at her with a wild guilt.

“I understand,” she said calmly. “You want to protect him. But tearing off to find him will draw attention, no matter what you do. You have to find a way to trust Snape.”

“I don’t trust him.”

“Then the whole Order’s shot,” she said, without missing a beat, “and we might as well give up, shall we? Seeing as Voldemort knows everything.”

With an answerless groan, Harry bent and pressed his forehead to their clasped hands.

“He’s going to die.”

“He’s not going to die.”

“He’s going to get himself killed.”

“No, he won’t.”

“You don’t know that.”

Hermione drew back her hands, forcing him to look at her.

“Harry Potter, I happen to know everything,” she said, in a nasal, shrill register. “I read all about it in Hogwarts: A History.”

Harry hung his head and broke into a weak laugh, bracing his elbows on his knees.

“If he hurts Sirius,” he said, “I’m gonna kill him.”

Hermione glanced at Ron. Something passed between them. Ron moved his head at her and gestured shortly with his hand.

She read something in his movements that answered her question, because she smiled a small and reassuring smile.

Draco turned away and folded his arms, stinging with a resentment that had no object, for envy of something he couldn't even name.

"I hope it won't come to that," said Hermione. She stood up. "The best thing you can do for Sirius right now is to focus on your Occlumency."

Harry grunted an unenthusiastic response. But he clambered up and followed the others from the undercroft, quiet, as per usual.

With night opaque and mirrored on the window-panes, Draco descended into the dark well of the Entrance Hall. Echoes of the bells sounding a nine o'clock curfew faded into the drafty fathoms above him, and torchlight made rippling masks of the oil paintings that walled the stair. He lit his wand and leaned on the banister at the foot of the stairwell. The many Educational Decrees sprouted above and around the notice-board like a white and flaking skin of mold.

Hermione was ten minutes late for patrol. He cast Nox and practiced his impression of a patient man.

He heard her footsteps before he saw her. She came whirling down the stairs with her hair wrenched up around a quill, lilting perilously from its hold.

"Sorry! Sorry, sorry. I had to change."

"You changed your shirt," he said, "for a patrol?"

"Yes." She stuck her wand between her teeth while she finished pinning up her hair. Strays drifted around her temples, charmingly tousled, an effect her flush did nothing to help. Her face was shiny.

“May I ask why?”

“Spilled on it.” She rolled up her cuffs, revealing a pair of dainty wrists, a bandaged hand. “Ron knocked over one of my Everfull Inkwells, and you can imagine the mess.”

“Why was he using them?”

She glanced at him oddly. “He wasn’t. We were just talking. Anyway, I hope you don’t mind the delay. I know you don’t like to be kept waiting, but I was really covered in it—”

“I was hardly going to code you for an inkstain.”

“I wasn’t worried,” she said, stilted, “about being coded. It’s just that I like being — presentable.”

He let the point drop with a shrug of his shoulder. Hermione plunged a hand elbow-deep in her bag and emerged gripping the soft, aging folds of the Marauder’s Map. “I have an idea,” she said triumphantly.

The corner of his mouth pulled up. “When don’t you?”

“I was trying to think of a way to spy on Theodore Nott — and Warrington, ideally — when I remembered that we already had one. The Map tells us at a glance whether they’re on school grounds, and if so, where they are, albeit with the exception of places the Marauders didn’t plot, like the Room of Requirement, but how many of those can there be? Anyway, I borrowed the Map from Harry and spent a few nights going over it before I went to sleep—”

“Define ‘sleep.’”

“—and what do you know?” she said, fiercely satisfied. “Theodore Nott is almost always out of bed after curfew.”

He tilted his head, immediately ill-at-ease. “Based on your tone, I don’t suppose he’s dutifully executing his Inquisitor patrols.”

“Alone?” she said smugly. “At two in the morning? In the same place every night? Impossible to say.”

His intrigue sharpened. “Where is he going alone?”

“That’s the funny part. He’s not meeting anyone. He just floats around the second-floor corridor. See? He’s there now.” She leaned close and pointed to the Map. A black dot labeled THEODORE NOTT was trundling steadily up the page, footsteps winking swiftly in and out of sight. He followed its trajectory, but the corridor ahead of it terminated in a wall.

“What’s he visiting on the second floor?”

“My first question,” she agreed. “At first I thought he was using a hidden room, and that’s why the Map didn’t show him leaving, so during yesterday’s lunch I went to have a look—”

“One of these days you might spend a meal period actually eating.”

“Terribly inefficient things, meals,” she said brightly, “never really got into them. Anyway, I conducted a thorough search for passages behind all the portraits and tapestries — let me tell you, some of them did not fancy being moved — but unfortunately most of it’s useless. The only way out besides the staircase is a passage behind the tapestry of Witch Lingad the Pink, and I doubt Theodore’s interested in it.”

“Why? Where does it go?”

“Gryffindor Tower,” she replied. “A possibility I dismissed for obvious reasons, and judging by your expression, I expect you agree — unless there’s something going on between him and Daphne?”

Draco did not know what his expression did then, but Hermione laughed awkwardly.

“Right. Er, no. I didn’t think so. I just remembered that she fancied him, for a while, and you mentioned he might have been a bit soft on her—”

“They’re not romantically involved. They are also not, strictly speaking, platonically involved,” he said, quelling the instinctive nausea of discussing Daphne’s love life. “She hasn’t talked to him in months. And she hadn’t a clue about Warrington.”

“I thought so, but I had to check. You’d be surprised how clever she can be about keeping secrets. Anyway, the only other place I can think he’d go is the Defense Against the Dark Arts classroom.” She pointed to the tiny indicated door. “To meet with Umbridge, you see. But she isn’t there. So I’m forced to conclude he’s doing something else.”

“And you,” he said tiredly, “want to go find out what it is.”

She was already tucking the Map into her pocket. “It’s an unmissable opportunity, Draco. The castle’s empty, we know exactly where he is, Harry gave me the Invisibility Cloak, and if he tries anything, there’s two of us. Besides, don’t you want to know what he’s doing?”

“Have you ever contemplated the phrase ‘looking for trouble’?”

“Yes, often,” she said primly. “I understand it to be the definition of ‘patrol.’ Are you coming?”

He was, though not without grievances, which he made known by pointedly taking the Map from her. He also forced her to wear the Cloak by herself, so that their joined volume would not lift the hem, which drew a predictable slew of objections.

On the second floor he put out his wandlight and cast charms to muffle the sound of his feet, then crept in the sliver of shadow directly beneath the torches, where darkness pooled in the edges of the halls. A Disillusionment Charm was always helped by poor light, and his Disillusionment wasn't quite as good as Hermione's: a fact she had no reservations about pointing out.

"...reason you ought to wear the Cloak, I can practically see you. Your refraction index is atrocious; this is just silly—"

"Do keep your voice down, Granger dear. You're the loudest spy I've ever heard."

"First, not true, we've both met Tonks," she retorted in a very loud whisper. "Second, it won't matter if he hears me, because he's going to see you coming up the stairs—"

"And what do you want me to do about it?"

"Put the Cloak on! And let me cast a spell we both know very well I'm better at!"

"No," he said.

"Why not?"

"Because then he might see you."

She gave an irritated huff that was so Hermione he could practically see the motion of her lips.

"You're sneaking up on a man who works for a Death Eater," he muttered. "Indulge me in the fantasy that you're taking it seriously."

He checked a corner, first with the Map, then with his own eyes, and stepped around it carefully. The second-floor corridor branched off from the mouth of the staircase. Moonlight from the castle windows carved pale ellipses on the stone. A row of tapestries depicting the wizarding theater of the English Civil War wafted gently in the evening chill. The Map dutifully reported Theo's location in a small room behind one of the doors on the right.

“I do take it seriously,” she said, in a different tone. “I have to. I just don’t want to be scared of everything.”

“Then I’ll have to do it for you,” he said tautly, and held out the Map wordlessly. Her thin hand, dappled in torchlight, appeared disembodied from the gloom to take it; she hesitated, and then the hood rippled back, revealing her small bright face in a shrine of curls, floating.

“Why?” she said. Her eyes searched his. “I mean it. Why? Between this, and the phoenix tears, and what you said on the train, about it being easy. Why?”

He stared at her.

“You know why.”

“No. I mean, I know what you mean. But that’s not an answer,” she said, brows furrowing. “Lots of people fancy someone, and that isn’t… that. It’s a different thing.”

“I wouldn’t know the difference,” he said.

Her brows furrowed more, but there was a sharp noise behind him and he whirled around. It came again: a muted BANG, metal on metal, followed by a muffled shrill of a woman’s voice.

“Who’s he with?” Hermione hissed, whisking back against the wall. “Who’s that woman? I didn’t see her when we were coming.”

“I don’t know; check the Map. He’s in that room there, you can see the light under the door.”

“But he can’t possibly be in there, it’s a girls’ bathroom, and — oh, idiot!” She was vehement. “Idiot, idiot! I’m such an idiot!”

“What, for Merlin’s sake?”

“That’s Myrtle’s bathroom!” she whispered, showing him the Map. “She’s in there, too!”

A dot labeled MYRTLE WARREN floated next to, nearly intersecting, THEODORE NOTT.

“Wonderful, explains everything. Why the fuck is he talking to Moaning Myrtle?”

“Probably because she won’t bloody leave him alone. As for the bathroom, it’s the least-traveled room in the castle. Remember when we brewed a potion in there for a month and nobody cared?”

Another loud noise jarred them. Hermione brushed past Draco eagerly and pressed close to the door. He grimaced and followed her. The voices from inside the bathroom pitched into earshot.

“...horrid little boys barge in here and bash it all to pieces! Some thanks for helping you...”

“You haven’t,” said Theo, his voice ragged. “You haven’t helped me. If anything, you’ve made things worse.”

“Don’t say that,” cried Myrtle. “You asked me… I told you the answer… I’ve only been helpful…”

“Oh, choke on it. The one helpful thing you ever did for me was die, and you’re still fucking useless, at that.” Another BANG. Something shattered.

“Don’t be mean,” she wailed. “I’ve got it bad enough already… at least you’re alive, you can leave… in fact, leave me alone, why don’t you…”

“Did your brain die with the rest of you? Does it look like I want to be here?” Footsteps crunched over something; shards, probably. “I’m done for tonight. This place had better not be fucking flooded again tomorrow, Warren. Or I’ll give you something to really cry about.”

Draco recognized what was about to happen with perhaps four seconds to spare. He wrenched Hermione away from the door, hauled her around, and pinned her against the wall. He ripped the Invisibility Cloak up and over both of them, drawing the hood tight over both their heads. Hermione gasped and he slapped his hand over her mouth.

The door to the bathroom burst open, and Theo strode out, the glow of a spell still fading from his wand-tip. His robe was missing, leaving him in shirtsleeves and a pullover, both of which were soaked. His hair stood up from its coif like raised hackles and his face, dripping wet, was set in a tight vise of fury. He checked the hallway with a short, impatient jerk of his head in both directions, then stalked off for the stairs.

Hermione exhaled. The hot air rushed over his fingers. Draco eased his hand off her mouth, palm hot.

“Sorry. Did that hurt?”

“No. It’s fine,” she said faintly. “Good reflexes.”

He nodded.

“We should,” she said. “Look in the bathroom. For evidence.”

“Right.”

Neither moved.

Inhaling, she laid her hands flush to his chest and gently pushed. He stepped back, letting the Cloak wilt from his shoulders and pool on the floor.

But the bathroom was a disappointment twice over. Inside there was nothing but a few chipped sinks, a shattered toilet, Theo’s ostensible victims, and a two-inch layer of water on the floor. A broken faucet sprayed. Myrtle was gone.

They probed around, trying to disturb as little as possible, before giving up and retreating to the hallway. Hermione shut the door behind her, wiping water from her cheek. “That was rather useless,” she murmured, clearly upset about it. “We hardly got any information. Except that Theodore apparently spends his nights berating ghosts.” She shook out the cloak and folded it over her arm to tuck it back in the bag.

“That’s not strictly true. We know he asked her something. And he didn’t like the answer.”

“Yes, but what did he ask Myrtle?” she said absently. “I suppose we could just ask her, couldn’t we…? But then she might tell him we did, and I don’t want him knowing we followed him.”

“I agree. And I strongly suspect he asked how she died.”

She blinked at him. “How do you figure?”

“Because it’s the only interesting thing that ever happened to Myrtle Warren,” he said, ignoring her disapproving noise, “and because he said it was the only helpful thing she ever did for him.”

“But Myrtle doesn’t know how she died,” said Hermione thoughtfully. “No one does. She’s listed in The Ghosts of Hogwarts Castle, seventy-fourth edition, under ‘unknown cause of death.’ The section on her just says there was a ‘tragic accident’ in 1943 — oh, relax, I didn’t memorize it. I looked her up when she kept bothering us in third year.”

“Thank Merlin.”

She smirked and lifted her chin. “Could’ve fooled you, couldn’t I?”

“Appalled me, more like.” He leaned his forearm on the wall beside her.

Hermione grinned wider. Then her eyes shifted down his face, and her grin faded. She wet her lips, as if to say something, and didn't. The torchlight rippled over her skin like the shadows of tide underwater.

He wanted to kiss her so badly it was dizzying. To snog the haughtiness out of her, however many years it took.

"What you said on the train," she said timidly, interrupting his thoughts. "Did you still… want… to talk about it?"

He looked at her. She was staring pointedly at his chest and twisting the strap of her bag within an inch of its life.

"That depends," he said slowly, "on whether you still think I shouldn't say certain things to you."

"I do."

"Then this is going to be difficult."

She nodded, dropping her chin.

"I just don't think," she said, "that there's any room for… I mean, it probably wouldn't… for one thing, we don't have the time."

"Don't have the time?" he repeated disgustedly. "Granger, you don't sleep. Neither of us do. It isn't about time."

"Fine. It's about functionality, then. It's about making sure that, that, that we can be functional, and won't get stupid about each other whenever there's a problem, which is often, and—"

"If you don't want something," he said, with an acrid bitterness in his mouth, "have the courage to come out and say you don't want it. I've known you too long for excuses."

Her head snapped up. "It's not an excuse," she said angrily. "It's a very real, very compelling reason we shouldn't start anything together.”

“Oh, well done, then, not starting anything.”

“I hadn’t! You did!”

“On the train?”

“That was you.”

“The first time.”

She flushed dark red. “Fine, that was me,” she agreed levelly. “Which I apologized for.”

“I don’t want your apology.”

“What do you want, then?”

“Nothing you’re willing to give. And that’s fine. You never were obligated to feel anything.”

“It isn’t about what I feel! If it was only about what I wanted, we’d have done something like this ages ago!”

Something tight coiled in his chest. He hated the sour little line of unhappiness in her mouth, the furrow between her eyes.

“Would we? Really? Because when I asked you, we were friends and then we were ‘friends,’ and then we were friends that kiss each other, and finally ‘complicated friends,’ whatever that means—”

“It takes two people to have a conversation!”

“And you told me you needed time to think.”

“Is that wrong? Is it so terrible of me to want to reflect before I destroy our friendship?”

“Destroy? Are you serious? Do you really think I would?”

“No! I’m afraid of messing it up!” she snapped. “I don’t want to fail! I told you that, you just didn’t listen, because you couldn’t believe that everything might not be totally about you!”

“‘Fail’? It isn’t an exam!”

“I know that,” she snapped, blazing, “because if it were an exam, I’d be good at it, wouldn’t I?”

She stepped forward, and he caught her by the hips. She was so warm. Even through the cotton of her skirt, her skin was warm.

Hermione was still scowling at him. Her scowl faltered when he drew close enough to throw a shadow over the torchlight on her face.

“My God,” she said, “see? We can’t even talk about this without bickering. We’re both total nightmares. We’d tear each other apart.”

He didn’t listen to her. She was probably right, but he didn’t care.

“You told me to ask. Fine. I’ll ask,” he said. “What do you want, Granger?”

Hermione’s chest rose and fell. Her teeth edged her bottom lip.

“Obviously, you,” she said. It was waspish, but sincere. “As always. Regrettably.”

He kissed her. She kissed him back, angrily, with a brief clash of teeth where she seemed to be trying to bite him and kiss him at once; the white-knuckle grip of her hands in his shirt made him weak in the knees.

He had to shove himself away from her to do what he needed to do. It was quite possibly the hardest thing he had ever done, and that included flying around a dragon enclosure.

“Alright,” he said, through a buzz of want. “We’re not doing this here.”

“Not doing what? Shouting at each other? Because I’ve bad news about that,” said Hermione, with a sweet condescension that made him want to kiss her again, wretchedly, for some reason. “We’ve been doing it for the past five minutes. If there’s someone down there, they’ve had their share of evening entertainme— what are you doing?”

He tugged her by the hand up the hallway. For all her fussing, she never tried to free her hand, and by the time they reached the seventh floor, she was almost walking alongside him, keeping pace with a double-stride for each of his. The Room of Requirement bloomed from the flat wall in silent answer to his need, iron curlicues swirling around a silver doorknob that rose to meet his hand.

“What are we doing here?”

“Talking. Privately.”

“Is that it? Do you know how many broom cupboards we passed?”

“I’m not doing this in a broom cupboard.”

“Doing what?” She sounded nervous, though not half as nervous as she was cross at being left out of the loop. In this, as ever, she was utterly herself.

He hauled the door open and swept her inside. It clanged shut behind them with a safe, assuring rattle of metal.

It was his dueling chamber again, with its vaulted ceilings, and panels of floriate stained glass. The Room was a different space in the evening, a calmer one. The fire bled yellow into the room’s vault of deep blue shadow. The windows were inked in navy, laced by silver filaments of rain.

With a breath that felt like about a douse of cold water, he drew his wand and walked into the center of the room. Hermione made an angered and bewildered noise, slightly bereft, as if she had been cut off in the middle of something.

“Cast a Patronus.”

She gave a strangled noise.

“What?” she said. “Now?”

“You didn’t cast one at the meeting.”

“Because I can’t,” she muttered. “It doesn’t work when I do it. I don’t know why.”

“Let’s fix it, then.”

“What, now?”

“Draw your wand, Granger. I bet you can.”

“This is embarrassing.”

“I know,” he said. “Do it anyway.”

Tight-lipped, she drew her wand and lifted it.

“Expecto Patronum.”

Wisps fluttered from her wand like cigarette trails. She gestured with frustration.

“There. See? I did everything right, the spell was perfect, I don’t know why it didn’t work. Can we go back to what we were talking about, please?”

He circled her in slow, measured steps. She pivoted to watch him, hesitant and suspicious. Her footwork was perfect, as was her spell construction. There was nothing wrong with her form. She wouldn't have allowed it. Harry and Ron could offer nothing to correct her on, nor, frankly, would she let them. There was merely the indelible fact that it didn't work.

"Which memory do you use?"

She twitched and glanced away.

"Transfiguration class," he said resignedly. "The library. No. Worse. It's marks, isn't it? Exams? Prefect meetings."

"My Prefect letter," she said hotly, and continued, over a trumpet of triumphant laughter: "And there's nothing wrong with being proud of myself—"

"No, but you can't make a Patronus out of pride. There's a reason Potter and Ronald are good at these."

She rolled her eyes and swished her wand absently, scowling, throwing sparks. "That's wishy-washy and you know it. For a spell this useful, it's not good design to put this much stock in whether or not you get the feeling right. Magic should operate on the grounds of predictable, controlled phenomena. Scientifically, that's all a feeling is, anyway."

"Maybe," he said, privately disagreeing. Predictable and controlled did not, in his experience, tend to apply. "But you might also say that it's an animated creature, and animation requires passion. The word 'spirit' etymologically descends from the Latin word for 'breath.' The moving bellows of the body. The part that stirs."

"It's so colossally unfair," she said, "that you were tutored in Latin. It's just ridiculous."

"Structural injustice is not the reason you can't do a Patronus. Think of something that moves you."

“Hm. A train.”

“A piece of music, for example,” he said, refusing to concede his amusement. He continued to circle, and she turned her head to watch him, following curiously from her periphery. “Your parents. That beastly cat. I don’t know. Remember a moment you wanted to keep. Something you were glad to be alive for.”

She tilted her head, considering. At length, she lifted her wand and, hesitantly, swished it.

“Expecto Patronum.”

A wiggly mass of something leapt from her wand, swirled through the air, and was lost. Hermione startled.

“That was— did you see—”

“Much better. Try again.”

“But it worked,” she said, almost cross. “It shouldn’t have worked.”

“Technically, it didn’t. Do it again. Try another memory.”

“It can’t be that simple.”

“Typical you, wanting it to be harder.”

“Expecto Patronum! Oh, did you see that? It was almost there!”

“Better. Try again.”

She rolled her shoulders, feet fidgeting. Her brows tightened infinitesimally, as if she were almost in pain.

“Expecto Patronum.”

Silver unfurled from her wand in a slow billow, swirling together as if stirred by an invisible hand. A head resolved from the mist, crowned by two small, round ears; it wriggled out of the primordial fog, followed by a long, sinuous body, four short limbs, and a long, lashing tail.

“Look at that. You were right.”

Her eyes flared open. She gasped and covered her mouth.

The otter hopped across an invisible series of shelves, climbing a circuit in the air, and then dove as if through water, its body undulating in a smooth glide.

“That’s — I did it.”

“Yes.”

“That’s my Patronus,” she said softly. She was staring at it with a starstruck expression that she reserved for the increasingly rare pieces of magic that, in their wonder, overwhelmed her natural sensibility of pragmatism. “An otter.”

“As you suspected.” He twirled his wand, feigning decorum, though the corner of his mouth was bent irreparably into a smile. They watched the otter frolic cheerfully around the chandelier. “A shame Lovegood was wrong.”

“Thank you,” she said, still soft, and her head still upturned. “We are — going to be truly, horrendously late for patrol, but — thank you.”

“Do I get to know who ‘Peter’ is, now?”

“No.”

“Fine.”

The otter swirled around her shoulders, shrouding her in white mist. She giggled a little, and reached up to stroke its back, her finger passing through the silver like gossamer.

There was tension in his shoulders. He cut deep into his reserves of courage, which were usually shallow, but now opened for him beautifully, easily, as if they had been holding their contents in reserve for this moment.

He called upon a memory of heat on a wide lake in summer, lemonade pitchers in crystal glasses, her laughter, a warm breeze, a place where nothing could hurt them.

“Expecto Patronum.”

A thread of white issued from his wand, swirled, and knotted together in a weave. From this nebula of white, a pair of wings sprouted, as did a short, angular beak, and finally the twin curves of a high, heart-shaped face.

The barn owl beat its wings, twice, and then alighted into the ceiling, carving a long, glistening circuit around the room.

Hermione made a sound. He lowered his wand without looking at her. He knew the expression on her face — wide open with wonder, backlit by joy. Her expression for all magic.

“It’s lovely.” Her voice was velvet. He twitched.

“Thank you,” he said brusquely.

She couldn’t understand — could not have known, could not have been expected to know — what it meant to say so; the etiquette of patronuses wouldn’t have been taught to her. She had learned them as weapons and tools, not as social gestures.

“It’s… an owl,” she said. “I recognize the species, I think.”

He drew his handkerchief and began cleaning his wand, mechanically.

“You should,” he said. “I bought you that owl. I’ll be quite put out if something’s happened to it.”

There was a pause. The heat of her attention warmed the side of his face.

“It’s my owl?”

“Or any other of the species Tyto alba. Meaning, literally, ‘white owl,’ making my rendition here somewhat literal.”

“But it’s my owl in particular. Tyto alba. The one you got me.”

He glanced up at his patronus, which was still making lazy spirals in the rafters. Her owl.

“That’s the one,” he said. “Theocritus, or what-have-you.”

“Thucydides,” she said softly. “Because I sent you History of the Peloponnesian War as a Christmas present. And you didn’t get me anything—”

“I didn’t know we were doing presents, mind you, no one said anything—”

“—so at the end of the year, you bought me an owl, because my parents wouldn’t. And you said you’d write.” She was coming closer to him. A tattoo drilled inside of his ribs. Her voice was unsteady. “I was — and I was so, so excited—”

“Little wonder. He was a thoroughbred.”

“—because I’d never had anyone to write letters to, before. No one else had ever wanted to — hear more of what I had to say. Most other children thought I said quite enough, actually. Which I probably did.”

This made him look at her. Her face was guarded and yet glowed, faintly, with some inner light.

“Do you know,” he said, into a silence that seemed deeper than all the oceans of the world, “the memory I use to conjure a Patronus with?”

“No. What?”

He did not answer, but continued to look at her. Her eyes widened.

“Not — you don’t mean—”

“I did try,” he said. “With other memories. Nothing quite does the trick.”

Hermione was staring at him as if he was something breathtakingly grand, cast from marble, and it made him feel about eight feet tall.

“You know very well,” he said, “that it isn’t friendship. For me. You’ve known it for some time.”

It was the first time he had said it to her out loud.

“I wanted things to be normal,” she said frankly. “I wanted nothing to change. I wanted — to go back to the way things used to be, you see.”

It was a shadow’s shadow of an apology, but he understood it.

“You can’t,” he said. “Nothing’s ever the way it used to be. You can’t have it back by pretending.”

“But I was close,” she said plaintively. “Sometimes, when it was just the four of us… it was close. I was good at pretending. We were good at it.”

“It wouldn’t last.”

“No,” she admitted, “probably not.”

She worried at one of her cuticles with a thumbnail, minute little fidgets of her knuckles.

“I told you this already,” she said, “but your letters were all I thought about, that first summer.”

She hadn’t put it that way. He would have remembered how he felt to hear it.

“I got up early every day to see if Thucydides had come back. I was worried he couldn’t find me in muggle London. I was worried he wouldn’t find you, wherever you were, or if he did you wouldn’t write back, because maybe you were just being nice, on the platform, or maybe you’d changed your mind—”

“Changed my mind?”

“I would remind you that you were a different person when you were twelve,” she said, “and so was I. But one day, I woke up and found him sitting on my window — and it was very early, and the sun was coming in. And Thucydides, you know, has white-and-gold coloring on his back, and the sunlight coming in behind him made him sort of — glow, everything seemed all shiny. It felt like magic. I know it wasn’t, not literally. But you can’t imagine how it feels, when you grow up in the muggle world, and then come here, and then you go back to it and you can’t bring any magic with you — you’re just back in the real world for the summer, and everything’s a little bit duller and slower and less interesting — and then suddenly there’s this piece of it in your house, waiting for you when you wake up. And you have a letter waiting for you from someone who understands everything. So it’s like this shiny piece of a dream fell into your lap while you were sleeping. That’s what you gave me.”

She ran her wand between her fingers, abruptly shy. “You were the only magic I got to keep,” she said in a quiet voice.

And: “That was the memory I used, just now. By the way.”

His patronus was forgotten. It disappeared, unobtrusively, in a whiff of white smoke.

“I was pretty well done for, at that point,” she said. “In retrospect.”

“In what sense?”

He already knew, but he was a liar, and she knew that, and she was going to tell him anyway.

She hiked in a breath and closed her hand around her wand. Lifted her chin. In her posture was the same blazing resilience she’d always had, which had to well from some deep furnace in the core of her. She had a kiln between her lungs. He could feel the heat when he stood near her.

“That I wanted you,” she said, with a panicked, dutiful bravery, as if she were confessing to a crime. “So much it left me sick, sometimes. And I can’t be your friend, I don’t think. Because, you see — the things I want, from you, have always been — larger than anyone else.”

The castle creaked. Her otter silently scattered into mist.

She took a breath. “You don’t have to say anything. To that. It’s just that I’ve been feeling this way for so long, and I thought it would stop but it hasn’t, and I did a lot of thinking about this and I’m pretty sure it’s hopeless. Friendship, that is. Based on the data, I mean. It’s the only plausible explanation for certain things. Like how I feel about your handwriting. And your hands. Or the way you say ‘Granger,’ and the way you do your tie crooked sometimes so that I’ll fuss at it, which I know you do, and you know I know you do, and I know you know I know you do, which I think is what I like about it, on some level, and Draco I know I said you didn’t need to say anything but actually you could say something, if you wanted to, any day now, really—”

He took her head in his hands and kissed her.

The surprise froze her for all of a heartbeat. With a high noise that could have been relief or pain, she buried her hands in his shirtfront and dragged him in to kiss him back.

His hand slid around the back of her skull, cupping her in place, tilting her head against his. Their mouths caught and dragged, clumsy, more urgency than skill, and the feeling was still blinding. The feeling still whited out the world. Why didn't it wear off? It should have worn off. Nothing could possibly be this good forever. No one would do anything else.

She had a fist in his shirt and had snuck one into his hair and was pulling, insistent, like she wanted to fuse with him. Her lips moved against his in short quick brushes, never drawing away far enough to do more than breathe. He held her head in place and kissed her once, deeply, and she shuddered still and then kissed him back the same way, with a long, slow movement of her mouth that sent heat plunging through him like fever. She was pulling his hair hard and he was caught between two pressures, her mouth and her hand, heat blooming in two directions, her hand on his chest in a white-knuckle grip like she intended to let him go never, this thing of hers she'd caught for keeps. He caught her waist and pulled hard.

Hermione made a sweet, happy sigh against his mouth, and he opened it to her, letting her slide her tongue along the underside of his lip. The jolt of sensation swayed them. He did it again, and she shuddered and rolled her whole body up, front to front, pressure on pressure on pressure. There was a live wire running down the back of his spine, a jagged scar of white pleasure, throwing volts. Everything felt so much.

He made a sound, a cross between a groan and a sigh, when her fingernails grazed his scalp. She echoed him and the sounds twined together in the rafters, bounding back and forth on the wood.

She was soft everywhere. Soft in the curve of her waist and the plane of her back and the warm rose of her mouth. Her hair was soft where it tangled and spilled through his fingers. He could move her with it, twist her head back to kiss her, pull her in, hold her there. She didn't object. When he tugged it her hand slid down his chest and pulled where the yield of the fabric ended, rucking it out of his waistband, almost petulant. Her hand skated across his skin and he broke the kiss to breathe out hard.

“Hermione—”

“Mm?” She leaned up and caught his mouth again, which stopped him from saying whatever the hell it was that had seemed so important.

Probably just fuck, and then fuck again, with gravitas.

He made a valiant effort, though. He lifted his head, trying to breathe evenly, and her mouth slipped down to his jaw.

The effort ended indecently and immediately. He was fucked. He was so profoundly fucked.

Heat poured from wherever her mouth went. The skin was sensitive and even more so where her mouth left it, wet and cool and warm where her lips went, and he was holding her hair too tightly and didn’t really know what to do with his hands, nor could think of it, nor could think. Nothing seemed connected to each other, it was just sensations outside of time, unrelated except in the sense of a gradual escalation, a slow rising burn in his sternum, a heat escaping from every tingling cell of his skin. Want, satisfaction, then more want. Not a logical progression. Would have to take it up later. With her.

He kissed her again to stop her from driving him mental, which didn’t work, but she seemed pleased enough. She wrapped her arms around his neck and arched up and slid their mouths together until the room spun.

At some point, she broke off and breathed against his mouth, ragged for air, and palpably frustrated by the need for it.

“I’m the only one who gets to do this,” he said.

“Obviously,” she said. She swallowed. “I'm quite plainly yours. In every respect. God help you for that. And you’re...?”

“Yours,” he said, “obviously.”

She considered him, her face a brilliant collision of giddiness and fear.

“Mine,” she said. Her hands tightened, impossibly, in his shirt. The rain trilled on the windows. “Yes. That's right, isn't it?”

Then she kissed him again, and finally, without reservation, without doubt, and without fear, he fell into her.

-Another classic GT 15,000-word omnibus chapter, brought to you wholly without knowledge or intent. I didn't realize this bad boy had gotten so big. I had a bit of ground to cover between "Deputy Special Inquisitor" and the next chapter, so I had to onboard a lot of stuff, and I thought about chopping it up. But I didn't want to keep you waiting any longer, especially coming off the heels of a hiatus like the last one, and I really like big chappies as a reader. Means more stuff for the bus ride to work.

-Lord forgive me for how late I stayed up editing this. By which I mean Lord, please do not let me do it again.

-The plot and structure for Book 5 recently underwent a piledriver of an editing pass and the last act has been substantially revised in terms of chapter count; if you're reading this from the future after Book 5 has completed, this affects your life not at all, freely disregard; but if you at some point saw a chapter title list floating around on my Tumblr, just know that it's officially out of date now, and that the last act of Book 5 is officially 120% better than it used to be.

-I know Luna's canon patronus is a hare, but I picked up one of them old creative licenses at the fanfiction store, and I'm using to drive this crazy train exactly wherever feels best and coolest. Also, egrets rule.

-If you left a comment on the last chapter, please know that I have read it, cherished it, and I hope you find a copy of your favorite book in a beautiful hardcover edition. Like those clothbound Penguin Classics, or an old burnished leather binding. And I hope it's on sale.

-Next chapter (release date to be divined by your local haruspex upon consideration of the relevant entrails): "The Pureblood Sisters."

The Pureblood Sisters

Chapter 74: The Pureblood Sisters

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

When he woke it was half six, but the fetters of sleep, once cast off, vanished irrecoverably, and he sat on the edge of his bed, watching the grounds. The frosty trees were like points of green agate, and the fields were smooth and silver with veins of blue heather; the sun, a heatless red dot; and the ice, dark as iron, on the face of the lake. It was March in Scotland.

Looking out at it he was eleven and fifteen at once, and twelve and fourteen and thirteen, too, rising to greet any one of a thousand mornings, on any one of a thousand days. He was fifteen, and a prefect, at a school under the command of the Ministry's Special Inquisitor; and all that notwithstanding, somewhere in the same tower was a girl who had made him a promise.

Holding that information, in the midst of everything else, felt like cradling a candle in the middle of a storm. But then, there it was, like a bowl of something simmering and precarious balanced somewhere around his sternum, every moment risking a spill. By candlelight, he knotted a red tie in a Windsor and pinned the prefect's badge to his lapel. He slipped his ring onto the fifth finger of his left hand, and watched the light dapple on the black garnet, the double-headed snake, the ornate M. It occurred to him for the first time that it might be odd for him to wear it; it meant nothing to anyone in Gryffindor, besides being a bit of nice jewelry that Malfoy liked to wear; and the only people at Hogwarts whom it communicated anything to were people he otherwise had no intention of communicating with.

And what did it say, really, that anyone didn't already know? It asserted that he was Lucius Malfoy's son. At some point, it had asserted that he was proud of that fact. What did it say now? That it was possible, perhaps, to be himself and also be Malfoy. That the rot of ages did not descend inexorably from one generation to another. That he could be himself, whole, and free of it. That he was not, in fact, a contradiction in terms

Ron, shuffling past him to the bathroom, grunted and gave him a short nod of greeting. Draco nodded back in silence. The simmering vessel inside him gave a jolt.

In the common room, Hermione was curled up reading in a nook by the window. The diamond grate of Tudor windows sieved the light coming in, and her face was a quilt of shadows.

It was so early that the room was empty. He leaned against the stairwell, watching her. She wet her finger to turn a page, then smiled at something she'd read. The self-contained little expression of someone doing something she loved. The wrinkle of her nose when something confused her. The snort of derision when she read something insufficiently researched.

The floorboards creaked to announce him when he joined her. She drew her knees up to make room for him in the nook and closed the book, folding it against her chest.

"Hello," she said, like it was a question.

"Hello."

"Did you sleep well?"

"Worst of my life," he said, and she laughed, relieved. She shifted her knees off the sill to move closer, and her leg brushed his knee.

"I was hearing birds when I fell asleep."

"Terrible waste. Could have stayed in the Room, if we were both awake anyway."

Her blush flared; she glanced around the common room. He nudged her knee. “Easy. No one’s here.”

“They could hear on the stairs.”

“Who? Lavender? She’d get us a cake.”

She blushed harder and elbowed him. He smiled indolently and leaned back against the window. “Harry,” she whispered pointedly. “And—”

“Ronald. Yes, I remember. But I told you, he already suspects. Both of them do.”

“There’s a difference between suspecting, and… seeing it. You agreed we weren’t going to tell anyone for a bit.”

“I agreed to be discreet. If someone asks me, I don’t intend to lie.”

She rolled her eyes amusedly. “Yeah, but no one’s going to ask you.”

“Why do you think so?”

“Because they’re afraid of getting murdered. Do you know how you come across? How many personal questions are you asked on a weekly basis? Monthly, even?”

“Thousands.”

“Mine exempted.”

He considered. “I think Longbottom asked me my favorite color, once.”

She snickered. He caught her chin in his hand and drew her in to kiss, and she went soft against him for a moment that was altogether too short. Her hand found his tie, pulling him in absently. But she broke off with a frustrated hitch of breath.

“Common room.”

He sighed irately and sat back. “Ronald and Potter aren’t blind. We live in each other’s pockets. How long have you ever kept a secret from them?”

“Long enough,” she said stubbornly. “I will tell them. I just want… privacy. For a bit. Before everyone makes a thing of it. And you know they’ll make a thing of it. The whole house. And then the school, too. You being who you are. And Harry being Harry, and us being close to him, and… I keep thinking about that Skeeter article from fourth year. Sometimes girls still bring it up to me, you know.” Her fingers picked at a cuticle. “And. Not that it matters, really, but. I’ve never done this before.”

He reached out and brushed her hair away from her face, making her look at him. It seemed like such a ridiculous, unthinkable thing that he should be able to do that. That she should let him do that, and look at him with such acceptance, even satisfaction, when he did.

“It’s not possible for you to fail at this,” he said. “It’s you and me. We’re the only ones that matter.”

She swallowed. Her eyes were dark and uncertain.

“It’s you and me,” she repeated. “You’re right.”

“Of course I’m right.”

Then she smiled, and even hesitant, it erased the common room and castle beyond in its corona. Being alone with her was like having a country to themselves.

He would have kissed her again, but the stairs creaked, and Hermione sat upright to put distance between them.

Neville came down, balancing awkwardly under the weight of heavy bags and a large cauldron. “Oh! Hullo,” he said. “Either of you got the t-time? Curfew’s lifted, hasn’t it?”

“It will in five minutes,” said Hermione, checking her watch. “Why? Where are you going?”

“The greenhouses. Sprout lets me brew p-p-potions in the back, if I’m careful not to make a m-mess.”

“The Potions homework this week is an essay, Nev.”

“I know,” he said hesitantly, glancing at Draco. “But M-Malfoy’s f-forcing me to sit the O.W.L.”

“...What?”

Draco examined his cuffs. “If you’d rather give up on being an Herbologist, it’s nothing to me,” he drawled. “It isn’t my future.”

“Okay, b-b-but, you said I actually wasn’t allowed to d-do that, though—”

“Are you helping him?” she said suspiciously.

“No.”

“Yes,” said Neville, traitorously.

“Please. I’m taking an hour a week to yell at him, is what I’m doing.”

“I think that’s helping,” said Hermione. She was staring at him so radiantly you’d think he had the cure to all illnesses in the palm of his hand. It made the simmering cup in his chest thrash and spill. Discretion would do precious little for either of them if she kept looking at him like that, Neville be damned.

He flushed and folded his arms. “Well,” he said tartly, “you would.”

With O.W.L.s perched on the horizon in May, the collective nose dipped to the grindstone, and pushed. The moments not consumed by classes, meals, or a piffling quantum of sleep found them ensconced in by a fortress of textbooks. Hermione had checked out half the library and put the other half on reserve. Harry and Ron glued their faces to their workbooks as if proximity would make the information move faster. Long after others went to bed, Hermione would find a table and crack her books again.

Cassius Warrington continued to rove around the castle grounds, often seen in Theo's wake, if not Umbridge's. At night, Theo's name floated alone with Myrtle's on the second-floor bathroom, but when they returned to follow him, they found the door warded and cloaked in Muffling Charms.

"What do you think happened to Myrtle?" Hermione said absently. The low burble of the Great Hall shielded their conversation from prying ears: the four of them were working through a dinner of shepherd's pie and a hearty gravy, with roast chips stacked high in silver bowls.

Harry tore his attention away from the high table, where Umbridge was explaining something to a frowning McGonagall. "Moaning Myrtle?" he said. "You mean the ghost?"

"No, my great aunt. She's ill of late. Yes, Harry, the ghost!"

"Jeez. Okay," he muttered. "Didn't realize you were on a first name basis."

"This is the Theodore Nott thing, right?" said Ron evenly, assembling a forkful of pie. "You think he's after some kind of information?"

"Yes. And I think he thinks Myrtle has it. But what does she know? She died in 1943. She's been here ever since."

"Maybe she witnessed something." He popped the fork in his mouth.

“What, in the bathroom?”

“Yeah, in the bathroom,” he retorted. “We used it in third year. Great place to work without being noticed. Fifty-odd years, we’re probably not the first ones to think of it.”

“But she said she didn’t remember.”

“Maybe she’d forgotten,” said Draco. Ron jerked his chin at him and nodded.

Hermione hummed to acknowledge it, but her fingers drilled on the table. “I suppose... I don’t know. I really think it’s something to do with her death.”

“Why would he care?” Harry muttered. “He’s not the type to get choked up, is he, if she fell and broke her neck—”

“That’s the thing! I don’t think she did break her neck,” she broke in passionately, leaning forward. “If she died in a normal accident, why wouldn’t the book say so? And why doesn’t she look injured? The Bloody Baron and Nearly Headless Nick both look as they did when they died, blood and all, but Myrtle seems perfectly fine. What kind of ‘accident’ doesn’t leave a mark? What kind of death doesn’t leave a mark?”

Ron grimaced. He looked at Draco, who pursed his lips and laid down his fork.

“What?” she demanded. “Don’t do that, don’t just stare at each other like you’re afraid to—”

“The Killing Curse,” said Harry.

Ron winced. Harry glanced at him, then at Draco, and added in a flat tone: “Famously.”

“That’s… not an accident,” said Hermione, after a moment.

“No. But you don’t think it’s an accident, anyway.” He shrugged and reached for his pumpkin juice.

“I … think… it’s an open question. Your… theory… would suggest someone killed her.”

“Yeah, it would,” he agreed.

“And then covered it up.”

“Yep.”

“Be serious, mate,” said Ron. “Students can’t do Unforgivables.”

“Pansy Parkinson used blood magic to perform a permanently incapacitating petrification curse at twelve,” said Draco.

“One: not an Unforgivable. Two: a teacher taught her to do that, yeah? She didn’t come up with it on her own.”

“I didn’t say a student did it,” said Harry.

Draco traded a glance with Ron and Hermione.

“Are you suggesting a teacher killed a student?” Hermione said delicately.

Harry shrugged again. “Almost happened to me in first year.”

Hermione began to reply, but they were interrupted by a trumpet of throat-clearing. Draco turned around. Alfie Chrissenpoffer had presented himself, his spine straighter than a sword.

“Good evening! Malfoy! Sir!”

“He’s only a prefect, Alfie, you don’t have to call him ‘sir,’” said Hermione.

“In fact, please don’t,” said Ron.

“Belay that. ‘Sir’ is fine,” said Draco. “We reserve ‘lord’ for formal occasions. What’s the matter?”

“I’ve a letter! From Professor Dumbledore! Sir!”

Satisfied at having fulfilled his duty, the child departed with a bow.

The letter was written in an elegant hand.

The headmaster’s office is home to some jonquils that would be beautified by the addition of jasmine.

There will be no need for haberleas today.

There will be no talk of carnations.

“I’m going to the headmaster’s office,” he said. He passed the note to Hermione. “Occlumency lesson. Potter, no need to come.”

Harry, relieved, made no effort to question it; but Hermione said, “How can you tell?”

“Carnations are insults. ‘Haberlea’ means Potter. You can infer the rest.”

“She has a name for me?” said Harry.

“She’s comprehensive.”

“Do I have one?” said Hermione.

“You do.”

“What is it?”

“Wouldn’t you like to know?”

“Draco!”

“See you in the common room, Granger. Gentlemen.”

Her indignant noise turned several heads, which he enjoyed more than he should have, walking out.

The headmaster’s office was dark when he arrived. Lightning flickered from the domed skylight overhead, sending occasional bolts searing through the gloom.

His mother sat in a chair by the fireplace, her profile traced in firelight. Her thumb spun the ring on her right fourth finger in endless rounds about its berth.

“Draco,” she said.

They hadn’t spoken since December. Not one word, neither pardon nor reprimand, had disturbed their silence.

“Mother.” He shut the door. She watched him shuck his robe and fold it over the coatrack, then roll up his sleeves.

Before that, she’d begged him for a promise. Then she’d begged him for a lie.

She rose and stood against the fire, veiled with red glow.

“Why isn’t Potter here? He could use the instruction.”

“I wanted the privacy to speak plainly,” she said. “This will be the last lesson for some time.”

“What? Why?”

“Because your headmaster is sending me somewhere that will take me considerable time to return from.”

“Are you leaving the country?”

“No. I would prefer that considerably.”

“Where, then?”

“Witherfell.”

The name stung him with fear.

“You can’t.”

“‘Shouldn’t’ is what you mean. Precision in everything, my dear.”

“The place is cursed.”

“Curses require casters. They don’t come from Merlin, Draco. You’re old enough to know that.”

“It’s haunted.”

“You think the Manor isn’t it?”

“Why haven’t you been back, then?” he snapped. “To Witherfell. If it’s safe.”

Narcissa lifted her chin coldly. “Because I cannot bear it,” she said. “Although lately, people have found all sorts of ways to test what I can and cannot bear.”

With an indifferent lift of her shoulder, she slid the knife between his ribs. It left him fairly breathless.

“And I didn’t say it was safe,” she remarked, turning away.

“So you admit it’s dangerous.” He swallowed around an edge of anger. “What you’re doing.”

She drew her wand and lifted it, examining the silver crossguard, the angled pommel. “What?” she said softly. “You think the only one allowed to endanger my life is you?”

Point, set, match, a knockout in a single blow, and he came off the piste with his head spinning. He'd be surprised if there wasn't blood splattered on the floor behind his chest; that was how it felt.

"I never wanted," he said, in a small voice that came from a body not his own, "for it to be like this. I would have done anything — anything I could have done—"

"Except disobey them."

He curled his lip. "I'm not following their orders. This is about right and wrong."

"Two things you understand exhaustively, of course, at fifteen."

"Fine. Fine! Fine. If you think I'm wrong, explain it," he snapped. "Make your case. Tell me why blood matters. Explain why perfectly magical children aren't the same as any other magical child. Point to the facts. Can you? Or do you admit you don't honestly believe it, because it's ridiculous, only you never questioned what your parents told you, so you resent that I did—"

"You never took my advice," she said bitterly. "You never thought I could counsel you in politics. Nor in war. I was too frivolous, I suppose, or too mad. Would you have obeyed your father? I sometimes wonder."

"I'm sick of you fantasizing about the son Lucius Malfoy raised."

She broke off. His voice rattled the frames on the wall.

"You didn't get him," he spat. The intensity of his anger numbed him, made him almost calm. "You got me. And I apologize for whatever pain it's caused you, but for better or worse, you have only ever had me. The father of your child is dead. You've had seven years to come to terms with it. And I find it ghoulish," he said, raising his voice, "that you still try to resurrect him every time you want me to heel—"

“Because you respected his memory more than me,” she cried furiously. “You wrote me off. You thought I was mad! You ask me to explain myself now? Now, when your mind’s made up? When did you ever seek my counsel except after it was too late?”

“I told you everything. What are you talking about?”

“Don’t play the fool,” she snapped. “It was years before you admitted the extent of your friendship with Potter. Or the muggle-born.”

“If you don’t use her name, we’re finished talking.”

It should have been against the law to see one’s mother so vulnerable to pain. It should have been a death sentence to cause it on purpose.

“Granger,” she said tightly. “Your friendship with the inexorable Miss Granger.”

“I’ve always done the best I can to please you.” He was carefully deadpan. “I’ve tried to honor the name of Malfoy. If you disagree, that’s your right. But it isn’t your name. And until someone pries this ring from my corpse—”

“Draco!”

“—then it remains my name. Mine to waste, mine to save, mine to kill,” he said savagely. “My father gave me that right when I was eight years old, and if he regrets it now, he can come and fucking take it back.”

Narcissa made a noise of anguish and swept away, leaning on the mantelpiece. Black lace fanned and shrank like a raven’s tail.

Time passed. Thunder marked its passage on the roof overhead.

“He loved you,” she said. “Before you were ever born, he loved you. He wanted you so badly.”

She must have expected this to move him, but it didn't. Nothing in him recoiled, for there was no pride to injure — only the aching cavity of love, a relationship that had never been. A man he could count the number of times he had touched.

"Prepare yourself," she rasped. He had only a moment to grasp what she meant before she raised her wand. "Legilimens."

They dropped through the waters of his memory like a pair of wrestling birds in free-fall.

The courtyard under the clock tower, smelling of blood and wet stone. Two boys wrestling by the lake on a cloudy day. St. Mungo's Hospital, bitter bleach, linoleum, jazzy horns on a scratchy radio. The gnarled door of Number Twelve, Grimmauld Place. His mind's eye glided in hungrily, narrowing to the handle, which turned on their approach. Voices murmured behind it: Mad-Eye. Arthur. Hermione.

Panic flared. He tore them away, and flung them into the past.

A horse patronus, Ginny's, galloping past in a blur of silver. Seamus Finnigan, wrenching his hand up with a victory roar. Cheering, applause. Closing the door to Umbridge's office. Hermione's hand cradled in his own, her blood running through his fingers—

Deeper, faster, he tore them down.

Lavender Brown, catching his salute like a kiss. Katie Bell flipping him a pass behind her back. Percy Weasley slumped on the Atrium floor. Peacocks and lemonade. Salt, sweetness. Brown curls ribboning on the breeze, a linen shirt, thin and translucent—

He shoved his hands desperately into the earth, and threw up darkness.

Viktor Krum's last grin. Bone-white masks in a hedge maze. Cigarette smoke stinging his lungs outside the Shrieking Shack. Four children bellowing at each other in a dark common room. A golden dress beside a red mountain of a man in a fur ruff, her hand in his, drawing her further and further away from Draco, while some part of him was drawn helplessly, miserably, into looking.

Because a waltz was playing, she was dancing with Viktor Krum in an enchanted ballroom, the loveliest thing in a castle of enchanted objects, glowing with light from without and within: of Hermione Granger and the man she might have loved, if she'd had the chance. And Viktor Krum was holding her carefully, clumsily, with the awestruck tenderness of someone who knew what he had in his hands; for he had already loved her, had died loving her, naturally, as anyone who ever loved her would.

On her face was the smile for which he would live forever in envy of a dead boy. He nauseated himself.

He drove deep into the pits of himself for something worse. It came eagerly to him.

Dementors converging on a moonlit lake. Hermione sprawled unconscious on the beach, her hair dark as spilled blood on white stone. No: not stone. Hospital bedsheets. Features frozen in an endless gasp of fear. Brave, bold, terrible little thirteen-year-old Hermione Granger, shouting at him, and the worst word he'd ever said sliding out between his teeth. The feeling of oil where a soul should be. A yearning to wrestle back through the past and catch himself by the throat, close his fist.

He was the first person who'd ever called her mudblood. On the train to Hogwarts. Before Sorting, before Gryffindor, before Draco-and-Hermione or anything that mattered. She hadn't known what the word meant before he taught it to her.

To close one's fist and hold, and hold, and hold. To choke out the breath that did the harm, to annihilate the past, to black it out, unmake, unhurt, unbreak. To soar into the cloudless sky, and forget the ground beneath him. To remember oneself only as their protector, and not the thing they had to tame to survive.

His mother's mind writhed in distress. He felt triumphant. She didn't like it. Well, he didn't like it, either. Let her see what he thought of the boy she raised.

The quidditch pitch, mud-slicked and raining, the day he broke his arm. The Whomping Willow. The girls' bathroom.

An owl patronus, its face a heart-shaped thing with dark, curious eyes.

Hello. I'm Hermione Granger. Is anyone sitting here?

Said breathlessly, like she'd run her whole life just to make that train, and she got there as soon as she could.

His mother strained against his grasp. He pinned her viciously to the floor.

If you'd rather not be disturbed that's fine. I just want somewhere to sit and read my book.

There was a strident pulse of displeasure from his mother. Her mind blazed in the hopeless protest of watching an irrevocable, fatalistic mistake.

And it wounded him. And it made him furious.

He hauled them back into the gauzy darkness between memories. His mind went clear and flat as a piece of obsidian. He could feel her scrabbling for a hold, throwing sensations at him — she tried Hermione's face, her voice, a shared memory at King's Cross — but none of them caught. He drifted above them. He let them slide over and through him without interest. They were in his mind. It was his kingdom.

The pressure diminished. He could feel ripples of her thoughts, like vibrations of sound without the sound itself: her agitation, her frustration, her cunning.

They stilled, and a single spike of intention flared in the distance. She threw herself against him, her mind rushing up against his like a clash of tides.

Her destination: a funeral. Midsummer in Wiltshire. Mourners crowding a fresh tombstone. An eight-year-old boy making a promise to his mother.

Fury burned the bottom of his stomach. He shattered the memory, pitching them into freefall, and summoned the face of Andromeda Black.

Her mind became a detonating object. It became a caged animal. It became wild.

He trapped her there, locking them both in with clamps like teeth, driving points into his skull: Andromeda's elfin chin, her thick black braid, a face feathered with the same beginnings of age that lurked in Narcissa's features. And next to her, a twenty-something daughter, styled in the image of Bellatrix Lestrange.

His mother's sisters gazed out at him from an endless hallway of black tile, a dyad of unrecognition and horror.

Pain ripped through his thoughts like an ax cleaving the plate of his skull.

Thoughts dissolved. So did feeling. There was nothing but void and pain.

Something dropped beneath his feet. He was sailing again, but through a different space, this one was smoother, emptier, more cavernous. Nothing guided him; his mother didn't seem to be pushing anywhere at all.

They landed with a jolt that shook his skull.

Sunlight seared his eyes and made him blink black spots from vision, clearing gradually into the scene: a garden party. A flock of wizards in white dresses and white suits drifted like swans over a vast and luscious green, which started at the foot of a black reflection pool and shot into the blue distance, narrowing under the encroachment of hedges and elm trees and marble statues, vaulting furrows of white rosebushes, looping fountains that perfumed the air with silver spray, and finally shattering into ivy against the face of a vast stone hall, twice the Manor's size at least, with turrets crowned in rust-blue copper, and fanged spires slitting a cloudless sky. The white crests of the party's tents dotted the lawn like the sails of great slow-moving barges from which wizards swum out, on occasion, to fish a cocktail from a floating tray, or board another vessel with a spray of laughter, and disappear.

"Where is she?"

Draco tried to turn, but his head wouldn't move.

"How should I know?" said a small, waspish voice. "Cissy and I have been here all afternoon."

His head turned without his will, and he found himself perched on a sedan chair in the shade of a tent. Wind stirred the tent and the linen chairs and the tablecloth hangings, so the only still objects seemed to be himself, and the girl next to him, and the pair of women whose shadow loomed over himself and the girl.

The girl sat haughtily upright, as if her spine refused to bend, and her striking black brows drove an intractable ridge into her face — a dour impression not helped by her wide mouth, which she screwed into a ferocious pout. A single black plait knifed open the white back of her party dress, but dozens of curls had frayed out around her face; a silk wand-purse dangling from her wrist, above the cuff of a white lace glove, marked her as at least eleven.

"Because she's your sister," said the first woman, a narrow-faced witch with pale hair piled high on her head.

“I’m aware of that. You told me to stay here.”

“Then you shouldn’t have let her leave.”

“Fine! Next time she wants to use the loo, I’ll tell her to sit there and soil herself like a gentlewoman.”

“Bella!”

“Don’t be crude,” said the other woman coldly. Her face had once hung from the stairwell of Grimmauld Place. “And don’t backtalk to your mother. It doesn’t matter where she went. Go fetch the girl and show her to the Greengrasses’ tent; they’ve brought their younger boy to introduce him.”

“But—”

“Bellatrix.”

“But she doesn’t want to meet a stupid boy!”

“And I care almost as little for her opinion as I do for yours. Go.”

Neither Druella nor Walburga waited for the girl’s answer. They retreated with a springing, elegant step across the field, white skirts flickering behind them.

“Fine,” muttered the girl who would become Bellatrix Lestrange. “Yes, milady. Terribly sorry, milady.”

She hauled herself up and stomped over to his — Narcissa’s — chair. “Come on,” she said, sticking out her hand. “Up with you, fatty. Enough sitting.”

“Am I coming?” said a high, soft voice. Narcissa allowed herself to be lifted, and her body pulled free from Draco’s in a dizzying moment of detachment: now he seemed to be floating weightlessly, like a tethered ghost, behind the tiny girl that was his mother. She was a petite and dreamy-looking child with long cornsilk hair tied in a blue bow.

“You don’t have to. You can always run back to Mummy and Aunt Wally.”

“Oh, no. I want to stay with you.”

Bellatrix grinned. “Good,” she said, “because I do know where Andy is. I lied.”

She twined their fingers together and tugged. They set off running over the lawns, rousing a flock of silver pixies that rose chittering from the bullrushes; they dodged a jewel-colored lyrebird with a razored beak, and waved at the koi-red scales of nixies darting alongside them in the wading pools. They dodged between Attic columns of tiered white cakes, ducked through a hedge full of gnomes that spluttered and squawked at Bellatrix when she kicked one out of her way; they sped giddily across a fresh-mown lawn whose dark and light squares alternated when a foot touched them, and tore through a game of bowls on a plain of white sand, the balls of which sprouted legs and scrambled around frantically whenever they were struck. Bellatrix snatched one up and pitched it far from the court, prompting the strangled cry of a tall wizard with antlers growing from his top hat; then, laughing, she dragged Narcissa away.

They ran past the music tent where four elven violinists trilled Vivaldi, and ignored the wizards in silk and jewels whose greetings spilled from every tent they passed; ignored the fond choruses — “Hello, Bella!” and “Attagirl, Bella!” and “Where are you off to, Bella?” — of familiar faces; they threw jubilant waves at a pair of dark-haired boys in white suits, a toddler and a boy no older than four, squabbling over a toy broomstick.

They escaped the pavilions at last and came along a rugged stone wall that circuited the lawn, and scrambled over it in a place where the stones had crumbled away; then plunged into a glade of oaks and sycamores, perfumed by the dark scent of wet earth.

The sights and sounds of the party faded behind them. A song drifted from the trees ahead. It was a girl's voice.

Bellatrix slowed and cocked her head to the wind, gauging the direction of the melody. Her eyes narrowed. Then she hurtled into the trees, hauling Narcissa along by the hand.

My heart is pierced by Cupid

I disdain all glittering gold

There is nothing can console me

But my jolly sailor bold.

"Andy?" Narcissa cried. "Andy, where did you go?"

"Do shut up. I can't hear."

His hair it hangs in ringlets, his eyes as black as coal

My happiness attend him wherever he may go!

"This way," said Bellatrix.

They stepped into the clearing of a giant sycamore tree. There was a wooden bench beneath it, gnarled with age, and a set of muddy footprints traced from its seat, to its back, to the pale sycamore trunk, and disappeared into its branches. The singing was quite clear now.

From Tower Hill to Blackwall, I'll wander, weep and moan

All for my jolly sailor, until he sails home!

Bellatrix led them to the base of the tree and craned her neck.

“Hello, Princess,” she called.

“Hullo, Boss!”

Andromeda peered down from her nest among the branches. Her muddied slippers swung free beneath her, and her white skirt bloomed gauzily over her chemise. Her curls were wild as black wool, half-pinned by a white ribbon, half abandoned to a frizzy helmet at her shoulders, and dirt caked her fingernails. She bared her teeth in a grin.

“Am I in trouble? Have they noticed I’m gone? Am I for a spanking?”

“Worse. Mummy’s sent for you,” Bellatrix called back. “They want to pawn you off on the Greengrass boy.”

“Ooh. Is he handsome?”

“Gross. He’s a boy.”

“He can still be handsome.”

“He looks like a frog shagged a ghost,” said Bellatrix, “and both were new money. If he speaks to you I’ll make him wish he was dead. Come down anyway, I want to play It.”

“I shan’t,” said Andromeda bravely. “It’s boring. Plus you always win ’cause you’re bigger. Can we play a story instead?”

“Fine. But we have to do the Warlock’s Hairy Heart, and I get to be the warlock, otherwise I won’t play.”

“You always get to be the warlock!”

“I don’t like Warlock,” whined Narcissa. “I’m always the servant, and I never get any lines—”

“Because you forget them!”

“You do forget them, Cissy.”

“—and it’s a sad story anyway! I hate sad stories. I want to do Three Brothers.”

Andromeda rolled her eyes. “Nobody cares. Bella, we can do Warlock, but you can’t hit me in the death scenes.”

“It’s called realism, numpty.”

“It’s called ‘I’ll tell Daddy.’ Numpty.”

They glowered through a silent contest of wills.

“I still want to play Three Brothers,” said Narcissa, with sad fatalism.

“Deal,” Bellatrix told Andromeda. “Let’s use the Mausoleum. They won't find us there.”

“Deal!” Andromeda hopped up on the branch and began walking its length, arms extended for balance. “Although I’m sad to leave this tree. I do love it. I think me and this tree have a common spirit, like forest nymphs… In my next life I should like to be a nymph. In fact, we should all be nymphs, and we can be like those old trees that grow together in the deep heart of the forest.”

“Please. You’d go running inside as soon as it rained,” said Bellatrix. “And then we’d be stuck out here without you, a pair of dumb ugly trees. Silly idea.” She sniffed. “We ought to be dragons, instead.”

“I think you’d both make marvelous dragons,” ventured Narcissa.

“Yeah? You wouldn’t.” Bellatrix pinched Narcissa’s nose, and she squealed. “You’d pick fights with all the big ones, and I’d have to come kill them for you. I’d be the most tired, banged-up dragon you’d ever seen.”

“Would not!”

“Would so.”

“I wouldn’t let them bang you up. I’d fight them off.”

“Oh, yeah? What if they did this?”

Narcissa screamed in delight and dodged Bellatrix’s attempt to tickle her.

“What kind of tree do you think you’d be?” Andromeda called dreamily, ignoring their scuffle. “I’ll be a silver birch. Cissy, you’re prettiest, so you’d be a big lovely willow; and Bella, you’re oldest, so you’re an elder, of course!”

She hopped to another branch, which creaked under her weight. Bark splintered.

“Careful, Andy,” cried Narcissa.

“Don’t be a baby, baby!” She bounced up and down. “See? The tree loves me. She wouldn’t—”

But Narcissa had been right: the branch groaned and snapped. Andromeda shrieked and tumbled down through the air.

Bellatrix thrust out her hand.

Andromeda never made it to the ground. Like the fingers of a great hand, the branches swooped to catch her, and enclosed her in a cradle of wood. The whole great bulk of the tree drooped gracefully until its uppermost branches swept the ground, and ladled the girl gently onto the earth.

When it was done, the tree rolled over beside her and flopped down lifelessly in the dirt. Its trunk was splintered open.

Bellatrix dropped her hand with a gasp. Sweat beaded her temples. Narcissa whimpered in relief.

Then Bellatrix stormed over to Andromeda and hoisted her up by the front of her dress.

“Ow! Bella!”

“Are you hurt?”

“No!”

“Cuts? Sprains?”

“No!”

“You’re entirely well?”

“Yes!”

Bellatrix slapped her. Andromeda wailed and clutched her cheek.

“You shouldn’t be,” she shouted. “You should’ve snapped your neck from a fall like that, and if I hadn’t been here you would’ve. I wish you had broken something, and I wish it hurt for the rest of your life, so you’d remember not to be such a dumb little cow. Are you really this stupid? Is this all you do while I’m at Hogwarts? Scheme up mad ways to get yourself killed?”

Andromeda looked up at her. Her lip wobbled. Her eyes were large as dinner plates.

“I’m sorry,” she said, and burst into tears.

Bellatrix released her. “Oh, don’t do that,” she said gruffly. “You’re alright, you — you’re just a silly little thing, you get scared easily.”

“Bella, I’m sorry,” wailed Andromeda. “I’m so sorry, Bella, please don’t be mean. Forgive me — you’ll forgive me, won’t you?”

“No. I’ll loathe you for ever and ever — oh, f— that was a joke, Andy, don’t — stop crying. You’re hideous when you cry, it does nothing for your complexion.”

“I know!” bellowed Andromeda, unconsoled.

“Merlin’s sake. Manipulative chit, we ought to run you for Minister. Come here.”

Bellatrix opened her arms, and Andromeda buried herself in them. She rubbed her face desperately into Bellatrix’s neck, like a kitten. Narcissa hurried forward and threw her arms around Andromeda’s shoulders.

“You’re fine,” said Bellatrix softly. She leaned down and kissed the red imprint of her own hand on Andromeda’s cheek. Andromeda popped up her face, wet-eyed and shiny, and beamed at her. “See? Little fool. I’m right here.”

“I’m here, too,” piped up Narcissa, nosing into them, and Bellatrix looped an arm around her shoulders with a huff.

“Yes. And Cissy’s here, too.”

“Do magic, Bella. Can you do magic?”

“Yes, please, do magic for us!”

“Do the spell that makes birds,” said Andromeda excitedly. “Can you make the birds again? So we can chase them?”

“I’m not supposed to do magic outside of school,” said Bellatrix warningly, but she was drawing her wand. “If I get expelled because of you, you’ll be really sorry.”

“You won’t be expelled,” said Andromeda. “They wouldn’t ever expel the great and terrible Bellatrix Black!”

Her voice sounded distant. A white vignette began gnawing away at the corners of the scene.

Bellatrix smirked. “Dippet might try,” she said. “He doesn’t like me very much. He thinks little girls should know their places.”

“I hate him,” cried Narcissa.

“You never met him, pet.”

“I hate him anyway!”

“Forget him,” laughed Andromeda. “Who cares what he says? It’s only us here, and we won’t tell. Do magic, go on.”

“Do magic! Oh, please!”

Fog was closing in through the trees, but none of them seemed to notice it. Bellatrix lifted her wand, dark eyes glittering, and opened her mouth.

Her spell vanished into the aether. The fog closed. Dirt disintegrated beneath his feet, and Draco plunged through a cascade of it, end over end, a diver torn from his broom.

Dark wood soared up to catch him.

He never got there. The spell lashed him in the heart and threw him back. He was soaring, then, the room a whirling streak of silver, and he slammed into something sharp and unforgiving with a firework of pain.

When his head ceased spinning enough for him to open his eyes, he found himself sprawled over the upended desk of Albus Dumbledore, while a maelstrom of loose parchment fluttered over his head. Everything that had been on the desk now lay in a sad, glittering ruin around him: a cracked Sneakoscope, a snapped quill, books with crumpled pages face-down in puddles of ink, and an ornate gold hourglass, one bulb of which had shattered, and trailed a white waterfall of sand into the cracks between floorboards.

Narcissa huddled against the opposite wall, her head hung, wand outstretched. With a shell-shocked twinge of betrayal, Draco's eyes fell on the hand that had jinxed him.

He tried gingerly to push himself upright. A fang of pain sank deep into his hand. He snatched it up and cradled it, watching blood well from a crooked line across his palm: a shard from the inkwell had sliced it open. He sucked breath through his teeth.

The sound made Narcissa's head jerk up. She blinked the fog from her eyes.

"Draco?" she croaked. "Are you alright?"

"Fine." He pressed the heel of his other hand to the cut to try and staunch the bleeding while he searched, not without urgency, for his wand. "Small cut. That's all."

"You're bleeding."

"Not much. Have you seen my w—"

She flew across the room in three strides and fell to her knees. "I'm sorry. I'm so sorry, I — I didn't mean it — Mummy didn't mean it — she's sorry, I'm so sorry, I'm sorry…"

She sounded on the verge of tears. He stared at her, hardly knowing who she was.

"Mother. Mother? Mum. It's fine."

"You're hurt, I hurt you—"

"You didn't. It doesn't hurt," he lied.

She seized his face. He felt her press a bruising kiss to the crown of his skull.

“I love you,” she whispered. “Mummy loves you. Mummy’s sorry.”

“I’m fine. I’m alright, Mum.”

She shook her head. The rush of warmth stirred his hair when she sighed.

“I saw Bellatrix in your memory,” he said.

Her breath caught. He was glad he could not see his mother’s face.

“She didn’t seem like a madwoman,” he said.

“She isn’t mad.”

“Most people say she is.”

“Most people don’t know her.”

“They know she tortured the Longbottoms into insanity. And killed countless people.”

“Draco.”

“Including my father.”

“Bellatrix—” She flinched, breathed deeply, and pushed on. “For her many faults, she wasn’t foolish, nor careless. She may have been passionate—”

He barked a laugh.

“—yes, passionate, and relentless; stubborn, wrathful — possessive, territorial, more than occasionally cruel — but she was never uncontrolled.”

“You think she was rational?”

“She was more than rational. She was deliberate. Perceptive. Frighteningly intelligent; surprisingly thoughtful. And she was most certainly prudent. She was the favorite knight of the Dark Lord, and she didn’t earn his trust by making mistakes.”

“She made one with Lucius.”

Narcissa tipped her head, equivocating.

“What did she gain by killing him? The aurors only caught her because she came back to England. And another thing — if she knew the Dark Lord could be resurrected, why didn’t she resurrect him? ‘Favorite knight,’ and she never thought to bring him back?”

“Resurrection is difficult.”

“Not too difficult for Peter Pettigrew.”

She rubbed her eyes. “Pettigrew was chosen because his flesh was expendable. He was slave meat, and remains so. As to why she never attempted — I’m sure she tried to. But the ritual requires the bone of one’s father, and I assure you, the Dark Lord never disclosed his sire to any of us.”

“Bloody oversight, that.”

“It wasn’t an oversight; he intended to never die, and we had no reason to doubt him. It was treason to speak of his death, or prepare for it. It’s why the war went so badly after he died.”

“Did it go badly? I thought it lasted years.”

She nodded. “Mm. But it was decided the night the Potters died. Barty was captured immediately; he was at the Potter house, and he stayed there, like a fool. I think he believed the Dark Lord would rise again from the very floor… he’s dead now,” she added, with startling blitheness. “Killed in Azkaban. Travers turned cloak... Dolohov and Mulciber were hounded down, like chattel, by the barbarian Moody… he threatened to send Mulciber's wife to him in six-ounce increments. Barty's father captured Rabastan at the Battle of Stirling, and baited Rodolphus into a rescue attempt. Nearly got himself killed. Did kill his regiment, which was a third of the remaining soldiers, and nineteen Death Eaters. After that, the Lestranges fled to Albania, and your father went back to Wiltshire."

"Why did they leave him behind?" he said, indignant despite himself.

His mother looked at him. Her mouth was a tight seam of pity.

"You'd just turned two," she said softly. "We had cake at the Manor, just the two of us. Bella and Roddy sent you a toy broomstick for a gift. Your father gave you a set of coloring chalks. I enclosed your drawings with my letters, so that he could see them."

"I don't remember that."

"Bella was jealous. She kept demanding to know if you were using the broomstick. I told her you were enough of a menace with your feet on the ground." A distant smile curved her mouth. "She liked that."

Her tone chilled him. "You sound fond of her."

"I am fond of her," she said calmly. She rose to her feet, and offered her hands; he took them, and let her draw him up. "I love her."

"You're joking. You cannot possibly still—"

"Why not?"

"She killed my father!"

To this, Narcissa offered the staggering reply of a shrug, as if to say: And so it is.

“And yet love endures,” she said. “It endured the murder of the man I married. It survived the collapse of my house, and my life, and the end of the name she and I once shared. But mark this well: I loved Bellatrix Black against reason, against duty, and against judgment. As I ever loved anything. Including my only son.”

She extended her hand. He took it. Her fingers sealed over his like a vise, painfully tight. She smiled cryptically and kissed his hand. Then she drew him into her arms and held him tightly, her heart beating like a rabbit’s against his ribs.

The rain trilled along in a steady alto, joined by the occasional roll of thunder.

Some time later, once Narcissa had left, he went to the Hospital Wing for his hand. Curfew had fallen, and the torches guttered high along the stone walls.

His head swam with afterimages of his mother’s memory. Of Walburga Black, young and well and sneering. Of Bellatrix Lestrange, hardly older than Victoria Frobisher, snapping a tree in half with her outstretched hand.

As he approached the Hospital Wing, the echoes of shouting bounced around the corner. Alerted, he drew his wand, and stepped into the hallway in time to see a trio of students rush through the doors. He followed, and their voices resolved as he stepped into the glaring light of Pomfrey’s chamber.

Blinking the spots from his eyes, he saw Cassius Warrington striding up the aisle with a barefoot Astoria Greengrass in his arms. Pansy hurried along at his side, half-running to keep up with him. Pomfrey was running out of her office to meet them, and their shouting collided in the center of the room.

“—down on the bed, Warrington, be careful—”

“—some kind of fainting spell,” Cassius announced. He ladled Astoria onto the bedspread. “Perfectly normal, especially around exams; stress and low blood sugar—”

“No, you idiot, I told you!” Pansy cried. “She needs a transfusion, Pomfrey, listen—”

Pomfrey did not need telling, however. She whirled away from Astoria’s bed. “Expecto Patronum!” she cried.

Her Patronus leapt from her wand and coalesced into a hooded snake.

“Find Orpheus and Dido Greengrass,,” she commanded, rolling up her sleeves. “Ask for permission for a blood transfusion between their daughters. Mr. Warrington — Ms. Parkinson — some space.”

Cassius obeyed with nervous haste; Pansy did not so much as loosen her grip. Pomfrey fed out the cord from Astoria’s wrist; a tap of her wand split it into three, and she slotted one into the base of a silver cloche-shaped instrument on the table. When the cord touched it, the cloche began to chime: ding… ding… ding…

At close range, Draco noticed the blood on Pansy’s wrists. A dirty smear ran from palm to forearm on either side, like she’d made a sloppy cut, and healed it sloppily, too.

He met her gaze. She wrenched her sleeve down.

“Did you try to heal her?”

Her face crumpled, and she turned her head sharply to hide it. She didn’t answer him.

“It wasn’t your fault,” he said.

“Stop.”

“Runes are powerful tools for simple functions. Healing, warding. They can’t address a complex medical problem.”

“Draco,” she said unsteadily, “are you actually so stupid — so piss-poor empty in the head — you think I need you to explain how runes work?”

The doors flew open. Theo stood between them, gripping Daphne by the hand like he’d pulled her from the depths of hell. Pansy gasped, actually gasped, and wilted against the wall.

“Here,” he barked. He surged down the aisle, and Daphne hurried after him. “I got her.”

“Is she alright?” Daphne cried, overtaking him. “Did I come in time?”

She leapt up on her sister’s bed and swept back her sleeve, reaching for a needle from Pomfrey’s tray. It had the practiced fluidity of a motion done a hundred times before. But Pomfrey didn’t give it to her.

“Hurry up! What is it? I told you, I’ve had sugar — is it fluids? Teddy, fetch me some water—”

“Your parents changed their policy,” Pomfrey said. “Standing permission for transfusions has been revoked. In the meantime, I’m placing your sister on a heartclock—”

“They can’t revoke it! I’m her only match! She needs my blood!”

“—to stabilize her, and giving her a fluid drip—”

“That won’t work!” Daphne screeched, and she lunged. Theo caught her, hauling her back from what appeared to be a hail-mary grab for the needle.

The heartclock was starting to slow down: the distance between chimes was growing. Each swell of Astoria’s chest failed to meet its previous height.

Theo's move cost him dearly: Daphne was stronger than him, and with a snarl, she threw an elbow that almost put him on the floor. "It won't work!" she shouted. "There's only one thing that worked, and the only supply of it is right here, and I ought to know, because it's my disease!"

"It isn't my decision. Your parents fear for Astoria's health—"

"She's dying!" Daphne screamed. "I'll show you fear for my sister's health — give me the needle—"

She lunged again, and this time, it took Pansy and Theo both leaping on her to stop her from tackling Pomfrey to the floor. Draco stepped in front of Pomfrey, his wand drawn, his heart racing. He had never seen Daphne this way. He didn't know what she might do.

"Merlin's blood, just let her," Cassius exclaimed. "You can't possibly intend to let them throw away one daughter out of — out of spite for the other."

"It isn't spite, Mr. Warrington — Miss Greengrass, please stop struggling—"

"Listen, you can hear her dying, please don't —" Daphne's wail broke into sobs. "Don't make me listen, don't make me listen to her die—"

"Pomfrey," Theo said furiously, "I'll handle her parents, just do something—"

"Daphne Greengrass is not legally cleared to give blood."

The bell gave a weak, faint chime. Then another.

Pomfrey's chest heaved. "I'm sorry, child," she said. "At your last reading, markers went up considerably."

Another chime. Daphne went still and expressionless.

“Markers of what?” said Theo. “Markers of what, Pomfrey?”

Daphne sank to lean on the bed. She blinked like she was trying to wake up.

“Answer me,” Theo snapped. “Markers of what?”

“Alpha-L immunoglobulin,” Daphne said, with a musical mnemonic lilt.

“Okay?” Pansy threw up her hands. “Hell does that mean, Daph?”

“It’s a marker for lycanthropy.”

The bell kept chiming its sad, slow song.

“Mother of Merlin,” Cassius said quietly. He was looking at Pomfrey. “And you kept her in a school.”

Theo leapt at him.

Cassius barked and seized his wand, but Draco’s was already out. A book-perfect Stupefy struck Theo in the back, and he dropped like stone.

Pansy’s reflexes alone rescued Theo’s nose from a nasty impact with the floor. She caught and lowered him carefully, while Cassius skittered back, staring at him in astonishment.

“Thank you, Malfoy,” Pansy said quietly.

Draco jerked his head in acknowledgement. There was no love lost between himself and Theodore Nott, but he had no desire to see the winner of a duel between him and Cassius Warrington.

“What happens,” he said to Pomfrey, “if you give her the blood anyway?”

“It’s inconclusive. Bloodborne lycanthropic pathogenesis hasn’t been studied, because it doesn’t often happen; the usual vector is a saliva. Lycanthropes are barred from giving blood in most circumstances.”

“Suppose you only did a small transfusion. Would that avoid the risk?”

“No.”

Pansy whimpered.

“There’s always a risk,” Pomfrey said. “I could tell you the odds of infection were low, as the concentration of pathogens in the bloodstream is minor compared to the concentrations in werewolf saliva. I could tell you I would anticipate optimal outcomes in a reasonable timeframe. I could tell you that in a choice between death and a treatable, if challenging, medical condition, not one medical professional on the planet would hesitate. But I could not tell you with confidence that she would not be infected, because I am not confident that would be the case.”

The doors slammed again. Orpheus Greengrass, Dido Greengrass, and Albus Dumbledore flew up the aisle in a confusion of shouting. When Dido saw Astoria, she gave a strangled scream and flew to her side, nearly shoving Cassius to the floor.

“Prepare her for transfusion,” Orpheus shouted at Pomfrey. He hurled a briefcase on the table. “We’ve brought blood for her.”

“What blood?” said Pomfrey. “Whose?”

“Donor organisms.”

“Daddy,” said Daphne, “did you know about me? Did they send you my results?”

Dido smoothed the hair back from Astoria’s face, murmuring.

“What ‘organisms’?” said Pomfrey.

“House-elves.” Orpheus threw open the briefcase. Inside lay three bags of blood on a bed of steaming ice. “Our researchers have confidence the blood will match.”

“Daddy?” said Daphne. “Mummy, did you know, either?”

“I entreat you,” said Dumbledore, speaking for the first time since coming into the room,“to consider what you are doing to your daughter.”

Orpheus drew himself up with righteous anger. “Spare me your sanctimony,” he said. “One of my daughters was poisoned under your care. I will do what it takes to save the other.”

He gestured furiously at Pomfrey. With an aggrieved sound, Pomfrey snatched up one of the house-elf bags and fed it into the intravenous cord. Its length flushed from gold to red.

The bell chimed again, and then once more, stronger. It picked up a faint but steady rhythm. Pansy keened and keeled over, burying her face in her hands.

Daphne slipped off the bed and staggered a bit, catching herself. She looked at her mother, but Dido was furiously darting kisses over Astoria’s face. Orpheus knelt and took Astoria’s limp hand, pressing it tightly to his lips.

Daphne stood apart from them with a distant expression, like a sailor standing in the shallows of an island he didn’t know.

Dumbledore ambled over to her and offered his arm. She stared at it, not understanding.

“Would you care to join me in my office?” he said, in a low, soft voice. “You need not stay here, if you do not wish.”

She shook her head.

“Of course. You prefer to be with your sister. May I extend an invitation, then, to come when you feel comfortable leaving her? It would please me very much.”

“I don’t… Professor, I…”

Cassius said, “You’ve broken the law.”

Dumbledore turned. Cassius lifted an unsteady finger.

“You harbored an unregistered lycanthrope. In a school full of children. For months. You… I lack the words for what you are. I lack the words for your audacity, your sheer degeneracy — I lack the words.”

“Apparently not,” said Dumbledore mildly. “You seem full of them.”

“Do you hear me? She’s a dangerous creature! I can’t believe people like the Greengrasses could be so irresponsible. It’s a tragedy to lose a daughter, I admit, but that’s no excuse for exposing other children to a predator. Something has to be done about it.”

Dumbledore’s expression changed. It slipped from its usual glaze of intelligent, disaffected concern into a piercing stare of great intensity, blue eyes flashing like small collapsing stars, the ancient lines folded deep and bitter with loathing.

The expression on Dumbledore’s face had seen far worse things than Cassius Warrington, but it liked none less.

“Perhaps you have forgotten that this is a school,” he said. His voice was gentle and firm. He could have been addressing a first year. “Given recent events, I understand the mistake. But if you attempt to have my student apprehended, I will be forced to stop you. And I will regret it. But not nearly as much as you will.”

Cassius stepped back, and bumped into the wall.

“Is that a threat?”

“Is that a question?” said Dumbledore pleasantly. “Deputy Special Inquisitor, you can escort the Greengrasses out. I have other items to attend. Miss Greengrass, do remember my invitation, please. And might someone remove Mr. Nott from the floor? He does not seem very comfortable.”

“I’ve got him,” croaked Pansy.

“Thank you, Miss Parkinson.” He glanced at Draco. “Good evening, Mr. Malfoy.”

Draco gave a wary nod.

Dumbledore’s smile became sad. His sadness unnerved Draco more than his threats; he didn’t know what sorrow the sight of himself could possibly offer that a dying girl wouldn’t.

The headmaster offered no explanation. He swept out of the Hospital Wing while the heartclock chimed faster and faster.

-Coming to you LIVE from the BOTTOMLESS BLACK PIT, it is your author, crawling briefly out to throw a chapter at the world and then crawling back in. When will she emerge next? Only the BOTTOMLESS BLACK PIT can say! For further information, please consult BOTTOMLESS BLACK PIT.

-If you have left a comment on the last chapter — and there were so many wonderful ones that I have fattened my Beloved Comment Folder by twofold, let me tell you — I hope you have a great week. And that life gives you the opportunity to pitch your enemy into a BOTTOMLESS BLACK PIT very soon. Metaphorically speaking. Or literally speaking! Chase your bliss.

-The next chapter title is still being hammered out, else I would give it here. You are my reason for writing. Thank you!!

The Crimes of Albus Dumbledore

Chapter 75: The Crimes of Albus Dumbledore

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

“I feel so stupid.”

They were alone in the Hospital Wing. Astoria had been transported to St. Mungo’s around midnight, which was when her vitals returned to normal, and her parents went with her. Daphne had stayed.

Daphne curled at the head of the bed, her knees drawn up to her chest, and with her chin perched on her kneecaps she looked very young. She wore a cornflower blue dressing-gown, and when she dipped her chin, her hair fell over the scarred half of her face.

A house-elf had brought her some tea, which lay cooling on a tray, along with a plate of shortbread and lemon cakes. Draco drank from his cup and listened to the clock tower give a single, mournful toll.

“I started giving transfusions when I was seven. Tori was three. It was obvious to everyone very early that her condition was worse than mine. She was extremely frail. Walking was difficult for her. She would get these muscle spasms that made her legs lock up. We both did, but mine were less frequent. Less severe. I could get around with a cane, but before the chair, she couldn’t get up the stairs.

“I hated giving blood. I hated needles — I still hate needles — and it meant I spent even more time in bed. It wasn’t fair. I mean, why me?” she said bitterly. She lifted her head. “Why do I have to stick around the Hall in the summers, when Millie’s in Greece, and Blaise is in Rome, and you’ve got Pans and Teddy in France? Why couldn’t I be free like the rest of you?”

She ducked her head low again, pressing her nose between her knees. “I was a fool.”

“You were seven years old.”

“Thirteen,” she spat. “A fool at seven and a fool at thirteen, and as foolish at sixteen as ever. I spent my whole life wanting to be free of her, and then I got what I wanted, and it ruined my life. Isn’t that just Daphne for you! She wants to be well again? Try a werewolf bite! She wants a date to the ball? Now Hermione loathes you! Sick of Daddy’s fussing? He can’t bear to look at her. Wants to be rid of her sister? Very good, Daphne, anything for you: she’ll learn to hate you, and die. And maybe that’ll finally teach you not to be so selfish all the time, you, you vain, stupid, spoiled little bitch—”

“Stop it.”

Daphne stopped.

He conjured a handkerchief for her. She buried her face in it.

“Hermione doesn’t loathe you,” he said. “For one thing.”

“She’d be right to. I’m hateful.”

“You’re not hateful.”

“I’m stupid.”

“Less so than most.”

“I wish I was clever,” she cried. “Then I wouldn’t mess everything up. I don’t know why I always mess everything up.”

“Don’t be dramatic,” he said tiredly. “Brilliance is no guarantee of character. Take me, for instance.”

It seemed to clear the fog of misery. Daphne lifted her head, daubing her eyes, and snorted.

“You’re not a bad person, you know,” she said. “You’re just a very silly, very sad little boy.”

“A thief knows a thief.”

Her smile grew. “Don’t we just?”

Thunder rolled. The frosted windows blazed white and then dimmed again.

“I would like you to promise me something,” she said distantly.

“Tell me what it is.”

“Promise first.”

“No.”

She smiled thinly. “Spoilsport. Fine. If I become a monster—”

“Pomfrey said you didn’t have lycanthropy.”

“That was before my readings went up.”

“Those are just readings. You’re still missing the principal symptom.” His voice was edged.

“The one where I turn into a monster?” she said, frowning into her cup. “Yes. But I don’t suppose it will be long, the way things are going.”

“It’s been almost two years since your bite. If something were going to happen, it would have happened by now.”

“Transformations don’t always start immediately,” she said, with the same distant, philosophical affect. “It happens around puberty, some say. For girls, in particular, it’s later. Some say. Anyway, if I do transform, I have to — to put my trust in someone. And trusting you was the first smart thing I ever did.”

He set down his cup with a sharp noise.

“What do you mean?”

“I don’t know,” she said helplessly. “The Defense textbook says that silver works well enough. I looked it up, you know. You’re not the only one who can read ahead.”

“Silver kills werewolves. It doesn’t cure them.”

She shrugged. “Yes,” she said in a small voice. “If you can find another way, that would be nice, but I’m trying to be realistic.”

He shoved his chair away and stood, repulsed. “No one is going to kill you. Especially not me. And I resent you for asking.”

Daphne bent her head and hid her face behind her knees.

“I always knew I wouldn’t live very long,” she said. “Ever since the diagnosis. Aunt Cilla died at twenty-one; Aunt Cassie was gone by twenty-four. Grandmama made it all the way to thirty-five. So I never thought I was going to have a career or see the world or anything. And I’ve already lived loads more in sixteen years than some of them did in thirty. If you look at it one way, it’s not a great loss.”

“Fuck’s sake. Greengrass. Stop.”

She tried, haltingly, to smile.

“I just don’t want to hurt anybody,” she said, as her voice dwindled on the threshold of tears. “I never wanted to hurt anybody. I wanted people to like me.”

“They do.”

“They won’t if I’m a monster.”

“You’d be surprised what people can overlook.”

She frowned up at him.

“You’re not going to die,” he said curtly. “What you will do is pull yourself together. If you don’t want to hurt anyone, then don’t. Take measures. Learn how to manage it. Solve the problem. Find a way out.”

“What if I can’t?” she said, trembling. She might cry. “I’m not strong. And I’m not clever. I can’t do the things you can.”

“Then get others to do them. You were willing enough to ask for help in dying; I don’t know why you think you can’t ask for help to live.”

She wrung his handkerchief fretfully. “Do you think I ought to?” she said. “Is there any point in it? I don’t want to get my hopes up for something, and be looking forward to things, and all that, if I’m just going to… I mean, can it be fixed? Really? And do you think that it’d be worth it to… I mean, can you even say for sure there’s a life for me out there, if I do make it? Because I don’t know that you can.”

He put his hand on her shoulder. The black garnet of his ring seemed lightless against the blue silk.

“I’m Lord Malfoy,” he said. “I can do anything I want.”

She smiled at him wistfully. She put her hand over his on her shoulder and rubbed it with a fond, fraternal touch.

“Then here’s to silly and sad little pureblood boys,” she said. “And the pureblood girls who never learn.”

By the time he left the Hospital Wing, blue light suffused the frost-filmed windows. Daphne stayed behind, claiming she wanted Pomfrey’s opinion on a brewing headache; he suspected the remedy she desired was actually some time alone, but he gave it to her.

Distraction shrank the distance between the Hospital Wing and Gryffindor Tower into nothing. His brain ached, and the intensity of the previous evening asserted itself with itinerant performances of all scenes — his mother, his mother's memory, Astoria's transfusion — such that he lacked the space to consider any one at length.

The common room was still and quiet as the corridor, but at the creak of the door, there was movement by the fireplace. Hermione raised her head over the sofa's back, scrubbing sleep from her eyes.

"Granger?"

She froze. Then she scrambled upright. He moved quickly to meet her, roused to fear by the look on her face.

"Merlin, what are you doing awake? It's nearly four—"

Hermione grabbed him by the front of his shirt. Her expression was so furious he was surprised it didn't burst into flames at the touch of her hand.

She wrenched him around and reached up and — his brain blanked — hauled him into a kiss.

It was a fast, angry kiss. Her mouth slanted hot and bruising on his, her teeth needling his lip. Her tongue slipped past his. He stumbled and kissed her back without finesse, worry warring against desire. She made a sharp sound and yanked his hair.

It was a cross between a punishment and a fascinating incentive to keep her angry at him all the time.

She tore back and gave him a hungry once-over, seeking fretfully anything that might be wrong with him. Her ensuing relief survived for a gratifying few seconds before irritation erupted in its place. "You went missing," she snapped. "That's the occasion. You swanned off to Dumbledore's office, alone, after a coded message that wasn't even signed, and you didn't come back to dinner and you didn't come back to the common room. Oh! And then! Theodore Nott shows up and breaks the door down, screaming his head off for Daphne, and she goes running, and the rest of us have the full night wondering when someone's going to let us in on what the hell is going on in this castle — which of course no one does — so now I'm up waiting for you—"

She broke off and swiped the back of her eyes. He looked at her in amazement.

"Sorry," she said, in a normal voice. "I'm under a lot of stress. And — if something happened to you — right after we — it'd be the last straw. You know. I can't handle, I wouldn't — I couldn't take it. So that's why. I wouldn't react this way, normally. Obviously."

"I'm not going anywhere."

"This is all very embarrassing."

"Look at me. I'm famously hard to kill."

"It's fine," she said tightly. "I overreacted. It's fine."

Something hot and sharp ignited in the back of his throat.

"My mother and I had a long conversation," he said. "Then I went to the Hospital Wing. Then I saw Greengrass. I'll tell you what happened, but you can't tell anyone. And the 'anyone' in that sentence is ironclad."

Curiosity sliced through the morass of misery and embarrassment on her face.

He drew her over to the sofa, and she sat warily with her legs balanced across his lap.

When he had finished explaining, the birds had begun trilling at the window, and the fire was almost dead. Hermione pressed her hand to her mouth, brow knit.

"If she transforms," she said, "she'll need potion. I don't know where —"

“Snape can brew Wolfsbane. I can ask him. If Dumbledore hasn’t already.”

“Is it difficult?”

“Well, if you could get it off the shelf, you’d think he would have.”

“No, I’m sure, but I mean… well, that’s a thought for down the road. She still might not transform.”

“That’s my hope.”

She leaned forward, folding her arms over her knees. “How are her parents reacting?”

He raked a hand through his hair, uncomfortable. “They didn’t acknowledge her.”

“They didn’t talk to her?”

“Her mother might’ve said a few words before they left. I don’t know. They’ve kept her at Hogwarts and haven’t told her anything, which suggests they’re trying to keep up appearances. Frankly, I’m less worried about them than I am about Warrington.”

“God, he’s everywhere. What’s his problem?”

“As I understand it, the new tests legally qualify her as a lycanthrope. Even latent ones are supposed to register with the Ministry.”

“And what would that entail?”

He rubbed his eyes. “She couldn’t go to school,” he said, grimacing. “That’s the main thing. Registered werewolves are highly regulated. They’re not allowed to get within ten kilometers of any school, or place where children live—”

“She is a child!”

“—or wizarding settlement — I’m only telling you. It’s why most of them end up living out in the wild. With other werewolves, if anyone.”

“That’s — that’s horrendous. But she’s a pureblood. And wealthy. Doesn’t that make a difference?”

“Not for Warrington,” he said. “In his mind, she’s already dead.”

“Christ, that’s disgusting.”

He shrugged: And so it is.

“And is that what they all think?” she said coldly. “Theodore and Pansy?”

“Well, there’s an interesting question. If I had to say a word for Nott and Parkinson — and to be clear, I preferably wouldn’t — I would say their devotion to Daphne, as a person, is genuine, and it runs deep. I would also say their devotion to any ideology whatsoever is strategic and, to the extent it exists, shallow. I venture they would accept her as an exception to the rule. When Warrington called her an animal, Nott swung on him.”

“On Cassius?” she repeated incredulously, sitting up a little. “I thought they were allies.”

“Alliances have limits. Maybe she’s one of them.”

“But that’s incredibly foolish,” she said flatly. “Cassius is Theo’s best connection in the Ministry. And his arrival prompted Theo to start doing… whatever it is he’s doing with Myrtle.”

“You still think they’re connected? The castle walls aren’t as thick as Warrington’s skull.”

“He’s cruel, not stupid,” she replied evenly. “And more importantly, he’s an adult. That means he’s capable of leaving the castle.”

It took him only a moment to understand what she meant. “Making him the only way to get information out of the castle that doesn’t require it to pass Umbridge’s desk.”

“Exactly. But to what end, I’m still not sure.”

Abruptly, she leaned over and pressed her head into his shoulder. He shifted to accommodate her, and she pressed tightly into his lap, her head set under the arch of his chin. He wrapped his arm around her waist and wondered how anyone so small could produce so much heat. It was like having a furnace pressed over his navel.

He could feel the twitch of her heartbeat against his palm on her back. When he noticed it, his heart slowed to match it.

Embers snapped. The light was so low that only a faint warm glow from the grate spared them from darkness.

“I don’t know what’s going to happen,” she said, as if she were confessing a humiliating secret.

“No one does.”

“But something will, won’t it? Something has to. We keep saying there’s going to be a war, but what does that mean? Attacks in the papers? Things happening in the Wizengamot? There haven’t been battles. We don’t know how large the enemy is, or how many of them are out there. I used to think if someone threatened my friends, I’d find a way to fight it. But now there is, and I’m — what am I doing? Hosting study groups. Prefect patrols. Trying to pass my exams.”

“We’re students. That’s what we should be doing.”

“It’s what we should have been doing,” she said, brittle. “In a world that doesn’t exist, and maybe never could. Draco, I want to do something that matters. When the war comes, I want to know I didn’t waste the time I had left pretending it never would.”

Instinctively, he wanted to ask why it would be such a waste to pretend. If everything had to end, it didn't seem like such a terrible thing to remember what it felt like to be free.

"Peace in our time is not your personal burden to bear."

She drew back and frowned at him. "Yes, it is," she said. "It's mine as much as anyone else's."

"Merlin's fucking sake."

"It is! We're not ignorant, we have knowledge, we have skills—"

"We're not yet seventeen."

"Lily Potter was my age when she joined the Order of the Phoenix."

"Lily Potter is dead." His throat was tight. "This isn't dragons and mermaids. It isn't an adventure. When wizards go to war, it's a killing field."

"All wars are a killing field. And I never said it was an adventure." Hermione lifted her chin, head high. "And Lily Potter killed Lord Voldemort."

Draco repressed a surge of revulsion. He put the back of his hand to his mouth, quelling bile.

White masks leering through the hedge and mist. Green light. A boy's body on the floor.

"Don't," he snapped.

"It's a fact," she said stubbornly. "I didn't mean any—"

"Granger, don't say that to me," he said quietly. "We both know damn well what you mean by it."

Hermione swallowed, caught out, and turned her head to regard the fireplace. She did not acknowledge that she had tried to lie to him, and he did not further the point. Even with her face to the flames, the circles beneath her eyes were deep, and abiding.

“I don’t know what you want me to say,” she said.

“Something that will convince me you value your life as much as I do.” He ran his hand down her wrist and turned her bandaged hand. “You haven’t used the phoenix tears.”

“I’m saving them. And I do value my life, Draco, I just happen to value other things more—”

“I know it well. That’s my problem.”

“You don’t mean that,” she said, frowning at him. “You care about freedom. And fairness. And justice, you wouldn’t still be here if you didn’t.”

“Where’s ‘here’?”

“With me,” she said incredulously. She gestured between them, furiously, as if trying to illustrate a thick, heavy cord connecting them. “Together. Partners. Whatever we are. In every sense, and in every way there is. You wouldn’t be with me if you didn’t believe it.”

“You think I wouldn’t be with you if you weren’t on the side of the angels?” His tone bordered on withering.

She shot him an equally withering look. “No. But you can’t pretend you don’t know where the angels are, you’ve been standing with them too long. A sneer and a one-liner don’t change that. They might work with other people. They certainly don’t with me.”

“If you amassed the world’s justice,” he said, “and its fairness, and its freedom, and you set them on a scale against you — judged according to the bearing they have on my mind, the command they have of my choices—”

“Oh, don’t even—”

“It would not move.”

“I don’t believe you! I don’t believe that I would win, and that’s a good thing,” she said snappishly, folding her arms. One could always trust her to get peeved at a compliment. “You don’t have to take this line. You can care for me and still admit you’re a good person. I’m not going to be irritated—”

“I did not say it would not win; I said it would not move. The scale would break before it lifted you.”

“Why won’t you admit you’re on our side?” she demanded. “I know you’re with Harry. Everyone in Gryffindor knows you’re with Harry. Nobody who knows you thinks for one moment you’d abandon him.”

“Maybe I care for him. Did you think of that? Maybe I think the world has dealt him enough suffering. Maybe I would like to see the next chapter of his inexcusably sad life redeemed, however briefly, by some measure of safety and happiness.”

“Yes,” she exclaimed, “that’s the war. It’s about safety and happiness. For Harry, and for everyone. If you’re for that, you’re on the side of the angels. It’s really that simple.”

“I’m not on your side. I’m with you.”

“That’s the same thing, Draco.”

Are you sure? he wanted to say, but he didn’t want her to look at him the way she would if he did. He glowered at the coals.

“It’s never ‘for everyone,’” he said. “That’s why it’s not simple.”

Hermione drew breath to reply — assuredly something cutting and intelligent that would have made him feel even more wretched — and the stairs creaked. She whipped around as Draco turned his head, and they both watched Ron emerge from the boys' staircase. At the sight of them perched closely on the sofa, Ron's mouth gave a sour twist, and his eyes narrowed.

"I heard you from the bathroom," he said stiffly. "If you're having a lovers' spat, could you save it for the morning? Rest of us are trying to sleep."

Hermione bridled. "Cast Muffliato," she said sharply. "Or do something. You're a perfectly capable fifth-year wizard, and it isn't our fault you forget it."

Ron scowled and dropped his head. Draco remained silent, drumming his fingers on the back of the sofa, and waited to see what he would do.

"I heard you talking about the war," muttered Ron.

Draco stiffened. He was tempted to say: And since? But he did not want to give Ron the satisfaction of riling him.

"How much did you hear?" said Hermione warily.

"'Peace in our time.' And something about fighting." He raised his chin. "You two planning something, then?"

"No," she replied. "We're talking about how useless I feel, actually."

"Yeah? You sure?"

"Excuse me? What does that mean?"

"I dunno," he said aggressively. "I come out and you two are cozied up together, talking about Harry and war—"

"That was a private conversation! It wasn't meant for you!"

Draco sighed. “Don’t be dramatic, Ronald.”

“I’m not being dramatic,” Ron exclaimed. “You know what? Fine! You two can go off and snog each other’s brains out, fine! None of my sodding business. Fine. But if you start making war plans without the rest of us—”

“We’re not making ‘war plans’ without you!” She shot up off the couch as if scalded, and her departure left Draco feeling cold. “What possible reason could you even have for that? The fact we’re having a conversation without you in it?”

“Yes, that’s exactly what I said, Mione. Good job. O for listening.”

“Then tell me what you are saying, Ron, because you’ve just come have a go at me for the capital sin of talking in private—”

“Sorry! I guess the rest of us should just leave you and your boyfriend alone, yeah? Stop interfering?”

“If you’re going to be horrible, then yes,” she shouted. Her hair swung free around her shoulders with the force of her gesture, broad and crackling with the static of her anger. “Leave me and Draco alone, why don’t you? That’s what you want, isn’t it? You picked a fight and you got one, and now you get to run off and sulk and tell yourself it’s my fault you’re feeling shitty. So go on! Save us some time! Make yourself someone else’s problem!”

Draco glanced at her sharply, then at Ron, keeping his expression still. His face was warm.

“You don’t mean that,” Ron said faintly. “You’re just — cross at me. S’all. Mione, you don’t mean it.”

“Oh, go cry to Harry,” she snapped.

She whirled around and sat down hard on the couch, every muscle rigid. Ron made a furious noise and fled up the stairs, his feet pounding on the steps.

Draco tipped his head back, inhaled, and exhaled for a long time.

“Don’t say it,” Hermione said thickly. When he looked over, she had her head in her hands, and she was muttering through her fingers. “I know I was horrible. I am horrible. Just — please don’t say anything for a little bit.”

“Granger—”

“Don’t,” she gasped. “Please don’t say anything. If you do, I’m going to scream.”

Wordlessly, he reached for her. With a gasp, she clambered into his arms, and she flung her head into the cradle of his neck and shoulder. Her arms wound tight around his neck. She made a long, thin sound of despair.

“You’re not horrible,” he murmured. He rested his chin over her head, and felt her shiver. “It was a row. You and I have had them. So has Ronald. It isn’t the first.”

“I’m getting worse,” she whispered. She sounded afraid. “I’m getting meaner. I’m less patient with him. With Harry. Draco, it’s getting harder. I’m getting angrier, and I can feel myself getting worse.”

“You’re still yourself. You’re different, not worse.” He ran his hands through her hair, freeing the sharp, sweet scent of citrus. “That’s life. You can’t be the same person you were at eleven. Though candidly, you were none too patient then, either.”

She laughed wetly into his chest. “Was I horrible then, too?”

“Wickedly.”

“Do you promise?”

“You were an impatient, thankless, horrible creature from the day we met,” he said, “and if you ever improved, I would never forgive you.”

He drew her face back, holding her chin cupped in her hands. She leaned up and kissed him, her lips grazing his chastely, soft and wet. He kissed her back, gently, and settled her back to his chest. He pressed his nose into her crown, and she gave another little shiver. The wind began to howl.

The term crawled on. Fleeting gasps of daylight slipped through the frosted windows, and shadows turned rounds on the ancient stones. Evenings blurred into each other. The nights were so long that sometimes they could spend an afternoon in the dungeons and emerge to perfect darkness at the windows. Quidditch practices took place with the floodlights on, regardless of the hour — for the other three Houses, who had resumed play for the Cup in a sequence of slow, ill-attended matches, since attendance was capped.

Daphne returned to Gryffindor Tower with a smile and an alibi. She had been called to comfort her sister in a medical emergency, she said, and the others accepted the explanation as reasonable, which it was. Astoria’s chair made the revelation of her infirmity less than shocking for most, and Daphne played to it by interpolating threads of truth: the poor dear, she’d been sick her whole life; grew up alone in a big house with no one but Daphne and her cats for company; and who but her big sister could soothe her in a moment of pain and fear?

She did not breathe the word ‘lycanthropy,’ and Draco respected her wishes by striking it from his vocabulary also. He steered the conversation away from her health, where possible; he silently removed werewolves from Defense Club’s March curriculum. Feigning normalcy seemed to be the only thing to be done for Daphne, and so he did it, persistently and well.

She lied blithely and well about it, which surprised Draco, for some reason. He never doubted that she could, but it was disconcerting to realize that if he hadn’t known the truth he would not, most likely, have been able to tell the difference.

A shrinking set of objects in his life did not dispirit him to remember upon waking. There were his studies, which he had always enjoyed, and now approached the reaping of his efforts in; there were his books, his music, the headphones and cassettes he hid beneath a secret compartment in his bedside drawer; there were the empty corridors on prefect patrols, peaceful and dark, as if nothing had changed since first year; and there was Hermione.

Hermione, scowling and scheming and fishing quills out of his pockets whenever she needed one. Hermione, clever and cunning and banging his door at six in the morning to go over notes. Hermione, crabby and stubborn and refusing to go to bed, dozing on his shoulder in the common-room.

Hermione whom he could touch, with her dark eyes and her hard scowl and the way she steered him around by the robes or the wrist when she wanted something, and he let her, because it pleased him that she wanted to.

For when the common room emptied, as it did late at the night, he could do things he couldn’t in public. He could reach for her hand and tug it pointedly, until she understood and rolled her eyes and climbed over to sit nearer, and sometimes he could turn — quash the instinctive feeling of unreality — and draw her face up for a kiss. And she would make a fussy little noise, feigning surprise, as if to say: How shocking that I, Hermione Granger, have been kissed by a boy I have been staring at like some sort of edible object for the past hour. The unmitigated gall of men!

And then she would break off and scold him for distracting her. Then she would usually kiss him again. He soon gave up on trying to understand her modes of seduction, and was happier for it.

There was a certain kind of pleasure in keeping a secret.

It still seemed indecent to make displays. There wasn't a reason it should be; both of them understood, insofar as one ever could, what was going on, or beginning to be going on; but after so many years of habituation in one mode of being with each other and others, their inertia prevented any sudden changes. She sat at an appreciable distance when the four of them were together, and he kept his hands to himself. He touched her back when she climbed a stair ahead of him, and she leaned on his shoulder when she needed to remove a stone in her shoe, but these things they had done before, and if anyone noticed them, they had the good sense not to remark on the relationship of the Gryffindor prefects, which after all had always lain well outside the parameters of common understanding.

It was unclear to what extent they succeeded in discretion, since Ron still made a point of removing himself whenever Harry wasn't with them. Moreover, he seemed determined never to be left with Hermione or Draco individually. He stuck doggedly to Harry's side through the last weeks of term, leaving the library when he did, taking meals when he did, and following him to bed at night.

"I don't like the idea of him alone," he said. "Not now. That's all."

"You're right, but you don't have to do it all yourself," said Hermione. "Draco and I could—"

"No. I've got him," he said brusquely, shouldering his bag to leave them.

These and other changes seemed to mark a shift in Ron's relationship with Hermione. He had stopped asking her for help with his homework, and rebuffed her inquiry about his O.W.L. study plan. He did not invite her to play wizard's chess, or Snap, or any other game the Weasley family might take up on a cold evening. When he came upon her reading in the common room, he did not strike up a conversation about the book, but went off to find Harry, or — more startling still — simply sat down with his own books, and worked.

He was not rude to her, or to Draco, for that matter; if anything, he was unusually civil. He spoke to them with brittle but unchipped politeness, as if he did not quite know who they were, or how to be with him, but he was still trying to treat them well.

It was a reversion, of sorts, to a mean that had never existed — to a state of disknowledge they had never assumed with each other, because even if they had not always liked each other, they had never been strangers. His first hours in Hogwarts Castle had been punctuated by a fight with Ron Weasley. Most of the rest of them had been engaged in a long, emotionally complicated friendship. They had never been strangers, and it made the castle an emptier place.

Cho took to lingering around the common room before curfew, speaking to Harry in low tones in some corner. They had repaired the rift in their relationship, but in consequence spent a lot of time in each other's pockets, chatting quietly in the window or playing games of Snap in an odd, un-companionable silence. Draco had seen them walking together in the hallways, her hand in his, and exchanging short, awkward kisses at the doors; neither of them seemed to know much what to do with the other. The most comfortable they seemed to be with each other was when they were sitting together by the Gryffindor fire, her head on his shoulder, watching the flames in a remote and disparate silence.

"Not to be rude," Ron said under his breath, "but is he ever going to tell her to fuck off?"

They were coming back from Ravenclaw quidditch practice, which was one of the few reliable sources of fresh air. Harry came to watch, with a forlorn expression that Draco wondered wasn't more painful than not coming. The other three had used the excuse to procure some grindylows for the next Defense Club lesson, which now resided in shrunken mason jars in Hermione's bag.

Harry walked several paces ahead with Cho. The girl silently picked her way over the rocks. His black cloak flickered next to Cho's blue uniform.

“That is rude,” said Daphne agreeably. “Her father’s a muggle. I’m sure she must be positively overwhelmed by despair.”

“One manages,” Hermione muttered.

“I don’t know what she wants Harry to do about that.”

“I don’t know what you want her to do about it, either,” said Daphne indulgently. “Captain the sunshine brigade?”

“Tell you what I want her to do. Three words: Pack it in.”

Daphne’s laugh was sweet and tinkling. “Ronald,” she said, “we’ll make a pureblood of you yet.”

A strange, cycling sunset darted through the spokes of passing clouds, and wind whipped the hems of their cloaks.

As they approached the clock tower courtyard, someone gave a cry. Draco was first to draw his wand, but Harry charged ahead of him, almost skidding on the wet cobble.

Four members of the Inquisitorial Squad stood in file around the comparatively tiny person of Victoria Frobisher, whom Blaise Zabini had pinned with an arm behind her back. She was struggling like a trapped dog, and Blaise had to jerk her to hold her still.

Pansy stood in front of her, hip cocked, a black armband dangling from one crooked finger. She was flanked by one dark head and a gold one: Theo and Cassius.

“...expect me to believe that, you little rat? Who gave it to you?”

“Your mum,” snarled Victoria. “And then she begged me to shove it up her—”

Pansy slapped her. Victoria shrieked.

“I’ll ask you once more, brat: who gave this to you?”

“She’s ELEVEN!” Harry roared. He shoved off Cho’s clutch on his arm and stormed into the courtyard, tearing his wand from his pocket. Pansy jumped, and Victoria gave a triumphant cry. “Take your hands off her! She’s eleven years old!”

Cho cried out, but Ron tackled Harry to the ground.

“Harry, NO!”

“Get off me! Let me go—”

Startled, Blaise dropped Victoria. She sprawled into the ground face-first, but soon sprang back up, grinning. There was a bruise on her chin.

“Now you’ve done it,” she told Pansy with relish. “Bitch! You’re in for it now.”

“Stop it,” Hermione hissed. “Go back to the common room.”

Victoria stabbed a middle finger at Pansy and shot off into the cloisters.

None of the Inquisitors were pleased by Hermione’s intervention, but least of all Cassius. The sneer he bestowed on all of them was less than amicable, but the way he looked at Hermione — with her chin high, and her teeth all but bared in a frigid smile — was warlike. His eyes spoke the language of loathing. His white knuckles added an exclamation point.

Draco stepped into the courtyard beside Hermione. Theo tensed. Draco mistook it for apprehension.

Then Daphne emerged from the cloisters behind him, her cloak drawn back, her hands raised high on either side of her head.

“Shall we all calm down?”

Her housemates regarded her with a menagerie of unhappiness.

“I quite agree,” said Cassius. “Are you feeling quite recovered from your illness, Daphne? Your sister is well, you will be glad to know.”

He said it mildly, but Theo wheeled on him and snarled something harsh and inaudible. Daphne stepped back, flattening her hand over her mouth, and shook her head. Her eyes were wide and pleading.

Confusion flickered in Cassius’s face. He hesitated, glancing between Theo and Daphne, and then said: “What the devil is into you people?”

Draco noticed it too swiftly to give it thought, but Cassius frowned at Daphne, as if he were concerned for her. What could have surprised him? Surely Cassius had made enough threats in his life to understand why she’d been shaken. Surely that was what he intended.

Unless he didn’t think it was a threat. But what would be the benefit of mentioning it? He’d called her a monster; he couldn’t possibly be sincere.

Before anyone could speak, footsteps clattered on the cobble. Neville spun into the courtyard and clutched the wall.

“Draco!” he shouted. “Harry— Hermione! Entrance Hall! Come on!”

“Longbottom, what—”

Neville slashed his hand. “No time! Come now!”

That Neville had ventured to interrupt Draco had immediate effect. Hermione spun on her heel and followed him, drawing her wand, and Ron scrambled up. He clasped Daphne’s elbow on his way out, and with a fretful glance over her shoulder at Theo, she let him draw her out of the courtyard.

Draco did not spare such a glance behind him when he followed, but Cassius’s laugh rang out in his ears as he left the courtyard.

The doors to the Entrance Hall hung wide. Draco shoved through a tightly-packed crowd, wand drawn.

A ring of students enclosed a gladiatorial space at the center of the hall. A large haunting of ghosts formed a second audience overhead. Professors and students mingled shoulder to shoulder in the medley; above them all, Umbridge presided from the first stair, her purple robes flush against the dark sea of onlookers, like a lilac planted in tar. Three patrolmen stood behind her, their caps drawn low over their faces, watching expressionlessly.

She lifted one of the Potter's Army armbands.

"So!" she cried. "At last! Evidence of what many of you may have long suspected: that Harry Potter has tried to foment violent rebellion against the Ministry."

Above her on the first landing of the Grand Staircase, Dumbledore stood alone, his hands folded before him. In a rare change, he wore a professor's robes, with the ceremonial hood and cap, rather than his usual blues. The effect thinned and swallowed him: the many lines in his ancient face seemed to multiply by the second, and the little blood in it withdrew so much his skin looked cold to the touch. The professor's robes made him seem shorter, somehow, and so feebler. His pince-nez rested on the long tip of his nose, and he peered over them at Umbridge with the intent concern of someone trying to intuit a language he did not speak.

"This movement," she added, twisting it to and fro, "which was conceived and assembled in violation of Educational Decrees, has stationed itself firmly in opposition to the Ministry, the school administration, and any attempts at law and order. You may see here evidence of its organization, which has spread its fingers through the student body; examine the lightning-bolt, clearly modeled after Mr. Potter's facial disfigurement — the red, for his House — not to mention its proliferation among students with disciplinary records! Of whom Mr. Potter is himself a singular example!"

Harry shoved forward, his expression as close to murder as Draco had ever seen on his small, dark face. Hermione stood beside him, her hand wrapped tightly around his wrist.

“Dolores,” cried McGonagall, shoving her way abreast of the crowd. “Abandon this circus! At Hogwarts, we handle disciplinary matters in private.”

“This is not a disciplinary matter. This is national security.”

“National security? This is a school!”

“Yes,” agreed Umbridge. “And where better to strike at a nation than the minds of its children? Albus?”

“Indeed,” he said. “I quite agree.”

“For you see, Harry Potter is not solely responsible,” she continued. “In fact, a young boy like himself can do quite little in his own right. Why should Mr. Potter have any resentment for the Ministry? Why should he abhor what is good and just, what is right and orderly, when he himself is the victim of great injustice and disorder? Why should he revile the Ministry unless someone had first taught him to? What is anarchy, after all, but contempt for authority, and reverence for those who think themselves above it?”

Draco caught sight of Snape rising from the stairwell to the dungeons, his robes unfurling from the shadow like smoke. He glanced at Umbridge, then swept his eyes through the crowd and fixed them unerringly on Draco.

A piercing pain split the front of Draco’s skull. He buckled and gripped the wall to stay upright.

Snape’s voice cut through the pain, loud and strong as a fresh memory.

SAY NOTHING.

“Draco?” Hermione grabbed his shoulder. Her face swam.

SAY NOTHING. DO NOTHING.

With some difficulty, he cleared his mind. He pictured black glass, ice on a lake, the color at the center of a candle. He summoned a place where thoughts turned flat and cold, where there was no feeling and no perception, only data and more data. It was difficult. He pushed harder, until he could feel his mind itself receding from the body, numbing to the sensations of the Entrance Hall.

Snape’s voice receded. The Potions Master’s expression flickered — pride? Or relief? — and he turned away from Draco, stepping through the ring of students at Umbridge’s feet.

“You will remember, Mr. Warrington, the testimony I gave to the Minister in October that Albus Dumbledore had been identified as an affiliate of several persons known to be in rebellion against the Ministry? Will you recite them for me?”

He smiled. “Mundungus Fletcher, Undesirable Number 273. Remus Lupin, Undesirable Number 94. Sirius Black, Undesirable Number 3 —”

“On what evidence?” McGonagall cut in loudly. “Or was the bother of proving your allegations too burdensome?”

“And Alastor Moody, Undesirable Number pending, currently suspected of treason,” Cassius continued, raising his voice over hers, “in conjunction with increasing evidence of affiliation with the aforementioned.”

“I ask again: on what evidence?”

“Alastor is an old friend,” said Dumbledore calmly. “I send him Christmas cards. We fought a war together, you see.”

“Through these affiliations,” continued Umbridge, “Dumbledore has knowingly aided, abetted, and I daresay directed the activities of the underground terrorist cell known as the Order of the Phoenix. On the basis of affiliation alone, he could be summoned for questioning. He has also violated several laws compelling the disclosure of any information about the whereabouts of wanted criminals, which is a second-class offense subject to penalties not excluding imprisonment.”

“But you have no evidence,” cried McGonagall, with mean satisfaction. “You have no proof! Only one of those persons has visited Hogwarts in the last year! You are indulging in a childish grudge at the expense of the rule of law — I invite you to see what your baseless suspicions will purchase in front of a judge!”

“Minerva,” said Dumbledore, his weariness laced with tenderness. “Please.”

Umbridge’s expression did not alter from a placid, beatific smile. “But I do have evidence,” she said. She lifted her chin and spoke to the far end of the room. “Eyewitness evidence, in fact. Severus?”

Opposite her, with his back pressed against the doors to the Great Hall, Snape’s expression did not change, either. It remained empty, even as McGonagall rounded on him with visible anger in every line of her body.

“Will you confirm,” said Umbridge, in tones of recitation, “that Albus Dumbledore had secret meetings with the aforementioned persons? In Hogsmeade, Edinburgh, and London?”

Slowly, his dark eyes glittering unreadably, Snape dipped his head.

Hermione went stiff. She seized Harry’s wrist as if to restrain him, but he wasn’t moving. Draco could not see his face, but he could imagine it.

He thought: Impossible. It wasn't possible for Snape to betray Dumbledore. It just wasn't in Snape's nature to do; he was vicious, but he was loyal. Narcissa had said he was loyal. She had said that he should trust Snape, even if he could trust nothing else. And he had; not just because she told him to, but because he knew his godfather, and he knew what pulled his strings. Snape was Dumbledore's man, not for Dumbledore's sake, but for the sake of a muggle-born girl who had died fifteen years ago.

No, it was impossible; it was insane, it was unnatural and anathema, for a man to keep a woman's memory for fifteen years and forget her on the sixteenth. It was beyond the powers of the heart to evict something embedded so deeply, and it was beyond the powers of the mind to forget it.

"Will you confirm that he entertained these meetings for the purpose of coordinating the activities of the Order of the Phoenix, to which he belongs?"

Snape dipped his head again.

"Will you confirm," she finished triumphantly, "that the sighting of Undesirable Number One in Godric's Hollow on Christmas day resulted from an unsuccessful attempt to rendezvous with Albus Dumbledore?"

"Does procedure require you to confirm every item in the witness's report?" said Snape idly. "Or do you fear an error in reading comprehension?"

"There is no need for rudeness," she snapped. "I made a note of your involvement, as well, Professor. I remind you that the goodwill of the Ministry can be withdrawn, once earned!"

McGonagall said: "Severus, what have you done?"

"Followed orders," said Snape, without looking at her.

“Orders!” She hitched up her skirts and swept forward with a face of vengeful promise — for a moment it looked certain that she would draw on him — but Dumbledore cleared his throat, and she wrenched herself back.

Umbridge unfolded a slip of parchment and some reading glasses from her breast pocket. “Indeed,” she said cheerfully. “To the letter, as is his duty. Now. I have here a warrant for the arrest of Albus Dumbledore. In a moment, my friends Albright and Munkover will take him into custody. But before they do, I wanted to show the student body — well, firstly, to show them that not even the highest and noblest in their regard are above the law! A sad lesson, but a necessary one. It is such a risky business, having heroes, isn’t it, Albus?”

“Oh, yes,” said Dumbledore. His voice sounded as far away as his expression. “For my part, I never do.”

“Do something,” Ron muttered. His fists were balled, and he was glaring at Dumbledore as if he could perform the Imperius wordless and wandless. “Do something. Stop standing there like an idiot. Fight.”

“He can’t,” said Hermione under her breath.

“He could try.”

“Try what, Ron? She has a warrant—”

“Jinx Snape. Jinx Umbridge! I don’t fucking know, Hermione!”

Harry had started to shake. Draco drew his wand.

Say nothing. Do nothing.

It was impossible for a man to cast off vows like Snape’s. There were some things the law could not command. Forgetting was one of them. He had to believe, even if no one else did, that his godfather was the kind of man who did not forget his promises. Because it was the only way he could believe that Snape would try to keep his promise to him, Draco Malfoy, a boy he had known since birth and before it. A boy whose life had been entrusted to him by Narcissa, in case of the worst. A boy whom he once sent Lucius Malfoy's cigarette lighter as a Christmas present, and taught Dark curses from the margins of his book.

It was an odd language of affection, to be sure. But perhaps it was the only tongue available to someone who had lived so long and so far beyond the light of others' love, and by the time the light grazed him again, his heart had grown strange and hairy in the dark.

Say nothing. Do nothing.

Umbridge handed the warrant off to Cassius and signaled to the patrolmen, who drew their wands.

"Moreover," she announced, "I want to offer all students with any knowledge of this… 'Potter's Army,' or the Order of the Phoenix, or any other insurgent movements of which they may be aware, the opportunity to come forward. I am not unreasonable! Come to my office with any information about the crimes of Albus Dumbledore, and you will have my protection. And remember that I will reward generosity in kind."

A round of whispering erupted. Umbridge waited for it to dwindle, smiling patiently, before she spoke again. "I will also offer you the chance to confess. Those who do not will be prosecuted, but dealt with privately, discreetly... I remind you that for those students who are of-age, that crime is punishable by imprisonment in Azkaban. For children, expulsion, and a permanent revocation of your license to practice magic." She regarded the crowd seriously over her reading glasses. "I will warn you now that for some of you, evidence of such involvement already exists. The guilty should hence feel especially forthcoming, as they are in most need of my generosity."

Whatever thin strand held Harry's patience snapped. He dove into the crowd and cleaved apart the wall of students, who parted with mingled cries.

"It's not their fault!" he screamed. "It's me you want, isn't it? It's me —"

"HARRY!"

"Harry, no!"

Agitation cracked the horrified hush. Behind Harry, Ginny wrestled out of the crowd with her own wand drawn, no doubt encouraged by his example; Fred and George flanked her. At her elbow, Luna Lovegood was rocking on her heels, red-faced, as if physically buffeted by fury.

Suddenly it felt as if everything was happening very slowly, or Draco was living in double-time. He could see the whole room at once, each scowl and grimace, every bared snarl, each hand poised on a wandsheath. He saw the patrolmen gazing with keen and dangerous interest at Harry. He saw Umbridge, whose eyes gleamed covetously as Harry stepped into the ring.

"Take me, then!" Harry was shouting. His voice was high and strained and not entirely lucid. He kept striding toward Umbridge, who subtly gestured for the patrolmen to stand down. "You win! Take me and be fucking done with it all — you want something to arrest me for? FINE! Here you go!"

He reached for his wand. McGonagall gasped.

Ron lunged for him only too late. Hermione cried out, but it was Draco who raised his arm.

It was a clean line, a perfect hit, the pride of any duelist: the Stunning Spell streaked neatly through a chink in the crowd and struck the square of Harry's back. He collapsed, and Ginny dove to catch him.

Noise erupted. The students surged back in a buffering wave, knocking everyone back. Umbridge, with a shade of disappointment coloring her face, called over the din: “Thank you for that… heroism, Mr. Malfoy. It was quite unnecessary, but I thank you for it.”

Draco said nothing. His heart pounded bruises on the inside of his chest. He lowered his wand and jerked his chin in acknowledgement, which thankfully was enough for her to move on.

“Oh thank God,” Hermione breathed. “Oh, thank God. Thank God. Thank God for you, thank you, thank God.” She was staring at the unconscious Harry and gripping Draco’s offhand so that his fingers grew numb. Fred and George quickly fumbled the unconscious Harry out of Umbridge’s line of sight, and McGonagall shepherded them closely, her own hand never straying from her wand.

There was too much babbling to hear what happened next: Umbridge said something to the patrolmen, who turned and began to advance on Dumbledore. Dumbledore watched them approach curiously, as if he really had no idea what they intended to do. One of them extended a hand and began talking quickly, gesturing at the door. The other kept his hand on his wand.

“Ah,” said Dumbledore, cocking his head in understanding. The clamor dimmed at the sound of his voice. “You would like me to come quietly.”

“It is not a question of what we would like,” said Umbridge, her disappointment fading quickly into a sunny smile. “You see, I do not think even you would be so reckless as to start a fight in a room full of children.”

Hermione’s grip tightened, then slackened.

“Oh, you bitch,” she said, with a low and wondrous passion.

“What is your end here, Dolores?” inquired Dumbledore. “I ascertain that you mean to convict me. Very well. What then?”

Her face wrinkled. “That will be decided by the jury,” she sniffed. “It will be out of my purview— I may give recommendations, of course, as a witness—”

“Yes? And where will you tell them to put me?” He cut across her effortlessly, his voice crushing hers beneath its velvety grandeur. “Azkaban? Nurmengard? I fail to grasp your intentions. Do you think you possess a prison that would hold me, if I wished to leave it?”

Umbridge’s mouth fell open; a wave of murmurs crested over the crowd.

“You,” she said, “may think that — many wizards do — that they are invulnerable, but—”

“Did it never occur to you that a prison could fail?”

“—but you will obey the law, in the end, as everyone must—”

“Did you never imagine a wall could break?”

“You will surrender yourself to Ministry custody,” she said angrily, mastering herself. “You will be tried. And you will be imprisoned. And we will build a prison to hold you, if we must.”

“Another prison?” he said sadly. “Is that the best you can do? Try, Dolores. Just once, for your old teacher. Try to think a little harder.”

“Do not lecture me! You have obstructed justice and engaged in political scheming to indemnify Harry Potter from prosecution. Your mismanagement of this school has resulted in countless injuries, an international political crisis, and the death of an auror, not to mention a seventeen-year-old boy. You have conspired against justice, order, and goodness, to effect a violent revolution, and enlist children in your petty wars. You are a corrupter, a manipulator, a rabble-rouser — a pitiful old man with delusions of grandeur,” Umbridge spat, panting, “and you will face justice — if it is the last — thing — I do!”

“My justice has been much delayed,” agreed Dumbledore. “But I have a long road yet to tread before it finds me. Your justice, on the other hand, I suspect is not far behind you.” He turned to the Deputy Headmistress, who stood rigidly at the foot of the stairs — poised, it seemed, to attack.

“Minerva, keep the fires burning,” he said. “When I return, I will not come quietly, either.”

“Yes, sir.”

He drew his wand. Something glittered at his wrist: a silver keyring, strung with charms, whose shape he recollected as if from a distant dream.

“And to my students,” he said, “I leave my best advice, which is a warning. The enemy lies not before you, nor ahead, but in your mind, where its power is deepest and strongest; in times of grief and suffering, when you fear you cannot stand the weight you bear, the enemy is the lie that you must stand alone. Remember your enemy; to resist him is to resist anything.”

He lifted his hands over his head. Umbridge cried out.

There was a thunderclap like a giant snapping its fingers.

Light filled the castle, blinding as the birth of a sun. The room’s features sank into pure white. Draco threw his arm over his eyes. Around him there came the rolling cries and thuds of a room dropping to its knees. Hermione’s hand clenched his as she sank down, head buried in her arm. A piercing whistle split the air.

The doors slammed against the walls, thrown open by some great thrust. Wind flung itself moaning into the hall, and fingers of fog trawled in. The grey and sodden courtyard lay dull under a curtain of rain. High overhead, a flame-bright bird with a long tail flapped its wings and gave a shuddering cry.

Hermione gave a throttled sob, and then clapped her hand over her mouth angrily, as if chastising herself. Whispers ran in rising cross-currents among the students. A few gave cries of dismay, but they were soon silenced by prefects and patrolmen.

Dumbledore was gone. As the rain began to fall, the patrolmen came down and picked over the courtyard, looking for evidence of where he had gone. They did not find it, and by and by, they left.

-Thanks for sticking with me, lads. We're crawling back out of the black pit, but we're like, making a home for ourselves in the shallows.

-I've been struggling to keep up with comments, but I do read as many of them as I can. Thank you so much for your generosity and your continued attention, it's a pit-lantern. If you've commented on the last chapter, I hope you find an elaborate and beautiful lamp.

-Next chapter should be along in a couple weeks; title: "Potter's Army."

Delilah in the Lethe

Chapter 76: Delilah in the Lethe

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

The hall was warded off until the aurors arrived. Umbridge stayed in the Entrance Hall with her patrolmen and a rapidly growing number of Ministry representatives — one of them seemed to hurry in from the courtyard every few minutes — while the Heads of House ushered their students out. Slytherin disappeared downstairs. Prefects were enlisted to guide stragglers. In these ways it felt vaguely like Opening Feast, only colored in a very different feeling.

Draco was among the last on the grand staircase, after the hall had emptied and the sun had set. Snape did not reappear; McGonagall, who had carried Harry upstairs in her own arms, likewise did not; nor did Umbridge seem to notice that Draco was in the room, so engrossed was she with the aurors.

He had climbed the stairs to Gryffindor Tower for five years. He knew them better than any part of the castle, and perhaps the Manor, come to that. Each creaking board and narrowed step, the chip in the banister where Neville dropped his cauldron, the windowsill where the Tower cat slept on sunny afternoons. When he'd first learned the winding stair, his name had been a muttered curiosity in the castle corridors, the echo of a man ten times his size and breadth and height, and he'd cowered under the carapace of it. The Tower stairs had left him breathless and aching, ending each day in a grueling ascent from the bottom of the castle to the top. So he had climbed them, though it made his legs hurt, and he crawled into bed miserable, wishing for an easier way home. And still, he had climbed, and climbed, and climbed these stairs, until he could take them two at a time, rising past classrooms, girls' bathrooms, broom closets; rising by portraits in red robes who cried out in familiar tones; rising through classmates who fell in file behind him as he went, and first years who stepped aside to let him pass, naming him in whispers, Malfoy, Malfoy, Malfoy; rising past windows full of sunlight, rising through stories of stone and air, until he stood at the crown of the world, in front of a solemn portrait door.

“Password?”

“Alea iacta est.”

The whole House had gathered in the common room. Faces gazed alertly from every sofa and armchair, tucked in sills, flush to the walls, sitting on cushions and carpets and cold stone floors. Angelina sprawled on the staircase to the girls’ dorm with Lavender and Parvati. Romilda sat beneath them with Natalie Macdonald, who was always getting demerits for leaving her collar open, and her friend Jimmy Peakes, who had once subbed in for Harry at a quidditch practice. Victoria Frobisher and Alfie Chrissenpoffer sat four deep on a sofa with Colin and Dennis Creevey — when had Colin grown spots? — while tiny Euan Abercrombie perched on a windowsill with a grim and vigilant expression. Dean and Seamus and Katie huddled together with Fred and George and Lee Jordan, a tall gangly boyish collection that featured in prefects’ nightmares; Neville sat with the first years by the fireplace, whispering in a low, soft voice.

Ginny was splayed deep in an armchair, her knee cocked up, twirling her wand. When the door opened, she caught it and glanced up.

And in the middle of them there was Harry, pale and furious, hunched in a chair with a blanket around his shoulders, and Ron’s hands pressing both blanket and shoulders firmly down. Hermione was daubing ointment on a bruise on Harry’s cheek.

“There he is,” Harry said sourly. “My savior.”

“Get ahold of yourself,” said Draco disgustedly, shutting the door. “I’m sorry, did you want your wand snapped? Give it here, I’ll do it for you.”

“My head hurts, you know.”

“Stupidity is known to sting.”

“Oi,” said Ron.

“By the way,” said Harry, raising his voice, “what was it you said about Snape, again? We should trust him?”

“I said it was likely he was double-crossing her. I stand by that assessment.”

“Stand by it? How can you seriously still think that Snape’s on our side?”

“Because I would believe almost anything before the contrary,” he snapped. “You don't know him as I do.”

He couldn’t explain it. He just knew his godfather; he knew the long, impatient length of his stride, the hunch of his back, and the way he swung his head around doggedly to scan a room once he entered it. He knew the way he held his arms dead straight at his sides, and walked with his head down, ill at ease in his own skin. He knew the way Snape’s fingers curled for his wand whenever someone reached too close to him.

Severus Snape would not have betrayed Lily Evans’s memory, because he would not have betrayed anything he cared for enough to bind himself to it. And he would not have betrayed Narcissa, lost to the world in Witherfell, even for a seat by the Dark Lord’s throne, let alone the Minister’s.

“Maybe not. But I know some things, ” snapped Harry. “Like how Padfoot’s good as dead if you're wrong.”

“Dumbledore left two hours ago. That’s more than enough time for a wizard to get to London. If you’re correct—”

“If I’m correct? If? Draco, open your fucking eyes—”

“SHUT UP!” Ron bellowed.

It rattled the ceiling; several children squeaked.

Ron folded his arms and stabbed two fingers at Harry. “Give. It. A rest. Bloody hell. Half the Ministry’s down there trying to figure out how to lay hands on Dumbledore, and you think anyone’s bothering right now about fucking Padfoot? And if they are, you think he can't manage himself? If there’s one thing he’s good for, it’s clearing off.”

It was not without bitterness; several people glanced around, clearly wondering who Padfoot was.

“And not for nothing,” Ron added, “but it’s not actually Draco’s fault if Snape’s an evil shit .”

Harry sealed his mouth and dropped his chin mulishly. Draco gave Ron a short, startled nod of acknowledgement, which was not returned.

“Potter, think about it. He told them about Dumbledore,” said Draco. “He didn’t tell them anything about you.”

“You don’t know that—”

“I know that because you’re not in Ministry custody,” he retorted. “Snape could have given them a pretext—”

“They don’t need a pretext!” Harry shouted. “They don’t need a reason to hurt me, it isn’t about fucking reasons, it’s about the fact that they can — they hurt people because hate them , and they hate anyone capable of stopping them—”

“They’ve been looking for a pretext to arrest you all year,” Hermione said. She folded her arms tightly. “I'm sorry. Ron's right. I’m sure they would have tried to arrest Dumbledore anyway, but targeting you — the smear campaign, cancelling quidditch, dosing your friends with Veritaserum — they’re trying to get you to do something they can expel you over, so they can take you into custody. Like they would have a year ago, if Dumbledore hadn't struck his deal with the Wizengamot."

"Then they should have just arrested me," said Harry savagely. "I don't understand why — why they had to hurt everyone else—"

"Because they need something to ruin you," she replied evenly. "Publicly. That's why they went after you for Viktor, and when that failed, they changed course and started painting you as a revolutionary. People love you, Harry, you're a symbol of the Second Wizarding War. They need people to lose faith in you before they can take full control. If there's no Harry Potter, there's nothing to fight for."

Harry trembled. Then he made a wounded sound and hung his head, covering his face with his hands. Ginny unfolded herself from her armchair and knelt beside him, letting him rest his weight against her, as he canted to the side in a swift collapse — either of muscle or of will. She touched his face gently, with a tenderness uncharacteristic of Ginny. Her flame-red braid sat high on her head and trailed down her back, like a train of fire.

"We won't let them get you," she said, fierce and low. "They won't take you. With an army, they couldn't take you from us."

"I'm not worried for me," he said. "I don't care about me."

"It's not your choice."

"It's me you're risking your lives for. It should be my choice."

"No."

"'No'? What do you mean, 'no'?"

"Because they're our lives," she said. Then Ginny pulled his hand away from his face, flattened it carefully between her own and pressed her lips to his knuckles, lightly, a knight's kiss for a prince.

Hermione glanced at Draco. Her knuckles pressed tightly to her mouth in thought. The white bandage clashed like snow against the bright pink of her lip. The world leaned off-kilter, the center of balance shifting perilously far. He knew the depths of his own guilt — in the weak and cowardly maw of him, in the empty chapel of his heart, where nothing immortal had ever really lived — that Ginny thought she spoke for all of them, and she was wrong. He would let them take Harry, if it came to that — under one condition and one condition only, but the difference between one and nothing was the difference between a coward and a knight. He felt heat in his stomach, his throat, his face.

But it was true for Ginny. It was clear in the guileless and unflinching honesty of her smile that she loved him; perhaps she had never stopped loving him, only charted her way to better waters in the sea of her love; from the fervent lovesickness of a ten-year-old to the steady, selfless sacrifice of a girl almost grown. It was remarkable, to love that long without hope.

“Let us help you,” said Ginny. “Fight. It’s what you taught us to do, isn’t it? Let us.”

“I won’t ask you to do that,” said Harry.

“You don’t have to ask us,” said Ron shortly. “And you can’t stop us, so don’t even try. If you turn yourself in, it’ll be me coming to spring you, and I’ll be bloody put out about it.”

“You can’t,” said Harry, pitching up in panic. “Hermione, you realize this is stupid — they could snap your wands. You could lose your magic.”

“Then I’ll lose my magic,” said Neville suddenly. Harry flinched.

Swallowing, Neville added, “Big d-deal. Never was much good at it anyway.”

“Yeah, let them,” said Katie, raising her voice. She jutted out her upper lip, and two piercings gleamed defiant in the firelight. “They have to get my wand first, don’t they?”

Harry cast his eyes around the room, desperately, on an array of faces hardening against fear. One could see, as the panic welled in his face, how swiftly it became clear to him what he had wrought: that his family, the one he must have longed and prayed for all the nights of his childhood, when it came, had come vast, and fierce, and loving; and on the second edge of love there lay sacrifice, the steady march into darkness, the column charge into the fire.

He had given all of himself to the place, little unloved Harry Potter, and now Gryffindor sat at his feet, patiently offering all of itself back.

“Draco,” he rasped. “Tell them to give it up. Tell them it’s pointless.”

The temptation would follow him for the rest of his life. An affirmative hovered on his tongue, coupled with an order to be reasonable. He knew his talents: he likely could persuade them not to go. Hermione would be the last holdout, but knew how to win that argument, too. If the plans went wrong, she would steer them all into ruin at the hands of the creature in the world she hated most. And she wouldn’t mind a gamble, Hermione, if she wasn’t playing with other people’s lives.

But she kept looking at him, half-pleading and half-commanding, and he realized it might not matter if he won the argument. Harry had said he was going, and so she would go. Wherever he went.

For a moment he wanted a different past, where the hat had said Slytherin or Ravenclaw for both of them, and she’d never met Harry Potter, and she had never sectioned her apostle’s heart into thirds. Where she belonged to Draco in the selfish, torrid, ordinary way.

But her bandage hung limp from her wrist, a heavy white flag.

Traitor. Traditor, tradere. Hand over; deliver; offer up. Sacrifice.

“It wouldn’t be pointless,” said Draco. He lifted one shoulder in acknowledgement of Harry’s betrayed look. “It wouldn’t be wise. But it wouldn’t be pointless.”

Harry exhaled. He slowly pushed himself to his feet.

The attention of the gathering sharpened and fixed on the boy’s narrow shoulders. The older students broke off from their private conversations to listen. The young students sat up straighter. When Harry drew breath, the room breathed with him.

“I’m not the Chosen One,” he said. “I’m not the Boy Who Lived. I’m not the savior of anything, I’m not a symbol of anything. I’m a real person, and if you ever have the choice, I would never — not in a hundred years — ask any one of you to put yourselves in danger for my sake. None of you. Not ever.”

He carded his hands through his hair, which was already so wild it hardly hurt. “Anyway,” he said, “I need to… I need time. To think. And we need time to come up with… a plan. But if you… if I go, we all go. I’m not leaving anyone here. No one left behind. That’s my… order, I guess. That’s what I say.”

The world outside of the common room seemed to exist again, suddenly, reflected at once in terrible glory by the scars it had left on those present.

The firelight gilded Harry’s scar like a sacred rune, splintering the skin of his forehead. The glint of it turned his glasses into white rounds, and with his flat expression, the result was not entirely recognizable to Draco as the boy who had lived for five years in the bed beside him.

The room rose, as one, and moved toward him. Fred and George clapped him on the shoulders; Katie cuffed him on the head; Dean and Seamus elbowed him. Victoria, daringly, threw her arms around his waist. The others crowded in a shower of light touches, murmured words, and Harry stood in the center, terribly still and quiet, like an idol of stone.

Hermione cut through the crowd to Draco and caught him, her hand encircling his arm. “Thank you.”

“For what?” he said. “I don’t want him dead, either.”

“I know you don’t see it the same way.”

“I didn’t lie,” he said. “It wouldn’t be pointless. I didn’t say it was a good idea.”

Her other hand caught his other arm and she looked at him gravely, as serious as a Killing Curse. Hermione reckless was normal and, however unpleasant, endurable; Hermione gentle was like watching a tiger try to prowl on eggshells, only more awkward and piteous. “It’s worth it,” she said. Trying to balance gentility with earnestness. Eggshells shattering on every word. “I’m sorry. I know you think it’s dangerous. It is dangerous, maybe. But we’re together. Just here there’s so many of us, and there could be more of us, too — people do love him, they love him without even knowing him, and if the world knew what he was like—”

“Granger,” he said. His hands found her waist. An unspeakable landscape of terrible truths waited for him to unveil it with a word. She was asking him to say that he had agreed for Harry’s sake, and not hers. Asking him to relieve her of guilt, to relieve her of the burden of whatever happened to him after, but he wouldn’t, and perhaps he couldn’t.

He was a bad person, but he wouldn’t free her of that knowledge. It tethered her to him. She had tethered herself to him. She deserved to own that weight.

“We’re both fools,” he said, as softly as he could, though the eggshells were breaking.

“Me? No,” she said brightly, too brightly. “I’m ‘the finest magical talent of this or any generation.’ And you’re quite good, too, on your better days.”

The room was too crowded for them: they ought to have been alone. Hermione, with her fingers digging into his arms like she could stop the future from taking him anywhere else, should have been able to do so, and he should have been able to put his arms around her waist. If the world were just, nothing would ever change. She would stay ferocious and bold and cocky and she would keep the frightened little grin on her face, and nothing would have taken it away from him, nothing.

For some time now the days had been growing longer, but not until a dry evening in late April did Draco notice that the sun still shone in the west when dinner ended, throwing deep shadows under the high table. Atop them, Umbridge held the headmaster’s chair. She was chatting with a square-faced middle-aged man in the Deputy seat that once belonged to McGonagall. The Transfiguration professor sat at the end of the table, six seats distant from Umbridge, and twice from Snape. Neither end of the table raised their heads from their plates.

The other aurors had remained, but ate at their own new table beneath the faculty, where they could keep full sight of the room. Sometimes they hung in the hallways outside of classrooms, or drew a student aside for questioning.

In the silent hall, the shuffling feet of hundreds echoed on the stones. Above the doors, the last Inquisitorial Decree hung in a frame of lacquered wood, announcing the new headmaster.

It was no use trying to avoid the Inquisitorial Squad. Tracey Davis and Blaise Zabini lounged at the foot of the staircase, taking demerits more or less at random; their job was to ensure students went directly to the library, or else their (own) common rooms.

Another Inquisitor would be stationed at the library doors to take note of all visitors.

The corridors smelled of dust and mold and wet stone. Filch had been sacked a week after Dumbledore left. It closely followed a decree that the Ministry would not employ non-magical persons, which set off rumors that he had been a squib. Only in his absence did the miserable old crone's love for the castle reveal itself: soot filmed thick on the sconces, and puddles of melted wax pooled beneath them, which no one had bothered to remove.

Slow days dripped into slow nights. Spring frosts iced over the bolted window-panes. The libraries filled in the evenings with students bent low over their desks, quills scratching at workbooks, while the smell of melting wax thickened under stuffy coils of smoke. New quiet hours kept the common room chatter to a minimum. Inquisitors perched around every corner and under each stairwell, directing straight files of students to and fro their appointed destinations. Cassius Warrington had taken to prowling around the grounds with the aurors, his purple cloak flickering among the pack of trench coats.

No word came from Sirius, Remus, or the Weasleys. Owl traffic in and out of the school had thinned. The Daily Prophet listed Albus Dumbledore as Undesirable No. 1, and a poster hung in pride of place on the notice board. His pallid eyes gazed deeply into Draco's as he passed them on his way to meals. They seemed to mirror the memory of Snape's dark ones: Say nothing. Do nothing.

But were they Snape's orders, or Dumbledore's? Had the old man been betrayed, after all, by his dogsbody of fifteen years? Were Snape's final instructions to Draco in fact an act of self-preservation, an attempt to coax Draco away from the cliff's edge of heroism? Or were they the standing instructions of the Order of the Phoenix?

He missed his mother with an ache that often seemed physical. It caught him unawares, a pang in his sternum, a wishing for one of her tart bon mots or crisp scoldings that snared him during moments of distraction at his books, or beats of silence at meals. It was not just her person he missed. She would know, he felt certain, the truth about Snape — whether he could be trusted, whether it was all a play — she would read from twenty years of experience the strange levers of Snape's mind, and what inducements could provoke him to treason. But with Umbridge in the headmaster's office, and Snape rarely seen without an auror at his elbow, the opportunity never appeared. In a fit of desperation he borrowed Victoria Frobisher's owl and penned a missive in code, on the assumption that even if Umbridge read it, nothing in its descriptions of jasmines and red roses would incriminate them. The owl came back days later, seal unbroken: his mother was either still at Witherfell, or somewhere beyond the reach of owls altogether.

It was hard to account for the difference in feeling before Dumbledore's flight and after it. Perhaps some resilient part of him, and of the student body at that, had believed that Dumbledore would save them all. That one bright morning, he would unleash the full height of his awesome power to banish the Ministry from the school, smite Umbridge, and restore the castle of yesteryear. Like Ron, they had all been waiting for Dumbledore to fight.

But he had fled, and stripped bare the ugly facts: no one was coming for them. They would save themselves, or nobody would.

Spring washed off the castle's cloak of snow, and daubed sapphire nets of crocuses at the bottom of the oak trees. On Tuesday nights, Neville returned from the greenhouses with his Potions homework, drenched by rain, and carefully took notes as Draco explained what was wrong with it. He had stopped making the same mistakes, although each time invented some creative new ones. Sometimes, after his critique was finished, he gathered his notes and went back out to the greenhouse to try again.

Defense Club ceased holding meetings, for safety. They communicated by little slips of parchment that Hermione charmed to burn themselves up once read. The tension frayed them all to thin strands, impatient, unforgiving.

Michael Corner blacked Zachariah's eye. Ron caught the counterjinx meant for Michael, and blacked the other one.

Millicent Bulstrode body-checked Padma down a flight of stairs. Tracey Davis gave Padma a detention for trying to trip her.

Draco pried Gregory Goyle off a bleeding Justin Finch-Fletchley; Hermione threatened Crabbe away from a cornered Euan Abercrombie; Cassius Warrington caught Euan again at the end of the hall. It was never enough. There was always something happening around the corner.

Draco slid down banisters and rounded corners with the haste of someone running from something, or to it, even when what awaited him was nothing more urgent than the library. Hours slipped through his fingers. Study, eat, study, train. He woke up and a minute later, it was noon.

There was something coming. Everyone knew it. But not everyone knew what it was.

Some days, he hardly saw Hermione, caught up in the thorny gridlock of studying and preparations. One evening, he found her in the common room, when the candles had burned low.

Her back was turned to the aisle, presenting him with the messy knot of brown hair pried up from her collar, her sleeves rucked up to the elbows, forearms dappled in inkstains. Her quill etched a looping, illegible scrawl in her journal, while her wand conducted several books in a revolving circuit, presenting themselves ritually to be consulted as she preferred.

He stepped behind her and waited, testing her. She raised her head and cocked it.

"Draco?"

He shifted to lean against the bookcases. "Proximity ward?"

“Among other things,” she said. She twisted around and leaned on the back of her chair, half-smiling at him. “You smell like smoke.”

“Tutorial with Longbottom and Finnigan.”

“He’s quite good at it,” she said, and she glanced over her shoulder. He identified the gesture as an assurance they were alone, and smirked, knowing what would come next: the double-take glance at his mouth, followed by the hooded, plaintive eyes that she made when she wanted something she didn’t want to ask for.

Draco braced his arm on the back of her chair.

Abruptly she shifted up like she was going to kiss him — he froze, because there were others in the common room, it was public, they would see and she didn’t want that, people seeing — but she kissed him on the cheek, her mouth hot against flushed skin.

Someone cleared his throat. Ron stood over her shoulder, pointedly looking at the floor.

Hermione discreetly shifted away from him.

“Ronald,” said Draco.

“Ron,” she said. “Hello. Did you need s—?”

“Word with Draco,” he said tautly. “Outside. Please.”

“About what?”

Ron looked at her, with a harsh, wry sort of look. Hermione reddened.

“If you have something to say to me, you should say it to me,” she said shortly. “I’m not an object. And if you’re going to talk about me like I’m not here—”

“I know,” said Ron pitifully. “There’s — I just —” He ground his jaw. “I can’t do this with both of you at once. It’s not about your thing. It’s about his thing and my thing.”

“What ‘things’? Ron, you’re not making any—”

“Alright,” said Draco, interrupting her. He nodded to the door. “A word. Granger, you get him next.”

Ron sighed in relief.

“Do you promise?” Hermione said sharply, eyeing Ron.

“Sure, yeah,” he said. “You can yell at me all you like.”

“Fine. Then I’m going to find Harry. Find me when you’re done,” she said, “and — I’m serious, Ron, I think the three of us really ought to talk at some point.”

“I agree,” said Ron, surprising her; Hermione never came prepared for anything but a fight. “We’ve got a battle plan to make, yeah? Let me do this bit first, though.”

Warily, she let them go, then turned back to find Harry. Ron wheeled open the portrait door. Draco stepped elegantly into the passageway, and Ron hauled it shut behind them.

There was an alcove ten or twenty stairs down from the Tower entrance, a flat shelf over which was cut a window facing the lake. Ron stepped into it and leaned against the wall, and Draco matched him, folding his arms. He waited for Ron to speak first, which he appeared to be attempting to; he opened his mouth and grimaced to himself several times.

The conversation that had been hovering over their heads for weeks fell all at once, like rain bursting from day-old swollen clouds, and brought with it a drench of silence.

“You were right,” said Draco, at length. “It was more than a friendship.”

Ron winced.

“We have a relationship. She and I. Don’t tell Potter.”

He swallowed. “Well,” he said. “That’s… not a surprise. Not Harry, really?”

“She wanted to keep it private.” It was inscrutably important to him that Ron understood that. “I wouldn’t have cared.”

Ron nodded, gnawing his cheek. “How long?”

“February.”

“Oh.” Ron paused. “Well, congrats. And everything.”

“I didn’t tell you to be cruel. If there were a way for this to avoid causing pain to you, I would. But I felt compelled to be clear.”

“I appreciate that,” he said. “I’m trying to be clear, too. But you get that there isn’t — there’s no world, right where that isn’t kind of painful, right, considering I fancy your girlfriend.”

Draco wanted to say, And I regret that as much as you do, but it seemed wrong.

Ron sighed and rubbed his temples, restless and agitated. “Fancied her for years,” he admitted. “I didn’t know it, but I did. And the two of you — I’m not stupid. I reckoned there was something going on. But I figured maybe if you two were just mates, like her and Harry… if I worked at it, and if I got to being a real bloke, with brains and everything… But I was kidding myself.”

The waters of the conversation were already rising around his neck.

“She would lie on a bed of nails for you, you know.”

“I know,” said Ron.

“She would give you an arm. A rib. Anything you asked for.”

“Yeah, and she could have mine,” he agreed. “We love each other. But it’s not me, right?”

“What do you mean?”

“Don’t play dumb,” he said, without malice. “She’s loved you since she was eleven years old. And even on my best day, I reckon I’m just fun to think about.”

His tongue felt thick in his mouth. “When she was eleven, she thought I was a coward,” he said. “And a bully. And a ponce.”

“She was correct,” said Ron mercilessly, “but she was still in love with you. And you’re still a ponce, but that hasn’t stopped her yet, so it probably won’t ever.”

Torches snapped. Wind hummed against the eaves.

“You were right, too. About ‘second place.’” Ron set his jaw. “That it shouldn’t matter. Usually. I know. But I — you know all this, but — sixth of seven, sixth son, and they stopped after the girl — forget that. Point is that I’m used to fighting for attention. Don’t,” he said warily, pointing at Draco, “think this is a pity thing. It’s not a pity thing. I don’t need you feeling sorry for Saint Ronald, who’s sad and poor and bad at quidditch. But you pissed me the fuck off with all that shit about not ‘getting it,’ the other day, like I’m always running to catch up with you. I can’t stand it. Because only one bloke ever really wanted me first pick of the litter, and it’s just my luck, the rest of the world’s trying to kill him.”

The overture hovered in the air, waiting for someone to complete it.

“You have an obsession with winning,” said Draco.

“I know. Hermione thinks it’s a problem.”

“I never said it was a problem,” he said. “In fact, I rather respect it.”

Ron smiled a bit. “Course you do. You’re the same. Used to think you’d rip someone’s head off to win a quidditch match, come to that.”

“That seems messy.”

“You would say that,” said Ron. “Anyway, you get why it matters. Being first choice.”

Of course he did.

But it was a part of himself he preferred not to voice. It was, among other things, the part that had wished ill for Viktor Krum about four minutes from his death, on the vile and arresting grounds that he’d received one of Hermione’s smiles.

“As first choices go,” he said, “you could have done worse than the Chosen One.”

“And you could have done a lot worse than Hermione Granger,” said Ron, with quiet resignation. Then he snickered to himself. “Guess that’s why all our luck ran out early.”

“Or none of us had any luck to begin with.”

“Hermione doesn’t need luck, she’s Hermione,” said Ron. It was wry and honeyed with the blind adoration of a first love.

He did love her. It would have been easier to resent him if he didn’t.

Ron said, “You know, there’s not enough time — there’s never enough time for shit like this. But definitely not now, and definitely not with your mates. Because — you know what’s coming. Haven’t got time to waste calling each other names, and fighting over this stuff. When I look back at these months, I want to think: ‘Yeah, that was how I want to remember it.’ Before the war.” He swallowed.

It was a bristling, even-shouldered dignity that Ron wrestled from disappointment's jaws, a nobler and fiercer dignity than anyone could possibly demand; it was a refusal to indulge in the humiliation of showing pain, and a commitment to drive on through it with one's head high, one's back straight, and one's wounds packed away where no one could see them.

It was something Narcissa would have admired, if she could find it in her to admire Ron for anything, which probably she could not.

"At the risk of stating the obvious," said Draco, "you are also a pureblood."

"At the risk of stating the obvious," said Ron, "it's not the same kettle of kelpies."

"No, it isn't. But it might occur to you one of these days, Ronald, that though the vast majority of you is Weasley, there remains a part of you descended from the House of Black."

Ron's tongue probed his cheek thoughtfully. Then he smirked.

"That goes both ways, though."

"Pardon."

"Bad news," he said. "Means somewhere in all that pureblood swill, there's a piffling little part of you that's Weasley."

Draco didn't know what his face did then, but Ron laughed.

When they came in again, Hermione and Harry were speaking in low voices by the fireplace. With their heads bent together, the light fell evenly on their robes, their ties, their rumpled crowns of dark hair, and flickered brightly in their eyes: Harry's electric green and Hermione's soft, fathomless dark ones.

"Don't like it when they talk like that," Ron muttered. "He'll do anything, and she can do everything. Oughtn't let them make plans together.”

“Don’t remind me,” said Draco, painfully aware of sounding like a sop.

Harry, feeling their attention, raised his head and squinted, nudging his glasses straight with the back of an ink-stained hand. “Stop staring and come pull your bloody weight,” he said. “I know I’m gorgeous, but that’s no excuse.”

“Can’t expect us to resist you, man,” Ron said easily. He sauntered over and dropped to kneel at Harry’s side, scanning the notes. “What are you plotting at?”

“I’m ‘plotting’ the girls’ bathroom,” said Hermione, smirking at her own pun. Draco gave her a thin look. “Anyway, I have a new theory about Myrtle.”

“You’re still after Theodore Nott?”

“Of course I am. You don’t think he’s not up to something, do you? Anyway, I went looking for reports of Myrtle’s death, and I found out — one, the school archive from 1943 is a terrible mess, lots of pages are damaged or just missing altogether— but more importantly, she wasn’t the first one attacked. There had been a string of attacks happening at Hogwarts for weeks before. Petrifications. All the victims were muggle-borns.”

“Like in second year,” added Ron.

“Yes. Well, yes, but no,” Hermione agreed. A questing fire was in her eyes. “The attacks were similar, but no one died, and they would’ve likely continued indefinitely if Yaxley hadn’t been killed. But here’s the odd bit: After Myrtle died, the attacks just… stopped.”

“Like she was … responsible for them, somehow?” said Harry.

“No. The opposite. I think someone was practicing,” she said. “And with Myrtle, they finally managed the real thing.”

The wind scraped against the castle windows. Draco cleared his throat.

“What are you using the Map for, then?” he said.

“Someone had to get in and out of the bathroom in order to kill her,” she said. “Myrtle’s body was found in the bathroom by a girl named Olive Hornby — whom Myrtle haunted, by the way, quite viciously, until Olive got a Ministry injunction — poor thing must have been demented, have you any idea how hard it is to sue a ghost? — but she found her in the bathroom where she died. That means either the killer went in after her, killed her, and walked out — somehow avoiding the notice of any number of students, prefects, teachers, ghosts, et cetera, all of whom would’ve been on high alert for suspicious activity at the time—”

“Or there’s a secret passage into the bathroom,” supplied Ron.

“Which you think Nott’s looking for,” said Draco neutrally. “Do you think he’s planning a murder?”

“No. There’s no one here it would serve him to kill,” she said calmly, sitting back on her haunches. “There are easier ways out of the school, if he’s trying to escape. But the easy ones are all fairly well-known. My current theory is that he’s looking for a passageway Cassius doesn’t know about.”

“Still begs the question of why,” pointed out Ron.

She hesitated, glancing at Draco. “Well,” she said, “I will say — if you must know — I happen to think he’s trying to find a way to get Daphne out of the school.”

Ron startled. “What? Why her?”

Hermione cringed and looked at Draco with a pointed, uncomfortable stare; Draco sighed, and rescued her. “Nott has an inexplicably enduring interest in Greengrass,” he said. “So’s Parkinson. I’m given to understand they have a safehouse of some kind. They gave her a letter at Christmas with some kind of code to access it; she claimed not to understand what it said, though I suspect she lied.”

“You don’t seriously think she’d join them,” Ron said in disgust. “After they’ve been shits to her for months. Years, basically. She — she’s closer to Lavender than she is to Pansy, nowadays. And she chose our side. She chose it good and loud, last year.”

Draco shrugged. “I happen to agree with you,” he said. “But it wouldn’t be the first time Nott was a poor judge of character. He thinks people are more loyal to him than they are.”

“Or more self-interested,” Hermione said idly. He looked at her. She raised her hands. “I’m just saying. There are … reasons it could be in Daphne’s best interest to be sequestered somewhere away from the fighting. It isn’t … an entirely bad idea, in terms of what’s best for her.”

“To run off with a pack of bigoted twats?” Ron exclaimed. “Blimey, you don’t have to like her, but you can say better of her than that—”

“I do like her, actually, she’s quite sweet when she’s not being condescending — but you know she has family troubles, and her parents are either in denial about her condition, or they simply don’t care.”

“Not her blood condition,” argued Ron. “They’ve had her in treatments for years. They coddled her for it.”

Hermione flushed. “I meant — being bitten,” she said. “Being ‘impure.’ From their perspective.”

“That’s not a condition. There’s nothing wrong with her. She’s safe, she’s got friends, she’s got hobbies. More importantly, she’s her own damn person, and she didn't ask Nott or Parkinson to take her anywhere! She doesn't need to be put up on a shelf, you know," he said indignantly, "like a doll they're sick of playing with—"

"I'm not saying she should, I'm saying what I think Theodore Nott would try to do," she said patiently. "If he cared for her. Which, unfortunately, I think he does."

"He doesn't care for her," Ron scoffed. "Hasn't said three words to her in a year. That's not what caring looks like."

"I wouldn't be certain," said Draco. Ron scoffed again — but Draco was thinking of Severus Snape, and Narcissa, and of the way Narcissa looked when she heard Andromeda's name, and he was reflecting on how much one could care without saying anything at all.

On the first day of exams, he didn't sleep. He drifted out of a nauseous semi-conscious fog to the late-morning scramble of boys throwing on their robes, fighting for showers, pitching deodorant and spare socks around. He sat up with a wince and a flex of his knee, the one Goyle had broken almost a full year ago: it had healed, but sometimes the old tendons still twinged, to remind him of the cost he had paid.

He brushed his teeth and combed his hair, used a spell to iron his robes, and drew his tie snugly under the pressed flap of his collar. In a surreal haze, he slipped his wand into its sheath and his ring into place on his finger. For the first time in months, he did not take his books with him as he descended the staircase. Dean carried a seam-splitting load of notebooks — hoping purposively to cram some last-minute studying into the breaks and meals — but Draco, for whom the exams had once been a source of strain, now viewed them as a dull disposal of time. After the Astronomy practical, none of it would matter.

It was difficult, therefore, to tap into the trembling thread of anxiety that ran across the hallways, charging the murmuring crowds like electric current. He moved through the crowds with the tired ease of someone tall enough and sure enough to make them part when he wanted. At one point, he was sure, he would have swaggered, but this morning brought none of the requisite joy.

This had the unusual silver lining of making him extremely calm as he approached the testing hall, and consequently the subject of some resentment by his peers. He took some tea from the tea station and drank it casually, while a few people gave him resentful stares over the backs of their overcrammed notebooks. Ernie Macmillan mouthed his notes frantically from a six-inch notecard, which at an invigilator's glare he stuffed into his pocket. Neville, clutching his stomach, abruptly whirled and shoved Dean aside in a dash for the bathroom.

Professor McGonagall gave the pre-exam briefing.

"O.W.L.s are spread over two successive weeks. You will sit the theory exams in the mornings and the practicals in the afternoons. Your practical Astronomy examination will, of course, take place at night. You may find the schedule posted on the notice board. When your scores are released, your names will be posted in sequence on the board, along with your results. Please hold questions until I am finished, Mr. Macmillan. You can expect your scores by the end of the term in early June. Participants who exceed the recommended length on their essays can expect additional delays — once I am finished, Ms. Patil — and participants found guilty of cheating or plagiarism will be disqualified. You may now ask—"

A copse of hands sprouted. McGonagall sighed, and pointed.

Draco threw back the rest of his tea and set it down. He ought to have eaten something. The caffeine made his stomach turn.

Hermione found him calmly waiting at the back of the room, twirling his wand through his fingers. She had three pens tucked in her breast pocket, plus a spare behind her ear, and she had braided her hair tightly out of her face. It had been slicked back with some sort of gel, or possibly sweat. From her apprehensive expression he half-expected an eager: aren't you excited? Taking exams? or an impatient: give me a hard question, quick!, but he got neither.

"Ready for the easy part?" she said bravely.

"Desperately," he said. "I could use a bit of fun."

"Good. Take a pen. I've given them to Harry and Ron and Neville, and I double-checked with McGonagall that you can use them. There's nothing in the rules that says you have to use a quill, merely tradition, and a pen writes twice as fast, so you can get more down on the essay questions. I have biscuits if you're hungry. Are you hungry? I'm not."

"Are you nervous?" he said, incredulous. "Over exams? Now?"

"Why shouldn't I be?"

"I don't know. Haven't your nerves reached quota?"

"I can be nervous about many things," she said indignantly. He snorted and refrained from quipping that it was the first principle of her personality. "There's no law about how many things I can worry about at once."

"Thank Merlin. You couldn't afford the lawyers' fees."

"I'd bill you for most of them," she retorted, scanning the hallway. "Only fair, since — hang on, is that Percy?"

Draco craned his neck. The examiners had lined by the door, and among them stood a tall, gangly redhead in a purple robe, his hideous glasses perched in a less-than-judicious position on his nose.

"Unfortunately," he muttered. "Where's Ronald?"

“Is he an examiner? I suppose he got twelve N.E.W.T.s. But he’s too young! The rules say examiners for the practical have to be seven years out at least, otherwise the adjudication isn’t impartial, and if a student’s even met an examiner before they can invoke a Section E appeal—”

“Granger. Big picture.”

She blinked, and her eyes sharpened. “He’s here to provoke Ron,” she said. “The whole Ministry has to know there’s bad blood. They brawled in the Atrium! If Ron assaults a Ministry official on school grounds—”

“Give him credit. If he sees Percy, he’ll realize all that, and even if he doesn’t, he won’t act out in front of Umbridge. He’s smarter than that.”

“Ginny isn’t,” Hermione hissed.

“Fuck. Good point.”

He shoved between a pair of fifth years and stalked through the crowd.

Ron had seen Percy before they had, and intercepted him before Draco could. Harry was close behind him, bristling, his hand a hairsbreadth from his wand — Draco caught it by the wrist, the motion hidden by the crowd, and though Harry glared at him, he reluctantly let his robes fall over his wandsheath.

The brothers collided within spitting distance of the door, though to Draco’s surprise, it was Percy who seized Ron, not the other way around.

“Uniform citation,” Percy said loudly. “Improper tie knot. What are the prefects getting up to these days? Step out, young man, and fix it at once.”

“Don’t touch me,” Ron said, outraged. “Keep your hands off me, you snivelling bastard—”

Percy ignored him and hustled him — impressively, considering Ron dwarfed him in height and doubled him in breadth — into a side corridor. Draco trotted after him, hand gliding to his wand, alarm prickling vaguely.

In the corridor, Percy craned his neck fearfully for onlookers, and then shoved Ron against the wall.

“Let go of me—”

“Is Father alive?”

Ron spluttered. “Yeah — I think, we don’t get owls here — why? What happened?”

“What happened? He was in St. Mungo’s! Did Mother drop you on your head again?”

“Yeah, like, five months ago,” Ron sneered. His fists clenched at his sides, but his expression was steady and cool. “He’s been out since February. Have you seriously not seen him?”

“No! I haven’t seen him since — since the last time I saw you.”

Ron curled his lip. “Couldn’t even be arsed with an owl,” he marvelled. He shrugged Percy off and tugged his robes straight. “Merlin. Why even pretend to care, if you’re so embarrassed of him?”

“I’m not embarrassed,” Percy hissed. He glanced over his shoulder. “He’s my father. They won’t let me contact him.”

“They? Who’s ‘they’?” Hermione said sharply. “The Ministry?”

“I — hello, Miss Granger,” said Percy stiffly. “This is a private family conversation—”

“She’s more my family than you are,” Ron snapped. “Answer her question.”

Percy flinched. “Well. I — well. Yes. The Ministry. Who else? You’re on a registry. All the Weasleys. Disreputable individuals, known connections to terrorism — I’m not allowed to see Father. Or Bill. Or Charlie.”

“Yeah? What happens to you if you talk to him?”

“Isn’t it obvious? ‘What happens’ is I lose my job!”

“Oh, your precious job! When did you pick your conscience out of the rubbish? You didn’t care when the Ministry put Harry on trial, and you didn’t care when they were carving up your brothers and sister—”

“Carving up — what? What are you talking about?”

“—didn’t care about us before, when you could watch us suffer from a distance, so don’t come crying now—”

“I don’t know what you’re saying to me! You’re mad! Ron, are you really involved with a rebellion at Hogwarts?” Percy whispered, pale and aghast. “The things they’re saying about you — about everyone — you don’t know how bad this could be for us. Bill’s being followed. Father has a file. Platinum clearance, they won’t even let me read it. And they have your names — yours and Ginny’s — on a list. Do you understand? I’m trying to warn you. You’ve no idea the risks I’m taking just to be here.”

“Yeah?” said Ron coolly. “What’d you do?”

“I lied to Lord Selwyn. Madam Umbridge thinks I have his permission to be here. I had to forge a document—”

Ron stared at him, stunned with contempt.

“You fucking idiot,” he said. “I don’t know how bad this could be? I don’t? You’ve had a desk job for two years, and I don’t— never mind.

You know it’ll be you next, right?”

Percy choked. Ron straightened his tie, and then said curtly: “These people don’t believe in anything but blood. Once we’re gone, they’ll come for you. And when they do, remember that you sold out the only people who would’ve stood by you.”

He swept out.

The bell rang. The doors to the Great Hall parted, and the crowd tightened in a sudden suction through its arch.

“Ron!” Hermione caught him by the shoulder, and Ron flinched. “That was well done,” she said breathlessly. “Really well done, keeping your cool. Are you—”

“Are you seriously asking me if I’m alright?”

Ron glared at her, and it became clear she could not have asked a worse question if she tried. He looked as if he had found his own death warrant crumpled up at the bottom of a bin, covered in grease, and it put a fire under him. It was an expression that could have worn a black eye without any loss of dignity. Ron, Draco had discovered, would rather suffer a great deal than lose his dignity.

“I’ll tell you a secret,” Ron said. “Nobody’s alright. Fucking nobody. Not one single person in this place, and nobody anywhere else. Ever.”

“Beside the point,” said Draco, stepping out of the crowd behind her. Students shuffled warily aside to make space for them, especially after Ron’s outburst. “Do you need a moment?”

“I’m fine.”

“The exam—”

“Draco, I’m not taking it. See you after.”

“They’ll suspect something if you’re not there.”

“My name,” said Ron calmly, “is on a list. That kneazle is out of the bag. Will you bugger off, please? I’m going to hit something, and right now I’m not really fussed if it’s you.”

The tremor in his voice made Draco release him. He brushed him off and cut through the hall. Everyone moved around him, giving him space, some with more grace than others. Across the hall, in the Slytherin line, Daphne followed him with her eyes, and sent Draco a worried, probing glance.

Percy skulked over to join the examiners. Someone from Hufflepuff leaned over and gave a distinct retch, which set off a chain reaction of retching in several other locations about the hall. A few Ravenclaws kept quizzing each other. Umbridge stood at the base of the staircase and watched Ron leave with a small smug smile.

The gong sounded, and the doors breached. The examiners filed into the Great Hall, and Draco found himself caught between the flurry of movement and the doors and, in the opposite direction, the sweep of Ron’s hem as he climbed the stairs. He found himself wondering, in a blear of uncertainty and anxiety, if Ron didn’t have the right of it; if it weren’t foolish to sit here and scribble down answers on paper, as if nothing were wrong, as if they were going to have normal grades and normal careers and normal lives; but what else was there to do? What was there except to plod on in the direction of the current, if for no other reason than that it was better than doing nothing at all?

Then the crowd drove forward like a long black river, the currents catching and dragging and eddying in small exclamations of panic and despair. They were all drowning, but only a dozen people seemed to know it.

Draco did not remember his O.W.L.s individually, but sequentially, as a blur of parchment and torchlight and Hermione’s ballpoint pens.

His hand cramped around the third day, and by the sixth it had subsided to a dull, constant ache. He wished that he had thought to develop wand-dexterity in a different hand he wrote in, since it made a proper grip in the practicals difficult, though luckily, the practicals were by and large a bore. In Defense, he did not draw his wand until the fifth challenge — to subdue a caged gnome, and cast a Patronus for the bonus point.

He could not help it: despite knowing it would not matter, he wanted to do well. In the Potions exam, he cut a blazing swath through six essay questions and doubled back in a rare moment of self-doubt to rewrite the first, scribbling out more notes in the margins. With three minutes left in the test he recalled a better counter-stirring method than the textbook recommended, and scrawled a postscript on the back of his essay detailing the relevant chemical proofs. In all exams, Potions especially, the nearby sweating and whimpering of other fifth years distracted him, and he nearly lost focus in his Charms essay on Disillusionment theory when Dean escaped to his fourth bathroom break of the hour. Electives were smaller, though the diminutive size of the Runes O.W.L. cohort — a piffling thirty-four, as compared to the full cohort for the core classes — only increased the tension when one student stood up to turn in their paper ludicrously early, or flipped their page obnoxiously fast. In this, he practiced minor incidents of Occlumency, flattening his thoughts to the safe plane of black glass; it could not close out the sound of quill-nibs scribbling, but it flattened his thoughts to a dark pinprick, from which he could then expand back to the rectangle of the page. There, the only enemy was the empty space beneath the question, the distance between his penpoint and the last line.

Potions, Transfiguration, and Defense came first in the week, and they took their price in morale: students wandered out of them dazed, quiet, as if they had been strapped down and flogged. The later exams of Charms, History of Magic, and Herbology brought spirits back up again. A few cheaters were dragged out of the hall with Korrecktall Kwills or transfigured cheat sheets; Umbridge sent them back to their common rooms with ‘T’ stamped on their exam cards.

Harry and Ron said little to each other and less to anyone else; in Gryffindor, the atmosphere formed shallow, fast-moving eddies of anxiety. Hermione became sleepless. Her hands were caked in ink, and she haunted the common room well into the dark hours of the morning, scanning the Marauder’s Map for something perhaps even she did not know the name of.

At the end of the second week, the Astronomy exam came. He spent three hours, i.e. several months, trudging blindly through a spate of questions about constellations and trines, after which they emerged into a fruitless and indolent and intolerable afternoon, offered as a break in preparation of the practical.

Atop the Astronomy Tower, a row of telescopes stared like cannons over a dark vista, stars spread thick like scattered salt over moon-glazed hills. The moon, one sliver removed, sat high at the heart of the sky, and the light was like bathing in milk. Daphne came over from the Slytherin line at once and knelt at a telescope by Lavender and Parvati, who leaned in and started whispering; at the examiner’s call, they broke off, furtive.

Harry leaned on the rail. The examiner, a witch with curly white hair named Griselda Marchbanks, told them to open their pamphlets and begin, but Harry didn’t move for several moments. His glasses caught the moonlight like round stars. Ron clapped his shoulder warily, and he turned to find a telescope.

It took at least a month to finish the exam, which might have elapsed in ten minutes. Marchbanks’s voice broke him out of a daze, and he drew his pen slowly from the parchment, rubbing his hand. Astronomical symbols he had little memory of drawing littered the parchment. Draco rolled it up and dropped it into a box at the door to the tower, then descended with the crowd of other fifth-years to the bottom of the staircase.

Hermione found him as they left, giving a bracing breath. “It’s over with,” she said. “It feels like it just started. Did you find the trick question?”

“Yes, both of them.”

“Both of — no, there weren’t two — were there? No. You’re joking. You are joking? Draco—”

“Completely. Yes, I found it.”

“Oh, you’re such a prat.”

“I might worry if I thought you minded.”

“I do mind,” she muttered, but her blush revealed her for a liar. He laughed.

Their relief was short-lived. At the bottom of the stairs to the Astronomy Tower there was a commotion: through the gloom and sea of dark robes, Harry and Ron pushed through and stood apart from the others.

Cassius stood at the foot of the stairs, his smile split in thirds by the wrought-iron bars. His wand was sheathed; his arms were folded, and he balanced his weight on one hip. When Draco rounded the corner, his eyebrow twitched, but he did not reach for his wand.

Around him stood four aurors, their greatcoats gleaming, brass buttons bright as gold. On the far side of them stood Cho. She hadn’t taken the Astronomy exam; the last Draco had seen of her was at the Defense practical, where she had produced a watery patronus. Now she was haggard and distracted, her tie askew, and tears made her face a terrible motley of grief and salt.

“Potter,” said Cassius.

“Cho,” said Harry, as if he were not sure that she was really there. He moved towards her, but Cassius held out his arm and stopped it.

“What’s going on?”

Cho shook her head. “I don’t know,” she said. “Harry, what’s going on? I don’t remember how I got here.”

“You talked to them,” said Hermione tonelessly. Her face was a rictus of absolutely nothing: no feeling, no emotion, only the flicker of her eyes darting between the aurors and Cassius. Her fist curled close to the hilt of her wand. “Didn’t you?”

“No, I didn’t,” she cried. “Talked to who? I don’t know what’s going on!”

“Her memory’s been tampered with,” said Cassius. “She doesn’t remember most things before October of 1995. I don’t suppose you know why that might be?”

Hermione said nothing. In the lamplight, her eyes shone furious, as dark as pitch. Harry made a sound that the drumbeat in Draco’s ears blotted out.

“Excellent charmwork, Malfoy,” Cassius admitted. “Really exceptional. I don’t know how you managed it. It’ll be a shame when they snap your wand.”

A thought skittered wildly across the dull film of Draco’s brain: We could run. He could take Hermione and run. They would let them go, if Harry stayed, and he would — staring at Cho, he was rooted to the spot. They could run to Hogsmeade and Floo back to King’s Cross, and she would keep her wand and Cassius Warrington would never look at her again, would never see her, or Draco would carve his wand-arm off at the elbow. He thought desperately that Harry would even bless the plan, if they had asked him, would clasp their hands and tell them Go, with a sad smile of parting, and the innocent, trusting warmth of a cow plodding into the slaughterhouse— but there ended the thought. The sea would rise before Hermione would turn her back on that face, and even Draco was not sure how far they could have made it before he looked back, either. They had already passed under the slaughterhouse gates.

Adrenaline and fear had obscured the other faces in Cassius's party, but there were several. Dawlish, Robards, Cortwaite, aurors all, had drawn their wands and stood poised to move swiftly, though they would not need to; at this distance, aurors could not miss.

"Draco," said Cassius, "will you come over here?"

Hermione stepped in front of him. Draco shouldered her out of the way, awash in regret and fear and loathing. He drew his wand and held his arm across her, although it would make no difference, with three aurors. He might have taken Cassius, by himself; the rest of the party, he had not a chance.

"Oh, I won't harm you," said Cassius. "I'm merely curious what on earth moved you to do this. You understand, old boy, you're going to be expelled for this. Your name can't protect you from everything."

"Your mistake is thinking your name will protect you from anything," said Draco, because it did not matter, anyway, they were going to be taken and expelled and his wand would be snapped and it did not matter, it wouldn't matter, he was watching the aurors and he was holding Hermione back with one hand and sometimes the world simply had to come a few seconds at a time.

Cho was still crying. He didn't care. He would find rage for her later. There would be plenty of it to go around.

"I don't need my name to protect me," said Cassius. He tapped his wand idly against his palm. "Names don't protect anyone, you unlucky fool, and neither does blood. Names and blood are the only things worth protecting. You're supposed to die for them, you're not supposed to let them die with you. I don't suppose it'll be any use to you, knowing that now, but it falls within my purview to occasionally engage in pedagogy." He smiled. It stiffened the scars on his face where Draco had once cursed him. "And discipline."

“What would you ever know about it?”

That was Hermione, with her empty hands and her mouth full of fire. Righteous, defiant Hermione, the voice in the back of his head. The echo on every selfish thought. The glowing jewel at the center of his greatest selfishness. She looked like a hurricane in a necktie, a hotheaded backtalking incorrigible walking site of chaos. She was not chaotic now. She was calm and even and perfectly, terrifically angry. It filled him with a strange and shameful pride to be standing next to her, to have been chosen to stand next to her, with his mind full of cowardice and his veins full of ice.

“What would you know about sacrifice?” she said. “When’s the last time you ever did something you didn’t stand to benefit from? What have you ever given up for the House of Warrington?”

He expected Cassius would give her the acknowledgement of a reprimand or nothing. Instead, Cassius looked on at Draco and said, lightly, almost smiling: “A girl.”

A cry interrupted them. Cho had tried to break away from the aurors and make a run for the gates, towards Harry; Harry surged forward to meet her, but she was caught by Dawlish, and Harry was hauled back by Ron.

“Let me go!” she screamed. “Let me go, let me go, I didn’t do anything— please!”

“What did you do to her?” Harry shouted, his voice shredded by grief. Ron grappled him back, with difficulty, as Harry fought him with real kicks and punches that drew grunts of pain. “What did you make her do?”

“You know, I do resent your tone,” said Cassius, glancing at last away from Draco. “I didn’t waterboard the girl. She came to me of her own free will. I’d say ‘ask her,’ but… well.”

“What did you tell her?” said Hermione. Through Harry’s shouting, her voice was flat and sharp. “Did she think you were going to spare us?”

“She made certain assurances. Which I plan to keep, by the way. I’m a man of my word.”

“What assurances?” said Ron roughly, heaving for breath. Harry had gone still at the word assurances. Cho was staring at Cassius, and between her and Harry it was hard to say who was more stricken.

“That she wouldn’t be expelled for sedition,” said Cassius, “and neither would Harry Potter. You know, Weasley, I’d be flattered; she tried to make a deal for all of you. Unsuccessfully, of course, but she did try.”

“No,” said Cho hoarsely. “No, I wouldn’t do that. I would never do that to Harry.” She turned to Harry wildly. “You believe me, don’t you? I wouldn’t do that, they’re lying, they — they must have tricked me, I don’t remember—”

“I believe you,” said Harry. Hermione made a sharp sound in her throat. Draco looked at her, and she was staring at Cho with cold eyes.

“So you’re arresting us,” said Ron.

“Well, not you,” said Cassius. “What use would that be? Some nobody son of a nobody's son. It’s Potter they want. Poor Miss Chang, she wasn’t terribly bright, even before you lopped off a year of her mind, Malfoy; I doubt she realized that Potter was never going to be expelled in the first place. Only a fool who lets his enemy out of a cage. No, he’s going to stay right here, and we’re going to expel the rest of you. As a lesson. And once he’s no longer furnished with a coterie of enablers, I think Mr. Potter is going to be much more cooperative with the Ministry.” He twirled his wand and slotted it into the overhand grip, casually flexing his wrist. “As a gesture of gratitude to Miss Chang, we've agreed to let him keep his wand; the rest of you, I suppose she thought she couldn't save."

"Cho," said Harry.

Cho jerked.

"I forgive you," he said. "You don't know what for, I guess, but I do. And I'm sorry it came to this. I don't blame you for protecting your mum. I hope I would've done the same."

Cho clapped her hands over her mouth, and gave a sob.

Harry let them take his arm without protest. One of them, Robard, touched Hermione's shoulder, and she wrenched it away. She stepped closer to Draco, who put his hand on his wand and sneered at Robard as coldly as he was able. The auror was clearly not intimidated, but he raised his hand and looked to Cassius for direction.

"Don't touch me," said Hermione, sharp. "I don't want you touching me."

Robard reached for her anyway. Draco caught his wrist. Robard jerked his hand free.

"She said not to touch her."

"Draco," she hissed. But Draco and Robard were both looking at Cassius.

"We're coming quietly," said Draco. "Touch her and I won't be."

Hermione breathed deeply, rubbing her shoulder, and shifted a half-step behind him. There was something pleasant about the way Robard appraised him, half-irate but half-unsure, as if he mightn't be a little dangerous. He was a little dangerous. If they touched her, he could be more than a little dangerous.

“Warrington?” said Robard. “I don’t want a mess.”

“Then don’t leave one,” said Cassius mildly. “It’s Potter we need.”

“They’re children. And he’s the next Lord Malfoy.”

Cassius twitched in irritation. “Not to mention a blood traitor.”

Dawlish said, “The laws don’t make him less a lord for that.”

“Merlin. What’s he going to do to you? He’s fifteen. He won’t even have his wand in a day’s time.”

But now the aurors were restless.

“I met Lucius Malfoy, once,” said Cortwaite quietly. “He didn’t need a wand.”

A chill draft whistled underfoot. Leaves whispered fretfully in the dark woods at the aurors’ back. The hilt of Draco’s wand pressed into his palm, and he lifted his chin. He could feel the man they were remembering as they stared at him, like a double-image sitting over his own face. Like a mask. For once, he did not mind it. For once, he could feel his father’s ghost standing at his back, and the chill did not frighten him. It felt like strength.

He peeled his lips back in a sneer, and let history infuse it with a menace he could not.

For once, his father’s ghost did what he needed it to.

Cassius wet his lips. “Fine,” he said shortly. “Walk them. If they run, it’s on your head.”

Hermione exhaled and slipped her hand into Draco’s, her fingers clutching his tightly. He clasped it back and drew her close to him as they walked, keeping one eye on Robards, one hand on his wand.

They were walked down through the castle. Torches guttered low in the halls. Up the stairs, shadows thickened in the halls, and Cassius lit his wand to lead them along the winding stone passages to the headmaster’s office. The griffin revolved, turning the stone staircase into view, and they climbed in single file up the steps.

The silver instruments were gone. Umbridge had cleared the headmaster’s office of any touch of Dumbledore; the portraits of old headmasters had been removed, as well, replaced by oil paintings of what appeared to be scenes from history. In one, a wizard with a silver beard stood with a goblin’s severed head under his foot; in another, a witch stood high atop a rock amid surf, her wand outstretched and gleaming red over a fleet of howling mermaids. The books had been removed. Wall-height shelves of oak and stone stood bare save the rare decorative plates or flower vases, whose presence merely served to emphasize the empty spaces. All had been removed from the antique desk but a stationery pad, a quill and ink, and a portrait of the Minister of Magic.

The room did not look like it had been re-occupied; it looked like it had been scoured, a field razed and salted.

Umbridge stood behind the desk, her lacquered nails braced lightly on a piece of parchment. By the fireplace knelt three red heads and a pale one: Ginny, George, Lee, and Luna were on their knees. Purple bruising mottled George and Lee’s faces, and a lace fringe of blood flowed down Ginny’s face from her temple, while the same caked under Luna’s nose. Severus Snape leaned against the wall behind them, turning his wand delicately over in his hands. When Draco came in, his wand stilled, and his expression took on a cool, acid stiffness.

“You’re a traitor,” she said, faintly wondrous, her rage so soft it verged on grief.

The word passed cleanly through him, a bolt of clearest diamond, and left his body clean. It almost surprised him. It took no blood; it left no bruising. It was a combination of syllables that had ceased to mean anything he couldn't look in the eye.

He said nothing. Hermione shouldered in front of him. Umbridge's eyes slipped at her and tightened.

Ron lurched towards his siblings, but Dawlish caught and shoved him back. Ginny's head snapped up when they came in, and the air went out of her with a sound like something puncturing.

"Where's Fred?" Hermione said sharply.

"Hospital Wing," George croaked. "It was an ambush — they grabbed us from the dorms—"

"—used a firework and tried to divert them—"

"—Fred was too close — his arm—"

"Severus," said Umbridge. Snape rolled his eyes and flicked his wand. Three voices vanished at once, cut by a nonverbal Silencio.

"Longbottom's been apprehended, as well," said Cassius, tossing his cloak to the sofa. "Alquist had to Stun him, and took Reiner to find the others."

Umbridge closed her eyes and delicately rubbed them. "How large was the conspiracy?"

"It's hard to say. We would have got it out of Miss Chang, but—"

"I wouldn't," Cho cried. "You're lying—"

"—the information appears to be lost to her."

"He's not," Hermione said curtly.

Ginny gave a cry of rage, and sprang up on one knee. George surged after her, but a twitch of Snape's wand bent them both back to the floor.

“The brat’s lying, I expect,” said Umbridge impatiently. “Veritaserum will change her tune.”

“If you’d given me Veritaserum to begin with, we wouldn’t be here,” Cassius retorted. “Dumbledore left weeks ago. I told you to dose Potter the night he left—”

“If only someone had not spent their stock questioning the student body,” drawled Snape. “Worth it, though, I am sure, to discover that most students already believed Harry Potter to be what he is: a fool and a liar.”

She jabbed a finger at him. “You will be quiet. You have twice failed to brew it for me. This disaster is on your head.”

“Veritaserum is a temperamental brew. It mislikes the presence of aurors in close proximity.”

“I thought I had warned you often enough of the costs of disobedience.”

“Your unhappiness is not a cost to me.”

“If my threats have been insufficiently specific—”

Dawlish cleared his throat. “Dolores,” he said, “please manage your staff on your own time. I must report to the Minister before daybreak.”

Her chest heaved with frustration. “Fine,” she said. “The report. Yes. You may tell him that seven — no, eight — students have been expelled tonight. And Harry Potter will be enrolled in a Ministry protectorate. That will make him happy. Yes.”

“What of the conspiracy?”

“Tell him we are in the process of rooting it out. We have made progress on it — we have acquired an artifact, which we believe the conspiracy has used to send coded messages to each other. Accio map.”

With a flutter, the Marauder’s Map tore itself from Hermione’s bag and flew to her hand. Harry choked. Umbridge unfolded it with an expression of great satisfaction.

“‘Moony, Wormtail, Padfoot, and Prongs,’” she read out clearly, then lowered her glasses and peered over the parchment in amusement. “Those are code names, I believe, yes? Four names… four ringleaders. Which one were you, I wonder?”

Ginny spat at her. “Bitch,” she said. “Fight without an auror at your fucking back, see what happens, rat-faced fucking cunt—” “Severus,” Umbridge said sharply. Snape flicked another Silencio at her, and Ginny’s next string of profanity was nonverbal.

“Stop it,” said Harry. His voice quivered with anger. “Stop cursing her. You’re an adult. And she — she’s bleeding. Let — let us take her to the Hospital Wing, at least—”

“Tell me how to open it,” said Umbridge, lifting the Map, “and I will.”

Ginny gave a muffled cry of denial. She shook her head doggedly at Harry, grappling against the bindings on her wrists.

Hermione’s hand was hot and damp in Draco’s. She clutched his fingers, slick with panic. Her pulse thundered under his touch, keeping pace with his. “Fine,” she said steadily. “It’s — not a communication device. It’s a map of the castle. But you can’t open it, because it’s a decoy. I have the real one. If you let me, I can go get it.”

But it was too late. They were too far behind the quaffle, and Umbridge knew it.

Umbridge smiled indulgently. “Perhaps,” she agreed. “Miss Chang, come here.”

Cho shrank into the door. Cassius caught her elbow and dragged her forward.

“Mr. Potter,” said Umbridge, drawing her wand, “you are going to tell me how to open this… map. Each time you fail to answer me, Miss Chang is going to experience quite a bit of pain. Cassius, her sleeve, please.”

“No!”

“No, please,” Cho screamed. Warrington grappled her in front of Umbridge’s desk, and wrenched out her arm. “Please, no. No, no, no, nononono, pleasepleaseplease — please , professor!”

“Take me!” Harry roared. “Take me, don’t touch her, she doesn’t even remember!”

“No,” said Umbridge sweetly, “but you do, don’t you?”

Cho wailed. Draco felt his mouth fall open, and despite himself, he jerked his head to stare at Snape.

The Potions Master was a professor. A member of the Order of the Phoenix. Dumbledore had trusted him. And he was avoiding Draco’s gaze, rolling his wand as as if he intended to watch the torture of a student without lifting an eyebrow. In his eyes lived a flat black nothingness, devoid of warmth, devoid of empathy, devoid even of interest in what was happening. An icy crust of desperation sealed over Draco’s sternum.

He tried to imagine what his mother would do. Narcissa would have known how to make Snape do what she wanted. She would have known what to do now; probably she could even have made Umbridge stop, if she were here.

Then it came to him — not what she would do, but one thing she could.

Discreetly, under the cover of his robe, he drew his wand. Amidst Cho's screaming and Harry's ragged protests, few noticed him rolling his wrist to angle his wand at Snape, inside his cloak, nor the whisper that slipped through gritted teeth.

It was desperation that moved his hand and his tongue; he had no idea if it would work, but he had watched his mother do it perhaps half a thousand times. He had felt her do it, as well. He could at least guess at what the spell entailed, what it required of the caster.

The spell was an act of violation, his mother had said. It was an act of violence against the mind of another being. So he brought his will to bear on it, drew up all the fear and frustration of watching the betrayal of Dumbledore, the disgust and repulsion of watching the torture a fifteen-year-old girl, the withering hatred that accrued from a year spent in suffocating fear of pain, and imagined himself driving a blade between his godfather's eyes.

Legilimens.

His mind became a pane of flat black glass. The room blurred and slipped away. He plunged into the lightless space of the mind, falling in it. He took the thing that was his consciousness, the space it occupied in the realm of Occlusion, and for the first time, he cast it probingly outside of his Occlumency shield.

The pane of black glass became a knife, and it flew. The rush of airless space dizzied him.

His mind slammed against something so hard and cold his body convulsed in physical space. It was more than a mental shield. Touching Snape's mind was like driving at full speed on a Firebolt into a castle wall. It left him starry and pulsing with pain.

The world slotted back into place. He staggered and nearly collapsed into Dawlish. Hermione caught him and dragged him away from the auror.

“Are you alright?” Her fingers winding tightly in his shirt. He nodded shortly.

Snape made a guttural noise. He was braced on the wall, one hand lifted, as if to block a blow to his eyes; he stared at Draco, mouth parted in an uncharacteristic posture of surprise, as if Draco had neatly gored him.

“Draco,” Hermione pressed. He curled his hand around her waist and braced himself on her, cold sweat dampening his temples.

“I’m fine.”

“Obviously not—”

“Later,” he muttered, though he did not know what or when later would be. From her distraught stare, neither did she.

Cho had dissolved from screaming into babbling sobs, braced on her knees in front of Umbridge.

“Dolores,” murmured Cassius, “the girl’s mother works at the Prophet.”

“Are you questioning my order?”

Cassius shrugged and tipped his head towards Ginny, saying nothing. Umbridge blinked, and then she smiled.

“How apt,” she said. “Thank you for your counsel, Cassius. Bring me the other.”

He tossed Cho aside. She stumbled and collapsed to the floor, catching herself hard on her elbows. Ginny was hauled forward, her heels skidding against the floor, thrashing and snapping at him with her teeth.

The replacement changed Harry; instead of shouting, he dropped to his knees and fell completely, terribly still, staring at Ginny as if she were the only living thing in the room. His stare was transfixed.

“Please,” he said, with a low broken voice, like prayer. He was not even really talking to Umbridge anymore.

Ginny was wrestled to the floor, her arm wrenched out. She panted, staring doggedly at Umbridge through the red and bloodied curtain of her hair.

“To demonstrate,” said Umbridge. “Mr. Potter, tell me how to open this map.”

“Please,” said Harry, incoherent with grief.

“No,” she said sadly. “That’s not an answer. Diffindo.”

Ginny screamed. Red slit her forearm. Blood welled and wept from the cut.

“Episkey,” said Umbridge, after a moment. The cut sealed over neatly, though the blood still dripped from Ginny’s arm. She turned to Harry and inclined her head knowingly. “Do you see?” she said. “Do you see what happens to them?”

“Please,” said Harry, distantly. His eyes were swollen. Tears dripped from his face, new rivulets spilling every time he blinked. “Professor. Please take me instead.”

“You can’t do that.”

Umbridge twitched. Hermione had spoken, and when Umbridge paused, she spoke again.

“You shouldn’t,” she repeated. It was flat and cold and clear and hopeless. “It’s against the law.”

Hermione did not touch her wand. She stood before the headmistress, weaponless, with the long stare of a girl with a prefect’s badge who knew she was right, and also knew that it did not matter. That she was standing on the hill of a dead cause, and she, too, meant to die there.

Nausea gripped him. He wanted to haul her out of the way, out of sight, but it wouldn’t do any good. No matter where he took her, she would fight her way back to that spot. Through anyone. Through him, if she had to.

“Not that it matters to you.” Hermione clenched two fists full of nothing but air, small and bold and clever and terrible. “You don’t care what the laws are, so it doesn’t matter. You’ll do what you want anyway, because you can, and you think that’s a good enough reason—”

“Severus,” Dolores said, but Snape did not respond.

“—to hurt people who don’t do what you want — nobody respects you, they’re just afraid you’ll hurt them. Only it was a poor strategy,” she said, “because you forgot something about children. You don’t really understand children, professor, I suppose it’s because you don’t like them very much. But they learn by copying, you see. They follow the example of their teachers.”

“Silence, Miss Granger!”

“I cursed Cho,” Hermione spat, bitter with a razored edge of pride. She did not look at Harry. She held her head high like the queen of a burning Carthage, for all she cared what anyone thought of her. “It wasn’t Draco, it was me. At the beginning of the year, I cursed everyone in the Army to forget everything that would incriminate Harry if they ever betrayed him, and when she came to you, she triggered the curse. A mudblood cost you your conspiracy, put that in your report to the Minister. Want to know where I got the idea, professor? From Veritaserum. You can't force someone to say something they can't remember. I can't say the Ministry never taught me anything. I can't say you didn't, either. You taught me what fear is. You taught a lot of people what fear is.

"You made children bleed for telling you the truth," she said coldly. "You made them hate you. And then you taught them how to handle pain. What do you think people do when they're not scared of bleeding anymore?"

"Right," said Umbridge furiously. "Right. Cassius, I think Miss Weasley has had enough. Bring me Miss Granger."

Bellows of objection came from Harry and Ron. But Draco was moving already, without thinking, without deliberating, a completely instinctive movement for his wand. He drew it and had the curse on his tongue, a bitter word he had read written in a book, a word to cause pain — regardless of the aurors, who in the blank rage-hot panic of that moment he really did think he might be able to kill, if they tried to stop him — and Snape clutched his arm.

Green flames erupted from the fireplace. Silhouettes bloomed from the smoke, an auror's greatcoat, first one, then another, then a third. A man stepped out of the hearth: broad, but slender, with a mane of sabled tawny hair and ragged brows that framed a pair of shrewd, yellowish eyes, the pale green of algae on a scummy lake. He stood with a hunch, hands behind his back, as if the shape of his spine was wrought for the purpose of looming. He swept out, red ashes crunching under his boots.

He paused when he saw Ginny on the floor, blood drying on her arm, and Harry on his knees. But with a glimmer of something in his expression, he visibly set it aside, and focused on Umbridge.

"Auror Scrimgeour," cried Umbridge. "You — what are you doing here? Dawlish was soon coming in to make his report—"

“This is an emergency.” Scrimgeour’s voice was hoarse and deep like a chain-smoking giant. He gestured to the aurors, and they moved at once to his side, abandoning their posts by Warrington. Umbridge’s eyes darted to follow the movement, and she moved further behind the desk. “I came because an owl would arrive too late. You must secure the school.”

“The school is secure,” she said irritably, gesturing at Harry. “We have apprehended the rebel, and we will soon have his conspirators, so there’s really no need for you—”

“Forget the boy, what does he matter?” Scrimgeour snapped. His voice was an icy lash to the throat. Harry lifted his head, staring blearily at Scrimgeour in confusion. “You have greater concerns than student discipline. I come to tell you that you must raise the castle wards. I’m putting a detail of dementors at the gates.”

Umbridge paled. “What happened?”

“There was a break-in at the Ministry. The Department of Mysteries has been sacked.”

“Dumbledore,” she gasped. “It was Albus Dumbledore, he came to —”

“No,” Scrimgeour snapped. “Not Dumbledore. A contingent of Unspeakables allowed a party of unidentified wizards to pass unnoticed into the Ministry and remove a vast quantity of Dark artifacts without being identified. All of the Department’s security features were disabled. None of the recording devices have captured anything from the period of the invasion. No fewer than sixty-three Ministry employees have failed to report to auror summons for questioning. Whoever did this has fingers deep inside the administration. The operation required the cooperation of dozens of employees, if not hundreds—”

“The Order,” she cried, “the Order must have done it, at Dumbledore’s behest—”

“Dumbledore did not have platinum clearance! This was a conspiracy, Dolores, and it came from within the Ministry! Either the Order has done it, and the Order has infiltrated the Ministry so thoroughly we may as well surrender to it—”

“That is not possible!” Umbridge screamed at him. “That cannot happen! You are mistaken!”

“—or we are facing another terrorist cell,” said Scrimgeour, ragged. “One much larger than the Order. One that has lain deep in the shadows for a great deal of time.”

“It’s Voldemort,” said Harry. He did not raise his voice. His eyes were shut. “I told you. I told you a year ago.”

The door creaked. Draco turned his head and caught Snape slipping out of the room, his cloak flickering behind him. No one else appeared to notice; Umbridge and Scrimgeour were caught in a fierce battle of inexorable truth against immovable will.

“Check how many of the missing employees are purebloods,” Harry added dully. “Actually, don’t bother. I can tell you.”

“What does Albert say?” Umbridge croaked. “What does he think? What — what does he want me to do?”

There was a long pause. Scrimgeour’s expression mingled pity with contempt.

“No successful attempt has been made to contact the Minister,” he said.

Umbridge gave a cry, clutching the desk for strength. Harry barked a laugh.

“You would never suggest—”

“He was not at his residence when aurors arrived. There are no apparation trails. He is gone.”

“Then they have kidnapped him,” she gasped. “They have — have taken him, this sect, or else— or else he is dead, then—”

“Dolores, take hold of yourself.” Scrimgeour raised his voice. “We have no Minister now. That is all that matters. We must protect the school. We must raise our defenses—”

“Albert would not betray us—”

“—elect a new Minister, if Runcorn cannot be found—”

The door was still ajar. Draco thought again of running, wildly, of dragging Hermione with him by force, but his dream shattered against the knowledge that there was nowhere to go.

“Keep everyone inside the castle,” he said. “No one comes in. No one leaves it.”

“You cannot command me,” Umbridge retorted, moving furtively back from the desk. “I serve at the Minister’s discretion—”

“Let him come to reprimand me,” snapped Scrimgeour. With the firelight at his back, he approached her, and his shadow bloomed over her pinched face. She stumbled away from the desk, and he stepped around it, edging her out of the headmaster’s seat.

“This is against the law,” she shrieked. “This — this is a coup! I am the rightful headmistress — the school is mine! The auror office cannot just take it from me! You cannot do this, Rufus!”

“We are facing a reckoning,” he replied. “I regret that the law does not abet this. But these are not lawful times. Dolores Umbridge, in my capacity as Head of the Auror Office, I direct you to surrender control of the castle, or else it will be taken from you.”

It escaped no one’s notice that there were now no less than six aurors in the room — six aurors, eight students, and Cassius

Warrington, whose expression remained impassive, lightless, and cold.

“Do as the aurors suggest, madam,” he said. It was the first time he had not called her professor. “For both of us.”

“You,” she cried in outrage. “After what I did for you— after all I gave you—”

“You will be permitted to retain your post as headmistress,” said Scrimgeour. “This is a security measure. If you comply with my orders, you have no cause for concern.”

“It is my school!” she screeched. Her face was a red crumple of unhappiness. “Mine! It isn’t fair!”

“What is fair will yield to what is necessary.” Scrimgeour turned his back on her, and addressed the aurors. “Take the injured to the Hospital Wing,” he ordered. “Shutter the Floos. Lock the Owlery. Inform the faculty. No one can leave Hogwarts until more is known about the nature of the crisis.”

“Yes, sir.”

“Sir.”

“Sir.”

Underneath the clamor, Harry had crawled across the floor to Ginny, and held her face between his hands. He spoke to her in low, hasty murmurs; her eyes, dazed and starry from pain, fixed on him as if he were the sole lighted object in the room. When he used his sleeve to scrub some dried blood from her temple, she gave him a brave, weak little smile.

Cho pushed herself to her feet, swaying some. “Hermione,” she said quietly, “can you— can you undo the charm on me? I’d like to — remember, please.”

Hermione took a deep breath.

“I don’t know,” she said coldly. “You should see someone about it.”

Cho flinched. “You — but — sorry, what do you mean? You do know how to undo it.”

“I mean what I said. I don’t know a countercharm for Obliviate. Do you?”

“No, but you must!”

“Well, I don’t.”

“Hermione!”

“What?” she snapped, whipping her head around. “What is it? What? Did you hear anything Scrimgeour said? There are more important things to think about—”

“Not to me! You stole a year of my life!” Cho was furious, but her voice had the shrill cadence of a plea. “You can’t just do that to a person! I didn’t betray Harry! Even if you think I did, I don’t — I can’t remember that, it isn’t fair!”

Hermione drew her head back. Her eyes were dark pits with coal guttering at the base.

“Consider this a chance to start over,” she said.

Something in her tone snagged at Draco’s ear. It came to him belatedly, as Cho crumpled under the unabating sear of Hermione’s glower: he recognized Hermione’s tone because it sounded very much like himself.

Consider this a chance to start over. He wore her signature so deeply and so clearly on his soul that it had never occurred to him to check hers for his fingerprints.

Scrimgeour and Umbridge were conferring in deep tones. George had joined Harry and Ron at Ginny’s side, and Luna was holding herself, rocking back and forth, mumbling. Hermione reached for Draco blindly, and his hand was there where hers sought it, winding around hers like two vines that grew together on a castle wall.

She turned to him, and a wild light guttered in her eyes, fierce and frantic. He had never seen her so except when she was about to curse something or weep. Rage or grief. The coin was in the air. There remained but a moment, a slender one, when it could be pushed.

He drew her hand up and pressed his mouth to the back of her knuckles. His lips touched the fingers that had cursed the girl who betrayed them, and they loosened at his kiss.

Hermione’s shoulders sank. Relief broke up the rigid lines of her face, softened them, but let the fear come, too. She tightened her grip on his hand. The fire carved the silhouette of two creatures limned in darkness. The coin fell.

Well, this has been a real "martha i'm back in the fucking building" kind of year for me so far, but the good news is, I'm not dead, and neither are you. I can't say much of anything except that on God, I will finish the story I started, no matter how long that takes me. I'm committed. I am also, however, a frail human being who gets swatted around like a horsefly by my schedule + health sometimes, so my promise to update is not immediately time-limited. Also, Book 5 in general has been fighting me in the edit, but I've finally wrestled this chapter into something publishable, and I shipped it to you as fast as I could.

I love you guys. Stay safe out there. Next chapter: "I Will Not Tell Lies."

I Will Not Tell Lies

Chapter 77: I Will Not Tell Lies

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

The first week after Scrimgeour’s arrival, Draco did not hear Harry speak.

Scrimgeour himself moved between Hogwarts and London often, sometimes several times a day. He was the only one in and out. With the Owlery locked, letters and news alike ceased, draping the world beyond the castle under a bleak veil. Six aurors were stationed in the Entrance Hall, along with an influx of so many patrolmen one would think they were forecasting invasion.

Just one, of thousands, had escaped the castle before the wall came down. Severus Snape was nowhere to be found in the castle. A full-fledged search of the dungeons by a dozen patrolmen failed to unearth his person, and with regret, it was concluded that Snape had fled the premises. To what end, and to serve what master — if any — no one knew, and not even Draco could guess.

Patience ran short. Each hour was a losing game of waiting. Through the windows, arrowed sunlight turned the common room stifling and hot, and the rich blue sky practically tasted of fresh air, but the only way to sample it was to open a window. No one could leave the castle. Nor did even lessons puncture the fabric of boredom: the faculty had been enlisted in the school’s defense. McGonagall and Flitwick stood as often as any auror at the school gates, their silhouettes thin and shallow on the lawns.

Without classes, students had their run of the castle, but with aurors at the doors, it was a shallow freedom. Prefects no longer ran patrols. Draco found himself restless and sleepless, sitting up reading old books of spells, or else practicing curses in bed with the drapes drawn. He fell asleep with his wand in his hand, lying shirtless on the coverlet, and woke up more exhausted than he had been before he slept. He went to the library and walked listlessly through the empty aisles, watching dust spin in the glare under grated windows. He went to the Room of Requirement and paced the dueling piste, rehearsing footwork until it was flawless, until the steps themselves seemed to move his limbs, like dancing. He went to the Great Hall, and the empty chamber sat still and peaceful, like a magnificent, sun-lit catacomb. He went to the fenced-off part of the seventh floor, where Seamus's bomb had carved out a vast chunk of the wall and damaged the bridge to the Owlery; sparrows were roosting in the rough-hewn rock that used to be a spare classroom. He walked past the aurors on his way back to Gryffindor. Others they stopped and made to empty their bags, checking for contraband, but not him.

The Damocles sword of expulsion hung low over his neck. His best reassurance was that the administration seemed too occupied to fix on what happened the night of the Astronomy practical. This was not, as Hermione pointed out, an enduring fix, but with each day it seemed more and more likely that Umbridge's plans for discipline had been overridden by some higher source intent on keeping all students inside the castle. The plans of Dolores Umbridge had been, at the least, shifted to the back cauldron, while the security of the wizarding world hung in question. It was an unpleasant irony that what had rescued them had been nothing less than the potential collapse of the Ministry itself.

The temper of the castle boiled low. Trapped, with nowhere to go and nothing to quench their stoppered aggravation, the students began to gnaw at the walls. Fights broke out in hallways. Draco lost count of the number of children he pried apart, split with a Stinging Jinx or restrained with rope, to prevent them from bloodying each other. House did not matter. Slytherin first years struck and tripped each other for the crime of laughing too loudly; they warred with Hufflepuffs over taking too long in the stall.

There was no order. How could there be? The adults disagreed openly with each other in the hallways. McGonagall had a shouting match with Dawlish over his effort to confiscate a second-year's medication for boils. Umbridge and Scrimgeour never sat down to dine at the faculty table except in bad spirits with each other. There were no newspapers allowed in the castle. The Ministry might well have fallen altogether, for all the students were permitted to know.

Meanwhile, Draco thought of his mother.

He laid awake with a knot in his heart and thought of where she was; had she heard about the Ministry? Was Snape with her? Did she know of Snape's betrayal, and had she arranged it? Fear commingled with fury at having once again been left out of their plans: if they had told him anything, he would have known now what to do.

But none of them knew what was happening outside; they were stuck. Children, infants. Gossiping and scheming at their little plots, pretending at games of war and politics, sheltered and caged by their ignorance. Some nights the possibilities left him sleepless; other nights he woke up choking on the start of a scream.

The day after the Astronomy exam was spent by most of the Weasley family in the Hospital Wing. Ginny and Fred returned forthwith. Pomfrey sent Ginny back to Gryffindor with a sling; a tendon had been severed in her throwing-arm. Fred stayed two nights. Angelina and Lee had suffered minor injuries from detonating Seamus's bomb. Katie sprained her ankle, and Dean had his nose broken by a patrolman's curse. Seamus sat with them in the common room with his jaw set in a rictus of sorrow and guilt, soothing Katie's sprained ankle with a freezing charm.

The failure of Potter's Army, such as it was, laid a silent film of desolation over the common room. Morale sapped, Katie and Lee halfheartedly tried to rally plans for another attempt at escaping, but with Ministry officials at every gate, they found few audiences. With Harry near-catatonic and Hermione in a bitter well of self-blame, there was nothing around which to organize.

Neville tried to apologize to Harry, but Harry was still not speaking, so Ron reassured on his behalf.

“You did your best, Nev. No one expected you to take down an auror.”

“About that. You don’t have to tell me, uh, everything, exactly, b-but — what h-happened?” said Neville. “Did Cho — was she informing on us the whole…?”

“Cho reported us,” said Hermione. She turned a page in her book and did not lift her head. “I expect she went to Cassius, who raised the alarm with Umbridge. She might have told them about the escape attempt, or she might have told them a good bit more — as much as she could have done, anyway, before the curse kicked in. I imagine they offered her what she thought were good terms.”

Harry exhaled. She lifted her head inquiringly. “Anything to add?”

Harry shook his head. Ron frowned at her, and went to sit with Harry in the window.

He was still the only one Harry would speak to. Draco had caught them several times in the evenings, in some shadowed corner of the common room, Harry muttering while Ron listened and nodded with intent.

It was known, for the same reasons that all things known by more than two people eventually became known, that Cho had betrayed them. It was less known what had happened to her because of it; Hermione did not speak of it, and Harry did not speak of all, and Ron and Draco independently arrived at the same conclusion, which was that it suited no one to know. Rumors of facial disfigurement percolated for some time, with particular enthusiasm by Victoria and the other first years, while Romilda assured anyone who would listen that Cho was gravely maimed. Regard for Hermione grew deep, but chilly like the pelagic; fewer came to bother her with questions about her homework in the evenings, and when she snapped at someone, students moved hastily to obey.

Hermione criticized, even by implication, was Hermione at her worst. In those long dog days of May, she became brittle and short-tempered. Speaking to her was a short-lived game of Exploding Snap, with no winning hands.

Sometimes she burst into the boys' dorms, spitting furious at some minor sleight from Lee or Seamus, while he was reading there; from there she would proceed to wear a hole in the floor, stray flickers of magic snapping her robes, until the subject had been verbally beaten to death, resurrected, and beaten to death again. He watched her desolate an array of hypothetical criticism with vigor and precision, but he did not once watch anyone brave the risk of voicing it to her, and so instead he watched her bottled-up defenses sour under the rotting suspicion that perhaps no one was interested in them.

Once, and once only, she admitted: "I didn't think it would do that much."

It was evening, and the sounds of the common room burbled through the walls. Muffliato and Colloportus infused the boys' dorm with what scant privacy was possible, in a shared space.

She was leaning against his bedpost, recovering from a few miles of pacing his floor, while he reclined against the headboard. Draco inclined his head, patient.

"I thought it would — I thought it would just take the memories of Defense Club." Her voice was small. "The Army, I mean. I didn't think it would take the whole year."

Cho Chang had betrayed people she did not understand and was not really friends with for a boy she adored — though she also, perhaps, did not understand him — and a mother she loved. She had also come very near to getting Draco's wand snapped, and Hermione's along with it. For his own sake, he resented her, and found little to regret in the fact she had been punished for it; at the same time, he did not find her choices difficult to understand. She was the unfortunate victim of luck: she had chosen the wrong people to invest with what she held dear. It was a hard call. Sometimes he doubted his own ability to make it, himself.

Nevertheless, his sympathy did not obligate him to forgive her.

"The spell was extremely difficult."

"I'm aware of that."

"A Memory Curse is fiendish on its own. Setting a runic trap on the parchment to hold the spell indefinitely is another level of complication — based on the act of revealing certain information, which means you reverse-engineered half of a Fidelius Charm. And you managed not to trigger a memory cascade upon casting. The fact that her mind is intact is a marvel."

"I'm perfectly aware how hard it was, thank you, I'm the one who did it."

Her cruelty wasn't aimed at him, nor was the fury, nor the disgust. Hermione practiced cruelty to herself in the hopes it would inoculate herself to it from others. It did not, and had never, but the habit was old, and enduring.

"She still remembers most of her life," he said, electing to stick with the line of the obvious. "You ringfenced the spell, which is by far the most pernicious effect of a botched Memory Charm."

"I took a year of her life."

"Not a very good one."

"Draco," she snapped.

“Well, she spent half of it weeping.”

“Draco!”

“I’m not going to condemn you.”

She scowled.

“Do you want me to do that? I can,” he said, “but I won’t.”

“Why not? Do you not think it’s awful? Or are all these muggle-born scruples just pearl-clutching to you, because you’re so above it all, these silly little moral conundrums?”

He raised his eyebrows. Hermione pressed the back of her hand to her mouth.

“Sorry.”

“Fine.”

“No. I am — sorry. Awful. Awful thing to say, I’m sorry.”

“It is fine.”

“I’m really sorry. I shouldn’t have said that to you. I shouldn’t — I don’t want to take this out on you, like I’m—”

Hermione swallowed. Abruptly, she sat down, and said in a tight voice: “Can you please— please just come and — and hold me, please. You don’t have to — but — please.”

He unfolded himself immediately and slid across the bed to take her by the waist, drawing her into the cradle of his lap. She folded herself tightly into him, clutching his arms where they wound around her waist, and bent her face to hide in her knees. She was shaking.

Hermione’s back arched into his chest. She was burning warm, furnace-bright, a line of fire down the half of his body. He bent his face into the nape of her neck, where citrus bloomed evergreen. She was so fierce, such a large person in everything but size, and he could fit her all inside his arms. She was frail and strong and defensive and regretful all at once. It was a marvel she even fit inside her own body.

He supposed that sometimes she didn't, and that was where her panic came from. Sometimes there was too much of her, just like there was too much of him, to make sense of. Somewhere between the Golden Girl and the Chosen One's pet cutthroat lived a very clever, very frightened girl named Hermione Granger, splitting her life among two worlds that each had no place for her.

She kissed Draco's shoulder. The whole surface of his chest seemed to twinge with it.

"You thought, if we were betrayed, it would be a stranger," he said. "You didn't think it would be someone close."

She did not reply at first.

Then she said: "A stranger wouldn't have much to forget. It wouldn't have hurt them — forgetting us."

"You can be forgiven for overestimating the loyalty of your friends."

"You would never make that mistake," she said quietly.

No, he wouldn't have; but then, he would not have done many things, if he had not been permitted to ride side-along on the bravery of others, freed by their courage to pretend that he was not really making a choice.

"You and I have different virtues," he said, at length. "And different vices. Don't wish for mine. I wouldn't wish them on you."

Hermione tilted her head away. The setting sun's light struck her eye obliquely, slitting it with veins of gold. "And what," she said evenly, "if we need yours more than we need mine?”

Her pupil shifted, and he found himself looking her in the eye.

“He has one of me already,” he said. “He doesn’t need two.”

It flitted back to the window. “What if I want yours?” she said unhappily.

He drew her hair over her shoulder. Her lid shuttered over the liquid gold of her iris. “Then you have me,” he said. It was easy to say, shockingly easy; it surprised him that it had ever been difficult. “Vices and virtues, and whatever’s left.”

“Do you think your father will be alright? Seeing as he was undercover at the Ministry.”

He and Ron were walking along one of the upper balustrades on the Tower, an open-air bridge between parts of the castle that offered a rare taste of fresh air. Below, the hills glittered in a sun-glazed quilt of moss and heather. They had shucked their ties in the heat; without prefect patrols, and with teachers otherwise occupied, uniform standards had slid to join other routines, by the wayside. In another time, Draco might have found some morsel of himself that cared.

Ron cleared his throat. “Sure, yeah. We had contingency plans,” he said. “What to do if the Ministry fell, if Hogwarts fell, if Dumbledore died. We’re s’posed to split up and head to different safehouses. Bill and Charlie with Ginny, Dad with the twins, Mum with Harry and me. If things got really bad, and we can’t get to the safehouse, we’re s’posed to rendezvous somewhere out of the country. So if the Ministry’s fallen, that means Mum and Dad are out there, somewhere, trying to find a way to get us out.”

“Prudent,” said Draco, a sincere compliment.

“Thanks.” He glanced at Draco. “You, then?”

“Do I have a plan, do you mean?”

“Yeah. You and your mum.” Ron paused. “You can always come with us, if you don’t. Or if you can’t … I mean, Mum wouldn’t… wouldn’t want you to be on your own.”

“Thank you,” he said, stilted. “I appreciate the gravity of your offer — deeply. I would be — more grateful — if you extended it to Hermione.”

“Course I did,” said Ron, offended by the presumption otherwise. “But she said she had other plans. I assumed they were with you — aren’t they? With the magical castle, and whatnot—”

“‘Plan’ is an ambitious noun.”

“You’re saying she doesn’t have one?”

“Such as it is,” he said, with over-articulated disgust, “it’s to return to her parents. In London.” He curled his fists on the balustrade. “Mind you, she’ll have the Trace on her until September.”

Ron snorted. “Bet she had a ball telling you that.”

“We have a difference of opinion, which we have litigated as far as is productive.”

“She’s aware that London’s not right safe, just now?”

“The point has been made to her,” said Draco, “in full force.”

Ron did laugh, then, though the sound was bleak.

“On the bright side,” he said, “I guess there’s your chance to meet the parents.”

The joke was too forced; it was too light; his heart was not really in it, but Ron was trying. He was trying to say, with whatever words he had, This is normal, and I will be normal about this.

“Good shout,” Draco drawled. “What charming circumstances. ‘Pleasure to meet you, Doctors, shame about the terrorists. My father used to lead them, but don’t worry, my aunt murdered him. By the way, I’m courting your daughter. Hope you don’t mind.’”

“Eugh,” Ron muttered. “Why can’t you just say ‘dating’ like everyone else? You sound like my Aunt Muriel.”

“Strictly, it’s inaccurate. Dating is a public form of courtship, which ours is not.”

“Strictly, you’re a priss for even knowing that. And her parents won’t care about your dad,” he added. “They don’t know the history there. As far as they’re concerned, you’re the scary wizard prince who keeps mauling people that bully her. And you know which fork to use at fancy dinners. They’ll go nuts. I’ve met them, I’d know.”

“I suppose you have.”

Ron glanced at him wearily from his periphery. “It doesn’t matter,” he said, with a twinge of pain. “You know that, right? She spent that whole summer talking about you.”

Though it had mattered, and did. It mattered that Ron’s family knew Hermione’s family, and that the Grangers had met Ron’s parents, eaten at their table. It mattered what Ron’s family was, and what it meant to her.

“It doesn’t matter,” he repeated. Then he shrugged. “Moot point, if we never get out of here.”

Ron laughed hollowly. An owl dipped out of the clouds overhead, skimming high among the turrets, but it made a wide circle around the wards and departed with the letter still clutched in its grasp.

“What do you and Potter talk about?”

“The weather,” Ron said evenly.

Draco raised his eyebrow. “He won’t let you tell me? Really.”

“You do not get to give me shit about keeping secrets.”

“Perfectly fair. Is it a secret, then, why he’s stopping talking to us?”

“Who’s ‘us’?”

“Don’t play the fool.”

Ron grimaced and made a little prevaricating gesture with his chin: yes-and-no. “Well, you know why he’s not talking to Hermione.”

“And I suppose you think he’s justified in it?”

Ron cut him a flat look. “So what? In his position, you wouldn’t have cared?”

“I would have been open to reason.”

“Like fuck you would’ve,” Ron exclaimed. “You realize it’s Hermione herself we’re talking about, in that analogy.”

Draco twitched, then waved his hand irritably, conceding the point. “Hermione would never have done what Chang did. One acted out of loyalty; the other, not. He’s punishing one for the sins of the other.”

“And who’s he supposed to punish? Cho? Who thinks it’s 1995? The girl who betrayed him doesn’t exist anymore. Hermione — kind of — killed her.”

Ron’s voice trailed off uncomfortably. Draco rolled his shoulders, feeling the heavy fabric of his shirt cling dense and damp to his skin in the heat.

“Don’t be hysterical,” he said flatly. “Cho’s not dead. She was relieved, if anything, of one spectacularly unpleasant year of her life.”

“Still her life,” said Ron.

Draco said nothing, and leaned forward against the post. A summer breeze ruffled the hair on the back of his neck. It was longer now than it had ever been; long enough to require binding back for unruliness.

“Will you advocate for her, at least? With Potter.”

Ron braced his elbows on the balustrade and leaned over. “Yeah. I mean, no. I tell him the curse backfired, that it wasn’t Hermione’s fault, that she didn’t mean it, but… I mean, Draco, she kind of did mean it.”

“Chang tried to expel us,” he snapped. “She meant it, as well.”

“Because she was piss-frightened they’d sack her mum.”

“From the paper that spent the year libelling her boyfriend. Where’s this outpouring of warmth coming from? I thought you were fed up with her.”

Ron threw up his hands. “I was. I am! I don’t think she’s this great person. I think she’s normal. I think that’s why Harry liked her, right, she’s pretty and normal and good at quidditch. Bloke doesn’t have a lot of normal people in his life, no offense.”

“If this is how they treat him, I can see why.”

“Okay, but like — I’ve been thinking on this, mate — are we sure if she even ratted us out?” Ron glanced over his shoulder, though they were alone on the balustrades, and the stakes of being overheard were, for once, null. “They could have tortured it out of her. They’re not above it. Remember the quills—?”

“Highly unlikely.”

“Why?”

“In the office, Warrington stopped Umbridge from hurting her. Her mother’s compliance still has value to them. At any rate, it would be unnecessary. They only needed Snape to replenish their veritaserum, which he didn't."

"Yeah, too busy spilling Order secrets to bother with ours."

"I think it worth noting that no one from the Order has actually been caught, remember, as a consequence of that—"

"How would you know? Are you somehow getting owls we're not?"

"You think Percival would have been able to refrain from mentioning if they raided your family?"

Ron smiled a slow, tired smile. "Right," he said. "He would've thrown it in my face."

"Never attribute to force what can be attributed to personal interest," said Draco. "A principle that applies to Percival and Cho Chang alike."

The smile vanished. "Yeah. I dunno if I'd obliviate Percy, either."

"Would you give up Harry to avoid it?"

Ron rubbed his knuckles in his eyes. "Merlin. Kind of question — I'd let someone torture me before I gave up Harry, right? I'd let them torture me dead. And Hermione doesn't — I don't judge her for what she does to protect him. I don't judge her for anything. She's a damn sight smarter and braver than I'll ever be, and I love her. Like, really love her. I'd let them torture me for her, too."

The usual antipathy twinged in Draco's breast, but it cooled swiftly. Ron said it without hostility and without possessiveness. It was a simple statement of fact: he loved her.

"And?"

"And sometimes she scares the shit out of me," said Ron plainly. "I don't know what to do with that. I've been angry at her, I've been intimidated by her, but I've never been scared of her."

He was about to object, stridently, that of all the people in the world, Ron was among the last with anything to fear from her. But the oddity of it struck Draco at once — that the things he had once found frightening about Hermione, such as they were, had flowed only from the fact that Hermione was likely to ask things of him greater than what anyone else would, and he was likely to do them. Perhaps for Ron, it was the same feeling, merely pointed in a different moral direction.

The next time Harry spoke to him, it had been two weeks since the Astronomy exam.

By and by, the boy had stopped sleeping as well as talking. Instead, he spent nights perched in the window with his snowy owl, feeding her treats and stroking her feathers, staring expressionlessly across the moonlit landscape under the tower window.

After a certain amount of time, it became ridiculous for both of them to lie awake in silence. Draco drew back the hangings of his bed and lit his wand. Approaching the window, he stepped deliberately on the floorboards instead of their seams, so they creaked and announced his presence well in advance.

Harry turned to him. His glasses sieved moonlight into rainbows on the floor.

Draco settled himself on the window seat, extinguished his wandlight, and twirled his wand between his fingers. Harry followed the movement with his eyes for a moment, then returned to stroking the bird's cowl.

"It wasn't your fault," said Draco.

Harry's fingers stilled.

“You must know that. They all chose to fight.”

The moon washed Harry’s eyes so pale they were nearly blue. He lifted them over his glasses and nodded. The movement parted his hair over the snaking tendrils of his scar.

“There was no world where Umbridge allowed you to save them,” said Draco. “You could have turned yourself in. You could have turned Dumbledore in. You could have flayed yourself for her entertainment. It would have changed nothing. There is no middle ground in matters like these. Take it from someone who has learned it painfully.”

Harry shook his head.

“Do you think that’s what I dream about?” he said, hoarse and calm. “Umbridge? And turning myself in?”

It was too much of a relief — far too much to be admitted — to hear Harry talk again.

He indicated the window and their empty beds. “To the extent that you dream at all, I considered it.”

Harry smiled thinly and shook his head again.

“I see a castle,” he rasped. “The same castle, every night. And there’s a man with my voice, and he sounds like me, and he’s torturing people. It’s always the same man. It’s not always the same people.”

Draco’s heartbeat skipped. Not always the same people. Not always the same people?

“Who is it?”

“Pettigrew,” said Harry dully, “and Goyle. Travers, sometimes. There’s a lot of people — they’ve all come back to him, you see, and he’s angry at them. He’s angry that they betrayed him.”

He twitched with irritated urgency, verging to say: I don't give a shit about Pettigrew or Travers. Is Snape there?

Is my mother?

Harry knew Narcissa. Certainly he knew Snape. He would tell Draco. That was a certainty.

Though he was not certain enough to stop thinking about it. Then again, not brave enough to ask. Never brave enough, Draco Malfoy.

"Occlumency will help."

"I can't do Occlumency."

"Potter—"

"I can't do Occlumency," he said doggedly. "Give it up. That's what your mum did."

"My mother stopped lessons because she was called away. She didn't give up. She would never."

"Okay. Doesn't really change things, does it?" Harry unfolded his legs and stood up, catching his owl on his arm.

Draco wanted to say something more about his mother — defend her, instinctively, although he really couldn't think how, and did not even understand why it mattered to him so much that Harry believed him — but Harry interrupted his thoughts.

"Do you want to know the worst part?"

He didn't give an answer; it didn't require one. Harry helped the owl into her cage and snapped the latch. "I understood it," he said. "How it feels to want to hurt someone. How it feels to want someone dead. That's the worst thing Umbridge ever did to me. I wasn't angry about the torture. I was angry because I wanted it to be someone else."

“They’re the Dark Lord’s feelings. They don’t belong to you.”

“No. See, that’s the worst part,” he said. “I can tell the difference.”

With that, he drew the hangings.

Draco went back to his own bed, but the hours until dawn were spent thinking of castles and torture and resenting his miserable, starveling gratitude that Harry hadn’t seen Narcissa through the Dark Lord’s eyes.

Morning dawned the color of dust. Distant rains trawling over the moors like the drifting cloaks of faraway dementors. It was almost June, and the nineteenth day of not knowing what was going to happen to them.

Harry was gone for most of the day. Umbridge still had the Map, so no one knew where he went until late in the afternoon, when Harry dropped through the portrait door, swept off his Invisibility Cloak, and said: “Cho’s getting transferred to St. Mungo’s.”

The room stirred. Draco raised his head from annotating the sixth-year potions textbook. Hermione watched Harry from her armchair, head tilted, bitterness writ deep across her face. Her hair spilled down her shoulders, held uselessly by a clasp, framing her face; she had ink on her nose and a raw-bitten mouth and the haggard scowl of a sleepless week, and she was still so lovely it stilled him for a moment.

“They have a ward for magical neurology,” said Harry. “They’re going to see if they can do something for her.”

“Fine,” said Hermione tautly. “Maybe she can send word if the Ministry’s still standing. The rest of us wouldn’t know.”

Harry exhaled through his teeth. Ron snapped his head up and shot a sharp look at Draco, which Draco returned with a helpless glare.

“I see you’re talking to me again,” Hermione added. “Good of you.”

“I thought you’d want to know,” said Harry. “Since it was your spell.”

“Right you are, it was my spell,” she said. “My spell that protected the rest of Potter’s Army from being caught, by the way, if she’d gone on to list names—”

“Don’t call it that.”

“I’ll call it whatever I want, Harry. I don’t take orders from you.”

“I never SAID you did!”

A contingent of first years by the fireplace leapt up and fled to the staircase. Ron tipped his king against Dean and hastily rose from his chair. Harry raked his hands through his hair, and his voice rose louder and louder: “I never asked you to do any of this! You decided we were going to form a club, Hermione, and then you decided to jinx the roster, and you planned all the meetings—”

“Don’t you dare put this on me.” Hermione slammed her book down. Her eyes shone like slick oil under ice. “You could have said ‘no’ whenever you wanted . You could have stopped at any time. You didn’t. Don’t you dare turn around and claim it was all my doing — nobody would have joined that club without you. I couldn’t have done it by myself, and I didn’t.”

“You didn’t ask me before you used a Memory Charm!”

“Like you’d have cared if it weren’t Cho!” she shouted. “If Zachariah Smith forgot a few afternoons, you wouldn’t be shouting at me, you’d have been thanking Merlin for me like bloody usual—”

“Whoa,” said Ron nervously, jumping the couch. “Whoa, whoa—”

“Fuck off,” said Harry furiously. “Yes, I would. I’ve have cared that you were messing with someone’s mind, which you must have known, since you didn’t tell me—”

“Let’s everybody take a minute—”

“I didn’t tell you so you wouldn’t be at fault if someone caught us, Harry!” Hermione screamed. “Not to mention so that nobody would find out — and by the way, you knew full well the jinx was harmful, you never had a problem before it was Cho—”

“Mione, c’mon,” said Ron exasperatedly, “that’s not fair—”

“But it’s fair to hold her to the Queensberry Rules after the fact?” said Draco coolly.

“—see her side of things, and — okay, hang on, Draco. ‘Don’t do Dark magic’ isn’t, like, a new stance of ours—”

“Memory Charms aren’t Dark,” said Hermione.

“And Polyjuice Potions are,” said Draco irritatedly. “That was third year. Neither of you minded it then.”

Harry said, “There’s a world of difference between Polyjuice and obliviating.”

“Is it? You don’t see a problem, potentially, with impersonating someone?” Hermione shrilled. “You don’t see any moral issues there? Because it feels like the difference is actually between which victims you care about. Or maybe it’s the difference between saving me and saving Padfoot—”

Harry staggered back, blinking, but swiftly retorted: “That’s not fair — the difference is you snuck around behind my back—”

“Some sneaking,” Draco retorted, “she told everyone she’d cursed the thing—”

“Exactly! Exactly, thank you — you’re not deaf, Harry! And neither is she! Did I make it sound like it was anodyne? Did she think it was a Tickling Charm? Did you?”

“I thought it was a STINGING JINX!” Harry roared. “I thought it’d make them sick! Or raise an alarm, or something! Forgive me for not guessing my best friend was going around breaking things in people’s heads—”

“Oh, grow up,” Hermione breathed, scathingly. “A Stinging Jinx? You cannot be serious.”

She tore back her sleeve and stripped the bandage from her hand. The white sheaves parted and revealed the flushed ridge of scarring on the back of her hand: I WILL NOT TELL LIES. She held it up.

“You wanted me to fight this,” she said, “with Stinging Jinxes? Is that what you want? Because the people who want to kill me—”

“I want to trust my friends! I want to be kind to them—”

“—are not using Expelliarmus and Stupefy. They’re using Killing Curses, and Dark magic, and yes, sorry, Memory Charms—”

“—I don’t want the people who follow me to do it from fear—”

“—and you want to arm soldiers with what? Moral fiber?”

“ —of what I’m going to do to them — they’re NOT SOLDIERS!” Harry roared. “They’re my friends! I don’t want people dying for me, or killing for me, or doing horrible things in my name! I never wanted any war! You want a movement, find somebody else to lead it! You do it, if you want it so bad!”

“Did you ever think,” she said, with increasing pitch, “that it’s not about what you want? Actually. That I might not spend every minute of every day thinking about how to accomplish the things that you tell me to? That I might have aims of my own? Survival, for instance?”

“I never said that. I never even implied it,” Harry said incredulously. “Hermione, when in my life have I ever been able to tell you what to do? I’ve been doing what you tell me for five years.”

“And obviously you’ve somehow convinced yourself that wasn’t a choice you made,” she snapped. “Fine. But you’re not the only one they’re going after. I’m very sorry you’re the Boy Who Lived! It isn’t the least bit fair. But the war isn’t about you!”

“I never said it was!”

“And it is rank hypocrisy for you to tell me to fight with my hands tied —”

“You’re twisting the question,” said Harry furiously. “You’re muddling everything together. You didn’t have to curse Cho because of ‘the war’.”

“If they expel me, they take my magic. What happens to a mudblood without magic? I’ll tell you. There’s a song about it, actually, they sang it once at a quidditch game. You must have heard it, you were there.”

“Hermione—”

“Everything is about the war, for me,” she said, flushed and trembling. “The war is about me. People like me, who I will never stop trying to save, whether or not you want to help me—”

Harry’s anger visibly clarified into something purer. He slackened the grip of his fists and put a step of distance between himself and Hermione, as if he were laying the stage for something to fall.

“I would do anything for you,” he said steadily. “Probably I’d obliviate someone for you, Hermione, if you asked me to. But if you’re not going to let me in on things — if you don’t care what I think of your methods, which you’re right, you don’t have to — then keep my name out of your plans. And if I somehow made you think you have to protect me — if I ever told you to, or said something that made you think it was your job — then this is me letting you off the hook.”

Static flickered subtly over the carpet at Hermione's ankles. She was staring at Harry like she had never met him before. Ron braced at Harry's elbow as if he might have to jump between them. Draco touched his wand and felt a strange dark cousin to nostalgia, a nauseous feeling, memory stirring under the surface of the scene.

"Protecting you has been my job since I was eleven, you idiot," she said thickly. "Nobody else was any good at it. Nobody was half as good at it as I was."

Harry said steadily, "That's true of a lot of things, Hermione."

Her composure splintered. Her jaw trembled and she gave a quick, ragged gasp of air.

"I'm sorry for what happened to Cho," she said. "Is that what you want me to say? I never thought she would be the one I hurt. I didn't think of what it would do to her, because I never thought it would happen. I thought I understood her. I was wrong."

"She forgot me," said Harry.

"I know. I'm sorry."

"She forgot everything about me. I told her things I haven't told almost anyone, and she doesn't remember them. She thinks we've only had a few dates."

"I know, and I'm sorry, I never intended—"

"She likes me better now," Harry said, and his voice finally cracked. "She doesn't believe she'd have done — what she did. She swears she wouldn't. And you know, I really don't think — the version of her now — actually would."

"Oh, oh no, Harry — no, she doesn't — she just doesn't remember —"

She took a tottering step towards him, and Ron shifted back to give them space. But Harry did not reciprocate her gesture. He kept his arms folded tightly as a tourniquet. Draco noticed Neville in the corner of his eye, watching silently from the boys' staircase, and Daphne, with her hands crumpled over her mouth.

"You're too smart to finish that sentence," said Harry. "And even if you did, I wouldn't believe you. I shouldn't have invited her to the first meeting. It was the worst thing I ever did to her."

Harry's eyes drifted blearily to find him over Hermione's shoulder. An uncomfortable prickle of attention skittered over Draco's skin. He felt as if he were being spoken to, in some oblique way, but had no notion of what was being said.

But Harry didn't speak to him. He said, "I wish I had—"

The portrait-door unhinged with a gravelly declaration. Draco touched his wand from instinct and turned on his heel, but it was McGonagall, her head dipped low as she emerged from the stone tunnel in the wall. Her presence invoked in the gathering of already-quiet children in a wave of breathless silence. Her eyes moved from Harry to Hermione to the shape of the congregation around them, and a twinge of something registered in her face; Draco wondered how much, if anything, of the exchange she had caught.

"The headmistress has called an assembly," she said. "You are to follow me to the Great Hall."

"For what purpose?" Hermione demanded. She had blocked Harry with her body, and even after seeing it was McGonagall, she did not shift. "What does she have to say? Is she going to expel us?"

"She does not take me in her confidences," said McGonagall, radiating a dreadful type of calm. Draco felt its twin settle over him. It was out of their hands; it was out of their teachers' hands, to that end. Everything left to happen would happen because it had to, regardless of what he did. “That said, I doubt she would call an assembly to expel you, Miss Granger, remarkable though you are.”

“But you don’t know — I mean, professor, with respect—”

“It doesn’t matter,” said Harry. He was more calm than McGonagall. Perhaps more calm than Draco. He pushed past Hermione, sidestepped Draco, and mounted the portrait-tunnel. “Whether we’re here or there, it doesn’t matter. She can expel us in any part of the castle she likes. I’m going.”

He pushed back the portrait-door. Gryffindor House came down from its tower.

There were patrolmen in the halls, chequered between squares of fleeting sunlight, as the House moved in a slow processional down the grand staircase. The other Houses had been already assembled at their tables, and watched with a sea of piercing eyes as their classmates filed through the vast doors. Impossible to say how much of it was curiosity, pity, or contempt. Absences mottled the high table: Dumbledore, Snape, Trelawney, Burbage. He tried to remember if the second two had been there at the last meal, and couldn’t.

Beneath, Umbridge had taken the podium. Patrolmen filed behind her, their bodies making the vertices of a lilac triangle. Aurors in black greatcoats on the steps, at her feet. Warrington at her elbow. When Draco turned, he saw the doors gliding shut behind Rufus Scrimgeour. The Head Auror’s scowl revealed nothing. The glare and the greatcoat reminded him terribly of Moody, which he quickly dismissed as a kind of nostalgia he could not afford.

Umbridge was smiling, not her cheerful grin of artifice, but a small, private smirk.

A sweep of the room revealed little. No one was hurt; no one was crying. Perplexion seemed to be the general mood. At the Slytherin table, Theo was missing. Draco might have found cause for alarm in that, if he had not been under the anesthetic of such dreadful calm.

He found a seat at the Gryffindor table. Impossibly, he made himself sit down.

The doors closed. Umbridge cleared her throat.

“Good evening!” she said. Her voice was higher than he remembered. She seemed shorter, as well. It was fathomless how much time had passed since the Astronomy practical. “Assembled students and faculty of Hogwarts School. I stand before you to report on the events of the past few weeks, and to reassure you of your continued safety and security in these strange times.”

Hermione tensed. In Draco’s view, this was innocuous enough to begin with; Ron was frowning; Harry was watching without any kind of expression at all.

“First,” said Umbridge, “it should be understood by all that the Ministry of Magic continues to function, and to administer effective governance to the many citizens of Wizarding Britain. You may have heard rumors of the disappearance of the Minister of Magic. These are unequivocal lies. The Minister remains in office. He wishes me to convey to you all his faithful dedication to his task—”

“Liar,” spat Hermione. She did not say it quietly; several students shot her furtive looks.

“—and his ongoing determination to defeat the forces that threaten peace and security in our society. What you have heard of is nothing more than a minor staffing turnover; several members of the Ministry, and of the Wizengamot, have disappeared with the help of aurors, in order to protect themselves and their families from the Order of the Phoenix, for whom they believe they are targets. They continue to correspond with the Minister from classified locations outside of the country, and wish their children to know that they will make arrangements for their care and keeping—”

“Liar,” repeated Hermione clearly. “That’s a lie, she doesn’t know where they are.”

Draco caught her wrist. Careful.

She flexed her hand, but didn't rebuke him.

"I'm sick of being careful."

"—and, in light of that fact," said Umbridge, "we are pleased to announce that Hogwarts will — for the first time in history! — remain open over the summer, to provide protection for students while the state of public order is in question. We have consulted with some of your parents — that is, those of whom we can reach by owl — to solicit their permission for this measure. Please see your Head of House after this meeting to inquire about what your parents have decided for you. In the temporary absence of our Potions Master, Slytherins should report to Mr. Warrington; and to all of you, I am very sorry for the inconvenience this may cause to your summer plans."

A local infection of whispering was metastasizing into a hubbub. McGongall rose from her seat at the high table and was hurrying down to the podium, though to do what, he couldn't imagine. It was not, after all, like there was anything to be done.

"Order," said Umbridge pleasantly, as if someone had interrupted her. "There will be order! Thank you."

"Dolores," said McGonagall. "Dolores!"

"There is another order of business," she continued, deaf to it. "Over the course of the spring term, the Ministry Bureau of Education has been submitting the faculty at Hogwarts to a competence review. We are happy to announce that many members have passed; Professors Snape, Sinistra, Sprout, Grubbly-Plank, and Vector will be returning next year, as will Madams Pince and Pomfrey, among other staff. The rest—"

But there was neither need nor time for her to finish. Across the Gryffindor and Ravenclaw tables the hubbub had thrown off reins of decorum and sprouted into an uproar.

“McGonagall—”

“Of course not McGonagall, she’s decent—”

“What about Flitwick? What’s wrong with him?”

“—part goblin, if you believe the rumors—”

The blood had fled McGonagall’s face.

“In summary!” Umbridge called. “If anyone would like an academic consultation, they may arrange appointments on my calendar—”

“COWARD!”

She peered at the Gryffindor table. Harry had stood up.

Draco ripped out his wand. Hermione snatched his hand down.

“Don't.”

“You’re joking—”

“I'm not.”

“This isn’t noble, it’s suicide by bureaucrat.”

“It isn’t that simple. I think Harry knows what he’s doing.”

“Do you know what he’s doing?”

Harry was stalking up to the dais, his robes sweeping the floor behind him. Green lighting behind his glasses, white lightning on his face. His hands were empty fists.

“You’re a fucking coward.”

“Mr. Potter!”

“Potter, stop!” McGonagall wrenched herself free and moved to intercept him, but the aurors caught her again and held her back.

“Minerva McGonagall is the best teacher at this school,” shouted Harry.

McGonagall whitened. “Harry Potter,” she said, “you must sit down, now — I beg you—”

“Ten times the teacher you are, if you even call yourself that — ten times the witch, ten times the person — only you know that, don’t you? That’s the point—”

Umbridge curled her lip, and slashed her wand.

“Silencio!”

He dodged it, a quick half-step that Draco had taught him on a sunny afternoon in January, and Draco felt — something. Sharp. Not pleasant, not exactly, but close to it. Harry kept walking.

“Best teacher at this school, and you sacked her because you couldn’t push her around. Hermione Granger, best student — best student, best prefect, bravest person I ever met — and you made her apologize to you for it in her own blood. Feel good, did it? ‘When people are strong, they do great things. When they’re weak, they suffer.’ Did you feel strong when you said that? Big ups to you and your great works, professor, winning fights with teenagers. They’ll put you down in textbooks. You know Angelina Johnson? She worked for six years to make captain, and you took it away from her because you wanted me off the field. Six years. It’s quidditch. You could’ve suspended me. You won’t do that, though. You were afraid of me.”

“Ignore him,” cried McGonagall. “He’s a child. A boy. He doesn’t know what he’s saying. Look at me—”

“He is a liar and a killer,” said Umbridge, thick with contempt, quick with anger. “He has spread insurrection in these halls, and condemned his peers to suffering on his behalf. A child? Do you hear yourself? He is a snake.”

“So you are afraid of me,” said Harry, with vicious triumph. “Don’t worry, professor. Lots of people are. You think I lied — you think I killed someone — right on all counts, professor. I’ve lied to people. I tell people ten times a day that I’m hopeful, because if I only said that when I believed it, I wouldn’t have lived long enough to meet you —”

“Cortwaite! Robard! Arrest him!”

But they did not respond to Umbridge’s order; they were preoccupied holding McGonagall, who had begun resisting furiously.

“And people died because of me,” Harry continued. “Two of them before my second birthday. One more last year. Probably others I don’t know about. I rack them up. Sometimes I play a little game where I count everyone who loved them, and then I lie a little more.

“You’re angry about that? Not as much as I am. You want people to stop dying for me? Not as much as I do. You wish the other kid left that graveyard? Not as much as I do.” Harry threw himself to a halt at the foot of the dias, his robe furling around him in a brusque beat like a raven’s wing. He spread his arms.

“Do something about it,” he spat. “What are you waiting for? Dumbledore’s gone. I’m not running. Prove you’re stronger than I am.”

McGonagall gave a wavering shout of warning, which might have been No, but cut short; Robard had silenced her with a curse.

“Come on, Dolores,” said Harry. “Do something great.”

Umbridge tightened her grip on her wand. Her chest heaved.

“If you learn nothing else from me,” she said, “it will be to address your betters with respect.”

She whipped her arm. A white streak flicked from her point like a piece of rope and lashed Harry across the face. He toppled to the floor. His glasses dropped from his face and cracked on the flagstones.

Screams erupted. McGonagall threw herself against the aurors’ hold, bellowing. Hermione had to fling herself over the table to stop Ron from erupting from his seat, and even that did not stop him from shouting profanities.

Harry scrambled upright. Blood dribbled from a short, deep cut crossing his lips, staining the whites of his teeth.

He spit, and scarlet splashed on the floor. Then he swiped his hand across his mouth, smearing the blood wide over his cheek, and grinned at her. He picked up his glasses, carefully, and settled them on his face. The cracked lens fractured his left eye into a fractal.

“I will not tell lies,” he said.

And he shifted, with a staggering half-step, into a dueling stance. For once, his form was flawless.

A shout pierced the air. Umbridge’s eyes flit with agitation across the hall, her wand aloft. The assembled students of Hogwarts School reached a frenetic chatter like a swelling cloud of hornets, but the shout came from Gryffindor — Ginny had climbed out of her seat and stepped up on the table. She struggled briefly to balance, with her arm in a sling, but the Creevey boys caught and braced her up.

“The Minister is a servant of Lord Voldemort,” she shouted. “I will not tell lies.”

Umbridge’s wand snapped in her direction. Draco reached for his hip. He did not have time to draw himself. Ron swept the dishes from his place and climbed up on it with a carillon of flying silver. Umbridge's wand darted from Ginny to accuse him, even as he spoke:

"Viktor Krum died trying to save Harry. He was murdered. I will not tell lies."

Umbridge's eyes narrowed. She opened her mouth again. There was a stirring at another table.

Cedric Diggory dispatched himself elegantly from his seat, stood in the aisle, and unclipped his Head Boy badge. He set it down on the table, and said calmly: "I believe Harry. He's my friend. I will not tell lies."

Several of his housemates stood up with him, without speaking. Umbridge's wand jumped again, though it faltered, it seemed, to accuse Cedric. But then it had to correct course to meet Neville, who stumbled and almost tripped his way from the bench, but righted himself. "I will not t-t-tell lies," he said, and his voice was first among seven. Then it was first among nine, and fifteen, and twenty. Lavender Brown wrenched up her sleeve and clambered on the table. She put her hand in the air, and her bandages fluttered free, stark white against her tawny skin.

The Gryffindor table rattled as silverware scattered and fell on the stone. It was hard now to hear what was being said by whom, for it vanished into indistinctness under the deafening unison of those saying it, and then the litany, which was spat and shouted and lifted wordlessly on scarred fists: I will not tell lies.

At the Slytherin table, Daphne stood. She didn't say anything, but she was shaking so badly that one could hardly expect her to. Someone tried to drag her back down again, and she threw their hand off.

Harry lifted his wand at Umbridge. "To the ground," he said, barely audible at a distance. "Head to foot. Wands—"

Draco leapt free of the bench, moved by the sheer electric freight of his alarm. He was mad. He would die. “POTTER!”

The first patrolman threw a spell at Ginny, and she parried it with a form-perfect whirl of her wand; and with a wave like a black tide, the crowd spilled from the tables and thronged the doors, tipping the knife-edge from agitation into a riot. The Gryffindor table shrieked and listed onto one side like a barricade, sending a wave of people hurtling to the ground and scrambling to clear away.

I will not tell lies— I will not tell lies—

Screams crested. Their echoes fulminated like harpies in the vaulted ceiling. Spells flickered against the vast slab of oak.

The aisles filled with dark cloaks like the welling bottom of a sinking ship. McGonagall did something forceful with her elbow and the auror holding her screamed, clutching his wrist; she ripped out her wand and lashed the other in the face with a spell that knocked him flat. Scrimgeour was roaring orders. Stunners and Petrification Charms fired in all directions. But there were too many children, and too few aurors, besides which, it was difficult for the patrolmen to tell which students were fighting and which were fleeing. Tracey Davis made a dash for the doors and was caught by a patrolman who shoved her back into the crowd. Two of her housemates flew past her and tried to unbolt the doors, Draco vaulted the table and darted through the crowd. He narrowly made it to Harry before he was trampled by a wave of students, hauling him up by the collar. They were lost in the crowd, thronged on either side by a hellish mass of shouting bodies.

Ginny landed a curse on a patrolman who held Lavender by the hair. She backhanded a pitch-perfect Flipendo into his partner and knocked him into the wall, but his partner’s Incarcerous threw her down in a tangle of rope; Ron uppercut him into the wall, and she wriggled free. The patrolman staggered into George’s Tarantallegra, and also George’s fist. The two of them hauled her upright, and with a war cry she took a running leap onto the back of a patrolman holding Seamus.

A bolt the size of a redwood trunk groaned into place over the doors, which sealed shut. Students surged up against it in a lemming-like wave.

The current shoved Draco against a wall of bodies and knocked the breath from his lungs. He gripped Harry's collar and shoved him down in time for a curse to shoot over their heads.

Hermione shoved through the crowd and latched to Draco's shoulder. "Doors," she shouted, and he read it from her lips, hearing nothing over the crowd. "Have to get out— get everyone away from the aurors—"

He pushed through. The bodies were thick, thrusting errantly and violently like riptide, and he had to use jinxes to pry them apart as often as not. Curses landed indiscriminately. The inability to aim meant it was impossible to throw spells of much severity without fear of hitting someone on the same side. It was ambitious, at that, to think of hitting anyone at all. In the crush they were too close to even see where the aurors were before they were on top of them. Draco was flung by a surge of the crowd into Auror Cortwaite's back, and barely got his wand up in time to parry a jinx. But it did not matter: Angelina leapt from the crowd and tackled Cortwaite from the other side, dragging him into another skirmish.

McGonagall and Umbridge were dueling on the dais — Draco watched, for a half-second longer than he should have, as a flurry of razor-beaked birds erupted from Umbridge's wand, and shattered into fine red mist at the sweep of McGonagall's arm; another sweep, and the pearls at Umbridge's throat began to writhe and contract, tightening around the folds of her throat as she clawed at them — but then the crowd hid them. Beneath the dais, patrolmen had organized roughly into a formation, and were pressing a phalanx down the center aisle. Students pooled at the end of the room and pushed up against the doors and there were cries of pain from those being crushed against the wood. Hermione shouted something he could not hear and took off weaving through the crowd. She wriggled through the pack of bodies and he followed her into it, into the crush where the screaming was loudest and the pressure of hot thrashing bodies made it hard to fill his lungs.

No room. No air. No chance, no space, no breath for a spell. Even so, Hermione had forced herself close to the bolt and with her wand outstretched tried: “Wingardium—”

The steel bolt rattled, but she was jostled hard, and the spell broke.

“Damn, I can’t — it needs concentration, I can’t hold still enough—”

The crowd surged. The doors gave an earsplitting groan against the bolt. Draco shoved back against someone crushing him to the floor. “Ready a Shield Charm, then.”

“Why?”

“Because this isn’t a precision spell,” he said, and cast Bombarda Maxima.

Hermione’s shield flickered to life over the crowd just before the spell collided with the doors, and the world whited out.

A BOOM shattered the air. Splinters the size of spears exploded from the wood and thundered on an evanescent warping silver shield that extended over the crowd, unbelievably wide, ricocheting them into the walls and into the windows. The ancient slabs of oak flew outward from the Hall and tumbled on the staircase, dislodging a pair of sconces and clipping the chandelier, which swung wildly, dropping a helix of molten wax. The force drove a loud thunder of portraits from their hooks and sent them sailing down on the stairs. Students flooded out of the Great Hall and surged into the entrance, out into the courtyard, moving like one organism of a thousand feet.

The crowd carried them. There was no choice of where to move — no one was choosing; it was the crowd that decided, as one, on its freedom. In the entrance hall it whipped around to the courtyard and splashed against the grand staircase, and it was there that Draco broke out of the current, hauling Hermione by her waist over the balustrade, and following her with a neat jump. Harry and Ron were still behind in the Great Hall, fighting patrolmen; they were shoulder to shoulder with Ginny and the twins, five of them on two patrolmen, and making quick work of it. Ginny caught a curse for Harry on her wandtip and shoved him down to whip it back at a patrolman over his head; he rolled to his feet and rebounded a battery of fire against a Shield Charm.

Hermione gave a cry and dropped to her knees. He caught her.

“Hermione—”

“Fine! I’m fine, I think it’s sprained — listen. We have to get to the headmaster’s office. It’s the only place the Floo is open, we can call the Order—”

“Everyone else is still in there—”

“With aurors,” she gasped. “Maybe you could duel an auror — maybe, on his own — but we can’t, and there’s five of them, plus patrolmen. We need help. Draco, we need — we need adults.”

Her chest was heaving. Her eyes were wild. He took her hand, wordlessly, and ran.

They rounded the great landing and sped up the grueling courses of stairs, racing at a speed that rattled the floorboards and made portraits cry out. The sounds of the hall faded behind them as the stories disappeared beneath their feet.

The Transfiguration atrium loomed ahead of them like an empty cathedral. They were no more than a few turns from the Headmaster’s Tower and passing under the wide open space, carved from white stone, when the call came: “Stop.”

Cassius Warrington blocked the path forward. His Ministry cloak had been discarded. The indigo waistcoat highlighted the broad span of his torso, thick and imposing, and gold glinted at his shoulders and chest. His sleeves, which swelled from his shoulders like blooms of lilac, were in the process of being uncuffed and neatly rolled back. He fastened one at his elbow and smiled at Draco, disarmingly.

“We really have to stop meeting like this,” he said.

Draco pointed his wand at him, and it only made Cassius laugh, softly. The room seemed to shrink to the size of the two-foot stripe of space between them.

“Go down two floors,” he said quietly. “Secret staircase by the prefect’s bathroom. That corridor takes you around the long way to the bottom of Headmaster’s Tower. If you run, you can beat whoever he’s sent there.”

She was predictably furious. “If you think I’m leaving you here,” she hissed, “to fight him alone—”

“Then come back with Alastair Moody. Two-on-one is only an advantage until one of his friends shows up.”

Cassius tapped his cheek, thumbing the line of a scar Draco gave him. “You can always run,” he said, “but it’s less sporting.”

Hemrione gripped Draco’s arm. Her curls had been knocked free of her braid, and hung over her face like a lace veil. Behind them, her dark eyes were large and locked on him, expression unfamiliar. She looked as if someone held a sword to her throat.

“Don’t lose,” she said unevenly. “Just — beat him, will you? Don’t lose. Don’t you dare.”

He said, “I live to please.”

“Draco—”

He kissed her, quickly, to stop her from saying something that would convince him to lose his nerve. It wouldn’t be difficult, so it was critical not to let her.

Movement stirred in his periphery. Hermione screamed, “ Draco look —”

He twisted. The spell whistled past his head and shattered a piece of the cloister wall.

His nerves seared. Draco turned, slowly, and replaced his foot on the duelist’s line. Advanced a step. Carefully put Hermione’s ragged breathing from his mind. She cast a searing stare at him over her shoulder and then ran from the atrium, vanishing around the corridor.

Cassius smirked. A lock of golden hair wilted from its coif and fell over his eyes, which glinted with a clear and impersonal malice, the color of pondscum. With his hair grown long and tied back, he resembled someone else. Someone from a painting Draco had seen once, or a memory of a memory, twice removed.

Draco felt a wave of familiar loathing.

He pushed it down, taking a moment of pause, and studied Cassius.

The boy’s form was stiff, formal, and perfect. He was also taller, broader, and three years older. But in the Triwizard Tournament, he’d cheated on his preparations in advance, doing strategy by committee, and in consequence, his moves were rarely interesting. Everything he did was appropriate. Textbook.

The boils from last year hadn’t healed completely. At close range, pockmarks ran up the sides of Cassius’s face. They were the kinds of scars that healed slow and painful. Cassius was an eighteen-year-old with battle scars, and Draco had put them there.

They must have healed too easily, because Cassius had already forgotten the lesson of them: that he was a weak, clumsy bag of perforable organs, held upright by the mercy of dangerous men.

Say ‘thank you, Cassius.’ You’re rather clever, after all; you only need to learn to mind your manners.

Draco threw a curse.

With the whip-crack of a counterspell, Cassius deflected. Then he lunged, and they dueled.

Stones scattered around their feet as they met spell for spell. Chains crisscrossing the air between them in jagged lines, each one perfect and none of them landing. Draco parried, dodged, struck, and parried again, scampering up and down the duelist’s line, shifting his weight elegantly from foot to foot. He threw Stupefy on a backhanded lash and rolled under a spell that sheared a chunk from the wall, snapping a pipe. Water erupted in a high spout and fountained down in a jagged line over the corridor, splashing dark stains over the pale stones.

Draco whipped his wand and froze the spout into ice. He shattered it and swept the swarm of broken shards at Cassius, who melted and siphoned them away with a graceful sweep of his arm.

Cassius moved with the grace of a dancer, every pivot and arch of his wrist a thing of beauty, but he was not a duelist and his body didn’t know the things a duelist’s did. He knew it the instant Cassius ducked a curse by stepping off the duelist’s line.

If there had been a piste, the match would have been over.

There wasn’t a piste. In many ways, it wasn’t a match.

The air stung with the sulfuric, woodsmoke-aftertaste of magic. Mist swirled, sliced through by darts of color. Thoughts slowed and retreated in respectful observance of the body as it did its work. Power thrummed in his arm, moving up his hand in a warm current, loosed in bright hot bursts with each gesture and flick of his wrist. It was action with purpose. He wasn't a person straining in the hash of counterposed duties; he was a thing doing exactly and only as it should. Without thought, without doubt, without question. He was glorious, and without pain or fatigue or any of time's other quarrelsome fetters, he could be glorious forever. He could live forever, and never lose.

He let Cassius whip a jinx sideways at his uncovered flank. He folded himself sideways, pivoting his back foot around, and sliced his wand up in a backhand arc. He opened his mouth, and suspended in instinct, out flew the first spell to reach his tongue. He didn't know what it did, so he took a guess: when forming the intention, he grasped the magic and thrust it towards the purpose of winning.

Maybe I'll tell my father to take you on as a secretary. Might even let you have robes, like a real witch.

Cassius gave a strangled cry and clutched his temples. He staggered to the side, off-balance, so far off his line that Draco could have hit him in three different places before he lowered his hand. In the split second before he registered it, Draco thought: Technical concession — the duel was over, he had stepped off-piste — not that it mattered, not that either of them cared.

He twitched back his wand in suspicion. He hadn't cursed him.

"Warrington," he said warily. "What is this?"

Cassius gripped his hair in his fists, eyes screwed shut. "What did you do?" he gasped. "Malfoy, what are you doing — what are you —?"

"I'm not doing anything."

He tore his hands from his face. There was fear in his eyes, terrible and sharp, such as Draco had never seen, and certainly not directed at himself.

“What are you doing to me?” he mumbled. “What’s happening? Why did you—”

He crumpled his eyes shut, groaning.

“Warrington—?”

“Why are we here? Why — why are we dueling?”

“Warrington, what — is happening to you?”

“I don’t know,” he snarled. “I don’t know! What are you doing here? You — you’re Malfoy.” He hesitated, uncertainty leaving its telltale signs in the slackening of his wand-grip. “You’re Draco Malfoy. That’s your name, you’re — why aren’t you wearing the right tie?”

“The right … tie?”

He was wearing a red one. He stared at Cassius, who appeared to not have the slightest idea what he had said wrong.

“No,” said Cassius, frowning. “You’re… you’re not Slytherin, that’s right, you’re…”

Draco said slowly, “What’s the last thing you remember?”

“I remember Pansy,” said Cassius, blinking. “Something… something about Pansy. Something important. She had to see me — I’m sorry, who are you?”

Draco stared at him. “Draco Malfoy,” he said, after a pause. Then he threw Stupefy at him.

It struck Cassius without resistance. He was too far off his line to parry, and too bemused to think of parrying anyway. He went down immediately, with a cold hard sound when his skull struck the floor, and Draco stepped over him on his way through the atrium.

It was an incredulous prospect to him that Pansy had managed a Memory Charm of such force it was capable of structural damage to Cassius's mind, but he shelved his doubts for later consideration. The sound of shouting swelled around him and faded as he stalked through the corridors,

The gryphon was open when he arrived. At the top of the stairs, the doors were open, and there was a voice coming from inside. Umbridge's voice.

"... did you call? Tell me!" A slap. "Was it Dumbledore? Or one of his spy cells?"

"You're going to be sacked." Hermione. Her voice was clear, and gave no evidence of being in pain. "Assuming the Minister comes back like you think he will. A riot like this? With aurors and patrolmen? Even Dumbledore never let it get that bad. And you're no Dumbledore."

He stepped silently into the doorway. The scene fell at once into full and grotesque clarity. Hermione knelt by the Floo hearth, where green embers still glittered in the ash. Umbridge gripped her in place by a tight handful of hair, in which was also clenched Hermione's wand. The other hand braced a wand at Hermione's neck. A ring of swollen red welts hung around Umbridge's throat where her pearls had been, and blood eddied under her nostrils.

"You assume the Minister will blame his servant, instead of the vermin?" Umbridge hissed. "You believe there will be no consequences for you? The grand architect of the riot?"

"Oh, there will be," said the grand architect of the riot, with a faint smile. "But the worst you can do is expel me. The rest of the students — what will you do? You can't expel them all, you won't have a school."

Umbridge’s expression waxed at once from strained to glorious.

“I see,” she said. “You think that being expelled makes you safe. You think you have nothing else to lose!” She cocked her head and smiled, eyes twinkling. “But Miss Granger — do you not understand? Students who are expelled do not have permission to carry wands. And without a wand, you are not a witch.” She lifted her own wand, a short, stubby blade of a thing with a jeweled hilt. “Let this be your last lesson as a student of Hogwarts.”

Draco threw a curse.

It was a wordless, angry bolt of a thing, and he did not quite know what it would have done if it hit her; but it didn’t, for Umbridge jerked with surprising dexterity to parry it. She wrenched Hermione in front of her, a full-body shield; her head was wrenched back over Umbridge’s shoulder, baring the clean arc of her throat. There would be a dozen ways to jinx her if Hermione weren’t there — a wand pointed away from him and all the time in the world to choose his spells, in another fight he would have dropped her by now — but that fight wasn’t this one and in the time it took his spell to hit her she could whisper whatever curse she wanted into Hermione’s throat. Diffindo or Defodio or Confringo or anything that was flashing through his head in a carousel of green, green, green.

Green light. Green light, and the sound of a body on the floor, and not her and not me. A year ago in a different office than this one. Green light, every beat of his heart sent a new lance of pain through his body. Green light, green light, and his mind was a spinning coin, oscillating between two points in time. Green light, and Hermione was twitching with short high little whines of protest, each one a new screw driven into his memory to ache. Green light and Barty Crouch was staring at him from the corner of Umbridge’s office. Green light and Hermione took his place. Then back again. The past strobed into the present.

The smell of smoke and ash and the coppery tang of Floo powder rich on the air. He couldn’t breathe. It wasn’t a metaphor. His lungs were seizing, forcing a series of smaller, shallow breaths. His pulse quickened.

He raised his wand in desperation, but there was nowhere to point it that wouldn't hit Hermione, nowhere that would be sure. It was an unacceptable risk. No clear shot. It flickered over her body and finally swerved to angle at the floor, the only place it wouldn't hurt her.

Umbridge jabbed Hermione's throat, and she choked. He caught himself moving forward and froze.

"Draco," said Hermione, high and light with faith and pain, and it simply, effortlessly, broke him apart.

Focus. A prehensile knife. Something useful.

"Your wand," said Umbridge. "Drop it."

"Let her go," he said. He didn't hear his own voice, and he had no idea how it sounded. It came from the bottom of his chest, and it felt like gravel being rolled in his lungs. Hermione went still.

"Drop it first," said Umbridge.

He should have been watching Umbridge. He wasn't. He looked at Hermione as if there was nothing else in the room to look at. If he looked away from her the green light would flash her out of existence, or perhaps both of them, and then at least this would be the last thing he would see. He drank in every part of her he could: the deep kindling brown of her eyes, the wild cowl of her hair, the scrapes and ash-stains on her heart-shaped face.

"Hermione," he said. Nothing in him was not on fire. If he had the magic or the power he would have stopped time, and stood there for a hundred years, just looking at her. A hundred years, to start.

"Draco," she said "it's going to be fine. Don't give her your wand. Go find Harry. She's bluffing."

He didn’t move.

“Go! It’s your turn,” she snapped, and tripped a bit on it, but pressed on quickly: “Get him and take the Weasleys, they’ll help you. I’ll be fine — I’ll be fine! She can’t do anything, now, there’s no point—”

Bloody and ashen and furiously begging him to leave her in a torturer’s hands, there she was: Hermione Granger, hurricane wild, terribly brave, the worst thing that had ever happened to him, and the best.

I love you, he might have said then. I have loved you for years. I have loved you like I have loved no other thing on this earth; that is, almost selflessly. If I could have been selfless for anyone, it would have been for you.

His breath came back. He held out his wand, point-down, and dropped it. Hermione gave a cry.

“Let her go.”

Umbridge wrapped Hermione’s hair around her hand and knelt to pick it up, dragging Hermione down to her knees with her.

“Pick it up,” Umbridge ordered. She wedged her wand into Hermione’s throat and shook her by the hair. “Grip out! No tricks! Pick it up and offer me the grip.”

Hermione flashed him a furious look and bent down.

“Hermione—”

“Don’t,” she said, low. Her mouth was drawn tight. She swallowed against Umbridge’s point.

Then she grabbed his wand and slammed her head back into Umbridge’s face.

It sounded like someone stepped on a bee’s nest. Cartilage crunched. He hadn’t heard someone scream like that since Neville caught Ginny’s Bat-Bogey on accident, and it had been accompanied by the same whole-body flinch of pain. Umbridge keeled back and fell over clutching her face. Hermione wrenched her hair free and tossed up his wand, which he took easily from the air, like a clean chaser’s play.

Hermione dove out of the way. Umbridge barely hauled up her wand in time to cast Shield before the first curse exploded against it.

“Malfoy,” she cried thickly. Blood dribbled thick from her lips. “Stand down! Stand down!”

Another curse pounded down on the shield, which fractured briefly into scintillations and refused.

“Stand down! I order you — I command you—”

“See, I thought I might find you two here.”

Draco twisted sharply, but he already knew who it was. It was with resignation, and no small share of vicious anger, that he turned to see Theodore materialize from the shadows of the doorway, his wand held lightly and pointed downward at his side.

Draco pointed his wand at him. Hermione arrowed hers at Umbridge. The tension stretched thin and translucent.

Slowly, Theo raised his offhand.

“Drop your wand,” Draco snarled.

Theo smiled wryly. “You first.”

“Drop it or use it.” This challenge was of questionable wisdom, after he’d fought two duels already, but he was in no mood to prevaricate.

The corner of Theo’s mouth twitched. With an offensively languid lack of urgency he nudged the door shut with his heel, and rolled his robe off his shoulders. The movement revealed that his robes were drenched up to to knees in water; Draco narrowed his eyes, but Theo interrupted the thought. “Interesting as that would be,” he said, “I’m not in the mood for a mess. By the way, do you even know who’s winning, down there? You cut out pretty quick.”

“What do you want?” said Hermione harshly.

He laughed, lightless, more of an acknowledgement of a good question than a show of pleasure. “Actually,” he said, “I wanted a word with you, Granger. You’re a hard woman to get alone, what with your pack of guard dogs.”

“I’m a little preoccupied, now,” said Hermione.

“Yes,” he sighed, glancing at Umbridge, “so it appears. You’ve already called in the cavalry, I suppose?”

“As if I’d tell you,” she scoffed.

“Just checking. I want to know how much time I have.”

“Theodore,” gasped Umbridge, heady with relief. “Help me. Apprehend the boy. I will take the girl to the Ministry, to fetch more aurors, and we will take Potter together.”

Theo’s smile stiffened and turned brittle like rotted wood. “You know,” he said, “I don’t mean to be a pill, but I’m getting really sick lately of people giving me orders.”

He pointed his wand at her. She went as still as a mouse bathed in wandlight.

“Ladies first,” he said, and looked at Hermione. Hardly a beat of hesitation passed before she pivoted, with a cool fearlessness in the square of her shoulders, and fired a jinx that shattered Umbridge's shield.

The duel was short and brutal. It could not have been otherwise. With three against one, even an adult, it didn't matter. Hermione tossed a snare of ropes at her ankles, flinging Umbridge back against the hearth, dropping a baptism of broken porcelain around her shoulders. Theo flicked her weak countercurses out of the air with an almost bored assertion of the wrist. But Draco was faster than either of them. He batted away her Confringo, blowing out the window in a shatter of glass he barely heard. He sent three of Narcissa's favorite curses in a battery up the side of her guard and sent her lurching against the bureau, drove her into the corner, and disarmed her.

The taste of blood filtered into his mouth, blotting out the ash. His heartbeat was slowing, or perhaps that was time dilating, offering him time to choose what he wanted to do. So he considered her, twining his wand between his fingers in a slow, pendulous pattern.

Umbridge wailed, shriveling into the corner. Her robes were stained and ripped, and her hair was a mousy thicket. Tears and blood and pain turned her face into a wet, sticky crumple of a thing, her nose bent badly, weeping blood and mucus down the purple silk of her robes. She really was a small person. It had never been so apparent before.

He cast Stupefy, and she slumped to the ground: a dropped puppet in rags of bloodstained tyrian.

He could do anything to her, now. The possibilities seemed to weigh physically in his wand-hand. He didn't precisely like the way it felt.

"What are you thinking?" It was Theo at his shoulder, startlingly close. He looked at Draco with disinterested curiosity. "I need her fairly out of commission, if you don't mind. We don't have to kill her, but she shouldn't be anywhere close to lucid. Hey, Granger, how about a Memory Charm?"

She threw him a sneer.

“No? Come on. Surely she deserves it more than Chatty Chang.”

“Fuck you,” she said, with a disgusted dignity. “Do your own dirty work.”

“Fine. I will. More to the point.” He muscled Draco out of the way and grabbed Hermione’s arm, tugged it when she tried to throw him off. “Listen. When you cursed Chang, how did you do it?”

“Let go of me — what?”

“How do you stop the memory cascade?”

Hermione stared at him for a moment, redolent with revulsion.

“I didn’t. Is that what you want to hear? I didn’t manage to stop it. I botched the spell. That’s why she lost the whole year. Now let go of me—”

“Merlin, I don’t care if it was your personal best. I want your method.”

“Why should I tell you? Look it up yourself—”

“I tried. Hogwarts doesn’t teach them. Raises the question of where you learned them, but I’ve seen the Malfoy library, so I’m not entirely out of ideas.”

She pried his hand from her arm. “Get off of me. I would be doing incalculably more damage to the world,” she snapped, “by helping you learn to cast a Memory Charm—”

“He’s already done it,” said Draco. “To Cassius Warrington.”

Theo closed his eyes and took a deep breath. Landing on some basement reservoir of forbearance, he opened his eyes and turned to Draco.

“Where is he now?” he asked. “Seventh year? Sixth?”

“He asked me for my name.”

“Fuck,” said Theo, brightly. He turned back to Hermione. “Let’s try again. Granger: memory cascade. Briefly.”

Her expression shaded from wariness to pity, but suddenly sharpened back to contempt. “If I knew how to modify memory retroactively,” she said, “do you really think I would have let Cho stay like this?”

“Does that mean you wouldn’t?” He paused. “Okay. Sure, you wouldn’t. Let’s just — where, supposing you had to learn—”

“Why did you mess with his memory in the first place?” she demanded.

“To protect Daphne Greengrass,” said Draco, “from being reported to the Ministry as a lycanthrope.”

Theo smiled in a way that was part flinch. His face was bright with exertion, dark hair washed gray with dust, and his eyes glittered with an electric, glassy panic.

“You should leave the country, by the way,” he said, apropos of nothing. “As soon as you can. I mean weeks, not months. Take whoever you can, and go as soon as you can. Don’t tell your friends where you go. Don’t tell anybody.”

“Have you lost your mind? What are you talking about?”

“Probably. Old news. Tell Daphne,” though he struggled palpably to say her name, like it was a presumption, or an offense— “tell her I. Tell her — never mind. She got Pansy’s letter.”

“She did,” said Draco warily. The hollows under his eyes could hold seas. “When’s the last time you slept?”

“Train ride to Hogwarts. Nineteen-ninety-one. Slept like a log. Would you please piss off? Go stop your pals from blowing up any more of my school.”

“Theodore, I don’t know it’s a good idea—”

Hermione was interrupted by a cry from outside the broken window.

A large red bird with glittering wings, streaked in gold, sailed past them, did a turn around the headmaster’s tower, and flew out of sight.

She clutched at Draco’s arm. “Dumbledore’s coming,” she breathed. “That’s Fawkes. His familiar.”

“And my cue,” said Theo. He fetched his robe from the ground and swept it around his shoulders. It was too large for him, and Draco wondered how much he was eating. “You were right,” he called back. “In Hogsmeade. There are still choices.”

Even by his standards, this was a strange parting. The boy melted into the shadows beyond the door.

“I don’t understand him,” said Hermione. In the aftermath of the fight, finally at liberty to stand at ease, he studied her: there were fingerprints on her throat and bits of blood freckled over her face. “Daphne made it sound like she doubted he even remembered her.”

“I’m not sure that Daphne understands him, either.” He felt weary. He braced himself against the wall and tried to focus. The sore hollow feeling of exhausted magic took up gnawing on his bones. He could not contemplate seeing the others, the full Defense Club, and beginning the inevitable count of injuries. “The Order will be here any minute, if they aren’t already. You should go meet with them. I’ll watch Umbridge. See that she stays Stunned.”

She looked at him and frowned. “No,” she said.

“You’ll want to make sure the others are alright.”

“I will. But I’m going to stay with you, at least until the Order comes.”

She sat down, her knees drawn up to her chest, and touched the floor beside her. “You have a cut on your face. Come here, I’ll heal it.”

“I mean it. Last chance. Going once.”

“Just sit down, would you?”

He sat down. As soon as his weight left his feet he groaned, and a pain kicked up in his left side. One of the jinxes must have caught him. He hadn’t noticed.

“You’re hurt.”

“I’m fine.”

“You’re in pain, listen to you. Pull up your shirt, I’ll heal that, too.”

“There are easier ways of getting my shirt off.”

“You’re not allowed to flirt until you’re healed.”

“I’m allowed to flirt with you whenever I want. It’s in the contract.”

She snickered, and it drew a twitch from the corner of his mouth. Her wand left a warm radiant patch on his abdomen, and he rolled his shirt back down over the fading bruise. “That’s the last time I sign something without reading it,” she said.

“It was highly out of character. I assume it’s because I’m irresistible. Is the blood yours?”

“What blood?”

He reached out and thumbed away some of it on her temple. She pressed her face into his palm, briefly, and he let it linger.

“Some of it,” she said. “I hit my head when I was dueling her. Reckon there’s a cut.”

“Show me.”

She obligingly bent her head forward. A dark rivulet sprouted from between her curls. He rested his wand against her scalp, cast Episkey , and it sealed over. When he lowered his wand to her neck, she bent her head back, giving him more access to the pale column of her throat.

The marks faded at the touch of magic, though not completely. Hermione sighed in relief and rubbed her neck.

Slowly her head keeled to one side, and came to rest on his shoulder. Her face turned and burrowed into his side. He slipped his arm around her waist, turned his face into her hair, and closed his eyes. He could rest. He wouldn’t wonder if he slept for a hundred years.

The Order found them that way, by and by — alone, with their heads braced together, in the wreckage of the headmaster’s office.

-In the interests of full disclosure, this chapter would not have been posted without bluebellandpie's "Greenhouse Seven," which was the bright point in my week and month and also a lot of the time when I couldn't work on this fic. I can't tell you how happy it made me, and still makes me, every time I open it. So: thank you, wonderful author.

-Happy fourth anniversary to this fic! Belatedly! I can't believe it's been four whole years, my God.

-I apologize again for the delay; the excuses I have are neither novel nor interesting, but they are mundane, and iterative. Sometimes I have good writing weeks, and good writing months; sometimes, the opposite. I'm sorry to have kept you waiting!

-I have written this chapter, from end to end, probably three or four times since its conception. It has fought me tooth and nail every part of the way.

-Next chapter title: "The Golden Hours." To be published as soon as I can get my shit together, which will HOPEFULLY be much sooner than the last time.

The Golden Hours

Chapter 78: The Golden Hours

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Draco would remember the rest of that afternoon, and the night and the day following, as a revolving drill of questions and appointments. An iridescent barrier laid over the entrance to the battered Great Hall, where two of the tables lay lopsided and several of the chandeliers over pools of broken glass. The doors were hauled away for repairs. The Hospital Wing filled its beds and Madam Pomfrey, short of nurses, sent student aides out to the common rooms with Pepper-Up and Soothing Draught and poultices for bruises and scars. Rumors moved in swift dark currents through the hallways, though they always dissipated when pressed to the source. Someone said they had seen Rufus Scrimgeour and Alastor Moody dueling in the entrance courtyard; the other said the Head Auror had fled to the ward boundary, and Apparated. Some authoritative-sounding person said that Cortwaite and Robard had ambushed McGonagall, only for her to jinx them into stone; and the appeal of this account led to the percolation of a story that she had personally dispatched the whole auror patrol, with gory flourishes keyed to the author’s preferences.

Ron and the twins collided with Bill and Charlie on the first-floor landing. Ginny launched herself from the bannister to tackle Arthur. All day the halls resounded with a liberation carillon: weeping, shouting, crying for relief. In Gryffindor there were toasts and speeches in Harry’s honor; in the hallways, students jeered at each other for falling on rival sides of the fight. Colin Creevey took to holding court in the oral tradition for those unfortunates who had fled before the Order’s arrival.

“The windows blew out. CRASH! There was this flash of light — BANG! — and then Dumbledore was standing there with all of these people, the Weasleys and the Diggories and the Boneses—”

“—don’t forget the Abbots, and Mad-Eye and the other one with the pink hair — and then CLAP! — he does this thing with his hands and all the stairs stop moving, somehow, and everyone freezes and it’s like I can’t feel my legs—”

“—and he shouts — never heard anything like it, ripping loud — ‘DOLORES,’ and the patrolman holding me passes out on the spot —”

“He did not, Colin.”

“Okay but basically he does. And then he disappears again and the other people come in and start pulling the patrolmen off us, and Moody drags them out of the castle, I don’t know where—”

“Probably lasered them to death with his eye. I heard he can totally do that.”

“That’s true, actually, I heard it from Katie. And Pink Hair says, ‘we’re the Order of the Phoenix, and we’re here to help you.’”

“And some prat said he was gonna call the aurors,” Dennis added, “but I don’t know if he did. Maybe he did call them, but they never showed.”

“They won’t come now, we’ve just beat them. But they’ll come,” said Colin grimly. “They’ll come soon. I hope they come while I’m here, so I can fight them. I didn’t hardly get any licks in, against the patrolmen.”

Colin excepted, the student body regarded the Order with supreme wariness; a year of the Prophet’s editorials had sapped dry their reservoirs of trust. It had helped greatly that most of the Order members Dumbledore had brought were parents, whose children could vouch for them; even so, the attitude of suspicion was not dispelled easily. Many blamed Harry for the violence, as was inevitable. There were as many versions of the riot as there were witnesses. Some said they had been involved when they hadn't. Some said they hadn't, though they were. Still others had to learn about the change of administration second-hand: Astoria Greengrass had been recovering from a blood transfusion, and missed it.

The rumors grew to fill a vacuum of information. Hogwarts remained a zipped pocket of the world. No word came from the Ministry. The Prophet ran on as if nothing had changed, and if the pictures were reused from previous issues, few noticed.

Owls flew at last from the Owlery, but the letters they brought back were sparse and brittle, full of obvious occlusions. By and by it occurred to him that no one in the real world seemed to know what was happening, either.

As the status quo spun out, hour after restless hour, it grew upon Draco that the feeling he had expected — the one he had wanted and imagined for months, the relief from fear that Umbridge's departure would bring — had never arrived. The fear had come from somewhere else, and found in her only a face. Now faceless, it swelled out like an infinite desert in the doldrums of his quiet, bleach-bright, endless afternoons.

Dumbledore arrived in the headmaster's office not long after Tonks and Bill, stepping around them on the staircase as they evacuated an unconscious Umbridge. He wore robes of midnight blue, hemmed in dust as pale as bone, and the ends of his beard bore singes. He moved aside to allow Bill and Tonks to evacuate an unconscious Umbridge, but he closed the door behind him, and took in the room with a faint sigh of regret.

"I hate to impose more difficulties on you, in what has been an invariably difficult day," he said, "but you would brief me on the goings-on in my absence, it will spare you the trouble of my bothering you again on the subject."

Hermione spoke first and longest. She told him how they had unlocked the Floo, which made it possible for the Order to come in through the castle hearths. She told him about Cassius Warrington and Theodore Nott. Then, squaring of her shoulders, she told him that they had tried to escape once before, unsuccessfully; she told him, haltingly, what she had done to Cho Chang.

Dumbledore listened, behind loosely laced fingers, without any expression. Almost a minute passed before he spoke.

“Was she sworn against giving any information concerning Mr. Potter, or merely information concerning your organization?”

“The second.”

“And she never previously reported anything to Dolores Umbridge, I presume?”

“I… doubt it. The spell was strict—”

“Strict with respect to the information you specified,” said Dumbledore, quite calmly. “But not with respect to anything else she might have gleaned from Harry.”

“You mean information about the Order?”

“I am curious about the scope of her confidence. I would ask her myself, but as it happens, Miss Chang is no longer the expert on what she does and does not know.”

Hermione folded her arms. Her expression shuttered.

“I botched it,” she said, in clinical tones, like she was grading an exam. “That’s why she lost a year. It was a horrible thing for her to experience, I’m well aware. But if you want to expel me for it—”

“Do you think you should be expelled for it?”

“There’s a reason people don’t sit in judgment on their own punishments,” she said, a clipped sidestep of the question. “Expulsions are at the final discretion of the Hogwarts Headmaster. So if you are — considering it — then you should know that the spell was intended only to eliminate memories that put other people in danger.” She bit her cheek, and added: “I wasn’t being vengeful or petty. It was supposed to protect people. I was trying to protect people.”

“How would you evaluate your attempt?”

Hermione flinched. “At least there was an attempt,” she said, and Dumbledore paused his slow circuit of the office. Draco tensed. “And if you’ll forgive me, I’d rather get expelled trying—”

“Miss Granger, it was not I who brought expulsion into this conversation.”

He stooped to pick up a piece of shattered porcelain, regarded it forlornly, and settled it back on the mantle. The effect, in the wrecked room, was hilarity.

“Assuming the school will still be open,” said Draco. “Will it?”

“The doors of Hogwarts will always be open to those who need it,” said Dumbledore. “That mistake I have made only once.”

Hermione darted Draco a querying glance, but Dumbledore continued. “The school will operate through the summer, and next year, for all those who return to it. However, since I have no intention of leaving, I doubt that many parents will permit their children to return. My reputation has seen better days.”

“The school has seen better days,” said Draco, and Dumbledore did a thing with his face that seemed painful.

“The school will endure,” he said. “Miss Granger, what you did to Miss Chang, however unconscionable, occurred outside of my tenure as the Hogwarts Headmaster, besides which I do not believe I should pass judgment on sins too similar to my own. I remand you to Professor McGonagall, who will decide your punishment moving into the next year."

"But she won't expel me," said Hermione, her voice uneven. "You won't take my wand."

"No. No, Hermione, I will not take your wand."

Something in her punctured. She braced herself subtly on the desk, but a tremble of relief betrayed her.

Draco moved to touch her. His hand found the small of her back, and she hiked her breath before she spoke.

"Thank you," she said. "Whatever McGonagall wants, I'll do. I'll do anything. I'll — I'll give up my prefect badge, if she wants."

Dumbledore smiled to himself and placed another piece of china on the mantel, considered the effect, then moved away. "It's a curious role," he said. From nowhere: "Were you aware that Victoria Frobisher requested to be made a prefect?"

Victoria's chief hobbies were swinging a beater's bat and threatening violence far outside her capability to perform. She was also abysmal in most classes. Draco registered his surprise with a polite silence.

"She can't," said Hermione. "She's just finished first year."

"I didn't ask what you thought of her prospects. I asked if you were aware, and, moreover, if you were aware of why."

"No idea," said Draco. The day had extended him far beyond his appetite for tiresome pedagogy. "The job's thankless tedium. I don't recommend it to her."

Dumbledore studied him intently over his glasses.

“She said she wanted to protect her friends,” he said.

Draco hated him for saying it. Something in his chest unfolded against the limits of his ribs, painfully.

“Why didn’t you do anything?” he said, and he marveled at his own vitriol even as he contemplated striking the old man across the face.

A thin whistle in the eaves voiced the wind’s opinion on the subject. But Dumbledore did answer him, with a clipped gravity.

“I judged it too great a risk,” he said. “Better, at any cost, to appear weak… to appear incapable of resistance… She wasted a year of rule on petty inquisitions and indulgences. And yet there are secrets at Hogwarts of which Dolores never scratched the surface.”

“Do you know the costs?” said Hermione, raising her voice. “Do you know what happened to Harry? What it did to him? What it is doing to him, now?”

“Does he still struggle with Occlumency?”

“The Dark Lord has a window into his brain,” said Draco. “It’s not clear Occlumency can stop it, if he could. Speaking of which. Where’s my godfather?”

Dumbledore did not react. “Severus is wherever his business takes him,” he said. “I rarely know his location precisely.”

“Your business, you mean.”

He did not deny it, either.

Draco found himself raising his voice, too. “Say that Snape didn’t betray the Order. He went to Umbridge on your instructions.”

“To what purpose?”

“To distance himself from you. To prove his loyalties to the Dark Lord.”

“Potentially,” said Dumbledore, blithe. “What purpose would you infer, if you were correct?”

“That you want a spy in his inner circle. That he needs absolute trust.” He paused. “Snape isn’t coming back next year. Is he?”

The twitch of Dumbledore’s mouth stirred his white beard. “Why would that be a poor idea?”

“It would be spending too much time around you. He would infer you still had sway over him. The Dark Lord assumes that people bend to the nearest source of power.”

“Severus Snape is an accomplished Occlumens. Shouldn’t that fact assure his master?”

“Snape shouldn’t want the Dark Lord to know that,” said Draco. His brain flitted along the line of thought, forking, checking corners, jittery with something almost like excitement. “The Dark Lord is a Legilimens. The last thing he wants in his inner circle is an accomplished Occlumens.”

Dumbledore inclined his head. “So what should Severus do?”

“Burn bridges,” he said. In the corner of his eye, Hermione turned her head. “Scorch the earth. Give him as many secrets as you can afford to lose. Start now. He shouldn’t have waited until—” His mind raced ahead of the sentence and abandoned it; he vaulted fast into another, angry now in earnest.

“Unless he didn’t wait, did he? If he started last summer. You were both planning this as soon as you knew the Dark Lord had returned.”

Dumbledore blinked. His eyes were the luminous color at the heart of a glacier. “It was a shame to lose Mundungus Fletcher,” he said, and he seemed to mean it. “For once in his life, I think he was making an honest effort to do the right thing.”

“You let Moody hound him out for nothing?” Hermione was struggling; her tone was not accusatory, but of one failing to understand. “To protect Snape? That’s it? You could have quashed the investigation to begin with—”

“Alastor Moody loathes spies,” said Dumbledore simply. “He must believe that his people are loyal, no rival claims to their fidelity, no kernel of treason in their hearts. He has known too much of betrayal to abide it… and I have known too much of hearts to agree with him.”

His robes moved soundlessly over the floors. The door to the office opened soundlessly at his approach, untouched.

“Your mother is well, Draco,” he said, as the shaded stairwell swallowed his face. “She asks that you return home for the summer. And she will expect you at Platform Nine and Three Quarters.”

Then the door closed over the weary hunch of his shoulders. And they were alone, at last, in a shattered room.

The castle post bellum was a castle undressed: near the grand staircase, portraits listed from their hooks, and marble dust seized in froth-white whorls under each step. Evening glowed in bronze fragments on the broken glass under the windows. Thick, warm air stirred the corridors, motion without relief. It accrued in Hermione’s hair, turning her face pale, and her robes shimmering gray. Where it flickered through the fallen glass, Draco’s reflection was colorless. They climbed down a broken stair, which had been dislodged in some skirmish between the Order and aurors; when she listed on her ankle, she fell into his shoulder, and stayed there for a moment. The weight of her kept him from feeling as if he might float up through the surreal dream of the day, and wake, panting, on the first morning of September.

They went on.

A crowd had assembled in the Hospital Wing antechamber to the Hospital Wing. Ron leaned against the doors, encircled by siblings. Padma and Parvati sat together on a bench, sharing earphones, distinguishable only by their ties; Luna dozed with her head in Padma's lap. Dean, Seamus, and Katie were playing Hearts with one of Fred's trick card decks.

Hermione moved into the light, her hand drifting over Draco's elbow. She did not let go of him, not quite. The conversation dimmed to greet them, and there was a slithering susurrus of whispers.

Ron had straightened at the sound of their footsteps; at the sight of them, he was in motion. "Hermione," he shouted. "Draco—"

He shot forward and scooped her up in a single movement, so quickly that a wheeze was her only objection. His arms wrapped tightly around her waist and he wheeled her around, and she gave a shout less angry than surprised, clinging to him.

"Ron! Ron! Put me down! I'm fine! I'm fine— put me down, you're mad!"

His tolerance ratcheted to its limit, tipped, and broke. Seeing Ron's head buried in Hermione's neck had made him less irritable on days far more deserving of his patience. It didn't help that Hermione had started to giggle, infected, no doubt, by the intensity of his joy, as of course she would be, which was the reason that Draco withstood precisely three more seconds of it than he thought really decent, considering that she didn't belong to Ron.

"That's more than enough, thank you. You can put her down."

Ron did not care. He gave a breathy guffaw of relief and dropped her, clasped her shoulders, her head, her waist again, and rounded on Draco with a grin that was so electrically bright it half-threatened to seize Draco and give him a whirl, too. He settled for punching him in the shoulder, and Draco let him. The ache flickered almost pleasantly through the sore muscles of his wand-arm.

“You son of a bitch,” Ron breathed. “I’m sorry I didn’t see it. Tonks said you had her out cold when they found you. Did you get her good?”

“You mean Umbridge, I assume?”

“Or any other old bints you knocked off on the way,” said Ginny. She clambered upright, flipping dust-clumped hair out of her face. “Hopefully not too many.”

“I think McGonagall’s sore she lost the pleasure,” said Fred. “You saw her going at it — reckon she nearly took off a limb, never seen her so mad as all that—”

“Most morale I’ve felt in years,” said George, “she should’ve beat someone to death on the first day of Transfiguration, I’d have aced the N.E.W.T.”

“Euan was worried she’d get off easy, Order being humanitarians,” said Ginny. “I told him: ‘Are you joking? It’s Malfoy and Granger. They’re gonna use her to ruin a hardwood floor.’”

Dean and Seamus jeered appreciatively. Hermione began to look uncomfortable.

“Where’s Potter?” said Draco, ignoring them.

“In there.” Ron jerked his head. “Collapsed when we were fighting Scrimgeour. Don’t think a spell got him, only—” He pointed at his forehead. “You know.”

The relief fell out of Hermione’s face in a tragic sweep. “Are you sure? He’s never fainted from a vision before.”

“Yeah, I dunno. Pomfrey’s got him. Mum, too. We’re just waiting for her to let us in.”

“Mrs. Weasley is here?”

“Yeah, ’course. Came with the rest of the Order. And Dad, of course, but she didn’t leave much for him to do—”

The doors parted. Neville stepped out wearing a nurse’s apron and stripped off a pair of blue gloves. His sleeves were rolled up to the elbows, and the ends of his fringe were damp with sweat.

“He’s fine,” he said, before anyone could accost him. “Pomfrey’s cleared him. No curses, no major problems. She’s holding him overnight to monitor, but she expects to release him in the morning. I’m supposed to take four of you—”

“Four!”

“That’s not fair, we’ve been out here for ages—”

“Neville, have a heart—”

“Four,” said Neville loudly, “and I’m allowed to take less, if someone gets s-saucy about it — if you don’t have an injury, go back to your common room, and if you do have an injury, come and see me. Ron, p-pick three.” He promptly turned and retreated behind the doors, deaf to a sweet chorus of whining.

“He’s been spending too much time with you,” Ron muttered to Draco.

“I can’t be credited with every competent act in this House. Only most of them.”

“I could leave you out here, you know — alright. Ginny, Hermione, you’re with me and Draco.” Ron swept his gaze over the assembly with a polite dictatorial air. “The rest of you piss off until tomorrow morning. Thanks for waiting with us, I’ll let Harry know you came. Fred and George keep their liquor in the false bottom of the broom cupboard—”

“Thanks, Ronnie,” exclaimed Fred, “last time I clock an auror for you.”

“—so go mad with that. Or don’t, er, if you’re like, twelve. Anyway, good job.”

“Thank you, Ron,” said Luna. Her voice was very un-Luna-like; it was flat and plaintive with tiredness. “Please tell Harry I’m sorry about the Grim.”

Hermione lifted her eyes to the ceiling, opened her mouth, and closed it on a long exhale.

“Consider him told,” said Ron.

The Hospital Wing sat pale and crowded under the warm descent of dusk. Each bed carried someone nursing a bruise or a split lip, and the chatter of them filled the room with a liquid ripple of inaudible voices: somewhere here complaining of an auror’s curse, another there of a sprain. The windows hung open to stir the stagnant summer air and heavy linen drapes, hung from the distant ceiling, moved like the slow wingbeats of a descending swan. It smelled of disinfectant, copper, and sweat. Pomfrey swept from bed to bed with the gravity of a descending peregrine, plucked, patched, dosed, or cut, and darted on to the next bed, while her attendants followed in a retinue of compresses and glass vials.

Harry’s bed had been sequestered by a translucent screen. He lay under a sheet as pale as shrouds, his knees propped up like whitecaps.

Molly Weasley was knitting at his bedside, though she looked remarkably unlike herself. She wore a plain black raincloak that hung like a poncho around her shoulders, a fitted tunic of midnight blue, and laced leather boots with mud up the sides. Her hands deftly operated the knitting needles while encumbered by a pair of fingerless gloves. An auror’s wandsheath ran up her left forearm.

If it had not been for her hair — frayed, sabled auburn curls, like fading leaves of the last flush, bound back tightly with a headband — he would not have recognized her. But the impression came back with a force when her children came in, for she stood and snapped out her arms with a brisk and familiar demand. Ron lurched in to hug her, and she nearly lifted him off his feet.

Harry turned as they came, his whole body quickened in bright relief. He sat up clumsily — a golden thread trailed from his wrist to a levitating bag of saline at his shoulder — and clutched Hermione's hand as she rushed to his bedside.

He gave a ragged, hapless laugh, as if he could not quite think what to say. She swallowed and did not say anything, either.

“Alright, Hermione?” he rasped.

“Fine,” she said. “Draco and I—”

“I know. You saved us.”

“Not alone,” she said weakly, with a hail-mary glance over her shoulder; Draco raised his eyebrows to indicate that she was without help, and she promptly punished him. “Draco dueled Cassius Warrington by himself. And won.”

“Fuck’s sake, Granger—”

“You did what?”

“It's true,” she said, with a silken note of proprietary pride. “It didn't take him fifteen minutes.”

He scoffed. “Not a fair fight. Warrington’s a poppet. Cut his strings, he falls over.”

“Nope, too late,” croaked Harry, and reached for him. Draco rolled his eyes and, with as much reluctance as he could telegraph, outstretched his hand so that Harry could take it. “Thank you, too.”

“Had half the school outside,” said Ron, jerking his thumb. “Ginny had to sell a kidney to get in. Neville’s let the power go to his head.”

Harry smiled thinly. “Good for him,” he said. “Tell him to start cutting me in on these deals. I’m sick of being the Elvis in this relationship.”

Ginny wriggled her way between them and hopped onto the mattress beside Harry.

“You missed out,” she said. “I totally kicked Warrington’s arse, too. You just didn’t see it, ’cause you fainted like a girl.”

“You know me. Had to make a dramatic exit.” Harry smiled, and it made the crooked bridge of his glasses lilt askew. The flat, angular, planes of his face hung shadows under them, and in the light his eyes were eerily pale, almost colorless.

Sometimes I play a little game, and then I lie a little more.

“The Order have Umbridge in custody,” said Draco.

“Where?” said Ginny dangerously, fingering her wand.

“No idea. Fancy an expedition?”

“God, you’re my favorite prefect. Can we go now?”

“Neither of you are doing anything of the sort,” said Molly pleasantly, looping a new strand of yarn around her forefinger. “You’re to stay away from that woman for the rest of her natural-born life, Ginevra. Draco, I can’t rightly tell you what to do, but I doubt your mother would disagree.”

She took his mother for a far more forgiving woman than she was, by his lights, but he laid the point aside from distraction. Hermione had lowered herself into one of the visitors’ chairs. The moment her weight left her heels, something wilted in her spine, and her eyes closed, briefly.

Years' experience informed him she was minutes from falling asleep wherever she happened to be standing, sitting, or reading, and he would have moved to take her back to the Tower; but Harry had started to relax for the first time they'd come in, and he knew she wouldn't leave. He placed a hand on the back of her chair, and she flicked her fingers in a tired gesture that meant she would push through, regardless of convincing.

The doors to the Hospital Wing cleaved and a pale head bestrode the gap. Daphne slipped through discreetly, though the effect was thwarted by the full attention of the room on her. She wore a navy-blue cardigan over her uniform, which happened to hide her Slytherin tie.

"Hello," she said hesitantly. "I heard that Harry was here."

"He'll be out in the morning, dear," said Molly, firm, but not unkind. "He isn't seeing visitors."

"S'fine. Just Daphne," said Harry. He waved her over, and she trotted in with the sly contentment of someone being permitted to breach a rule.

"Duck behind me, if Neville comes," Ron told her.

"I shall vanish entirely." She noticed Molly, and half-folded herself in an uncharacteristically awkward curtsy, which a less tired Draco would have found the words to mock. "Oh, you're — why, hello, Lady — Mrs. Weasley."

"This is Daphne Greengrass," Molly said, politely. "From the stories?"

"You do talk about me," Daphne murmured, pleased.

"Yeah, to complain," said Ron. "Anyway, she's cool, Mum. Stood up for Harry, in the Great Hall. Only Slytherin to do it." He smiled at her, perhaps urging some show of pride, but Daphne hesitated.

“That’s not quite true,” she said. “A few of the very young ones did, too… admittedly, I think they just wanted to stand on the table, I’m not sure they quite knew what was going on. Anyway, I wasn't really fighting, like you — I mean, Ron punched one square in the neck—”

“He gets his aggression from his father,” said Molly haughtily. Ginny gaped at her in disbelief. “I raised him better than that.”

“Mum! You punched Cortwaite in the d—”

“And I raised you better than to use that language in front of company!”

“It’s Harry’s company,” said Ginny irritably. She chafed against her mother’s tone, her shoulders creeping up, and Draco remembered their fight from St. Mungo’s. “Not yours. Let him say if he doesn't like my language.”

“I’m his guardian for the time being,” said Molly sharply. “I’ll look after him. Now—”

“But you're not,” said Ginny, with an equal and opposite streak of flinty stubbornness. “His guardian's Sirius. Where is he?”

“Ginny,” rasped Harry. “Don't—”

“Drinking, I expect,” said Molly, quite bright and quite cold. “So whatever your preferences are, young lady, I'm sorry to say you're stuck with me.”

Ginny sucked in her cheek and rolled her jaw mulishly to stare at the floor. She did not apologize to her mother, but she didn't prosecute the argument, either. Molly set down her needles and scowled at her hands.

“How's Dad?” said Ron suddenly.

Molly took up her needles again, shaking out her wrists with a sharp gesture. “He's fine,” she said curtly. “He's searching the castle for traps, with Mad-Eye. The Healers expect him to regain some of his voice by September."

"How much is some?"

"Less than all," she said, and pulled tight the loop.

Daphne averted her eyes. Draco thought someone ought to breach the awful silence. He said, "What's that you've got, Greengrass?"

Her gratitude was spelled in her sharp intake of breath. "I brought some things for Harry." She began digging parcels out of her knapsack. She was obviously trying to play it off casually, but the parcels were wrapped in pink tissue paper and tied in satin ribbon, and he had rarely seen her put so much effort into anything except her hair. "Whenever Tori and I were in hospital," she added, "we'd bring each other handsoaps, because hospital soaps always smell like bleach, it's dreadful. And some dry shampoo, and toothpaste — Scouring Charms just never feel clean, do they? And a silk pillowcase, so your hair doesn't get mussy on those awful cheap sheets."

"Tell me about it," said Harry, "those cheap sheets," and Hermione pointedly jogged the leg of his bed.

"And some Turkish delight, just for a treat. Hospital is a fine chance to gorge yourself without anyone telling you off." Daphne placed the box in his lap and patted it. Then she stepped back awkwardly, her grace vanquished without a task to perform; she seemed suddenly adrift, waiting for someone to give her a heading.

Ron was staring at her. She glanced at him furtively, twice, and sighed: "Oh, God, he's allergic, isn't he? Don't tell me, I'll jump out a window."

"No," said Ron oddly. "He's — he's fine, eat mud if you let him. Why'd you come?"

“I don’t know,” she said. “It… seemed like a nice thing to do.”

“Well, it was,” he said.

“Yes,” she said. “I know.”

He nodded, averting his eyes. She clasped her hands behind her back in a posture of elegant uncertainty.

“Don’t get much of them,” he said. “The fancy sweets. Bit rich for our blood.”

“Oh, Turkish delight isn’t expensive. Honeydukes has a deluxe box for ten galleons.”

Ron blinked.

“Which is a lot of money,” she blurted. “Quite a lot of money, for most people, in fact, and actually, I think I’ll see about that window—”

“I’m having you on. I’ve had Turkish delight before. I’m not, like, homeless.”

“I didn’t say you were homeless,” she gasped. “I would never say that. Or think it! And if I did, which you can’t prove, then it was for a brief period early in our acquaintance, and I should not be held responsible for it.”

An owl broke through one of the open windows of the Hospital Wing, its raven-black feathers gilded in the last veins of sunset. It settled on one of the other students’ bedside, drawing Draco’s eye to the only other bed in the room that had a screen. Emerging from the screen to receive her owl was a short, dark-haired girl in a Slytherin uniform. She slit the twine with her wand and fed the owl a treat from her pocket, flipped open the letter, and skimmed it, her snub-nosed face pursed in concentration.

Sensing that she was being watched, Pansy glanced up at him. She folded the letter into her robe pocket and turned to say something to the person behind the screen. Draco harbored few doubts as to who lay there. Daphne followed his gaze, choked on air, and fell silent.

With a bellicose square of her shoulders, Pansy crossed the ward, her steps long and brusque and graceful. Her presence was neither unnoticed nor welcome by Ron and Ginny, the latter of whom removed her wand from her pocket. But Molly disarmed them with a lift of her hand, and she rose at Pansy's approach.

"Hello, again," she said, and Pansy hesitated — caught off-guard, perhaps, by the familiarity in it. "You've changed your hair."

There was something he had forgotten. The last time they had seen each other, Pansy's hair had been splinched by Theo. A hairdresser of preternatural skill had rearranged it into a French bob, tapered at the back and rounded at the front with a long fringe, and it hung so low it gave her the impression of a perpetually uplifted glower.

"Yes. My mother cried," said Pansy, in a clipped tone that was almost cordial. She turned to Draco. "I assume you caught Umbridge," she said, "since Granger's still got her wand. Bien joué. I hope it was satisfying."

"What's it to you?" snapped Ron. Molly laid a hand on his arm.

Pansy curled her lip. "I'm doing reconnaissance," she said. "I'd like to know what plans the Order has for me."

"For you, personally?" inquired Hermione, with a sharp edge of amusement. "Are you under the impression that they're thinking about you?"

"If they're not, they bloody well should be. Theo and Cassius are already gone. You should be more careful with your hostages."

"Hostages!" said Molly scornfully. "My days. You're not a hostage, dearie."

“I am, in fact. In effect, if not by intention. Daddy will never attack the school while I’m here. Congratulations! You have all once again failed catastrophically upwards,” she said. “But if Dumbledore intends to let his leverage walk out the door, I won’t stop him.”

“The Order of the Phoenix does not fight wars with children,” said Molly.

“You mean you won’t employ them,” Pansy snapped. “Which is bully for your kids. But your enemies don’t share your inhibitions, and I somehow doubt you’ll risk your children’s lives for mine. So I would be careful, if I were you, about acting too sanctimonious. The next time we see each other, you might not have quite the reach for the moral high ground.”

With a delicate step, she disengaged from their circle, cutting a wide berth around Daphne, and strode forthwith out of the Hospital Wing. Neville, who had been watching at a distance, stepped in front of her at the doors — she recoiled and reached for her hip — but he merely took the handle and drew one back for her, his expression shuttered, if not unsympathetic. She said something to him, short and inaudible. His reply was brief; she stepped around him, giving him a wide berth, as her robe flickered out of sight.

Harry’s heartclock murmured up into the forefront of the silence. Hermione sheathed her wand with an unsteady hand. Ron and Ginny were having some sort of unreadable silent communication, and Molly was saying something about letting Harry rest, her brisk manner sweeping the conversation mercifully into the past. People were staring at them, each the wide unembarrassed stare of someone with a reason to. A crawl ran over Draco’s skin and it occurred to him, for a second time, that this was what winning felt like.

Dumbledore held an assembly the next morning. Ongoing renovations on the Great Hall sent them to the lawn. Because there were no tables, it was difficult to see who had turned out for it, and which, if any, Houses had abstained. It told them little they didn’t already know: that Hogwarts would stay open, for the summer and the year beyond; that the Ministry, whatever was left of it, would be ousted from the school’s administration; that the students not eager to stay would be permitted to leave, as usual, on the Hogwarts Express, which would arrive for them on June twelfth. Hermione intended to go with it. That was fine. She had agreed for a member of the Order to go with her.

She had not agreed, despite efforts, to stay at Hogwarts for the summer, or indeed to do anything else that might lower Draco’s blood pressure.

Most of the Order had stayed. Moody prowled the battlements of the castle regularly, and Draco overheard the tail-end of a heated conversation between him and Dumbledore about the remaining Slytherins. The Boneses and the Diggories, reunited with their children, stuck closely together, although Amos enjoyed informing strangers about his son’s role in single-handedly starting the Hogwarts resistance, until Cedric dragged him off by the heels. Arthur and Molly had been given rooms in the guest wing of the castle, and held tea services for students seeking information about the Order of the Phoenix. Tonks, Bill, Fleur, and Charlie ran patrols at Moody’s behest along the exterior of the castle and grounds, checking the secret passageways and tunnels of the Shrieking Shack, but their reports came back clean.

The students fell into wary rhythms with the new police force, in form not so different from their old one as to upset routine. The suspicion mellowed over time, as their new freedoms expanded, and more students were allowed to go home. Alfie Chrissenpoffer flagged Draco in the Transfiguration corridor to address it.

“Malfoy,” he said, nearly whispering, “these Order people — they are the right sort, aren't they?”

“What?”

“I mean, we can trust them? They're behind Harry, and everything?”

At twelve, Alfie had failed to grow into his hair, the ruddy mop of which still draped in his eyes. Draco sighed.

“Trust them absent reason to do otherwise,” he said. “As a rule, you needn't fear them. They're reasonably domesticated.”

Alfie nodded firmly. With an experimental air, he snapped off a salute. It was a striking imitation of how Bill and Tonks signed off to each other.

“Don't do that,” he snapped, queasy. “You're twelve. It looks ridiculous. Two points from Gryffindor for public embarrassment.”

Alfie nodded again, half-started another salute — winced, aborted — and settled on two rigid thumbs-up. He scurried into a secret passage behind a tapestry and was gone, leaving Draco roiling with nameless unease.

Three days after the riot, Lupin still had not come. Harry said, “He’s probably with Sirius,” but Draco sensed his apprehension, and dispatched himself to ask Mad-Eye on a discreet occasion.

“Classified,” said Mad-Eye. He glared around the corner of the alcove, though they were alone, and Draco cast a Muffling Charm. “Classified, boy, and I wouldn’t tell you if it weren’t. Are you dull?”

“Potter won’t accept that answer.”

“It’s not Potter I’m talking to,” said Mad-Eye. His lone eye pierced the locks of lanky, gray hair in his face. He seemed ages older than he had been last year. “You don’t know what kind of information you’re asking for, Malfoy. Much less how much of it you want.”

“Fine. I won’t ask, I’ll give it to you: Potter wants to see him. Earlier this year, the three of us had to talk him down from running back to Twelve in the middle of term just to see him alive.”

“That was damn foolish.”

“I know. So let him see his godfather. Or Lupin.”

“Can’t be done,” said Mad-Eye grimly. “Twelve’s too valuable. And Lupin’s out of play.”

“Hogwarts is ten times a better safehouse than Twelve. What do you mean by out of play?”

“I don’t mean as a safehouse, boy,” he snapped. “Christ, you’re a Black, you ought to know. It’s the seat of an ancient house. Bound and kept by the Laws of Blood, consecrated with the magic of twenty dead generations. Of dead tyrants. Padfoot doesn’t know the half of the evil in that place, and it’d be worse in the hands of the Dark Lord.”

The chill of this infused him while Mad-Eye muttered on. “No telling what could happen to it. No telling where the enemy even is. Could be London. Could be Oxford. Could be Edinburgh. He’d change his seat in the day… made a game of it, I would’ve sworn to you, he slipped us clues. He liked to dance. I’d let him. We made a secret of our power, and let good men die to keep it… Never asked if Albus forgave me. No! I played a game of whispers when to breathe the truth was sin. Now he won’t give us the facts. Prophet won’t report them. Even those who know won’t last, Kingsley found two explosives in his Floo powder… When they write the history of this war, they’ll ask the winners what was true.”

In alarm, Draco watched the old man’s rheumed eye slip into the middle distance, sharpen, and swivel back to him. It occurred to him that Mad-Eye had the twin of Dumbledore’s pristine, grieving silences: this muttering, fervent conscience, which crawled out luridly in idleness, practically begging to be unburdened. He wondered if it were possible for it to be any other way. He could not decide which was worse.

Mad-Eye's face did not soften, exactly, but a new chisel opened in the rock. He clapped Draco on the shoulder with a blow that could have crippled a smaller man. It surprised Draco, the collegiality of it.

"Ah, boy. I'm not cruel," he muttered. "Potter's had a hard go. If I can have Moony brought here, I will. But Padfoot's out of the question."

Mad-Eye left him in the alcove, his leather duster sweeping the ground.

Harry noticed the absence. He noticed it even when Arthur Weasley came to visit him in Gryffindor, his smile broad and strained, speaking in the softest of half-whispers, little more than a rustle of air at the back of his throat. They spent an afternoon conversing over a piece of parchment they traded to and fro over the table. At the end of it, Arthur left with Bill, and Harry curled himself into one of the window-seats, fending off efforts to draw him into conversation with polite muttered denials.

He was surrounded by family again: Weasleys aplenty, McGonagall and Tonks, all of Gryffindor, all of them at his beck and anxious to please. But for want of Sirius Black, Harry's victory turned to ash in his mouth. He wrote long letters that he burned un-sent. In the evenings Draco came down to see him lingering by the fireplace, long after the others had come to bed, watching the embers with his knees tucked under his chin.

Draco would be the first to say he found it irrational. He found it maudlin, and more than that, he found it a waste of Harry Potter, whose affection seemed too high a thing to bestow on someone who could reward it so poorly, with such a twisted, reckless kind of affection. Someone who had known him so briefly, and loved him too ferociously, for that brief time, to believe that love belonged to Harry alone. It was love borrowed on credit, and borrowed things demanded to be repaid.

The creditor wasn't hard to guess. But he remembered Tonks's eavesdropped exchange, at Christmas — my little fucking spy assessment currently finds that the ward master of the Order headquarters — and it wasn't like he hadn't seen it, hadn't heard it even, the wild edge of Sirius's voice when he was drunk, the cinders of rage smoldering under thirteen years of insouciance and grief. To be alone in Grimmauld Place did not seem a pleasant prospect. He did not seek to imagine what Sirius Black was doing to himself without anyone to watch him.

Four days after the riot found him with Hermione on a window-seat in the boys' dormitory. The stone chamber flooded with sunlight: it pooled in sheer white boxes on the floor, speared the eye where it caught random bits of glass and mirror, and set the gilt on the leatherbound volumes at his bedside aflame with rare brilliance. It inflamed Hermione's hair from beneath with a volcanic warmth, the hints of gold and red lifted up amongst the unpinned chestnut coils. She was annotating something with runes; Draco laid on the bed, paging through a book Remus had given him for Christmas about potions. The Cure's Disintegration album thrummed statically from her earphones. Her quill moved in rhythm with the sound.

Through the window, the grounds soaked up the light like a latticed spill of jewels. The Whomping Willow twitched its fingers in the dry, still air. Harry was flying overhead, an incongruous dart of jet against the blue slate of the sky: someone in the Order, probably Bill, had fetched Umbridge's keys and unlocked the Gryffindor quidditch room. Ron and Ginny made smaller, less ambitious loops in the sky beneath him.

The carceral days of May seemed to belong to a different season, a different year. June crawled to them on its belly, hot and flat, practically stifling. A single sluggish cloud strained across the southern horizon.

He wondered when he would start feeling happy again. It was taking more time than he had expected. It was a great relief, of course, to have Umbridge gone, and it was a greater relief to have the weight of custody off his shoulders — it was the Order, now, who pried students apart when they squabbled, who jinxed bullies from their quarry, who kept the peace by being omnipresently around the corner. A vast weight had lifted to hover a few inches from his shoulders, a shadow without force. It was not his outlook any longer to ensure that the many students of Hogwarts Castle did not tear each other to pieces under the strain.

“It’s a bad idea.”

The dorm was empty: Dean and Seamus were downstairs in the common room, by the faint pulse of music on the floorboards, and Neville was still helping Pomfrey on the ward. Most of the Tower was out attempting to wring every drop from its freedom. His voice rebounded from the stone walls, vanishing into the wood rafters.

Hermione finished drawing a rune, made a critical survey, and blew on the ink. It flashed gold and blazed into the paper, vanishing. “You lost this fight the first three times,” she said, “so perhaps we ought to skip the fourth. I’m getting bored of winning it.”

“Try losing it, then, for a change. Here, I’ll let you: it’s not even so much that it’s a bad idea, it’s that I don’t believe you have an idea for it at all.”

She capped her inkwell and shook out her wrist. “The train arrives,” she deadpanned. “I get on the train. I get off the train.”

“I object. You discover compound sentences.”

“I — ha, ha — fine. I see my parents, I show them I’m not dead, and the reason I couldn’t write them since January wasn’t because I’m a terrible daughter, although considering what else I haven’t told them, they probably shouldn’t waive the charge.”

“And you have to do that in Hampstead Garden?”

“You say that like it’s Clapton,” she said mildly. “It’s a suburb. I live next to a church.”

“What about the Manor?” He tossed the book on the table and lowered his legs from the window seat.

“We talked about this.”

“It’s a practical compromise. It’s warded, it’s remote, it’s comfortable. It’s far from London.”

“I agree with you.”

“And I’d be there.”

“Yes, I’d hope so.”

“Then do it,” he said. “Say yes. It isn’t hard.”

“I have to see my parents,” she said, in the singsong of one repeating herself.

“Bring them.”

“The Manor has muggle-repelling charms.”

“I’ll deactivate them.”

“You don’t know how to do that.”

“I’ll learn how to do it. Or I’ll buy a house in the area and put them up. Be a damn sight easier than letting you walk around London alone.” He pushed off his bed and prowled to his bureau. The bruises on his torso were still healing, and they twinged stiffly when he rolled his shoulders. He tapped Ulysses’s cage, and the owl croaked at him in a distinguished, reproachful manner.

Hermione’s robes rustled as she drew her knees down from the window-seat. She tugged out her earphone and wound it neatly around the little grey Discman. “I’m not going to be alone,” she said, truthfully. “Tonks is coming with me.”

“Thank Merlin. Dark armies of hideous strength are arraying against us, and you’re taking a twenty-something with a tongue piercing.”

“Tonks is perfectly capable, you admitted it. You’re just recanting because you don’t like the plan—”

“I admitted nothing like it.” He used his wand to fill the cage’s water trough. Ulysses nipped at his fingers in gratitude, breaking the skin; he daubed his index in his mouth to stop the bleeding and shut the cage. “I said I preferred her to Charlie. Who also, I believe, has a tongue piercing. And for the record, ‘perfectly capable’ isn’t good enough.”

She threw up her hands in exasperation. “Well, I’m a bit ‘capable’ myself. If it comes to it, I’ll have my wand, and I’ll be fine—”

“No, you won’t,” he snapped, turning on her. “You can’t use magic—”

“Neither can you!”

“—until your Trace comes off in September. Until then you’re a walking beacon—”

“The Dark Lord’s armies aren’t going to target a pair of dentists.”

“Don’t be coy. You think the Dark Lord doesn’t know who you are?”

She blinked, her eyelashes shuttering slowly over her cheeks. When she opened her eyes they were hard, intent. “Stop trying to scare me,” she said crisply. “I’m quite good enough at it on my own.”

He gave a short exhale and paced. Ulysses crooned in concern. Hermione stretched her ankle, twisting the joint in an exaggerated pronation, flashing the blueberry stain of a bruise under her heel. When she tested her weight on it, her calf flexed, and she padded to the bed, where her satchel was, to root for some of the poultice Neville had made her. Absently, she nudged some of her hair out of her face, and it spilled over her shoulder, twining threads of rust on ivory cotton. Her bottom lip caught between her teeth, and she pressed a faint divot in it. Habitual overbite, orthodontically corrected. Muggle braces. Off by fourth year. She'd asked him how they looked, because it had mattered to her. Though she hated the idea of how she looked mattering to her, and she hated feeling like it should matter. Never wore jewelry but for a leather-banded watch, her grandmother's. Code-perfect uniform, no accents. Makeup, sometimes, if she had a spot. Anything she could use to restrain any amount of her hair. He remembered so much about her sometimes it overwhelmed him.

“Fine. I’ll come with you.”

“You w— I—” Her cheeks warmed. “You’d be very welcome to meet them, but I’m not talking about a short visit. I can’t just swing by, tell them what’s happened, and catch the eight o’clock train back to Scotland. I’ll have to convince them to let me come back to school. Again.”

“We’ll make them understand.”

“It isn’t that simple. How would you explain that you wanted to come back?” It was a touch, perhaps, uncertain. “What sane person would?”

“Because it’s your inheritance,” he said immediately. “Because it belongs to you. Because you belong to it.”

Her mouth worked. He dropped his eyes to it. Her lip folded softly under her teeth, edging a raw dark line of red at the swell.

“Well,” she said flippantly, “if that’s what your mother told you about magic, it would explain a lot.”

She was too late to dodge as he clipped a Lasso Jinx at her ankles, a skittery and harmless that made her squeak and fall on the bed. No one stood above the sacred rite of petty vengeance. Hermione, laughing in surprise, retorted at once by snatching her wand out of her hair and Disarming him, snaring his wand towards her with a canny twist of her wrist. It was a short-lived scuffle. His reflexes still ran jittery and quick from overuse, fried nerves smoldering at noises around corners. Hers were sharper than they had been before.

Both their appetites for scrimmage were wanting. She folded too quickly to make it any fun, and levitated his wand with a lazy swish of her own, which he caught and pocketed as an olive branch.

“The only thing I’m heir to is a dental practice,” she said, laying on her back. Her hands laced over her stomach. Her skirt rode up, drawing like a curtain over a stretch of soft sun-neglected skin that reached perilously high. “And I think they plan on giving it to the cousins.”

“That’s not true,” he said, leaning against the bedpost. Dissonance frissoned at the sight of her in the boys’ dormitory, not because she hadn’t been before — she made episodic invasions on Christmas, or whenever Ron or Harry overslept — but because usually, when she had, it was full of other people. “You’re more witch than anyone alive.”

“Magic isn’t something I inherited,” she pointed out. “And I live in the muggle world. I can’t just leave it, and I wouldn’t want to. Draco, before the Order came, did you ask Ron to take me on the run with the Weasleys?”

The flank attack on the topic was a characteristic maneuver. “He offered first of his own accord,” he said, noncommittal.

Hermione sat up, radiating furor. “You did. Where were you planning on doing?”

“Finding my mother. Getting her out of her oath to Dumbledore. Fleeing the country,” he said. “Past that point, I hadn’t bothered to think.”

“You were planning to do that without help?”

“Not by choice, but with others gone—”

“If you stayed in Britain I’d stay with you, you dolt,” she said, reckless and intent. “You’re my — you’re you. If you were here, I’d be here. I would stay if they hauled me in front of a tribunal and snapped my wand and posted a warrant for our arrests. I’d stay if they pulled down the towers of this castle, looking for us, and I’d dig you out from underneath them.”

He shifted upright, standing over her. Hermione reached up and palmed his jaw, hot pressure, like she was trying to infuse her point through the skin.

“I’d find you if you ran away,” she said, with destined certainty, “and vanished from the earth, hid yourself somewhere no one else would think to look. I’d come looking for you. And then, when I found you, I’d make you regret it.”

It was not a question. It was not last year: Please, please stay. Love had not gentled her. If anything, the opposite.

His fingers grazed the soft underside of her chin.

“You know,” he said, to swerve the danger of saying something with significantly more emotion, “you’re distinctly lovely when you’re threatening me.”

That knocked her off her guard well and far; Hermione loved the warpath, but she waded into intimacy with the bewilderment of a small and developmentally challenged deer. It was hopelessly predictable of her to twitch. Gamely, however, she grappled her hesitation and said: “I could keep going, if — you’re enjoying yourself.”

It must have registered to her at the same time that there was no one around, and no one likely to come looking for them. That they were without work and without chores and without pretexts to distract each other. For the first time in months, they were totally and indefinitely alone.

He grabbed her and kissed her.

She swayed back from the force of it with a muffled yip of surprise.

He shoved his hand greedily into her hair and wrapped his hand around her waist, slanting his mouth over hers with a bruising force. She tasted of tea and lemon and the whole fucking field of sugarcane she always put in it, like a raw lick of honey.

Her leg slipped over his and then, with a short little tug on her waist, she was sliding half on top of him, and he carried her weight back onto his elbows, still kissing her in hard, hot rhythm, her mouth fixed to his like a singing nerve of raw pleasure. He couldn't stop. He couldn't remember why they'd stopped in the first place, when this was what it felt like.

Her hum was a perfect, little catlike sound that vibrated through the back of his skull. Her shirt bunched under his fingers, rising out of her skirt, and he slid his fingers inside to glide over miles of soft skin, riding up the faint ridge of her spine, tracing the thin rounds of her vertebrae. Her hair was warm and soft under his fingers and it shrouded his face, spilling over his neck, his chest, everywhere.

She pressed flush to his chest and sighed again, breathy with a light, vapid sort of pleasure, and he gave another tug at her, senselessly. She gave a pleased chirp, and her knees tightened on either side of his hips, and then there was an electric bolt of something moving through his body and he broke off kissing her to gasp.

The aftershock of the feeling left him wired and filled with an aching, restless sensitivity. He shifted his hips back into the mattress, which did precisely shit, because Hermione apparently wasn't inclined to offer a morsel of fucking help; she made another contented little sound and leaned down to kiss him again, drinking the gasp from his lips, and he canted into mouth before he had thought about it. This was the wrong move. She took the inch and stole planets; with her arms draped over her shoulders, she pressed flush into him, driving him down, so soft, and so very warm, and her hot mouth driving out any consideration of why he shouldn't be running his hand up the hem of her skirt.

She went still. A half-inch of distance appeared between their mouths, and she opened her eyes. Hesitation stilled his fingers at the top of her thigh.

"Right," she said, nonsensically, and licked her lips. He could have whined at the unfairness. "Okay. I didn't mean to do that."

He had no idea what to say to that.

He offered: "Which part?"

She laughed a bright, shy little laugh. Then she eased herself upright. Her weight rolled back, and down.

"Fuck," he said.

"I meant the conversation. I didn't mean to have an argument and then snog about it. Although it is, admittedly a lot better than just having an argument," she admitted, with characteristic brilliance and wisdom, "and for preference, really, very strongly in favor of this approach — but it does have costs, vis-a-vis our conclusions—"

"Fuck. Fuck, stop—"

She was still reciting analysis at an anxious speed. "—specifically, that it's rather easy to get carried away. Again, not to complain. Very good and all that. But I don't, I mean I didn't intend to — I mean that I wasn't thinking—"

He seized her hips.

"Granger. Stop moving."

She went still. She looked down, looked at his face, and a blush rose steadily to her cheeks.

“Oh,” she said, in a faraway voice. “You.”

“Right,” he said, nonsensically, to this nonsensical statement. “So.”

“I should — sorry. Sorry. I don’t mean to — make you uncomfortable.”

“I wouldn’t say uncomfortable, precisely,” he said, with diligent focus on the ceiling.

She made a noise somewhere between a trill and a gasp. That absolutely wasn’t helping, and he would have shot her a dirty look for it, if he’d been capable of looking at her.

She still wasn’t moving.

“What… is it like?”

He let out a very loud bark of hysterical laughter.

“You were sent here to kill me, I think,” he said to the ceiling. “Incredible work. My compliments to my enemies, they’ve outdone themselves completely.”

“You’re rather dramatic,” she said, with a blasé and eyewatering hypocrisy. “It’s an honest question. Of pedagogy.”

“What’s it like for you, then?” he shot back. “Of pedagogy.”

She blinked. The mental image that conjured did nothing at all to help him. It in fact made his life several times better and worse, in a complex way, along multiple dimensions.

“Point taken,” she said. The red in her cheeks had suffused down her throat, making a glowing line into the V of her blouse.

She could rule any country she wanted, probably, if everyone could see her like this. He would, unfortunately, have to kill them all, but the reign would be brief and glorious.

“I’m going to move,” she said, “and — sit next to you. Instead. To help with — everything.”

“You might consider leaving the country,” he said. She twitched, and spoke thickly.

“You can’t flirt, either. That’s not fair.”

“That wasn’t even flirting, I was just saying something—”

“Saying things. In that voice. Counts.”

He squinted at her. “It’s my voice.”

“It’s a voice of yours,” she agreed.

He lifted his head, intrigued. “Do you like my voice?”

“In fact, I don’t. No. I find it incredibly distracting.”

“You do.”

“You said something about going to another country,” she said haggardly, clambering off of him. Draco was having such a good time he almost didn’t mind.

“You like it,” he preened. “You find it ‘incredibly distracting.’ Do I often seduce you by accident?”

“This was a mistake,” she said, resigned. “I see that now. I have made, it occurs to me, many mistakes—”

“We’re well past that, dear. Let’s return to the part where you’re seduced.”

“No,” she said primly. “The moment’s passed. I’ve decided to live a life of chastity and contemplation.”

Typical Granger, taking vows to avoid snogging him. He laid back down, dispirited.

She made the world normal. That was partly the reason, he decided, that the details stuck: they were his accounting of the indispensable facts of the universe, the things which were silly and human and true, and which could be relied upon to re-orient him, come the worst. They were a collection of keys cut to evoke a particular kind of happiness. They were his to have, and his only, as long as he lived.

For a moment they laid there, parallel lines on red quilting, no sound but the restless shuffling of the boys’ familiars in their cages. Then Hermione reached between them and found his hand, pried it open somewhat sharply, laced their fingers and placed them together on her knee. She held it loosely, with a dignified sort of presumed authority, but her palms were clammy, and an itch in his fingers made them fidget. One would be forgiven for finding something embarrassing in it. The helpless fatalism of desire. The cruel tyranny of the body, wanting.

Abruptly she said, “You can come home with me,” and then: “When I go, I mean. You can meet my family. We don’t have a spare room, and they absolutely won’t let you share with me, so you’ll have to sleep on the couch. But if you’re alright with that, and driving in a car, and dressing normal and going to Tesco and so forth, you can come and stay.”

She said the words like a rehearsal. They were slowly chosen and carefully pronounced. She said them like a declaration of contract, read drolly and firmly and finally into the record of a court for signature and seal.

It was all really quite romantic.

He tugged on her hand. The scars on it had healed to a stiff, shiny ripple of taut skin. Her pen had left calluses on her third finger and thumb. On impulse, he sat up to kiss her, and she kissed him so fast it rocked his head back. It was instinct, not reason, that made him grip the back of her neck in his hand, run his thumb along her curls. Probably it was instinct that made her grab a handful of his own, although that might have been Hermione, too, with full knowledge and intent, digging in her fingernails so hard it'd leave cuts.

He hoped she would. He hoped the feeling would cut deep and stay there, so he'd remember what it felt like, laying here with her, in the sunlight and the silence. The taut line of something yet to be discovered between them, the moment before something happened — the moment where it was sure to happen, but not yet. One thing left, at least, to run towards in earnest. Past and future strung out like a line, and between them the tightrope walkers, dancing, dancing.

The train would leave soon. There was still a little time.

There was time for quidditch skirmishes in an empty pitch, Katie and Ginny and Harry and Angelina, weaving red ribbons across the iridescent sky; for Fred and George's product showcases, fireworks from the Astronomy Tower, Filch's mournful shrieks, and little vaudeville shows with Peruvian Instant Darkness Powder and Screaming Yo-Yos; for betting games of poker and Snap with the Weasleys, who all cheated so diabolically and brilliantly that the odds were practically fair; there was time to bicker over who used up the hot water and left their socks on the floor. There was time for the Room of Requirement, and sparring bouts against Ron, or Harry, or Ron and Harry, or Ron and Harry and Ginny, or Harry and Ron against Draco and Ginny, or Draco against Ginny and Dean and Seamus and Katie, and permutations; for midnight trips to the kitchens, to let Dobby foist off as many bottles of Ogden's as he could get away from his supervisor, while flaunting Hermione's present of a mateless (she had been busy) hand-knit sock; for them to return, thereafter, to an approving common room full of boys without ties and girls in uniform code violations, and for Seamus to throttle the volume on Music for the Masses until it rattled the casements.

McGonagall had taken a few days to scour Umbridge's office, and discovered there the Ministry exam results for sitting fifth and seventh years. Customarily posted by class rank in the Entrance Hall, to vomit-inducing effect, she instead announced that they would be delivered discreetly, by house-elf, to each recipient's dorm by the next day. "In order," she concluded, "to ameliorate the emotional effects of the scores, which come — it is acknowledged — on the heels of a considerable ordeal."

"Bless her," said Ron, as they went up. "I didn't even take half of them. If I fail, Mum can't say shite, because I did it to fight the fascists."

"What about those of us who expect an 'O'?"

"That's fine, Mione, you just lack my vigor for the cause."

The blow was swift, and left him cackling.

In the common room, the rustle of parchment concealed a buoy of half-glad whispers. It was of no consequence, really, who did well on exams. None of the fifth years would be barred from coming back, and in any case, for the seventh years, it hardly mattered. Fred and George ripped theirs apart without opening them, and gave the pieces to first years to practice fire-setting jinxes.

Some cared, despite the stakes, of course. He had noticed Ernie Macmillan body-check Cedric into a wall in his haste to get back to Hufflepuff. Hermione had picked hers up, tentatively, and held it like a breakable bit of glass.

Draco found an alcove and broke the seal with his wand, bisecting a purple 'M' in wax. At the top of the sheet was printed DRACO MALFOY.

ARITHMANCY (O) - 100/100

ASTRONOMY (O) - 100/100

CHARMS (O) - 100/100

DEFENSE AGAINST THE DARK ARTS (O) - 101/100

HERBOLOGY (O) - 94/100

HISTORY OF MAGIC (O) - 100/100

MUGGLE STUDIES (E) - 82/100

POTIONS (O) - 102/100

TRANSFIGURATION (O) - 100/100

RUNES (O) - 100/100

Wordlessly, he held his parchment to Hermione, who snatched it and shoved him hers. He'd beaten her by one point in Potions and two in Defense, lost out to her in Herbology, Muggle Studies — no shame in that — and Runes, where, inexplicably, she'd picked up a bonus point. Probably she'd gone off on a screed about the Romans and bewitched the examiners with her trademark brilliance and possession of irrelevant facts.

Hermione was trying to dislocate his arm.

"Two bonus points! In Potions!" she exclaimed. "I could kill you! I only got one!"

"That 'E' in Herbology is a joke. I only slipped up once in the practical, and that was because I didn't pot the mandrake in one go — would've hocked the bloody thing like a quaffle if I knew I was being graded on speed—"

“One hundred and two! They don’t give extra points on Potions exams! Most people don’t even finish them!”

“It’s mere recitation,” he said, unwillingly pleased. “The formulas don’t change. Half the answer’s embedded in the question. They don’t ask for a show of genius.”

Hermione waved this off haphazardly, flitting over to check Harry’s and Ron’s. Triumph eddied swiftly from distraction. Neville had flipped his sheet open and had sat down hard in an armchair, his face pale and shiny.

“Longbottom.”

He could not quite strike the tone of indifference he wanted. In truth, he did not know. Neville seemed to him adequate to pass; but the markers in Potions were notoriously demanding, and Neville’s worst enemy was the feeling of being watched.

Neville jumped and twitched the parchment to his chest, which induced a sinking feeling. “Draco,” he said. “Hi. Er.”

ASTRONOMY (A) - 71/100

CARE OF MAGICAL CREATURES (O) - 96/100

CHARMS (E) - 83/100

DEFENSE AGAINST THE DARK ARTS (O) - 90/100

HERBOLOGY (O) - 100/100

HISTORY OF MAGIC (E) - 85/100

POTIONS (E) - 89/100

TRANSFIGURATION (A) - 67/100

“Remarkable,” said Draco, quietly.

Neville choked on air. “I — well, really, it’s not an ‘O,’ or anything—”

He thrust the parchment back at Neville’s chest. A constrictive feeling wrapped around his ribs. “I was referring to myself. All you did was pass an O.W.L. I’m the finest Potions instructor born on English soil. Anyway, you were only off by a point.”

“I don’t know how,” Neville said, as if he really expected better of the Potions examiners. “I didn’t add the powdered starkbulb in time for the Cure for Boils to reach full coloration, and I had to k-kill the heat before it reached full simmer—”

“You passed. Who cares?”

Neville gaped. “Well — sorry, but— you do,” he said tartly. “And Snape requires an ‘O’ for the N.E.W.T. class, so, him.”

“Snape isn’t coming back next year,” he said, ignoring a twinge in his chest, and Neville’s face carefully flattened to polite concern. “I don’t know who’ll replace him, but the standard benchmark for advancement is ‘E." You should speak to McGonagall about it.”

“I’m sure she has other things on her mind, and anyway, I-I-I’m — I’m sorry he’s not coming back.”

This was unlikely. Few students had more reason to celebrate his disappearance than Neville, who would have gladly traded his Potions class for an hour on the rack.

“You don’t have to say so.”

“I am, though,” he replied. “He’s your godfather. You liked him. And he liked you, I think. In his way.”

Draco snorted. In his way. Whatever that meant, for someone whose personality consisted in liking just about nothing at all.

Ginny trotted over, flushed from celebrating Ron and Harry's 'O's in D.A.D.A., and peered over Neville's shoulder. Her eyes became lunar in size.

"Holy shit, Nev. You passed Potions."

"Don't say it s-s-so loudly," said Neville nervously, but Ron had overheard, and his head snapped up.

"He passed it?"

"You're joking!" said Harry, sitting up straight.

"Good job, Neville," exclaimed Hermione, "that's really lovely. After you worked so hard."

"After he worked so hard," said Draco. "Of his own initiative, I suppose—"

"I should think you're proud enough of yourself for both of us!"

"I'm sure they c-curved it," Neville said, raising his voice.

"They don't," said Ron. "Someone would have assassinated Hermione ages ago."

"Honestly," said Hermione mildly, tucking her results into a secure pocket. "I'd like to say not, but I think Ernie might."

The mood of the room had lightened into a taut, tentative sort of relief.

Ginny latched her arm around Neville's shoulder. "Do you know what I want?" she said.

"What?" said Harry.

"Another crack at Auror Robard," said George.

“Seven minutes alone with Michael Corner,” said Fred.

“Visible biceps,” said Ron.

Warmly, Ginny fired her middle fingers in a slow battery around the room. “Fuck you all! When I’m ripped, you’ll still be single. Harry, ask me what I want.”

“I thought those were good guesses,” he said innocently, and she swiveled one middle finger with ease from Ron to Harry.

Draco would be loath to disclose it, but even among Weasleys, one had favorites.

Ginny wanted a party.

It was one of those bejeweled June afternoons where sunlight dripped like liquid gold over the green labyrinth of the forest, which enclosed like an emerald-studded circlet the clean, flat mirror of the lake. Flowers foamed promiscuously from the ferns and the grasses and the rushes on the lakeside, heather and Scotch thistle, iris and crocus, butterfly orchids like knotted stripes of white silk, butter-yellow buttons of celandine and primrose, tyrian foxgloves like royal spears. An orchestra of swallows decorated the afternoon with their piping. The tawny pelt of the hills shone and rippled under the twin waves of sun and wind.

Fred and George smuggled teapots full of Pimm’s from the kitchens, and splashed it in porcelain teacups between plates of lemon tarts and fruit galettes. Luna and Neville went blackberry-picking in the forest and came back, grinning and thorn-scratched, with four whole bucketsful; Hermione charmed the ice cream to stay cool. At the end, the kitchen envoys unveiled from beneath a large silver cloche a two-tier chiffon cake with strawberries and turrets of buttercream frosting, which said ‘HAPPY BIRTHDAY’ in crooked red piping. It was walked in a grand redheaded procession three times around the willow tree where they picnicked, and ultimately delivered with much pomp and circumstance, to Draco, whereon he was shouted at until he consented to put out the candles — a compromise he secured by flicking his wand at them and casting a Wind Spell.

It was a sign of the times that it startled Draco to see it. He had almost forgotten: it was June. He was sixteen.

Harry gave him a pack of sweets from Honeydukes, and Ron hocked him a puck of broomstick polish, to “keep you from griping about me using yours up, pissant.” Daphne presented him with a silk handkerchief whose embroidery was only slightly wobbly, and crowded him impatiently until he complimented it. Neville admitted, under some duress, to making the cake.

“Thank you,” said Draco, and George made a show of pretending to faint. Draco ignored him. It failed to spoil the moment, which was otherwise quite adequate, being fully concentrated on celebrating him.

When the Weasleys began singing, however, Hermione had to stop him from absconding up the tree.

It was a good day. The sun was full in the leaves. There were children on the shoreline. In the distance, there were Order members with their hands on their wands, watching the horizon, which was good, because it meant he didn’t have to do it. Seamus and Lee huddled together in the effort of reconciling an unavoidably muggle CD player with immutably magical amplifiers. He looked around at their faces, under the dappled shade of the willow — Ron tussling with Ginny over seconds; Neville laughing at something Luna was reading from his palms; Lavender braiding Daphne’s hair; Harry, spread on the blanket with his hands laced behind his head, his eyes closed, the sunlight washing out the faded white forks of his scar.

The scene should have left him content. It sent nausea rearing up his throat. War — the likelihood of death, the certainty of suffering. The number of them. Statistically poor odds. Impossible that anything should ever happen to them, these people, who had done nothing wrong really, who had been kind and he had not been — not always — and they were here, even so, all the same; impossible also that he could stop anything from happening to them. There was time left — yes, time — but not much.

When he was younger, it had been so easy to write off everything and everyone that did not belong to him. He tried to imagine the way that had felt, that shell of ice, and failed.

“Alright, Draco?” Harry slitted one eye open.

“It’s nothing.” The dissonance passed. The present stubbornly edged out the future: heat, grass, dew, breeze. “It was good of you to remember.”

Harry’s lip twitched. “You don’t have to say thank you for that,” he quipped. “Have some self-respect.”

It twigged Draco’s memory, and he narrowed his eyes at him.

“You are an ass, you know.”

“I don’t know why more people don’t notice,” said Harry, snuggling deeper into the blanket. “Look at who I hang out with.”

Seamus’s yelp of success prefigured a splutter of the Ramones through a gutter of washed-out static. No sooner had the pair of them rushed to get their share of cake than Bill wandered over from the Order patrol and switched it out for Springsteen, which he called a diplomatic concession to Moody, to avoid a noise citation; but Draco rather suspected he just liked it more. Ginny threw off her robe and raced down the shoreline wearing only code-breaching shorts and a shirt for a band called Elastica, sleeves shorn, baring her freckled arms to the sun.

Her brothers took off in chase, a pack of tall fire-haired teenagers racing fast and gangly and golden through the afternoon sunlight, and collided in the water with splashes that glazed the water white where it rose in the sun. Behind them the darkest head made quick work of scrambling down and jumped after them, whipping off his glasses and robe on the beach, staggering in with his trousers rolled up. Daphne stood primly on the beach, and after repeated exhortations, relented to delicately remove her socks and shoes, fold her jumper on the rocks, and tiptoe into four inches of water. Something there must have touched her foot, because she screamed and leapt like a frightened cat onto the nearest freestanding object, which happened to be Ron. She refused to relinquish her grip on his neck, despite being plied with assurances, and a compromise was reached wherein she changed position and rode around on his back, directing him judiciously and often where she wanted to go.

Draco and Hermione ambled down in their wake, picking their way leisurely over the moss-strewn pebble beaches, and sat cross-legged on a round flat stone that protruded over the water. The lake stretched out from his ankles to the distant hills, a massive plane of glass-bright water, scintillating.

Hermione fidgeted with her fingers. “I have a present for you,” she said, by and by. She unearthed from her robes a small package neatly wrapped in brown parchment-paper. “Sorry it isn’t pretty. I didn’t have time to get any tape or ribbons, and Moody wouldn’t let me go to Hogsmeade for it.”

“Some people have no sense of priorities.”

She sniffed. “It would have been fine,” she said, “but I digress. Go on, open it. It isn’t very nice, just so you know, it’s a small thing. I would have gotten you a proper present, but I couldn’t get to the shops, and anyway I can’t get my pounds exchanged at Gringotts anymore, so it had to be something I could do in the castle and there wasn’t any time and you’re horrible to shop for, truly, because there’s hardly anything you can’t buy for yourself. So it’s your fault if you don’t like it.”

“Would you like me to sign a waiver?”

“No. Fine! Just open it. Don’t be disappointed.” Her fingers laced and clutched, a nucleus of tension in her lap.

He counterspelled the Sticking Charm, and the package unfolded elegantly in his lap. Inside lay a framed photograph, of the wizarding type, colored and strained through the bleary soft grain of film. The photographer — Colin, it must have been — had shot them candidly in the Room of Requirement. Harry and Ron were standing on the dais, talking to Ginny; Ron had his arm slung around Harry’s shoulder, casually, and they were laughing. Fred and George lounged on the steps, as was Neville. Hermione sat on the steps, slightly apart from the rest; she was the only one who had noticed Colin, because she was glancing at the camera, and every so often the image of her would give a halting, nervous smile, or tuck her hair behind her ear.

It was a moment Draco did not remember, but must have participated in, because he was in it, too: almost hidden by the pillar at Hermione’s elbow, the image of him leaned on one hip, his wand twirling through his fingers, giving the camera an occasional nonplussed glance. It was strange to see his own face in motion. The boy in the picture was a tall, cold, impassive creature, a thing apart from the rest. A lurking presence in the corner. A shadow on the wall.

Hermione had filed a caption neatly on the bottom, in her own hand: POTTER’S ARMY. 03.17.1996.

“He didn’t want us to call it that,” he said, eventually.

“Harry wants to make a lot of decisions that aren’t up to him,” she said. “He’ll cope.”

Her voice revealed little. He thought of Cho Chang, and of Hermione’s conciliatory politeness around Harry, and a bitter, tangled history of things that they had all said to each other. The ties that bound were not always clean.

“This is very good,” he said, and her shoulders drooped in relief. “Thank you. How did you get it?”

“I helped Colin rig a darkroom in the spare Potions classroom. He’s actually rather good at chemistry. I told him he should try to O.W.L. in Potions next year.”

He snorted, tucking the photograph safely aside with his robes. “Dumbledore’s declared against the Ministry. There aren’t going to be O.W.L.s next year.”

She pursed her lips and looked down at her hands, which plucked at a loose thread on her skirt. “For class, then. McGonagall said they’re still going to operate as a school.”

“With what staff? Snape’s gone, Umbridge is gone, I’ll be shocked if Dumbledore even has the time—”

“Moody’s coming on again, as Defense professor,” she said, which was a pleasant surprise. “They’ll find someone for Potions. Snape wasn’t the only qualified wizard in the country.”

“I reserve my judgment.”

She huffed in amusement. “Have you heard from him?” she said, with a furtive glance. “Or your mother?”

He shook his head.

“Oh. Draco—”

“They’re fine. Owls are likely being watched. My mother will see me tomorrow, anyway.”

His stomach did an unpleasant thing at the prospect. It warred with his heart, which wanted to see her enough to walk to London, if he had to. The experience was strange, and impossible to recommend.

“I don’t suppose you could send a message,” she said reflectively. “To Snape, I mean. If he’s undercover.”

“I don’t know any Death Eaters.”

She hummed. “You know their children. And Theodore owes you.”

“I've done him no favors on purpose.”

“No, but Cassius Warrington is probably alive,” she said matter-of-factly, picking a reed from her skirt. “The memory cascade doesn’t kill you. It destroys organized long-term recall. I don’t know how Theodore plans to deal with that, but short of killing him, it’ll have to be drastic, and probably noticeable. It might even have been related to whatever he was doing in Myrtle’s bathroom,” she added, with a sharp twinge of interest. “I wonder if he was asking her about the effects of a Memory Charm. If her memory had been modified, it would explain why she can’t remember how she died.”

“It would take diabolically complicated magic to perform a Memory Charm on a ghost. I’m not even certain it’s possible. They don’t have ‘minds,’ as such.”

“I know,” she said, in frustration, “I know. It’s not a good theory. But I don’t have anything else.”

“Nor do I,” he said freely, “but I can think of better things to lose sleep over.”

She frowned and shook her head. Then she leaned over and kissed him on the mouth — catching him by surprise, too quick for the red-iron awareness of being in public to forge any resistance — and pressed there with a forceful sweetness, as if she were making a point about it, her ability to do it, her authority.

“Happy birthday, Draco,” she said. Once he had recovered from the freeze of it, he laughed slightly.

“You should’ve done that last year,” he said, mostly against her mouth. “Spared us both some trouble.”

“As if you would’ve let me,” she laughed. “You think holding hands in public is for libertines.”

“And it took you two months to kiss me without running away. If we’re debating who was more of an impediment—”

“At least I did kiss you. If it were up to you, we’d be prevaricating on hand-holding.”

“I deserve more credit than that. By some interpretations of the rules, I’ve already stolen your honor, and your father is allowed to duel me on sight. He’ll have to give you a fearsome dowry to make up for what I’m doing.”

Hermione laughed again, brightly, loudly, almost ungainly, like a bird battering the air with its wings before flight. She patted his shoulder and confiscated it as a cushion, as was her right. “Sometimes I can’t believe you say things like that,” she said, “and then I remember in a year you’re going to be a lord. What a silly world.”

He had not forgotten it, precisely, but the reminder slapped him like cold air after a long time underwater. On his seventeenth birthday, he would be Lord Malfoy, in the formal sense. The entail would descend on his shoulders. He would have command of the Malfoy estates. It was, ostensibly, the position for which he had been born. It was the reason he existed, in a not-insubstantial way.

His fingers found his ring, rolling it around the groove over his knuckle. A black garnet, the emblem of a double-headed snake. The band was stone; the Malfoys weren’t as showy as the Blacks, whose goblin-silver ring nearly swallowed his mother’s hand. He could always have it reset, he supposed, but he had grown rather accustomed to its weight.

Out in the waters, Ginny used her wand to slap a wave over Harry's head, then led him on a merry chase through the shallows that left both of them soaking. Amends were made, somehow, in a game that involved her sitting on Harry's shoulders, and wrestling with Luna on Fred's. Ginny's natural athleticism and hard elbows prevailed: Luna went sailing with a scream of laughter. Then George plucked Ginny off Harry's shoulders and hurled her into the lake like a discus, kicking off a turbulent Weasley civil war.

In the aftermath, Harry came paddling up to the rock where Draco and Hermione sat, and they each took one of his arms to help haul him up. He flopped on the stone, breathing heavily, his face cracked open in a rare giddy grin.

"I could fall asleep here," he said. One arm drifted up vaguely, his finger sketching an invisible shape against the sky. "Just like this."

"It'll be like this all the time, when the castle's empty," said Hermione. "You'll have it to yourself."

"Yeah, but you won't be there."

She hesitated, glancing at Draco. "No," she said, "but we'll be back before you really miss us."

"No, you won't," he said, staring up and not at her. "No one ever is."

Ron slipped like a dart through the water and emerged beside them, slicking back the burnt-umber strands of hair from his eyes. He lifted himself effortlessly onto the rock and dropped down beside them, splattering droplets.

"I won," he said triumphantly, "if anyone cares. Harry, thanks for totally bitching out, mate, left me one on three against Fred and the girls."

Harry laughed, closing his eyes.

The sun burned in its cradle of the western hills. A smoky purple rose on the trees, the first hint to the eye that the afternoon could end, though the rest of the sky remained an immortal blue. The slap and chatter of water on the lake quashed the song of birds and the rustle of wind that moved, like stirring cymbals, through the old trees. The castle above them had grown a trail that fell long behind it over the forest, a cloak of rippling black, shadow proliferating upon shadow.

“I’ll miss this,” said Harry. He did not say what he meant.

“It's a touch cold,” said Draco.

“It's a touch cold,” imitated Ron. “I'll give you my jacket, you nancy.”

“You really oughtn’t swim in still water too often,” said Hermione, professorial, and Harry sighed.

Hermione rested against Draco's arm, and the other two lay glittering as they dried from the lake, their blood high and clothes translucent in the searing eye of the aging sun. Shadows dug deep rivets on the earth, beneath the trees, beneath his own hands. Seconds of his life rolled out in a rout march under the murmur of wind and water. There were children dancing in the lake before them, their bodies young and strong and shining.

-That’s it! That’s the end of Lionheart! Thanks for reading, please like and rev— [sharpshooter nails me through the head]

-Just kidding. Wouldn't that be horrendous?

-In OOTP, Dumbledore really is that tuxedo mask "my work here is done" meme. I get that he's ignoring Harry for Plot Reasons, or possibly Character Reasons depending on your read, but it really is funny that he takes off in the middle of the book and then comes back at the end to have like a 30-second zoolander staredown with Riddle at the tail end of a huge battle that he's shown up late to. this is not criticism. I love this extra old man.

-Another 15k chapter, because I have no self-control, and also because the last few chapters were A Lot to deal with and it's time for some excess in a warmer direction.

-Everyone who commented or sent mail to my inbox on tumblr, you are a miracle, and this chapter is dedicated to you. Seriously. If you're a repeat commenter in particular, I recognize your handle, and I am always so specifically and genuinely glad to see you. I appreciate it. Bonus extra shoutouts to cervidame and bluebellandpie, who are writing beautiful fics that make me tear up and want to lie down in anguish (affectionate).

-The next chapter will be up on a vaguely fortnight-y basis, and it'll be called “Heroes.”

Heroes

Chapter 79: Heroes

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

By nine o'clock on the day of the train, Gryffindor boomed with the traffic of students packing far too late: hollering for socks, bellowing about lost Sneakoscopes, first years pleading for Cramming Charms from fifth years far too busy squirreling away their contraband to notice. Draco lifted a pack of cigarettes from Seamus, some suspicious-looking turquoise plant from Katie, and delivered both in an anonymized box with the rest of Fred and George’s liquor to McGonagall, who greeted them with a surprising lack of astringence.

Her office was a round stone room walled in glass bookcases, carpeted with a thick layer of Turkish brocade, with leather armchairs of rich red leather so old there were sun-bleached stripes in the same pattern as the windowpanes. It smelled of old things, must and books and dust and sweetness, and the earthy tang of tea from the pot on her desk. McGonagall was packing a set of fifth-year Defense textbooks into a box. Its kin lay in stacks along one wall.

“What’s going to happen to her? Umbridge.”

McGonagall’s glasses glinted as she turned her head. “She will await justice until such a time as Professor Dumbledore feels prepared to give it to her.”

“How long will that be?”

“Until Albus feels like it. So it will behoove Dolores to delve deep in her stores of patience. In the meantime, she will not suffer for want of food and water; of course, she may not find the decor of the dungeons to her liking, but lacking a wand, I suspect there is little she can do about it.”

To hear the castle dungeons being used as actual dungeons reminded him that the castle was, in fact, a castle: a fortification. Built for warfare.

“What if someone comes looking for her?” he said, though the idea of her rotting in a cell under the earth did not fail to suit.

“For Dolores Umbridge?” Her mouth twisted. “For all the allies she purported — for her Ministry contacts, her important connections, the friends she so liked to tout — I doubt anyone will notice she is gone. You may leave that here.”

He placed the box of contraband on her desk. McGonagall surveyed it with a strange, unguarded expression.

“This belongs to the Weasleys,” she said.

“Not all of them. I’m sure Ginevra has her own supply.”

She nodded. After a moment, she pushed the box away and balanced her fingertips on the desk.

“The twins have submitted to join the Order of the Phoenix,” she said. “Moody intends to accept them. Their parents have not been able to dissuade them from joining.”

“It would be somewhat hypocritical if they did.”

“I understand that.” When she dipped her head, her horn-rimmed glasses sat low on her nose. The wrinkles around her eyes seemed to sink deeper into her face, and he perceived for a moment that behind the screen of raw indomitable authority, McGonagall was not a large woman. He was taller than she was, and twice as broad.

It was a terrible thing, to see great creatures made small. It ought never happen. It filled him with a volatile, unsettled sort of grief.

She still had not spoken. He said, “Professor?”

“Four years ago,” she said, “Fred and George Weasley celebrated their thirteenth birthday by turning the third-floor corridor into a swamp.” She added, with a thin, alarming note of approval: “It was a remarkable piece of Transfiguration.”

He waited for elaboration. She did not seem to expect him to reply.

A watery echo from third year: It’s tall for you. Choke up.

“Potter still uses your broomstick,” he said. “The Nimbus. It’s the sole possession he hasn’t damaged.”

She sniffed and pushed her glasses up her nose with a delicate adjustment of thumb and fourth finger. “It’s an excellent model,” she said. “His father preferred a Comet. His seeker, Marlene McKinnon, preferred the Nimbus Six. Florian and Gideon Prewett had mint-condition Starsweep Tens.”

McGonagall lifted her head. Her expression cleared. “Have a good summer, Mr. Malfoy,” she said.

Clouds feathered a sky of perfect blue. The highlands shone red and purple and green, slit through with the silver ribbon of a river. Those going on the train would depart in the afternoon, but the goodbyes started early, as some students were leaving by portkey in Hogsmeade and going directly to their family homes. Most were purebloods; many, but not all, were from Slytherin. It was lost on few that not everyone would be coming back, and not everyone knew who they were, so every goodbye took on an apocalyptic aspect.

Neville set off in the next wave, a knapsack tucked over his right shoulder, Trevor perched on his left. “I’ll be back in August,” he assured Harry, “don’t worry, won’t hardly seem like a minute. Gran is c-coming to join the Order. Says she’s taking her scalping knife out of the attic.”

Harry winced.

“No, she’s glad,” hurried Neville. “I mean, not glad, but — she’s really good with it. She was so p-pleased I passed Potions she offered to give it to me, but I couldn’t take it, really.”

“We’ll get you your own,” Ron agreed, slapping him on the back. “Safe travels, Nev.”

“Thanks. See you, Harry — see you, Draco! I’ll be practicing!”

“You’d better,” Draco called. “If you fail next year, I’m telling Frobisher to use that toad for target practice.”

“Ha, ha! Nice one, Draco. Okay! Bye!”

He waved furiously, walking backwards down the trail. The wind ruffled his hair, and his rucked-up sleeves showed a bevy of stains, but his crooked teeth winked cheerfully from his freckled face. Then he spun on his heel, and striding at a brisk clip, he caught up to the other students trailing down to Hogsmeade.

“It’s no fun to threaten him anymore.”

“I’m sorry,” said Daphne consolingly. “There’ll be plenty of nice people to threaten next year.”

“Yes, but it won’t be the same as it was, with Longbottom.”

Luna came not long after, wearing a yellow blouson, ornamented with moths that flapped their wings when she twirled. She carried a trunk larger than she was, and stood on tiptoe to kiss Hermione on the cheek, at which Hermione made an expression like one getting one’s face licked by a small dog.

“Thank you for teaching me the Patronus,” she said, clasping Harry’s hand. “Daddy heard what happened, and he’s ever so pleased. Let me know if you ever want an interview in the Quibbler.”

“I’m pretty much done with print media, I think, Luna.”

“You’re very right to be! Daddy’s been trying to invent publication by astral projection for years. Now there’s going to be a war, he thinks it’s really important for us to communicate without leaving traces.”

Harry cracked a smile. “Let me know when he figures it out.”

“I won’t have to! That’s the point, Harry.”

“Oh, God, right. Sorry, my mistake.”

Luna kissed his cheek, too, and Ron’s, though it made her stretch on her tiptoes. To Draco, she dipped a curtsy. Then she sailed down the path like a kite, with the gliding gait of one intending to fly home.

The Slytherins came up last, when the crowds had thinned. Pansy and Astoria came last, long after Blaise had sauntered down the path with Tracey Davis, and Millicent Bulstrode had sneered past on the arm of Vince Crabbe.

Pansy carried a leatherbound case. She wore fitted cigarette trousers and a black lambskin jacket whose shine and texture suggested eyewatering expense. Her finger sparkled from her engagement ring.

Astoria wore an argyle skirt, and her pale hair was plaited, and she set her jaw like she had stopped in at the abattoir on her way from finishing school. They were holding hands like they were the first two children to think up friendship. Harry and Ron shifted to let them pass into the entrance courtyard.

“Hello, Pans,” said Daphne, very quietly. “Hi, Tori.”

“You’re still going to marry him, then,” said Hermione.

Pansy’s reply lagged a beat while she looked at Daphne, but gamely, she flipped her hair and smiled like a double-shot of Dreamless. “At speed, too. What can I say? I liked the way ‘war bride’ rolled off the tongue. Why wait, after all, when you’re deliriously in love?”

“You’re fifteen,” said Hermione incredulously. “He’s barely nineteen, for that matter, but you—”

“Yes. I’m fifteen. And in Britain, where I have to assume you live, the age of marriage is sixteen. Which I will be in November. Hence.”

“Will Theodore be attending your festivities?” interrupted Draco, partly of curiosity as to the boy's whereabouts, and partly to stop Pansy from hammering on Hermione's visibly fraying patience.

“One hopes. He’s the best man.”

“Oh, Pansy,” said Daphne. “I’m so sorry.”

Pansy twitched. After a moment, she said: “It’s nothing, really. Would have happened anyway. Don’t pity me.”

“I don’t. I don’t pity you, darling, I worry for you, but—”

“Worry is pity with a hat on!”

“It’s not! It’s sad with a hat on, Pansy, I don’t like what you’re doing to yourself, I don’t like what Theo’s making you do—”

“Theo doesn’t make me do anything,” Pansy snapped, dropping Astoria’s hand. “Please. You used to know me better than that.”

That was a hit below the belt, scored and salted. Daphne flinched like she felt it, too, and lifted her hands to ward it off. The crowd through the doors had bottlenecked, the burble in the courtyard quelling under the hot sun.

Astoria intercepted, calmly, by laying her hand on Pansy’s arm.

“The new transfusions are working,” she said. She gripped the side of her chair, white-knuckled, and in her face was the razor intensity of someone flying a broomstick, or playing a game of chess with half the pieces. It was the zealous focus of someone making a wild play on a thin margin, going all-in on a hand of junk. “I don’t sleep as much as I used to. I'm stronger. It turns out — now the doctors have it handled — I don't need you."

"Good for you," said Daphne, clipped. "I hope they feed you more."

"I'm eating plenty."

"You're a paperclip."

"Mum says I haven't come into my figure."

"Well, I had more figure than that, at twelve."

Astoria pressed the heels of her hands into her eyes. "Oh, my God," she said, angry and wondrous. "You're such a — sorry, Pans. You're such a bitch, Daph."

"At least I'm a natural. You became a bitch because Millicent Bulstrode told you to, which is frankly just embarrassing," Daphne said coldly.

"Millie was nice to me!"

"Nice! She called me a half-breed, but all water under the bridgetroll; she's nice to Tori, which is really the final measure of anyone's soul."

"I told her to stop," Astoria said doggedly. A lacrimal glistening had painted her eyes. "I did. Why don't you believe me?"

"Merlin, you still can't lie without crying," Daphne scoffed. "Your tricks don't work on me, idiot, I taught you half of them."

Astoria sniffed. The glistening faded, and she straightened in her chair.

"I did tell them, though," she said plainly. "Millie said Odin Davis was going to hunt you down with the rest of your herd, and I told her if she said it again I'd do to her what she did to my sister's cat."

Daphne froze on the verge of a retort, her mouth a perfect round.

“I could have done it, too,” she said smugly. In the empty entrance courtyard, her boast skittered in echoes on the marble, stirring dust. “I’ve been practicing jinxes. I’m really good. And I’m getting clever with them. Mummy says I’m going to be the best in my year at Charms, like she was.”

“Mummy didn’t even N.E.W.T. in Charms,” said Daphne wearily. “She only says that to impress people. Darling, what do you want me to say? Threatening them won’t change their minds.”

“They aren’t the point. I am. I don’t need your blood anymore.”

“I know, thank you,” she snapped, “you said it already, you don’t need me for anything, you can lark off without me and never turn back — what do you want, my permission? Take it. Go flirt and drink and go to parties. Go be the only Greengrass girl that matters, Tori, it’s what you always wanted.”

“I don’t want to be the only Greengrass girl,” cried Astoria. She gripped the sides of her chair like the arms of a throne she had fought two wars for. “You said you loved me. Prove it. Come home.”

It was a truth behind a lie behind a truth. Exquisitely cruel; compellingly simple. He suspected there were more layers to it than that, even, things Daphne never told anyone about, and Pansy must have glimpsed some of them, because she was the first one brave enough to speak.

“Teddy found a healer,” Pansy said quietly. “Someone who says he can work with you. Orpheus wants to try it.”

“Try what?” snapped Ron. “Parenting?”

“Is the doctor reputable?” said Hermione, brow furrowed.

“Of course he’s not,” snapped Daphne. Her composure was a friendly memory. The set of her face was all panic, and the clench of her fists was a failing countermand. “There aren’t any. I’m sure Theo believes it, but Theo believes in grumpkins and snarks. I used to think you were equal parts victim and martyr where he was concerned, but now I think you might be merely gullible. He isn’t going to fix it, Pans. He threw in with Odin Davis and thought it wouldn’t matter I was infected; then he tried to estrange me, and when that didn’t work he tried to hide me—”

“Come home,” said Pansy, dreadfully. “He loves you. I love you. Come home—”

“Stop saying that!”

Her voice was high and ugly, and it made several people step back from her. No sooner did it leave her mouth than Daphne snapped it closed, cringing in self-contempt. Draco remembered that feeling clearly — of wanting to rip words out of the still-trembling air. “Don’t say it. Not when you know full well it doesn’t matter,” she said. “What did he tell you? That I would come back, and everything would be as it was, and he would protect us from the grumpkins and the snarks? Did he tell you all of us could be together again? Did he tell you he could cure me? Theodore lies.”

“He still talks about you,” said Astoria. “We all do. When we have your favorite pudding, or Teddy hears your favorite song. He asks me to play it for him on the piano, sometimes, when it’s raining.”

“You’re useless at piano,” Daphne said tightly, “so that’s his loss.”

“I learned,” she said. “I learned lots of things, while you were away. Like the Levitation Spell. And how to talk to mermaids. I’m very grown-up now, you see. Everybody says so.”

“Do they, now.” Daphne shot an angry look at Pansy, which made the other girl turn her face away in guilt. Astoria reached out, calmly, and touched Daphne on the cheek: the scarred side. Second blow.

“Come home,” she said, with the awkward coaxing of someone to whom nothing had ever come easily. “Now I’m a grown-up, I understand everything, and we can be friends for real.”

Observing the patent manipulation would not have helped; it would have been an insult to pretend Daphne had not noticed. It did not matter. The manipulation might have been what touched her most, in fact: that she could be the treasured object of such an arrant, vicious snare. Draco saw which way the wind had turned from the sink of Daphne’s shoulders, and the curl of her fingers over Astoria’s.

And the pureblood girls who never learn.

“It won’t be safe for you,” Hermione said flatly. “Living with them. If things get worse for you, medically—” She chose her words carefully, in light of their surroundings. “It’ll be very dangerous. Staying at Hogwarts—”

Daphne turned around. Her expression made Hermione break off, which was no small thing to do.

Pansy had begun to glow. “Daphne,” she said, “if you make me ask again, and say no—”

“I will. So don’t ask,” Daphne interrupted coldly. She rose to her feet. With unhappy dignity, she kissed Astoria on the forehead. “I’m not coming for you.”

“But you—”

“We’re not going to be friends again. And I don’t want anything to do with your little movement, either.”

“You won’t. I won’t let you.”

“I think it’s utterly hateful, what you and Teddy are doing,” she snapped. “You ran around all year for that awful woman. And if that was all you were doing, it’d be enough. She made little children bleed and you didn't say a word. What happened to you? I thought you couldn't stand unfairness, Pansy, I thought you were going to break all the rules, and — never mind. It doesn't matter. I won't have anything to do with it. I want your promise—"

"I promise."

"I'm not finished. I want your promise on Teddy's life that Astoria won't have anything to do with it," she said curtly. "Nothing. You leave her alone. No meetings, no youth clubs, no paramours. No more very grown up. You stop bringing her around Millicent and Tracey and all of those girls. None of them get to see her. And I don't want to see Teddy, either," she added curtly. "If you want to see us, you come to Meadowridge, and you come alone."

"I promise," Pansy said.

"Do you understand?" Daphne stepped up to her, and imposed on her a striking height difference. "I can't stand to watch you befoul yourself," she said bitterly. "You're friends with foul, grimy people, you've let them put their grimy fingers on my sister. I can't help you. I gave up helping Teddy long ago. But bring any more of it near her, I swear to you, I'll tear you apart."

Pansy set her jaw and nodded. Astoria, apparently dazed by her success, seemed far less credulous of the threat; she stared up at Daphne as if a corona had grown behind her head.

Daphne, however, did not see it, as she had turned to Harry.

"Hermione's right," he said. "I don't mind if you leave, but you shouldn't let them… this is really scummy. What they're doing."

Daphne smiled sadly.

Ron cleared his throat, and her smile disappeared. She took an anxious half-step away from Astoria, her hands spasming and flattening against her skirt. “Ronald,” she said. “You — you have a sister.”

“Yeah, I do.” His eyes flitted to Astoria, over her shoulder, and tightened. “She wouldn’t ask me to do this, though.”

Daphne gave a hard exhale and smiled again. “Lucky you,” she said. “Lucky her! You both have my undying envy and respect. Please tell her not to burn effigies of me in the common room, the smoke irritates Lavender’s pores.”

“She’s not gonna be mad at you,” Ron said. “Disappointed, maybe. No one's gonna be mad.”

“Oh, don’t be nice to me,” she said bitterly. “You don’t have to be nice anymore. I know everything they’ll say about me. ‘Daphne Greengrass had her vacation, and then she ran home, just like the rest of them.’ I know it all.”

Hermione, who was tapping her foot with the textbook rhythm of a held tongue, might have. But when she caught Draco’s eye in her periphery she folded her arms and shook her head in a way imperceptible to anyone else. It was less tact than tactical surrender: it was not her circus.

“Nah.” Ron slipped his hands in his pockets, shifting his not-inconsiderable weight. He was one of the biggest boys in the crowd: almost six feet of Weasley, barn-broad, dark-red fringe sideswept over his intent eyes. “Won’t.”

She twisted her fingers to the point of obvious pain. She stepped away from Astoria and Pansy, who followed her with her eyes.

“She needs me,” she said. “Nobody ever needed me, really except her. And nobody ever will.” She gave a bitter laugh. “And I d-don’t have anywhere else to go.”

There was a pause.

“Right, yeah, except for the great fancy castle where all your friends are,” said Ron. “Wouldn’t want to be too predictable, you.”

Daphne choked, once, and then swallowed her tears.

“You’re so nice to me,” she said. “It’s not fair. You were already tall! Why did you have to be such a nice boy?”

Whatever reply Ron would have made to that was erased from history by Pansy, who cleared her throat with a deafening trumpet.

“I am sorry to cut this maudlin dialogue short,” she said, “but we have a portkey to catch, and if we miss it, I have to sit through six dreadful hours on a train. If any of you have parting sniffles for me, I will accept them by post.”

The look Daphne gave her was anger cut with naked relief. The look Ron gave her was the same, without relief, and reserved in many cases for insects.

But when Pansy reached for Daphne’s hand, she gave it to her. And when she stumbled alongside Astoria’s chair, it was the only time Draco had seen Daphne move without grace.

They stared at each other, although in her case it was refracted through her watery eyes, and she was moving too quickly for it to hold for long.

Pansy wheeled them with fugitive speed down the path to Hogsmeade, and didn’t look back. Daphne did, of course, her whole shoulders twisted to the point of pain while her body was navigated assiduously along by the girls on either side of her.

When they were out of earshot Ron swore, quietly, and kicked the flagstones.

“Do you think that’s the last time we’ll see them?” said Harry, with a dull curiosity that raised Draco’s hairs. “Any of them. Not just Daphne.”

“Daphne will come back,” said Hermione, with a strange certainty. “She wants to save her sister. Either she will, or she won’t, and I think she has just enough self-preservation not to let that stop her from saving herself.”

Draco made a noncommittal noise, though somewhat reassured; Hermione’s belief on any given subject was as good as scientific evidence.

“Do you think she can?” said Harry. “Save her.”

“I wouldn’t have said so,” she said, “but then — Daphne often surprises me.”

The bell tolled eleven. A rasping shuffle of footsteps laved over the old stones, and the whispers diminished as more and more hurried downstairs to catch their portkeys.

Hermione cradled her elbows and blew out a long breath. “I think Draco and I should head to the train,” she said. “Walk us down?”

“No, thanks,” said Harry. His tone flinted. “Cedric’s portkey’s at noon, I promised I’d wait for him. You go on ahead.”

Hermione gave him an odd look. Harry shrugged, fidgeting with his hands in his pockets. She opened her arms, cautiously, and he cracked a little; he stepped forcefully into them, and hugged her tightly, while she put her nose down and tried furiously not to look verklempt.

“You’re sure you won’t come to the station?” she said thickly.

“I’ll see you before you know it. Don’t worry.”

“Don’t tell me what to do.”

Harry smiled into her shoulder, brittle, and withdrew. “Get yourself some other hobbies,” he said, not in bad humor. “Watch the telly. Go hang out in London. Take your boyfriend to the movies or something.”

Hermione colored and did a terrible job of not looking at Draco. “Harry,” she said curtly, as if her possession of a boyfriend was a national secret. “That’s really none of — I don’t know what you’re — I’m not going to respond to that.”

Draco interceded, noting the sudden interest Ron had taken in the flagstones. “Check your corners, Potter.”

“Watch each other’s backs,” said Harry, and shook Draco’s extended hand with a dignified solemnity. Then he hugged him, painfully, because it was still Harry.

“Well, I’ll go,” Ron said, somewhat pointedly. “Won’t see you tossers for three months, and a chat won’t kill me. Walk you down, c’mon.”

Steam from the engine twined over the singled roofs of Hogsmeade and lay in film over the hills, which receded flat and dim under a purpled thatch of midsummer clouds. Trolleys rattled over the stones, and shouts broke out as the departing reached down from their windows with grasping fingers to touch their friends for what might be the last time. Tonks trotted down the platform, counting heads, her magenta duster flapping behind in a batlike train.

Ron walked them to the prefects’ compartment, and stood awkwardly at the step.

“Say hi to Herb and Denise,” he said gruffly. “Draco, remember to change your gold out, the muggles use paper notes.”

The train screeched. A fresh skirt of steam unfurled from the undercarriage. Hermione flinched, and with a groan of worry, she launched into Ron’s arms.

“Don't be an idiot,” she said, muffled.

Ron lifted her off her toes, rocking back on his heels. He screwed his eyes shut so tightly it pursed his whole face. Then he opened them and settled her down, carefully, like a delicate object he was liable to damage. He shoved his hands in his pockets.

Draco extended his hand. Ron hauled him in to slap his shoulder.

“Write,” he said. “Train. Stick together. Not that you two have any trouble with that, but. In case you need reminding.”

The glance he traded with Draco was unsettled in two directions. The whistle blasted again, and Draco stepped up onto the carriage. Hermione took his offered hand and climbed in after him. Ron stepped back as steam poured in earnest from the tracks.

“Hermione?”

She stopped on the stairs. Draco stilled with one hand on the carriage door.

Ron hesitated. “I love you,” he said, like he was afraid of it. “You know that, right? You know I was for real, even when I was a prick about it. It wasn’t a competition thing, or a shiny-toy thing, or a last-resort thing. It was you. For the right reasons, and not because of anyone else.”

Draco turned sharply, but Hermione touched his arm.

“I know,” she said bravely. “Thank you for saying that. I — I do love —”

“Don’t say it,” he said with a wince. “Sorry. Just don’t… say it, for a while, okay? Not until I mean it the way you mean it.”

Her lips pressed together. “Okay,” she said in a small voice. “I won’t. But I hope you get everything you want. And I really think you will, you know. You’re terribly easy to love.”

Ron’s mouth crooked. “Always, you two, with the dramatics,” he said. “You’re pretty great, Hermione, but I’m not gonna kill myself because you rejected me.”

“Sporting of you,” said Draco. “You would deprive Gryffindor of its keeper, and I would never forgive you.”

Ron laughed. “I'll call you up,” he said finally. “You owe me a tour of your castle, prat. I haven’t forgotten.”

“Do, and bring others. It’s the only house in Britain large enough to comfortably host your family.”

“It’ll have to be, if it fits your ego.”

The final whistle piped over a near-empty platform. The steam had grown thick as fog. Hermione drew back from the carriage steps, but Draco found himself jumping back down to the last step, to hang from the rail, as the wheels ground to life.

“You’re the better pureblood,” he shouted back at him. “There’s your second-to-none, Weasley. If merit was pedigree, you’d outrank me.”

He was glad that he said it, even on impulse. First Ron nodded uncertainly, and then his lips twisted into a wide and incredulous grin, as if he had been given some hilarious secret that he couldn’t believe Draco would willingly part with. His red tie hung flapping in the breeze under his unbuttoned collar, and his shirttail hung out of his trousers, a too-short pair of Charlie’s that Molly re-hemmed, and he thought of Ron on the train to Hogwarts, five years before, fierce, game, and fearless, full of a terrible bitter pride, a lord’s descendant wearing tattered hand-me-down trousers. Son of Molly Weasley, grandson of Cedrella Black. Great-great grandson of Phineas Nigellus, whose last living heir was named Draco.

Ron waved at them until the train canted around a corner, and a hillside blotted out the dart of red against the rooftops.

The castle towers shrank into the neat spinnerets of a child's dollhouse, and retreated behind reams and reams of craggy highland until the points of the uppermost spires bowed under the bristly trees. Then the train slipped into a tunnel, and a brief purge of darkness locked the whole valley out of sight.

He turned to Hermione, who was smiling in the great starry dazzle-eyed way she did when he fought a dragon for her. It wasn't his fault for flushing.

"Put that away, you'll hurt someone with it."

"No," she said, radiantly insouciant. "You can be so wonderfully decent, when you want to be. It's this gorgeous talent you have, and hardly anybody knows about it."

"It exhausts me. I saved up effort for that one for years."

"I'm surprised it cost you so little," she said, and her smile slackened into something more serious and thoughtful. "You know, if merit was pedigree, you'd still be you."

The flush pitched hot, and he brushed it off. "Thank you," he said. "I had in mind some order of monarch, but I'm not so far off it's an insult. Let's find a compartment."

Her laughter was a passel of bells, trilling behind him, as he tugged her into the carriage.

In the prefects' compartment, few remained of the cohort that had gathered in September. Padma Patil and Anthony Goldstein had also chosen to stay at Hogwarts, but Hannah Abbott was coming home to see her mother, a pharmacist in Leeds. Instead of the prefects', she shared a compartment with Leanne Thomas, the tallest girl in her year, and Romilda Vane, who was sewing a patch in the shape of a lightning bolt into her denim jacket.

The afternoon passed like a dream. Voices in the corridors, rustling luggage, the chuffing of pistons underfoot. The clouds kept a woollen seal over the sky and washed pale the lakes and rivers that pooled in the space between hills. An owl followed their train for some time, shadowless in the grey light, vanishing now and then when they threaded a tunnel. There were few people on the train, and they were hardly an unruly selection. Bill, Fleur, and Tonks took periodic patrols down the long and soundless hallway between compartments. There were coronation chicken sandwiches for lunch, and Bott's beans from the trolley, and watery builder's tea in paper cups with single-serve creamers.

Draco sat with his back to the window and his knee thrown up on the seat, a book balanced on his thigh. It was Hermione's, a Penguin paperback of Brideshead Revisited, its cover a photograph of a glass conservatory under snow. Hermione cradled Crookshanks in her lap, practicing charms under her breath on a pocket snitch that Katie had given her.

He marked his place with a finger — reeled back to my rooms under a starry heaven which swam dizzily among the towers, and fell asleep in my clothes as I had not done for a year — and tilted his head to watch her.

"I think you've mastered Verdimilious."

"I lose my magic once we get to London," she said, following the snitch with her eyes. "I should practice while I can. What do you think Daphne is going to do, if she transforms?"

He grimaced and made an equivocal gesture. "No idea. Her parents let Briarfield Hall, and I don't know what facilities they have. I had thought she might use the Shrieking Shack, if she were going to be at Hogwarts, but I doubt she'll have access, unless she can find a way from getting away from her parents on full moons."

"Oh, that's a good point. But I meant the Wolfsbane Potion," she said. "If Snape isn't here next year. Remus said once that Slughorn couldn’t do it, not to satisfaction. Do you think you could?”

He tried not to be flattered by the implication, and failed eagerly. “Likely not. It’s famously difficult to gather ingredients for, and—”

“Sprout gave Neville keys to the hothouses. He might be able to grow something, with notice.”

“Assuming I could even manage it, which is a gamble. There’s a precarious sequence of reactions you have to perform in order to temper the ingredients, and obviously, if you fail, you have a werewolf to deal with. There’s a reason it doesn’t appear on the Boards. Most people find it too technically demanding.”

Hermione muttered something like “two bonus points,” but let it drop. She nodded at his book. “How is that, by the way?”

“Maudlin,” he replied. “They’re all traipsing around like common drunks. It’s begging for a comparison to Wilde—”

“Dorian and Basil, without the portrait?”

“Or the psychological intimacy. But the jokes are funny, I’ll give him that.”

She smiled slightly. “Hm. How far are you?”

“They’ve just left Oxford.”

“Remind me to ask again when they’re on the ship,” she said. “Catch that for me, will you?”

Turning a page, he snagged the snitch casually with his offhand and tossed it to her. She was tucking it into her satchel when a tap came on the glass door of their compartment.

“Wotcher, you two. Coming up on London,” said Tonks. She had turned her hair black again, and it brought out the parts of her that resembled her mother: her pointed chin, her rounded face, her beetle-brown eyes. Full resemblance was held at bay by a boxer's nose that looked to have been broken, and the careless way her pixie-cut spilled like a mop around her ears. "Remember to change into muggle gear."

She caught him staring, and cocked an eyebrow. It was Narcissa's expression. Draco's head ached.

"My mother will be there," he said. "I don't know if you were warned."

"Yeah, Dumbledore briefed me," she said. "Cute of you to worry, though."

"Tonks—"

"Kid, it's fine. I'm a big girl. I never knew Mum's family, and I don't expect a tearful reunion." Tonks grinned, a bit jagged. "You tell me how to play it. You want backup, or a wide perimeter?"

"She may not know you exist," he said, with difficulty. "I would be wary of shocking her."

Tonks snorted. "Yeah, she knows I exist."

"I wouldn't be sure. Mother would have forsworn contact after your parents' marriage. She still won't—"

"Mum was up the duff before she got married," said Tonks, crinkling her nose merrily at his expression. Hermione stifled a laugh. "That was the whole to-do, boyo. They eloped and had a do-over ceremony with Dad's family when I was five. Mum made me flower girl. Last time the devious wench got me in a skirt."

"How old was she?"

Tonks rolled her eyes back in reminiscence. "Er. I'm January '73, so she's… what, eighteen? Nineteen, when she had me?"

Hermione startled. "She was in school," she said, appalled.

“Yeah, and a prefect,” said Tonks, which elicited a minor noise of outrage from Hermione, seemingly on behalf of the position. “Not a great one, obviously, but still. Dad says the Slytherin Head was a pure slimebucket — both of Mum’s sisters made prefect, too. Apparently Slughorn was always wheedling for an invitation to one of their balls.”

“That’s abhorrent clientelism,” said Hermione, even more appalled than she had been at teenage pregnancy. As usual, her priorities were strictly organized, and inscrutable.

“That’s Dad’s line,” said Tonks. “Mum says it’s called a business relationship, and more people could stand to try it.”

She knocked twice on the doorframe and stepped out. “Jeans!” she said, in passing. “Jeans! Trainers! Et cetera. Step lively.”

“There is a pernicious and false equivalency,” said Draco, nobly, “between nonmagical culture and slovenliness, which I object—”

“JEANS! TRAINERS! ET CETERA!” faded down the hallway.

Hermione, being hard-hearted, failed to reward his valiant defense of muggle civilization. Unfolding from her seat, she drew the blinds with a flick of her wand, and stretched up on tiptoe to levitate her trunk down from the luggage rack. “You heard her,” she said. “You ought to go change. I think there’s an empty compartment next to ours.”

“I don’t see why I have to leave.”

He’d meant only that he’d as much a right to evict her as the opposite; but her mouth fell open, and he abruptly reevaluated.

“I didn’t mean that.”

“Didn’t you!”

“Though it’s no less than what you were wearing in the prefects’ bathroom last year. Ostensibly.”

“Those were extenuating circumstances!”

“You were still in your pants,” he pointed out, tipping his head back, and she colored fiercely.

“It doesn’t count,” she said, folding her arms firmly over her chest, as if to retroactively shield it from view. “I wasn’t looking at you that way.”

“You were looking a bit.”

“For pedagogy! We were talking to each other. It would have been rude not to look. But I certainly didn’t intend anything by it, and anyway, it was a public bathroom! We had a job to do! A highly unsensual context for disrobement! I was having platonic thoughts,” she finished, “the whole time.”

“Good for you. I haven’t had a platonic thought about you in years.”

Hermione’s face spiked to a temperature that could melt glass, exorbitantly lovely, and she made a strangled noise, flapping a hand over her shoulder. “I — that’s immaterial. Go change. All this to get out of wearing muggle clothes — you’re a complete diva.”

He laughed, rolling to his feet, and she had to press her knuckles to her mouth to stop herself from smiling. He dropped a kiss on her temple as he strolled out into the corridor.

Moors had given way to fields and pastures, knolls thickly trussed with farmhouses and shrubs. They had passed through the Midlands and started on into the fenced hillsides of the southern English country, faint sloping mounds of golden wheat crowned with furls of trees, and villages dotted here and there on the bank of a river or in the lee of a hill. The clouds thickened as they came upon London, and the light was flat and strange, like camerafire.

Draco found an empty compartment and snapped the blinds. His robes were exchanged for a pair of dark grey trousers and a cobalt shirt, which, if it failed Tonks's instructions, at least plausibly passed for muggle. He folded his tie and prefect badge into the trunk with his robes and snapped the clasps.

The shirt rode high on his wrists. Nice as it was to be taller, it was exasperating to keep having new things fitted. He slipped his wand down the pocket of his trousers and stepped back into the corridor, folding back his cuffs.

As he drew the compartment door shut behind him, the loo at the end of the hallway rattled open and shut. Nothing passed through it; it merely swung free of its own accord, paused, and latched behind itself neatly. Draco frowned at it. His eyes narrowed.

He approached, drawing his wand. Another compartment door unhitched discreetly beside the loo, and he caught it before it closed. The compartment itself was empty, but Draco stepped inside and slammed it behind him. After a moment, he raised his wand, and he said, "Show yourself."

Nothing happened. The farmland streamed past the window in a twining braid of green.

"Hominem revelio."

The charm rippled through the compartment, and flashed briefly over a silhouetted shape of a boy standing in the middle of it, four inches from the point of Draco's wand. He lowered it, and snarled.

"Potter."

Harry tore the Cloak down around his shoulders. His eyes were massive with self-explanatory guilt, which dismissed any reservations Draco might have had about being furious with him.

"I have to see Sirius."

"You're fucking kidding me."

He scrambled in front of the compartment door, Draco nearly side-checked him into the wall. “I’m going there, and I’m coming straight back. They’ve closed the Floo, but I’ll take the train—”

“You’re supposed to be at school!”

“—use the Cloak, nobody’ll see—”

“You thought you could fuck off and no one would notice? That you’d swan in and out as you like, no responsibilities, no one liable to wonder—”

“I keep dreaming he’s dying!” Harry scrambled to stop him from grabbing the compartment-door. “Draco, hang on — I keep seeing him getting tortured, he’s at Grimmauld Place and he’s — and I told Dumbledore if they’d just let me see him, just once, but he told me to keep doing Occlumency, which, sorry, doesn’t work on Voldemort—”

“—whole Order is in fucking Scotland right now for your protection, three of them here just for Hermione, and you’re bloody—”

“—won’t tell me where Remus even is, and they expect me to sit there and wave everyone off, meanwhile Sirius is rotting in a house he hates! It’s cruel! It’s cruel, and I don’t want to be cruel, I told myself when I came to Hogwarts I never would be— I told myself if I ever had the power to stop someone feeling that way,” said the boy who had lived eleven years of his life in a cupboard, raggedly, “I would stop it, I wouldn’t let it happen, I wouldn’t be one of the people who walked past and let it happen to me!”

“—pitching a fit because you’re not inside-track on Mad-Eye’s agents — the difference between an eleven-year-old and a thirty-seven-year-old man demeans us both to state. For fuck’s sake. I don’t know where you come by this idea that everyone in your life suffers at your whim, waiting for you to save them.”

“MAYBE I HAVE TO! NOBODY ELSE WANTS TO BLOODY DO IT!”

“The world is not your remit! Sirius Black is not your remit!”

“I say he is.” Harry stood to his full height, and Draco clocked nearly half a foot on him; he had been left behind in the year’s dissemination of growth spurts. “He’s my godfather. Without Lupin, I’m the only person he’s got.”

“So what, I don’t know where my godfather even is, or if he’s alive, and nobody else gives a damn, why don’t I just blow up this fucking train—”

“Because I’m his family! Because Lupin left him! He’s got one person, one, and it’s me. I thought you of all people would understand!”

“Because my father’s dead?” he snapped. “Because Lucius Malfoy was murdered, I should understand what tempts you to join him? Think again. Severus Snape never had any delusions about who my father was, and if he did they weren’t the sort that would send me running after him to death’s doorstep. He certainly never fed them to me under the pretense of connection—”

“Sirius isn’t like that—”

“—or intimated they would be worth the cost of catastrophic danger. To myself or others. Did you imagine what the Order would think when they noticed you were gone? If you didn’t come back? They’ll come looking for you, you realize, as soon as they notice. At no small risk to themselves.”

“Nobody knows where I am. Alright? I didn’t leave a note. I took the Cloak, my wand, nothing else. He’s my godfather, nobody’s risking their lives for him but—”

“Then I take it back,” he said icily. “I do understand. You’d rather the dead for company than the living.”

Harry lunged at him. Draco didn’t resist. His back slammed against the compartment door, rattling fixtures. Harry’s face loomed close, twisted in a snarl, eyes slitted and dark like raw tide-laved glass.

“Apologize,” he said. His grip flexed on Draco’s shoulders, digging into the muscle. “Apologize for that, you shithead. Come on.”

“James Potter is never going to tell you he loves you,” said Draco, with soft contempt. “Not if you spend a lifetime running after Sirius Black.”

“Maybe not,” said Harry, tightly. “Maybe I’ll keep waiting for that my whole life, Draco, you’d certainly fucking know. But my dad loved him. He’s the last thing in the world I know Dad loved. And he doesn’t have anybody else. So I’m going to save him.”

He shoved him back, and Draco let go.

He had mistaken the tenor of Harry’s relationship with Sirius. It was both more selfless and far more treacherous than he had reckoned with. Before he could recast it, however, the door rattled back.

Hermione barged into the compartment with her wand up. She had changed into muggle clothes, jeans and trainers, and maroon polo with golden stitching at the breast pocket, her hair confined strictly by a headband and a few sleeking charms. When she saw Harry, her face dropped at once into the pitch of a thunderstorm.

“What's going on? I heard Draco— oh.” She forced her hand down and breathed, “Oh, I’m going to kill you.”

“Good, right, perfect,” said Harry savagely. “Hi, Hermione. I’m not having this argument again—”

“How nice of you to decide in advance!”

“—so you just assume Draco already read me whatever riot act you’re preparing, and bin it, please.”

“Right!” she said brightly. “What happened? Did Sirius run away again? Or did you have a nightmare?”

“You say that like it isn’t real!” Harry exclaimed. “Like he’s not actually out there, doing things I can see — you think I can’t tell the difference between his memories and mine?”

“So you think he has Sirius,” she said, “and you decided to run away, alone, without telling anybody, letting everyone else on this train drive straight into what could well be a trap—”

“He’s not in London.” Harry was curt. “He’s in northern Scotland, actually, best I can tell. Coast of the North Sea. Nobody knows I’m coming.”

“Except Voldemort,” she snapped, ignoring Draco’s exhale of displeasure at the word. “If you know he’s in Scotland, he absolutely knows you’re in London.”

“I have the Cloak, and once I get behind Grimmauld’s wards—”

“Bully for you! What about the rest of us?”

“You’ll have Tonks! And Bill! And Fleur!”

“You think they’d leave you?” she said, her words jagged around a knot of anger in her throat. Magic did a lightning-skitter around the fist that clutched her wand. “Really? You think if it was between me and you, the Chosen One, Nymphadora Tonks would protect me?”

Harry stopped short, blinking, his chest rising in quick, deep bursts. He lowered his shoulders, and the Cloak slithered to his feet.

“Nymphadora Tonks is a jolly person,” Hermione said tightly, “so a lot of people forget she’s Alastor Moody’s deputy. Second-ranking field agent in the Order, de facto ranking officer on any mission without Moody — she was top grade in her cohort at the Auror Academy, and they don’t give marks for tender-heartedness. Did you know any of that? If you think she lacks the guts to decide between us, you've fallen for her cover. And I'm sure she'd feel badly about it, but it wouldn't stop her, and personally, I don't begrudge her that decision one bit."

"I would never run away from you," he croaked. "Hermione, I would let them kill me before I—"

"Why isn't it enough?" she demanded. "All the Weasleys, and the Order, and Dumbledore, plus our friends. Everyone is at Hogwarts. They moved the whole Order. Partly for you! Everyone but the one person you think you have to have to be happy! Why isn't it enough?"

"I don't know," he said tiredly. "It just isn't. No matter how many people love me, or tell me they're with me, it doesn't feel different. And it's not because you're not enough, you are. It's not you. I think I just. That when I was young, or — maybe last year, or — always. I reckon. I don't know." He broke off and lifted his glasses carefully back onto his nose. The bridge was taped together. "I'm just broken, I think," he said, quite calmly. "I never feel the way you're supposed to feel. That safe thing, the bit where you want to stay, and let them... do whatever parents are for. Molly and Arthur, and Hagrid, and Remus. When they leave a room, a bit of me goes: 'That's it, that's the last time you'll ever see them.'" He added, "Sometimes I'm right, and that doesn't help, either."

Hermione recoiled, startled. She hesitated.

"Does Sirius make you feel… that? The way you're — supposed to feel."

"No," said Harry. "He's not a great parent, really. I know that, I don't know why everyone acts like I don't." He sank his hands in his pockets. Then, "I don't know why everyone acts like it matters."

A serene chime from the train broke through his words. Footsteps in the corridor pitched them into silence until they receded.

Harry caught Hermione's arm. She turned back sharply, her lip curling, and he tightened his grip.

"I'm sorry," he said quietly. "For doing this. I am. You think I don't take the war seriously, but I do."

"Now, Harry, really isn't the time—"

"I do," he repeated. "I take it seriously. And I know you're not doing it for me. It's your magic, and your war. It is. When Viktor died, it was your friend they killed. I haven't ever forgotten it."

The train eased to a halt in a bath of steam that flushed the windows white. The doors sprang open with an echoing shudder of metal, like an unsealed vault.

Harry slipped up the hood of his cloak and vanished. Draco stepped in front of Hermione, checked the corner of the door, and they descended through curtains of mist to the platform.

It was cold. The steam from the tracks ought to have warmed the stone, and the June air ought to have helped it, but the gusts that rose to meet him were chilled, and left condensation trails on his skin. He frowned and scanned the ceiling, but the glass ceiling was grey and dry, untouched by rain. The clouds behind it rolled, a dark wave unknitting from the underbelly of the storm.

Children began to drop from the carriages, a skeletal crowd compared to the usual. They streamed out to meet their parents and had bleary reunions behind veils of mist. Hermione stepped down behind him, and a rustle at her back meant Harry had done the same.

Low chatter issued from family reunions, coalescing like islands in a sea of silhouettes. Dean and Seamus were ushered off with a pair of besuited professionals that must have been the Thomases. Katie's mother, a foot her junior in height, was bemoaning her new piercings. He tapped his wand restlessly on his thigh.

From the mist, anyone might have been his mother. He could feel with unusual clarity the toll of his heart against his ribs, but he still craned his neck to find her, as if any stranger in the mist might turn and reveal a French twist of pale hair at her nape, or cut the crowd with vulpine grace.

“There she is,” said Hermione suddenly. For there she was.

Narcissa stood at the entrance to the platform, dressed in a flowing, high-collared summer robe of green organza, the wide brim of her hat drawn so low it almost hid the crimson-painted curve of her lips. A wandpurse of black lace dangled from her wrist, matching the thin netting of her gloves, her signet a large and lightless swell on her third finger. The way she wore the finery it all seemed eminently natural, as if she'd been born clad for a party to which everyone else had shown up tragically underdressed. There she was, his mother, exactly where she needed to be, on time and well-dressed, and she brought with her a world of rules and order, with impregnable walls.

She flitted through the crowd with weightless grace, and then she was in front of him, smiling with a slightly brittle hope, lips parted in an apprehensive show of teeth.

“Draco,” she said. When she spoke, her voice was low and reedy with effort, as if overused.

The parting of her arms was tentative. There was no time for it, but he did it anyway: he stepped forward and embraced her. Startled, she touched the back of his head, and then her arms slid around his shoulders. “Darling,” she said. “Oh, I’m sorry. Come and hug your mother that loves you.”

He braced his head on her shoulder. She smelled of clean soap and perfume: jasmine grandiflorum, saffron, woody and warm.

And there were so many things he could not say to her. And Hermione stiffened a bit, when Narcissa touched him, as if perhaps fighting the wish to intercede. But she was his mother, and she was real, and he had been away from her so long he had forgotten how much himself he felt when she was near.

Narcissa drew back, keeping her hand braced on his neck. The comfort cooled. He turned back.

Hermione cleared her throat. “Hello, Mrs. Malfoy.”

Narcissa’s mouth twitched to the side in a crooked not-smile. “The singular Miss Granger,” she said. Hermione’s cheek twitched.

“Mother.”

She flicked her fingers in a dismissal. “I can be trusted,” she said lightly. “If the mouth ‘speaketh from the abundance of the heart,’ I wager I can still manage a conversation without coming to arms. Under a certain baseline of respect.”

“The one thing that makes you remotely respectable is the fact that Draco loves you,” Hermione said tightly. He turned to her, startled, and she was staring at his mother like she might draw on her. “The only thing I ever respected about you for a fraction of a second was the fact that you raised him.”

Draco stared at her as if he had been clubbed over the head, because he felt like it.

Narcissa noticed it. Her eyes flit up, and she inhaled through her teeth.

“You’re fearless,” she said, a compliment soured by defeatism. “And very angry.”

“Quite, yes,” said Hermione. “I am also — sorry — in a bit of a hurry, so if you don’t mind, I have to see an auror about a boy.”

The situation did not give her time to introduce it. It came hurtling across the platform in a flourish of leather and robes. Nymphadora Tonks was marvelous at top speed: high spots of color in her cheeks, her duster skimming high like a duck's wing, her shoulders rolling with the weight of each step, her wand a seamless extension of the line of her arm.

"Draco!" she barked. "Where's Lightning?"

"Lightning?"

"Here," Hermione said quickly, throwing her hand behind her to check for him. "He's here, Tonks, he's wearing the Cloak—"

"Great, thanks, Hermione. Kid, wherever you are, grab my arm and run when I tell you. We need to get off the platform to Apparate."

Harry did not reply. Hermione whipped around, her hand sweeping through the air, and it met nothing. Her eyes glazed with panic.

"He was here," she snapped. "He was here just as second ago—"

Tonks did not waste a millisecond on dismay. "Done a runner. Got it," she said. "Aiming for Number Twelve, innit?"

"—but he knows how dangerous, and he told us he did, and I told him why—"

"Don't kick yourself," she said calmly. "He's not thinking about you. He's not even really thinking."

"Oh my God, is that supposed to make me feel better?" Hermione snapped, tearing her wand from her satchel. "That he's forgotten us?"

Narcissa had not moved. The back of her hand sealed up her mouth.

"Hullo, Lady Malfoy," Tonks added. "Nymphadora Tonks. Lieutenant Commander, Order of the Phoenix. Don't fuss about the title, Moody made it up. And I'm pretty sure Mum made up the name, so don't fuss about it, either."

“Nymphadora,” said Narcissa, roughly.

Draco’s neck ached from the speed he turned. Tonks blinked, her fingers stilling on her laces.

“Your name is Nymphadora,” she repeated, with difficulty, as if each word were being carved into her skin. “You were… named… for a virgin martyr of Bithynia.”

Tonks blinked again, her eyes wide, and slowly straightened. “Okay,” she said. “Very neat. I have to—”

“One of three sisters. They fasted together in the wilderness. The older two were tortured to death,” she said, “and their bodies made examples to the youngest — your namesake — but she refused to give up the faith. She died with them. They burned together, on the pyre, and were martyred.” Narcissa tried to breathe deeply, and it caught. “Your mother,” she said, “was always — an abominable sentimentalist.”

It was the first time he had ever heard her invoke Andromeda of her free will. It made his skin crawl. He stared at her.

“Cool,” said Tonks, indifferent. “Tell her you said so. Er, hate to run, but it was nice to meet you. Hermione, stick with Bill, I'm going after —”

Thunder broke over the platform. A downfall opened on the roof, loud and harsh. It was too harsh for rain.

A hundred faces tipped back to watch the volley of hail pelt down on the glass, a shadow rolled down the platform in a long sweep.

The clouds were moving swiftly and strangely. They congealed into a roiling, swirling, eye. Draco grabbed Hermione’s arm.

Black smoke dropped from the eye like ink through water. Coils ribboned through the darkling sky.

“BRACE!” roared Tonks, and tackled Hermione to the floor. Draco dropped with her, landing flat on his palms, and the ceiling of King’s Cross shattered above them.

Glass poured like rain, pieces shattering into brilliant starbursts near his head. He dropped his head and a stinging hail prickled his scalp, retreating when the last of it broke to glittering dust around them. He leapt up with a roll of his shoulders and found himself under the glowing hemisphere of Shield Charm. It had spared Tonks and Hermione from the brunt of the glass.

Narcissa held its stem on the tip of her wand. She flicked it out, but her attention locked on the sky. Her wand arched forward and down, in the duelist’s position. Smoke descended over the ragged maw of the station’s ceiling, and tatters flared from its edges.

His ears rang from distant screaming. Down the platform there were students on their knees. Blood eddied on the asphalt. The crowd crushed tight to the entrance to Platform 9 ¾ and fought and clawed at each other to get out and his heartbeat was high and fast in his ears. Tonks sat up and Hermione scrambled out and she caught his hand to pull herself up. She was bleeding from scratches on her arms but she was alright, she was fine, and she was looking at him and shouting something and he only heard it over the sound of his heartbeat when the shape of her mouth clearly spelled YOU.

A hand clamped down on his shoulder. Sound cut in.

“Run when I tell you,” Narcissa whispered.

Smoke coalesced. Ragged coils of it unfurled and creatures pried themselves from the rippling cord of it like some horrible birth. The desiccated hands prying through the air. The black hole of a mouth, the wretched, rasping howl.

The chill over the platform turned subthermal. He knew what this was, he had seen it before. A dementor sank from the group and fell like a diving hawk on Tonks and with her wand in the air she shouted an incantation he knew very well.

A silver jackrabbit tackled it to the side, and it fell to the tracks bleeding ribbons of white. She lashed two more out with a cleaving forestroke-backstroke, the tip of her wand a white scythe in the air. The swarm broke apart, but then there were still dozens; the screaming and the rasping coalesced into a terrible chord and cloaks gloved the slate-dark sky.

Down the platform, Bill cast a wolf that bounded up and batted one out of the air. Fleur shielded a group of children under an enclave. Her fox ripped through the billowing folds of the dementor that trawled down the platform to meet her.

He needed a patronus. He needed to cast a patronus, to help them, to save them. They needed help, and he knew the Patronus Charm, and he could do it, it was a simple thing that he could do. He had done it at thirteen, under a moonlit sky.

But it was so cold that he was numb. And the sky was falling. And he was bleeding and Hermione was bleeding and there was nothing happy in the world and there had never been.

Narcissa grabbed his elbow and she was pulling him inexorably and he stumbled after her, and Hermione was shouting again. Narcissa's wand streamed ribbons of white, a full shield of it, but it was diluted, not a full corporeal, and her face was drawn with the strain. The screaming turned dull under the deafening rasp of the dementors' shrieks.

They had followed Harry. Or they had attacked them all the same, on the chance he would be there.

Hermione tore free of Tonks and took off running down the platform without a backward glance. His heart leapt up his throat and he ripped his arm away from his mother, running after her, shouting her name, and for a half-second his fear-stalled mind fumbled through bafflement at where she was going and then he understood.

Her parents. She was going to find her parents, who were waiting with the other muggles beyond the platform entrance.

Hermione shoved between a pair of cowering children and raced, at the top of her speed, but he was faster than she was. When she hurled herself through the platform wall he was behind her, a heartbeat behind, his heart in his throat.

Outside, thousands foamed over the plaza and surged outward towards Pancras Road. The cars, locked in standstill traffic by the charge, blared a compliment to the symphony of panic. Trees flushed green dripped icicles in the middle of high June. People tripped over concrete benches set into the plaza and crawled over each other in screaming masses of hands and boots. A whisper on the back of his neck was the only notice for him to duck as a dementor swept overhead, the icy tail of its cloak whipping his ear. Hermione broke out of the crowd and made a dead sprint for the row of cars parked roadside, where she collided with a couple that were running against the current of the crowd — running towards her, to greet her.

The details of them registered at a subconscious level, slipping under the presiding dominion of fear: Older, both of them; fifties, greying. Her mother’s hair in dark ringlets, eyes blue, Hermione’s freckles scattered over her cheeks. Something of Hermione in the horrified set of her face, in the way she held her jaw. Her father, with one arm braced in front of his wife, short hair in retreat over a narrow face, clean-shaven. He had her eyes. Hermione had her father’s eyes. Herbert and Denise, she’d told him that. He hadn’t forgotten it.

Hermione had muggle parents who loved her like breathing and who had parts of her studded all over them like geodes in rock. She had her mother’s freckles and her father’s eyes and it made something inside him twist to the point of strain, and when she leapt up so her father could catch her in his arms it broke and he remembered what a crooked thing it was to love a parent who couldn’t save you. To leave parts of you behind, far away, and all the pieces scattered over the country like so much shrapnel.

The moaning rasps swelled as more dementors poured from the broken ceiling. Hermione was trying to drive her parents away from the station, one-armed, with her wand-hand braced for a patronus. The Grangers didn’t understand; they were all shouting at each other and her frustration was patent in the way she shoved her mother back towards the car.

A dementor came slithering out of the crowd, its claws scuttling over frosted ground, and Hermione’s mother screamed. Hermione shouted and brandished her wand, but the otter she cast was translucent and flickered out after a futile snap of its teeth. The dementor swept up to avoid it and dove back for another try, and her father grabbed her shoulder to drag her behind him, his face pale, while Hermione thrashed against the movement with the fury of someone who knew how futile it was.

Draco shoved his shoulder through fleeing muggles and slipped over one of the benches, landed with the ease of sliding a bannister. His wand arced a white line in front of his face, gleaming with a prefigurative current of magic, and the words on his tongue moved seamlessly, as if they had been only waiting for him, like it was easy, like it had always been easy.

A white owl the size of a thestral tore free from the misted air and plunged its claws into the dementor’s back.

The wretched shrieking must have been the creature’s pain. It bucked and rose, wrestling together with the white wings of the patronus until the twin trails of smoke and mist bloomed grey against the sky. Its kin were regrouping over the rooftops as the crowd flooded out into the streets and cleared the plaza. The owl harried it off to join its flock, howling.

Draco skidded to a halt. The air rasped cold against his throat. The Grangers were staring, their arms latched tightly around their daughter — who was also staring at him, flushed and panting, her eyes bright and aghast and relieved.

“Draco Malfoy,” he said, when it became clear she wasn’t going to introduce him. “We’ve corresponded.”

Denise Granger opened her mouth, soundlessly, and closed it. She looked at Hermione. Hermione’s expression gave her a sharp, unreadable instruction, and she pried herself free of them.

“That was a magical creature,” said Herbert, remarkably calm. He smoothed his hair with a hand that was almost steady. “I thought they weren’t supposed to interact with us.”

“They’re not,” said Hermione shortly, sweeping her wand over her arm. Her cuts sealed under the watery glow of Episkey. Her mother blanched at it. “Those are dementors. They guard the wizard prison. They’re not supposed to leave unless ordered.”

“And why were they ordered here?” said Denise, her voice rising. “This is London. It’s a normal place, it’s not one of their places. They aren’t supposed to come here, you said.”

“Because — I don’t know. I think they’re looking for Harry, but—”

A shout interrupted her. Tonks, Bill, and Fleur strode across the plaza at a clip. Behind them, Narcissa glided over the frosted concrete with a snap of green skirts.

Tonks broke into a run and closed the distance with a barking laugh of relief. “Thank Merlin,” she shouted. “They’re regrouping to the east. Reckon they figured he’s not here, and wretched things go by scent, so they’ll trace him. Hermione, take your parents and get as far away from Islington — sorry, you lot, I’m aware you’ve got no idea who I am or why I’m giving you orders, but if you trust your daughter you're gonna take them anyway. Bill, Fleur, and I are going after Harry—"

"I'm coming with you," Hermione cut in. Tonks pinched the bridge of her nose. "Sorry. I am. You don't have time to argue with me."

"Hermione," muttered Draco, and it was thin, half a groan. But no one noticed except, perhaps, Narcissa, whose breath caught.

"I'm sorry," she repeated steadily. "I am coming. You're only three. I have a wand. I'm not running away."

"What? No," said Denise, high-pitched. "No, you're not. You're not going towards those things."

"It's up to you," Hermione told Tonks. The fist of her hand drew tight the ribs of her scars, and at sixteen, she was far too young to sound so old, to speak with such contempt for others' hesitation to sacrifice her. "It'll waste your time to call my bluff."

Tonks sucked her lips inward, pensive, and glanced at Bill. He shook his head.

"Right, okay," she said. "Fuck. Sorry, Mrs. Granger. You want your daughter to stay, you make her do it."

She took off at a sprint. Bill and Fleur followed at her heels. Hermione tried to do the same, and father caught her arm; she threw a Stinging Jinx behind her. It was perfect form, flawless, even done backhanded and under her own elbow. Herbert gave a cry of surprise, and let go.

Freed, his daughter took half a step and then stopped and turned back to look at Draco. The wind threw a cluster of curls over the dark stare. She reached her hand back for him, with the thinnest flicker of uncertainty.

He reached for it automatically; he didn't know what he was going to do except run after her, which was the only thing he could do, the only option left to him besides let her go and throw herself carelessly in front of someone's curse — and then a hand closed on his arm and there was a jerk under his navel and the world twisted out of sight. His fingers slipped past Hermione's without touching them.

They sprang into existence in a square up the street, a block of townhouses shading a fenced park. A thatch of trees gave them cover from passersby. It couldn't have been far from the station; he recognized the knot of clouds in the western sky.

Narcissa dropped his arm, gasping from exertion, and he staggered away from her. The cold-water shock of betrayal made his gorge rise.

"What the hell are you doing?" His voice was louder, by far, than he had intended. "I didn't say you could—"

"We'll take the Knight Bus to Paddington," she said, her voice firm and ragged. "We can be at the Manor by day's end. Moody's agent will alert the Order of the attack. She and her aides will secure Potter. We need not do anything more."

"You're fucking joking." He tore a hand through his hair. His breath came fast and hard in his throat. "There's four of them. Hermione—"

"Had the same opportunity you do," she rasped, straightening. "She rejected it. Her bed is made. Do not martyr yourself to prevent her from lying in it."

"That's not your choice!"

"It is unfortunate, truly, that her parents lacked the strength to stop her," Narcissa said, with surprising compassion. "A young witch without reins is a terrible thing. We must move quickly."

“The dementors followed Potter. They don’t act without orders. Do you understand what that means? Someone far more dangerous knows where Harry Potter is, and wants him followed—”

“And cares nothing for the collateral of finding him. Take my hand.”

“Listen to me! Hermione—”

“Is in danger, if you’re correct,” she snapped, reaching for him. “When the Dark Lord’s servants find her, there will be nothing you could have done for her.”

“Stop. Stop talking.”

“But Draco — you are so, so young. And I do not ask you to understand, but I beg you to believe — I swear it on my father’s name — you will thank me someday for not allowing you to follow her.”

The image spilled across the front of his mind, unbidden.

He pointed his wand at her. Narcissa jerked backward, her eyes falling on the tip.

“Don’t ever,” he said, unsteadily, “don’t ever — never say that to me again. It’s a lie. I wouldn’t. If she — I wouldn’t forgive you, for that.”

She watched the point of his wand. Her dark eyes flicked up. “You could not forgive,” she said slowly, “a mother saving her son’s life.”

“If she died today, and I wasn’t with her, it would be the last day I ever spoke to you.” His heartbeat muffled the sound of his own voice. “On my father’s name, I would not forgive you. Yes.”

“Don’t you dare use your father’s name to baptize this suicide quest, Draco Malfoy.”

“It's not his name, actually.” The force of it tore out of his throat, venomous. “It’s mine. He gave it up. He died, and he left his name behind, and now it's mine, and I decide what it means. I've decided Malfoy means I win. Malfoy means all my enemies are fucked. Malfoy means no one takes anything I want away from me, not now, not ever," he snarled. "No one touches what's mine. That's what my name means. When I swear on it, that's the promise I'm keeping."

Narcissa scoffed, stepped forward, and shoved his wand off its line. He stepped back, wary of her, wary that she might grab him and try to Apparate him anyway.

For his tenth birthday, his mother had taken him to London under the pretense of visiting the Royal Wizards' Ballet. When they arrived, dressed in finery, she had tugged him off to Diagon Alley, and loosed him instead on the inside of a toy shop with a cheque for a thousand galleons. Then she had bought them a pair of bespelled pints at Fortescue's, and they had walked up Primrose Hill in the warm June evening and had ice cream for dinner, sitting on the bench atop the hill while she whispered Confundus Jinxes at any muggle he pointed out, and together they went to pieces laughing, watching them all stumble over each other.

It had felt impossible for two people to be closer, more content in each other's company, than himself and his mother; he had understood, with a childish godlike certainty, that he would never love anyone so much, or perhaps anyone else at all.

When he was a child he'd known everything, doubted nothing, hesitated never. He had been king of a little world he imagined for himself, where no harm came to anyone, nor ever could, because Mother was there. It was his own mistake, believing it, but a part of him had still been angry at her when he discovered the mistake.

"My mother lost two of her daughters," she said suddenly. "I was all she had left. Her least favorite — she would have denied that, but daughters always know. Druella Rosier. Drugged herself to death when you were three."

The trees creaked overhead where their fingers twined together in the wind. A siren blared in the distance.

“They found my uncle’s body at the bottom of a cliff. For the sake of his dignity, they called it an accident. The last Lord Black of Witherfell,” she said, “and he died like a muggle. Of a broken neck.”

“Sirius Black is alive.”

“I had given him an heir,” she said, ignoring him. “But you wouldn’t have my name. He used to mock my father for not having sons, it was the one thing he could hold over him. Cygnus was the strongest wizard in the family, and Orion wasn’t even the strongest in his own marriage... He died knowing his legacy would fall to the lesser daughter of a cousin he loathed.”

“Do you hear me? Sirius Black is alive. Andromeda Tonks is alive. If you’d drop these wretched prejudices you’d realize how much of your family’s still with you.”

“I was never best of anything, among my sisters,” said Narcissa. “I was not the bravest, or the strongest. I was not charming; very few ever loved or admired me. But I was dutiful. I had no equal in that. The curse of the dutiful, of course, is that they cannot entice anyone to stay.”

His breath came like sandpaper in his throat.

“You’re far braver than we were,” she said, which pierced him. “Braver than Lucius, and he was the bravest man I ever met. Braver than Bella, and I never thought that was possible.” She paused. “I did that. Not them. I carried the glory of our house in our body, and I raised him to love better things than myself.”

He wasn’t; he was a coward, terrified at all times of how much could be taken from him, and what he did in the name of that cowardice deserved nothing like the honors of the brave.

“I’m not the glory of our house,” he said harshly. “I gave it up. And it is possible to love two things at once.”

The corner of her mouth curved. “Yes,” she agreed, “but it’s terribly painful.”

She held out her hand again. “Come with me,” she said, but though it was tender, it was not hopeful.

“I’m sorry,” he said, backing away, and he was. He could not remember being sorrier for anything in his life. He was sorry he did not live in a world where he could have come with her. He was sorry that neither of them were any version that the other could accept. It was a terrible thing he was doing, he knew that. It was only just less terrible than anything else he could have done.

Neither of them wept. They had both been taught not to. The wind was still, and the pavements were empty. The street was silent when Draco turned his back on his mother.

-Merry Taylor Swiftmas, again. If you’re binge-reading this fic in the future, then yeah, it was really that long between chapters. The pit is a powerful thing.

-The age of marriage in Britain actually was 16 until 2023, when it was changed to 18. ‘Age of Marriage Act of 1929.’ Pansy’s right about the law; Hermione’s right about the ethics. The more you know!

-That copy of Brideshead Revisited is the 1990 Penguin Classics printing, and in my opinion, the most beautiful cover for a very beautiful book. It also has one of the worst sex scenes in all of classic literature, wherein the protagonist sleeps with the twin sister of the man he’s been catastrophically in love with since adolescence in such a staggeringly un-sensual way it actually doubles back around to being homoerotic again: “[T]here was a formality to be observed, no more. It was as though a deed of conveyance of her narrow loins had been drawn and sealed. I was making my first entry as the freeholder of a property I would enjoy and develop at leisure.” (mfw i’m sleeping with a girl because i’m in love with her brother and also probably her house and regard her as a transitory object of voyeurism. highly normal behavior.)

-Behemoth chapters are an end-of-book tradition. You have no idea how much stuff I cut from this bad boy to even get it down to this size. My scrap folder is through the roof.

-It's been... I won't lie, it's been kind of rough. I took some hard knocks from a supervisor who's not the most people-friendly person — not like a monster or anything, just likes to joke in ways that make me feel small. and then like if you object, he goes :(why are you hurting my feelings :((so like you have to pretend you're okay with this dude who is not your friend making sort of unpleasant or snide jokes at your expense, but you can't actually make the kind of jokes about him that he makes about you, or he gets offended. you know? anyway, i had to deal with That Guy, so. your kind words have been a real-pick-me-up.

-in that vein, I couldn't respond to all the comments i got on the last chapter, but they made me cry. you write such beautiful, hearty comments, I really don't deserve it.

-Next chapter up in a week or two. Title: "As Though Nothing Could Fall."

As Though Nothing Could Fall

Chapter 80: As Though Nothing Could Fall

TW for violence and gore. Reader discretion advised.

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

If you were fast, you could get to Grimmauld Place from King's Cross in ten minutes.

The square was unnaturally empty. Dementors twisted in the air, and a shimmering in the air suggested a ward of some kind, which squirmed uncomfortably over his skin when he passed through. He'd cast a Disillusionment on himself, and though it wouldn't hold against scrutiny, it would hide him from anyone not looking for him. The first thing he saw was Tonks, who stood in front of a glowing hex of golden runes, her hands lifted, her face glowing perspirant in concentration. Bill and Fleur stood together in front of Hermione, which jolted him in relief. But Harry was nowhere.

He moved flat-footed around the edge of the square, slipping low behind the row of cars. Bill caught him in his periphery, and grimaced in exasperation. Hermione gasped, and leapt at him: her hug was bruising, and her fingernails bit deep into his shoulders. He caught her and gripped her tightly, but briefly, and let her go to free his wand-arm.

"Malfoy," Fleur hissed. "What are you doing here? Get out!"

"What are you doing out here? The warded building's right behind you. And where's Potter?"

“Here,” whispered Harry, gripping his wrist invisibly. Draco seized his arm, and smacked him.

“That’s the start of what I owe you,” he snapped, while Harry hissed. “Why aren’t you inside?”

“Tonks worries it’s trapped,” Hermione said lowly, crouching beside them. The wind dragged her ragged, sweat-limned curls over her temples. With a flick of her wrist, she threw an absent Episkey in Harry’s direction, but her gaze was intently on Draco. “Fleur’s put a muggle-repellent charm on the square, and a Concealment Charm, in the meantime, and Bill’s putting up wards. Did you cast a Disillusionment before coming in?”

“Of course I did. Who do you take me for?”

“Thank God. Anyway, I wanted them to take Harry in side-along Apparition—”

“Won’t work. You need—”

“—incredible skill to do long-distance side-along, I know that—”

“And there’s a hard upper bound on distance traveled—”

“—inversely proportional to the quantity of matter, and I know, I was trying to think of something, and we’ve only been here five—” She stopped and inhaled. “Draco,” she said, “where’s your mother?”

“She’s behind me,” he said, shoving all attendant thoughts pointedly to the side. “She had other plans for this evening. I disagreed.”

“Oh,” said Hermione. She wet her lips. “Are you — are you two alright?”

The pain of keeping them aside was quite keen. “No,” he said shortly. “Probably not. Let’s not talk about it.”

“But—”

“How are your parents?”

She recoiled fractionally. “All right,” she said. “Fair enough.”

Tonks finished the incantation with a jerk of her wand. The gold hex of runes shattered into the air, and she lowered her hands with an even exhale.

“Should do it,” she said. “Now get in, kiddies. One of those runes was an alarm sigil, and if it’s keyed right, they’ll know I broke it. Let’s —”

Lightning slit across the sky. It stole the visible world, and when it gave it back, it gave it back unevenly, with a dark stain on it. On the roofs across the square, there stood a ridge of figures, billows of smoke still dissipating from their hems, as if they had come fresh from a walk through an inferno.

There were five. The first was Sibelius Nott, an elderly man, the folds of his face an edifice of years’ bitterness; his hair was far closer to white now than it had been when Draco saw him last. Like the others, he still wore the tattered grey smock of Azkaban.

The other three men were strangers. One had wild curls, stained black by filth, his face masked by the same; the second was dark-haired and bearded, with blood splashed in lurid brown over the front of his smock; the third had no hair at all on his head, but his eyes seemed to protrude from his face, a blue so bright they seemed manic. All had wands.

The last of their number was a pale, diamond-shaped face, cut by searingly dark eyes, and a cowl of wind-battered hair. Her lips peeled in a harsh, broad snarl, an expression that was ugly on purpose, as if to disown the cold beauty of her face.

The lull between the flash and thunder yielded to the hoary bellow of the sky, like a child crying belatedly at a cut. Tonks dropped back to flank Bill and Fleur. With a single lash she cast a patronus, and started talking to it quickly in a low flat tone, without removing her eyes from the peopled skyline.

“All hands. All hands, to Grimmauld Place. Emergency call, five hostiles. Calling Fool, Hierophant, Empress. Five hostiles. Lightning is here. I repeat. Lightning is here.”

“Inside,” Hermione said unevenly, and groped behind her for Harry. “Get inside Grimmauld Place.”

She shoved him to his feet and fumbled him towards the door. Draco was staring.

Her face was familiar. Broader than her sisters’, furred with thick brows and a wide mouth, it had far more of Cygnus than Druella. He had seen its childhood counterpart, once, in a dream of a memory. Years’ growth and years’ suffering, and the grime of Azkaban, could not remedy the resemblance such that it was not striking.

Bellatrix stepped up to the ledge of the building, put her arms out, and laughed. It was a hypnotic, crystalline sound, and it was lovely, like a lady’s; it was a sound so refined it seemed wrong to come from her throat. Her fingers waved slightly, as if relishing the very feeling of the air. Static glinted frantically in the air around her, magic coalescing in shivering waves around her body.

“So Potter does come when he’s called,” she said, and it echoed queerly around the empty square. “My God. How genteel.”

She leaned forward, off the ledge, and dropped.

Her body became a rippling fold of black smoke. It dipped and split across the square in a reforming bloom, snaked through the road, and rippled under Tonks’s guard, the auror’s curse slitting harmlessly through the fabric. Bellatrix leapt from the smoke and landed on the stoop of Number Twelve with an elegant drop. Her wand whipped behind her back to deflect the splatter of curses from Bill and Fleur. A Shield Charm so thick it was opaque sent their curses soaring back at them, and they dropped for cover. Her head didn't turn.

She pointed her wand down. A shockwave boomed from the ground at her feet. All the cars on the street rocked. It threw Harry and Hermione on their backs, and the cloak slipped from Harry's shoulders.

He leapt back to his feet, and with cruel ease Bellatrix flicked away his jinx; she did something complex with her wrist, and he shot forward, skidding his heels against the stoop, until she caught him with her offhand by the hair.

"I have your poppet," she called, only she wasn't looking behind her, at her companions, nor at her enemies; she was gazing up at the dark windows of Number Twelve. With a slow, almost playful flourish of fingerwork, she rolled her wand through her fingers and directed it lazily at Harry's temple. "Another one, that is. What shall I do with it?"

The door was sealed and silent.

Tonks leapt into a duelist's stance, her wand high. "Lestrange!" she barked. "Formal challenge! I challenge you in the name of my mother, Andromeda Black!"

Foul idea. The witch standing before them would cut Tonks to ribbons. But it was a gamble to isolate Bellatrix — to hope that her traditionalism would blind her — to hope that Andromeda's name had purchase, even if only as a distraction or an irritant.

There was no such luck. Bellatrix paused, her lip curling; but she did not rise to it. "Dolohov," she spat.

The dark-haired wizard vanished into smoke. A moment later, Dolohov burst into existence over Tonks's head. She dove beneath him to avoid the Bombarda he lashed out of the air, which struck one of the cars. The engine exploded and set the alarms off up the street in a concert of lagging, eerie, echoing screams.

“The mongrel thinks it has a right to duel,” Bellatrix said casually over the pandemonium, waving her hand. “Enlighten it. If it survives you, I might try playing with it myself.”

Tonks threw a spell back at Dolohov. He parried, and they took up dueling furiously, driving Tonks back up the street. Bill tackled Mulciber, who snapped into existence in the street before them, with a spell that threw him into the square, and Fleur lunged for him with a searing barb of a spell that shattered and scorched the pavement black.

Bellatrix turned back to the door. Hermione shrank away in the corner of the stoop and pressed herself against the brick, chest heaving. Draco knelt beside her. His heart pounded.

She hadn’t seen him. Bellatrix hadn’t thought he would be here, so she hadn’t seen him. The Disillusionment had concealed it.

He cast the charm again, over himself and Hermione, and felt the cool ripple pass over them. Hermione’s figure blurred. Her hand brushed his shoulder in fleeting gratitude. Then she knelt and reached forward, moving slowly to avoid notice, until her fingers met a puddle of silk on the stoop.

“Prison has its uses,” said Bellatrix to the door, reflectively. Harry snarled as she jerked his head back, exposing the column of his throat. “It’s a handsome chance to think on one’s errors. Mine was being too submissive to orders. I told the Lord he was a fool to send me to the Longbottoms — it was the first thing I said to him, when he dropped the walls of Azkaban to stones, and pulled me from the rubble; the first thing I said, after I had thanked him for my salvation — he was a fool to send me there, and not to the Potters. I said, ‘Lord, what did Alice Longbottom know of blood magic? A blunt instrument, what curses could she have wrought? You might have killed all three with a snap of your fingers, and I would have left both Potters gibbering beside the dead infant.’”

Harry roared and thrashed against her. She tapped a Petrificus into his throat, and he froze.

Hermione snatched the Cloak back and whipped it around her shoulders.

“I would have died for him, too,” said Bellatrix, casually, “if the bitch had still managed the runes. I doubt she would have. I’m faster than my good Lord, even he admits. He said: ‘Indeed, Devotion, I was a fool; I should not have trusted my own right hand with what I could not trust in you. But I have suffered for it; I was dead ere I was with you.’ And then I said, ‘I suffered twice that, Lord, for you merely died; I had to live without you.’ And so we forgave each other.” She smiled sweetly. “But what of your dead Lord, cousin? When will James Potter raise you from the ruins?”

Fire ripped up the street in a gust from Mulciber’s wand. Tonks caught it and siphoned it, and Fleur leapt in front of her to deflect Dolohov’s spell, which ripped up the posts of the wrought-iron fence and sent them diving in a birdlike flock. Her Shield thundered under the effort, and Bill ducked beneath it, carving a gouge in the ground under Mulciber. The three of them moved in a dreadful synchrony, and the street warped under the haze of magic, the sirens blaring.

Bellatrix lifted Harry by the hair and examined him, admiring the scar like a piece of fine porcelain. “Do you know I worked out how she did it, in Azkaban? Cousin, I award her: it’s a horrible piece of magic. I never would have dreamed it of a mudblood. Did you teach it to her? Martyrdom was a hallmark of your style.”

A stirring in the air told him Hermione had stood. Draco’s heart kicked. A second later, he understood what she was doing. He shifted up and forward onto the balls of his feet.

“I hope you did,” said Bellatrix, and a smile crept up her face: it was the smile of his mother getting what she wanted. “I hope you taught her everything she knew of the Dark Arts. I like to imagine you had a hand in my Lord’s death, even at a distance; for one, it’ll please me all more to kill you; and for two, it adds a charming symmetry to events, since my Lord cut down your heart's companion like a dog."

The door flew open. Draco's heart dropped. Tonks whirled and gave a roar of dismay, but Mulciber's bruising curse threw her off her feet before she could stop it.

Sirius emerged from the shadows of Grimmauld Place. His combat leathers sat loose on his shrunken frame, straps tightened into bruising cuffs to compensate, but his great height still imposed itself in an eerie way as he ducked through the door, and the blue robes of the Order of the Phoenix swept the ground behind him. His hair fell loose to his waist, black as a raven's wing, threaded with ice-grey streaks of age, and when he grinned there was a dark glitter of something hungry and listless behind his face. There was something almost like gratitude in it.

"There'll be a charming symmetry to your offal," he said, "when I slit you cunt to snout, good kinswoman."

Bellatrix's smile thickened into a grin. Commingled with the loathing there was an equal gratitude: she almost seemed genuinely pleased to see him.

She lunged, and dissolved into smoke. Sirius slashed his wand, and the stones at her feet leapt up to entomb her ankles, but the smoke foamed through them harmlessly. It concealed in the air, darted over Sirius's shoulder, and plunged into Grimmauld Place. Sirius snarled and ran after her, and a shivering explosion from inside bespoke the continuation of their duel.

Harry dropped down the stairs, petrified. Hermione dove for him, and they rolled together down the stairs, a blur of dark hair whirling together with the silken cloak.

Bill was crouched behind Fleur's shield, lobbing shots at Mulciber; Tonks and Dolohov were sparring around in a growing sinkhole in the middle of the street, which Dolohov appeared to be commanding, as it chased Tonks wherever she moved over the asphalt. Sibelius and the other Death Eater had vanished — could have been anywhere, or fetching reinforcements. Draco lunged down the stairs and scrabbled to a halt at the bottom, where Hermione lay tangled together with Harry.

He dragged her up and she rocked upright, breathing hard, a bruise forming around her right eye. “Fine,” she rasped. “I’m fine. We have to get Harry out of here.”

“Bloody good time we’ll have with that. We can’t Apparate, and the city’s swarming with dementors.”

“Right, then. So. We’ll try something else,” she said. Her voice hardly trembled at all. Her hands were shaking, and there was blood smeared up her wrist — Bellatrix’s blood, where she’d cut her. She extended it to him. He caught it and let her pull him to his feet. There was no time to comfort each other. The street wavered and burned and warped under the hideous contortions of magical battle. Dolohov’s sinkhole widened, and there were flames in the trees. There was no time for anything at all.

Harry broke free of the petrification with a gasp. He grasped Hermione’s shoulder and heaved for breath. “What did she mean, about my mother?” he demanded. He stood up, swaying. “Do you know?”

“No idea,” Draco snapped. “Probably it was a lie to bait out Sirius, which, predictably, worked. Put the Cloak on— better yet, give it to Granger, I’ll Disillusion us—oh, Merlin, you shithead—”

Harry had twisted out of Hermione’s grasp and had raced up the steps, towards Sirius. The Cloak whipped around his shoulders, and he vanished.

“God damn it,” Hermione hissed. “I’m going to kill him. No! I’m going to let you kill him, first, to get the method right, and then I’m going to kill him, only slower, and differently — come on.”

It was bravado; she was palpably working herself up. Draco touched Hermione’s hand. She took his quickly, and tightly, and held on as if it were the only object gravity were still operating on.

She drew her wand, cast Disillusionment, and led them into the old townhouse.

Inside, the parlor had been shredded. With curtains drawn, it was so dark they had to find their way from the glittering embers scattered over the stairwell. Something had ripped up the stairwell like spines on a dorsal ridge and left gaping holes in its wake. The wallpaper peeled and wilted from panels of scarred wood and, in some places, scuffed stone; some of it smoked. The hallway to the kitchen was a bombed-out, smoky black, and the floor piled with rubble like a desert tundra. Under the hole of Walburga’s portrait there was a stain of something red and visceral. When they passed the burnt brass shell of the hallway mirror, glass crunched under Draco’s boot. Directly ahead, in the drawing-room, the shadows writhed together in a violent ballet of shade and light.

In the heart of the room stood a more violent dance still: Bellatrix Lestrange and Sirius Black, wayward daughter and prodigal son, dueling in a tiny supernova of light and holy fire.

Wherever Sirius wasn't, Bellatrix was. She cut a white rift in the air above her, and he shot a blue charm on the backhand, which exploded together under the chandelier in a fountain of splintered wood and glass. The shrapnel hit a Shield Charm balanced on his wand-tip, which swallowed three bolts of green light and then vanished as she shot something sinewy and red. Sirius swayed back in an elegant dodge and she slashed her wand into the opening — blood sprayed, it had nicked him — but Sirius had used the move to flick a curse sidelong under her guard, and though she counterspelled it, the recoil rocked her back, so she moved, too, shifting the curse, curling it around her waist like a physical liquid, flipping it back at him with a new thread of black spikes. Sirius spun his wand in a wide circle over their heads; the air shimmered as something blue and scaly came into being, forked tongue hissing — and now his guard was down, so she ducked under his arm and slashed her wand again, and two Death Eaters who had been readying their wands fell in a blaze of green light — and the thing over their heads was sprouting wings, roaring — and Bellatrix was everywhere, all at once, shooting spells and deflecting curses, and Sirius at last with a gleeful howl released the ice dragon, and as its wings spread open it drove deep gouges into the wood of the rafters, like claw-marks. The house gave a whining groan, and the ceiling sagged.

“Where is it?”

That was Bellatrix, impatient and shrill. Draco stepped quickly behind the doorframe, hauling Hermione around and out of sight.

Bellatrix grunted and met the dragon with a sweeping fan of fire that forced Sirius to dive behind the sofa. It killed the creature, but it also snapped up and caught the tapestries on the wall. They kindled and burst into flame, casting the room in a hellish red.

“Where did you put it?” she shouted. “Where is it? Where is it? I know you have it!”

“Whatever it is, it’s at the bottom of a flea market in Knockturn Alley,” said Sirius savagely, “if Mundungus Fletcher is the man I hope he is — pawned for sickles to a mudblood beggar, or trickled down to a muggle charity shop—”

“Enough! I know you stole it! Where did you put it?”

“If I gave a fuck what you meant, I still wouldn’t tell you,” he spat, and jabbed his wand at the floorboards. They erupted underneath her in a trapjaw, snapping closed with deadly force around the space she was: Bellatrix slipped out of the way, executing what Draco identified as a truly beautiful sidestep, and the jaws closed on empty air. “Missing one of your trinkets? Fretting for your childhood thumbscrews?”

For some reason, this found purchase under her skin. Bellatrix scoffed in anger, and flung an armchair at him. It shattered in an explosion of upholstery and mahogany against the mantelpiece, and Sirius hardly had to duck. “The ring!” she cried. “The ring that bears the crest of Black! Where is it?”

Sirius gaped at her, and gave a harsh laugh. “Ask your lady sister,” he said. “Or your lord husband, maggots take him. Bella, baby, why the fuck did you think I had your ring?”

“The vault’s been emptied,” said Bellatrix thinly. “A blood-sealed vault. Did you really think you could lie to me? Tell me where you put it.”

“This is hilarious stuff,” gritted Sirius, throwing a Killing Curse. Carelessly, she kicked an ottoman at him, blocking it. “So your gaudy junk went missing. It’s not even the real ring! It’s your new-money knuckleduster replacement crap. The real one’s somewhere out there in Reg’s grave. I bet his ghost nurses it like a binky.”

“Tell me where it is.”

“No idea! Ask your lady sister, the vault master, you fucking moron —”

“Cissa wouldn’t take it! It was mine, she well knew!”

“Oh, well, if you told her to,” Sirius drawled, dancing back from her curse. “I’m sure she did it, then. Quite your whelp, wasn’t she? Small matter of killing her husband, water under the trollbridge, between chums — hah! I don’t suppose it occurred to you! Did it? That she wouldn’t forgive you?”

Bellatrix threw herself at him. In midair she became smoke again, like her body belonged only temporarily to the physical plane, dissolving and reforming — Draco’s heart jerked — far too close, on the inside of his guard, too close for him to party — and with a shout that was more contempt than anger, she tore her wand diagonally across his chest.

Blood sprayed high and thick and dark over both of them. Threads of it draped their faces and soaked through the leather of Sirius's breastplate, pouring fast onto slick floorboards. A gouge opened in Sirius's chest so deep it flashed white bone.

Sirius dropped to his knees. One hand fumbled at his chest, and came away soaked. In the light of the burning tapestries the color hardly changed, but thick trails of it ran down his wrist when he lifted it, slowly, before his eyes. He listed and caught himself on his wand-hand; his aged, handsome face was slack with dazed surprise.

Bellatrix stood over him, her arm still extended in the finishing pose of her stroke. She could have finished him easily, then, with a Killing Curse or any other crowning blow, but she didn't.

Harry ripped off the Cloak and tore out of the shadows, dodging Draco's desperate grab at his arm.

"SIRIUS!" he screamed. It was an awful sound; an orphan's sound, Draco thought, with the part of his brain that wasn't dumb with dread. "SIRIUS!"

He threw himself over Sirius's body. His breath came in audible wet gasps. Sirius rocked back, blinking. His hand drifted lightly over Harry's shoulder. He sagged down and caught himself on one elbow.

"Run," he croaked. "Go, kid. Run… I can… get you time, buy you…"

It was not clear he knew what he was saying. His eyes were unfocused. Harry fumbled to heal him, but Episkey spluttered uselessly against the depth and breadth of the wound.

"James, you can still make it," said Sirius.

His arm went out from under him. His head knocked hard on the floor.

“SIRIUS!”

Hermione gave a muffled scream. Draco dragged her further in the shadows, ice-numb. Harry was there. Hermione was here. They were too far apart. Bellatrix could take all of them at once, it wouldn’t matter, she would kill them.

She would kill him. She’d killed his father, and she’d kill him. She’d kill both of them and she’d make him watch and then she’d make him die.

Bellatrix lowered her arm, flexing her wand-hand absently, and cast a glance around the room. She seemed disinterested in Harry, for the time being, likely more preoccupied with whatever it was she wanted — the ring. The ring for which Sirius Black had died.

Hermione was tearing through her pockets for something, whispering frantically to herself. Draco gripped his wand and tipped his head against the wall, trying to steady his heartbeat.

He risked another look into the drawing-room. Bellatrix had thrown back the Turkish rug — now so bloodstained as to obscure the print — and, swiping her fingers through the pool of Sirius’s blood, she had begun drawing a rune on the darkened floorboards. The reflected flames of the tapestries flickered over her dark brows, drawn intently in concentration. She worked steadily, adding each dot and mark with care; the lines of her pentagram were unblemished and crisply angled, no worse than Sinestra’s.

Harry was crying into Sirius’s chest. His hands were dark and shining with his godfather’s blood.

Hermione drew something from her pockets with a trembling exhale. It glinted silver in her hands. Phoenix tears.

“I need an opening,” she whispered, and her voice had never shaken more, but her hands were steady. “If we can get her away from Sirius —”

“How.”

“Distract her. I’ll get her attention—”

“No.”

“Then hide me,” she begged, “so I can heal him. Draco, he’s going to die, and Harry will never come back.”

It was true. Her face was furious, streaked with fire, gold where it wasn’t red or shade. He was angry at her for suggesting that either of them risk their lives for Sirius Black, only it was an imperfect anger, because he’d been thinking of the same thing.

“You do a better Disillusion.”

“Two charms,” she said. “Disillusionment and Muffliato. Then I’ll heal him, and we’ll all head for the Floo. Harry first, then you—”

“No.”

“Fine! We both go at once. But Harry first, with Sirius, then us. If we’re fast, we can do it.”

If they were fast, and lucky, and perfect, possibly. He didn’t say that, though. He nodded shortly. Hermione took a deep breath, wrapped her hands around the tiny vial of phoenix tears, and ducked into the room.

Bellatrix’s back was turned, working at a rune. Draco placed his foot on the seams of the boards and moved lightly, the shimmer of Hermione’s charm so strong he could hardly focus on his own boots. The nerves in his body were chattering with a blind and uniform panic. There was so much blood he had to take care not to trip.

Outside, the sounds of wizards dueling came in muffled thunder. The sirens carried on an endless lament. Bellatrix's hand slowed, and then finished the loop with a short stroke of her third finger.

Draco gestured with his head. Hermione slipped around the corner, darted along the wall, and dropped to her knees beside Sirius, shoving Harry off without preamble. Harry gave a gasp, and she clapped a hand over his mouth, her eyes wide and searing.

"I wouldn't," said Bellatrix.

She hadn't turned her head. His blood was ice. It did not move. Nothing moved, not even his heart. Hermione had frozen with her hand on Harry's mouth.

"It's a waste," she added. She wiped her hand on her prisoner's skirt and stood. "You're young wizards. Brave ones, if you saw that and didn't run."

Bellatrix turned. Draco felt it like a physical touch, a slap of cold water.

Her expression tightened, quizzical, and he saw the dark darts of her pupils flicker up to his hair.

"You love the boy," observed Bellatrix. Drained of contempt, her voice was an odd thing: low and hollow, hard-edged, and it might even have been compassionate. It was hard to reconcile with the reality, so recently demonstrated, of her enormous capacity for cruelty. "You would have run if you didn't. Well, it's no crime. If it is, it's not one my Lord won't forgive. Here is his mercy, and mine: Neither of you have to die here."

Harry pried himself free of Hermione. "Hermione," he gasped, and Draco was seized with an awful, choking premonition too late to stop the name from slipping out, in a desperate unthinking slur: "Draco, go, run, listen to her!"

He kept pleading, but Draco's hearing kindly winked him out. At the word Draco, Bellatrix's head cocked to one side, and her expression sharpened into fascination.

"Draco," she said softly. "Yes, I thought so. Your face resurrects him."

He found his voice, inconceivably, somewhere at the bottom of a cask of fury he'd kept on ice for a long, long eight years.

"I wouldn't know," he said coldly. "He died some time since."

Her expression was difficult to read. It was intrigued, faintly vulpine, equally devoid of guilt or blame. Bellatrix began to cross the room, picking gracefully around the broken furniture. There was something in the way she moved that was like an animal, a large one, moving with deceptive lightness. "You're my heir," she said. "I held you in my arms when you were a baby. I thought of you often, in Azkaban."

Of all the things he had thought she might say, this was so far beyond predictable that he struggled to pin the reality of it in place.

"You thought of me."

"Of course I did. You, and the Dark Lord. They were the two thoughts that kept me alive," she said, with bizarre simplicity. "Those, and your mother. How is she? Has she married again?"

"No."

"Good. More children would only be a danger. Their sire would breed them against you, and you'd war for the succession once she died." Her face twitched in a way that might have been a smile, or an effort at one, in a hideous way. "Under other circumstances, it could be quite fun."

"I don't understand." His head pulsed with the ache of trying to reconcile her with what he knew. She had killed his father. She had tortured the Longbottoms to insanity. She had made Neville an orphan. She had probably made many orphans.

But she was a person, then, in front of him, with oily skin and prison greys, and greasy ringlets in her hair; and she had told them to run, so she wouldn't hurt them; and she had told what he was fairly sure was a joke. It was impossible. It couldn't fit, it would break, it would break anyone who tried to understand it.

"What don't you understand? Tell me. I will make it plain."

"You killed my father. You speak as if— you speak as if you didn't."

Her face cleared. "Oh," she said. "She didn't tell you. Of course she didn't; how cruel that lovely girl is. Draco, your father betrayed us. He sold himself to the Ministry for a short leash—"

"I know that."

"Then I mistake your question. I saved a thousand of our Lord's servants from your father's treason. I saved the Lord himself, in ways you are yet too young to understand. I speak to you as family."

"I speak to you as the son of a man you killed," he said, furious. It pitched him beyond fear. "You took my father and buried him. I don't care what he did."

Bellatrix blinked.

"You're older than I thought you would be," she said, after a moment. "The years pass differently inside. I hoped to return before you were a man. I don't know why I thought you would ever understand, growing up with your mother."

It was worse for the way she delivered it: without apology, which he would not have accepted, and without sympathy, which he dreaded to think he might have.

Hermione had been working while they spoke. Unstoppering the vial, she poured its contents in a thin stream over Sirius's wound. Pale steam guttered from the body, and tendrils of muscle reached for each other, replenishing the flesh that had been lost. A corded rope of scar tissue rose over the wound, cinching the cleaved folds of skin together. Hermione followed the path of the healing with her wand, bolts of sweat shining on her face, muttering spells. Harry cradled Sirius's head in his lap, watching her with an expression that would have over-honored Merlin himself. But Sirius did not stir.

Draco realized that Bellatrix was still looking at him. If she knew what Hermione was doing, she didn't care. Possibly she hadn't meant to kill Sirius, or hadn't cared to, or perhaps she merely knew she could again, once Hermione's efforts were finished.

"What do you want with Potter?" he said roughly.

"Do you care for him?" she wondered. "Is that why you're here?"

"I don't want him to die," he said, which was true, if incomplete. He shifted away from the others, subtly. If could keep her attention until Hermione had finished—

"The Lord doesn't want him dead. Potter has many uses to him yet. If he were meant to die here—" Suddenly, Bellatrix looked over his shoulder. "Rookwood, it's not here."

One of the Death Eaters stood in the door, his robes tattered and smoking, his brown curls hanging low over his eyes. He put out one of the flaming tapestries with a flick of his wand and braced himself against the wall.

"Then we should away," he said raggedly. "Before the others come. The auror child bested Dolohov."

"Good God, he's out of practice," Bellatrix said in dismay, stepping around Draco. Her hand brushed his shoulder, a fleeting and absent gesture, as she moved around him; everything in him froze still. “Where’s Nott?”

“Commanding the dementors. He’s neutralized the red one and the blonde.”

“He’s done well, then.”

“He is a whinging dog.”

“Those are often competent,” said Bellatrix, “and I have uses for them. Augustus, meet my nephew: Draco Malfoy, this is Lord Rookwood, Death Eater.”

Rookwood focused on him intently. “Lord Malfoy,” he said, in glacial tones of respect, and extended his arm. “Good tidings.”

“I’m not Lord Malfoy,” he said, revulsed. It was the only thing he could think to say. The light was thick and red and nauseating. It made Rookwood’s face seem unearthly, swollen with malice, a demon-face.

“He’s sixteen,” said Bellatrix brusquely, and stepped between them to cross to the door. Rookwood withdrew his arm, his eyes glinting. “My lady sister is his regent. I’ll escort him back to her when we’re finished.”

“Be swift in it. We have a long journey ahead.”

Hermione drew back from Sirius, who still did not move. Harry shook his shoulder weakly, to no resolution. Draco’s stomach sank. If Sirius had died already, the healing wouldn’t matter. They were a powerful palliative, but they couldn’t bring someone back from the dead. Hermione watched Rookwood and Bellatrix move around the room with wide eyes.

The door to the house flew open with a scream of hinges. The figure that emerged into the firelight was sallow and thin, and wore highcollared black robes.

Severus Snape stepped over the threshold, tossed ashes from his hems, and glanced down at the fallen body of his old school foe. Surprise registered in the briefest flare of his eyes. Draco could not help it: he was relieved to see him. He almost called out to him, but he clenched his jaw to stop it.

Then Snape stepped over the corpse, forcing Hermione to dive out of the way to avoid being trod on. Harry gave a wordless snarl at him, clutching Sirius's head to his chest.

Bellatrix watched him with a calculating expression. Snape glanced at Draco, and though his eyes narrowed, he said nothing to him.

"Hail the Lady Lestrange," he said. He swept into a bow so deep it seemed faintly mocking.

Bellatrix twitched in irritation. "Hail, Severus," she said. "The eternally turning worm."

"I hardly think I deserve that," said Snape, straightening. "I have served our Lord faithfully these many years."

"Faithfully! I should strike you down for saying the word."

"If you thought he would forgive you that, you would have," said Snape smoothly. He folded his hands behind his back. "So at least one of you is mistaken in me. Does the Lady doubt her Lord?"

Her lip curled, and she scoffed, turning her back on him. "It's not here," she muttered instead of answering, kicking a bit of rubble that had once been an armchair. "Black hid it from me."

"I see," agreed Snape, blank-faced. "And did killing him further your interrogation?"

"It furthered my pleasure," she said pointedly. "Which is the disposition I find myself in, at present, Severus."

“Could I request that you adopt a more productive disposition, at your convenience? Far be it for me to deny you sweets, but you were dispatched for a purpose, and you are not the only one whose displeasure has a body count.”

“We’ve laid hands on Potter,” Rookwood said. “He wants the boy. He’ll be pleased with us for that.”

“Leave him to me,” said Snape immediately. “I’ll see him to our Lord, and deal with the spares. You stay, and complete your purpose.”

“It isn’t here,” snapped Bellatrix.

“Have you searched thoroughly? I see you have attempted a heartsblood pentagram. You intended to scry the ring, I assume?”

“It wouldn’t have worked. You can’t scry that kind of artifact.”

“Certainly not with an unfinished pentagram,” he said.

“Maybe I shall use your heartsblood to finish it.”

“It could only improve your chances.”

Rookwood stepped over to Harry and tore him free of Sirius as casually as one lifting a dog. Hermione gave a cry, and Draco looked sharply at her. She was crouched by the hearth with her wand gripped close to her chest.

“Enough chinwag,” said Rookwood. “I’m taking him back.”

“No,” said Snape.

“Severus,” snapped Bellatrix. “Let him take the boy. You cannot possibly begrudge him this one pearl—”

“Potter is sly and cunning,” said Snape, “and I, knowing him better than either of you, am best suited to handle him.”

“You piece of shit,” Harry said raggedly. “Try it, Death Eater, see how you handle me.”

“Silencio.”

Snape’s wand moved so quickly Draco didn’t see it. The spell whiffed out Harry’s voice, though his mouth kept moving in savage shapes.

“You’re hardly one to fear a child’s cunning,” said Bellatrix.

“Potter has twice evaded our Lord. Your arrogance will make it thrice.”

Draco’s heart pounded. Snape had not holstered his wand after Silencing Harry.

“Rookwood,” said Bellatrix suddenly. “Take Potter. Go.”

Rookwood dragged Harry forward by the collar. Snape stepped into his path. She inhaled, and inclined her head with a knowing condescension.

“Severus,” she said, “in the name of our Lord, his right hand, and first knight, commands you to step aside.”

“The right hand may command all it likes,” said Severus softly, “but I take my orders from the mouth. Ones that even you are not privy to. Give Potter to me, and I will deliver him.”

“I have always loathed you,” Bellatrix said softly. “I have always mistrusted you. I never understood why the others didn’t! Whatever amusements Mulciber found in you… What in Merlin’s earth compelled Lucius to take a half-blood runt under his wing. He was never one for pity.”

“Much in this world can be laid at the feet of half-blood runts,” replied Snape. “Give me the boy, and I will relieve you of the burden of my presence.”

Bellatrix tilted her head almost indulgently. She drew back the sleeve of her left arm, revealing a swirling tattoo that swallowed the plane of skin from wrist to elbow: a skull and a snake, twined around each other in a black ouroboros. Her fingers skimmed low over the ink.

The curse flashed. A jerk of her wand deflected it, and it sizzled out at her feet. She stepped back and grinned at him.

Snape lowered his wand, his shoulders sinking.

“What a gift,” she breathed. “What a way to celebrate my liberation! Oh, I’ve wanted to do this for years. You didn’t even make me wait.”

“Bellatrix,” said Snape, and he stepped sideways, slowly, while she matched his steps in reverse. Draco realized what he was doing: turning the axis of the duel, opening a route to the hallway for Draco. “You were in prison this morning. You have fought one bout already. I have not. Consider carefully whether you can best me.”

Her smile vanished, and a snarl replaced it. “Best you!” she said. “There’s old audacity, with its blind eyes! Does a storm weigh its chance against the vane? Did I hesitate for Amory Bones? For Wulfred MacKinnon? For Galatea Merrythought? The last man to best me brought an army. And on your best day, you were nothing more than a bumbling alchemist, fretting at your notes and theories, studying the shadows of greater wizards on the wall.”

Snape struck on the word shadows. His first curse was a beauty, a swarm of white blades arcing out of the air, converging on her like a razored school of eels. Bellatrix raised her wand with a conductor’s poise, and she gave a delighted little laugh, as if she found nothing in the world so splendid as this effort to kill her.

Her wand glided gracefully down. The blades melted and swirled into liquid light on her wandtip. She rolled her shoulders with a dancer’s grace and whipped it back in a swarm of tentacles that swarmed across the floor, leaving bubbling ruts of acid in their wake. Snape conjured a lattice of spongiform black beneath them that drank them up and gnawed at the floorboards. They dueled in a dreamy and grotesque style, less of the sparring stroke-and-parry of the classical duel, and more like a ritual showcase of horrible ways to die.

But Bellatrix was stronger. It was evident in three movements, and obvious in four: Spells that took Severus seconds to compose were shredded at her glance, and her movements were offensively lax, parsimonious, graceful, to the point it seemed effortless. There was an element of dance in them, of pleasure. She laughed when he slipped something deadly past her guard, as if it couldn't matter, and it didn't. She twisted his every spell into something more monstrous and lassoed it back at him. A noose of thorns sprouted at her touch into a bloom of poisonous flowers, which he siphoned from the air with a gust. A conjured snake she split open in midair, blood fountaining, and transfigured each shred of skin into a razor-toothed worm, which scurried towards Snape with terrible shrieking before they died in a blight of heat at his wand.

Reality bent and twisted at the flutter of her fingers; her offhand seeming to conduct the air around her wand as it jumped and darted. Magic hung thick in the air, static flints jumping from her fingers and hair. The air around them distorted in a fish-eye shape, which he recognized a second later as their wards.

The first six movements passed in a matter of seconds. A sideboard exploded under a redirected Bombarda, and Draco threw a Shield Charm to shield himself from shrapnel, the force of which drove him back on his heels. He slammed into something hard and tall and found himself staring down Rookwood.

Rookwood darted forward with his wand close to his body, arm bunched for a thrust — he was too fucking fast, unnaturally fast — tossed away Draco's probing strike, and knocked him on his back with an unusually blunt punch to the chest. It had enormous strength behind it, and threw him into the wall with a starry blot of pain when his head hit the wood. The killing blow didn't come: Rookwood hauled Harry into the hallway, backlit by the burning tapestries and the exotic fireworks of the duel, and passed Draco by. Rookwood was too dangerous to think the mercy was incidental.

Small hands grabbed his collar. Hermione had screamed something; his head swam and he heard his name.

“Draco!”

She was panicking. Her eyes were glassy, tear-tracks of fear slitting open the grime on her cheeks, and she was wild in how she touched him, ungentle. Her bloodied hands flew to his neck, cheek, temple, leaving warm smears of something on his cheeks. He clasped her arm, blinking spots out of his eyes.

“Fine! I’m fine! He’s got Potter!”

“I KNOW! Catch— get to — more—”

He couldn’t hear her over the duel. Hermione seized his hand and tugged, and he ran with her around the corner, into the shattered hallway. Rookwood was almost through the door with Harry when Hermione pointed her wand and shouted: “ULCERATIO!”

Rookwood whirled and caught the curse on his forearm. Sores ripped up the skin, angry and red, ballooning the skin from wrist to arm. The man barked and barely clasped his wand, which was clutched in a growing mass of sores. It was not without pride that Draco noticed the blood that wept between sores, the yellow swell of infection peeling the skin. She had learned it beautifully. It was almost better than his.

Hermione panted, twitching her wand back into first position, and threw another curse at his ankles, which missed. Draco saw the twitch of Rookwood’s swollen wand-hand and threw his arm up to counterspell the curse that lashed back at her. Rookwood dropped Harry, who landed on his knees and gasped for breath, clutching his throat. His wand slid from his pocket and rolled, skittering out of reach.

“That was a poor idea, child,” said Rookwood. His pain showed in the whistle of breath through clenched teeth.

“Fuck you,” Hermione said, and she was so angry she was shaking. There were years of anger in the adrenaline gleam of her eyes. Too angry for a clever reproof, nothing witty in the risk of death. She cursed him again.

A net swirled from her wand. It was thin as gossamer, but it had weight, and snared Rookwood’s ankles. It caught him, and he severed it with a lash, then threw Bombarda. It detonated at their ankles. Draco swept the blast up and out of the way, shattering another chandelier, raining glass and wax against Hermione’s shield. Draco lobbed a curse low as she threw one high, and he understood as if he’d already seen it what she was going to do, where her body would move next; he moved to cover it, and found the hole in her guard, threaded a counterspell through it to block Rookwood’s curse, and when he lashed a charm overhand Hermione ducked to throw a Stupefy at his knees, forcing Rookwood to backstep.

Harry’s wand sat just to his right. As Rookwood lunged, Draco sidestepped off his line, and Hermione intercepted the curse that Rookwood shot into the opening. Draco kicked Harry’s wand back at him.

Harry snapped it out of the air, rolled on his back, and shot a spell that hit the guard at the same time as Hermione’s Everte and Draco’s Vermicarnis.

Rookwood blocked two with a neat zigzag movement: two, but not three. Draco’s spell hit him square in the sternum, and he staggered back, clutching his chest. The fabric of his shift started to ripple.

A hole peeled open in Rookwood’s chest, and a thin pink worm nosed out. Another one opened in his stomach, followed by a second worm, which wriggled out and then burrowed back into the skin.

Across the skin of his chest, dark holes sprouted and spawned a wriggling, fleshy mass of worms, which squirmed and chewed their way back into his body. Rookwood roared, and his hands spasmed, torn between the obvious desire to beat them off and not to touch them; he thrashed in pain. Blood beaded and wept from the holes as the worms feasted on his skin.

Harry barked an expletive and scrambled back from him, leaping to his feet. Hermione stepped back, uncertain, but in her horror there was a glint of hard, angry satisfaction. Rookwood staggered out of the house, into the smoky dusk, and Apparated with a crack, leaving a wriggling trail of worms in his wake. He was gone.

“Is it going to kill him?” said Harry hoarsely.

“I don’t know,” said Draco, feeling numb and cold, because he didn’t. “I’ve never used that spell before.”

“Holy shit, Draco.”

“I didn’t see you saving either of us,” Hermione snapped, and Harry flinched.

“I didn’t mean — I’m not saying it’s—”

“Good, I hoped you weren’t. I’m sure you weren’t going to say anything about his methods, Harry, when Draco fought a Death Eater for you, if it weren’t for his exceptional skill with a wand, you might be halfway to the North Sea—”

“Hermione, I wasn’t!”

She had stepped in front of Draco, her hackles high, as if he required guarding. It was deeply touching; also, vaguely discomfiting, since she was shouting at Harry as if she might curse him next. “And you know, I’m glad he did cast it,” she shouted. “I’m glad I watched that happen to him. I’m bloody glad Draco was here, so Rookwood didn’t kill me. I’m glad Draco made him suffer. I’m glad it wasn’t peaceful or civilized, I'm glad that I got to watch someone do something half as bad to him as what he would've done to me. I'm not sorry. I'm not fucking sorry. I'm not going to roll over and die. Draco is the only one of us who can fight worth a damn, don't you dare tell him not to, don't you dare, you're not allowed to—"

"Hermione, I didn't say that! You're panicking, listen to yourself—"

"I'm fucking terrified!" she snarled. "There are Death Eaters and dementors here and Sirius is dead, and my parents are out there, and I'm about to die—"

"Hermione, please!"

"—and you leave Draco alone, he's the only reason I'm fucking close to safe, you're certainly not—"

"Granger," Draco said roughly, pulling her back from a stricken Harry. She snarled at him, but she stilled when he touched her, snapping her jaw closed around another invective, and breathed hard through her nose. "That's enough. I appreciate it. It's not the time."

"I can't," she said, breathing quickly, "I can't breathe, I'm going to—"

"You're not going to die. I won't let you."

"We're all going to die, there're Death Eaters — I'm not a duelist, I can't fight, Harry can't fight, the only one of us with any experience is you—"

"I'm good enough," said Draco intently, threading his hands in her hair. There was blood on them, now, Sirius's. He pushed it aside. Couldn't think about it. He could do that; doubtlessly Hermione understood the situation better than any of them, that was why she was terrified, but he could close down those thoughts, he could force himself to be steady and even and cool. "I can be good enough for the three of us. I can. I'll get us out of here."

“You can’t.”

“I can. Trust me. Tell me you trust me.”

Hermione gripped his wrists, and closed her eyes. With a shudder, as if some violent spirit were going out of her, she stopped shaking. She said: “I trust you.”

“There you are. Come on. I’ll get us out of here.”

He began turning to Harry, but a shadow darkened the doorway. His wand snapped up of its own accord.

The shadow sharpened as it stepped into the dull red light of Grimmauld Place. It was Narcissa.

A great swell carried him up and seemingly off his feet, a dizzy, free-falling delirium of relief. It was his mother.

“Mother,” he said, reaching for her. “Mum.”

She flew at him and caught him in a fierce embrace. Her arms crushed him to her chest. Her ring grazed over his skull, heavy and cold. Her breath shuddered out of her.

“Draco,” she whispered. “Draco, I’m sorry. Forgive me. I was awful. Mummy was selfish. I’m sorry.”

“Forgive you — yes, it’s fine, I don’t — we have to go. We have to go now.”

Narcissa laid a bruising kiss on his temple and withdrew. “The Order is coming,” she said briskly. “They’ve been delayed. The Floo network is policed, and many of the public grates are shut. Take Granger and Potter to the Manor. Stay there until you get word from Albus Dumbledore — from Albus Dumbledore, and no one else. Let no one through the wards. Not even those who wear familiar faces.”

“What about the others?” rasped Harry. “They were fighting outside — Tonks, and Bill, and Fleur—”

“Nymphadora Tonks incurred heavy injuries in her duel with Dolohov. She was lucky to survive, at that cost. Leave her: she will only slow you,” Narcissa said curtly. “The Weasley and the Frenchwoman I found swarmed by dementors; it took all I had to save them. You may tell Molly Prewett, that self-declared wardenness of other women’s sons, that my debts are paid.”

“Tell her yourself,” said Draco, his heart skittering. “Where are you going?”

Narcissa ignored him and clutched his arm. She gripped Hermione on the shoulder, so high her thumb almost dug into her throat. “Never leave him,” she hissed, and the firelight kindled her dark eyes with manic intensity. “Never. Kill anyone who tries to hurt him. I trust you to do it; you are a fierce creature, and you will fight like a demon. I see it in you. I bless it. It will take all the fire in your soul to survive what comes. They will rip your happiness from your arms and bleed it to death while you watch, if you let them. They will tear your heart’s treasure limb from limb and gnaw on his bones — if you let them. Girlchild, you must do anything but let them. Break every law. Defile all altars. Become any monster, before you let them.”

She jerked Hermione forward, and — Draco started — pressed her mouth to Hermione’s ear. Hermione’s eyes flared, and she made to shove Narcissa away, but she stopped as Narcissa whispered something to her. Her expression shuttered.

When she was finished, Hermione flinched away, and Narcissa released her, with a savage satisfaction in the twist of her mouth.

She kissed Draco on the forehead, and said: “From any distance, my darling.”

Then she pushed him away. He stumbled back. Narcissa turned and moved into the entrance of the parlor, and the wave of fresh light washed her face red.

“What are you doing,” he said sharply, reaching for her. Hermione held him back. “What are you doing?”

“We have to go,” Hermione whispered unhappily. “I’m so sorry. Draco, we have to go.”

“Absolutely not. Absolutely not — what is she doing? Let go of me. Granger, let go of me.”

“I’m sorry! I’m sorry, I’m so sorry, we have to get out—”

He pried free and ran into the parlor, ignoring Hermione’s cry.

Inside, the tapestries had guttered out, and the light was so dull it was almost night. From small smoking bundles on the floor the only light of the room dappled the walls, red and dreamy, like a vignette from Baudelaire. His gut twisted at the scene.

Snape lay at Bellatrix’s feet, bleeding profusely from a stump where his left arm had been. His face was a warped mask of bruising and scars, his nose collapsed and crooked sickeningly to one side, and when Draco saw him it pierced his chest with a cold certainty that he was dead. The tiniest lift of Snape’s chest proved it for a lie: but relief was not long, for Bellatrix paced the room nearby. The wrist of his severed arm, which bore the Dark Mark, she broke with a stamp of her boot.

“...emperor strung by his own phylacteries,” she spat. “Nothing less to expect from a half-blood worm… You ought to beg me to kill you; when I turn you over to the Dark Lord, you’ll long for the death I’d have given you. How many of our failures were brooked by your treason? How deep is the knife you laid in the spine of God? Why, Severus, you must weep for honor: he may even kill you himself.”

She did not notice that two people slipped into the room, the first smoothly, with a step that did not hesitate at the horrorshow that awaited her; the other stumbling after her, and caught in disgust at the door.

Narcissa presented herself in the low kindling light, her spine straight, her shoulders thrown out and back to accentuate the proud shape of her carriage in her jade-green robes. Pieces of cornsilk hair fluttered around her face in a coy frame. She was splendid, beautiful as a bride, with and despite the deep lines in her face. After a moment, she smiled.

Bellatrix stared at her. The tremor in her face seemed torn hatefully from her, an unwilling concession to fear or fury or whatever it was. Then she lunged.

Draco's arm seized for a curse, but Bellatrix didn't attack Narcissa. She cleared Snape's body in a single leap and threw herself at Narcissa, and Narcissa stepped forward, with a broken sound, and buried her face in her sister's shoulder. Draco's hand twitched, and he lowered his wand, paralyzed.

The two women huddled together as if they were trying to enter each other's skin. Bellatrix gripped the back of Narcissa's head, her yellowed nails digging into her skull, and pressed her face into the crook of Narcissa's neck, nosing at it with terrible sounds; Narcissa laughed wetly at something. She clenched Bellatrix's shoulders and shook her, a bit, to dislodge her. Bellatrix went freely, and when her face lifted again it was wet and shining.

"Cissa," she said. "You came for me. You heard I was— you came."

"Yes," murmured Narcissa, and the lie jarred him in its ease, "yes, of course. Of course I came."

"You didn't visit me. Years and years, I waited for you, and you never came."

"How could I? How could I bear it, to see you brought so low?"

“Weakling,” said Bellatrix, and the spite was heady with affection. “You craven wretch, you’re not fit for use nor ornament. You abandoned me to that place because you couldn’t stomach it?”

“It’s what I am,” said Narcissa simply. “How could I help it? I’m sorry, Bella. I would have come if I could bear it.”

“I know,” she admitted. Her matted curls veiled half of her face, and the half that wasn’t shone. “I know you couldn’t come, poppet. I know. You’re only a fairy-girl. A cruel, shriveling, soft little fairy-girl, with hollow bones and knives for teeth.”

Narcissa said, “That’s a bit much.”

And Bellatrix said, “That hair is a bit much. Did your house-elf swap tar for soap?”

And they laughed together, a harmony of two notes, high and low. Bellatrix clasped her again to her chest, like a child pinning a squirming pet.

“Go now, with Mulciber,” she whispered giddily. “He’ll take you, and your boy — Draco — I met Draco! Cissa, he’s a fine thing, isn’t he? So proud, so angry — lost his way, of course, but you did the best you could, and I’m here now, there’s so much I can do with him.”

A whisper of fabric brushed Draco’s wrist. He jerked around. Hermione stood behind him, her finger pressed to her lips, the Cloak half-draped around her shoulders. She tugged on his arm insistently, and he knelt to let her draw the Cloak around them both, and pressing close to his side, so it would conceal them. Her arm lifted above them to hold the Cloak over their heads, and he could feel her heartbeat jumping against his arm. She exhaled, steadily, and a bead of sweat moved down her cheek. Unsteady, and unable to speak for fear of giving them away, he tapped her twice on the back of her wand-hand, and she gave an unsteady twitch of the mouth: You’re welcome.

Narcissa took Bellatrix's wrist and drew it away from her shoulder. "Bella," she said, in a honeyed trifle of a tone. "Run away and live in a Death Eater camp? Bunk with Mulciber and Dolohov, and ride out to hunt werewolves on thestralback, burning effigies to keep warm? Recall that you and I read very different kinds of novels."

"Don't be a priss. You'll have your silks and sweets. But—" She refocused, abruptly, on Narcissa's hand. The sentence died on her tongue.

"What?"

"You idiot," said Bellatrix, with awestruck woe. "You perfect stupid thing. You wore it?"

Snape had begun to stir. His right hand groped feebly along the baseboard for something. His wand rested a hairsbreadth from his bloodied fingers.

"Wore what? What are you talking about?" She followed Bellatrix's gaze to her hand, which bore a black diamond ring inset in a thick band of goblin silver. "This? It's your signet. It came with your effects."

"It's not yours!"

"It's the Black sigil. What on earth are you talking about? Do you want it back?"

"It isn't the Black ring," said Bellatrix, on the edge of a hysterical laugh. "Cissa, that's mine. That is —it's not even mine, it's his."

"His? Whose? Roddy's?"

There was a beat. Smoke guttered from the embers of the tapestries. Narcissa whisked her hand out of Bellatrix's grasp, now very pale.

"No," she said. "What do you mean? No."

“Why did you wear it?” said Bellatrix incredulously. “Did you long so badly to be the heir, that you…? Surely you knew it wasn’t Orion’s.”

“I thought it was yours,” Narcissa exclaimed. “I thought it was given to you by Father, or Regulus, as a gift.”

“And you still wore it?”

“I thought it was yours.”

Snape’s hand closed around the wand. He dragged it along the floor, moving with a languor that could have been weakness or subterfuge, and pointed it weakly at his severed stump.

“You and your softness,” said Bellatrix, her dark eyes shining. Her fingers grazed Narcissa’s cheek. “My little tower princess. You don’t even know how you’ve saved us. He’ll love you as I do, after this.”

Narcissa flinched. “I don’t want that.”

“I know you don’t. Don’t worry, he knows you’re mine. Here, poppet. Give it to me.”

Snape had staunched the bleeding on his wound; the scorched reek of cauterized flesh joined the stench of smoke. He gripped the sideboard and gnashing his teeth, he dragged his body upright. The effort drained him, and he had to stop to gather breath.

“What happens if I do?” said Narcissa, her voice small.

“Everything goes back to the way it was. Only better. You come with me, and they never part us. No more fathers and teachers.”

“And Draco?”

Draco twitched. Hermione clenched his arm.

“Draco? He’ll come with us.”

Narcissa closed her eyes. The breath she drew seemed to break something in her throat on the way out. When she opened her eyes again, it dislodged a tear, which she removed with a calm and surgical daub of her knuckle.

She said, “Severus, I can give you seven minutes.”

“I could do it in four,” rasped Snape, “but I appreciate your vote of confidence.”

The look she flashed at him was not amused, but freighted in its place with a shocked, angry species of gratitude. She might have laughed at that, Draco thought. It was the kind of joke his mother would have liked. Someone who knew her would have known. Snape peered back at her through swollen eyes, with textbook impassiveness, and dipped his chin.

She pried the ring from her finger and passed it to her off-hand, where it vanished into her fist. Bellatrix moved to take it. Narcissa held her ground, and twisted her offhand behind her back. It had the effect of shifting her shoulders onto a duelist’s line.

“What are you doing?” said Bellatrix coldly. “Stop conspiring. Give it over.”

Snape braced himself upright against the sideboard, jerking the sallow hair from his eyes. His wand etched a complex pattern through the air, more script than gesture. As he muttered, a rosy gleam suffused through the air over his wand, as if someone in the next world over had turned a light on.

“I forgive you,” said Narcissa.

Bellatrix smiled quizzically. “For what?” she said.

“For Lucius.”

Bellatrix’s eyes sealed over with something flat and cold.

“For him?” she repeated. “You forgive… me… for him?”

“For killing my husband,” Narcissa said calmly. “Yes.”

“He betrayed you. He broke his oath,” she snapped. “He made fugitives and prisoners of us, our families—”

“You left him to rot in Azkaban.”

“And so he should have rotted in Azkaban,” snapped Bellatrix. “Did you think I would have left him there forever? I would have freed him. I would have fought to free him, for you, dull fool that he was. And if it were your life at stake, I would have felled the prison to do it, wandless I could have done it, with bloody hands — and what? He loved you so little he could not sit in silence for the same purpose?”

“He did it for me. And for Draco. He wanted to watch his son grow up.”

“And that was enough for you? You didn’t care, then, that he betrayed us — that he betrayed me—”

“I did care.”

“Not enough! If you forgave him that, it was because you never cared for me!”

Narcissa winced. “I do not grant that,” she said. “I say that I loved him. I would have died for him. I suppose you couldn’t countenance that, really,” she said, kindly enough. “You would never permit me to die unless it was for you.”

“Don’t say that like it makes you proud,” Bellatrix hissed, and her venom failed to disguise injury. “You insipid fool. Of course you’d die for him. You’d have died for anyone that gave the order, you were too fucking simple to do anything else. That’s why he married you.”

Narcissa shrugged.

“I loved you first,” she said simply. “I loved you the day I married Lucius, and I loved you the day I buried him. Strike me down, and you will cut down a creature that loves you.” She added, “Then again, you always did enjoy doing that.”

“Silencio!”

The curse flew high and wide of Narcissa, who did not move. It splashed harmlessly on the wall.

“I’m sorry we made you marry him,” she said, in even tones of sorrow. “It was a mistake. We should have rallied around you. We should have protected you. We were all you had, and we left you to die. I’m sorry.”

“You had nothing to do with my marriage. Don’t flatter yourself.”

Narcissa tilted her head. “No, I didn’t,” she said. “I should have. They should have had to pry me from you with an awl—”

“Be silent, Narcissa!”

“—should have cut my hands off at the wrists before they released you. If they had tried to marry me to a man I despised, you would have killed him before he touched me,” said Narcissa, lifting her voice. “You would have burned Witherfell before you let him take me from it. I should have done the same for you. I should have fought; I could have won. Not a day goes by where I do not wonder what would have happened if I had not betrayed you.”

“As if you had any power—”

“I could. With Andy and you together, we could. You were our courage. That’s why she left, I always knew it,” she said. “She loved you more than any man, but you were gone, and I was not enough.”

The curse slit the air between them with black lightning. Narcissa turned her chin and it sizzled past, inches from her cheek. Bellatrix did not even speak, but kept her wand aloft in warning.

Narcissa lifted her own wand and shifted stances, her offhand rising to hover about the hip, her wand outstretched in the overhand grip. The old grip. The old way.

They dueled.

Her wand snapped up in a perfect parry. Perfect glide into a perfect riposte into a perfect counterstrike. And for every perfect deflection, Bellatrix hurled another perfect attack, a flawless curse, a ruthless thrust, coming down the piste like thundercloud unfurling, raw magic rippling the air around her in a dizzy storm of humid sparks. She feinted right and yet Narcissa stepped left, gracefully quick, without even a deferential glance at the feint, to parry the spell. A conjured whip of thorns was withered to ash in a single blast. Ice spikes ripped up from the floor and she dodged them a three-step so smooth it was almost a waltz. Jinxes shattered on her guard in a pepper of fire that her wand caught unerringly, as if magnetized.

Her cool dark eyes held unerringly on the point of Bellatrix's wand. Her body moved as if it knew what would happen three seconds ahead, as if she had done all this before, and had been doing it, without relief, for a hundred years.

"Prometheo," said Snape.

Fire poured from the air like a river of liquid sunlight. It coalesced into the shape of a beast, but it was unlike any beast Draco had ever seen in flesh or book: a bulbous arthropod with a sectioned carapace and an underbelly studded with long claws that propelled it through the air like fins, a forked tail that frothed and spit with tufts of flame. On its shoulders perched a skull and not a head, with four hollows instead of eyes where black coals guttered, with great serrated mandibles that dripped smoke. It snapped and swam through the room, leading a trail of fire that snapped up the walls in thick tongues.

Narcissa and Bellatrix were still dueling. There was no opening for anyone to intervene. The way they were moving, any curse stood equal chances of hitting Narcissa.

Hermione was hauling on his arm. The roar of Snape's conjuration drowned her voice, but he read the plea to run on her lips.

"My mother," he said numbly. "My mother—"

"Draco, please!" Hermione was pulling him. Her panicked eyes swam to him through the smoke. The fire left them the color of tarnished galleons. Her hands found his face and tried to pull him to look at her. Her hot trembling fingers were still sticky with blood."You have to leave!"

The walls were burning. Smoke billowed from the walls, the floor, the ceiling. The roaring and spellfire congealed to a thunderous ringing in his ears. The house gave a groan.

A splintering CRACK was the only warning. A portion of the rafters collapsed. Hermione dove out of the way. They shattered around his head. The log that descended on him broke his Shield under a momentous blow, and he was knocked to the side. Hermione screamed his name and vanished behind a falling piece of the ceiling, guttering in flames.

Draco tore himself upright. He couldn't breathe. He couldn't see her. He shouted for her and didn't hear his own voice. His Aguamenti spluttered against the fire and merely added steam to the darkening veil of smoke. He shouted for her again the burn in his throat seemed to spread, down his chest into his lungs, into his bones, until his body was on fire, everything was on fire with panic.

And then there she was: caught under a piece of the wall that had collapse, her Shield glittering ferociously under the enormous bulk of the wood, and her teeth bared and face knit in effort and the relief was a single split second of cool.

He threw a Levitation Charm like a snare and it shoved the wall to one side. The wood leaned away from her and collapsed in an explosion of kindling and embers. Hermione's Shield vanished as she gasped for air. He seized her by the arm and dragged her up, and she clutched his forearms, coughing hard.

Hermione shoved herself upright, breathing raggedly, and pointed her wand. "Ventus!"

A gust of wind barrelled down the corridor of flame, splitting it open around the gleaming deer. It laced a narrow path through the burning wreckage to the door.

Snape's fire demon made another round of the room, letting out a screech that shook the foundations of the house. Spells flickered back and forth from the flames, but he couldn't see the casters. He shouted for his mother, but there was no answer. The silver deer stamped the ground in agitation, nosing at the path to the exit.

With his heart in his throat, he gave a snarl of wordless, hopeless frustration, and shoved Hermione in front of him. They staggered out of the burning parlor, through the collapsing entrance hall. The portraits had melted ghoulishly under the onslaught of flame, and the brass of the mirror had warped, dripping on the floor in a glowing molten pool. Turkish rugs lay in black spiderwebs of ashen thread. Embers rained from above as burning parts of the ceiling dropped like comets. All the ghostly splendor of Grimmauld Place howled in a cascade of fire and ash.

He grabbed Hermione's hand and ran to the door, her fingers sweat-slick and tight in his. They were so close; he could see the soft clear twilight of the night beyond, the clear purple, and he could almost taste the waft of fresh air from beyond the burning doorframe. Hermione cast another Ventus and it knocked the flames away in a billowing curtain around the door, and her foot had crossed the threshold when something snared the back of his shirt and wrenched him back, tearing his hand free of hers.

The flames snapped closed around her as she whirled around. They closed on her face in a rictus of horror. She screamed, “DRACO!”

A hand fisted his collar. The nails scraped the back of his neck.

He twisted and lashed out blindly behind him with all of his strength. Something connected — something cracked — there was a female cry of pain.

Draco landed with a hard dazzle of pain on his back and threw his hand up, with a wordless cry, to block a curse he could not stop, but it never came. Instead, Bellatrix swore and clutched her mouth, where blood beaded from the lip he’d split with his elbow. Embers guttered in her hair, and a cast of smoke and cinders paled her hair to a ghostly shade. She grimaced and spat blood beside him. Then she thrust out her hand, her palm streaked with an indistinguishable smear of ash and magical residue, her fingernails blacked with it.

“Take my hand.”

“Where’s my mother?”

“They seek to destroy the ring — he has seduced your mother to his treasons—”

“Let go of me—”

“She has condemned us all—”

“LET GO!”

Bellatrix screamed in anguish, threading her hands through her hair. “I cannot,” she cried, “it is too much, I cannot bear it, I will not, I can survive no more—”

The house fell above them, and she tore herself away with a cry that vanished into the scream of shattering wood.

The ceiling came down at once, a shower of black beams with an unfurling bloom of red behind it. Draco's Shield came too late.

A beam dropped on his head, and the world went out.

For a moment — it could have been minutes, it could have been hours — he floated in the world outside the world, blank and numb.

"DRACO! GET UP!"

He was flung off his stomach and dropped on his back. The house was still burning. He was caged between beams. His head seared; up and down rotated each other at a frenetic quickstep. He had no idea how long it had been, but Bellatrix was gone.

When the three sets of vision blurred together, Sirius Black stood over him, his bare chest corded with scars, wearing a shirt of his own blood, frail and wild and viciously alive.

"There you are," he shouted. He seized Draco by the collar and rattled him hard, loosing a raucous cough from Draco's chest. Sirius's face swam in and out of smoke and dizziness. "Get up! GET UP! Gotta get out of here!"

"I can't—" He could hardly breathe in the smoke. It hurt to talk. "Can't walk—"

"Then I've got you," Sirius said grimly, hauling him upright by his shoulders. "Hold on to me — HOLD ON! Up! UP! Attaboy, Draco — steady! Steady! Oh, you'll live, I tell you!" He gave an unnerving, hysterical cackle as Draco staggered upright, and they lurched together for the doors.

Sirius blasted Bombarda at the beams in their wake, shattering what remained of the walls, and charged through the wreckage with a warrior cry. The night swelled before them, still and cool. "That's fucking RIGHT!” he roared. “You and me! Come on! We’re not dying here!”

He slung Draco’s arm around his back, and clutching him tightly, Sirius hurtled onto the stoop.

Fresh air filled his chest in a buoyant rush. Sirius staggered down the stoop and laid him carefully on the pavement. His lungs shuddered, seizing around the smoke.

“Alright,” muttered Sirius, shifting his wand-grip. “Think I remember this one. Dispefumum.”

The smoke slithered out of his throat in an eerie, sucking rush, and he snapped his head back as it poured from his mouth in a rippling snake. He gasped and dropped back down as his lungs drew full of clear, gorgeous air, and his blood sang with oxygen. His vision cleared. Sirius sat back on his haunches, grinning in exhausted satisfaction.

Seven days of bombing could not have done worse to the street. The magical battle had left it charred and distorted, the asphalt melted like butter and swirled in bizarre shapes, trees uprooted, cars smouldering. The dementors were gone. Draco tried to speak and found his voice a withered shell of itself.

“Where’s — Hermione? Where’s Potter?” He tried to sit up, and Sirius pushed him back down, gently.

“Rest a second,. You broke anything?”

“No — where are they? Get off me.”

“Order took 'em,” said Sirius, and jerked his head at the empty street. “Your bird fought like a hellion, by the way. Didn’t want to leave you, went a bit mad for it. Think she splinched Kingsley trying to stop him from Apparating her.”

“The Order came?”

“Yeah,” said Sirius, scratching his temple with his wand. “When I came to, I dropped the Apparation wards. Let them pop right in, instead of coming longways from the Floo at Arabella’s.” He paused. “Was I dead?”

“You were close,” he rasped.

“Huh,” said Sirius. Then: “Am I dead?”

“No. Hermione saved you. She had — phoenix tears.”

Sirius set his jaw. He sat back, elbows braced on his knees.

“Not sure I would’ve advised that,” he said, at length. “Those are pretty rare.”

“You weren’t available to consult,” Draco snarled, clambering upright. “Next time, don’t lose. Where did my mother go?”

Sirius blinked at him. “Your mum?”

“Yes. My mother.” His heart started running again, a slow, hard beat at the bottom of his ribs. “Did the Order take her?”

“I didn’t see her. You mean Narcissa was here?”

“You didn’t see her leave? She didn’t — Bellatrix didn’t take her, either?”

“Last I saw Bellatrix, half my guts were pouring out of me,” said Sirius. “What was Cissa—?”

“Thank you, Sirius.”

A shadow carved through the lamplight. It was Dumbledore. He wore robes of midnight blue that trailed, and his hair was bound back with a piece of silver twine. He carried his wand: a long and knobbled thing, with a simple leather hilt.

“My mother,” said Draco unsteadily.

“Step back, please, Draco.”

“My mother was inside. With Snape. Her ring—”

“Draco, I must insist you step back.”

Dumbledore lifted his wand and flattened his offhand delicately against the air. He closed his eyes, and drew his wand slowly back.

A current of air rippled around the house. It raced up the walls in tight spirals of wine so strong they rattled the shutters of houses down the street.

The flames guttered as the air above them was ripped away. With the oxygen whisked up and away from the source of the fire, the glow faded from the windows. The remaining layers of coal-dark bricks, once so fine, slumped and skittered finally to the ground under twists of shriveled ivy. Smoke unfurled in a black sheet, billowing from the dead-eyed house.

Dumbledore, with a slight effort, bent his arm and conducted the air in a vast current that rippled off across the street, blowing the trees nearly flat to the ground. Cars skittered away from him. His robes thrashed, and his hair snapped in a long white tail.

Then he lowered his wand, and the street went still.

Draco shoved past him and raced up the stairs.

The parlor was a blackened ruin. Thin grey strains of twilight filtered through a hole in the roof that reached up through the successive floors, revealing a biopsy of carnage in the burnt house. Embers floated amongst drifts of smoke. A pair of figures huddled in the corner of the room, crouched against the mantel, shrouded in a cast of thick ash. The shining remains of a runic circle lay on the floor around them, burned-out from use.

Bellatrix held Narcissa's head in her lap. The younger sister lay on her side, her body a slender stripe of fallen marble amidst the wreck. Snape was gone.

Bellatrix was crying. It was a surreal act; her face did not move, and the clamp of her mouth did not unseal, but her shoulders shook, and tears ran from wide, raw, red eyes.

Wood snapped under his feet when he knelt beside them. Bellatrix lifted her head.

"Draco," she said.

"Is she," said Draco. His head was a clean white slate across which a single thought raced in nauseating circles. "Is she? Mum."

Bellatrix moved Narcissa's head, tipping it towards Draco. Her hand spilled open, and the ring tumbled out of her fist.

The fire had melted the outer cast of goblin-silver, warping it open to reveal the ring beneath it. The original setting was a thin band of gold, and under the outer diamond sat a pyramid of black stone, which had split open at the base from the setting. It was weeping an oily black substance.

"Mother." He shoved her shoulder, roughly. "Mother? She's not conscious. Did you Ennervate her?"

"Draco."

"What did you do to her?"

"I didn't do this," said Bellatrix roughly. "The fiendfyre — she took it on herself to extinguish it."

"Where was Snape?"

“I don’t know. I would have killed him, if he were in sight. He poisoned her—”

“You’re lying.” His voice was calm. He did not know why it was so calm. “You dueled her. You killed her.”

“Not for her life. I would not.”

“You expect me to believe that?”

She thrust out her arm. “Bind me to the truth,” she rasped. “I will make the vow Unbreakable. I did not kill her.”

“But you survived,” he said. It was not calm, he found, so much as emptiness: something in his mind that was failing to spark, flint scraping fruitlessly against steel. “You did. And she—”

Bellatrix shook her head. She bent over Narcissa, pressing their foreheads together.

“Get off of her,” he said. The flint caught. “Get the fuck off of her. Get off—”

“Draco.”

“Don’t touch her. It’s your fault, you killed her—”

“I did not!”

“She wouldn’t have been here if not for you!”

“I never touched her,” Bellatrix rasped. “I never struck to kill—”

“If you hadn’t come, if you hadn’t told her what that fucking ring was, if you’d stayed the fuck away from us, if you’d died—”

If he’d never said no, if he’d never turned back, if he’d done as she asked. If Sirius Black had never been born. If the wind had changed, if the Hat had lied.

“Draco Malfoy, I own my share of your vengeance,” Bellatrix said. Her dark eyes radiated under a gnarled fringe of curls. “I owe you a father. I own it. But this—”

“Bellatrix.”

Dumbledore’s voice brooked a flutter of warm wind, stirring the cinders. Bellatrix jerked her head up, and scrambled back, still clutching Narcissa.

“Professor,” she spat. “Come to see all that you have made?”

“Let her go.”

“Do you really find nothing in yourself to blame for this?” It had all a teacher’s condescension without a teacher’s kindness. “No guilt, still? I suppose by now the remorse would have killed you. Perhaps it finally may.”

“Remorse is not a killing thing,” she said. “The weight is never quite enough to snap the neck.”

Dumbledore sighed. “We both know tonight is not the night you die,” he said. “Leave Narcissa, and take your leave. Your master calls.”

“I will bury her in the soil of Witherfell. She belongs there.”

“You lost a sister. There is a boy here who lost his mother. Leave her.”

“She is mine! She was mine, she was not yours!”

Dumbledore lifted his voice. “She belongs to the boy she chose,” he said. “Just once, can you try to see her for what she was, and honor it?”

Bellatrix stared at him, wide-eyed. “Strike me,” she said suddenly. “Strike me, old man. I know you want to do it.”

“Bellatrix, you tire me,” Dumbledore said contemptuously. “If you seek to suffer, ask your Lord. He will give it to you. But leave my sight. You are despicable, and you are not even opaque.”

She wailed, and pressed her head to Narcissa’s. Dumbledore’s wand twitched.

Crack. She disappeared.

With her gone, Narcissa slumped to the floor. Draco caught her and lowered her, trying to cushion the back of her head.

Her eyes were closed. That was good. She could be sleeping, with her eyes closed. An angry burn trailed down from her neck under her hemline, but when he pulled the flap of her robe closed he could only see the crown of it. That was also good. And her hair was spilling out of its knot, gathering dust, which she would hate, so he gathered it out of the way and tried to pool it on her shoulder. She had smudged her makeup and he rubbed it off her cheek with his sleeve, but that was dirty too, so he left it alone. And her hat was gone. Where was her hat? She would want it.

He reached for his magic, but it failed. The current that ran through him had been stoppered; he could not focus, he could not think. There was nothing in his head, and so the magic eddied fruitlessly around him, clenching his muscles in its longing to manifest.

“If you will permit me,” said Dumbledore, and sat down beside him. Watching the old man lower himself was a bizarre experience: the mundane resettling of robes, the way Dumbledore hitched his trousers back on his knees. He wasn’t supposed to do that. He was supposed to be above that. It made Draco furious.

“It’s a horcrux,” he said roughly. He picked up the ring and pitched it into Dumbledore’s lap. Dumbledore peered at it without touching it. “The ring. The fiendfyre was meant to destroy it.”

“It did.”

“Snape broke his cover to save Potter. My aunt cut off his Mark.”

“I can imagine.”

“Why was he alone?” he bit out. “Why didn’t the rest of the Order come with him?”

“Severus had heard of the Azkaban break before Nymphadora’s warning,” Dumbledore said calmly. “He had earlier notice, and a shorter distance to travel. He came from Little Hangleton.”

“I don’t know where that is.”

“It doesn’t matter.”

That was probably true.

“A child is not his mother’s keeper,” said Dumbledore, as if he knew the first thing or last thing about her, as if he knew everything and grieved it.

“My mother,” he said, as Narcissa continued not to move. There was something heavy bearing down on him. It was not yet painful, but it soon would be, and the dread of it was almost worse than the pressure it exerted now; soon he would wake up, though, and she would be alive again. He would wake up and he would be eleven. He would wake up and he would be eight, and both of his parents would be having breakfast in the drawing-room, murmuring to each other about unknowable grown-up things. He stopped. Started again. “My mother was.”

But there was no more. That was the end of the sentence. It was the end of everything: my mother was. The seconds that raced past carried him further and further away from her, into a black and monstrous is; but Narcissa Malfoy slipped inexorably into the past, still and quiet, like a figure on a receding train station.

Next chapter, 10/19/25: "The Princess's Tale."

The Princess's Tale

Chapter 81: The Princess's Tale

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

The Manor’s shadow fell in a black crosspiece on the north lawn, a carveout on the green. Venetian windows burned with the hellish gilt of a red sunset between alternating ribs of brick and marble on the palladian facade. Wrought-iron gates sealed up the worn driveway, over which the beginnings of a gnarled overgrowth were moving in a slow vanguard of ivy and moss.

The guests were due at eight o’clock. Draco waited in the drawing-room until Briselda, who had been adding mourning sheets over the portraits, announced at seven that the stationmaster at the local train had signalled, and a half-hour later, a hesitant and respectful: “They’re at the gates, milord; shall I bring them in?”

Little point in correcting her form of address. He went himself to the portico and waited there for the thestral carriages to pull up the drive, their black bodies shining leathery and burnished under the setting sun.

It would be the first time since Grimmauld Place that he saw more than one person at once. For days he had lived in blindness, without knowing what the wizarding world was coming to, or if indeed it still existed. When word came, it came only by way of Fawkes, and it was spelled in Dumbledore’s spidery hand.

The Ministry had resumed function, under the leadership of Runcorn and a new cabinet. The Wizengamot had been dissolved, without a set date for its reformation, and many of the representatives from the Populares party were in hiding. Clemency had been declared for the prisoners recently escaped from Azkaban, and the prison itself had been shuttered, with remaining inmates moved to other facilities. The auror force had been eradicated, though there were still sightings of people who looked like aurors throughout the countryside, apparently patrolling, though on what power or authority, no one quite knew. A state of emergency had been declared. There were lights on in the Ministry building, and none of the public had been inside since it reopened.

There were mass Obliviations of muggles taking place in and around Islington. What good it would do, Dumbledore was not certain, as no degree of Obliviations could overwrite public memory of such a hugely distressing event, especially one that had left visible evidence of damage at Grimmauld Place and King's Cross. The muggle government had to take notice, and it did; the Daily Mail called it a terrorist attack, and the reports of cloaked figures swarming in the sky were cabined as hallucinations, induced by distress. Dumbledore assumed that some journalists and representatives had been taken under the Imperius Curse, to abet the coverup. He doubted it was a genuine effort to maintain peace and order in the muggle world, but rather an attempt to repel international attention; breaching the Statute of Secrecy, at least without any good-faith effort at cleanup, brooked investigation from the International Board of Arbitration and, at worst, the European Confederation of Wizards. Not that help would be forthcoming from that square. Barring breaches of secrecy, the international wizarding community tried to leave nations to manage their own domestic affairs.

Dumbledore's letters discussed these realities with a frankness that surprised Draco. They did not seem calibrated to soothe or assure him; they were hard, clear, and direct. He was grateful, in some sense, for the absence of illusion, though it cast no great light on the dark corridor of his future. But then, he supposed that Dumbledore no longer had anything to gain from the pretense of calm.

The world was falling. Draco stayed at the Manor. He lived on coffee and toast points. He planned his mother's funeral.

The morning of the ceremony, he had watched the sun rise from his window. If he'd slept he didn't remember it. A stack of unopened

Christmas presents lay at the foot of his bed, tressed in satin paper and silk ribbon, with notes in a hand he recognized. He'd forgotten them over the winter holiday, but they'd remained there. Now they sat obdurately at the foot of his bed, wearing a thin cloak of dust.

He had tried to open them. He'd gone so far as to pick one out — a small one near the top of the pile, in green gilt wrapping-paper with a brocade of poinsettias. He'd brushed off the dust on it. Broke the seal on the wrapping.

As he did it went through him like a cold knife that he had undone something she did with her hands, and it would never be back to the way she put it.

He put it back where it had been. He nudged it to get the angle right, then again, though it still seemed different, somehow. Upon consideration, he threw a cloak over the pile. The unchanged silhouette quietly rejected the attempt.

Draco slammed the door on it, and went to tell Briselda to open one of the guest rooms for him.

Not that he'd used it. In the three days since he'd dozed, if at all, in armchairs in the library, or at his desk, or simply slipped out of consciousness for an hour or two while in the middle of some other task. It did not help abate the surreality of the occasion, when the day of the ceremony came.

The gates, which stood closed at most times of the year, had been thrown open, and up the mossy drive rattled just two carriages of mourners, most of whom had not known the deceased: Albus Dumbledore, who had left through the same gates only a few hours earlier, after helping finish the spellwork for the ceremony; then Arthur and Molly Weasley, both wearing gold-hemmed mourning robes and caps not out of place in a scullery; and with them, Harry, Ron, and Hermione, an assortment of people she would have been hard-pressed to tolerate at a garden party, much less the final celebration of her life.

Hermione jumped out first, forcing the footman to scuttle back, her hand up to shield her eyes from the sun. Catching sight of Draco, she broke into a run. Her hair twisted with visible strain into a chignon, and she wore her school uniform with a black shirt and gold earrings, all of which fell into disarray when she climbed the stairs two at a time and leapt at him.

Their bodies collided, and he grabbed her; her momentum threw her off her feet and swept her around. It shielded her a little from the others, who were disembarking at a courteously slow pace from the carriages. Her body was hard and heavy in his arms and some of her hair sprang free of its confines to greet him, too, showering around his face in a cascade of feathery touches. He wound his arms around her waist and held her tightly, and she kept gripping him tighter and tighter, too, as if it were not close enough, to be skin to skin, as if she intended to climb inside him and plant her flag in the war-ravaged territory inside his chest.

She was the first person he'd touched, since — well, since.

Hermione pulled back a few inches — he didn't let her go far — and her eyes skittered over him. "Draco," she said, and of all the ways she'd said his name, of the hundreds and thousands of variations, it had never been so heartbreakingly sad. His eyes burned at the way she said it, and so he kissed her, partly to hide them.

She made a muffled noise, pained, and kissed him back. Her lips parted around a sad gasp, and she was crying, a little bit, or he thought she was; it might have been him, probably was, didn't matter; the heat of her mouth was the only warm thing he could feel, and the rest of him gravitated to it in abject desperation. She cradled his jaw in her hands like a delicate object and kissed him with a soft, gentle movement of her lips, but he wanted more heat, and he pulled her tighter to him to try to get more of it, flattening her against him. He wanted to be warm again. This was the only thing that did it, it was the only thing that had the reach.

Her hands glided down his shoulders and stroked his arms, gripping the sleeves of his robes. A startled, hesitant noise tore out of her throat when he nipped her bottom lip, and she turned her head just far enough to break the kiss. “Sorry,” she said. Her breath was hot and rough against the underside of his jaw. “I wanted to say. I’m so sorry. I know she—”

He didn’t want to hear any of it. He’d reviled the approach of this evening because he knew he’d have to hear so much of it, and so he kissed her again, a selfish kiss, a hard fast clash of lips and tongue, which made her twitch in surprise. “Don’t say it,” he said. “Don’t. You don’t have to say it.”

She understood, or seemed to, and nodded. He was relieved and grateful. “I won’t apologize, then,” she murmured, “but I should have been with you. I didn’t want to leave. They took me. Kingsley Apparated me, I didn’t ask him, I told him not to.”

“I know.”

“I shouldn’t have let them. I won’t let them, again,” she said, with a flicker of bitterness. “I should have splinched him.”

“It’s better you didn’t,” he said, even as he imagined it: he nearly smiled. “It wouldn’t have helped.”

“I don’t give a shit if it wouldn’t have helped,” she said. Her strident voice wavered only slightly around the expletive. She was so young, and so old, and he noted that loved her, very abruptly and painfully. “You wouldn’t have been alone, when — anyway. You aren’t alone now. I won’t leave unless you tell me to.”

“You really don’t have to do this.”

“Please, just — I know it’s uncomfortable and you don’t want to hear it and this is the worst time. I know. And I wouldn’t want me to comfort me either. And all the things the books say to do are mawkish and banal and you’d hate them. So we don’t have to talk about anything, we don’t have to talk about this ever again after today if you don’t want to, and God knows I wouldn’t want to,” she breathed, “but you don’t have to be alone here, after this. You do know that. You can come stay with me, or — if you want to be here, I’ll come and stay with you.”

“What about your parents?”

“I’ll sort that out,” she said, with a forceful indifference. “You shouldn’t have to worry about them.”

“No, but I suspect that one of us should.”

She twitched in the irritated way that meant he’d struck true. “If it really matters, you could come stay,” she muttered unhappily, “or, or get a hotel room in London, or something, or—”

It was a conversation they didn’t have the time or space for. Dumbledore was climbing the steps with a slow, ambling gait, his attention vested courteously on the trawling jasmine.“Later,” he said quietly, as the others crested the staircase, and she trailed off, uncharacteristically helpless. At Dumbledore’s approach she put her arm through his, almost warily, as if she might be taken away from him again.

Arthur touched him on the shoulder as he passed. After six months of recovery from his injuries at Christmas, he could speak only a few words at a time, and the cords of scarring on his throat meant they came out at a mere whisper. Nevertheless, he uttered none, for which Draco was grateful.

Molly had brought flowers. That was funny, for some reason.

“Briselda will take those,” he said. “Thank you.”

“My dear,” she whispered, and her lips wobbled; but Ron cleared his throat, and she moved along, briskly roping Briselda into a hunt for a vase.

“Sorry,” he muttered. He wore his school uniform with a gold tie instead of a red one, and the knot was tied properly, for once. It filled Draco with a complex resentment. “Told her not to start any productions. Dad’ll hustle her off, if she starts bawling.”

That was decent of him. Draco nodded.

“Anything for us to do?” said Harry. “I can help, if there’s something to set up, or carry, or…”

“It’s through this way.” Draco turned and led them into the foyer. Hermione went with him, casting a glance over her shoulder. Ron sucked his teeth and clapped Harry on the back as they went in.

White sheets flickered in the periphery of each room. The Manor had been shut up while Narcissa was traveling, and much of it remained closed, doors locked, sheets drawn over the furniture to preserve it from dust. The effect was a museum of unfinished marble statues, their half-chiseled shapes left by a wandering sculptor, their contours hinting only vaguely at the artist’s vision.

A set of marble stairs led them down from the upper gardens to the family mausoleum, which sat in a shaded grove of poplar trees some distance from the lake. Warm evening, bright scent of grass. The door to the mausoleum had been rolled open, and inside, torches lapped over two stories of elaborately decorated cells, ornamented with gargoyles of iron and stone, with names carved in the stone over each gated awning. Some sported two coffins, for couples who had been buried together, but not all. Each coffin bore an engraving of the birth signet of its occupant. The Lords Malfoy sported an additional engraving of a coronet of fleurs-de-lis.

He had to unlock his father’s cell for the occasion. It was the most lavish and most recent of the graves, on a sunken level of the mausoleum under the earth, and the stone interior was heaped high with treasures. Jewels and furs, chains of goblin-gold, braided tapestries of conquest and ancestors from the Dark Ages, a suit of dragon-hide armor, the nacreous pelt of a unicorn, a whole cask of selkie pearls. In olden days the cell would have been filled with the wizard's own acquisitions, but those times were past, and it seemed undistinguished to burden an altar with deeds to investment properties. Sic transit gloria mundi: Paper and ink for emeralds and rubies. Leveraged bonds for pillaged gold.

Draco slit his thumb brusquely, with a jerk of his wand that made Hermione clench her teeth, and pressed it to the lock. The iron shuddered and the deadlock sprang free, letting the gate roll back with the shrill complaint of corroded metal. His father's coffin sat unchanged by the blink of eight years, though the spoils had started to decay. The flowers once heaped upon it had dried to strands. Like the one set to join it, it was carved entirely from statuario marble, a translucent white so fine it looked almost soft to touch.

The mausoleum wasn't the only place where they buried Malfoys. Outside, in the cooling shade of the poplars, tombstones rose from the earth like a carnival of stone ornaments: cousins, spinsters, second sons, and the few human servants whose service distinguished them so well their bones could be interred beside their masters'. In that little stone-walled graveyard the new coffin rested, brought there by Dumbledore. The Black insignia sat upon it in engraving so fine it was like a silver ink on the marble.

It was drawing closer to sunset, and the burning sky peered with beady eyes through the black walls of the poplar trees. Peacocks crooned distantly, their cries high and eerie on the silent lawns.

Dumbledore was the first to fold his robe and kneel before the coffin. Arthur and Molly followed him, arranging themselves carefully on the gold rug that had been unfurled for the occasion. Draco was about to join them when there was a creak at the graveyard gate, and a figure poked her head around the corner.

It was Andromeda. She wore a robe of exquisite gold brocade, her shoulders layered so thickly in thread it formed a sort of epaulette, with a headdress of jet and carved yellow leaves that pinned back her curls. She held herself with a stiff formality, as if she were representing an ambassadorial delegation from a hostile country.

Behind her came, like attendants, her daughter, who balanced on crutches, and a gentleman with receding sandy hair and a long, thin face, a once-prominent jaw softened by the encroachment of age, and unfashionably large square glasses. At their heels trotted a black German Shepherd with tattered ears, which sat contritely at the edge of the graveyard, its tail wrapped over its feet with uncharacteristic poise. It dipped its head, and the transformation rippled across its fur.

A moment later, Sirius sat cross-legged on the grass, wearing a black high-collared coat, gold chains dripping down the front of his shirt. He dipped his head deeply to Draco when their eyes met.

Andromeda paused with her hand on the gate, as if seeking permission. Draco realized belatedly that the permission she sought was his. He nodded to her, and she let herself inside. The Tonks family took their seats on the far edge of the golden rug. Molly shuffled over to make room for them, shooting Andromeda a poorly concealed stare.

Ron muttered in Harry's ear. Hermione scowled at him, but they fell to whispering anyway. Draco tipped his head back and tried not to laugh. He evaded doing so only by a drowning wave of self-contempt. It shouldn't have been possible to laugh.

"Castle… not… asked Mad-Eye."

"Wasn't … Black?"

"Wouldn't… safe, or… I think."

Hermione snapped her fingers at both of them with furious emphasis. Draco's eyes burned. But that was the way of everything, after Grimmauld Place. Nothing was real, so anything could still be funny. In fact, most things were funny, once nothing was real anymore.

It was tradition for the next of kin to speak first. He had ventured a few drafts of something to say — some drivel about duty, and bravery, and the things his mother had loved. But the lines turned to syrup and ash on the page, and it nauseated him, the idea of sending her away on the wings of such tepid prayers. He tried to think about her now, but she seemed so far away, and in that pitched surreality he was not certain he could remember anything about her except the color of the robes she had been wearing the day she died.

Dumbledore gestured subtly, asking to speak. Draco jerked his head at him, caring little, wishing only that the whole thing would be over and everyone would stop looking at him with their big piteous eyes.

The headmaster stood and placed his hand on the coffin.

“I will be brief,” he said, “as the departed, while she lived, often enjoined me to be. She made no secret of her opinion on my taste for digression, and I will not indulge when she has been deprived of the chance to object.

“Narcissa enrolled as a student of Slytherin House in 1966. For five years, I taught her Transfiguration, until I assumed the post of Headmaster and quit teaching. She did not enjoy my subject, or any subject, as far as I could glean. She believed, of course, that she would never undertake a career. I do not comment on that conviction except to espouse my belief — born far too late in her life for it to matter — that someone in her youth should have urged her to contemplate a broader universe of choices, even if she did not take them, even if only for his latter-day peace of mind.” He removed his glasses and gestured with them while he spoke, turning to address the congregation.

“She was not known for her interest in school rules. It was you, Auror Tonks, who broke her standing record for class absences. Unlike you, I do not believe she ever served a detention, though she followed curfew only intermittently, and appeared to come and go from Hogsmeade as she pleased. Due to her family's influence, her teachers generally declined to impose consequences. I was the lone professor, I think, who persisted in the attempt… Not until I became headmaster did I grasp the scale of the Black family's power at the school. Cygnus Black, a generous benefactor and my first Chairman of the Board, left no doubt about the kind of treatment he expected for his little girl. I confess — and if she is listening, it will doubtless please her — that she frustrated me in the extreme.

"I believe she was well-liked in Slytherin. In truth, I do not know. I have, and always had, limited insight into the social mires of that house. But I perceived her a favored prefect among the younger Slytherins, whom she always attended with great care. Children and small animals brought out the best of her; they were the only affairs capable of coaxing out her true intellect and strength of character, which, it seemed, she did her best to conceal. In the castle flood of 1971, a pipe burst in the dungeons, and Slytherin House had to be evacuated while their commons were drained. In the mayhem, a kitten belonging to our caretaker unfortunately went missing, and while the rest of her house was at work drying its socks, she returned to search for it. She found the poor creature — I never discovered how — and restored it to its master, who in his emphatic gratitude, I believe, conferred on her the right-of-way of the castle, and would never again report to me a word of any wrong she had done." Dumbledore smiled. "Perhaps she had such a reward in mind when she embarked on the search. However, I like to think she did not. I like to think that she went out because she imagined a small, frightened creature alone in the darkness, with the torches extinguished, and decided to right a little wrong.

"She was also a woman of contemptible ideas," he added, his voice deepening with sudden sobriety. "She had, as did all members of her family, a fathomless vitriol for those who did not comply with the narrow standards of her upbringing. She rejected out of hand the idea that all wizards were equals, much less that all people might be.

She thought these were regrettable but necessary truths, undeniable, and essential to her way of life. One might distinguish between her prejudice, which was inculcated by indifference and habit, and the violent conviction with which prejudice is now enforced by some of her peers; but I do not. When we forgive cruelty on the excuse of habit, we cede our moral responsibility to the past. When we forgive cruelty on the excuse of civility — because it is expressed sweetly, because it is expressed politely, because it is defended with words instead of fists — we suggest that the scores of violent hateful act without invitation; we suggest that violence has no root, it has no seed, that it is not conceived in the silence of the acquiescent. Narcissa was not a soldier, but her hands were not clean.

“And yet she died,” he said, with gravity, “for a cause antithetical to her beliefs. Let us contemplate her actions: her sacrifice. Let us say she died for us. She died for our fight, that muggles and wizards might live together peaceably, that muggle-born children might grow up welcome and safe and free. Is that so?” He paused. “No. I do not think she would have said so. Let us not disrespect her sacrifice by removing it to an altar of our own choosing. It was her life, after all; given by her, freely, for her own purposes; let us seek to understand it, as every creature deserves to be understood.

“She died for a private cause. She had lately been challenged to reflect on her beliefs: not as a source of evil, in truth, but because they posed a personal danger.” He glanced at Draco, and his face tightened apologetically. “Her son, who survives her, was becoming even early in his adolescence a different and more thoughtful person than she had been — perhaps I should say, invited to be — in her youth. He had become a man committed, by his own private causes, to oppose what she believed. She died in order to conceive a world where he might be free to do so. I doubt she admired the aspect of such a world, in her own private considerations, but she pursued it anyway, because it was the only world where her son might both love her and be happy. The great work she did in service of that goal, we may lay at his feet. But we must lay the choice with her, because she could have chosen otherwise. To deny that she chose her son freely — to suggest she was compelled by threat, or by the hopeless force of mother-love — is to deprive her of agency. I consider such an idea," said Dumbledore, looking intently at Draco, "greatly misguided. The children of loving mothers often harbor the fortunate misconception that their mothers care for them ineffably, involuntarily, as a reflex of nature; this is not so. A mother's love, like any love, is a series of choices. And to love something so well you wish it to be free, rather than to be with you, or to be as you desire it — this is the most difficult choice, and it takes the most towering strength. I beseech you all, I beseech you, to grant her in death the laurel she earned: remember her towering strength!"

His voice rebounded on the mausoleum. Molly was weeping, with a laudable effort at silence, into Arthur's shoulder.

"Given time," Dumbledore continued, "she might have rehabilitated her convictions to match her son's. But she also might not have. The answers to such questions will not come to us in this life. Even so, I am, you have learned, an unreservedly hopeful man. I would like to think that in years to come, she would have allowed her love for her son, that is, the best of her, to conquer the worst. Disagree with me if you wish. I am old — please, mask your surprise — and I have seen people more lost than she was come much farther than she had left to go. I have seen them do it with far less to live for."

He did seem old, then with the marks of time set deep in his face, and the rasp of it loud in his throat. "She was not a lost cause," he remarked. "I, for one, had great hopes for her. I wish that I had nurtured such hopes sooner. I wish I had expressed them to her when they would have meant more, and stood any chance of helping. Narcissa, I am sorry. It was my job to see in you something better than what you were, and I failed you. You would hate me for saying so, I know. But I did see it, eventually; and what I see survives you. He has your laugh precisely, and your mischief, and your wit. And if he spurns the path you would have chosen, then I charge you, Lady Malfoy, to remember your old teacher's lament: You always did like to break the rules."

And at last, Dumbledore withdrew, and took his seat.

Then they were looking at Draco again. But Dumbledore's eulogy had not inclined him to speak. If anything, the opposite. Dumbledore speaking for Narcissa had been bizarre enough: For Draco to say anything would trip the whole occasion into bleak absurdity. Anyway, he didn't know what he would say, and if he opened his mouth what came out might very well be offensive, or bitter, or cruel. Certainly it would be no consolation for Molly Weasley, who was weeping, he knew quite well, mostly for him.

He had very few warm words to say about his mother, in truth. She had gone. It seemed, in a childish way, unfair for him to have to praise her in recompense for it.

But then: What kind of son was that, who couldn't say a kind word for his mother at her own funeral? What kind of son could sink to such depths of failure in his duty? And it wasn't like he didn't know the kind things he could have said about her. He thought of them constantly. He thought of them every night instead of sleeping, all the parts of her that only he would ever know. He wanted other people to know them, to remember them, if only to take the unbearable weight of remembering off his shoulders. But it was impermissible to anoint her death by telling them. They were the things you could only tell people when you knew she was never coming back.

There was so much of him that she had understood that nobody else did, and now no one ever would.

Andromeda stood, with a rustle of skirts, and laid her fingers lightly on the coffin lid. Her frown knit her dark brows together.

"My sister," she said, faltering. She looked back at her husband, who nodded at her and smiled in a faint, anxious way. Andromeda's answering smile fought through a rictus of discomfort to reach him, and it was a hard thing to watch— that blinding axon-tip of love.

“My sister was the sweetest creature ever born in that house,” she said. Her voice was low and throaty, washed thin by tears.“Which, in truth, does not say much. She had a bitter palate. She loved our parents — that was an accomplishment. I think she even loved Aunt Wally, which ought to have earned her some kind of prize. I doubt anyone ever loved Bellatrix more than she did, and I daresay they never will. And she loved me, for a while.”

She peered down at a notecard hidden in her palm, and crumpled it.

“She resembled our mother,” she said. “Druella Rosier. Bella and I took after our father. We had the Black look, as it were. All of you know it; there’s enough of us. But Narcissa had the Rosier hair, and the Rosier… delicacy. I don’t know where she came from — you won’t find any aunts that look like her. But Mother loved it. She’d dress her up in little pinafores and parade her around at parties. It made me sick with envy. I never told her. I told her I thought it was stupid, and that Bella and I had spent the whole time playing without her, which made her cry.” Andromeda sniffled. “Later on she never cried like that. Something happened to her, the year I went to Hogwarts, when she was alone at home with Mummy and Daddy. When Bella and I came home the next summer she’d gone all cold, and she never cried at all. By the time she started at Hogwarts I’d come to see how we’d misjudged her, growing up; she was scary clever, though she never showed it off, and she had spent so much time watching us, I sometimes think she knew us better than we knew ourselves. I did try to know her, too. But I suppose it was too late, by then. She had locked something up, that year she was alone, and if she ever let it out it wasn’t for me. I doubt it was for Bella. Perhaps her husband managed it, I wouldn’t know.

“When I had Nymphadora,” she said, “I wrote letters to her and Sirius. Sirius wrote me back straightaway and came to see Nymphadora, and he brought all his friends, and it was very — well, it was a nice thing to do, and I wept buckets, even though the Potters got the sex wrong and bought her a lot of hideous boy clothes. I thought Narcissa might come too. I suppose that sounds silly of me. I didn’t think it was. After her marriage, she outranked Mother and Father both. Did you know that?”

It was not clear who she was asking. “It’s true,” she said. “And Bella. As Lady Malfoy, she was very near Aunt Wally. I suppose — well, you’ll think this is silly. I thought that would make her more willing to bend the rules. ‘Who can hurt her now?’ I thought. ‘Who would dare? What a darling; she’s gone and made herself impervious, and now she’ll be my guardian and my protector, for she loves me so.’” She flashed her teeth in a smile. “How silly of me.”

Sirius made a sympathetic noise in his throat.

“I now believe,” she said, “that I lost her a long time ago. It wasn’t Ted that did it, or Nymphadora. And it wasn’t Lucius, truly. I don't believe it helped her personality one bit to marry him, but if she never did I'd still have lost her. It happened when I got on that train for Hogwarts, with Bellatrix, and left her all alone in a big house where nobody ever laughed — but we loved each other, once. When I was a child and she was a child, in a kingdom by the sea.”

She stumbled back, and sat down. Sirius shuffled over and offered her his hand, palm-up. She squeezed it and flashed him a bright, watery smile. He leaned around her back to salute Tonks. They were at ease with each other, their little triumvirate of the forgotten.

It would have been the ideal time for Draco to speak. His father’s funeral had lasted for three hours, between all the speeches. But by now the sun had set. It could be over, if he wanted it to be.

He stood up, drawing his wand. Dumbledore rose gracefully at his example, raised his wand, and helped walk it into the mausoleum, suspended between two Levitation Charms.

The coffin settled in the hollow left beside Lucius’s. The cell had been dressed in advance with her grave artifacts: the jewels she had liked to wear, her pearls and her emeralds — her diamond engagement ring, which he had placed carefully in a silver dish beside Lucius's wedding band. A tin of her favorite caviar he located next to one of her good evening gowns, and one of Fortescue's ice cream. A taped cassette of the ballet she'd dragged him to, the summer he turned fourteen. A handkerchief adorned with the Black family crest.

When he was finished, he dragged the gate closed and pressed his bloodied thumb to the lock. The deadbolt sealed his mother's body in the crypt. The two coffins sat together. A stray thought wondered if the company would be consolation for his father's. Then he snorted, and turned away.

Outside, the mourners filed again into the glade. Draco pointed his wand up first, wanting only to get it over with, but Andromeda beat him to it.

"Narcissa," she said, lighting her wand. Lumos arrowed into the heathery darkness of the sky.

A scant collection of murmurs followed her, and beads of light darted up from the poplars. They scalded the branches with light as they passed, like a group of meteors reversing course, or angels retracing the fall.

Hermione drew her wand, briefly unclasping his hand to grasp it. Lumos bathed her face in sudden light. Her eyes were clear, but she was looking at him even as she sent the light up through the trees, her brows furrowed, her mouth a curlicue of worry. It was a breach of protocol, to do that, but he didn't care. She was the only one he didn't mind looking at him. It wasn't so much that he enjoyed it, but part of him sincerely worried if she stopped the rest of him might just dissolve away.

He lit his wand, and at the crucial moment, his tongue slipped. It ought to have been her given name, but he said, "Mum."

Stupid child. Stupid, mewling child to do that, like everyone wasn't watching.

A commotion by the graveyard's edge. Tonks had stumbled, and her crutch had collided with the relief on one of the tombstones. A moss-eaten dragon-head, probably a few centuries years old, peeled off and toppled into the dirt.

She whirled around in panic, but a harsh sound interrupted her apology. Draco was laughing.

It came up through his chest as a clean, purging burn, that laugh. The others gave him stares ranging from alarm to bemusement. None of them joined him, of course they didn't. But it was such a relief that he didn't care about the impropriety. He leaned back and laughed the laugh he would never have dared, if his mother was alive, because it was funny, and because there was no one to stop him. There was no one to stop him from doing anything. It was his house, his name, his title.

His mother, his tomb, his hole in the ground. His laughter, shattering the peacocks into a tempest of ghosts over the lake.

It was nearly ten o'clock before the light was entirely gone, and there was tea and firewhiskey served in crystal tulips in the drawing-room, although in that tall, cold, elegant chamber, with its massive hearth and high ceilings, the evident scarceness of guests chilled any embers of conversation. During Christmas, Draco remembered the vast pine tree that someone — had it been his mother? Or Dobby? Or a maid, or someone paid from the village to come, he didn't remember or he'd never asked — erected in the corner and dressed in tinsel, with baubles and ornaments.

Tonks and Dumbledore shared a private conversation behind a vase of white mourning roses, which Draco biopsied as he passed them.

"...emergency government in Cambridge," she was murmuring. "The rest of the Populares Party, or what's left of them. Half won't come because they're scared. They're choosing a Minister tomorrow, three guesses who."

“And what does Lord Shacklebolt intend to do, from Cambridge?”

“Give speeches? Take votes? Get himself killed? Merlin, I dunno. He says our military can’t be our government. Something about giving the Ministry a monopoly on public trust.”

“And this so-called military — will he be supplying it himself?”

“Yeah, I don’t know, boss. I don’t work for him, remember? This is his secretary after eight shots, not his deposition—”

“I simply find it very optimistic of Kingsley to start opposing someone with neither political nor military power, and our enemy has both.”

“Doesn’t sound like he’s opposing you.”

“Does he expect me to follow the laws he passes? By his one-party government, in Cambridge?”

A pause.

“You want someone in his office?” she murmured. “I can get people.”

“It would be nice to have some warning,” he sighed, “if he tries to interpose… but don’t threaten him. Kingsley is a good man, and a reasonable one. He knows politics far better than I. He may be right, in truth, about siloing the politicians from the warmakers.”

“...But?”

“But he believes quite strongly in transparency,” said Dumbledore. “And if I am going to produce this military miracle for him, I need a little shade to work in.”

Draco passed out of earshot, or perhaps Dumbledore had cast Muffliato, for their voices vanished into murmurs.

He found Sirius in the foyer, gazing up at one of the marble sculptures. It was an eight-foot Rhea Silvia, a twin nursing on her breast, her palla pooled at her hips. The other twin clung to her knee, his face twisted up in eternal supplication.

Sirius was smoking a cigarette. When Draco emerged from the shadows, he subtly Vanished the ash at his feet.

“Bad habit,” he said. “You want me to put it out?”

Draco consulted himself for affront and found none. The irony helped ward off the pall.

“Give me one.”

Sirius shrugged and slipped one out of his coat. Draco lit it from his wand, and his mouth filled with the foul taste of smoke.

“Old acquaintance, that one,” said Sirius, tipping his head at the statue. “Used to haunt the ballroom at Witherfell. Dad must’ve shipped it off as a wedding present.”

He tried to recall the associated myth.

“What a foul present.”

“Yeah. Foul bloke.”

The taste of smoke filmed his teeth. Stinging heat flew in his throat with each drag, like the air at Grimmauld Place, foul and thick.

Draco considered him from the corner of his eye. Sirius regarded Rhea Silvia with forlorn respect, like two immortals, commiserating.

“Remus is on assignment,” said Sirius. “I got your invitation for him, and I asked Mad-Eye to pass it along, but he said it was no contact. So. Here’s what you missed: He’d tell you he’s sorry, and you’re a good kid and it’s not fair this happened to you, or some other thing that would help, I dunno. And then he’d hug you. Then he’d yell at me for smoking. Then he’d yell at you for smoking. Then he’d yell at me for letting you smoke. You get the picture.”

“Do you have,” he said, “a cell of self-respect in your body?”

“Used to. Left it with him. Along with most of my sense. Classic Remus, I tell you, hogging all the best bits of me. Suppose he made them, so they’re his by rights, but it’s frankly childish of him to play keep-away.”

Then Sirius spoke over Draco’s effort to interrupt him: “I’m sorry it was her.”

“What?”

“If one of us had to die,” he said. “You didn’t deserve that. I’m an old washed-up so-and-so, and she had a kid. And I’d have been done in, if not for you lot. Truth be told,” he added, with a brisk and unhappy gratitude, “I owe you the kind of debt I never wanted to owe anybody again. Sorry if I wasn’t gracious about it. Nobody likes to wake up on credit.”

“You pulled me from the burning building. Forget your debts.”

“That was a freebie,” said Sirius. “Didn’t know I owed you, then. Just seemed unsporting to let another decent little bloke die in that house.” He plucked the stub of his cigarette from his mouth. “Anyway,” he said, “I’d forgot what it felt like to save somebody.”

Draco dropped his own cigarette, half-smoked, to the tile. A twist of his heel snuffed it out.

“Why didn’t you speak?”

“At the ceremony? Didn’t know her,” said Sirius, in surprise. “Wouldn’t be right.”

“Then why did you come?”

“I dunno. Same as everybody,” he said. “You called.”

This pained him so acutely he lost his words. He thought of the distance it was to Hogwarts Castle, and the pain left him surprised that he was still breathing. There was only one thing for it.

He ground his teeth together and extended his hand. Sirius stared at it. Only when Draco began tapping his foot did he juggle his cigarette and clasp it.

“Black,” he said.

“Malfoy.”

Draco turned on his heel, and left.

Andromeda and her husband had occupied a corner to themselves, studying something that Draco recognized belatedly as his parents’ wedding portrait. Narcissa was wearing a high-collared gown of gold lace with lantern sleeves, and a thin circlet dripped a sapphire from the V of her hairline. Lucius condescended to the viewer in a round-collar suit of green-and-blue brocade. The clasp of his cloak was the twin to the jewel on his wife’s circlet. The engraving on the frame read MAY 9, 1974.

“I always wondered what she wore,” mused Andromeda. “Poor thing. She was much better in silver.”

She turned to Draco, her expression innocently curious. “Did she really ride in on a unicorn, like they said in Witch Weekly? I’ve heard mixed reports.” When he didn’t answer, she gave a tinkling laugh. “I’m sorry, I don’t know why I asked you. You weren’t there. Nymphadora was at mine, you see, but your mother would never permit that sort of scandal.”

He didn’t know how to answer that.

After a moment’s hesitation, she touched her husband’s shoulder. “He was there, too. At mine, I mean! Not hers. Edward Tonks — Draco Malfoy. My nephew.”

“I go by Ted.”

“Unfortunately,” she said.

His uncle had a firm handshake, and a surly manner that conveyed hostility until it was revealed for awkwardness. At first glance, it was hard to imagine him and Andromeda falling in love. It was hard to imagine them even having a conversation. Draco was reminded of Percy Weasley, which did not enable understanding on previous points.

He wondered what had happened to Percy, in the government reshuffle. It was one of a hundred uncertainties that yawned up from the shodden aftermath of his year.

“I was rude to you, last August,” said Andromeda. “Scampered off without a word. Not a handshake, even! Terrible work. But how was I to know you were there with Harry Potter? Nobody tells me anything. And of course I supposed you’d be there at your mother’s bidding, and that she might even be with you, and I daresay nobody wanted that to happen. I didn’t even want to come, only Nymphadora bullied me into it—”

“You could have written.” He was not angry at her, but he was tired. His tone was informative. “You could have come to Grimmauld Place.”

“Oh,” she said with a laugh, “if you think your mother would have forgiven that, I don’t know what to tell you.”

They lapsed into silence.

“Before she died,” he said, “my mother and Bellatrix spoke of you.”

Andromeda blanched. Ted coughed on his drink.

“She said you left because something had happened to Bellatrix. That she had been betrayed.”

“I left because I changed,” she said, strained. “It had nothing to do with Bella. She made her own decisions. Tell me, how much of Cissa’s life did she think was my fault?”

His expression must have made her reconsider; she winced, and said: “Bella chose to get married before I left. She wanted out of that house more than I did, and she took the first train leaving the station. Even if it was twice her age,” Andromeda said, unhappily. I couldn’t tell you why a woman I haven’t known in two decades said anything to anyone. It’s likely enough she’d blame me for Bella, or Bella for me, or anyone but herself for everything in the world.”

“You think she lied to Bellatrix, then?”

Andromeda shrugged, insouciant. “I think she probably believed something that wasn’t true. Perhaps she knew it wasn’t true, and still believed it. Narcissa was good at that. She could tell herself a story so sweet and sad she’d make herself cry, and all day nobody could coax her to be happy again.”

This was an unexpectedly deep cut. “That's my mother you're talking about.”

She snickered, then. It slipped through the mask of her contrition, and he understood in a flash how someone could hate her. The Black family charm, with none of the Black family gravitas; he’d thought Sirius was a bad case.

“She’d be fed up with me,” she said. “Complaining about her at her own funeral. The opprobrium! She’d eat me up. But Bella would think it was funny.” She glanced at the window, across the darkening grounds.

Ted wrapped his arm around her shoulders. “Being here is difficult,” he murmured, formally. “I apologize.”

“It unmakes me,” announced Andromeda. “I’m not myself, when I’m here… or I’m more myself than ever. Which is it, do you think,

Edward?”

Her husband smiled at her. “That’s a riddle, not a question.”

“But you like riddles, don’t you? You were in Ravenclaw.” She turned back to Draco. “I hear you’re in Gryffindor,” she added. “That must have been an awful shock.”

Draco said that it was. Then he asked leave of her, and left the stranger to her husband, with strictly more courtesy than he thought she had earned.

His blood was high in his temples, and he pushed through the double-doors of the terrace to get some air. Anger at her presumptions faded quickly into irritation, and then into a dull, restless sort of itch. He could recognize the voice in Regulus’s letter. He recognized, too, why her memory would hurt his mother so much, so long after she had gone. Andromeda had a way of crawling under the skin.

Firelight guttered in the braziers. On the vine-tressed balustrade, a trio sat with their heads together, talking in low voices. Harry straddled the marble, while Ron leaned against it, with his arms folded; Hermione sat side-saddle on it, her robe spilling over the bustles of jasmine and bougainvillea.

Light spilled behind him from the drawing-room as he opened the doors. The three of them turned — a fleeting impression of deer, as the light reflected on their eyes — and Hermione sat up a little at the sight of him, her shoulders sinking. Her hands stilled around a twined piece of her hair.

“One almost feels neglected,” he drawled, although his heart wasn’t in it, the barb. “Did the reception bore you?”

“You were talking to Andromeda,” said Hermione, undeterred. “A bit loudly, to be honest. I didn’t want to get in the middle of it.”

“You should have.” He nudged the doors closed behind him. “It could only have improved the conversation.”

She frowned. Her gaze sharpened. “Are you alright?”

“I’m fine. Will I step on the moment, joining you?”

Ron pushed off the balustrade. “Yeah, bit cramped, this pavilion,” he said, “it’ll be a squeeze, but if you sit on my lap—”

“Don’t get excited.”

Ron sniggered. Hermione relaxed, a little, though her eyes followed him anxiously in her periphery. Draco leaned his hip next to Hermione’s, the scent of crushed jasmines blooming through the smoke and the warm night air.

The coin of the moon lay flat on the lake. He thought of Daphne.

He’d thought of inviting her, but hadn’t. If her family knew, the world would know. They would anyway, once word went around.

Theo and Pansy had, but he couldn’t invite them, either. They were not friends and could not be, on this side of the war, or perhaps any other.

He regretted that quite a bit, in retrospect. Theodore should have been there. He had cared for Narcissa greatly, and Pansy, whatever her feelings, had somehow left Narcissa with the impression that she was a “lovely girl.” They should have had the chance to say goodbye. It was his fault they wouldn’t. There was another thing for him to carry.

These things had costs: the choices one made, the company one decided to keep. Draco had expensive tastes.

“We were talking about Snape,” said Ron. “They said he broke his cover to save Harry.” He shot Harry an unpleasant look. There lay some mire of argument that Draco hadn’t begun to uncover. He found himself spitefully uninterested in them. He hoped it caused them problems; he hoped Ron had shouted himself hoarse, and it was some contentment that he trusted Ron to do it.

“So… sorry,” said Ron brusquely. “For thinking your godfather was trying to kill us all.” He glanced around. “Sort of thought he’d be here.”

He might have said I told you so, but his heart wasn’t in it; the angels of Snape’s better nature, skeletal and pallid things they were, did not make frequent appearances.

“My godfather is in hiding.”

“Yeah, so’s Sirius, but—”

“Sirius Black isn’t a target in the way Snape will be. Black is dangerous; Snape was essential. Arguably the reason they pursued Black in the first place was because Lestrange thought he’d taken possession of her ring. By her great fortune, and subsequent misfortune, my mother did instead.”

“What ring?” said Ron.

“I second that ‘what,’” said Hermione, frowning. “Why did she want the ring? And what was Snape trying to do with the spell? There’d be no possible reason to do something that destructive a closed space — unless he thought it was the only way to even the odds with Bellatrix, but the risks — well, the risks are evident, now. I thought perhaps he’d recalculated when he thought Harry was out of the room, but even then, I can’t believe a duelist of his skill would want to—”

“That’s not why.”

In for a knut, in for a galleon. It couldn’t possibly harm him now.

“The ring is a piece of the Dark Lord’s soul,” he said. “It kept him from dying when his body was killed. Presumably you can’t scry them, or else they would be significantly harder to find. That’s why Snape cast fiendfyre. It’s one of the only ways to destroy a horcrux.”

The others stared at him.

“She wore a bit of his soul?” Harry said, horrified.

“Not knowingly.”

“Have you checked yours?” said Ron, and Draco barked a laugh.

“No,” he said, “my father got a book, instead. Thank you for worrying.”

“How long have you known?” Hermione demanded. Her voice was edged with injury; she was angry, of course, he hadn’t told her.

“A year. My mother swore me to secrecy. It’s difficult to play a hand the other man can see.”

“And — and—” She was struggling not to blame him for not telling her; he watched her, tiredly, as she wrestled the feeling aside. “And so you can tell us only now, because the vow is gone?”

“Vows don’t work like that,” mumbled Ron.

“Quite right, they don’t. But since I swore on the dishonor and destruction of my house, I find myself curious what else the fates can possibly do to me.”

Hermione reached to touch him, but hesitated, fingers curling.

Draco drew his wand and re-lit one of the dying braziers. The flame jumped from his wand in a rippling arch.

“We should talk about it,” said Harry.

“I was under the impression we were talking about it.”

“Yeah, but not really.”

“Fine. I can think of no reason Harry Potter shouldn’t have his pleasure. What would he like to talk about?”

“Your mother.”

“My mother, yes. Go on. What about her?”

“She died—”

“You’ve concluded that, have you?”

“—and you blame me—”

“Do I? Why bother to think at all? Saint Potter will tell me—”

“—but you can’t blame me without blaming yourself,” said Harry, hard and flat, “because if you weren’t there, she wouldn’t have been, either. So if you’d like to hate me — and I reckon you would — you have to go through yourself to do it. Which I reckon isn’t gonna stop you. So do you want to talk about it?”

Draco threw his wand to the ground and punched him.

CRACK. The boy toppled back from the balustrade and landed in the hedges a few feet below. Hermione cried out more loudly than Harry did.

Draco rounded the post on the stairs and followed him down. Prying him from the hedges, it was easy enough to hit him, at point-blank range, and hit him again. Harry shouted and caught another blow to the face, throwing his glasses into the dirt.

The pain blossomed hot and immediate over his bruising knuckles. He didn’t throw punches often. Ron made it seem easier than it was.

“How fucking dare you?”

“Christ,” Hermione muttered, coming after him, but she didn’t stop him. She hung back, with Ron, while Harry tried to grapple free.

Their heads rolled over and over each other in the dirt, white and black, though the first was collecting enough dirt to grey it some. Draco got the upper hand and shoved him down, bracing him in the dirt with a knee on his chest.

“How fucking dare you,” he breathed, “speak to me of blame—”

“Go on,” Harry panted. “You’re right, go on.”

“How dare you speak to me of fault? If you had stayed—”

“I know—”

“Why couldn’t you stay put?”

Ron flinched. Hermione folded her arms, her expression stony, and looked at her shoes.

“Why was it so fucking hard? Why? They played you, and you knew it, and you let them, like a fucking idiot! She spent the last year of her life teaching you Occlumency for fucking nothing!”

“I don’t know. I’m sorry, I don’t know.”

“You ran away!”

“I didn’t know—”

“You didn’t know there would be fucking consequences?” he snarled. “As if you, of all people, have had a life with so few of them?”

Harry coiled into the ground, his fingers digging in the earth.

“I’m sorry,” he whispered.

“You should be.”

“I killed her,” croaked Harry. “I was there, so you were there, so she was there, so she died. That’s what you want to say, isn’t it?”

Draco stared at him. His pulse throbbed.

“Fuck’s sake,” he bit out, and shoved off him. Harry sat up, blinking, as Draco turned his back and stalked off.

“Draco,” said Ron lowly, “what are you—”

“Formal challenge,” he said shortly, crossing ten paces. The space from Harry made it easier to think. “Wands. Heel to cranium, to w— to first blood.”

“No,” said Ron suddenly. The speed with which he moved in front of Harry was irritating, and, distantly, flattering. “No. Not with wands—”

“Ron, get away,” said Harry thickly, struggling up. “Let him. I can take it.”

“Are you mad? What does this fucking help? Letting him curse you?”

“Nothing,” said Draco, twirling his wand. “It doesn’t help anything at all.”

Ron shouldered Harry back. “Draco,” he said roughly. “You’re not thinking.”

“He is, though,” said Harry, in a hard voice. “Ron, get out of the way. You don’t understand.”

Ron staggered back.

It was perfectly sized to gut him: Now run along, Ron, you don’t understand. Harry could be cruel, when he wanted to be. And he could be careless, when he wanted to be. And he could be fretful, and jealous, and spiteful, in all the ways apropos for something dropped on a doorstep and forgotten for eleven years.

How horrible to be like him. They were locked alone together in an empty room.

“My mother didn’t have to die,” said Draco. He became aware, with a terrible wonder, of the desire to hurt something.

Worse: He wanted to kill something. He wanted to watch its body stop moving under his boot. To feel as powerful as he had thirty seconds before he walked into the drawing room of Grimmauld Place.

He wanted death, destruction, armageddon. He wanted thousands to drown in blood, for the world to bear a scar — but that was not what he wanted, not at all.

“Hermione,” Ron exclaimed, appealing finally to the fourth of them, who had been silent. “Talk to them. They’ll listen to you, Merlin knows they never fucking listen to me—”

“I wouldn’t be offended, Ron, Harry doesn’t listen to anybody,” she said coldly.

All three of them looked at her. Harry said gutturally, “Hermione, if you want to step in after him, we can do that, too.”

“No,” she said, in the same tone, “I think this is all ridiculous posturing, candidly. I don’t like duels. You’d remember that, if you’d put to memory anything I’d ever said on the subject.”

“Oh, thanks,” said Ron, “that really helps—”

“I’m not his carer. What do you want me to do?”

“I don’t know! Damage control! You’re a prefect!”

“We’re not at school,” she said, watching Draco, who caught his wand and held it still.

“It could’ve been your brother,” called Draco, and took savage pleasure in how Ron whipped his head around. “Bill was there. My mother saved him. Not that it may matter, in the end; we’re going to lose the war.”

Ron faltered. “Shut up,” he snapped. “Don’t say that. Don’t say we’re going to lose.”

“We are. Do you know what happens in wars where one party can die, and the other can’t?” He twitched his wand at Harry. “Ask his parents. Ask mine.”

“Enough. You want a shot at me,” said Harry hoarsely. “I’m giving it to you.”

He almost laughed again, incredulous, because Harry was serious, and in his horrible, misbegotten way, he was trying to be kind.

The torchlight guttered on the boy’s glasses, paving the green in coins of fire, catching the veins of his scar, and in that light he was somber and angry, the calm clean anger that had stared down Umbridge and raised the Great Hall to fight at his back.

A pair of voices echoed in his head: You wish the other kid left that graveyard? Not as much as I do. And: Strike me, old man. I know you want to do it.

Here was a boy who had been punished for living, and asked for more. Who kept asking. As if he had been born with a debt in it, a bond of suffering that someone else had run up on his account. That explained his bravery — at least the deep end of it, the chemical insensate courage that Draco had never understood; the pain didn’t frighten him. Of course it didn’t. There was nothing left to be frightened of.

There was no joy in hitting a boy like that. He took it as his due. It was like kicking a dog; and really, it was worse than kicking a dog, because a dog would at least avoid someone after it was kicked.

Draco sheathed his wand. “I don’t need your largesse,” he said, dripping spite. “Save it for the next one.”

Ron sucked a breath through his teeth. Harry dropped his head, rolling his jaw through the hit.

Draco turned his back, and swept up the staircase. It was a few moments before Hermione’s footsteps followed him.

He wondered what had passed, unspoken, between her and the others such that they did not call out to her. Or perhaps she had followed without looking.

At the top of the stairs, he almost ran through Molly Weasley, who without preamble caught him and pressed him into her arms. He stood there woodenly in her embrace, his pulse running in his ears, as she refused even at some length to let him go.

“I’m so sorry,” she whispered.

Draco thought of the blood running from Harry’s nose. He wondered if she would still embrace him when she saw it. That, too, made him want to laugh, horribly.

But when Harry came up, his bruises were healed, and the blood was gone. Ron subtly slipped his wand into his back pocket, darting a stiff nod at Draco.

“The carriages have come,” Molly whispered. “Won’t you come with us, dearie? We’re staying over with the Tonkses in Birmingham, and on to Hogwarts in the morning. I hate to think of you—” She made an awkward late-stage elision of the word alone— “out here in the countryside, so far away from us. Isn’t any adult staying with you?”

“Severus Snape is my legal guardian.”

“That is not an answer to my question.”

He stepped away from her, even as she kept wheedling. “There’s plenty of room at the Tonkses! And Arthur brought the tent, if it’s too tight a squeeze—”

“Mum,” muttered Ron.

“Safe travels, Mrs. Weasley,” said Draco. “Thank you for coming.”

The guests migrated out. Ron kept one hand on Harry’s shoulder as they left, as if wary of hostiles leaping at him from the trees. Harry turned as they left, and tried to say something; but nothing came up, and he closed his mouth miserably, his eyes burning into Draco from across the steps.

Sirius slunk past him. He had steered clear of Harry during the ceremony, and now he transformed again into his animagus form, which trotted up and jumped up to curl in the unoccupied driver’s box of Harry’s carriage. He would be returning to Hogwarts, with the rest of them. Of course, if he had not enough to resent, there was the revelation that Harry had gotten what he wanted

Molly and Arthur boarded their carriage, and the Tonkses glided down into the other, Andromeda lingering only for a somber, slightly regretful touch of his hand. When she opened her mouth, he was surprised to hear a string of French syllables tumble, somewhat rustily, out from between her painted lips.

“Au revoir, neveu. Ravi d’avoir fait votre connaissance.” She hesitated. “We are all each other has left, are we not?” She glanced at Hermione and tapped her nose. “Traitors must stick together.”

Draco stiffened, and did not reply. Andromeda, seeming to sense a misstep, pressed her lips closed — but no apology was forthcoming. At length, Draco stepped back. She gave her husband her arm, and allowed herself to be steered like a golden barge into the glowing port of the carriage.

But Ted looked back at him. He seemed to flinch upon meeting Draco's stare. His hackles rose, and his hand stilled on the carriage-door.

Draco raised his hand. Ted relaxed and smiled at him, a bit uneasily. He raised his hand back, and then clambered into the carriage.

Tonks was one of the last out, with Dumbledore. She stopped to shake his hand, and leaned in to speak in his ear.

"Hey. Sorry about Mum," she muttered. "She means well, I swear."

"It's nothing."

"Well, no, it's your mum's funeral. It's not fine."

He jerked his head dismissively. "Perhaps. But as you say, it's my mother's funeral," he said. "If it's any consolation, she chose the one day it could have no appreciable effect on my mood."

She nodded. "You're tough," she said. "Don't be too tough, yeah?"

"I don't know what you mean," he said tonelessly.

Tonks kissed her teeth and turned her head. "At the Academy, the first thing they teach you is how to take a fall," she said. "They spend a week knocking you down a hundred different ways. In the mud, in the water, in a crowd, off a building. They teach it like an art form, knowing how to fall."

I am not falling, he might have said. I am on the ground. There is nothing left to fret about breaking.

He stepped aside to let her pass. She clipped him off a short salute, and then Tonks and Dumbledore joined her parents in the second carriage. Before they left, Dumbledore offered him a small gold coin, with the emblem of a phoenix cast in silver.

“A ward key to Hogwarts,” he said. “If you change your mind. If not… I will expect you in September.”

The sentence canted upward at the end, open to interpretation as a question.

He pocketed the coin. Dumbledore nodded, tipped his golden cap, and descended from the Manor steps.

Hermione lingered on the stairs beside him. The wind stirred her hair, too, unfurling it curl by curl from her bun.

“Are you going to make me go?” she said. It was a quiet challenge.

He didn’t want to. The silence of the house at night had thorns.

He forced himself to say: “Do your parents expect you?”

“Eventually,” she said.

“Let’s try again. What did you tell them, exactly?”

“I told my mother I might stay over, and she said — well, she understood.”

“That’s a dextrous choice of verb.”

“I… Draco,” she said, and that was it, his name, her tone, one plea. Once the glimmer of uncertainty opened her face he wanted to recant any objection, tug her behind the doors, and lock them. If he’d ever had the ability to deny what he wanted, it wasn’t today. He wanted her here; she’d stay. He could have what he wanted.

It couldn’t possibly fall to him, today, to do anything else.

“Don’t leave,” he said. “Go back to your parents tomorrow.”

It was a weak thing to do; he was weak, and selfish. Taking her away from her parents. Weak and selfish, Draco Malfoy, but at least he could be honest with himself.

Hermione exhaled. The preparatory bristling for an argument dissolved in one breath. “Good,” she said fiercely. “I will. I’ll go tell them — I’ll be right back—”

She darted down the stairs and stuck her head into the Weasleys’ carriage, at which she had a short, intent conversation with someone inside. When she emerged, her expression was queasy, but relieved, and she shut the door behind her. The carriage wheels gave a creaking turn as she started back up the stairs, the lamplit interiors shrinking like yellow will-o-wisps up the drive.

Hermione crested the staircase again, breathing strained. He sought her hand again, idly, while she tried to salvage the remainder of her bun. “They said it was fine if my parents gave permission,” she said, “which I obviously said they did. It makes things easier at the Tonkses, anyway.”

“How so?”

“I’m not really talking to Harry at the moment,” she said. There was a pause.

“You don’t have to hold him to account for me,” he said stiffly. “I don’t intend to deprive him of his friends.”

“I understand that,” she said, after a moment, “but I’d also note that it isn’t — entirely — about what happened to you. Though it doesn’t… help.”

Draco said, “He broke your trust.”

“Not even that. I don’t care that he broke a promise. I could forgive him for that. But I spend so much time,” she said, her voice warbled, “thinking about him. For five years. I risked my life and my health, and so much of my time, and — I left my parents over the holidays, to be with him. Fourth year summer, fourth year Christmas... Fifth year Christmas. Every time he called. And when Umbridge tried to take his broomstick," she said, her voice hardening, "I got this. On my hand. For him. And then I did what I did to Cho, and nobody looks at me the same anymore — for him. I did everything I thought he needed, before he needed it, because I knew he wouldn't ask for it. And I did it willingly! But when he had the chance, he didn't think about me. I wasn't a consideration. My parents weren't a consideration. None of the muggles on that platform were a consideration." She wrinkled her eyes shut. "I'm so sick," she said, her voice no longer faint but furious, "of wizards who can't, who won't, think about anyone else."

Silently, Draco reached out and hitched their fingers together. She sniffed, and watched the carriages trundle out to the gates and turn onto the far road.

"Ron thinks I should try to forgive him. That's what he's trying to do," she added. "Ron."

"Is he making progress?"

"Oh, he says he isn't," she said tiredly, "but he will. It's Ron."

He had expected that much. Ron would shout at him, assuredly, and might give him the cold shoulder for a while, but it would not deter him. He knew how Ron fought. He would come running back as soon as he remembered he was needed, and at this juncture, there were plenty of things to remind him.

The will-o-wisps flitted through the trees beyond the gates and sank into the gloom.

"Do you want tea?" she said.

Briselda brought the tray up to his private sitting-room. He sent her to turn down a guest room of some size, and then locked the door and cast Muffliato. The maids like to talk to each other.

With the windows open, there was more than enough heat to manage without the fireplace, before which rested the camelback sofa where she'd slept, the night they got their prefect letters; she might have been recalling it, too, because her fingers drifted along the back. The lamps filled the room with low brassy light, and the moon pressed a pale glaze on the windowpane. On his desk by the window, Ulysses rattled the bars in greeting.

Hermione's tea preference divested him of a sugarbowl. She leaned against the arm of the sofa, her hands wrapped around the tiny porcelain cup, her legs folded over his lap. He pulled out a piece of her hair and threaded it through his fingers.

"Do you know if Dumbledore has a plan?" she said quietly.

"With respect to what?"

"With respect to anything. To finding the horcruxes. To winning the war, as he did the first time."

"Dumbledore didn't win the first Wizarding War." His index traced a circle lightly around her knee. "The Order was losing, and steadily, up until their immortal enemy committed suicide by infant."

"But there has to be a way," she persisted. "No one is actually immortal. Anyone can be killed."

"That's true. There was one way. It was Snape and my mother, and they're both gone."

By now the Dark Lord knew that Snape had betrayed him, he knew he had lost the secret of the horcruxes. A wizard with a tenth his intellect would have moved them by now. And there was no war to be fought against an enemy that could not die.

To kill a man, one had to find his body. The Dark Lord had many bodies, mostly hidden. Dumbledore didn't need soldiers half as much as he needed spies.

If there's no Harry Potter, there's nothing to fight for, Hermione had said. People love you, Harry, you're a symbol of the Second Wizarding War. And Ginny had said, hard and deadly with love, With an army, they couldn't take you from us. That was true. They'd walk over the bodies to get him, and send them into death together.

Ginny and Fred and George and Neville. Dean and Seamus. Katie and Angelina. Luna Lovegood and Lavender Brown, the Patil sisters, the Creevey brothers, Alfie Chrissenpoffer and Victoria Frobisher, and good Cedric Diggory, who had only ever tried to do what a prefect should. He knew now how their bodies would lie. How the weight of them would settle in his arms.

It had to be someone's responsibility. It wasn't fair, that they should all pay the price. It wasn't their war. It wasn't his, either. But in the registry of costs and faults and failures, he would not emerge with clean hands.

Bellatrix Lestrange had clutched his hand and asked him to run with her. A fine thing, she had called him. And somewhere in the world, at that moment, she would be suffering at her master's hand for what happened to the ring, but she would be forgiven. It wasn't her fault, after all, that Snape had betrayed her. The Dark Lord's right hand could not be dispensed with so easily.

And it would know, if anyone did, where the other horcruxes were.

He remembered something his mother had said, before she died. The day was vanishing into the blear of memory; he panicked, sometimes, at how little of it he remembered only a few days later. How little of what she said he could recall. But he remembered her saying, quite clearly, with annihilating regret: I should have fought. I could have won.

Hermione had set her lips against the teacup, thinking. She lifted them, curious.

“Why didn’t you tell me about them?” she said suddenly. “The horcruxes?”

He almost flinched at the uncanny feeling that she’d plucked the word from his thoughts. “I made a vow to my mother,” he said.

“Your mother asked a lot of you. Not all of it was fair.”

“And not all of it was done,” he said. “I tried to give her anything I could stand to.”

She frowned. The lamplight made her skin soft. “Did she ask you to stay away from me?”

His fingers stilled in her hair.

“Granger—”

“I’d like to know. Because I always knew you were giving something up,” she said stubbornly, “breaking with your upbringing. Being what you are. But I sometimes thought it wouldn’t have mattered to her, me being in your life, if I hadn’t had feelings for you.”

It would have. He didn't mention that. “Technically, your feelings weren’t the problem.”

“Ah, right,” she said. “You were supposed to fancy a genteel pureblooded girl who’d have your children.”

“Little chance of that, with you around.”

“There might have been. If you’d started seeing someone proper, then she mightn’t have cared—”

“I would have still wanted you.”

She said quietly, “You might have learned not to, after a while.”

He coiled the hair around his fist and closed it. She glanced at it, a fleeting movement of her eyes.

“That would have saved no one,” he said, “and certainly it would not have saved me.”

Hermione made a sharp noise and set down her teacup. She shifted, easing his hand out of her hair, and replaced it in a businesslike way on her waist. She sat up, drawing their faces closer together.

“Tell me something about your mother,” she said intently. “Something you’ve never told anyone.”

The pressure in his chest changed. He was tempted to laughter, again, although the itch crept up his throat in a suspicious way.

“I want it noted,” he said, “that your attempt at comfort began with an interrogation.”

“I append to the note that this was not the beginning of the attempt,” she said, with classic pedantry, “and it is not my fault you respond to some methods better than others.”

A smile tugged his mouth, although it hurt to swallow.

“She took her tea with lemon,” he said. “Just lemon. No cream, no sugar.”

Hermione nodded, politely.

“Don’t make that face. Not all of us want ten volts of sugar at eight in the morning. Anyway, that’s how she took it. She preferred darjeeling. First flush. When I started drinking tea, I copied her, only watered it down with cream.”

“Which you, not knowing better, thought was an acceptable way for tea to taste,” she agreed, and smiled when he flicked her ear. “Did you often take it together?”

“Most days. When I was younger, she gave me cocoa. Or mint, if I’d behaved badly.”

“That’s more disciplined than I expected.”

“No, it isn’t. I always had cocoa. If I didn’t I’d cry, and she could never stand to see me unhappy.”

His eyes stung. He tipped his head back at the ceiling, trying to cool them.

And it was so much pain at once to think about it, to think about it for a fraction of a second, that it was better not to think at all. It was better to think of anything, to laugh or to bicker or to dream of other kinds of pain, than to permit for a fraction of a second the idea to cross his welted mind that she was dead.

Dead, and no longer employed in the business of being his mother. She had said her last words to him. She had touched him for the last time. That was the end of his allotment. There was no more of Mother left.

Moving swiftly, Hermione wrapped her arms around his neck and buried her head in his shoulder, which gave him privacy for the pressure to release, in his chest, in short breaks like the beats of a caged bird’s wings.

He couldn’t count in minutes or hours the length of time she held him there in silence. The teapot had ceased to steam. Maids’ footsteps no longer troubled the floors above them.

“What did she say to you?”

Hermione drew back, clearing her throat. “What?”

“At Grimmauld. My mother whispered something to you. What was it?”

“Oh,” she said thickly, rubbing the corner of her eye. “I'm really sorry. I don't know. It was loud, and I didn't hear her.”

He tilted his head. Hermione swallowed and flicked the sleep from her fingers.

“Was it unpleasant?” he asked her.

“No. I told you, I just didn't hear.”

He began to argue, but he considered then the stark and brutal content of what his mother had said to her; and, pursuantly, the circumstances under which she would say something she could not tolerate her son to hear, even knowing she was likely never to face the consequences for it.

“You can tell me, if it was cruel,” he said. “I heard the rest of what she said to you. She was — passionate. I hope she didn't try to hurt you.”

She laughed slightly to herself. “Yes,” she said. “She was passionate. I don't think she intended to hurt me. But to be honest, I don't think she cared about my feelings at all. It was a concession speech. She'd surrendered something very precious, and not quite willingly, and she was trying to do it with whatever grace her beliefs allowed her.”

He was about to reply when a queasy feeling passed through him, a ripple, like a comb being dragged along his ribs. In a single swift motion, he levered Hermione off his lap and stood, wand out.

“What is it?” She began to stand, her legs uncurling, and he stilled her with a touch to her shoulder.

“Someone’s come through the wards.”

She shot up and grabbed her wand from the table, diving for her shoes. He cast out his feeling for the wards, groping along the contours of the estate — they were murky, still, since he wasn't seventeen; the best he could do was a watery sense of the house, its thick walls, the faint motions of Briselda and the maids in the kitchen below. Something else stirred weakly on the terrace, a presence so dim it could have been an animal, if it were not drifting towards the drawing-room.

The door to his bedroom snapped open before he touched it, responding to a premonitory thought.

"Downstairs," he said, sweeping out. Hermione followed him, her wand flaring with Lumos.

"How did they get through the wards? Did they break them?"

"They can't have, I would have felt it—"

"But then they can't get through without permissions, or—"

"Or I'd have to admit them myself." Another pair of doors burst open at his approach, and he stalked through. "Which I didn't. So unless it's Dumbledore—"

"It can't be, he just left with Harry."

"—and assuming we're not about to die horribly—"

"As I might have, up until you used the word 'assume'—"

"—then there's only one person who could enter the Manor without my permission, while I'm here."

The maids had put out the sconces. Shadows pooled around the corners and clung to the starless vault of the ceiling. In the drawing-room, the doors to the terrace hung open, and a warm wind stirred the drapes in flickering snaps, like the lashing tails of serpents pinned at the throat. In the awning of the doors stood a hunched figure in a traveling cloak, favoring its left side. When the wind peeled back the lip of its cowl, it revealed a narrow, pallid face, rimmed by a tattered oilslick of hair.

Snape waded forward, silhouetted by the moonstruck lake. The fingers of his right hand were unnaturally thin and pointed, and when Draco focused on them he saw his phalanges terminated in points of bare bone. Black wires mimicked the structures of sinew and tendon, trawling from an ivory cuff at the wrist. Another flicker of wind revealed it for an ivory bracer, which curved over the pale helix of radius and ulna, fastened by leather straps at the elbow.

The wires seared gold whenever Snape twitched them, puppeting the skeletal architecture of Potions Master’s new forearm. As he watched, the bone-hand tucked his wand back into its sheath, and removed a brass chest from where it was tucked under his other arm.

“My apologies,” he rasped. “I came to pay my respects.”

With that, Draco’s godfather crumpled to the floor.

-Hey, guys. Going through it right now, so sorry if I can't reply to as many comments as I'd like to. You are the bright spot in my life; reading what you've written brings me nearly to tears.

-Andromeda’s reference is, of course, “Annabel Lee,” by Edgar Allen Poe. Shoutout to that person who pulled a Poe reference in the comments for the last chapter, I had to go through my notes frantically to make sure I hadn't mixed up the posting dates.

-Unless wizard cats, like wizards, have extended lifespans, I imagine that there have been many Mrs. Norrises through the years (possibly with different first names, or prefixes). I like to think that when one dies, it’s a student tradition to raise money and get Filch a new kitten.

-This chapter and the next were originally in the same document, but I broke them up out of sympathy for M&G, since suggesting that anyone record a chapter of that size might very seriously make me liable for injuries incurred due to vocal strain.

-This one goes out to the Poldark soundtrack, which was playing while I wrote most of this chapter. That’s a real “make the words go” OST.

-The two-part finale of Book 5 (and Volume II) will be posted two weeks from today: "The Princess's Tale, Part II" and "Toujours."

The Princess's Tale, Part II

Chapter 82: The Princess's Tale, Part II

By a combination of reflex and luck, respectively, they caught Snape before he hit the parquet. Some effort saw him leveraged into a wingbacked chair, where he sprawled and caught his breath.

“Did you come all the way from Hogwarts tonight?” said Draco.

Snape jerked his head.

“That was stupid,” he snapped. “Do you think they’re not watching the Floo? Or the trains? They’ll have men across the countryside searching for you. Could you even Apparate if you needed to? Merlin, look at the state of you. I doubt it.”

Hermione cleared her throat, faintly. Draco stepped back, radiating discontent, and Snape caught his breath.

“I came,” Snape rasped, “by coach.”

“Coach? What coach?”

“By muggle coach?” said Hermione, whose disbelief achieved insult. Snape flashed her a withering look.

“It is a serviceable method of transportation.”

“I know that, but — I mean, have you used it before?”

“Did you think Hogwarts pays its teachers enough to travel by sedan chair?”

Hermione blinked. “I didn’t think cost was the relevant obstacle to that,” she said. “It would be a lot slower. Professor, what happened to your arm?”

“Is your question rhetorical, or ironical?”

“I think it’s medical,” she said, eyeing it with conflicted curiosity. “Why… bones? I thought Pomfrey could regrow—”

“Poppy has left me fit to wield a wand,” said Snape grimly, rolling the skeletal fingers. “Further convalescence would have wasted essential time. Flesh is largely ornamental.”

“It’s not. Really. For a lot of things it’s quite essential.”

Snape ignored her. “I have something for you,” he said to Draco. “From your mother. A bequest.”

The word bequest left a stinging pain. “An owl wouldn’t have sufficed?” he said roughly. “What is it?”

Snape reached for the brass chest. Fumbling for want of dexterity in his right hand, he fished a key from a chain on his neck and unlocked it, revealing a set of thirteen vials set in a bed of purple silk. They held a swirling, mercurial liquid.

“You have a pensieve, I assume,” said Snape.

Draco picked up the chest. His mother’s memories lay in two shining rows between his hands.

“I was sorry,” Snape added, “to have missed the ceremony.”

It didn’t bear talking about. A person like Severus Snape did not attend funerals. Draco had always known that; he hadn’t been at his father’s funeral, either. That one had been a society event. Snape’s trial at the Wizengamot had been only four months concluded; he hadn’t gone.

Anyway, it was better, perhaps, that Snape hadn’t been there. Draco snapped the chest shut.

“Who don’t you trust?” said Hermione suddenly.

Snape raised his eyebrows at her to demonstrate the breadth of possible answers to the question.

“I’m talking about today. You didn’t come to the ceremony. It obviously wasn’t because you couldn’t make the journey, so who was there that couldn’t see you?”

“The question implies I have knowledge of who attended; which, as I did not, I do not.”

She didn’t even bother with that. “Was it Andromeda? Everyone else is Order.”

Snape’s face did something odd; he braced a thumb and fourth finger on either side of his brows. “You invited,” he said, “Andromeda Black.”

“She happens to have been related to her,” Draco said.

“And was it a pleasant reunion? Did she act with reverence and cordiality for the deceased?”

“No. In fact, it was greatly unpleasant, as a regrettably large share of decent things are. Severus, answer her question.”

Snape tilted his head at her slightly; his eyes glinted. “Nymphadora Tonks,” he said, “reports in the first instance to Alastor Moody. Who would not hesitate to throw me to what he regards as my former brothers-in-arms.”

“Dumbledore wouldn’t allow that,” she said.

“It is one of Albus’s more famous traits, that he is rarely around, and never more rarely than when one needs him. I try never to depend on it.” He tapped the box: click-click, bone on brass. “Hasten to those,” he added. “Memory is an unstable substance. It has a tendency to warp.”

Draco tightened his grip. “And you?” he said flatly. “Are you leaving?”

“I will lodge for the night, if you permit. I have business to attend in the morning.” He nodded at the box. “Speak to me. After.”

Draco set the box under his arm. Hermione said meaningfully: “Professor, have you eaten?”

“I can see myself to the kitchens,” he said, rising to his feet. “I have been here before.”

“Right. Of… course you have. I’ll go tell Briselda there’s another guest here,” she said briskly, dusting her hands, “so you don’t scare the daylights out of her—”

“Granger,” said Draco. She looked at him.

“Oh,” she said, in a different tone. “Oh. Yes. If you’re— sure.”

He tipped his head towards the door. Snape inspected the bookshelf, expressionless. Hermione threw a glance between them and followed Draco out.

His father’s study sat in the library wing. A surprisingly light room, it sported ample windows that in daylight exposed a full square of lavish green on the Manor grounds, and at night cut black quadrilaterals into the wooden walls. Between leatherbound shelves hung portraits of pale wizards with striking glares. In a glass case at the back of the room, set between a stuffed lion and a bust of Charlemagne, there stood a golden reliquary in the Gothic style, with rubies set into each of the ornamented spires.

When he closed the door, a candelabra burst to life at his elbow with unusual promptness, as if the Manor were apologizing for the unfortunate business with Snape.

“Was all of this your father’s?” Hermione murmured, caught evidently between her affection for the room’s style and her political distaste for its excess. She wandered down an aisle of artifacts, tapping on the glass encasement of a set of jeweled ortolans. Her finger drifted over the lion's mane. He caught her hand.

"Museum rules," he said. "I don't know which are cursed."

She looked over her shoulder at him as if this might be a joke.

"It's true. The lawyers have it noted down in our asset portfolio, but it's longer than the tax code and even Gatz hasn't read the whole thing. Until I do, it's best not to take chances."

Her lips parted.

"My father collected some of it," he said, to ward off a probably salient criticism. "Not much. He preferred books and broomsticks. He inherited the collection from his father, and he from his, et cetera. It's not his anymore."

She blinked at him, and scanned again the jeweled birds, the lion, the portraits. Her face belied an uneasy cousin to wonder.

Unsettled, he pressed the small of her back, pulling her along. "The pensieve is here."

"I've never used one before. Is it difficult?"

"The hardest part is opening the pensieve."

He tried to remember how his father had done it.

The reliquary's front face bore a pair of little golden doors. He unlatched them, and when he pulled the ruby capstone from the top, the sides of the reliquary unsealed and unfolded neatly to hang down around the stem.

Inset in the velvet beneath was a round pool of misty fluid so still it might have been glass. Standing, it reached knee-height, so he set the box down and knelt. Hermione did, too, albeit with a pointed tug.

“About this,” she said suddenly. “Are you sure?”

“I never do anything except.”

“Yes, that’s — well. Bald lie, for one thing. For two: it’s Narcissa’s memories.” She watched him open the box and carefully remove the first vial, unstopper it, and empty it into the pensieve. Memory dribbled from its lip in a sluggish crawl, the wisps thin and yellowing; older ones, he suspected. Childhood. Perhaps infancy. The surface tension on the pensieve shattered, and it began to swirl.

“Both are true,” he said, unstoppering another. This one was cleaner, and poured faster. “What’s your point?”

“I don’t think she would have wanted me to see this.”

“You don’t even know what ‘this’ is.”

“I know she made it her last bequest to her only son. I don’t have to know what’s in it. I know she didn’t bequeath it to me.”

With a twist of his wrist, another vial slipped into the pensieve. “She’s not here,” he said cruelly. “So if the only thing stopping you is concern for her feelings, I have good news on that score.”

“Draco.”

The empty vial slipped and cracked on the floor. He closed his fingers too late around where it should have been.

“I can’t do this,” he said, clearly and carefully.

“You don’t have to.” Her hand closed over his, and steered it away from the vial. She brushed it aside with a businesslike flick of her hand. “Especially not tonight. My God. Or ever, if you don’t want to.”

“She wanted to tell me something.”

“Then she can wait for you to want to listen,” she said hotly. He listened to her with great tiredness. Everything was so simple, when Hermione spoke; everything was so clear, the world so bright, the sun so high and shining, even if only for a moment, through a winking cloud. “Putting aside your point about her feelings, even though, incidentally, it’s correct — I’m not certain you are obligated in the way you suggest. No one who loved you would have wanted you to use their memory to hurt yourself, and any rate, it’s certainly not something they could ask of you. The dead don’t have special entitlements because they’re dead. They play by the same rules as the rest of us, and when they want something, they have to give you a good reason to give it to them, and so I don’t see a good reason for you to put yourself through this, if you’re not ready, and you’ll forgive me for saying I don’t think any such reason exists in a formation I couldn’t beat stupid if it was put to me.”

He caught her by the chin and kissed her. She inhaled in surprise, but her mouth slackened into his, sliding together in an artless clash of mouths and teeth whose sensual element was nearly irrelevant. He made a hard sound, and she cupped his face a good deal more carefully than he touched hers. He pulled her forward, dragging her on her knees on the parquet until she had to catch herself on her shoulders with another hitch of breath.

“You have to breathe it,” he said. Their foreheads were braced together, so close his breath stirred her hair. “The memory. That’s how it works.”

Hermione sighed.

“Okay,” she said. “I don’t enjoy that, mechanically.”

“I thought you wouldn’t.”

“There is air in it, still, when you…? You’re still breathing? Never mind, don’t tell me.”

“We have to go at once. A deep breath, to get to the bottom.”

She sat up on her knees, peering doubtfully inside. The mist reflected on her drawn face.

“Latin,” she murmured. “Spirit. Breath. Spirare. It’s the same root, you know.”

“Who taught you that one?”

“It’s general knowledge,” she said, haughtily. “You don’t need citations for a morpheme.” She sniffed. “Tell me when. Actually, don’t tell me. Just do it, no warning. I’m going to lose my nerve, otherwise.”

“I was about to tell you the same thing.”

His mother’s memories ran in a clockwise current of braided mist, glowing.

“Alright,” announced Hermione. “One—”

He did as she asked; there was no warning. He pulled them under without a sound.

Once his ears slipped under the surface, all senses — the clench of her hand, the cold edge of the pensieve, the wood under his knees — faded together into the mist. He remembered the first breath of the pensieve, memory filling his lungs with dust-bitter not-quite-air.

Then he was loose in the current of time, cresting the edge of a waterfall, and descending.

She was falling, and then she was not: she was looking at the plasters on her fingers, which were pressed to one side of a locked door.

Grandpapa had whispered once that if she never slammed doors and cleaned her shoes before coming in, then Witherfell would do her favors, when it could. She never knew if it was her magic or the house's, but when she tugged the doorknob, the lock clicked.

Coals guttered red in the hearth. Moonlight limned two girls in the windowsill, faces shrouded in dark hair. The bigger one was crying into her arms.

Andy had her arm stretched awkwardly around the bulk of Bella's shoulders. "It's alright! It's alright! Oh, Merlin, don't cry. She didn't mean it. It wouldn't even make any difference, if you were a boy."

She yelped. Bella had pinched her.

"What did you do that for? Now you've gone and made me cross," she snapped, reaching for her wand, and Bella raised her head, her expression glad and savage, when Narcissa closed the door behind her. The sound made them both turn.

"Go away," Bella spat. "I don't want you."

"You would if you knew what I've got. But you have to promise to smile when you get it."

"Give it first," Bella demanded.

"I shan't."

"I want it!"

"Then you must promise! I don't do anything for nothing."

Bella nodded shortly. Andy sighed, buffing her nails.

Narcissa drew back the fold of her robe. She slipped from the interior pocket a shabby and somewhat charred copy of Secrets of the Darkest Arte, Vol. I.

Bella's eyes widened. "You saved it," she murmured. "How?"

“I waited until Mummy took her potion, and Daddy went to the parlor with Lord Crabbe. I don’t suppose even Kreacher saw me do it. I beat most of the coals off with the poker — I couldn’t save the others, though, I’m sorry.”

Andromeda gasped. “Cissy! Your hands!”

Narcissa dropped the book on Bella’s lap and stuffed her hands under her arms. “You can still read it. I checked.”

Bella folded her hands around the book tenderly. Narcissa held her breath.

“Do you need burn cream?” muttered Andy.

“No. Hush.”

“Fine. Ruin your hands, see if I care.”

Bella tucked the book into her own robe without speaking. She bent down and pressed a long, soft kiss on Narcissa’s cheek, like she was made of glass.

“Thank you, princess,” she murmured. Narcissa smiled and kissed the nearest part of her she could reach, which was her knee. Andy scoffed.

“...believe what they say, she’ll be a Nott before the year’s out.”

The clocks were tolling eleven. The space was paneled in wood, personal, with wood rafters and the inevitable smell of must that clung to medieval buildings. Even in August, Knotscliff Peak held a chill.

By the hearth, Orion held court with Lord Rosier and Lord Lestrange and his younger brother, Rabastan. Narcissa feigned interest in an oil-portrait of Sibelius Nott’s grandfather.

“...lovely thing, the oldest, but headstrong. It’s a cold marriage bed he’s after.”

“Did you hear what she did to Macmillan’s girl?” said Orion, not unhappily. “Ghastly thing. Cygnus paid handsomely for it.”

“Perhaps she’ll do him a credit,” said Lord Lestrange. The firelight made gilt of the silver in his beard. “I daresay he would not be courting her if he did not see something in her to be admired.”

“Do you have an interest?”

Lord Lestrange shrugged. “She seems hearty,” he said. “My work takes me often from my home. It would behoove my wife to be independent. But while I thank you, Orion, I hope you will not interfere with Sibelius’s courtship. It is an inopportune time for him to resent me.”

“What ‘work’?”

“His little political group,” drawled Rosier. “The lad down south who’s always nattering about mudbloods.”

“I don’t see why you don’t join the Cavaliers,” Orion muttered, docking his pipe on the ottoman.

Lord Lestrange smiled. “I appreciate the suggestion,” he said. “I may return to it. In the meantime, I am satisfied with my little political group.”

“I didn’t mean to offend,” said Lord Rosier.

Rodolphus Lestrange’s smile did not waver, though it adopted a certain paternal chill. “My good lord,” he said, “I would never accuse you of meaning to do anything. Good night.”

Narcissa slipped away.

Across the room, Bellatrix leaned on the drinks table, and was drinking from an overfull crystal of firewhiskey. Andy leaned against a pillar beside her, watching the dancers mournfully.

Narcissa touched her elbow. Bellatrix acknowledged her with a glance.

“Tris says Sibelius is going to propose.”

“They were debating my dowry over the soup,” she said, “but it’s good of you to keep me informed.”

“Shall I poison him?”

Bella flashed a thin smile. “Now, silly,” she said. “How am I supposed to make poison look like an accident?”

“I heard he’s cruel,” said Andy, plucking a string of lace on her cuff. “That he hits his staff.”

“So? House-elves need whipping, it’s good for them.”

“No, the people.”

Bella paused. “Purebloods?”

“Half. It’s still in poor taste. Won’t you refuse him?”

“And then do what? Wait thirty years for my lord uncle to keel over, and pray my good cousin lets me sleep in the attic at Witherfell?” She threw back her firewhiskey and grimaced. “I suppose I should be grateful my lord husband’s arthritis will prevent him from often troubling my bedchamber.”

“Isn’t there any boy you like better?” wondered Andy. “I’m sure we could induce him to propose before Lord Nott does.”

“With my suite of charms, hm? Or have you been reading Cyrano?”

“Madame Bovary. Tell me, darling, do you want to live in Paris?”

Bella laughed. The nearest hemisphere of the room turned in a retinue of frightened enchantment. Andy met Narcissa’s eyes, and cast her wry smile down to the floor.

“You’d wrong any boy to mention me,” said Bella, into her glass. “I’d go through him like paper, and then you’d feel awfully guilty.”

“That’s rather an overstatement, don’t you think?” murmured Andy.

“The paper?” said Bella.

“The guilt,” she said, looking at Narcissa. Narcissa scowled back, pressing closer to Bellatrix’s arm.

Boots pounded out a reel on the dance floor. The light in the room was red and writhing.

“I overheard Orion talking to Lord Lestrange,” she whispered.

“...then he told me I was a brat. And I told him I could have him hauled out back and beaten for saying that to me, even if he weren’t a mudblood, and then he told me that my whole family were brats by birth, and if the Ministry taxed us out of existence within a generation it was only to spare us the effrontery of the guillotine.”

Slughorn had taken the common room for his party. Firelight sparkled on floating baubles of red and green. Wreaths piled high from the rafters, spotted with red berries and crusts of enchanted frost. Girls in heels and boys with pressed shirtfronts shuffled together to honeyed music. A redhead — one of Slughorn’s pet mudbloods, an indulgence — was whispering together with a dark-haired first year in the corner.

Narcissa wore a ballgown of powder-blue, with cap-sleeves and a jabot, and pearls on her wrists and in her ears. Andy wore a leather miniskirt and a tartan scarf. Tris Avery had taken one look at her and walked into a wall.

“... and I worry, Cissa.”

She turned her head. Andy was studying the perfect 0-shapes of her nails like they were a scorecard for something important. “Don’t you? It’s not the politics — I don’t know any of that. But the squib riots aren’t a decade past, and so much has changed. Now Slughorn is saying the squibs were right all along, though I swore he didn’t like them, and everyone said Dumbledore was a radical but now he’s to be headmaster, and — don’t you think it’s odd? How the world changes its mind?”

“Stupid people believe what they’re told,” she said. “Powerful people fight each other, and the winner tells them. The Cavaliers lost, and now Jenkins is Minister. It’s all quite tedious.”

“You sound like the lovely Lady Lestrange.”

“I don’t think so,” Narcissa laughed. “I don’t think Bella’s said that many words about politics in her life. I doubt she could name five members of the Wizengamot she wasn’t related to.”

“In her defense, that excludes most of them. Cissa, don’t you ever worry?” She swept her hand, indicating with great theatricality a fairly mundane room full of people. “Don’t you think of what they’ll say about us in ten years? Or a hundred?”

“Gracious. A hundred years is a long time to talk about anything.”

“Not for our family.”

“Name your grandfather’s youngest sister.”

“I mean important things. Like truth and love. And choice. And courage.”

“None of those are names,” said Narcissa.

When she turned her head, he cut across her eyeline. Six feet of him in black tails, white hair curtaining the slender planes of a face like a desaturated Leyendecker. A sweet contempt in the tautness of his mouth. His eyes were so pale they seemed to glow.

Andy said, “What I want, really—”

“I’m going to get a drink,” she interrupted. She tugged out her handkerchief and sieved it through her fingers to the floor. “Don’t pick that up.”

Andromeda paused in reaching for it. “You slattern,” she said wryly. “Have oodles of fun. Don’t let him get to third without proposing.”

Narcissa rolled her eyes and detached decisively from their table.

“You can always break the engagement in the morning,” Andy called. Narcissa made a rude gesture guised by her sleeve, which cast her sister into giggling. She plucked a flute of champagne from the tower and located herself in one of the pockets of space between conversations so involved that no one would be tempted to recruit her.

In a few moments, a shadow dimmed the candlelight over her face. Lucius stood over her, the handkerchief notched between his outstretched third and forefinger.

“That’s a lovely object,” she said.

“You’re very kind,” he said, and inclined his head in a sardonic bow. “I’ve come by it recently. I think it suits you.”

“I shouldn’t accept,” she said. “I don’t take gifts from strangers.”

She picked it delicately from his upturned palm. His hand was warm, and clean, and smooth.

“It needn’t be a gift,” he said. “I could ask for something in return.”

“As you’ve already given it to me, you’re in a weak position to negotiate.”

“Shouldn’t that be an enticement to you? It leaves me quite pliable.”

“Why don’t I get the sense that’s true, Mr. Malfoy?”

Lucius smiled. It was a small movement, but it seemed to change the whole cast of his face, like wood transmuted into marble by a finger of sun.

“Perhaps,” he said, “it leaves you in a weaker position to have accepted without knowing the cost.”

“I know the cost.”

“Forgive me, but I doubt it. I haven’t even decided what to ask for.”

“Yes, you have,” she said.

The arch of his eyebrow nearly made her smile.

“This is an unorthodox negotiation. I say I don’t know what I want, and you offer to tell me.”

She settled her flute on a floating tray. “You knew what you wanted before you came over here.”

“Did you read that in my tea leaves, Miss Black?”

She drew a cigarette from a gold case in her purse, notched it between her fingers, and after a pause, she extended it for lighting. Lucius raised his eyebrows, but like a gentleman, he obliged.

His lighter was goblin-silver, so polished she could see her lipstick’s red reflection. It took a certain wizard to carry a goblin-silver lighter, when any first-year could conjure flames.

“Among other things,” she said, and put the cigarette to her lips.

Lucius smiled, and it revealed the earlier gesture for a counterfeit. Now she would know the difference.

“Do you have another one of those?” he said, glancing at her cigarette case.

Then it was her turn to grin.

“You resolved to marry a Black sister.”

“I resolved to marry one, in particular,” he said, striking something out. “The offer is non-fungible. Please make that clear to your family, if it isn’t.”

The Hogwarts library smelled of dust and leather. Red carpets muffled her footsteps as she moved around his table, her steps deft and idle. Lucius twitched his glasses up his nose and continued copying something from the textbook beside him.

“Bellatrix is stronger,” she said. “The better witch. And third in line to the lordship.”

“I do not seek a wife to duel my enemies,” he said, “and ‘third’ is hardly an improvement from ‘fifth.’ And she’s married.”

“She wasn’t always.”

“No,” he agreed, “and in many ways, I think she still isn’t, now. Cissa, your sister’s soul is cast from a hard metal. We would damage each other in the engagement.”

“Andromeda, then.”

Lucius grimaced.

“She’s more charming,” she added. “It would balance you, who are not.”

“I beg your pardon. I have, to date, charmed at least one woman.”

“I was not charmed.”

“But you performed it so beautifully,” said Lucius. When she turned, he still bent over the paper, examining it, but his eyes flickered up at her from under the sheaf of his hair. The lamplight turned it so dark it was silver. His cheek was suspiciously taut.

She cleared her throat.

“I was bewitched by your discussion of gilt-edged securities,” she said. “Your imitation of rigor mortis at Puddifoot’s subsumed me in lust. I should have rode you there on the table, if you permitted.”

Lucius made an ungraceful noise in his throat. His glare was adorably scandalized. She smiled at him.

“The question remains,” she said, rubbing the dust between her fingers. “You inherit a position with social responsibilities. Andy is sociable. I am — cold, by comparison.”

“Cold?”

“Reserved.”

He slipped his reading glasses off his nose and regarded her, blinking, through fresh grey eyes. “Being reserved is not a fault. Discretion is a virtue.”

“You’re not marrying me because I’m discreet.”

Lucius crossed his legs at the knee, dangling his glasses from one armrest. “Why do you think I’m marrying you?”

“Mother says I’m the loveliest,” she said blandly. “Perhaps you’re shallow.”

He smiled: a thin little cluster of lines at the corner of his mouth. “Perhaps I am.”

She perched on the table beside his work. When she grazed her fingers over his handwriting, her engagement flashed in the light. She had loved that ring from sight. Loved its weight. Loved the way it caught and held the room’s eye.

“That word is redundant,” she said, resting her forefinger on the page.

He didn’t look at it. He was still watching her. “Alright,” he said.

“And Bella’s asked to throw us an engagement party. Some of Roddy’s friends want to meet you.”

“Alright,” he said.

“And you should send my uncle some elf-wine for Christmas,” she said. “He prefers a bordeaux. Mention the name ‘Harold Minchum.’ They’re running him for Minister against Jenkins in the next cycle. My uncle will set a meeting.”

“You’ll choose the bottle?”

“Mm.”

He offered his palm. She laid her hand over it, lightly. The diamond winked out as his fingers closed over hers.

He touched his lips to her knuckle: warm and clean and smooth.

The doors were open onto the veranda, and the swans moved sluggishly through a late twilight on the gardens. Inside, the house was full of screaming. Aunt Wally’s voice drowned the rest, though Regulus piped through, reedy and shrill.

But it was all distant. Narcissa was running, her bare feet springing through the lawns, as Andy stalked up the drive with her trunk. She was wearing a traveling cloak and muggle clothes, one sleeve torn where Bella — well.

“Andy, listen—”

“Let go of me. I’ll jinx your arm off.”

“Stop! Listen! She didn’t mean it—”

“She did mean it,” Andy spat. She whirled around. “She always means it, Cissa, are you blind?”

“You told her in a bad way, it was artless, you didn’t have to start with —”

“Start with what? The truth? Wouldn’t want too much of that around here, would you?”

“You didn’t give her half a chance! She’s been off with Roddy and their coven half the year, trawling the country, and you didn’t give her a night’s sleep before proclaiming your mudblood lover at the dinner table—”

“He’s not just ‘my lover.’ I love Edward,” she said passionately. “I adore him. I’d die for him. He’s everything to me. And I don’t have to say it artfully, or delicately, and honestly, I can’t believe you’re such a fool you think it would make a difference how I said it when they all want him dead, anyway!”

“You’re ridiculous,” said Narcissa, trying not to laugh. “He’s everything to you? You met him last year!”

“You’re marrying someone you met last year!”

“That’s different. We’re equals. The mudblood can’t offer you a life!”

“I don’t want a life! I want Edward!”

She did laugh, then, and Andromeda's face darkened. "Listen to yourself! Are you going to run away? With what, stupid dear? You haven't any money; you didn't even take any N.E.W.T.s. Come back. You can keep your lover, I won't tell anyone. Plenty of people have odd tastes — everyone knows Uncle Alfie doesn't really have business in New York — but you just can't expect everyone to be so modern. The dinner table isn't any sort of place—"

"You're not listening," said Andromeda faintly. "You're pretending to listen, but you're not. I said I love him. I don't want to sneak him in the garden gate after midnight. I want to sit next to him at dinner—"

"You loved every boy that ever looked twice at you."

"—I want to feed him ice when he's feverish, I want to hear him tell me the weather—"

"You loved every boy that promised to take you to fairyland, and you cried like a baby every time they didn't. Don't you ever tire of it?" said Narcissa, and her sibilants whistled with scorn. "Aren't you ashamed to be some man's fool?"

"Better his fool than his concubine," she spat, brandishing her bare left hand. "Don't condescend to me, Cissa. Your fairyland might come with diamonds, but that doesn't make it better than mine."

Narcissa slapped her.

Tried to: Andy caught her wrist. She sneered between their crossed arms.

"There you are, Lady Malfoy," she said."I see you now."

She threw Narcissa's wrist back at her.

"I will be Lady Malfoy," said Narcissa. "And when you tire of lying there on your back beneath a brute, don't owl me for help getting up."

“I wouldn’t owl you for every goblin’s gold.”

“You think he’ll please you? He won’t. You’ll tire of him in a fortnight. You think a man can make you happy? You think anything can? Lord Merlin, Andy, if there was I would’ve found it! In a year’s time you’ll be lonely and poor, wondering why you thought what the castle lacked could be found in sty—”

“In a year’s time I’ll have a baby,” said Andy.

Narcissa stopped still. Her feet were shrouded in earth. The wind battered their skirts against their ankles, two black birds straining to fly.

“You’re lying.”

“I will.” Andy lifted her chin, and her voice nearly didn’t tremble. “Six weeks late. If it’s a boy, I’m naming it after him.”

“It’s anathema,” she said shrilly. “The bloodline—”

“Fuck the bloodline,” exclaimed Andy, with a trill of exhilaration. “Don’t you ever tire of cliché? None of you really care, you’re all spitting shit at each other over tea and trifle — you live without thinking! How can you bear it, waiting to breed and rot and die—”

Narcissa tried to take Andy’s hands, but she shook her off. “If you have— if you let him — I won’t — you’ll break Bella’s heart, you—”

“Bella! There’s one woman who’ll survive it,” she exclaimed, astonished. “She’s already doing what I am, just in the other direction. She’s in love with her husband’s blood zealot, did you know? You’d all see it if you only let yourselves. Some days I think I’m the only one who looks at her, the way you people act — like she’d care if that dry old cack you married her to keeled over and died on the mattress! All she really lives for are the days she leaves that castle. But you can’t understand it, because you don’t really have the courage for love, do you, Cissa? In my shoes, you wouldn't make it past the front door."

Narcissa straightened. Her spine was a temple pillar, perpendicular to the ground.

"In your shoes, I would have cut that animal out of my body before I let it do to me what you're about to."

Andy closed her mouth. Her face slackened — not calm, merely dead.

"I'd rather do that to mine than what you'll do to yours," she said. "You're going to raise a monster. And I hope, Cissa, I really hope you enjoy it. You've been waiting long enough for one to love you back."

Narcissa's wand whispered out of its sheath. She pointed it at her, palm-down, forefinger laid straight along the wood. At her side, Andy was holding hers in the same way.

A door slammed in the house, and light spilled over the lawns. Andy whirled and ran, her back retreating over the trembling end of Narcissa's wandpoint, until she slipped into the trees, and was gone.

Fuming noon. Cooling Charms trembled vainly against the shimmer of a heatwave. Narcissa, faintly shining in a gown of thick lace, sat under a vast tent of cloth-of-gold, while a quartet of selkies performed Pachelbel. Dancers moved up and down the shaded pavilion, their robes a glittering braid, studded with gilt in the ladies' hair.

At the children's table, Sirius had shucked his tie and jacket; he was refilling his third firewhiskey. Regulus made a quartet with Crabbe, Avery, and Dolohov, who dwarfed him comically in height. Their periodic waves of laughter failed to move him. Heat melted an older wizard's dress robes over his scrawny shoulders. He was calm and miserable.

Walburga and Orion had a table with Rodolphus Lestrange, who said something that made Orion laugh. Cygnus had sequestered himself under one of the flower arches with the Carrows' girl. Down by the lake, Druella had taken a few of the younger Rosiers to examine the peacocks, whose feathers were the same color as their hair.

Bellatrix had come in a gold shirtwaist and black skirt. Her left hand sported a thick gold band; on the other, a black diamond signet spotted her forefinger, which she rolled around and around with her thumb. Her dark eyes sifted restlessly through the crowd, gravitating to the exit.

Narcissa leaned over to her ear. "Did you invite a paramour?"

Bellatrix recoiled. "My husband's at that table," she hissed. "Are you mad?"

"It was a joke. You seemed restless, dear."

"Strange joke to tell at your wedding," said Bellatrix, but it mollified her. She leaned over, and spoke in a low voice. "The Lord wants me to go with him to Romania. Alone."

"It's an odd thing to call him, isn't it? There isn't any House Voldemort."

"He's not a lord in the traditional sense. Listen — Cissy, I'm learning things. Magic they didn't teach at Hogwarts. If we go to Romania, I could learn more."

"If you go to Romania, your husband will notice," muttered Narcissa, reaching for her wine.

"'Notice' isn't 'mind.' And he's too frightened of the Lord for it to matter. He's weak."

"What do you need me to say? You've already worked it out."

“Don’t sound so judgmental,” said Bellatrix, frowning. “I’m not going to do anything iniquitous. The Lord isn’t like that. He doesn’t want—”

Narcissa’s face pinched in acute, frustrated pity. Bellatrix faltered.

“All men want that, dear.”

“He doesn’t,” she said venomously. “There are no other men like him.”

“What is not like other men is not a man.”

“Then he isn’t. He doesn’t deal in the chattels of desire,” she said, and her voice became distant, dreamy. “All he wants is power. It’s more honest, you know; he never lies. And what is desire if not power, recognized? You would understand it, if you met him. The things he can do—”

Narcissa sat up. Lucius had come back from the crowd of dancers. Against the gold of his cloak, his long hair was so white it shone.

By the arm he held a shabby teenager, with oily hair brushed forward to hide his spots. He wore trousers that showed his ankles, and a Slytherin tie, and the Malfoy crest on his tie pin suggested to whom it belonged.

“Cissa,” said Lucius, “you remember Severus.”

“I do. You’re in Sirius’s year,” she said indulgently. “What does Slughorn have you doing?”

He spoke from the corner of his mouth, with his hands in his pockets. “Amortentia. And Dreamless Sleep. Wolfsbane, sometimes.”

“Gracious. In fourth year?” She smiled. “I’m not sure I’d pass it, now.”

“I work from the N.E.W.T. book,” said Snape. His voice was flat and smug. “If it comforts you, I’m not sure he’d pass it, either.”

“Risked expulsion last year,” said Lucius. “Slughorn had to pull him out of an incident with Meadowes. He calls him the dungeon’s resident genius.”

“How did this genius get himself caught?” said Bellatrix coldly. Snape curled his lip, but it was Narcissa who spoke.

“Meadowes called Cadmus a name,” she said. “He retaliated. I saw it.”

Snape smirked, an acrid expression of embarrassed pride; but Bella’s lips thinned.

“The Dark Lord isn’t on the market for a dog,” she said. “Bring him back in two years, when he’s less green.”

“In two years, I’ll be past the Hogwarts curriculum,” Snape complained. His voice cracked. “Slughorn won’t have anything to teach me. He barely does now.”

“Then find a way to make yourself of use.” She threw back her chair and dropped her napkin. “The Dark Lord’s service is not a Potions mastery. If you want to be a technician, go to Cambridge.”

Narcissa opened her mouth, but Bella stalked down the dais, cutting a path to her husband’s table.

“I wouldn’t rend your shirt over it,” murmured Narcissa, in tones of hesitant sweetness. “She’s slow to warm. And you are young.”

He bristled. “I wasn’t going to rend anything—”

“I should say not,” said Lucius, “it’s my shirt you’re wearing—”

“—and I resent you, Malfoy, for conceding to her metaphor,” said Snape bitterly, shrugging him off. “I’m not your lord’s dog. Nor, for that matter, am I Mulciber’s, though I thank you for that implication—”

“That’ll do,” said Lucius, and Snape fell silent. “Show Cissa your wedding present.”

Narcissa raised her eyebrows and crooked two fingers. With ill grace, Snape stepped up and placed before her a trifolded parchment sheaf, sealed with crestless black wax.

She slit it open and unfolded it. On the parchment there was written in difficult scrawl:

ELECTROSEMPRA

Verbal — 5th parry into classic riposte — focus

Wear rubber soles

Narcissa lifted the paper delicately between forefinger and thumb. “You wrote this?”

“Writing it wasn’t the hard part,” muttered Snape.

“One would be forgiven for considering it extraordinary,” said Lucius. “At the age of fourteen. It’s distinctly unique.”

Snape threw him another furtive look; it was shuttered and irritable, but even so, it glowed with obvious, thirsty pleasure.

Narcissa handed it back. “The Latin is evocative,” she agreed. “A bit dramatic. The Greek would have been subtler.”

“It works,” said Snape intently. “I’ll teach you. It takes some doing, but—”

“Show Lucius,” she said firmly. “It’s very nice. But I don’t suppose I’ll have much use for it.”

To her surprise, Snape edged it back at her. He said: “Keep it. You’d be surprised what you can find a use for.”

Thunder broke overhead, but the air was full of fire instead of rain.

The ward-alarm screamed. Footsteps pounded down the hallways, and men in bone-white masks flurried through the house, swarming at the exits. The aftertaste of Disapparation made the air taste of ozone. Smoke cloaked the Manor windows, billowing from the lawns, which glowed like a field of coals.

Narcissa stumbled down the marble stairs and dropped hard to her knees at the bottom, clutching the full round of her belly. She cried out.

“Lucius!”

One of the masked wizards Apparated into being at her elbow, and knelt to help her up. “He’s at the vanguard.” The voice was Snape’s. “Where’s your rendezvous? I’ll take you.”

“Forget the rendezvous. Take me to St. Mungo’s.”

“Lord fucking Merlin. Now?”

“It doesn’t happen on command, you cestode. Take me to Mungo’s.”

He scoffed, but it had an edge of panic. “I can’t Apparate you to London, Lady Malfoy. If you hadn’t noticed, the Order of the Phoenix —”

“Hang the Order. Take me, now.”

“I am not your seneschal,” he said tightly. “I have other responsibilities. If Lucius fails, neither you nor I will be free.”

“He won’t fail. He never does. He’s a legion unto himself, you know it, he never needed either of us, he— ah!”

She gave another cry, and almost fell, but he caught her. When it ebbed, she tilted her head up, flushed and shaking. “Severus,” she rasped, “help me. Please. Trust Lucius — he has your spells, and his cunning. He doesn’t need you as I do.”

A group of soldiers ran past and almost knocked her to her feet; she clutched his shoulders. Thunder crashed, and a whorl of green flame rolled up from the lawns. Another alarm began screaming.

“I can take you to a country hospital,” Snape ground out. “In the village.”

“No.”

“Narcissa, be reasonable.”

“I won’t have some filthy muggle put his paws on me. I’d rather die —”

“I was born in such a place. It may not suit. But it will serve.”

“I don’t— I can’t, Severus, I—”

“Stand back from her.”

At the top of the staircase, Bellatrix stood, her cowl thrown back, the hair unfurling like a second cloak over the black gleam of her armoring. The armageddon-light from the windows bathed her in red, and her gloved right hand closed around a hilt of lacquered vinewood. The other clutched a white mask.

“Lucius called you to the vanguard,” said Snape. “He’s marshalled your division. They await orders.”

“Convey them to his control.” She swept down the stairs. “Mulciber’s cavalry is ten miles distant. He brings the giants under Karkus. Tell Lucius he holds the line.”

“When can I tell him to expect you?”

“Once he wins, Severus.” She lifted Narcissa in her arms, bracing her arm under her knees. Narcissa latched her arms around her neck. “And tell my sister’s lord husband that he can come meet our heir on the morrow.”

Scrambling soldiers surged clear around the path of Lady Lestrange as she carried Lady Malfoy through the corridors. Shouts to hail her met no answer. House-elves flitted ahead to mind the doors, and one hauled open the double-door to the master bedroom barely in time to avoid a blow from Bellatrix’s boot. Narcissa pressed her face to Bellatrix’s shoulder, moaning, as her body seized again.

In the master bedroom, where only a red seam glowed behind the drapes. Bellatrix settled her onto the bed — moving with stiff, ungraceful care, by turns too gentle and not enough — and the candles in the room burst to life with a wide sweep of her wand.

Narcissa screamed again. Her hands scrabbled on the coverlet. Bellatrix vaulted onto the bed beside her, grabbing her head before she slammed it against the headboard. She shoved her back down. Her ring dug cold into Narcissa’s fevered temple.

In the shadows of the room, a dark-haired figure swam through the smoke and haze, her curls tied with ribbons. A girl was singing in the distance, over the sound of thunder.

“Andy?”

Bellatrix recoiled. “She’s gone,” she snapped. “There’s no such thing as Andy. She never was. She wasn’t one of us, in the end, she wasn’t strong enough—”

“Andy — where’s Andy? It hurts—”

The figure moved into the firelight. It was not Andy, but Walburga, her skin hollowed around the starveling contours of her skeleton. She turned and slipped soundlessly through the window.

“She’s not here,” said Bellatrix, furious. “I’m here. Look at me.”

“Please, make it stop — make it stop.”

“You have to push.”

“No, I can’t. I’m going t-to die.”

Bellatrix pulled her wand and lit a flame at the end of it.

“Push,” she said, “or I’ll give you something to really scream about.”

Narcissa clenched Bellatrix’s hand. “Aide-moi,” she rasped. Her body rolled with the next contraction. “Bien-aimée, aide-moi.”

“Toujours,” she murmured. “Push or die, princess.”

A contraction seized her; she screamed, and blood poured over the silk sheets. Bellatrix pressed their foreheads together, and the scream reverberated through the walls, while the house shook to its foundations with lightless thunder.

It was dawn; the smoke was still rising from the grounds. Narcissa sat against the headboard, her hair ragged and loose around her bare shoulders. Draco nestled against her breast, making tepid noises of discomfort. She gazed at him rapturously, cradling his tiny head in her palm. Hesitantly, she leaned forward and touched her lips to the tiny bulb of his nose.

He squawked and groaned. She giggled, tapping his nose, and then his ears, his cheeks, the little bow of his philtrum. When she nosed into his neck, he gave a loud whine, and it made her cackle madly to herself. The light filtered through the smoke on the window, an artificial midwinter.

Footsteps rapped out on the corridor. When the door flew open, she had to drag her eyes away from the baby.

Steam rose from Lucius's armor; ash filmed his gauntlets and his hair. The smell of magic clung to him, and the blood on his boots did not seem his own.

Her blood had soaked through to the mattress. She sat in the ring of it like a pearl in a clamshell.

"I won," she said. Her voice was hoarse. She lifted the baby in the cradle of her arms.

Lucius let out a laugh.

Narcissa held a swaddled infant to her chest in the sitting-room. It was dark. A draft hung about the Manor still, and orange leaves clustered on the sills.

Draco was sleeping, his face burrowed comfortably into her neck. She hummed to herself while he dozed, smoothing down the tufts of white hair. He still had the sickly-sweet infant smell about him.

The Floo burst green. Lucius staggered over the hearth, bracing Snape over his shoulder. Blood streaked the front of Snape's robes.

"Dead," Lucius barked. He threw Snape down on one of the sofas. "The Dark Lord's dead."

Narcissa froze. She looked at Snape, but he did not appear to hear them. He had fallen with his face down, and he was making a horrible sound between a sob and a wail. It ricocheted down the halls, twin to Draco's.

"I warned him," Lucius snarled. "Potter sent a distress call. The Order were coming. There wasn't time. But he wanted to make the cursed thing there, with the boy's soul, he said, it was fitting — when he finished preparing, we went upstairs, and found the wife in a pool of her own blood. She made a heartsblood pentagram. A shielding rune."

Snape’s howl tapered off, and he fell to trembling, silently.

“On the child,” said Narcissa quietly.

“That was not the Dark Lord’s conclusion,” said Lucius grimly. “He took the spell to be for herself.”

“And now he’s dead?”

“Or gone to test the power of his horcruxes — Merlin’s sake, Severus pull yourself together.”

“Did the child survive it?” said Narcissa stiffly. Draco wailed into her shoulder, and she rubbed his back in fruitless consolation. “Or did it perish, too?”

“He’s alive,” said Snape throatily. “She did it right. A perfect circle — heartsblood pentagram, witch’s blood, midnight on Samhain. Of course it worked. The Dark Lord went to kill the child— he stepped over her— over her b—”

He pitched down to his knees at the hearth, and threw up in it. Narcissa curled her lip and held Draco away from him.

“What happened to the child?” she said.

“Presumably the Order has it,” Lucius said, stripping off his gloves. “It was an expeditious retreat. Your cousin was at the gates. I had to pull this one out by the hair—”

“You should have left me,” Snape rasped doggedly, still wiping spittle from his mouth. “I should have died.”

“That would have helped no one,” said Lucius, “least of all the mudblood.”

“Don’t call her that.”

Lucius rolled his eyes, gesturing boredly with his glove. “Your prize, then. She won’t like you any better in the afterlife, I assure you, and especially not after this.”

“Don’t!”

“Turned Pettigrew into a pavement stain,” Lucius added. “Black. Plain sight of twelve muggles, not that they saw much — if your aunt had seen it, she might have restored him.

“What of my sister?”

“She and Roddy fled north. The second of tonight’s failures: She spent so long playing with her food she forgot to eat it.”

“Don’t speak that way of her,” Narcissa said faintly. “So — he’s gone. What happens now?”

Draco burst into tears. Dobby appeared with a crack at her elbow to take him. He bowed deeply to both Malfoys, and vanished again, severing Draco’s cry with a ghostly echo.

“We call counsel with Bellatrix,” said Lucius. “I doubt she will hear of surrender.”

“But she won’t pursue — with the Lord gone, it would be foolish, to— she wants only freedom. She doesn’t wish to die. I can convince her —”

“I have always wondered what it is you think you love, in Bellatrix,” said Snape. His head still hung low. “Did it never strike you odd that no one else recognizes in her the graces you do?”

“Does it never strike you that you are a half-blood abomination?” she snapped. “Does it never strike you as audacious to speak to me that way, though you stand here alive by my husband’s generosity? Does it strike you, Severus, that you know nothing of us, of our families, or of the ways we love?”

“It strikes me daily,” he said, turning, and the look of him made her step back. His face was a dull, vacant object, hollowed by the gnawing woodrot of grief. “It strikes me often, nowadays, that I am not loved by you, nor by anyone else. That either of you would throw me to the dogs, if it suited you — and I think it will suit you, one day, I am not so naive as to think myself endeared — and that when it happens, I will be buried wordless and lightless in a pauper’s tomb. I have only the right to dream otherwise, and even that I do not do, these days. Lady Malfoy, all I ever knew of love I learned by watching. But I am glad to say I did not learn by watching you.”

Lightning bathed a writhing sky. Rain churned up the Manor grounds, tar-slick mud underfoot, as the storm cast ghoulish bars of light and shade over the mausoleum.

Four figures stood together under the poplars. Spells flickered back and forth through the churning wheel of lightning-flashes, colors lurid in the darkness. Lucius Malfoy and Rodolphus Lestrange dueled with the relentless focus of artisans, their movements perfectly mirrored across the ten-pace distance between them. White hair whirled through the darkness, matched by sabled crag-dark gray. Bellatrix clutched Narcissa to her chest while she thrashed, screaming.

“Let me go, please— stop him, stop him—”

“It’ll be fast,” said Bellatrix softly. “Roddy will be quick.”

“I’ll give you anything — I’ll do anything — take me instead, please, Bella!”

Bellatrix hugged her tightly and pressed her lips to her ear, ignoring her thrashing. “Hush, pet. It’ll be over soon.”

Rodolphus Lestrange thrust his wand down. A roiling ridge of spikes erupted from the earth and undulated like the tail of a great beast, throwing Lucius from his feet. Narcissa screamed raggedly.

Lucius caught himself and rolled, flipping upright on one knee. Rodolphus crossed the piste, a serrated blade sprouting from his wand. Lucius snapped his head up and lunged.

The spikes melted into a wave of tar that drenched Rodolphus's boots. A whisk of his wand froze it to stone. Lucius pulled, and Rodolphus lurched, catching himself at the last moment with a blast of Bombarda. The stone shattered, and the rain turned the dust to grime. Lucius threw three blasts up the piste and began sparring again, boots darting back and forth across the mud like dancers in a reel.

Rodolphus drew his wand up, and the earth beneath them began to writhe. A black dart flashed out of the woods.

A spell flickered across the lawn. Rodolphus dropped his wand, clutching his throat.

Blood bubbled through his fingers. Wounds peeled open across his chest, soaking through his shirtfront, as if the skin had unsealed in a dozen places at once. Rodolphus lifted his head, and lightning flushed the color from his weathered face. Red flecks pebbled the short crop of his beard.

He stared at Bellatrix, reaching for her. She stiffened, and her breath caught, but she did not cry out for him. Her arms remained firm around Narcissa.

Rodolphus collapsed to the ground. Snape stood behind him, his wand still suspended in the last position of the curse.

"Release your sister," he called. His voice rippled in between peals of thunder.

"You killed my lord husband," said Bellatrix softly. "And Lord Malfoy forfeits the duel by dishonorable conduct. The law accords me the honor of revenge upon you both."

“Between your husband and your honor, I question which you care for less,” called Lucius. “Flee now. Mourn your lord’s ghost. I imagine you will prefer its company to any other.”

“He is not dead! The lord lives! You know he does, you knew it, and you betrayed him anyway — I called on you to seek his resurrection with me, and you denied it! As we speak he walks the veil alone, waiting in vain for the fulfillment of your vows, while those who swore to serve him glut themselves on a coward’s prizes — mourn him? I never mourned him, for he never died! I mourn that my sister ever touched you, feculent liar. I mourn that your name stains the title of my heir. I mourn all blood of yours in his sacred veins, would that I could bleed it out of him—”

“The aurors are coming,” called Snape. “In the time it takes you to kill both of us, they will be here.”

Bellatrix made a cross between a snarl and a whine.

“Death first to cowards and traitors,” she hissed. She threw Narcissa aside and vanished into smoke.

She appeared again on the lawn, drawing her wand, and Lucius raised his only in time to catch a brilliant, shuddering thunderclap, shattering sparks across the green. Narcissa scrambled to her feet and screamed again, but Snape had darted forth and caught her, bracing around the waist, hauling her back from the fight, as waves of magic bloomed from the lawns in oscillating pendulums of light, flushing the night as bright as dawn. Snape shoved her down to the earth and threw a shield over their heads, rippling blue; Narcissa clung to his robes, screaming again, as the dueling figures coalesced and vanished into the nova.

The vision cleared.

Draco stood before her. He could not have been fourteen. He had Lucius’s eyes, pale and bright, but his hair was short and combed, and he held himself differently. It was in the casual cant to his hip, the leonine deliberation of where he placed his feet — for Lucius moved like a colonel inspecting his regiment, the thoughtless bravery of one who never looked where his feet would fall; but when Draco stepped forward to catch her, and he put himself exactly where he had to, to catch her fall.

“Darling,” she murmured. Her face was filmed with sweat. She touched his cheek, smiling, but he did not return it. He had inherited such a furious little scowl.

“Mother, come down from there,” he said. His voice had yet to drop; he had to lower it to trembling, to get the tenor of command.

Behind her, wind trailed through the yawning square of the window. The sill bent under her feet. She stroked her thumb up the line of his jaw. He flickered, and there was Lucius, cold and sightless: another flicker, and he was young and furious.

“Come down from there at once,” he said sternly.

There were voices behind her: Girls were singing in the fields. She turned, and Draco caught her elbow.

“Do you hear that?” she said.

“Hear what? Mother, get down.”

My heart is pierced by Cupid… I disdain all glittering gold…

“Nothing,” she said. When she brushed her cheek, the black diamond dragged a cold line across the skin. “Help Mummy, sweetling.”

She wrapped her arm around his shoulders, and he helped her down on trembling feet.

“I have you,” Draco said, strained with the effort of bracing her up. “Come this way. You’ll be alright. Watch there, for the glass.”

“I never worry,” she whispered, and kissed his temple. Lucius turned and smiled thinly at her, shifting his arm around waist, and she tilted her head against his shoulder.

They were in the Manor again, her and Snape. She sat in a chair by the hearth, her sleeve rolled back, while he stitched together a blackened gash on her arm.

“You were a fool to try it alone.”

“A fool, or sick of caves,” she said tonelessly, watching him sew. Snape bit off the end and laid it aside. “Dumbledore doesn’t want to admit it, because it’ll mean hell to get the wretched thing out, but if it’s anywhere in the world, it’s Witherfell Abbey. Regulus wouldn’t have put it anywhere he needed to reach by going outdoors. Anyway, I grew up there. I suppose I thought it would welcome me.”

“You did not think to ask for help?”

“Would you have come?” she countered. “You’re supposed to be playing the pageboy. You’ve no time to rescue a wandering madwoman.”

“Neglecting that oafish play for sympathy,” said Snape, “which, for pity, I will not touch — you might recall that you have a son.”

She hummed. He tugged the stitching, making her hiss.

“We fought before he left. Badly.”

“And you thought to punish yourself by dying?”

“Lord, no. Not all of us are as melodramatic as you,” she said crossly. “He went to be with his half-breed brood in London, and — ow. That hurts.”

“It certainly does.”

“Why are you punishing me?” she hissed. “I have allowed it, have I not? I have allowed him more than my mother ever would have. My father— don’t make me laugh. Do you know, the girl—”

“Careful.”

“The muggle-born, Severus, I wasn’t going to — she slept under this roof. Can you imagine what Lucius would have said?”

“No, but I doubt I would enjoy it.” Snape snapped the surgical kit closed. Narcissa frowned.

“You think he’d be wrong to say it,” she said. Her expression grew chilly, and then mocking. “Why, thou bleeding heart. After all this time, Severus, have you become a believer? Has Dumbledore sold you a bridge?”

“You say that like a childish thing. I do not know why. You and I both obey him; to believe what he does is at least to give it a varnish of choice. Do you really wish to die at the hands of a master?”

Narcissa rolled her arm, testing the stitches. “I have no master,” she said. “I have a son.”

“I am aware of your fanatical devotion. It does not answer my question.”

“Well, it was my turn for one,” she said curtly. “Fanatical devotion. Both of my sisters had their vainglorious obsessions with men who annihilated them. I always get everything last.”

One of the pipes dripped. In the old kitchen, the burnished copper caught any scrap of light from the windows.

“Draco,” said Snape, in tutorial tones, “is hardly annihilatory. He is caught between the river and the deeps. And he fights the current for your sake.”

“Why, how good of him. It’s hard to do the unprecedented, isn’t it? Most people give up on me well before the fifteen-year-mark. Why trouble over the little wallflower, when there are so many blooms in distant gardens, and this one is so difficult to deal with—”

“It is a peculiar vice in your family to regard oneself as the still point around which the world turns,” said Snape dryly. “Andromeda did not marry with the object of scorning you—”

“Don’t say that name to me.”

“—and your husband, as I recall, made great sacrifices to avoid parting from you — seems cruel to blame him, under the circumstances — and I will use the names that please me. I’ve dealt enough in my life with taboos.”

“Kindly remove my neck from between your teeth,” she said dully. “Why my beliefs are suddenly important to anyone, I’d love to know. Only one man ever loved me for what I think, and I buried him.”

He tucked the surgical kit into his knapsack, wedged between a set of knives and vials. “If that’s a complaint, it’s hypocrisy,” he said, “as you don’t love Draco for what he thinks, either.”

She massaged her wrist, glaring at him. He gestured indulgently for her to speak.

“That shows your ignorance. Motherlove is the conquest of reason. Your girl understood that,” she said, with silken cruelty. “Between her son’s life and a knife in her chest, it would not have required a second’s thought. There is no space between the love and its object for thought to pass.”

“No,” said Snape, and his voice was almost soft. “For her, there never was.”

The wax pooled beneath the candles in thick white coils. The clocks tolled three.

“You love her still,” she said. “Lily.”

Snape did not reply, but the set of his face made her nod.

“Do you?” he said.

“Him? Yes.”

“And her,” he said, watching.

Through her sleeve, her finger traced the path of her scar. “Oh, darling,” she said lightly. “Toujours.”

“You would have done better,” she said.

They were in the mausoleum, the door slitted open over a triangle of moonlight. Narcissa sat with her knees drawn close to her chest. Her back pressed to the bars of her husband’s tomb.

“Andy once said I’d raise a monster.” The stone caught her voice and threw it back at her, accusingly. She listened to it calmly, without complaint, and replied: “For the pleasure of having it love me. — Forgive me the anathema. I only do it once a year.”

The ghosts obeyed her. She pressed her knuckles to her mouth.

“He isn’t a monster,” she said worriedly. “I don’t think he is. I would know. I could — tell.”

The tomb said nothing to her.

“My father would have adored him. He would have made Regulus laugh. Mare that it was. And Bella never wanted children. But she swore she’d love mine.”

An owl cried out from the distant trees.

“Some days I forget you,” she said. “I think I made you up. I worry that the best I remember of you is only what I’ve learned by watching him.”

She paused, and reached through the bar. Her finger traced the edge of the place left for her own coffin.

“Exit seraphim, and Satan’s men,” she murmured. She giggled to herself. It skittered around the Malfoy crypts, ghoulish and indulgent. “Isn’t it funny, darling? I’ve known him as long as I knew you.”

Yellow windows hung like lanterns from the silhouette of a twilit street. The houses were brick and square, perched close to the pavements, with flat facades and first stories made from white plaster. Narcissa stood at the gate, a green velvet cloak drawn low over her face.

Voices rippled from the open kitchen window.

“Darling? I’m getting a takeaway curry.”

“Oh, good. Can’t be arsed to cook. Can I have a vindaloo?”

A vague hum. “Samosa?”

“Mm. I shouldn’t.”

“I’ll get two.”

“Oh, don’t, darling, I’ll feel obligated.”

A shadow passed over the window, and Narcissa drew back behind the gatepost.

Andromeda turned on the faucet. She wore her hair back, and a pale brown blouse, with hoop earrings and little makeup. The lines around her eyes and mouth showed the beginning of a great descent in her face, but the ethereal beauty lingered in the shape of her mouth and the haughty, aquiline arch of her nose.

“...should call Melissa tomorrow,” she was saying, “it’s been ages, she’s going to think you’re dead.”

“Dastardly thought. She’d have to find some other way to get you over for Christmas.”

“The love between me and your mother will long outlive you, dear. Never worry.”

A man stepped into the square of the window and kissed her on the neck. She shrieked, slapping him with a soapy hand.

“Off! Off! I’m going to bite you. Go put the bins out, make yourself useful.”

Narcissa closed her eyes. There were diamonds on the tips of her lashes.

“I’m sorry about that.”

Dumbledore stood under the streetlamp. He wore a three-piece muggle suit of brown tartan, and a soft cap. “I thought you might like to see it,” he said, in tones of not-apology. “But I did not think you could bear to come yourself. You are entitled to resent me for the deception.”

Narcissa lifted her eyes, a faint smile upon her lips. “An apology, for what must seem to you such a trifling indignity,” she murmured. “How you spoil me. My son cannot abide the sight of me because of you. And you apologize for this?”

“It is not you he cannot abide.”

She turned. Her eyes burned bright with loathing. “In my life, I have lost all my battles but one,” she said softly. “One triumph. And you would take him, too, from me.”

“I would save him for you. I would keep him from the Dark Lord. I only wanted to spare him.”

“Nothing will keep him from the Dark Lord,” she said. “Nothing. You have made him too brave, Albus. He thinks he can fight.”

“Perhaps he can,” said Dumbledore intently. “Perhaps he can win.”

“And perhaps he will be killed,” she said, “prosecuting the third generation of your war against the inevitable. Perhaps my boy will rest beside the Potters in the bodies at your feet. And only then, in your arrogance, will it occur to you that he would have lived longer, whatever his beliefs, if you had not made him an enemy to himself. Perhaps, finally—”

“Narcissa—”

“—finally, you will question,” she said, her voice thick with rage, “if your dreams of justice are worth what you did to my child. What you will do to him, every day of his life, while darkness walks this world. I know what happens to brave boys, Albus, I mourned my share of them.”

“Why did you throw in with me at all, if you did not rate our chances?”

A coach glided past with a whistle of exhaust.

“Because he is the only thing that matters,” she said softly. “All I ever did well, I did for his sake.”

“Never your own?” he said sadly. “Truly? Have you never thought for a moment, in all your suffering, that the world for which you have suffered and denied yourself, the world for which you sacrificed the greater part of your family — you never questioned the value of a devotion it has never seen fit to reward?”

Narcissa smiled at him suddenly, and her eyes shone like asphalt under frost.

“My family names its sons after stars,” she said. “I had one for a father, and one for a child. Their light takes us lesser creatures through the darkness. That path is mine by right; I am the last of the great astronomers.”

“It is hard going, by starlight,” said Dumbledore, melancholy.

“That may be,” she said. “But it is the only way I know.”

She walked up the street, instead of Apparating. Her cloak swept the gleaming pavement as the sky turned from blue to black.

Toujours

Chapter 83: Toujours

(See the end of the chapter for notes.)

Emerging from the pensieve, he found the study drenched in dawn's soggy blues. Waking brought a moment of bewilderment as he struggled to place himself in space and time. It helped when Hermione stirred beside him, groaning. By appearance, she might have slept for two weeks or not at all; a coronet of bristling curls hung shaggy in her face, and the bruises under eyes had grown fresh rings of ash. She looked completely terrible. Tenderness cut him in the ribs. He sat up, and caught his reflection in the blown mirrors of her pupils: hair mussed, collar askew, but sixteen and recognizably himself.

It was a relief. For a moment he'd doubted what he would see.

"Hey," she said hoarsely.

She made a bleary grab for him before remembering, apparently, what had happened to them, and then she mastered herself and sat on her knees and simply looked at him. "My head's killing me," she said. "I feel — hungover, rather, but without any of the fun."

The voice that came out of him was dry and rusted. "How would you know what that feels like?"

"I have a concept," she said. "Lavender's had one, and she's a devoted imagist. Are you alright?"

"Not very." He closed his eyes and braced his forehead on his knuckles, waiting for the headache to abate. His synapses felt overheated. He had overtaxed the system, and the alarms drummed insistently on his skull. Somehow he found the wits to say, "I'm sorry I made you do that." In the double scrutiny of daylight and retrospect the decision seemed far more unconscionably selfish; not with respect to his mother, but to Hermione, about whom his mother's life had reported nothing kind.

"Don't be stupid, you didn't make me do anything," she said immediately. "You asked me, and I agreed. You didn't know what was in her memories."

"I knew it wouldn't be pleasant."

"Yes, hence the point of me coming," she said, and her irritation helped his headache by spawning a second, smaller headache to duel it. "I knew it wouldn't be pleasant, either, I'd met the woman before. And having done it I can't say it was, but Draco — she wasn't my mother."

"You—" He winced around the snag in his throat, and exhaled until the air flowed relatively clean. His tongue throbbed dry and fat between his teeth and he could not fathom how pathetic it was to ask her for anything, after that, having had the audacity to ask at all. "You're alright, then?"

Hermione gave a high, uneasy laugh, and he watched in a pained daze as she crawled over and kissed him, quite businesslike, on the cheek. It had the quality of someone trying to stamp her opinion through the skin. "Of course I'm alright," she said. "I could have lived quite happily without seeing Snape as a teenager. And I found your teenaged father uncanny, in an uncomfortable way, he does look rather like you, only with the wrong smile, and gestures, and posture, and— anyway. But I'm going to be fine. I have a hundred questions about what happened, and in a moment I'm going to run and get a pen to write them all down, and then I'm going to have a fairly good time badgering you about it."

It had every appearance of honesty. She could not, in truth, be trusted to foreclose any statement for tact. He took comfort in this, and kissed her. She said: "Mm," and let him, a bit, before pulling back and wobbling to her feet. She extended her hand, and he used it to pull himself up.

“You should rest,” she said. “I doubt skimming forty years of memory constitutes adequate sleep hygiene.”

Exhaustion reared up to affirm that she was correct. He suppressed it and smoothed his hair back from his face. “The guest room should be ready for you,” he said. “You can take my bed, if it isn’t. I have to speak to Snape.”

She opened her mouth to ask about what, but thought better of it. “Yes,” she said, “of course,” and: “Come find me. After.”

The servants pointed him in the direction of the dining-room. Snape hunched at the right hand of the table’s head. He was dissembling a plate of toast and sausages with the swift carelessness of the starving.

Draco sat down opposite and reached for the coffee. Snape watched him over the surgical decapitation of a toast point.

On the distant trees, a yellow luster spread, filming the pale green leaves at the top. Sweet green air whispered through the high windows. The drapes bucked gently, like breaking crests of seafoam.

Snape’s jaw worked ruthlessly on a bit of fat. Recognizable in his homely, bone-gaunt stare were all the ingredients of his adolescent face, veined with more creases of age than his years would rightly give him, a long jaw, a crooked slash of a nose that, with hindsight’s knowledge, must have been broken at some point after his fourteenth birthday. Even staring, his eyes twitched iterantly to the exits, neither of which Snape had placed behind his back.

Draco sipped his coffee. Snape waited.

“Will you go back to the school?” said Draco. His voice was still rough from the pensieve.

“For a time.”

“And then?”

“I will go where I am needed,” he said. “I have a few talents left besides spycraft.”

“I assume that means hunting horcruxes.”

“The Dark Lord will begin moving them, soon,” agreed Snape, reaching for the coffee. “The ones he can locate. It will be hard for him to judge what I knew of their whereabouts, and safest to insure them all against me. If so, perhaps my years of labor will not have been entirely laid to waste.”

“You might take care, with that,” said Draco flatly. “He’ll be seeking to punish you. My aunt implied death was preferable to his methods.”

Snape kindly ignored his sentimentality. “I have some experience moving without notice,” he said, “and I have my headings. Albus tells me that Potter has at least a rudimentary sense of the Dark Lord’s location, which, if exploited, may help him atone for the consequences of his recklessness.”

“I thought he wanted Potter to Occlude.”

“That was his strategy a year ago. Your mother volunteered to me her opinion that the channel between Potter’s mind and the Dark Lord’s may not operate at a conscious level.”

“Why?” said Draco sharply. He settled his cup in his saucer. “What is it that happened to him, that night at the Potters’? My mother showed me the memory of her death. Father said that Lily Evans drew a pentagram—”

Snape sat back in his chair, stone-faced.

“—used her own heartsblood, completely anathema, midnight on Samhain. I understand the mechanics. But runes can’t hold detailed enchantments. Even an Oxford master couldn't draw a pentagram that would sever someone's soul."

"It was a simple inscription," he said, toneless. "Protection. Elhaz. A rune can do anything, theoretically, that its maker can; the chief limit is resources. 'A rune's energy field scales exponentially with its complexity.' The Poisson-Bernadine equations. You should know them by heart, given your marks on the O.W.L."

"I understand that she killed him," he said. "I struggle to grasp what happened after."

Snape swept his wrist over his mouth and pushed aside his plate. "The process for making a horcrux requires a physical sacrifice from the host," he said. "You may imagine — electricity is an imperfect metaphor, it will serve here — to cleave the soul requires an enormous infusion of energy. It requires a jumpstart — a death — a murder, in practice, but I do not know that it must be — and uses the dead soul as grist for the cleaving. Then one binds the severed piece to an object, to prevent it from reunifying with the whole. A part of the host's person must be severed also. When the spell destroyed the Dark Lord's body, it completed the ceremony. The piece of his soul he had meant for the horcrux entered the body of the creature he had attempted to kill."

"But Potter survived."

"So he did. I theorize that the Dark Lord's own death fulfilled the spell, and his soul cannibalized itself. It would explain why his resurrection was imperfect — though that may also be attributable to flaws in the ceremony — I do not think he did it right, but that can be of no substance to us now. Albus has another theory, but our best arguments are still venturesome. These matters are at the far edge of experimental magic, beyond anathema, and no one has written even speculatively on the subject."

"What does Dumbledore think?" said Draco, wary.

Snape's cheek twitched in a shadow of a grimace. "He believes there were two horcruxes made that night," he said. "The first, using her death, to sever the soul of the Dark Lord. And the second — using the Dark Lord's death—"

"To sever Harry's." Draco set down his cup. The coffee burned in his stomach. "Why do you find that tenuous?"

"Because, as noted previously, the host requires his own sacrifice," said Snape briskly, "and Potter's scar does not strike me as sufficient injury, even for an infant. The Dark Lord's sacrifices were considerably more dramatic, by comparison. Also, I have been in the company of a horcrux-host far more often than Albus, and I do not detect the signs. His faults, generous though they are in number, strike me as typical for a tender young moron."

Draco tapped his finger on the white tablecloth. The door creaked, and they both fell silent as Briselda came in to take Snape's tray. She cast a Warming Charm on the coffee pot, replaced the sugarbowl, and left.

"Did you try to save her?" he said quietly. "Or did you let it happen? For your cover?"

There was a palpable ripple of emotion that Snape suppressed under a flat stare. "I was too late," he said, toneless. "She cut out her own heart."

"I don't follow," said Draco, his eyes narrow. "James died first. Then the Dark Lord prepared the horcrux. She had time to draw a full pentagram. You had time—"

"We would never have made it."

"Do you tell yourself that?"

It was cruel. Well, so it was: he felt cruel today. It was his house. There was no one to chastise him for being cruel at the breakfast table.

Snape spoke in a voice so hollow it had no capacity for feeling. “The Dark Lord wanted only the child. And he favored me, in his way. He would have made me a Knight of Walpurgis if I had not volunteered to spy for him in the Order. I think he regretted that he did not.”

Draco’s laugh was a sharp, bitter sound. “You asked him to spare her?”

“I did.”

“And you believed he would?”

“I believe to this day that he would have,” he replied. “It is the prerogative of the king to indulge hypocrisies his inferiors cannot be seen to tolerate — indeed, it helps him to be the only creature above reproach. It was not unknown for Death Eaters to have paramours, or kept women, of questionable blood. The Dark Lord would not be the force that he is if he did not understand, in his way, the things that love demands.”

“A kept woman—”

“I had no such aim.” Snape cut over him. “That night should have marked my disappearance. I intended to end my career as a soldier, one way or another, the moment Lily Evans was safe.”

“So why didn’t you?”

“Because she died,” he said, and the flint in his voice chipped. “And she left her world in my keeping.”

He thought of the sound that had come out of his godfather’s body after seeing Lily Evans dead. He would have preferred to have never heard it. It was haunting.

“You’re not the world’s keeper,” said Draco.

“If I believed that, I would not have labored so long to stay alive,” said Snape, with a cool and disorienting forthrightness. “Draco, this pretense is beneath you. You have no interest in the death of Lily Evans. You are angry at me for your mother.”

Draco’s finger stilled on the tablecloth. He turned his head away.

“You wonder that I did not rescue her; you do not believe that I could not. I had lost my strength and wand-arm; I could die or flee. Nothing that I say will satisfy your suspicion, and perhaps it never will. I will carry that weight. Worse still, I seem unfeeling. My habits do not accord with the common language of grief. I have no recompense for that except to say that I have a soldier’s habits, and I grieve her in our way. If it matters, she would not expect me to do anything else.”

“I don’t want to talk about my mother.”

“Understood,” said Snape, and mercifully said no more.

It was true, he didn’t. He wanted to know everything she had ever said to Snape without talking about her, or acknowledging in any way the fact that she was dead.

He wanted to know enough that he could imagine what she would say now, if she were at the table. He imagined her sitting between them, at the head, but in his mind’s eye she was silent. It made part of him trill in panic. He wondered if he had ever known her at all.

“Bellatrix Lestrange offered to make me a Death Eater,” he said.

Snape said nothing, waiting.

He cleared a hard snag in his throat. “She’s arrogant.”

“Yes.”

“Arrogant and vulnerable, where I’m concerned. It makes her a poor judge of character. My mother could manipulate her. To a point.”

“Your mother knew Bellatrix from infancy. I caution you against analogies.”

“I don’t want advice. I want to know if she’s going to kill me if I try to speak to her.”

“One is rarely sure,” said Snape thinly. “If she believed you regarded her in sincerity as friend and kin, she might be moved by sentiment to help you. The Blacks have long memories. Note that I dislike what you are contemplating.”

“Not half as much as I do,” he said, over-elocuting around the tightness in his throat. “But that’s neither here nor there. She’s in the inner circle, isn’t she? She has the Dark Lord’s favor.”

“I would not underestimate her. You have spent half a decade in the public company of Harry Potter. She is not a fool.”

“You’re right. Half a decade with the Boy Who Lived; he doesn’t have a secret I don’t know. What fool would be interested in that?”

Snape’s stare grew an edge.

The attack came presently: a searing pinpoint of pain at the surface of his mind. Draco threw down the black glass of Occlusion barely in time to prevent a burning claw of fire from tearing through his thoughts. Snape’s mind scrabbled over the shield, a dull wave of pressure on his skull, and then receded.

Draco winced, glowering at him. “Satisfied?” he snapped.

“Not remotely,” Snape said coldly. He stood up. “That is a candle beside what the Dark Lord can do. You are unwise to consider this. Your mother would not have permitted you to speak of it.”

“Well, I have terribly convenient news.”

“Don’t be insipid. It would have destroyed her to imagine you doing this. She would have bled to keep you from it.”

“Fancy that.”

“Listen to me. This is not an atonement,” Snape hissed, leaning over the table. Draco tipped his head back, watching him warily. “You will not find penance in this. You will not find peace. You will destroy everything that is left to you. You would ruin your life, barely begun, in one reckless act of spite for a dead woman.”

“And you’re a hypocrite. It’s your job I’m considering.”

Snape stepped back. His nostrils flared.

“There was a man named Severus Snape, once,” he said, at length. “That man gave himself over, twice, on different altars. I bear his name; but I do not know if the man remains.”

Draco pushed his chair back and stood. “I’m not you,” he said, with all the disdain that could fit in three words. “I don’t know where you find the audacity to imply it. If I was all that was left between the Dark Lord and Hermione, she mightn’t live, but at the very least she would outlive me.”

He turned and swept out of the dining room, his footsteps rapping sharply on the wood.

Someone had drawn the drapes in his bedroom; dust spun in the needles of sunlight between. A lump in the coverlet sported a mane of hair, and when he shut the door behind him, it stirred and made an inarticulate demand of inquest. He toed off his shoes and sat on the bed beside her.

Hermione nosed out of the sheets and scrubbed her eyes open. “God,” she mumbled, “tell me it’s not tomorrow already.”

“No. It’s the first of September. You’ve missed the train.”

“Fine,” she muttered, drawing one of the pillows over her head. “Tell Draco I’ll miss Potions.”

The corner of his lip twisted so far it hurt his cheek. “The prefect? He’s got a reputation. I wouldn’t like to disappoint him.”

“It’s good for him,” said the pillow, drowsily. “Usually he gets whatever he wants because he’s cocky and handsome. It’s horrendous.”

He stripped away the pillow, and she made an anguished noise. Her clumsy grab to recover it probably would have failed even if his reflexes were not considerably better than hers. He tossed it aside and, in recompense, allowed her to wriggle over and perch her head on his shoulder as a replacement.

“What did Snape say?” she yawned, scrubbing her eyes. He moved one of the curls out of her face, pinning it uselessly behind her ear. The ragged spill of them was thick and soft over his throat, and her body was curled up around him, heavy and warm, and when he ran his hand through her hair she sighed hot into his neck.

An imprint of the sheet’s wrinkles lay in pink on her cheek. Sleep clung to the corner of her eye. Looking at her he felt everything so acutely it hurt him, like a hot iron to a raw nerve.

“We spoke about the horcruxes. Things that are going to happen next year.”

“What about next year?” She lifted her head. He nudged her back down.

“I don’t know yet. I have to speak to Dumbledore.”

That cast off the dregs of sleep. She pushed off him and sat up, alert. “About what?” she demanded. “What don’t you want to tell me?”

“There’s nothing I don’t want to tell you.” That was true.

Hermione’s face wrinkled deeper every time he spoke. “Well, good thing that’s not at all a suspicious answer to that question,” she said. “I’m wholly satisfied and definitely reassured. Don’t worry about explaining further, I’m actually a colossal moron.”

“I’ll tell you.” His heart beat hard against his chest. “I need to have a think first. I’ll tell you before I do anything.”

Hermione searched his eyes, her brows folded tightly. He watched the problem play out in micro-gestures on her face, and all at once he felt so stricken with tenderness it left him in pain. It was completely inconceivable that anything should ever hurt her. It was equally inconceivable that nothing would. There was a world outside his room. It was dreadful and inevitable.

And there were other people. There were children in Hogwarts Castle and they were full of rage and magic, and he himself had taught a dozen of them to duel, showed them where to put their feet, how to hold their hands. When they fought, they would make his mistakes, because he had shown them how.

He’d learned to duel from his mother. His father had been a soldier, but every move Draco knew he’d learned from Narcissa Black.

“Granger?”

She hummed, tilting her head at him.

He twisted his signet around his finger, biting a line into the skin beneath. “What would it take for your parents to leave the country?”

“I don’t know,” she said, belated. “Their lives are here. Their families are here, their jobs… And I would have to go with them. They would never leave without me.”

“What if you did?”

“I wouldn’t,” she said immediately.

“Even for your parents?”

Her head gave a stubborn, reflexive little shake. “Not even for them. No.”

He didn’t ask the corollary question, which would have been: Even for me?

When she spoke, the hoarse edge implied she’d heard it anyway. “I’ve been fighting with my mum,” she said. “She doesn’t believe me, when I tell her what’s happening. It’s not on the muggle news. All they’re reporting is terrorism. And the thing is, the Prophet’s not reporting it either, so I can’t even show her a wizarding paper to prove it. She thinks I’m a bit mad, and when I’m thinking rationally, I don’t blame her.”

It had occurred to him, over the last twenty-four hours, that among her reasons for staying at the Manor there might be something she was running away from.

“If my daughter was a witch, and I wasn’t,” he said, “I would treat her as an authority on what is happening in the magical world.”

“You have to think of it the other way,” she said unhappily. “If a muggle came to you and tried to tell you something really dangerous was happening in their world, and you had to leave your home because of it, would you take it seriously?”

He wouldn’t, of course.

“No, of course you wouldn’t,” she said, after his silence. “Because they don’t know anything about how you live. Because they’re gone nine months of the year, and also most vacations, and they barely know you, and you’ve never seen a muggle do anything so dangerous you have to be afraid of it. That’s my mother. That’s the position she’s in, which I’ve put her in, and I haven’t helped her one bit by telling her so little about it, because if it was really dangerous, all those years, why wouldn't her daughter tell her? And I know that," she said, her voice cracking, "I know exactly why it's difficult for her. So then I try to talk to her, thinking this is it, this is the time I'm going to get through: I'm going to be patient with her, this time, I'm going to be reasonable and persuasive and calm. And then something happens and we're screaming at each other. I don't know why. I'm right, and I can prove it. It's that she's so incredibly stubborn, and she doesn't listen to me, really, I mean she listens enough, but she clearly doesn't care to be convinced, so it's like she's just tolerating whatever I say until it's her turn to talk and she gets to explain how I'm wrong. She's so stubborn I'm amazed she doesn't try to drive through red lights. I don't know how my dad stands it, some days, I really don't."

Draco, tactfully, said nothing. She glared at him.

"Shut up," she said.

"I said nothing," he said, tactfully.

"That's the least tactful way of saying nothing I've ever heard!"

"Take notes. You've already found the least tactful way of saying everything else."

"You should meet my mother," she said, her throat tight. She cleared it. "Anyway, it doesn't matter. I'm not leaving Britain, so it's not a question with teeth. And I have until September to figure out what… to do with them. When I'm away."

"When do you intend to go back to them?" He tried to sound indifferent.

Hermione took a deep breath. "Not immediately," she said. "If you'll have me. Not to impose. Sorry. I didn't just assume that you would __"

“Lord Merlin. Had my tongue down her throat twice in twenty-four hours and she’s worried about ‘imposing.’”

“You can’t just swan up to someone’s house and snog them and expect them to put you up,” said Hermione, with the firm indignation of a person with baffling psychologies. “It’s bad form, and worse, it’s unreliable. But. I don’t want to go home until I have a plan, and I don’t have a plan, so… I’ll go back once I have one. I just don’t. Yet.”

He looked at her with wary intrigue. “You know, I’m not altogether persuaded you’re not running away from them.”

Hermione curled into herself, slightly sulkish. “I’m not,” she said. “I’m going back. Just.” Her face crumpled. “I’m so tired of fighting. I’m so tired. I’ve been fighting all year. I fought to come here, I’ll fight to go back to school. I'll have to fight when I’m there, too, and it might very well be real fighting — we don’t really know how to do that, I’m realizing, and that’s also terrifying. Most times we’ve actually fought people it’s been other students, or we’ve had the element of surprise, or there have been so many of us it doesn’t matter. When Rookwood pointed his wand at me,” she said, with strangled laughter, “I thought — God help me — the first thing I thought was, ‘I hope Draco does something,’ because if I’d been alone I don’t know what I’d have done. Throw a Shield Charm, maybe.”

“You underrate yourself,” he said distantly. He didn’t like to remember those moments; he had to keep tearing back the cassette of his memory to keep it from rolling into the next scene. “You had an excellent curse. And for what it’s worth, the Shield Charm would have worked.”

“Right,” she said doubtfully. “Yeah, it would’ve.”

She turned her head into his chest, her cheek pillowed on his collar. He closed his eyes and lifted his foot from the neck of exhaustion; it roared up to meet him, hungry and waiting. A warm breeze marched through the still, dusty air.

The city of Salisbury had an old-fashioned squat brick train station, a wide parking lot, and rows of cottages in brick and white plaster suspended colorful pennants, curving away along the winding country lanes. At four thousand people, it was not a city by size; the Crown had conferred the title with letters patent in acknowledgement of “ancient prescriptive right,” which, by Hermione’s account, essentially meant that people persisted in calling it a city for long enough that the statisticians gave up and went home. Their ensuing argument, which carried them through breakfast, lunch, and up to the very Manor gates, debated whether this constituted a win for linguistic descriptivism.

She talked when she was nervous. She’d been in a talkative mood when he left.

The London train arrived at five o’clock, though he never saw Dumbledore himself disembark. Instead, he emerged from the thronging crowd, wearing an unusually drab and donnish set of master’s robes, with a blue tie and soft cap hiding his long white hair. The gold crescent on his earring matched his pince-nez.

He approached Draco with his hands behind his back and stood politely, as if waiting for instruction. Draco jerked his head outside the station, and he smiled in understanding.

“I have always wished to visit the cathedral in this city,” he said. “It is astonishing how even the truly decrepit can put things off. Will you permit me?”

The cathedral sat cushioned by a lush setting of green, its facade an ornamented braid of glass and chiseled stone. The spire perched high on a series of ascending roofs, like steps for a giant to come and claim his spear. Inside, cloisters of smooth sandstone ensconced shining pews of dark wood, and the stained-glass clerestory strained afternoon light through the scalloped ceiling.

Draco hung back by the door as Dumbledore made a showy, delighted examination of the ceiling, and exclaimed appreciatively at the windows, though both were smaller than those in the Great Hall. He inspected the pews and read the inscriptions on the stone tombs. He followed patiently in the wake of a walking tour, and returned to Draco after an inspection that lasted, by his lights, far too long.

“Remarkable,” he said. “Built without magic. Can you imagine?”

Draco glanced at the group of muggles who had come in. They wore loose jeans and large plastic jewelry, and they spoke in loud, turbulent Essex.

“I shouldn’t worry,” said Dumbledore. “Most people know better than to concern themselves with the mutterings of strange old men. Moreover, my countrymen are dispositionally averse to oddity. Whenever I am in London, a few full-throated remarks about unicorns will cure me of virtually all eye contact.”

“Remarkable,” he repeated. “Have you finished?”

“Have we another appointment?” Dumbledore inquired. “I do apologize; I thought we were meandering. By all means, lead on.”

There was a bench under an ash tree beside the cathedral, with a view of the spire and the street beyond. Draco cast up a set of preemptive wards. Dumbledore sat and watched him, twiddling his thumbs. Draco wondered more than once if he was the subject of an unspoken joke.

The last Muffliato settled with a ripple over the tree. Draco sat down, slipping his wand up its sheath in his sleeve. Dumbledore crossed his legs, humming.

“Severus Snape is burned,” Draco said, attempting a tone of disinterest. His heart twitched, anyway. He felt as if he had approached a steep cliff and leaned over it, and as he spoke, his balance was slowly shifting. “The Ministry fell. You don’t have power. You don’t have an army. And you don’t have eyes on the Dark Lord.”

“For preference, I use ‘He-Who-Must-Not-Be-Named,’” he said. “I assume the Ministry will reinstate the taboo, if it has not already, but I do not use tyrants’ chosen epithets. Politics aside, they are usually quite silly.”

“And a bound relative clause sounds better to you?”

“It gets us nowhere, vis-a-vis: silliness,” admitted Dumbledore, “but it takes us away from ‘Lord,’ which, I think, is good practice. Draco, forgive me my presumptions, and I will hear from you whatever you wish, but I fear I know what you intend to say.”

“Do you? Good,” he said, clipped. “Saves me time.”

“Yes. I also fear that I cannot conscience it.”

Draco nodded. He had expected that. It was necessary; in negotiation, the first answer was generally for appearances.

“You are sixteen,” said Dumbledore, like it was news. “You have recently buried your mother. You want to do something. Of course you do. You are a brave young man, and you care for your friends. You want to do what you can. But you are sixteen, and your mother is dead, and you are not prepared to undertake a decision of any gravity.”

“Lily Evans was sixteen when Alastor Moody admitted her into the Order of the Phoenix.”

“She was a tall sixteen,” said Dumbledore blithely, and when Draco began to speak, he sighed. “No. We are not negotiating. I question, in truth, whether I should have let you bring it up to begin with. I suspected from your letter that this was your goal; I came here in the hopes that it would be more effective to dissuade you with a firm and direct negative answer.”

“I don’t believe you.”

“Why?”

“You didn’t come from Scotland to tell me no.”

“I did,” said Dumbledore mildly, turning. “Apparently, I came to do it twice. You are not adequately educated to undertake a decision of this gravity. You are uniquely unprepared in this moment, when you have more anger than prudence, and more fear than sense.” He shook his head. “Wait a few years, Draco. Prove to me you will still want it when you are old enough to know what it means.”

“Some of my friends are going to die in the next few years, Professor.”

Dumbledore blinked at him, his expression even.

He added, a touch vicious: “I’m old enough to know what that means. How many would you like me to watch? At what number of bodies do I become an adult, in your eyes? My parents aren’t enough, I take it. What will be? And how many years will I have to wait, then, to have thoughts you won’t dismiss as the fruit of juvenile grief?”

“The last, I could not say,” said Dumbledore. “Perhaps I will know when I am older.”

Draco curled his lip and turned away. Dumbledore watched him intently.

“How did you imagine it would work?” he said gently. “Did you expect a hero’s welcome? The childhood friend of Harry Potter? Who came with him, for his protection, to Grimmauld Place?”

“Where my mother died,” he spat, and used the bleary pain of it to ground him. “Where she was killed for boy Potter’s hopeless cause. Where my family tore itself apart over a worthless outcast’s dying dream. How better to teach someone the lesson of loyalty? What else could be enough?”

It was easy to say the words, because he almost believed them. “Harry Potter is the reason my mother is dead,” he added bitterly. “And with her, all schoolyard dreams of glory. There's nothing noble in death, nothing worthy. Let someone else catch Potter's curses for him. I'm ready to grow up, my lord.”

Dumbledore winced. Draco was glad.

“And I’m Draco Malfoy, by the way,” he said, “in case you’d forgotten. He won’t have, I assure you.”

“I never do.”

“The lord of House Malfoy, and the last male heir of Black. Two of the Twenty-Eight. Two of them. Dead, but for me. You think he wouldn’t take me? You don’t know purebloods like I do.”

“Nor do I know Hermione Granger, as you do,” said Dumbledore, effortlessly gentle, which was — not unfair, considering, but still — spectacularly vicious, really quite something. If he weren’t furious he might have been impressed.

He said harshly, “I can Occlude.”

“I’m sure you can.”

“I don’t have to hide everything. Snape didn’t. The Dark Lord knew his feelings for Lily, he didn’t care about them.”

“Severus’s feelings for Lily did not bear great inspection,” said Dumbledore, “being that their friendship ended before he took up the service. I do not take this as the case for you.”

“I could pretend, to the extent I had to. I’m sure Snape did his share of that.”

“Pretend what?” Dumbledore inquired. “Pretend to quit her company? Pretend not to know her, nor desire to know her, except as an inferior object for which you experience the occasional wayward tenderness?”

“Don’t.”

“I marvel that you rebuke me; it’s your own suggestion. You will have to say much worse than that of her, if you do as you intend. And what would your aunt think of your predilections, if she discovered them?”

“Nothing I can tell her will be worse than the truth,” he said shortly. “She would be far less dangerous to Hermione if she thought I didn’t care about her.”

“Does Hermione agree?”

“That’s between her and me,” he said tightly, “and not you, and if it was somehow, conceivably, your business to ask, I would assure you that Hermione would do whatever it took to win the war, including what I’m offering. If this were possible for her to do, she would have done it already. She might consult me. If I asked her not to, she wouldn’t listen.”

“I grant you that the situation, reversed, bears little doubt,” he agreed. “As it is: I am not certain your logic holds.”

“I am.”

“You think she would sacrifice you?”

“I think she would sacrifice herself. Which is functionally the same thing.”

“In many relevant ways it is not.”

“It’s the same thing to me. You understand? If she did, it would be the same as — what would happen — it would be the same.”

He found himself stumbling, and shut his mouth, loathing himself. Dumbledore tilted his head sadly.

“Your mother was very dear to you, wasn’t she?” he said, apropos of nothing. Draco gave him a scathing look.

“Must you?”

“I apologize,” he said. “I forget myself. This is not the first time I have had this conversation.”

The tone evoked his sparring with Umbridge under the Entrance Hall: My justice has been much delayed.

He was sick of that, too. Relentless nostalgizing, naval-gazing, soliloquies about the first war. He had heard enough of them. He had long since ceased to find anything romantic in the idea of being anyone’s resurrection.

Draco said, “If you don’t want me to do this, then tell me how you’re going to win the war.”

Dumbledore clasped his hands over his knee. “I wish I could. I wish I had a great and secret plan to play upon the world’s many threads. I wish I lived in Pushkin, and could ‘sing Freedom to the world, and strike vice upon thrones.’ But I fear Tolstoy had the better argument, and I have always been at heart a Pierre.”

“Well, then.”

“Well, then,” he agreed. “You know the number of the beast. The horcruxes must be found, and destroyed. An army must be raised, trained, and sent to die. The Order numbers between twenty and a hundred, depending on how you count its membership, and I do not know who else will answer the call. The enemy rallies the oldest and richest families in the Wizarding World against us, and adds to their number the dementors, the werewolves under Greyback, and most of the giant clans… Still, all is not lost. I have a general. I have a Minister. I have a castle.”

“But you have no spymaster.”

Dumbledore shrugged. “One manages.”

“One doesn’t. In fact. Rather, one doesn’t have to.”

“Explain this to me,” he remarked. “Why do you want to spy? It is not a glorious species of heroism. It would ask for all of you, ceaselessly. It would be cruel. It would be cruel to everyone you love.”

Because there was nothing left of him. Because his father had died and his mother had died and the only people left to him would die, too, if something did not happen, if someone didn’t do something. Because Harry and Ron would die, if something did not happen. Because Hermione would die, and if he stopped long enough to think about what he was without them the answer yawned ragged and bottomless.

No one had saved his father. No one had saved his mother. No one would save anything loved by Draco Malfoy except himself, and it was a hard lesson, but he had learned eventually. If he wanted the world to stop killing things he loved, it had to be fought. It had to be beaten. Well, he was good enough. He was the last of his house, and the best. He was the last best thing between her life and the fire.

He looked at Dumbledore. He knew how to make his voice sound like his mother’s. It was a certain texture in the drawl, a crispness in the consonants, an arid aspiration in the vowels.

It was his same accent, though, and the same cadence. His mother’s voice was the spine of his own.

“Because they’re the only thing that matters,” he said.

His reward for the performance was the closest Dumbledore ever came to a flinch: a flicker in his composure, a shift of the eyebrow, a shadow in the eyes. It was thrilling and unnerving to have that ability.

“Deeply noble,” remarked Dumbledore. Then: “Serve them, then, by keeping yourself alive. None of them will thank you for what you are suggesting.”

Draco smoothed his trousers and stood. “It occurs to me that I don’t actually require your permission,” he said. “I could do this, and you wouldn’t stop me. My legal guardian is in hiding. You’re acquainted, of course, with my next of kin. If I went to Theo Nott and told him to take me with him the next time he saw his father, what would you do about it? Would you bar me from Hogwarts? No, you wouldn’t.”

“I categorically rebuke that idea,” he said, frowning, and leaning forward on his knees. “I disavow it. Draco, if I thought it would make a difference, I would beg you not to do it.”

“I’m not asking you to beg,” he said, struck by the thrill of having the upper hand. It was so nice to have any sort of power, at all, that it was difficult not to lean towards it. “Technically, I’m asking you to threaten. What would you do?”

“I would mourn,” said Dumbledore tiredly, “if you want my honest answer. And I would do everything in my power to save you from yourself, however difficult you endeavored to make it for me.”

Draco considered this, and nodded.

“I understand.”

“You do not,” he pleaded. “You do not know. It may be years before you understand what you are doing to yourself.”

Draco drew the wand from his sleeve and cut down the wards. Birdsong swelled lush and loud as Vivaldi. The road burbled from across the green, chattering tourists, muttering cars.

“If I live that long, I’ll remember you told me so,” he said acidly. “If I don’t, I’ll try to remember to be relieved.”

When the carriage deposited him back at the Manor, the sun sat almost level with the earth. He found Hermione reading in the garden, a stack of books from the Manor library piled beside her lawn chair, one of them supporting a porcelain tea set. She had filched one of his shirts, dark blue with a wide lapel, and mended a pair of his old school trousers to sit properly on her waist. The sleeves kept slipping off her elbow and down her arms, and she fidgeted them back up absently while reading.

He arrived at her back and watched, for a while, as the wind tossed the jasmine behind her like snowflakes. Some of them caught in her hair. Most things did, at some point.

She turned a page. “You’re going to give me a complex,” she said. “Staring.”

“Suppose I want your other ones to have a friend.” He came up behind her, his hands in his pockets, and read over her shoulder. He reached over to take it from her. “Is that the dueling manual?”

She snapped it closed and held it away. “You are so annoying,” she said, craning her neck to scowl, but her voice glowed with how pleased she was to see him. He smiled at her. “I’m sitting here reading this, minding my business, and you think, ‘oh, I wonder what that is, how should I find out? Take it from her without warning, or, more radically, asking—’”

“It’s my book.”

“You think that means you can just take it whenever you want, do you?”

“That would be the legal understanding of ‘mine.’” He leaned down and spoke in her ear. “That’s also my shirt.”

She dropped the book in his waiting hand and said, declaratively: “Well. That’s. And I mean. It would be. In one sense, even so.”

“Even so,” he agreed, leaning on the chair. Her eyes made a desperate appeal for him to forget her tragic and sudden aphasia. He denied it with a sad shake of his head.

“Starting over,” she said. “Hello, Draco. It’s lovely to see you. This is your book; I borrowed it. Thank you terribly. Tea?”

“I liked your first try better. But I’ll have some.”

He drew the other wand chair over with a swish of his wand. She followed it curiously. “Trace?” she murmured.

“Difficult to tell, in a house like this, and I doubt the Ministry can be arsed. None of the purebloods will be keeping that custom, especially if they don’t go back to Hogwarts.”

“Yet another advantage,” she remarked, handing over his tea.

“Hardly bears thinking about.”

“On that idea,” she said, and reached for the book again. “I’ve been reading the dueling manual. I want to make a go at learning, if you’ll teach me. I think if I had some sort of system, or knowledge — I thought it was specious, trying to make fighting into a precision exercise, but I’m reading this, and at least it gives you some sense of what to do.”

“I’ll teach you,” he said, and as if it was the same thought: “I went to see Dumbledore.”

Hermione paused, waiting. By and by, she set the book down.

“I’m going to—” He tested the words out, but the words were clumsy and didn’t say what he wanted them to. Instead, he said: “I offered to spy for him.”

“Did he accept?” she said calmly.

“No.”

“Oh,” she said. “Good.”

They waited for each other. Her silence had a brittle, interrogatory quality.

“I don’t know that it matters,” he said. “I don’t need his permission.”

“His opinion might be valuable, though. Among others.”

“That’s why I’m asking for yours.”

She nodded, tongue probing her cheek. “Alright,” she said. “Tell me what you’re thinking. I’m not sure how this would work. Would you still be at Hogwarts? Would you leave, to go — spy, and come back?”

“In principle.”

“And you would pretend to be—”

“Yes. I could explain more of my thinking, or we could acknowledge the fact that if I’ve thought of this, it’s already occurred to you twice.”

Hermione stood up, her arms folded, and began walking a slow circuit of the garden. The seconds ticked past, and she did not reply; he began to tap his foot. Her expression was pensive. It was not immediately furious. This could be read as more alarming.

Abruptly, Hermione drew her wand. She pointed it at the ground. “Expecto Patronum.”

The silver otter appeared in a fission of starlight. It frolicked across the rosebushes, carried through an invisible stream. Her hand gripped her wand like the hilt of a knife.

“That was my letter,” she said. “Eleventh birthday. September nineteenth, 1990. I kept the letter under my pillow for a year.”

She swished her wand and cast another. The first otter disappeared, and a second swam out over the fleet.

“That was my Sorting. I was only the third or fourth Gryffindor, after Lavender and Seamus. Expecto Patronum. That’s the mountain troll in the girls’ bathroom. You brought me a sandwich. It was,” she said, “a terrible sandwich.”

“I beg your pardon. I’m sorry the lady’s bathroom sandwich inexplicably failed quality control.”

“It was so bad,” she said tenderly. “I saved the crusts until they went stale.”

She swished her wand again. A fourth patronus hopped out and curled around her feet, subdued.

“I don’t suppose you’d ever have heard about a book named Peter and Wendy,” she said. “It’s a muggle book. I wouldn’t have told you about it, it’s for children. It’s about a girl named Wendy, who’s quite bossy and patronizing and takes care of her two brothers; and there’s a magical boy named Peter who comes to her window one night, and teaches her to fly. He takes her away to Neverland, which is a magical island where no one ever has to grow up, and the four children have adventures.

“But she goes back to London at the end of the book,” she said. “Because she can’t stay there forever. She misses her parents. And she needs to grow up.”

The otter drifted into dust and floated away.

“‘You need not be sorry for her,’” she said absently. “‘She was one of the kind that likes to grow up. In the end she grew up of her own free will a day quicker than the other girls.’”

A hollow yawned in his abdomen. Cold poured from it like oil from a well.

“We could run away,” she said, looking at him. Her eyes were bright and fervid.

He almost laughed. “No, we can’t.”

“We can do anything we want,” she said intently. “You taught me that.”

“Yes, but you don’t mean it,” he said, strained with the unfairness of having to say so.

Hermione didn’t allow herself to want things she couldn’t have. That was why her plans worked. It was why they’d wasted months of skittish dancing around each other, while time sieved like Floo powder through their fingers.

“I do mean it.” She moved so fast she tripped, and caught herself on the arms of his chair, bending to speak quickly and earnestly in his face. “I mean it. Run away now. We don’t have to go back to school. We don’t have to tell anybody. We could go, now, and we would make it. You and me. You know we would.”

“But you don’t want to,” he said tiredly, aching. “Do you?”

She faltered.

The rest of the world reintroduced itself with a thatch of starlings shooting into the evening sky. Facing defeat, she slackened her grip.

Hermione eased upright to stand on her feet again. In her gaze was a guarded mingling of reprimand and longing, her pupils blown wide, her cheeks flushed. His heart was going as if he’d done a lap around the castle and he was struck low again by the sight of her, how badly he wanted her, how much he would have been willing to do for her to just kiss him.

“We’re not running away,” she said, as if she’d just realized it herself. “I can’t leave Harry. Even if he makes me furious. Even when I hate him. I won’t leave him, I never could.”

Somehow, inconceivably, this still managed to surprise him. In her voice were long, deep strains of the love she bore for Harry Potter — strains that welled from the very root of her, a promise they would find filigreed in her heart on the mortician’s table. From the moment they’d met, she’d been sewn to Harry’s side by a tether of material Draco had never seen clearly, and she’d always had half a mind to hang herself with it.

“It was a silly idea,” she said. She glanced at him, checking. “Wasn’t it?”

“The queen and the rook don’t run off together,” he said. “It’s a nice thought, but it’s not what they’re for.”

Hermione nodded, biting her lip. She lowered her head and started to cry.

The color of the sky at dusk was a drowning, pelagic blue. The rhythm of his heart collapsed from looking at her.

“You promised,” she said. “And I’m furious at how dumb it is to care, given everything else. It’s the least of all the things I could possibly cry about. But you promised you would stay. Because I asked. Do you remember?”

He caught her hand in a tight grip. “I’m not leaving.”

“I know you’re not. I know it’s not real. I’m not mad at you.”

“You could ask me not to do it.”

“You know I won’t do that,” she snapped, “that’s why you told me, isn’t it, you knew I’d listen and a part of me would think, ‘That would be really useful for a lot of reasons, if he doesn’t get himself killed.’ You knew I’d thought about it, and I did. And I thought, ‘God, I hope he never thinks of that, what a fucking horrible thing to think about your boyfriend.'"

He stood up, and took her arms at the elbows. "From a different vantage," he said, aware it did not remotely suffice for comfort, "all it expresses is a certain faith that I won't get myself killed."

"It was a horrible thing," she said. "It still is. It's worse to hear it, because I trust you, and I think you're right." Her nails bit into the skin of his neck and bound themselves in his shoulder, so tightly he'd have new creases in his shirtfront. "You can't. You can't leave. You just can't. You — I — please. You can't."

"I won't. I'm not. I won't." Her fear dislodged his agitation and cast him into anxious disquiet. He looped his arm around her waist and held her there, her heartbeat rabbiting against his chest like an accusation. "I'm not going anywhere. You have me. While you want me, you have me. I promised you that, and I meant it."

"Promise again."

"I promise."

"Promise again," she said, hard-edged.

"I promise. And I promise."

He slid his hand into her hair and she shuddered, burying herself in him.

"You can't leave," she whispered, nearly inaudible. "Don't leave me here. Not when it's like this."

"I wouldn't." He meant it as much as he had ever meant anything. He meant as he meant my name is Draco, and much as he'd ever meant my name is Malfoy, perhaps more.

"Don't be ridiculous," he added. "Where would I go without you?"

She gave a little laugh and drew back, searching his eyes. Hers were bloodshot and rimmed in pink.

“I don’t know,” she said. “I wouldn’t be there, so I wouldn’t know.”

“Nor I.” He kissed her forehead, and then her mouth, gently, because it hadn’t been kissed in a while, and needed to be. She relaxed in his arms when he kissed her. It slightly amazed him.

“You’re still unforgivably stupid,” she whispered against his mouth. “I hate this. I hate this. No one should ever feel this way about anyone. Least of all anyone noble.”

“It’s not my fault you have a type.”

She throttled her own laugh into a throaty noise of warning, and then she was laughing and crying and kissing him, roughly. It had the hard, unsophisticated pressure of someone still learning how, a young girl’s clumsy kiss, and thought how odd it felt that they should be so young still. That he should be standing in his mother’s gardens, his heart beating quick, and have under all that a thrumming layer of grief that seemed older than he was.

He was sixteen. The sun was setting fast and low.

When he reached the gates of Knotscliff Peak, the air thundered from the ocean beating the cliffs. The road to the gates led through the forest, and obscured the entrance until the last possible moment, at which point it whisked away a curtain of shrubs to unveil the file of wrought-iron that enclosed the green. On the hilltop, silhouetted with eerie contrast against a featureless sky, sat three squat turrets of rain-washed stone.

Theo didn’t open the gates. He stood behind them, his arms folded, his weight on one hip, bearing the expression of one debating whether to call the aurors or the hounds. He had slept since he’d seen him last, and seemed less jittery, which made a dire improvement on his usual mode of asylum chic.

“Hark at you,” he called. “You don’t look like you’re having a psychotic break.”

“Contain your disappointment,” said Draco. “The day is young.”

“But I so looked forward to you going mad,” said Theo mildly. “I’ve always said you’d make a fine nutter. In some respects, you’re already one of the greats.” He lifted his chin, and his voice hardened. “I heard about Narcissa.”

“Did you,” said Draco, toneless.

“Yeah,” he said. “I suppose you buried her.”

“Generally happens.”

Theo set his jaw. Draco slipped a bit of metal out of his pocket, turning it over in his hands. Theo watched it.

“Pansy says I’m a fool for inviting you,” he said. “I’m open to that possibility. But I told her I wouldn’t let you in unless I had a bloody good reason, and then, I’d still make you ask me nicely.”

He fell silent and waited, with furtive expectation, framed by the towers of Knotscliff. Draco recalled something Daphne had told him once, about Theodore and Pansy, running wild in a house with no adults to notice it, or care.

Theodore Nott had disarmed Barty Crouch in the moments before his death, and he had broken a boy’s memory to pieces for the crime of knowing something he shouldn’t. He could be violent and supercilious and brash. He also had a soft streak for things he’d known as a child.

How deep the streak cut, it was difficult to say. It was at least deep enough to make it to the front gate.

Draco tossed him the bit of metal. The snitch flipped through the bars of the gate, and Theo caught it. Freed, the wings peeled from the sides and buzzed, straining against his grasp.

“I’m thinking of selling the house in France,” said Draco.

Theo raised his eyebrows. “It’s not a bad little property,” he said. “Good for a getaway, if you want one. You might want to wait for a good offer.”

“You wouldn’t be interested in it, of course.”

His eyebrows twitched together faintly. “I’m not on the market,” he said. “No capital, old boy. My father sees to all that.”

“I imagine he gives you a wide latitude to negotiate.”

“Couldn’t say,” said Theo thoughtfully, thumbing the snitch. “Wouldn’t help my position, you understand. Draco, I hate to kill a good rhythm, but I’m drawing a blank on how to translate ‘I don’t know what you fucking want from me’ into a real estate metaphor.”

That would have to suffice, as a move to sentiment. “I know what you did to Cassius Warrington,” he said, and Theo’s face gave a half-wry, half-angry twitch. “I want you to do something for me.”

“Ah. Blackmail! Here I was being cute, thinking I’d get something out of this.”

“What you get is the confidence that I won’t tell anyone that Warrington’s hippocampus is going supernova. That’s something.”

“How do you know he’s not dead yet?”

“Please. It would’ve been announced, and Parkinson would have to go into mourning.”

“So they do get newspapers in England.”

“Maybe they do. I don’t read the gossip section. I get enough from Meadowridge.”

Theo’s composure visibly calcified. “What did you tell Daphne?”

“Nothing, yet.”

“I should trust you?”

“I mean, you could always ask her.”

“Fine. For the record, this is not ‘asking nicely.’ What do you want?”

Draco waited. The waves shattered against the cliffside, and at their heights, the roar softened to a murmur. It could have been voices, at that distance. Someone could have screamed from the bottom, and it would reach them as a whisper. They were fathoms above what a normal voice could reach. Knotscliff was like a small Olympus, tucked high on its dark little crag.

“To make the right choice,” he said.

Theo stared at him. He rolled the snitch over his palm, pressed the wings flat, and pocketed it. When he smiled, it was without happiness.

“Dad’s out,” he said. “What say we go have a brandy and talk it over like grownups?”

Draco nodded. Theo clicked his tongue. The gates pried open. Draco had to step back from their path to move forward and through, to where Theo waited for him.

He extended his hand. Theo took it with a pleasant expression of surprise. The band of Draco’s signet pressed cool between their fingers. The gates screamed when they closed, iron grinding against iron. The bolt moved like a peal of lightless thunder.

END OF VOLUME TWO

-Obligatory needle drop, for the end of the volume, because I can't help myself.

-It just wouldn't be Book 5 if it didn't fight back and demand copious gut-deep content edits in the last possible stretch. Goodbye, my darling. You were consistent to the bitter end.

-More specifically, Chapter 82 had to be killed completely and rewritten no less than three times. I think Narcissa did not appreciate my attempt to describe her personal life.

-I pushed myself to the absolute limit to get this one out on time (kind of? technically?) because I really wanted to deliver on schedule. I'm going to take a bit of a writerly break and try to refill the juices. More information to come on the Book 6 update schedule on my Tumblr, when the time arives.

-This would not exist, ever, in any iteration, without all of the wonderful people who are kind to me, and are patient with me, and forgive my mistakes. I'm just a human plugging along trying to make something kinda halfway maybe good, and if I manage part of that, I'm grateful.

-And hey: Thanks. Love you. See you soon.